Art in America

JANUARY 1983/$3.50
Outside North America/$5.00

THE EXPRESSIONISM QUESTION, II

Kirchner's Berlin Scenes/Expressionist Architecture/More on New German Painting Critical Takes on Neo-Expressionism/"Expressionist" Lichtensteins

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
J A 1983
UMI

Three Part Variety

January 11 – February 2, 1983

1/11 – 1/15, 1983

MICHAEL KEANE
GEORGE MOORE
JOLIE STAHL
TOM WARREN
BOBBY G
SCOTT MILLER
JOHN LUPE

1/19 – 1/25, 1983

CAROL WELLS
KEN BORTMAN
MICHAEL OTTERSEN
JEAN FOOS
DIRK ROWNTREE
PHILIP SMITH

1/27 – 2/2, 1983

KIM FINE
TWENG KWONG CHI
NICHOLAS A. MOUFARREGE
CHUCK MANNEY
SUSAN BOWMAN
KIKI SMITH
FRANK PALAIA

ALEXANDER F. MILLIKEN INC.
98 Prince Street, New York, NY 10012
212 / 966-7800

in conjunction with Richard Hambleton and David Wojnarowicz

Photo: David Wojnarowicz

Happy New Year and Thank You, Art World!

Here are the year-end advertising page totals for the four leading art magazines:

	ADVERTISING PAGES, 1982
Art in America	1,155
ArtNews	990
Artforum	486
Portfolio	369

As the art world's leading advertising medium in 1982, Art in America placed first in U.S. gallery advertising first in New York gallery advertising first in International gallery advertising first in Auction sales advertising first in advertising from members of the Art Dealers Association of America.

Our resolution for the new year is simply this: to make every effort to earn the continued confidence and support of the artworld's most respected advertisers.

Again, our sincere thanks.

Paul Stanley

Publisher

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
J A 1983
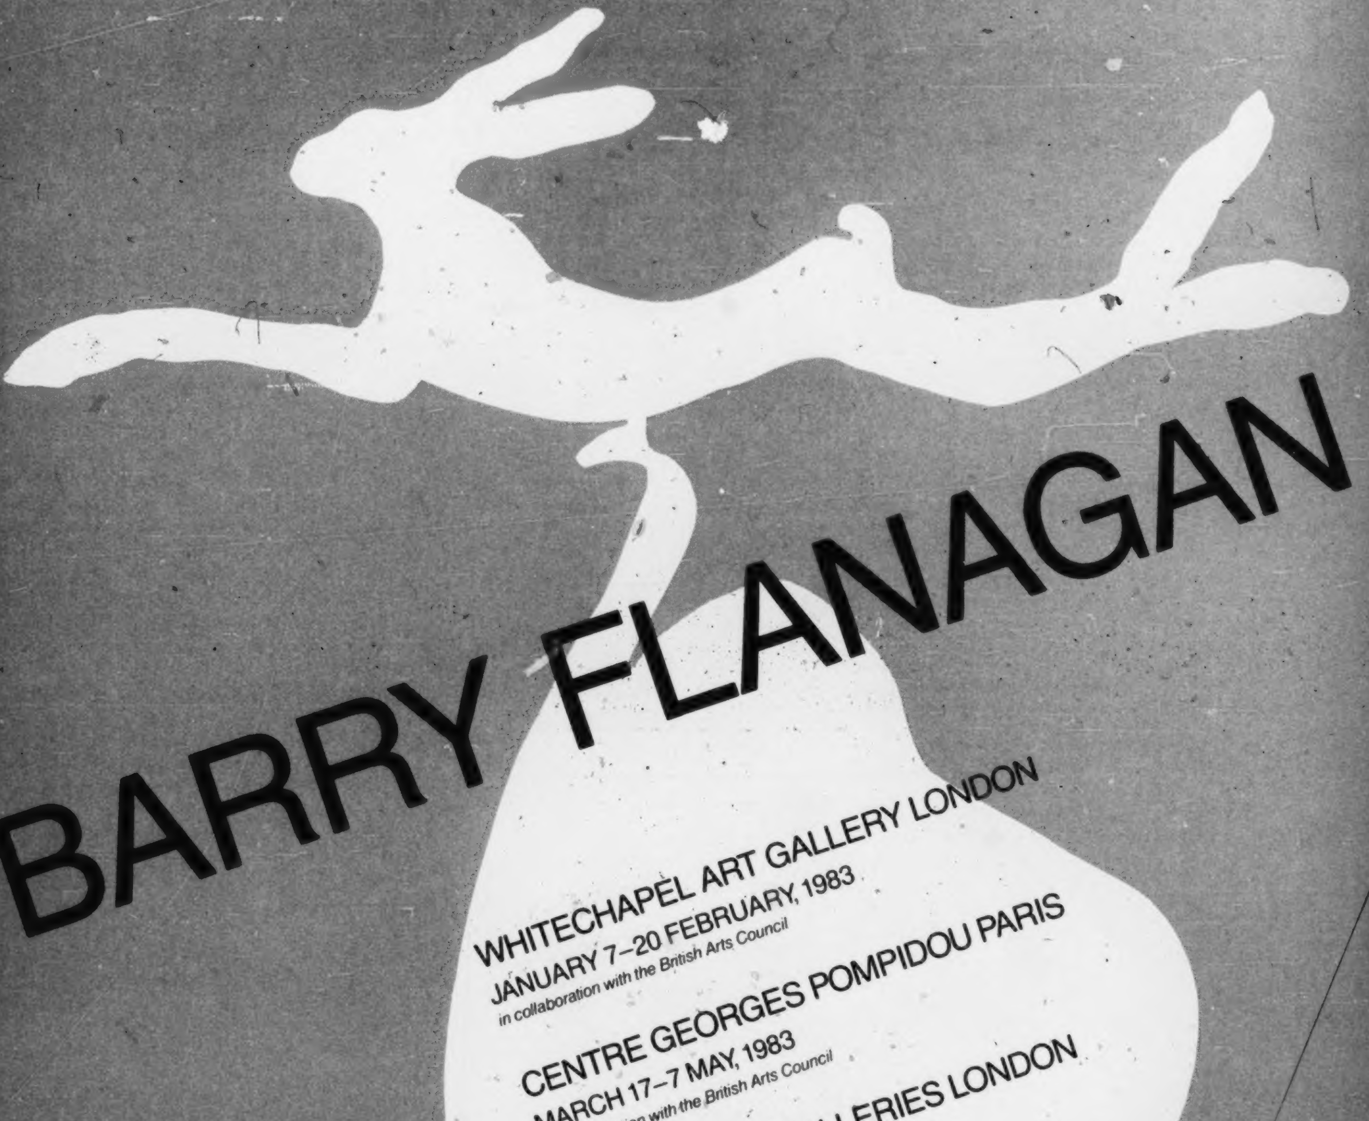
UMI



BARRY FLANAGAN

WHITECHAPEL ART GALLERY LONDON
JANUARY 7–20 FEBRUARY, 1983
in collaboration with the British Arts Council

CENTRE GEORGES POMPIDOU PARIS
MARCH 17–7 MAY, 1983
in collaboration with the British Arts Council

WADDINGTON GALLERIES LONDON
JANUARY 6–29, 1983

BARRY FLANAGAN IS REPRESENTED BY WADDINGTON GALLERIES LONDON AND THE PACE GALLERY NEW YORK

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

Galerie Maeght

Painting, sculpture and drawings by European and American masters of the 20th century

Arnold Herstand, President
9 West 57th Street
New York, New York 10019
212 371 9077
Telex 128931

By Appointment Only

Paris, Zürich

ADAMI · ALECHINSKY
ARAKAWA · ARROYO
[illegible] · BRAQUE
CALDER
[illegible] · CHILLIDA
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible] · TAPIES
[illegible] · GARCIA
[illegible] VAN VELDE

Art in America

JANUARY 1983

SPECIAL ISSUE: EXPRESSIONISM, II

Alienation in Berlin: Kirchner's Street Scenes Rosalyn Deutsche 64
A new political reading of the German Expressionist's images of a city on the eve of economic crisis.

The Short Life of the Sincere Stroke Carter Ratcliff 73
How long can the Expressionist brushstroke last? What happens when raw spontaneity becomes a convention? A look at some exemplary careers.

The Expressive Fallacy Hal Foster 80
Expressionism is here examined as an ideology and as a language, but one that denies its mediated status.

Lichtenstein's Expressionist Takes David Deitcher 84
An investigation of this artist's recurrent, and ambivalent, treatment of the theme of Expressionism.

Acts of Aggression: German Painting Today, Part II Donald B. Kuspit 90
The conflicts, ironies and irreverent lyricism of the major figures of Germany's new painting are analyzed.

Fantasms and Fragments: Expressionist Architecture Martin Filler 102
A utopian response to the cataclysm of World War I, Expressionist architectural design flourished from 1919 to 1923, and continues to exercise a hold upon the modern imagination.

ISSUES & COMMENTARY

Honor, Power and the Love of Women Craig Owens 7

DEPARTMENTS

Report from Amsterdam
Arriving at the '80s Prudence Carlson 19

Artworld 160

REVIEW OF EXHIBITIONS

New York, Washington, D.C.
Chicago, Los Angeles
San Francisco 115

Cover: Anselm Kiefer's Inneraum (1981, oil, paper, canvas, 113 by 122 inches) was recently exhibited at the Mary Boone Gallery; see "Acts of Aggression: German Painting Today, Part II," beginning on page 90.

Editor: Elizabeth C. Baker

Managing Editor: Joan Simon / Executive Editor: Nancy Marmer / Senior Editors: Ted Mooney, Craig Owens / Associate Editors: Prudence Carlson, Hal Foster / Assistant Managing Editor: Kathryn Howarth / Assistant Editor: Robert Fisher / Designer: Alberto P. Gavasci / Directory Manager: Amy Slaton / Consultant: John Peter / Contributing Editors: Donald B. Kuspit, Lucy Lippard, Sarah McFadden, Linda Nochlin, Carter Ratcliff, Bryan Robertson, Irving Sandler, Peter Schjeldahl, Roberta Smith, Charles F. Stuckey / Corresponding Editors: Chicago, Franz Schulze; San Francisco, Peter Selz; Washington D.C., David Tannous; London, Suzi Gablik; Rome, Milton Gendel

Publisher: Paul Shanley

Director of Advertising: Susan B. Anthony / Advertising Sales: Betty Ann Leibowitz, Susan McCall, Ruth Rothseid / Advertising Services: Susanne Vorster, Mary Baez / Production: Mary Jontry / Production Assistant: Sarah King / Circulation Manager: Susan Blattman / Art in America, 850 Third Ave., N.Y.C., 10022, Tel. (212) 593-2100
Director for International Development: John H. Liesveld Jr., Art in America, 39 Quai des Grands Augustins, 75006 Paris, France. Tel. (1) 325.26.55.

WHITNEY COMMUNICATIONS CORPORATION MAGAZINE DIVISION
PRESIDENT: John S. Prescott SENIOR VICE PRESIDENT, FINANCE/ADMINISTRATION: Gordon H. Duncan
VICE PRESIDENT MARKETING: William Hitzig VICE PRESIDENT PLANNING: Dean Heine
VICE PRESIDENT PRODUCTION: James Kearney VICE PRESIDENT PRODUCT DEVELOPMENT: Virginia Evans PROMOTION DIRECTOR: James Anderson

WHITNEY COMMUNICATIONS CORPORATION
CHAIRMAN: Walter N. Thayer
PRESIDENT: Charles H. G. Rees

Vol. 71, No. 1 (January) Art in America is published 11 times a year (monthly except July) by Art in America, Inc., 850 Third Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10022. Telephone (area code 212) 593-2100. Cable address: AMARTMAG. A member of the Magazine Division of Whitney Communications Corporation. Contents copyright © 1983 by Art in America, Inc., and may not be reproduced in any manner or form without permission. ISSN: 0004-3214. The opinions expressed in "Issues and Commentary," apart from the editor's comments, are those of the writers themselves and not necessarily those of this magazine. Not responsible for unsolicited manuscripts or photographs. Art in America is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature and the Art Index. Back volumes of Art in America are available in microfiche from Bell & Howell, Att. Periodical Department, Old Mansfield Road, Wooster, Ohio 44691. Microfilm copies are available through Xerox University Microfilm, Ann Arbor, Michigan 48106. Articles appearing in this magazine are abstracted and indexed in Historical Abstracts and/or America: History and Life and RILA. Circulation is verified by the Audit Bureau of Circulations. Controlled circulation postage paid at Concord, N.H. and New York, N.Y. BACK ISSUES AND COMPLETE VOLUMES: Lawrence McGilvery, P.O. Box 852, LaJolla, Calif., 92038. SUBSCRIPTIONS: U.S. 11 issues $34.95, 22 issues $59.95, 33 issues $79.95. Possessions & Canada add $8.00 per year. All others add $10.00 per year. Domestic single copy $3.50 prepaid. Outside North America $5.00. Single copy August/Annual $7.45 prepaid (includes $1.50 postage and handling). SUBSCRIPTION OFFICE: Art in America, 542 Pacific Ave., Marion, Ohio 43302. Telephone (area code 614) 383-3141. FOR CHANGE OF ADDRESS send old and new addresses and label from a recent issue. POSTMASTER Send Form No. 3579 to Art in America, 542 Pacific Avenue, Marion, Ohio 43302.

Member of the Audit Bureau of Circulations

VOL
71
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

SMALL WORKS BY MAJOR ARTISTS
December 14–January 22

GEORGE TOOKER, Embracing Couple, 1982. Pencil on paper: 15 x 24″

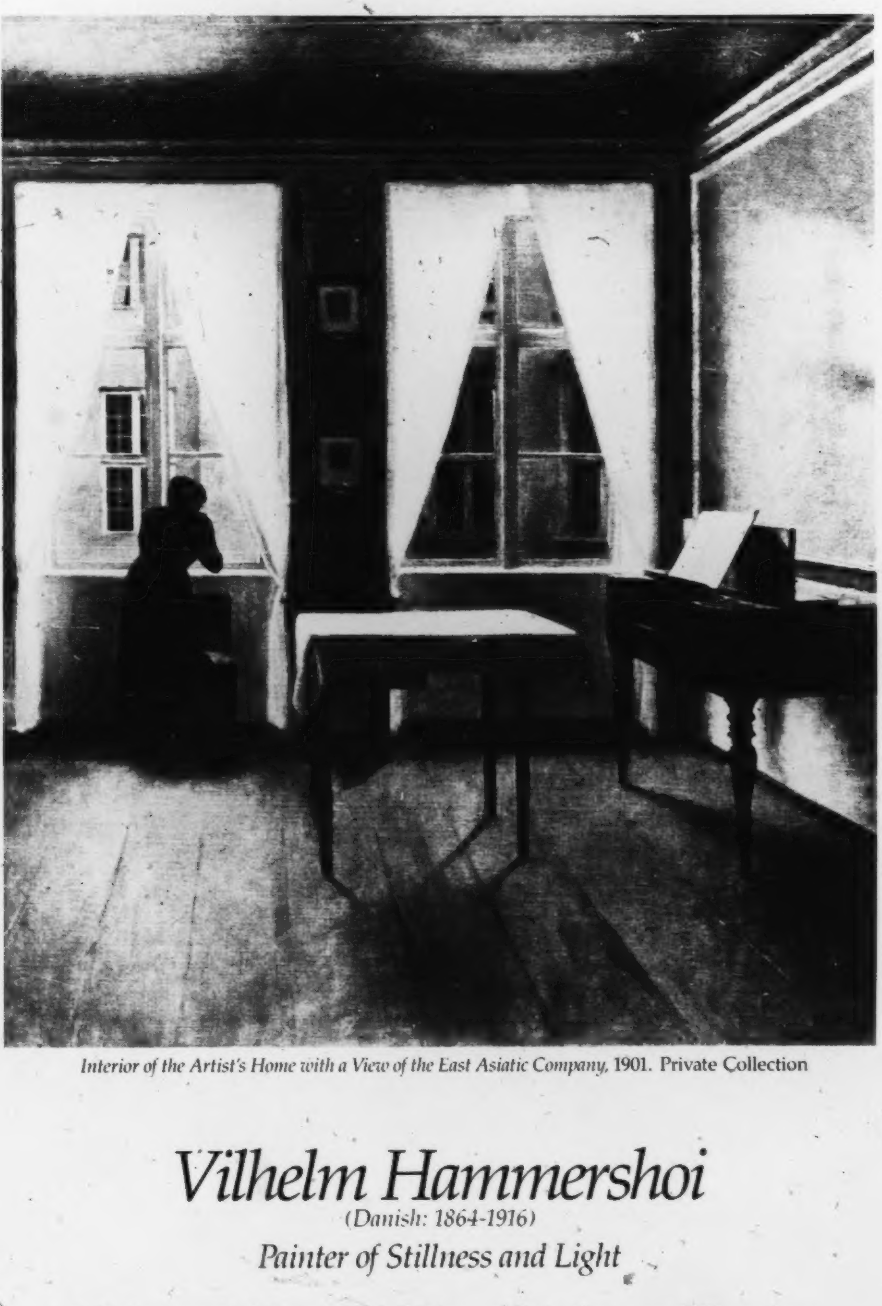
MARISA DEL RE GALLERY
41 East 57th Street, New York, NY 10022
(212) 688-1843

WILDENSTEIN



Interior of the Artist's Home with a View of the East Asiatic Company, 1901. Private Collection

Vilhelm Hammershoi

(Danish: 1864-1916)

Painter of Stillness and Light

A Retrospective Loan Exhibition of Paintings and Drawings

January 7-28, 1983
Monday-Friday

19 EAST 64TH STREET, NEW YORK

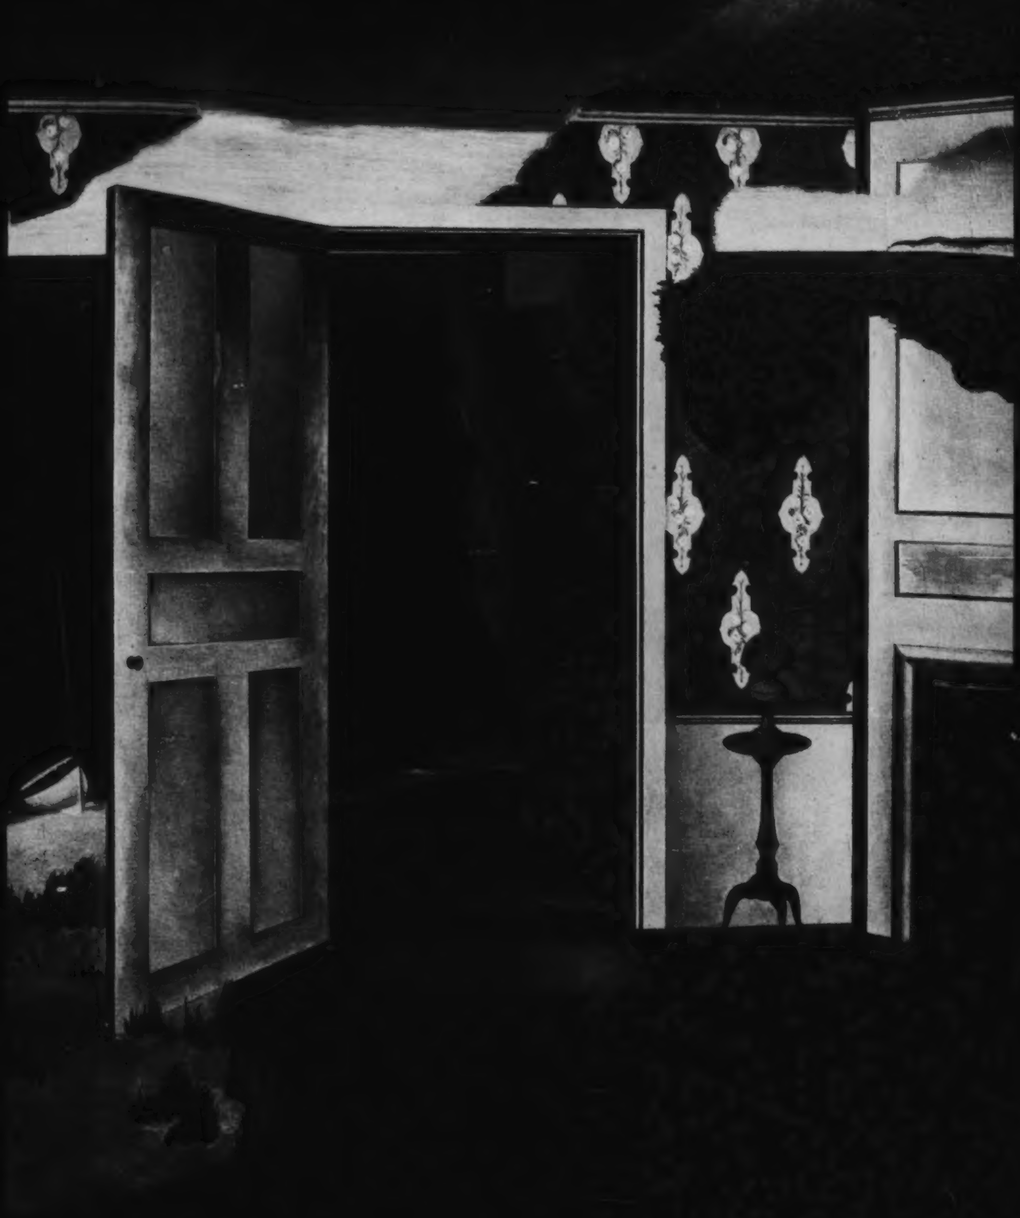
VOL
7
1

ISS
1

J A

1983

UMI



O. LOUIS GUGLIELMI
(1906-1956)
The Persistent Sea No. 2 1935
Oil on canvas
30¼ × 24¼ inches
Signed lower right

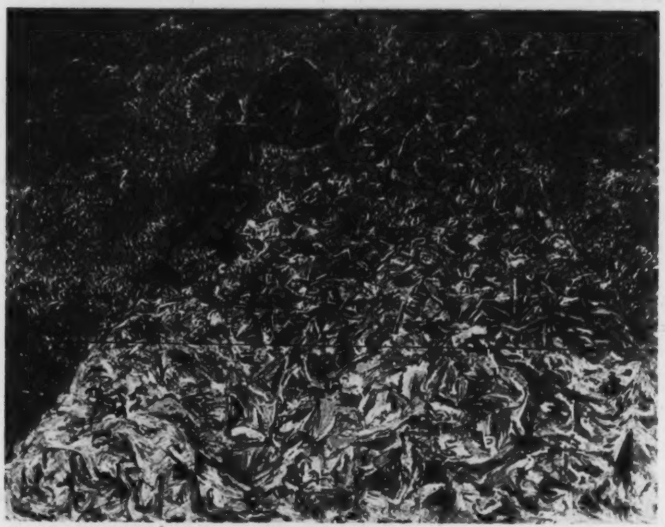
BARBARA MATHES GALLERY
19 East 71st Street New York NY 10021 212 249-3600

Issues & Commentary

Honor, Power and the Love of Women

The current "Expressionist" revival is sustained by a desire to be a hero, by hopes of royalty and mastery that stem from the artist's sense of his inability to intervene in reality and thereby to change it.

BY CRAIG OWENS



Sandro Chia:* The Idleness of Sisyphus, *1981, oil on canvas, 122 by 152 inches. Museum of Modern Art.

In 1911, just as the Expressionist movement was gaining momentum in German-speaking countries, Freud speculated that the origin of the creative impulse lies in frustration, a sense that reality is impervious to desire:

> The artist is originally a man [and we will soon discover why, for Freud, the role of artist is invariably masculine] who turns away from reality because he cannot come to terms with the demand for the renunciation of instinctual satisfaction as it is first made, and who then in phantasy-life allows full play to his erotic and ambitious wishes. But he finds a way of return from this world of phantasy back to reality; with his special gifts he moulds his phantasies into a new kind of reality, and men [the spectator posited here is also masculine] concede them a justification as valuable reflections of actual life. Thus by a certain path he actually becomes the hero, king, creator, favourite he desired to be, without pursuing the circuitous course of creating real alterations in the outer world.[1]

When he assigns art a compensatory role, Freud appears merely to repeat the basic error of Western art theory (Hegel: "The necessity of the esthetically beautiful [derives from] the deficiencies of immediate reality").[2] Why must art always be defined as an alternative to reality? Sometimes art is a recognition of reality, a mode of apprehending and of representing it. And why do we tend to neglect the fact that works of art always exist as part of the material world? Thus, Freud's treatment of the artist could easily be indicted for complicity with philosophical esthetics. Such an indictment, however, would have to overlook what is truly original here: Freud—like the Expressionists—situates art not in relation to reality, but in relation to desire. Even more importantly, he locates it in relation not only to the artist's desire, but to the spectator's desire as well. The work of art is the token of an intersubjective relation between artist and spectator; the investigation of this relation is the task of a properly psychoanalytic esthetics.[3]

However, the desire that Freud attributes to the artist and the source of the pleasure he attributes to the spectator are by no means unproblematic. Both are motivated, he proposes, by a (masculine) desire to be a hero. The artist's hopes of royalty and of mastery were explicitly stated in 1911 ("hero, king, creator, favourite"). Six years later, when he reiterates this definition in the Introductory Lectures on Psychoanalysis, Freud will have more to say about the spectator's pleasure; in Lecture 23 he writes, "[The artist] makes it possible for other people once more to derive consolation and alleviation from their own sources of pleasure in their unconscious which have become inaccessible to them." That is, the spectator recognizes the desire of the artist represented in the work as his own (repressed) desire, and the lifting of repression is invariably accompanied by a sensation of pleasure. Esthetic pleasure, then, is essentially narcissistic: it arises from the viewer's identification of his own desire with the desire of the other (in this case, of the artist). (Elsewhere, Freud writes of the spectator of Hamlet: "The precondition of enjoyment is that the spectator should himself be a neurotic.")[4]

Since the desire to be a hero is shared by artist and spectator alike, it is tempting to regard it as innate and immutable—to posit a universal human desire for mastery. There is, however, an alternative to this essentialist reading; for it is Freud who has taught us (through Lacan) that desire is a social product, that it comes into the world because of our relations with others. What is the source of the artist's desire, then, if not the sense of frustration that Freud locates at the origin of the work of art, his sense of powerlessness to achieve in reality what he desires in his fantasy? His desire to be a hero, then—"to feel and to act and to arrange things according to his desires"[5]—arises only because he believes he lacks this power. (Lacan: Desire is lack.) And when this lack is represented within works of art, it will tend to be confirmed, that is, posited as (the) truth. Such works will also tend to reinforce the spectator's sense of his own impotence, his inability to create real alterations in the world.

We are all familiar with the popular diagnosis of Hitler as a frustrated artist (verhinderter Künstler): had he been able to sublimate in art his desire for power, the world might have been spared much anguish. Recently, this conceit has "inspired" a number of art works, most ostentatiously, Hans-Jürgen Syberberg's epic film Our Hitler, in which the führer is represented as history's greatest filmmaker.[6] (As I have argued

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
J A 1983
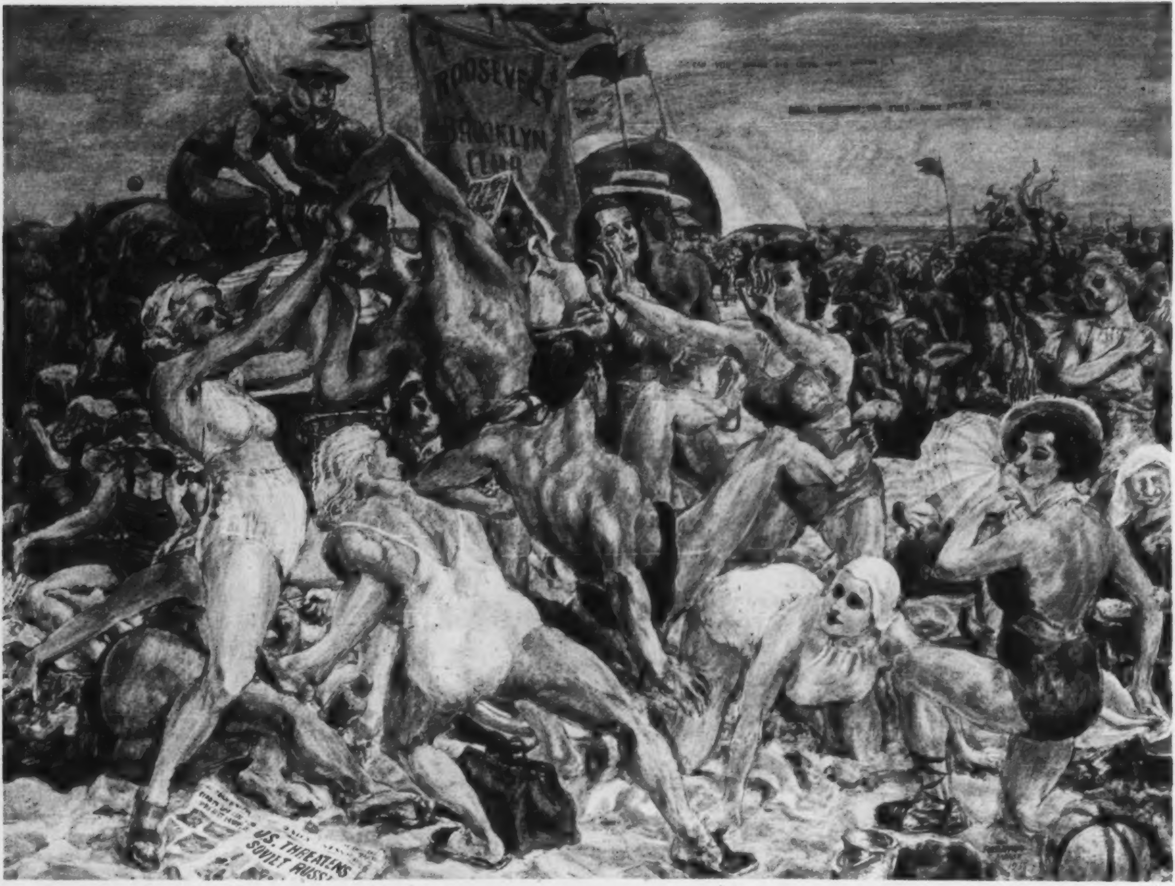
UMI



ROOSEVEL
BROOKLYN
CLUB
U.S. THREATENS SOVIET RUSS

Reginald Marsh (1898-1954)
Coney Island Beach, 1935
Tempera, 30 x 40 inches
Signed and dated, lower right

JAMES MARONEY incorporated

129a East 74th Street, New York, N.Y. 10021 (212) 879-2252
Church Street, Roxbury, CT 06783 (203) 354-6783

elsewhere, Syberberg's work has much in common with that of the German "Neo-Expressionists.")[7] Such works estheticize, and thereby neutralize, the machinations of power; they also invert Freud's formula. For in the passage cited above, art is treated not as a sublimation of, but as a realization of desire; thus, the twenty-third lecture on psychoanalysis concludes: "[The artist] has thus achieved through his phantasy what previously he had achieved only in his phantasy—honour, power, and the love of women."

Sandro Chia's The Idleness of Sisyphus (1981) appears to confirm Freud's speculations on the artist. Not only does the painter's recourse to classical myth testify to his withdrawal from reality into a realm of subjective fantasy (the language of depth psychology is also the language of myth); what is more, Chia clearly identifies his own activity with that of a classical hero—Sisyphus, the Corinthian king condemned to eternal repetition. For it is not difficult to recognize in Chia's protagonist, as he struggles with a mass of inert, recalcitrant material, a displaced representation of the heroic male artist—a role Chia himself has rather pretentiously assumed, at least in interviews and public appearances.

Remember Sisyphus's crime and punishment: for (twice) rebelling against Death, he was sentenced eternally to push a giant boulder up the side of a mountain, only to have it roll back down again as he approached the summit, to the great amusement of the gods. Thus, if the Sisyphus myth can be said to represent Chia's own desire for royalty and for mastery, it also represents the sphere of perpetual frustration in which that desire is operative.

In Albert Camus's The Myth of Sisyphus, an extended philosophical argument against suicide composed in 1940 (that is, in the same year that France surrendered to Germany), Sisyphus is treated as the perfect embodiment of the modern (i.e., Existentialist) hero, who confronts without flinching the absurdity of his existence. Yet Camus's recourse to classical myth works to transform his hero's inability to change the world from a historical into a metaphysical condition, the origins of which remain shrouded in mystery. In the same way, Chia's invocation of Sisyphus projects frustration as a permanent state. In both Camus and Chia, then, myth objectifies psychology, while psychology validates myth; both exist, however, in relation to an evacuated historical dimension.

This reading of Chia's painting is complicated, however, by the fact that his Sisyphus is a comic rather than tragic figure. Camus interpreted Sisyphus as an image of hope beyond hoplessness, of comfort and security in desolation. Such pathos is totally absent from Chia's treatment of the same myth; with his silly grin, business suit and diminutive fedora, his Sisyphus combines the physiognomy of the clown with that of the petty bureaucrat. Thus, Chia does not defend his hero but ridicules his blind obedience; the artist sides not with the suffering of the victim, but with the laughter of the gods.

Chia appears to ridicule the artist-hero in the same breath that he proclaims his resurrection. Here, we encounter the fundamental ambivalence that sustains the current revival of large-scale figurative easel painting, its perpetual oscillation between mutually incompatible attitudes or theories. Interpreted as irony, this ambivalence is sometimes summoned as evidence to support the thesis that painters like Chia are engaged in a genuinely critical activity; thus, The Idleness of Sisyphus has been interpreted as a "Dada cartoon designed to subvert the conventional mythic image."[8] Maybe I am taking Chia's painting too seriously, then; it is, after all, only a joke. Perhaps—but at whose expense? (Freud: Jokes are historically a contract of mastery at the expense of a third person.)[9]

In The Idleness of Sisyphus Chia debunks the (modernist) belief in progress in art—a belief which he and his colleagues emphatically repudiate. It must be stressed, however, that Chia is not critical, merely contemptuous of the ideology of progress; thus, he simply substitutes repetition (Sisyphus) for progress. If the social program of modernity can be defined, following Max Weber, as the progressive disenchantment of the world by instrumental reason, cultural modernism was also a demystification—a progressive laying bare of esthetic codes and conventions. In The Idleness of Sisyphus, however, Chia counters modernist *de*mystification with an antimodernist *re*mystification. Progress is exploded as (a) myth; Chia's painting is a joke, then, at the modernist painter's expense.

But because he identifies himself with Sisyphus, Chia seems to be indulging in self-mockery as well. Either way, The Idleness of Sisyphus testifies to the painter's ambivalence about his own activity, to a lack of conviction in painting—a lack Chia shares with most artists of his generation. (This is what links him with painting's supposed "deconstructors"—Salle, Lawson, et al.) And once we have acknowledged the prevalence of this attitude, how long can we continue to account for Chia and his colleagues' extraordinary prosperity—for these artists have indeed won "honour, power, wealth, fame . . . "—simply by positing some insatiable "hunger for pictures"?[10] Must we not speak instead of a more fundamental contempt for painting—a contempt which is shared by artists and audience alike?

The Idleness of Sisyphus alerts us, then, to what is at stake in the current revival of so-called Expressionist painting and its widespread institutional and critical acceptance. (Chia's painting was immediately acquired by the Museum of Modern Art; this is not only a measure of his success, but also an indication that the institutions—and the critics—that support this kind of work must be named as its collaborators.) Artists like Chia construct their works as pastiches derived, more often than not, from the "heroic" period of modernism. Chia favors Boccioni's dynamic Futurist line in particular, but he plunders a wide range of antimodernist sources as well—late Chagall, reactionary Italian painting of the '30s. The modern and the antimodern exist side by side in his work; as a result, they are reduced to absolute equivalence.

In Chia's work, then, quotation functions not as respectful hommage, but as an agent of mutilation. What Russian formalist critic Boris Tomashevsky wrote of the epigone seems applicable to the pasticheur as well:

> The epigones repeat a worn-out combination of processes and, as original and revolutionary as it once was, this combination becomes stereotypical and traditional. Thus the epigones kill, sometimes for a long time, the aptitude of their contemporaries to sense the esthetic force of the examples they imitate; they discredit their masters.[11]

Chia, Cucchi, Clemente, Mariani, Baselitz, Lüpertz, Middendorf, Fetting, Penck, Kiefer, Schnabel . . . —these and other artists are engaged not (as is frequently claimed by critics who find mirrored in this art their own frustration with the radical art of the present) in the recovery and reinvestment of tradition, but rather in declaring its bankruptcy—specifically, the bankruptcy of the modernist tradition. Everywhere we turn today the radical impulse that motivated modernism—its commitment to transgression—is treated as the object of parody and insult. What we are witnessing, then, is the wholesale liquidation of the entire modernist legacy.

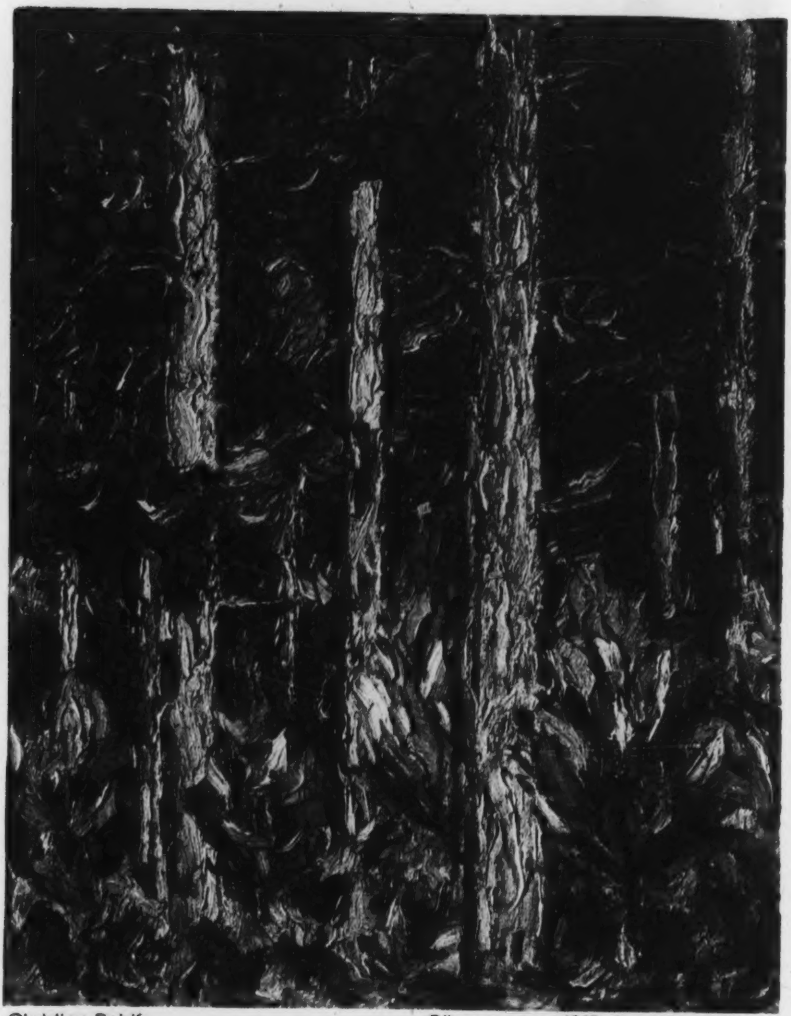
Expressionism was an attack on convention (this is what characterizes it as a modernist movement), specifically, on those conventions which subject unconscious impulses to the laws of form and thereby rationalize them, transform them into images. (Here, convention plays a role roughly analogous to the censorship which the ego exercises over the unconscious.) Prior to Expressionism, human passions might be represented by, but could have no immediate presence or reality within, works of art. The Expressionists, however, abandoned the simulation of emotion in favor of its seismographic registration. They were determined to register unconscious affects—trauma, shock—without disguise through the medium of art; with Freud, they fully appreciated the disruptive potential of desire. Whatever we may think of this project today—whether we find its claims to spontaneity and immediacy hopelessly naive, or whether we believe that the Expressionists actually tapped a prelinguistic reserve of libidinal impulses—we should not overlook its radical ambition.[12]

In "Neo-Expressionism," however—but this is why this designation must be rejected—Expressionism is reduced to convention, to a standard repertoire of abstract, strictly codified signs for expression. Everything is bracketed in quotation marks; as a result, what was (supposedly) spontaneous

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

German Expressionists

Exhibition
January 18 through February 19, 1983



Christian Rohlfs
Sunny Forest

Oil on canvas, 1910, signed and dated,
25½ x 20⅛ in., [65 x 51 cm.]

Illustrated Catalogue $15.00

Galleri Bellman

41 East 57th Street, fifth floor, New York, New York 10022 • (212) 486-7944
19th and 20th Century Paintings and Graphics

congeals into a signifier: "spontaneity," "immediacy." (Think of Schnabel's "violent" brushwork.) The pseudo-Expressionists retreat to the pre-Expressionist simulation of passion; they create illusions of spontaneity and immediacy, or rather expose the spontaneity and immediacy sought by the Expressionists as illusions, as a construct of preexisting forms.

In all discourse, quotation represents authority. Modernism—Expressionism included—represents a challenge to authority specifically to the authority vested in dominant cultural modes and conventions. Today, however, modernism has itself become a dominant cultural mode, as the quotation of modernist conventions in pseudo-Expressionism testifies. Trangression has become the norm in a society that stages its own scandals (Abscam). Thus, the contemporary artist is trapped in a double bind: if the modernist imperative is obeyed, then the norm is simultaneously upheld; if the modernist imperative is rejected, it is simultaneously confirmed.

In other words, today the modernist imperative to transgression can be neither embraced nor rejected. Caught in this untenable situation, the pseudo-Expressionists substitute an abstract revenge against modernism for its radical impulse. Modernist strategies are used against themselves: thus, the antiauthoritarian stance of the modernist artist is attacked as authoritarian, and anyone who argues for the continuing necessity of antiauthoritarian critique thereby opens him or herself to charges of authoritarianism.[13]

What we are witnessing, then, is the emergence of a new—or renewed—authoritarianism masquerading as antiauthoritarian. Today, acquiescence to authority is proclaimed as a radical act (Donald Kuspit on David Salle).[14] The celebration of "traditional values"—the hallmark of authoritarian discourse—becomes the agenda of a supposedly politically motivated art (Syberberg, Anselm Kiefer, but also Gilbert & George). More often than not, however, the pseudo-Expressionist artist claims to have withdrawn from any conscious political engagement, and this estheticist isolationism is celebrated as a return to the "essence" of art. (This is the basis for Achille Bonito Oliva's championing of the Italian "trans-avant-garde.")

Authoritarianism proclaimed as antiauthoritarian, antiauthoritarian critique stigmatized as authoritarian: this is one manifestation of what Jean Baudrillard diagnoses as a generalized cultural implosion.[15] Everything reverses into its opposite; opposites reveal mirrored identities. The imploded state of pseudo-Expressionist art would seem, therefore, to preclude irony. For irony is essentially a negative trope calculated to expose false consciousness; the coexistence, in pseudo-Expressionist work, of mutually incompatible attitudes suggests instead the loss of the capacity for negation, which Lacan locates at the origin of the schizophrenic breakdown.[16] Schizophrenic discourse is paralogical; it does not recognize the law of contradiction. Thus, the schizophrenic will be obliged to say the opposite of what he means in order to mean the opposite of what he says.[17]

Although most of the major symptoms of schizophrenia are to be found in pseudo-Expressionist painting—hebephrenia, catatonia, ambivalence—I am not proposing that we diagnose contemporary artists, on the basis of their work, as schizophrenics. Nor would I proclaim schizophrenia, as some have, as a new emancipatory principle.[18] Still, my argument is more than descriptive; it seems to me that contemporary artists simulate schizophrenia as a mimetic defense against increasingly contradictory demands—on the one hand, to be as innovative and original as possible; on the other, to conform to established norms and conventions.

What we see reflected, then, in supposedly "revivalist" painting is the widespread antimodernist sentiment that everywhere appears to have gripped the contemporary imagination. This sentiment is hardly limited to art, but manifests itself at every level of intellectual, cultural, and political life at present. Antimodernism is primarily a disaffection with the terms and conditions of social modernity, specifically, with the modernist belief in science and technology as the key to the liberation of humankind from necessity. Fears of ecological catastrophe, and of the increasing penetration of industrialization into previously exempt spheres of human activity, give rise to a blanket rejection of the ideology of progress. Responsibility for the crisis in social modernity is, however, often displaced onto its cultural program—especially the visual arts. Thus, the antiauthoritarian stance of the modernist artist—in particular, the Expressionist valorization of human desire—is often blamed for the much-discussed "crisis of authority" in advanced industrial nations.[19]

Antimodernism is one manifestation of what Belgian political economist Ernest Mandel identifies as the "neo-fatalist" ideology specific to late capitalist society—a belief that science and technology have coalesced into an autonomous power of invincible force. In his book Late Capitalism, Mandel traces its effects in detail:

> To the captive individual, whose entire life is subordinated to the laws of the market—not only (as in the 19th century) in the sphere of production, but also in the spheres of consumption, recreation, culture, art, education and personal relations, it appears impossible to break out of the social prison. "Every-day experience" reinforces the neo-fatalist ideology of the immutable nature of the late capitalist social order. All that is left is the dream of escape—through sex and drugs, which are in their turn promptly industrialized.[20]

Sex, drugs, rock and roll—there is, as we know, another traditional means of escape (although this function has largely been assumed by the mass media): Art. And it is this route—blocked by the avant-garde's ambition to intervene, whether directly or indirectly, in the historical process—that pseudo-Expressionist artists are attempting to force open once again. But in offering the spectator an escape from increasing economic and social pressures, they reinforce the neofatalist ideology of late capitalism. Theirs is an "official" art which provides an apology for the existing social order; collaboration with power replaces the oppositional stance of the modernist artist.

Have we not finally uncovered the source of the sense of frustration that Freud located at the origin of the work of art—namely, a belief in the opacity and omnipotence of the social process? It is not surprising, then, that the current "revival" of figurative modes of expression should be sustained everywhere by artists' desires to be heroes. The desire for mastery is nowhere more apparent than in that rapidly proliferating genre of art works that can only be called the "artificial masterpiece." Artificial, because genuine masterpiece status can accrue to a work of art only after the fact; masterpiece, because such works, whether executed by men or women, are motivated by a masculine desire for mastery, specifically, a desire to triumph over time.

When the historical conditions surrounding a work's production and reception by the artist's contemporaries have been superceded, and yet the work appears to continue to speak to us in the present as if it had been made in the present, we elevate the work to the status of a classic.[21] What this view of the work of art represses is the successive reappropriation and reinterpretation of works of art by each successive generation. A classic certainly did not appear to be a classic at the time of its first appearance, and it is naive to assume that it meant the same thing to the artist's contemporaries as it does to us. Nevertheless, the survival of works of art gives rise to the illusion that timeless metaphysical truths express themselves through them.

The artificial masterpiece inverts this situation: it speaks in the present as if it had been made in the past. As such, it testifies primarily to our impatience, our demand for instant gratification and, most importantly, the spectator's desire to see (his sense of) his own identity confirmed by the work of art. The extraordinary speed with which the pseudo-Expressionists have risen to prominence indicates that their work, rather than creating new expectations, merely conforms to existing ones; when "the fulfilled expectation becomes the norm of the product," however, we have entered the territory of kitsch.[22]

Throughout the history of art, style has been one of the most effective indices to the existence of a timeless truth in the work of art. Thus, Carlo Maria Mariani resurrects 19th-century Neoclassicism—a style which, in its own time, was calculated to provide an

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
J A 1983
UMI

ARNULF RAINER

RECENT PAINTINGS

Catalogue on Request

GALERIE ULYSSES

1010 Vienna, Opernring 21, Austria

ascendant bourgeoisie with an idealized image of its own class aspirations and past struggles—an image transposed, however, from the plane of history to that of myth.[23] Mariani's Neo-Neoclassicism indicates that the academic project of sublimating history into form and universality—a project that was abandoned by the earliest modernists—has returned.

Although it may appear to occupy the opposite end of the stylistic spectrum, A.R. Penck's cultivated neoprimitivist technique performs exactly the same function. Penck's work derives directly from American painting of the 1940s—specifically, from the Abstract Expressionist's early involvement with myth and primitive symbolism (early Gottlieb, Pollock, etc.). These artists were interested in such emblematic imagery primarily as a bearer of cultural information; Penck, however, uses it to express a heroic affinity with the precultural—with the barbaric, the wild, the uncultivated. It also gives his work the appearance of having been around since the beginning of time.[24]

Artificial masterpieces are also manufactured today through the revival of outmoded artistic materials and production procedures, thereby denying the fundamental historicity of those materials and techniques.[25] Although the entire revival of easel painting must be evaluated in these terms, Francesco Clemente's resurrection of fresco is a particularly blatant denial of history, as are Jorg Immendorff's, Markus Lüpertz's and, now, Chia's returns to monumental, cast-bronze sculpture. Other artists resuscitate discarded iconographic conventions: Louis Cane, for example, paints Annunciations. Here, Catholic subject matter indicates a desire for catholicity; but it also reads as a reference to Cane's recent "conversion" from modernist abstraction to antimodernist figuration.

Perhaps the most transparent strategy for simulating a masterpiece is that of antiquing the canvas itself. Thus, Gérard Garouste's neo-Baroque allegories—which, the artist insists, "stage the battle of the forces of order and disorder, of the rational and the irrational"—are dimly perceived through what appear to be layers of yellowed varnish. But Anselm Kiefer also "antiques" his canvases. Not only has he returned to landscape painting; he also attempts, through the implict equation of the barren fields he depicts with the burnt and scarred surfaces of his own canvases, to impart to his paintings something of the desolation and exhaustion of the earth itself. (What is more, Kiefer attributes this desolation to mythical rather than historical forces. His "Waterloo" paintings bear a legend from Victor Hugo: "The earth still trembles/from the footsteps of giants.") Thus, Kiefer's art insists that it is only the faithful reflection of (its own) shattered depletion.

In the 1970s, as is well known, several writers—Richard Sennett and Christopher Lasch among them—diagnosed the collective Narcissism that appeared to have infected an entire society. It is tempting, on the basis of the phenomena discussed above, to describe our own decade as Sisyphean, referring, of course, to the widespread "compulsion to repeat" in which we appear to be deadlocked. It is, however, precisely this tendency to treat contemporary reality in mythological terms that is at issue here. When the critic diagnoses a collective neurosis, does he not also betray his own desire for (intellectual) mastery? In the eighth chapter of Civilization and Its Discontents Freud addressed the question of intellectual mastery, significantly, in the context of a discussion of the possibility of psychoanalyzing entire societies: "And as regards the therapeutic application of our knowledge," Freud writes, "what would be the use of the most correct analysis of social neurosis, since no one possesses authority to impose such a therapy on the group?"

Yet everywhere we turn today we encounter therapeutic programs for the amelioration of our collective "illness"—nowhere more blatantly than in the authoritarian call for a return to traditional values which, we are told, will resolve the crisis of authority in advanced industrial nations. Perhaps, then, it is to the issue of mastery—of power, authority, domination—that both art and criticism must turn if we are to emerge from our current impasse. ☐

The '80s might be diagnosed as Sisyphean, referring to the "compulsion to repeat" in which we are deadlocked.

This text is a revised version of a speech delivered on Sept. 22, 1982 to the Society for Contemporary Art, the Art Institute of Chicago. I would like to thank Courtney Donnell for inviting me to address that audience. I would also like to thank Barbara Kruger, without whose work and conversation parts of the above discussion would not have been possible.

1. Sigmund Freud, "Formulations Regarding the Two Principles in Mental Functioning," General Psychological Theory, ed. Philip Rieff, New York, 1963, pp. 26–7, my italics.
2. On art as supplement, see Jacques Derrida, "The Parergon," October 9 (Summer 1979), 3–41, as well as my afterword, "Detachment/from the parergon," 42–9.
3. Psychoanalytic discussions of the work of art's relation to its spectator occur mainly in film theory and criticism; see in particular the work of Christian Metz (The Imaginary Signifier) and Stephen Heath (Questions of Cinema).
4. Freud, "Psychopathic Characters on the Stage," Standard Edition, vol. 7, p. 308.
5. Ibid., p. 305. The entire passage reads as follows: "The spectator is a person who experiences too little, who feels that he is a 'poor wretch to whom nothing of importance can happen,' who has long been obliged to damp down, or rather displace, his ambition to stand in his own person at the hub of world affairs; he longs to feel and to act and to arrange things according to his desires—in short, to be a hero."
6. On Our Hitler, see Fredric Jameson, "In the Destructive Element Immerse," October 17 (Summer 1981), 99–118, and Thomas Elsaesser, "Myth as the phantasmagoria of History . . . ," New German Critique 24–5 (Fall/Winter 1981–82), 108–54. I disagree with Elsaesser's defense of Syberberg's practice, but I am indebted to his insights on the modern functions of myth.
7. "Bayreuth '82," A.i.A., Sept. '82, p. 135.
8. Michael Krugman, "Sandro Chia at Sperone Westwater Fischer," A.i.A., Oct. '81, p. 144.
9. See Freud, Jokes and Their Relation to the Unconscious. This particular formulation of Freud's thesis is from Jane Weinstock, "She Who Laughs First Laughs Last," Camera Obscura 5, p. 107.
10. This is the title of Wolfgang Max Faust's recent book on contemporary German painting (Hunger nach Bildern).
11. Quoted in Hans Robert Jauss, Toward an Aesthetic of Reception, Minneapolis, '82, p. 197.
12. See Theodor Adorno's discussion of Schoenberg's Expressionism in Philosophy of Modern Music, New York, 1980, esp. pp. 38–9.
13. This is the thrust of attacks launched recently by Peter Schjeldahl, who has increasingly been gravitating towards a Neoconservative position, against myself and other writers—ironically, from the pages of the Village Voice, supposedly the last bastion of '60s-style radicalism.
14. "Salle, then, offers us an explicitly conformist art–an art in perfect harmony with its world. . . . Its attempt at maximalizing its resources is nothing but an acceptance of—submission to—the totality of its world." It is not that I disagree with Kuspit's description of Salle's enterprise; rather, I find no cause for celebration. "David Salle at Boone and Castelli," Art in America, Summer '82, p. 142.
15. Jean Baudrillard, L'Echange symbolique et la mort, Paris, 1975, passim. For an English text, see Baudrillard's "The Beaubourg Effect," October 20 (Spring 1982).
16. See in particular Lacan's "On a question preliminary to any possible treatment of psychosis" in Ecrits: A Selection, New York, 1977.
17. This formulation is Gregory Bateson's. See Anthony Wilden, System and Structure, London, 1972, pp. 56–62.
18. Gilles Deleuze and Félix Guattari, for example. See their Anti-Oedipus, New York, 1977.
19. This is the argument of Neoconservative Daniel Bell in The Cultural Contradictions of Capitalism, New York, 1976, esp. pp. 85–119. For a rebuttal, see Jürgen Habermas, "Modernity versus Postmodernity," New German Critique 22 (Winter 1981), 3–14.
20. Ernest Mandel, Late Capitalism, London, Verso, 1978, p. 502. Mandel, of course, is indebted here to Lukács's History and Class Consciousness.
21. Jauss, pp. 28–32.
22. This definition is Wolfgang Iser's. Quoted in Jauss, p. 197.
23. Elsaesser, pp. 132–33.
24. Thus, Penck tends to project violence as part of some essential "human nature." But we can treat violence as innate only at the risk of overlooking its specific social determinants: its origins in frustration provoked by an opaque, omnipotent social process.
25. On the historicity of artistic materials and production techniques, see Benjamin Buchloh, "Michael Asher and the Conclusion of Modernist Sculpture," Performance, Text(e)s & Documents, ed. C. Pontbriand, Montreal, 1981, pp. 55–65.

VOL
71
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

G. LANZI

ARTE
FIERA
83

BOLOGNA
(ITALY)
MARCH 5/8
TRADE-FAIRS
QUARTER

INTERNATIONAL FAIR OF CONTEMPORARY ART

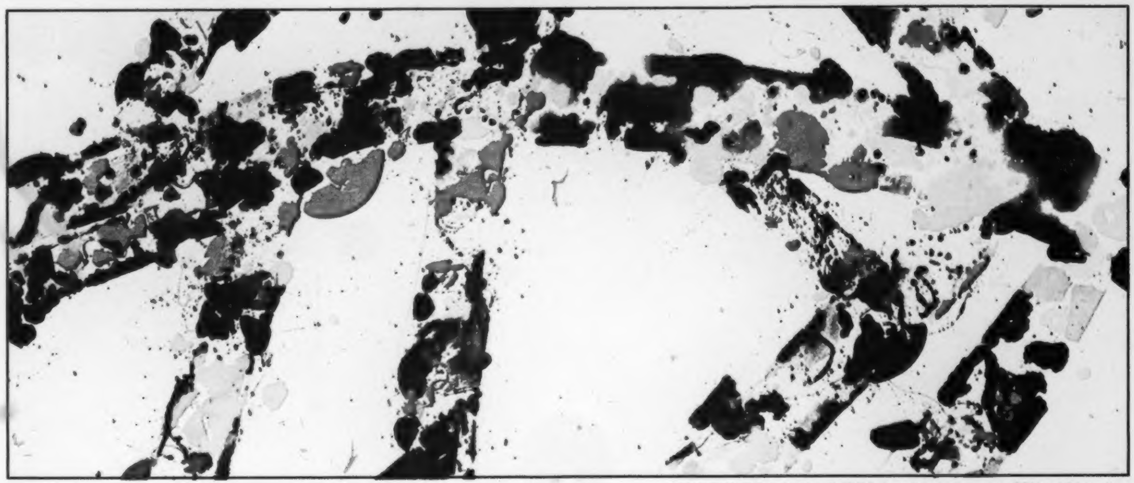
FRANK STELLA
"Geometric Composition" 1966 70" x 70"

Galerie
Rudolf Zwirner
Albertusstrasse 1-8
D - 5000 Cologne
phone: 221-235837

Galleria
Paolo Sprovieri
3, Piazza del Popolo
I - Roma
phone: 396-3610975

ARP BALLA BRAUNER DUBUFFET ERNST FONTANA
FAUTRIER YVES KLEIN LEGER MAGRITTE PICABIA PICASSO
SCHWITTERS STELLA TWOMBLY

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI



SAM FRANCIS, "Untitled," 1974, Acrylic on canvas, 82½ x 191 inches

COLOR III

January 6 to February 26

Avery
DeKooning
Francis
Frankenthaler
Motherwell
Noland
Pousette-Dart
Twombly

Martha White Gallery
330 West Main Street
Louisville, Kentucky 40202
(502) 589-3347

10:00-5:00 Monday-Friday
10:00-3:00 Saturday

Jan Henle

Land and Stone

January 6-February 12

Joan Mitchell

New Paintings

February 19-March 26

XAVIER FOURCADE INC.
36 East 75 Street   New York, NY 10021   212 535-3980

JANUARY

TUESDAY 18	Important Old Master Paintings
SATURDAY 22	The Contents of The Lindens, The collection of the Late Mrs. George Maurice Morris, Important American Furniture and Decorative Arts
SATURDAY 22	Fine American Furniture, Silver and Decorative Arts (immediately following the sale of the Contents of The Lindens)

FEBRUARY

WEDNESDAY 23	19th Century Drawings and Watercolors
FRIDAY 25	19th Century European Paintings

MARCH

TUESDAY 1	Fine Jewels
SATURDAY 12	Fine English and Continental Furniture and Objects of Art
WEDNESDAY 16	American and European Prints
FRIDAY 18	American 19th and 20th Century Watercolors, Drawings, Paintings and Sculpture
SATURDAY 26	Art Nouveau and Art Deco
MONDAY 28	English and Continental Silver, Russian Works of Art, Watches and Objects of Vertu

Christie's

502 Park Avenue, New York, NY 10022 212/546-1000

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

NEW GALLERY

DAVID FINDLAY JR

AMERICAN CONTEMPORARY

FULLER BUILDING 41 EAST 57 NEW YORK

EXHIBITION SCHEDULE

RICHARD PITTS

February 9—March 5

DANIEL LANG

March 9—April 2

PETER POSKAS

April 6—April 30

PHILIP MULLEN

Fall 1983

IDA KOHLMEYER

Spring 1984

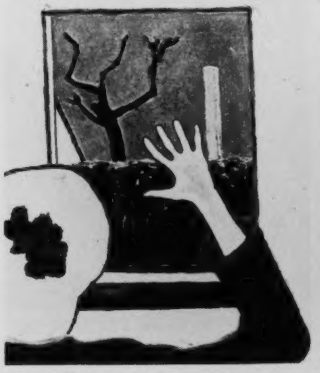
CHARLES MOSER

Fall 1984

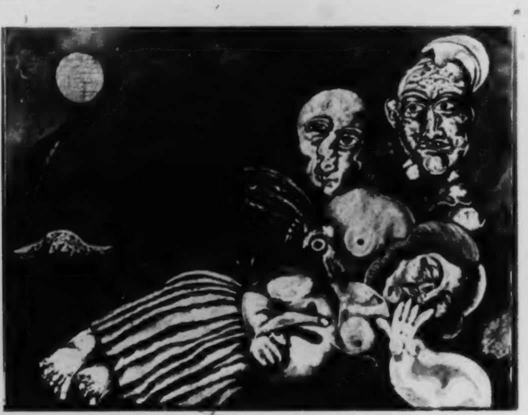
Report From Amsterdam
Arriving at the '80s

BY PRUDENCE CARLSON

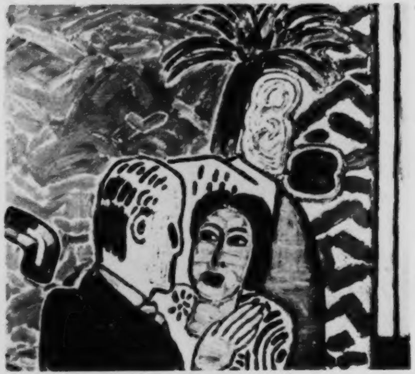
The Stedelijk's " '60-'80" show both tackled the question of the new figuration's origins and attempted to lend fresh credence to the museum as having been, for the last 20 years, close to art's cutting edge.



Roger Raveel:* A Gesture, A Painting, *1978, oil on canvas, 39 by 31 inches. Galerie Espace, Amsterdam.



Lucebert:* Apollinaire's Dream, *1972, oil on canvas, 35 by 46 ¾ inches. Stedelijk Museum.



Lucassen:* Romance, *1978, acrylic on canvas, 39 by 43 inches. Stedelijk Kunstcollectie, Helmond.

If, toward the wildfire phenomenon of the "New Painting," any one mood prevails, it is still perhaps that of puzzlement, intrigue and an equivocating uneasiness. Behind this mood is a question that has galvanized both critics and curators, over the last two years, into a rare flurry of activity and that has found as yet no perfectly satisfactory answer: "Where did it all come from, this painting?" What abrupt swing in attitude, toward the function and means of art-making itself, does it measure? And what future course for art can it describe? For, contrary to most vanguard art of the previous two decades, the new figuration—the troublingly potent imagery, say, of the Germans, or the Italians' arch, heterodox stylistic reinventions—is compelling because it seems not only peculiarly hag-ridden by an art-historical self-consciousness, but also peculiarly touched by an immediate social/political import: seems shaped, in fact, by a newfound theatrics of cynicism and despair.

One aim, however veiled, of the summer show at the Stedelijk was to come at this question of the new figuration's origins, motivation and nature—and, in doing so, to lend fresh credence to the Stedelijk (and to the Amsterdam art scene, as well) as having been, for most of the last two decades, close to art's cutting edge. (In conjunction with the Stedelijk show, the Museum Fodor mounted a lively, rotating exhibition in six parts, "Amsterdam 60/80," that treated Amsterdam art, the city's galleries and its efflorescent sub-culture of the 1960s and '70s.) On first take, " '60–'80: Attitudes, Concepts, Images" was a stellar, though somewhat arbitrary survey of the most innovative, often most controversial and bête noire art produced in Europe and the U.S. over the last 20 years. A chronological format was deftly employed by the curators not as a blind towline but as a kind of supple and transparent webbing between the exhibition's over 500 very discrepant art works (much painting, a handful of sculpture, plus installation pieces, wall-mounted constructions, straight and altered photographs, artists' books, blue-prints for Conceptual experiments, Fluxus artifacts, noise or "sound" works, and assorted documentation of environmental, process and performance art). The show's organization, treated with a provocative elasticity, permitted the "attitudes, concepts, images," of the exhibition's title to gradually and complexly become clear.

If " '60–'80," in the selection and arrangement of its works, evidenced keen discretion, a conscientious neutrality and even artistry on the part of its three curators—Stedelijk director Edy de Wilde and curators Ad Petersen and Karel Schwampers—it also had its own quirks of accent, its own odd savor. The show belied, in fact, certain curatorial predilections and its organizers' fields of expertise—art brut and '50s expressionist painting (de Wilde); Fluxus, Pop and '60s reductivist art (Petersen); performance and body art (Schwampers). It also disclosed the ways in which these preferences were enlisted so as to expressly point up the figurative painting fanfared in the exhibition's opening and closing rooms.

From one vantage, " '60–'80" could thus be seen as conforming with a recent spate of large-scale exhibitions of "special pleading"—from the Royal Academy's "New Spirit," which set out to establish for new painting a specific paternity, to this year's Documenta 7, which brought it into familial relation with other types of contemporary art. Tucked away in an interview at the back of the Museum Fodor catalogue is a telltale comment made by de Wilde: "The [Stedelijk] exhibition is going to be entirely different from . . . a real historical exhibition. Here, we are concerned with a perspective of the future." And what, at least publicly and at this point in time, bulks larger against the future than the new painting?

There was a marked Dutch bias to " '60–'80." While not quite forgivable, since it undercut and marred the show's implicit international scope, this bias was understandable—especially in light of the flash advent of the new German-Italian "transavantgarde." It's as if the Stedelijk's curators had been impelled to make a kind of reparation and prove, by example, that Dutch art, not only of the early 1980s but also the last 20 years, has been vigorously alive, full of innovative sap and thus deserving of more than domestic attention. This bias, though muted by " '60–'80" 's chronological scheme, was in evidence almost from the outset. Co Westerik, with his fine, pitiless, existentially lonely and obsessionally close-focused paintings of the '60s, had a small room all to himself. His work was followed, in short order, by intermittent clusterings of Dutch art—each calculated to represent a particular esthetic departure or stylistic thrust. Wim Schippers and the master of reticence, Stanley Brouwn, were included as Fluxus offshoots; Anton Heyboer and Constant appeared as two latter-day incarnations of the original Cobra Group's primitivist and utopian impulses. Schoonhoven, Dekkers and André Volten stood as Holland's bid for a certain preeminence in the lyrical, contemplative art based on repetitive structure, that coincided with Minimalism; Dibbets, van Elk, Godmundsson, Pieter Mols and Bas Jan Ader have blent the unlikely essences of Conceptual and performance art in "object works" that ordinarily incorporate photographs and that mostly pursue wry or absurdist tacks; and the anarchical chameleon, Karel Visser—whose exotic, yet formally concise sculpture often cunningly mates a variety of heterogeneous stuffs, raw or trouvé—is in a class by himself.

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

Co Westerik: Cut on Grass, 1966, oil and tempera on canvas, 23 3/8 by 29 1/4 inches. Stedelijk Museum.

Carel Visser: Flying Bird, 1981, mixed mediums, 50 3/4 by 46 3/4 by 97 1/2 inches. Art & Project, Amsterdam.

The prevalence of Dutch work made for a succession of modest little revelations—until, that is, curatorial bias assumed a disconcertingly flagrant form. This occurred in a small room sandwiched between the two galleries devoted to the current "new" German and Italian hotbloods. Here were hung the work of Holland's own most celebrated, older-generation practitioners (i.e., artists who have exhibited since at least the mid-'60s) of "bad" painting: the icy enigmatist Roger Raveel, the painter-poet Lucebert (long ago dubbed, for the political acrimony in both his writing and art work, the "People's Emperor"), and, head-and-shoulders above the others, Lucassen, with his colorful and heart-clutching paintings of dream-like aperçu. Made to vie for equal footing with Baselitz, Armando, and Kiefer, on the one hand, and Chia and Cucchi on the other, these three artists were, in a sense, dragooned into the role of native Dutch fathers to the new painting. (Why, in the midst of all this, was there not one late Guston, a Morley or, in an earlier stretch of the show, a '60s de Kooning like Clam Diggers or Reclining Man?)

Ger van Elk: Pulling Babies, 1980, color photograph on canvas, measurements variable. Art & Project, Amsterdam.

Armando: Flag, 1980-81, oil on canvas, 93 5/8 by 68 1/4 inches. Collection the artist.

Yet, since the bulk—and perhaps the best—of contemporary Dutch art has had little truck with the latest tide of painting (with the exceptions of René Daniel's and Hans van Hoek's work, also included in " '60–'80"), the show's curators were careful to mount a second offensive, to prepare a retort of an entirely different type. In the exhibition's concluding corridor, a plea was made for the robustness of a strictly homegrown variety of figuration, and this in the way of cameo appearances granted the curious, patient, poetically succinct work of Markus Raetz (born Swiss) and Emo Verkerk.

Not surprisingly—given the general predominance of "images" over "attitudes" and "concepts"—completely omitted from " '60–'80" were any young Dutch or, for that matter, foreign abstractionists, whether sculptors or painters. Recent abstraction was carried solely by new works from artists whose reputations were mostly secured over a decade ago: Johns, de Kooning, Stella, René Daniels: Untitled, 1977, oil on canvas, 78 by 58 ½ inches.

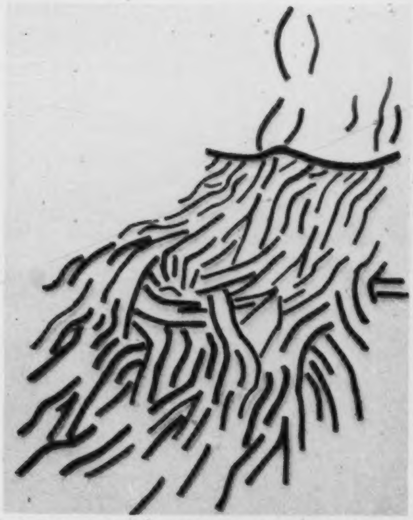
Emo Verkerk:* Portrait of Netje Fernhout, *1979, oil on paper on plexiglass, 23 ½ by 24 ¾ inches.



Markus Raetz:* From the Sleeping Wood, *1981, wood, 70 3/16 by 54 5/8 inches. Musée de Toulon.

Tuttle, Rückriem and Penone. Perhaps the curators' most convincing parry, however, was a sort of off-hand hypothesis, couched in several catalogue essays, that would put the seeds of the new figuration in both the self-ironizing detachment of Conceptual art and the raw subjectivity of brut and performance art; their argument would cede to New Painting, to its imagery, not only a fervidly or "heroically" confessional and unmediated content, but also one which is "conceptual" or complicatedly self-undermining.

A covert symmetry spanned the length of the exhibition. Prompted, perhaps in part, by the roughly circular configuration of the museum's rooms and implemented by the curators with considerable finesse, this symmetry involved two opposed movements, one proceeding forward from the show's beginning and the other trailing backward from its conclusion. The movement, in each case, was fluently conducted by means of pivotal art works—a strategical ploy that was one of " '60–'80" 's peculiar brilliances—so that each progression, step by step, reflected in loose kind the content of the other. Early figuration, in the show's opening gallery, was mirrored by '80s new painting in its last; Stella's stunning Tuxedo Park and Newstead Abbey of 1960 fronted, across the museum's atrium, two of the artist's jazzy, faintly latticed, wall constructions of 1981; paintings by the young Johns and Rauschenberg occupied a room opposite that containing recent paintings by Johns and de Kooning; French Nouveau Realisme, in its turn, was counterbalanced by Italian Arte Povera, and then Fluxus and Pop, by Conceptual art; and, toward the exhibition's middle, '60s works of Kelly, Agnes Martin and Ad Dekkers sympathetically offset '70s works by Ryman and Marden. Together, these progressions mapped a loop. They served to suggest that the last 20 years' art describes a completed cycle, a crazy comet-like ellipse running through all the manifestations of "pluriformity" (de Wilde's epithet for the 1960s and '70s), through all the radical starts and departures so comprehensively chronicled in " '60–80" itself, yet terminating, first and last, in figurative painting. Both progressions, too, reached a kind of far vertex in the show's largest, unquestionably most handsome gallery—a room that functioned as " '60–80" 's centerpiece and apogee.

> There was a marked Dutch bias to " '60-'80," as if the curators were impelled to prove that recent Dutch art has been full of innovative sap and deserving of more than domestic attention.

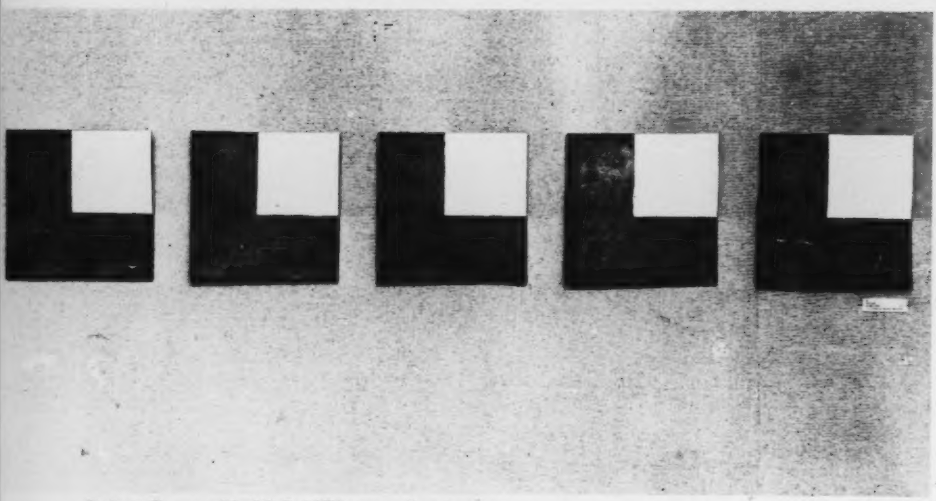
In this gallery was a handful of choice samples from the reductivist/Minimalist and proto-Conceptual art of the late 1960s (Tuttle, Ryman, Serra, Andre, Visser, Beuys, Merz). By reason of its formal self-containment, concision and wit, this art now seems the most remote, the most exotic of any in the show, yet it more than held its own against all the other represented varieties—including the figuration, old and new. Clumped in and around this one room were the majority of the exhibition's real highlights. Here were four mid-'60s Tuttles, among them a ground-hugging, primitivist wood Wheel (a 1964 work eloquent both of overpowering physical/historical inertia and of imminent motion) and one of the artist's physically modest, but space-revolutionizing wall pieces of the following year. Here, too, was one of the most refined, economical and sensorily pleasing of Ryman's early serial experiments in white: a 1973 untitled work that makes a visual fugue of five small, horizontally aligned copper plates, each with its upper right corner coated by cream-thick, white enamel. There was also the intellectual lyricism of Agnes Martin's White Flower of 1962; Mario Merz's Città Irreale that eccentrically spars with its own materiality; and a pair of Richard Long's empirical-poetical, photo-cum-map documentations of the artist's own subtly restructuring incursions into a landscape.

Nearly all, for that matter, of " '60–'80" 's art works were among the finest specimens of their types; the show was simply packed with plums. The salience of these works allowed the curators to employ them, time and again, as a sort of archetype, as portmanteau works abbreviating within themselves and capable of conjuring up whole classes of related art. For example: Warhol, Lichtenstein and Oldenburg stood for all of Pop; Kelly and Barnett Newman together recapitulated '60s abstract color painting; Serra and Andre summoned up an absent legion of Minimalist sculptors; while in Gerhard Richter's "meta-photographic" paintings figured the germ of Chuck Close (Richter also pointing, through association, to Polke and Palermo). There were thus continual little handwaves to things not present, but there were likewise obvious exclusions, perturbing gaps: sculpture (of almost every variety), late '60s perceptual experiments with light (as brought to a pitch of nuance in Turrell's work), and any late scions of Abstract-Expressionist painting (with Twombly the most missed among these last).

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI



Robert Ryman: Untitled, 1973, enamel on copper; five parts, each 39 inches square. Stedelijk Museum.

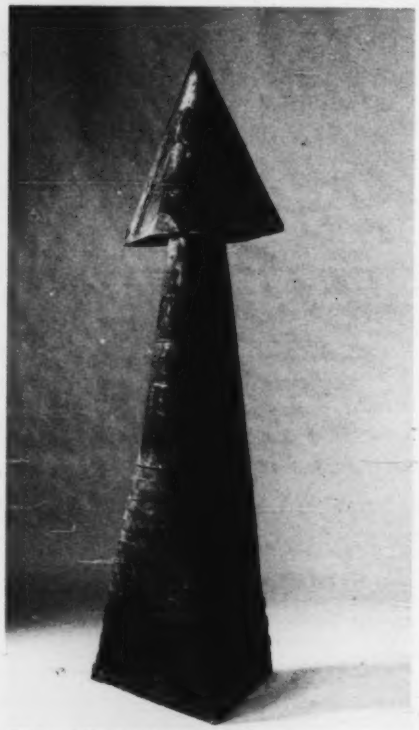
The imprint of the Stedelijk's curators was further legible in certain logistical ingenuities, techniques of arrangement that knitted the show's disparate elements and enlarged its resonance far beyond its literal contents. First was their practice of making startling, pointedly evocative pairings of works. Also, the show's structure was reined to a number of long runs built of works often only tenuously related; these sequences enforced a smooth-paced forward momentum and elicited odd antiphonies across distances in time and of type. Finally, where an artist was represented by two or more works, the curators took care that the art be widely divergent and thus provide a kind of split-second synopsis of development, range or intention. It was, in fact, the curators' canny strategical skill that transformed a rather arbitrary selection of art into a trenchant, open-ended survey and that enabled " '60–'80" to carry, without jeopardy of foundering, a persistent intrigue with the question of the new painting.



Richard Tuttle:* Arrow, *1967, wood, 68 ¼ by 23 ⅜ by 18 inches. Stedelijk Museum.

This question of the new painting, like the fairy-tale mountain made of impossibly slippery glass, has been tackled from many sides, with all manner of speculative arguments and claims. Most of these trial claims and counter-claims are glanced at—coolly, skimmingly, dispassionately—in the half-dozen " '60–'80" catalogue essays. Most of these claims, too, are by now fairly familiar. (The new figuration has been ascribed to reawakened nationalist fervor, to economic debilitation, to a lacerating cynicism bred of the threat of nuclear armageddon and of an unprecedented sense of "no-exit"-like closure. It has also—from a strictly art-historical stance—been ascribed to what is alternately reviled as "unwholesome nostalgia" for an obsolete expressionism and championed as a powerful kicking against formalist asceticism. For the older generation of "new" painters, like Lüpertz or Baselitz, the catalytic irritant was '50s Tachisme; for the younger, it has been Minimalist and Conceptual art.)

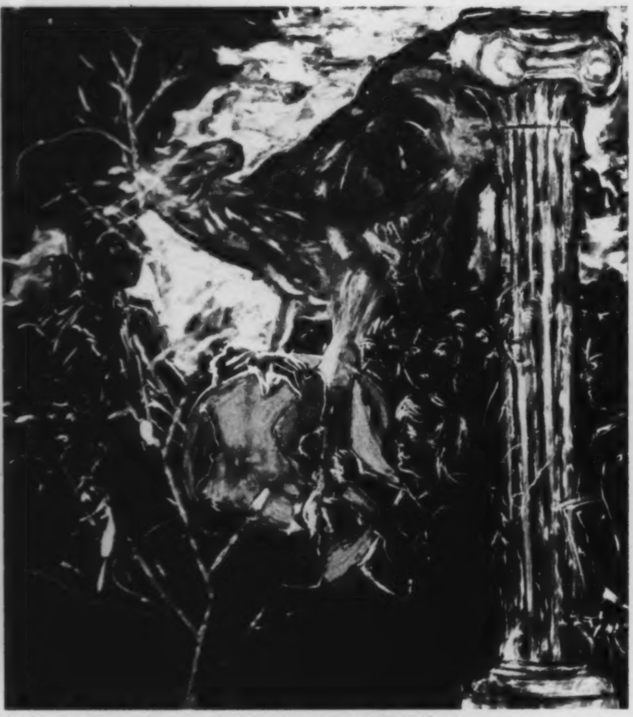
As slowly clarified in the catalogue essays, the mood generated by the new painting is contradictory, double-edged. It is tinged, on the other hand, by the bitterness of sudden disillusionment—by critical rancor at new painting's apparent betrayal of a fundamental "modernist" impulse and its breaking with the supposed revolutionary trajectory of the avant-garde toward non-object art. Petersen's and de Wilde's essays, while far from rancorous, do give vent to a sotto voce lament for the "exuberant pluriformity" of the 1960s and '70s. During the last two decades, the essentially "anti-art"/anti-object movements of Nouveau Realisme, Fluxus, Nul/Zero, Happenings and eventually Arte Povera, Conceptual and performance art were at home, flourishingly so, in Amsterdam (and in the halls of the Stedelijk, as well) often as in no other city. However, the current mood has another face, an ingredient of exultant buoyancy. The new figuration seems nothing short of a fresh vindication of the material/sensory nature of painting, of the allusive potential of traditional iconography, and of sheer subjectivity—of the uniquely "truthful," uniquely explorational processes of imaging and symbol-making. On this point, a certain, if damped-down, excitement does infect most of the catalogue writings.

The show argues that new painting owns not only a fervidly confessional, but also a Conceptual and complicatedly self-undermining, content.

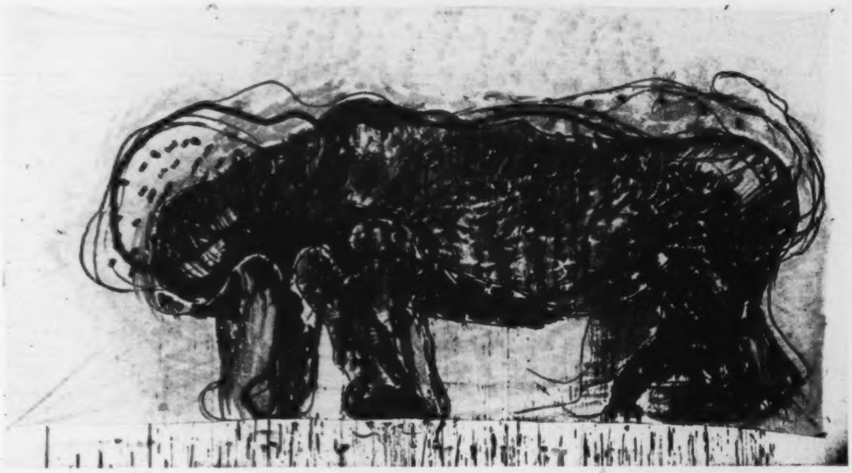
The new painting, which de Wilde has described as "extravagant" and "anti-intellectualistic" and which registers as operatic, confessional, recherché and void of system, is of course radically at odds with one main tradition of modernist Dutch art. This tradition, a practice of abstraction dating back to De Stijl (though having its origins in 17th-century Dutch still life and landscape painting), is scrupulously grounded in the perceived "facts," the immanent structure, of nature. By contrast, the new figuration is, among other things, titanically—fantastically—bent on conjuring up mythic settings and situations. As a phenomenon in many ways foreign to Holland, the new painting cannot help but chafe a little on the Dutch nerve.

The Stedelijk show came in for stiff critical flack on a number of counts. These include the exhibition's Dutch bias, its emphasis on imagistic painting, the apparent arbitrariness of its two terminus dates, and its chronological format. While some of the complaints are little more than carping, those stemming from the show's chronological arrangement are significant of larger controversy. Critics have read in this framework, in its implication of simple headlong continuity, a spurious curatorial effort to fix the new painting as an inevitable outgrowth of '60s and '70s vanguard art. They also have regarded it as a device effectively defusing those works (eg., Fluxus, Conceptual) originally designed to sabotage the primacy of the museum and long-standing notions of "fine art." In essence, the show's critics dismiss the possibility that a chronological scheme was adopted as the most neutral of organizations; that the new painting was treated as a rupture in kind with the immediate past; and, on a more profound level, that (art) history may not at all be obedient to an invented teleology—to a narrow construct of "progress" or the quintessentially Romantic conceit of an "avant-garde." And, finally, what many of these critics steadfastly ignore is a proposition embodied in the direct opposition of " '60–'80" 's first and last rooms: i.e., that the new painting is truly new (and not an exhumation of an expressionist cadaver), and that it owes much to the intervention of reductivist and Conceptual art.

Jean Tinguely:* Le ballet des pauvres, *1961. Collection the artist.



Julian Schnabel:* The Geography Lesson, *1980, oil on velvet, 95 by 83 inches. Collection Bruno Bischofberger, Zürich.



Mario Merz:* Animale Terribile, *1979, 89 ¾ by 187 ⁹⁄₁₆ inches. Collection Christian Stein, Turin.

In the show's opening room were Tinguely's automated, playfully menacing Le Ballet des pauvres of 1961 and a photo record of Niki de St. Phalle's gaudy goliathan Femme of roughly the same date; in the final gallery were four recent figurative paintings by Mario Merz and Julian Schnabel. These two rooms, almost identical in size and occupying mirror-image locations within the exhibition's layout, were the only ones treated to the slightly disorienting, subtly exciting effects of high-contrast spotlighting. These were the only rooms in which the art, in both instances of a sensational, larger-than-life character, was jumped into a visual intensity ordinarily associated with stage display or make-believe. The opening gallery, furthermore, let immediately into a corridor turned over to a technically iconoclastic, adventuresome and somewhat grisly species of late '50s/early '60s figuration: the paintings of Bacon and Westerik, Dubuffet's deft but nasty Pisseur outline-drawings, and Oldenburg's raggedy found-cardboard Street Figures. The burden, of course, of so many resemblances was to suggest that the show's start and finish bracket a period in which art, for all its interim bounding about, has doubled back on itself.

Yet, where Tinguely's macabre Ballet of rag-and-refuse figures seemed—under the spots—to belong among the carnivalesque inventions of underground theater, Merz's and Schnabel's paintings took on the mystery, the portentousness, of things enshrined. Finally, the art in these first and last galleries was shown to be worlds apart in percep-

VOL 71
ISS 1
JA 1983
UMI

PALM BEACH

Dubuffet

January 11 – February 3, 1983

BAY HARBOR ISLANDS

Alexander Liberman

January 14 – February 4, 1983

HOKIN GALLERY INC.

Member, Art Dealers
Association
of America, Inc.

210 West Superior Street
Chicago, Illinois 60610
Telephone 312/266-1211

245 Worth Avenue
Palm Beach, Florida 33480
Telephone 305/655-5177

1086 Kane Concourse
Bay Harbor Islands, Florida 33154
Telephone 305/861-5700

tion, in temper. Figurative work of the late '50s and early '60s appears to be either buoyed by a profane, scatological and occasionally even blithe burlesquing of the modern human predicament (Tinguely, St. Phalle, Oldenburg) or harrowed by unnervingly acute, existentialist apprehensions (Bacon, Westerik). Eighties' figuration, however, seems to have pulled all the stops, tapping and transfiguring any imagery whatsoever (whether automatic or labored, invented or pilfered) to engage an otherworld of free-floating symbols—a world that is neither temporal, nor psychological and interior.

As the circle of " '60–'80" 's galleries seemed intended to reveal, the new figuration—the work of Baselitz and Armando, Chia and Lüpertz—is taxed by a formalist self-consciousness (though it is untouched by formalist utopianism) that is the legacy of modernism and, more nearly, of reductivist art; and it is further involuted by the anti-material ironies of Conceptualism. The new painting has, in a sense, taken upon itself a "dematerialization" of the symbol, a skeptical overhaul of the symbol's function; it negates an image's inherent power, or "meaning," to substitute instead the power of sheer technical or stylistic tour de force. It does not matter, as it does in Bacon's or Westerik's, in de Kooning's early or Guston's late painting, that the pictorial content is ludicrous or ungainly, brutal or illogical, lyrical or mythic, for this content exists as a unique sort of vehicle, one to be tampered with, controverted, vitiated or completely emptied and refilled. In the new painting, both material and metaphoric content like, say, the mockery of Tinguely's work or the painful scabrousness of Bacon's have been thoroughly internalized; they have become axiomatic terms, like breathing or like counting, the starting points of painting and not its ends. Such wholesale presupposition, with its myriad attendant contradictions and ambivalencies, seems to have permitted, in turn, the characteristic abandon—the "vehemence"—of the new figuration. Painting may now careen into stylistic overkill, delve into contraband subject matter, resuscitate a suppressed cultural symbolism or adopt a posture of lofty profundity, because it continually begs to be taken two (and more) ways, i.e., for both what it is and what it is not.

> Tapping all manner of imagery, '80s figuration engages an otherworld of free-floating symbols—a world neither temporal nor psychological.

In " '60–'80" 's final gallery, the juxtaposition of paintings by Schnabel and errant-Conceptualist Merz thus concealed a sort of coup of felicitous association and suggestion. Merz's own sorties into figurative painting, his easy sidewindings between Fibonacci series or spirals and rudely limned mythical beasts, seem in no way to compromise his Conceptual premises. However, this last room would, perhaps, have more accurately, more provocatively summed the present had the terrain it defined for New Painting been projected not from two points, two artists, but triangulated into a third, slightly different dimension. Alongside Merz's Animale Terribile and Schnabel's Geography Lesson could have been hung, for instance, the exotic fauna of Malcolm Morley or the horses or ghostly mask-heads of Susan Rothenberg. Morley's painting—more integral, ingenuous, heatedly obsessional, and Rothenberg's—more private, self-emergent, steadfastly obedient to an internal imperative, would have introduced a counter-beat to the disturbing relativism buried at the heart of the work of the others. ☐

ROBERTO
JUAREZ

January 5 through January 29

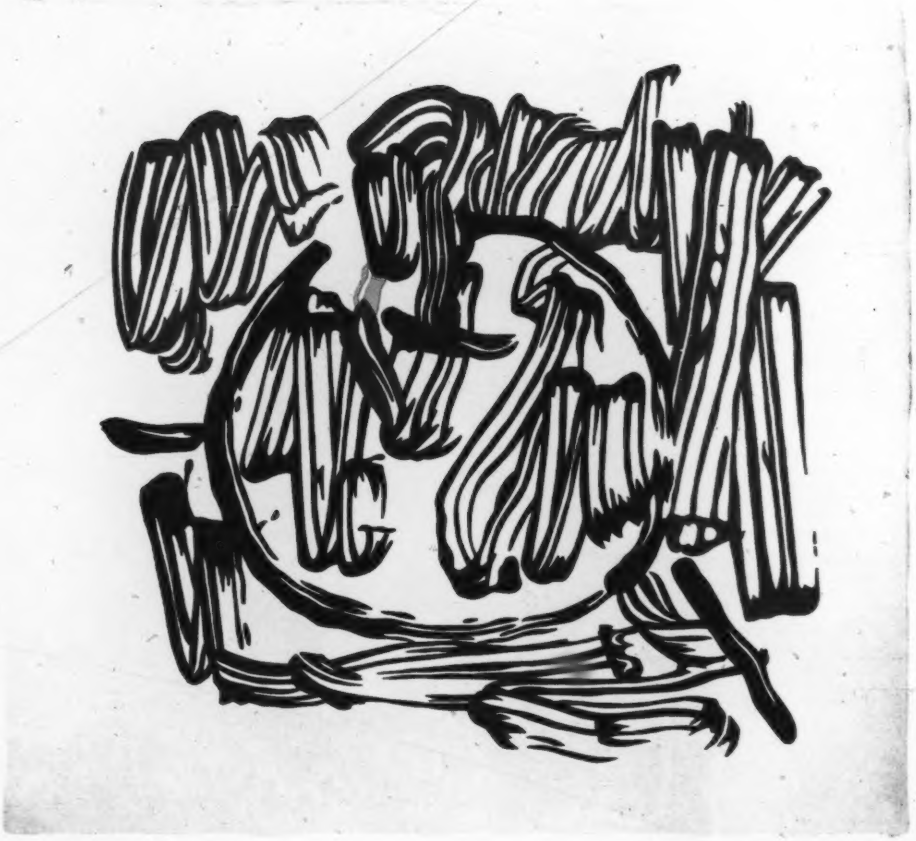
SPIRIT AND PRISM
a catalogue by Duncan Smith $5. ppd.

ROBERT MILLER
724 FIFTH AVENUE NEW YORK
212 · 246 · 1625

VOL
71
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

ROY LICHTENSTEIN

SEVEN APPLE WOODCUTS



Apple with Gray Background

© 1982 Roy Lichtenstein

PETERSBURG PRESS
17 East 74 Street New York · 59A Portobello Road London eye-witnesses

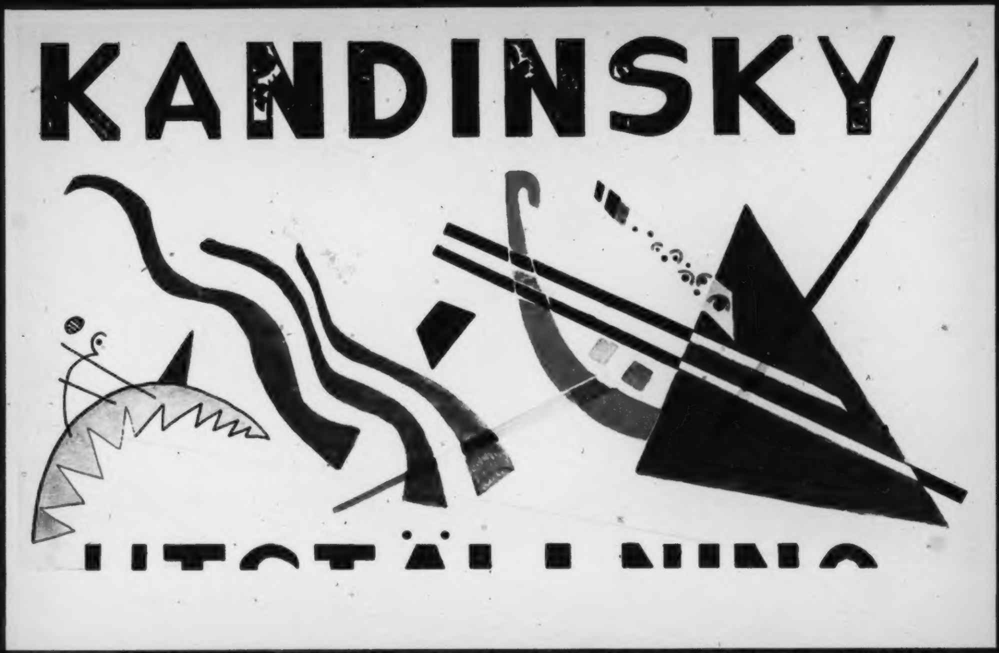
New Paintings

Anzinger
Chevalier
Finkeldei
Klinkan
Koberling
Lanneau
Nagel
Middendorf
Sandoz
Schulze
Szczesny
Tadeusz
Tannert
Zimmer

November 11, 1982 – January 22, 1983
Mutter-Ey-Straße 5 · D-4000 Düsseldorf 1
West-Germany · (211) 32 77 70

Galerie Gmyrek

VOL
71
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI



V. Kandinsky: "Leftside of the door", 1922, gouache, watercolor, brush and pen and ink on board, 35 X 61.3 cm.
Both to be included in Volume One of the Kandinsky Catalogue Raisonné of Drawings and Watercolors being prepared by Hans K. Roethel and Jean K. Benjamin.

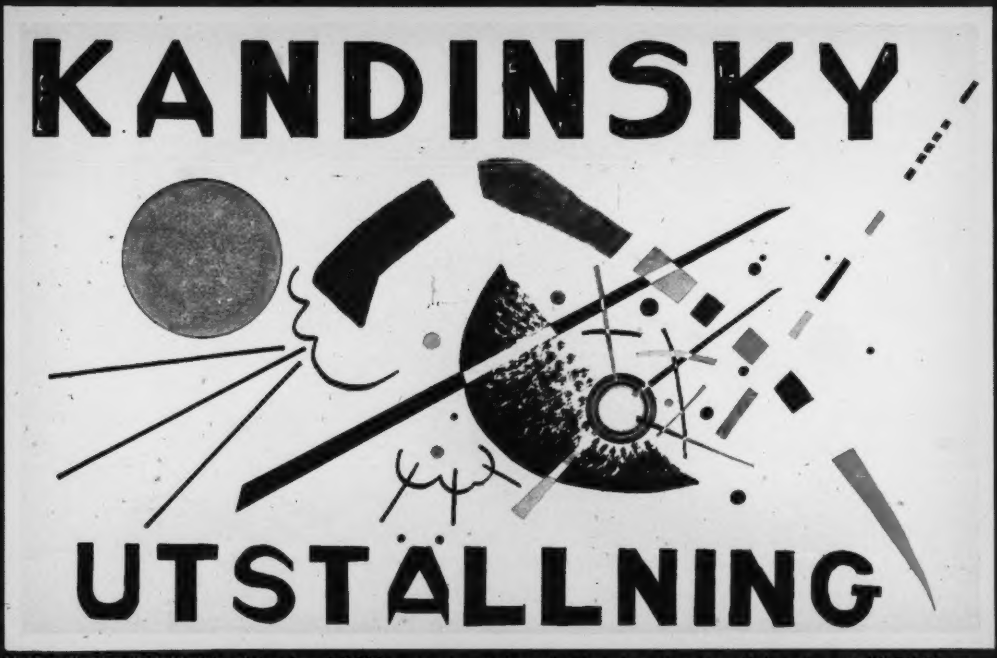
GALERIE LINSSEN

Tom Butter
sculpture

Stuart Davis
Havana watercolors

8 JANUARY–3 FEBRUARY 1983

GRACE BORGENICHT GALLERY
724 Fifth Avenue New York, NY 10019



V. Kandinsky: "Rightside of the door", 1922, gouache, watercolor, brush and pen and ink on board, 38,5 X 61cm.
Both exhibited: Stockholm, Konsthandel Gummson, "Kandinsky," 1922; Essen, Museum Folkwang, "Art of the 20th Century," 1979; Duren, Leopold-Hoesch-Museum, "Art of the 20th Century," 1979; Bonn, The Collection of Bauhaus-Archiv-Museum Fur Gestaltung at Wissenschaftszentrum, 1981.

Prinz-Albert-Strasse 47 • Bonn • (228) 21 89 09

JACK ROTH

Recent Paintings / January 8 - 27

FRIEDEL DZUBAS

Recent Paintings / January 29 - February 17

M. Knoedler & Co.

19 East 70 Street. New York 10021. Telephone (212) 794-0550

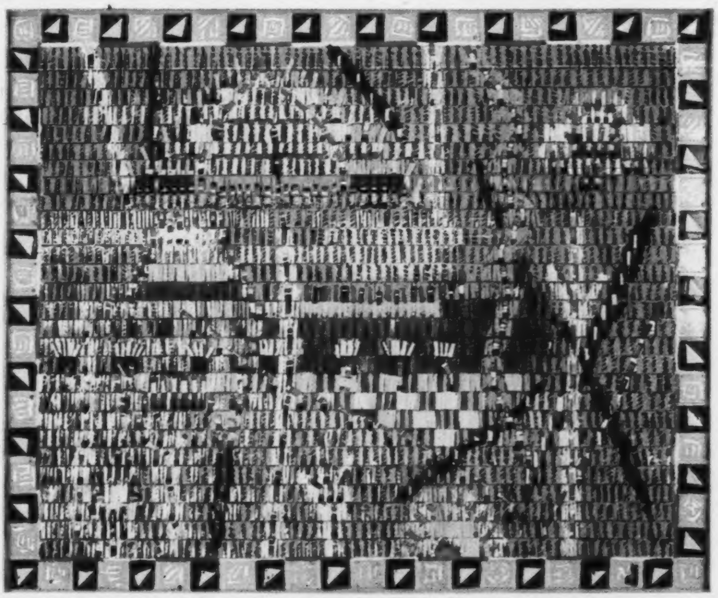
VOL
71

ISS
1

JA

1983

UMI



The Last Windup, 50" x 60", painted aluminum. Photo: Dorothy Zeidman

JACK CLIFT
January, 1983

HADLER
RODRIGUEZ GALLERIES

38 E 57 NYC 10022
212-752-7734

In Boston, Jack Clift is represented by Cutler/Stavaridis Gallery, 354 Congress Street

HIRSCHL & ADLER GALLERIES

PROUDLY ANNOUNCE THE OPENING

JANUARY 1983 OF

HIRSCHL & ADLER Modern

851 MADISON AVENUE NEW YORK

Donald McKinney, Director

212 744-6700

BIG IN BOSTON

Alternative space to exhibit large scale works

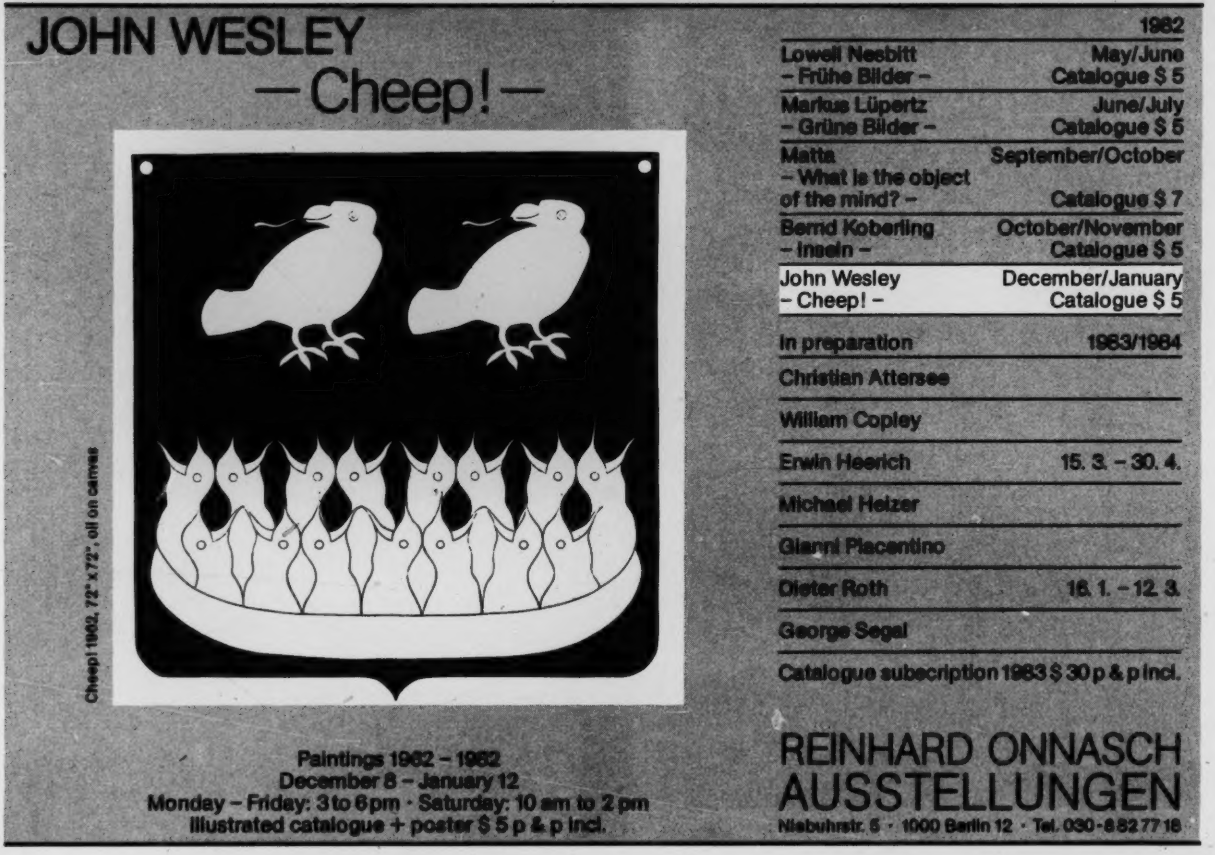
For information:

Thomas
Segal
Gallery

73 Newbury Street
Boston, Mass. 02116
Tel: 617 266-3500

Friedel Dzubas Kenneth Noland Peter Voulkos Roy Lichtenstein
George Rickey Chris Wilmarth Helen Frankenthaler Ellsworth Kelly
Robert Rauschenberg Alexander Calder



JOHN WESLEY
– Cheep! –

Cheep! 1962, 72" x 72", oil on canvas

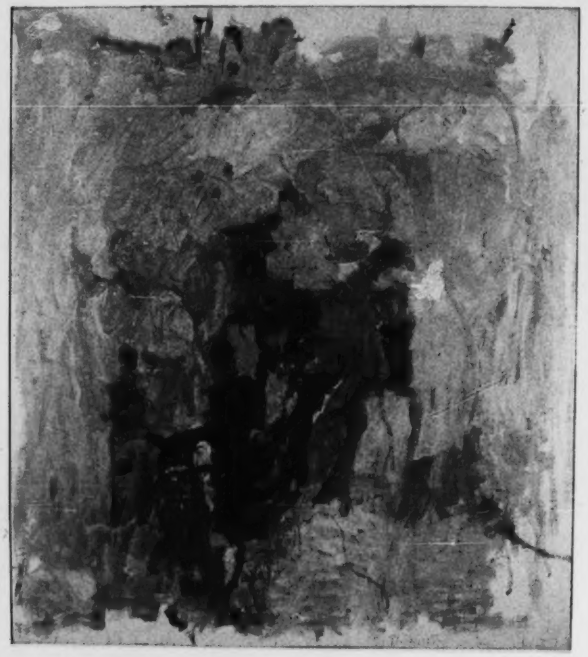
Paintings 1962 – 1982
December 8 – January 12
Monday – Friday: 3 to 6 pm · Saturday: 10 am to 2 pm
Illustrated catalogue + poster $ 5 p & p incl.

	1982
Lowell Nesbitt – Frühe Bilder –	May/June Catalogue $ 5
Markus Lüpertz – Grüne Bilder –	June/July Catalogue $ 5
Matta – What is the object of the mind? –	September/October Catalogue $ 7
Bernd Koberling – Inseln –	October/November Catalogue $ 5
John Wesley – Cheep! –	December/January Catalogue $ 5
In preparation	1983/1984
Christian Attersee
William Copley
Erwin Heerich	15. 3. – 30. 4.
Michael Heizer
Gianni Piacentino
Dieter Roth	18. 1. – 12. 3.
George Segal

Catalogue subcription 1983 $ 30 p & p incl.

REINHARD ONNASCH
AUSSTELLUNGEN
Niebuhrstr. 5 · 1000 Berlin 12 · Tel. 030 - 8 82 77 18

VOL
71
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

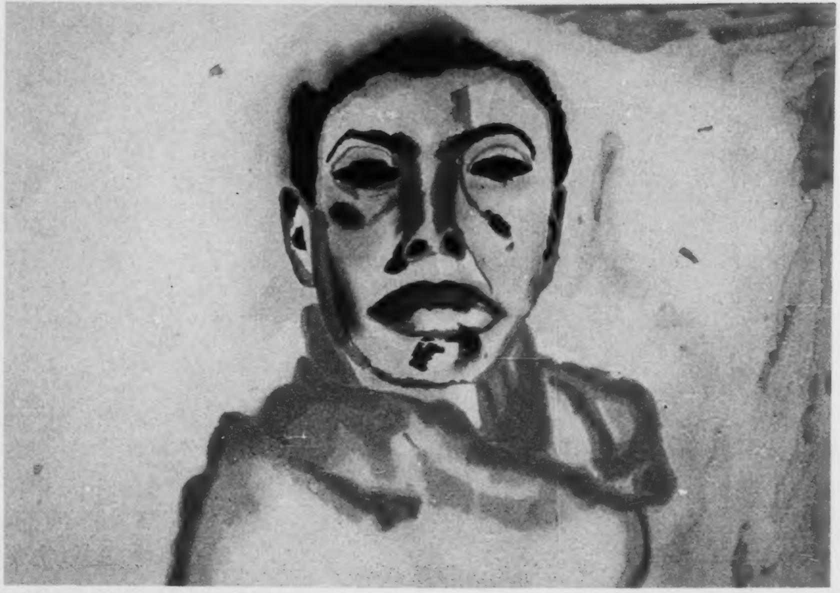


PHILIP GUSTON

URN 1957
Oil on Canvas
68 x 60½ inches
Signed Bottom Center

JOHN C. STOLLER & CO.
400 MARQUETTE AVE MINNEAPOLIS 55401 (612) 339-7060

Francesco Clemente
Two Woodblock Prints



I, 1982, 14 x 20," edition 100

Crown Point Press
1555 San Pablo
Oakland CA 94612
(415) 835-5104
545 Broadway
New York NY 10012
(212) 226-5476

ROBERT MORRIS

“PSYCHOMACHIA” DRAWINGS
8–29 JANUARY 1983

LEO CASTELLI GALLERY
420 WEST BROADWAY, NEW YORK

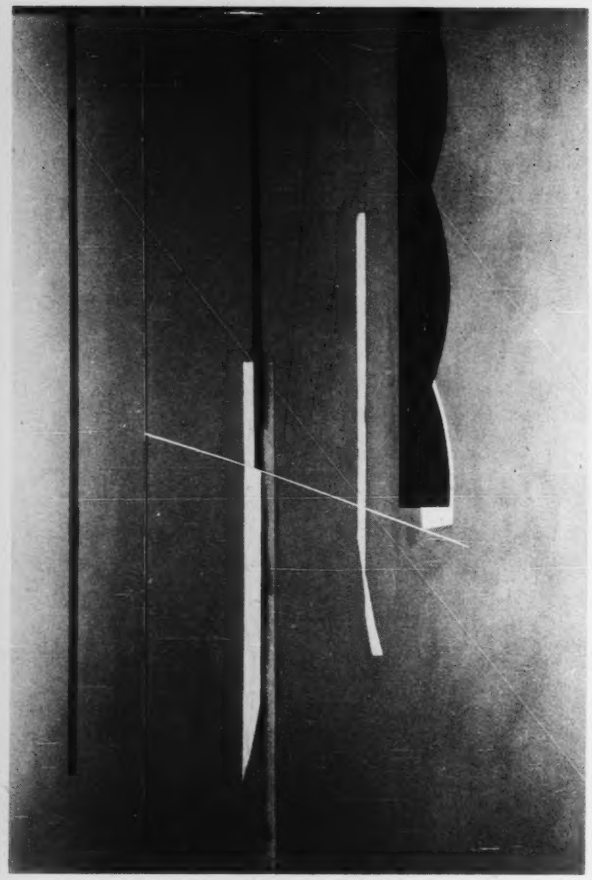
“HYPNEROTOMACHIA”
RELIEFS

“FIRESTORM SERIES”
DRAWINGS
8–29 JANUARY 1983

SONNABEND GALLERY
420 WEST BROADWAY, NEW YORK

STEPHEN EDLICH

Recent Collages, 1981-1982



Untitled, September, 1982, New York. Mixed media, 72 x 48 inches.

Illustrated catalogue available with essay by Stephen Bann
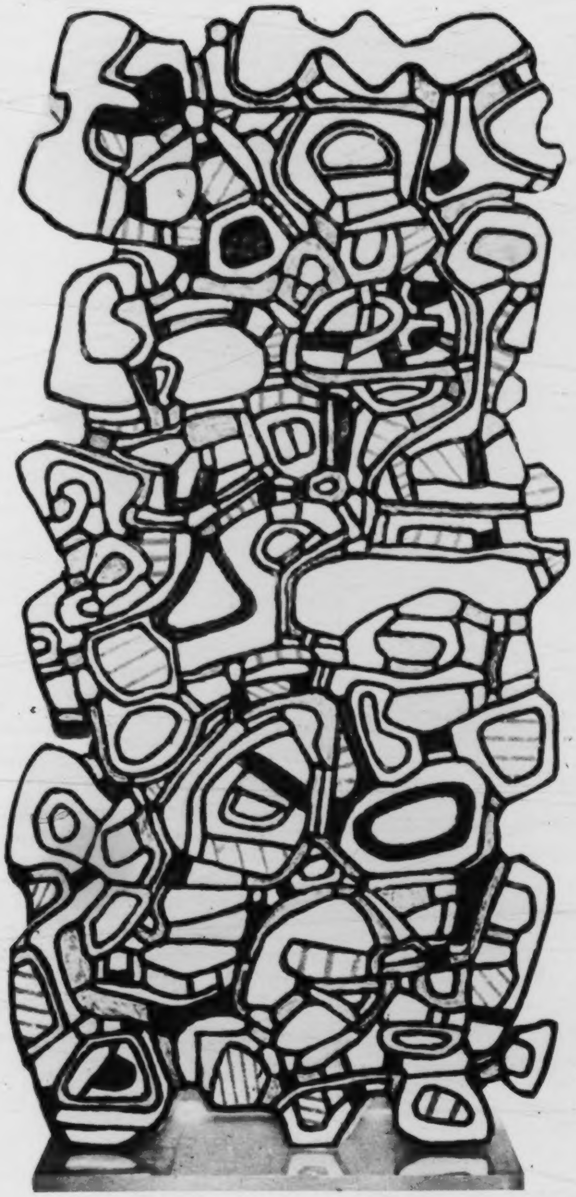
$12 U.S. and Canada, postage included

January 6 - February 1

Marlborough

40 West 57 New York 541-4900

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI



JEAN DUBUFFET
Element Bleu XVI 1967 79 x 39 x 4 inches

IRVING GALLERIES
Dealers in Fine Arts
332 Worth Ave., Palm Beach, Florida 33480
Telephone (305) 659-6221

MERION ESTES

FEB 1–MAR 5

LEONARD KOSCIANSKI

KARL BORNSTEIN GALLERY

1662 12TH ST/SANTA MONICA
CA 90404 (213) 450-1129

GALLERY HOURS/TUES-SAT 11AM-5PM

LEONARD KOSCIANSKI IS ALSO REPRESENTED BY PHYLLIS KIND GALLERY/NEW YORK + CHICAGO

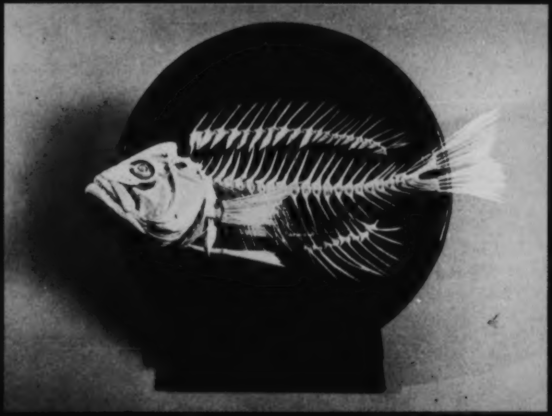
NINA RAGINSKY

UNTITLED, 1977. HAND-COLORED PHOTO: 15¼X13½.

FUMIO YOSHIMURA



FISH ON A PLATE II, 1981. LINDEN WOOD: 12 X 24 X 4.

NANCY HOFFMAN GALLERY
429 WEST BROADWAY NEW YORK

SOL LEWITT

January 11 - February 5, 1983

CAROL TAYLOR, Art
2508 cedar springs dallas, texas 75201 (214) 745-1923

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

8 JANUARY TO 29 JANUARY

GARY STEPHAN

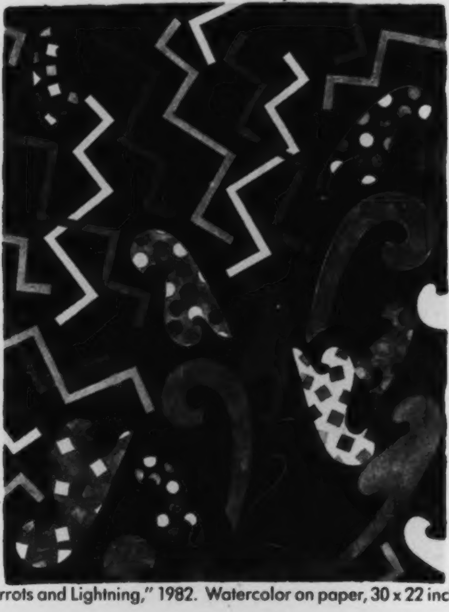
MARY BOONE

GALLERY, 420 WEST BROADWAY
GALLERY, 417 WEST BROADWAY
NEW YORK, NEW YORK 966-2114

Harry Soviak

New Watercolors & Sculpture · Jan 4-27



"Parrots and Lightning," 1982. Watercolor on paper, 30 x 22 inches.

Pam Adler Gallery

37 West 57 New York 10019 212/980.9696

JOHN OKULICK

Recent Work: January 13 - February 12, 1983

"Concourse" painted wood
59" x 77" x 7"

JOHN BERGGRUEN GALLERY
228 Grant Avenue • San Francisco, California 94108
(415) 781-4629

EVA HESSE

EVA HESSE PAINTINGS & RELIEFS FROM 1963 TO 1966 WILL BE ON EXHIBITION FROM JANUARY 8 TO 29 AT METRO PICTURES 169 MERCER STREET, NEW YORK 212/925.8335.

A RETROSPECTIVE OF HESSE DRAWINGS WILL BE ON VIEW AT THE GREY ART GALLERY FROM JANUARY 11 TO FEBRUARY 19.

METRO PICTURES

Richard Mock
January 8-February 5, 1983

Tom Otterness
January 8-February 5, 1983

Brooke Alexander, Inc.
20 West 57 Street New York, New York 10019 Telephone 212/757-3721

GERHARD
RICHTER

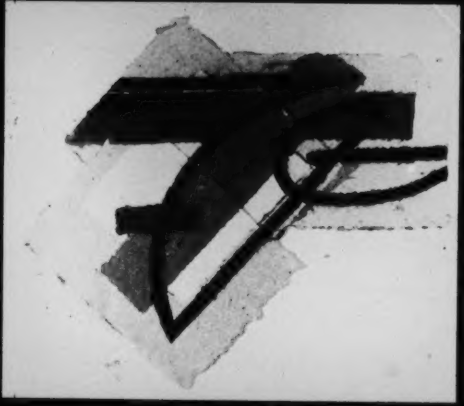
8-29 January 1983

SPERONE WESTWATER FISCHER
142 Greene Street New York NY 10012 (212) 431-3685

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

Clinton Hill

PAINTINGS AND PAPERWORKS



[illegible]

marilyn pearl
gallery 38 East 57 Street New York 10022

Edvard Munch Expressionist Paintings 1900-1940

E Munch

Newport Harbor Art Museum
850 San Clemente Drive
Newport Beach, California 92660
(714) 759-1122

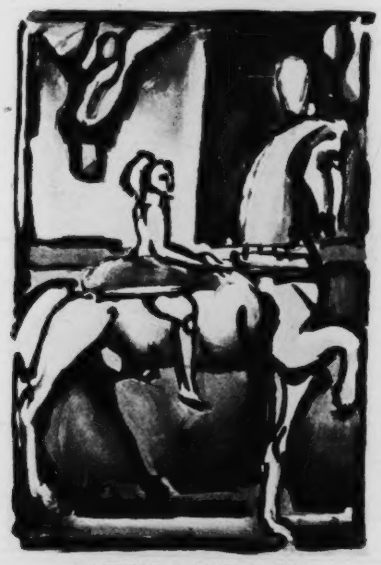
Dates of the exhibition:
February 12 through
March 27, 1983
Catalog and poster available
Scandinavia Today

This is a loan exhibition from the Munch Museum in Oslo, organized by the Elvehjem Museum of Art, and sponsored by the Royal Norwegian Ministry of Foreign Affairs and is supported by an indemnity from the Federal Council on the Arts and Humanities

---

ROUAULT

JANUARY 8 — FEBRUARY 12



LA PETITE ECUYERE, 1936

JACK RUTBERG FINE ARTS, INC.
357 N. La Brea Avenue, Los Angeles, California 90036 (213) 938-5222

Walter Murch

January 15 - February 3, 1983

BETTY PARSONS GALLERY
24 WEST 57 STREET NEW YORK N.Y. 10019

Protetch McNeil

214 Lafayette, N.Y.C.

Director: Richard Flood

Inaugural Exhibition

The Revolutionary Power of Women's Laughter

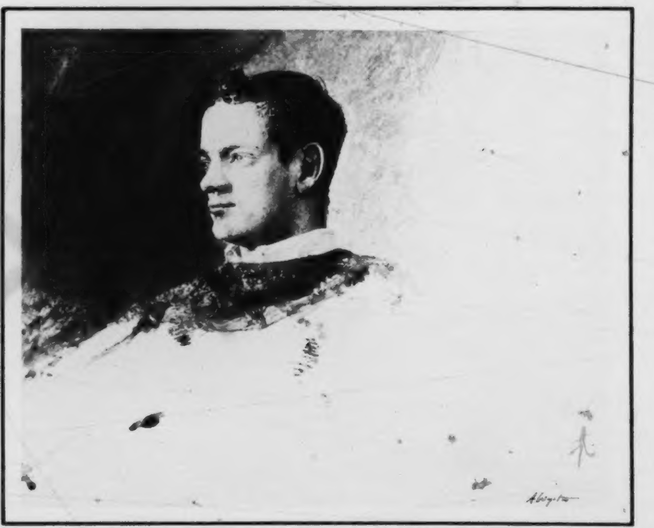
Curator: Joanna Isaak
Jenny Holzer, Silvia Kalbowski, Mary Kelly and Barbara Kruger

Opening January 15th, 1983

212-431-8293

ANDREW WYETH

from public and private collections



Title: The Preppie Medium: Dry Brush Signed: A. Wyeth, l.r.

Museum of Art

426 EAST LAS OLAS BOULEVARD
FORT LAUDERDALE, FLORIDA 33301
TELEPHONE (305) 463-5184

Fully Illustrated Catalogue Available
$8.50 Soft Bound $15.00 Hard Bound

JANUARY 12-
FEBRUARY 28, 1983

Exhibition organized by:
JOHN H. SUROVEK FINE ARTS, INC.
Palm Beach, Florida 33480
Phone (305) 832-0422

VOL
71
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

Charles Cowles Gallery

Ronnie Landfield

January 8-29

420 West Broadway New York 10012 (212) 925-3500

Roy Boyd Chicago

Steve Heino
Paintings

Vera Klement
Drawings

215 W. Superior
Chicago 60610

Roy Boyd Los Angeles

Ned Evans
Paintings

170 S. La Brea
Los Angeles 90036

GP

FRANK STELLA

WORKS ON PAPER • DEC 28—JAN 29

GETLER/PALL

50 WEST 57 NEW YORK 10019 212/581-2724

ConStruct

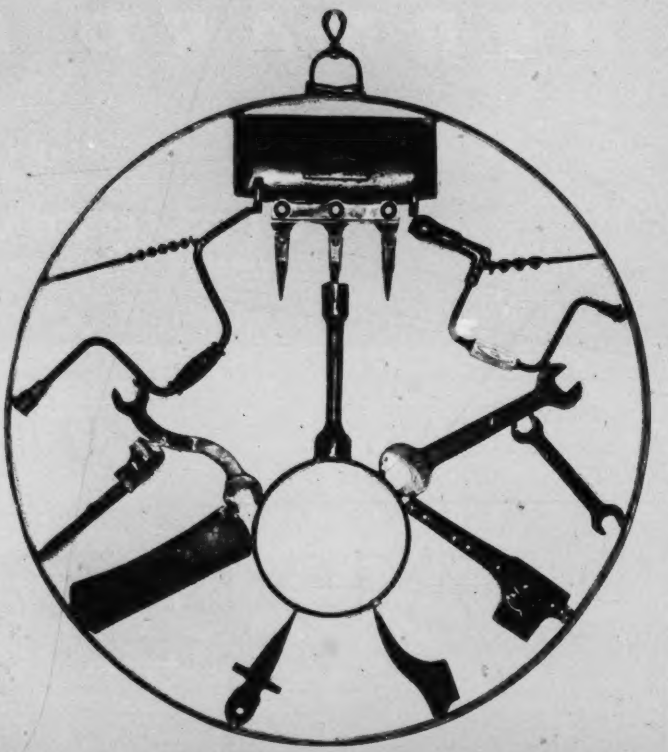
SCULPTURE

Mark di Suvero
Linda Fleming
Charles Ginnever
John Henry

Linda Howard
Lyman Kipp
Frank McGuire
Jerry Peart

101 N. Wacker Drive / Suite 235
Chicago, Illinois 60606
312 .853 .1125

ConStruct South
12100 NE 16th Avenue
North Miami, Florida 33161
305 .891 .0183



RICCO·JOHNSON GALLERY
SOHO 475 BROOME ST
NEW YORK
212·966·0541

Exceptional American Folk Art
Tues. - Sat., 11-6

Exhibition
January 12 - February 12
The Art of Rodney Rosebrook
Welded Metal Assemblages

FRED SANDBACK

6 Constructions from 1967 and recent graphic work

4 January—22 January

MARIAN GOODMAN GALLERY
24 WEST 57TH STREET NEW YORK 10019

GEORG BASELITZ

Linocuts and Woodprints

25 January—5 February

MULTIPLES
24 WEST 57TH STREET NEW YORK 10019

VOL 71
ISS 1
JA 1983

BERNARD FAUCON

CASTELLI GRAPHICS
4 EAST 77TH STREET NEW YORK NY 10021 TELEPHONE 212/288-3202

BARBARA BALKIN GALLERY

STEVEN SORMAN
14 JANUARY · 26 FEBRUARY

425 NORTH CLARK STREET CHICAGO, ILLINOIS 60610 312 · 321 · 9010

THE 1983
SCULPTURE INVITATIONAL
JANUARY

ALICE AYCOCK · BARD BREIVIK · JACKIE FERRARA · JASHA GREEN
SUZANNE HARRIS · MICHAEL HEIZER · JENE HIGHSTEIN
BERNARD KIRSCHENBAUM · MARSHA PELS · ULRICH RUCKRIEM
ROBERT STACKHOUSE · MICHELLE STUART · JACKIE WINSOR

OSCARSSON HOOD
GALLERY
41 WEST 57TH ST., NYC
(212) 750-8640

Jackie Ferrara

January 6-February 5

Max Protetch
37 West 57 Street New York

UMI

Gene Davis

A limited edition book with signed & numbered print available at

THE METROPOLITAN MUSEUM OF ART
The Mezzanine Gallery for information call 879-5500 ext 2910

Published by The Arts Publisher, Inc., New York

Untitled 9½" h. burnished earthenware

Lydia Buzio
Soho Rooftops
The Primal Vessel
Roberta Marks
Richard Deutsch
Rick Hirsch
January 8 - February 5, 1983

GARTH CLARK GALLERY
5820 Wilshire Blvd Los Angeles 90036
(213) 939 2189

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

Eric Fischl

NEW PAINTINGS
JAN. 22-FEB. 19, 1983

LARRY GAGOSIAN
GALLERY 510 N. ROBERTSON BLVD., LA, CA 90048
213/276-6051

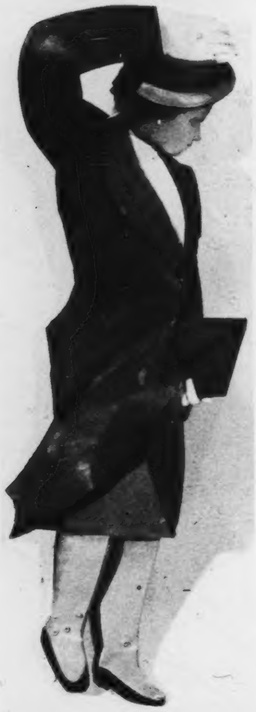
IAN CARR-HARRIS

RECENT WORKS JANUARY 12-FEBRUARY 12

STILL LIFE/NATURE MORTE, 1979. 3 UNITS: WOOD, METAL, THEATRICAL SPOTLIGHT AND DUAL LAMP WITH SUPPORTS, TRANSFER LETTERING, PROPERTIES; 86 x 154 x 82 INCHES INSTALLED

49TH PARALLEL
CENTRE FOR CONTEMPORARY CANADIAN ART
49E PARALLELE
CENTRE D'ART CONTEMPORAIN CANADIEN
420 WEST BROADWAY NEW YORK 10012
212 925-8349

IN COOPERATION WITH CARMEN LAMANNA GALLERY, TORONTO



Timothy Woodman

RECENT SCULPTURE

THRU FEBRUARY 12

Zabriskie

724 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK

Woman Holding Her Hat, 1982
Aluminum, paint; 22 x 7 x 4½ inches

Nic Nicosia

Domestic Dramas

Delahunty Dallas
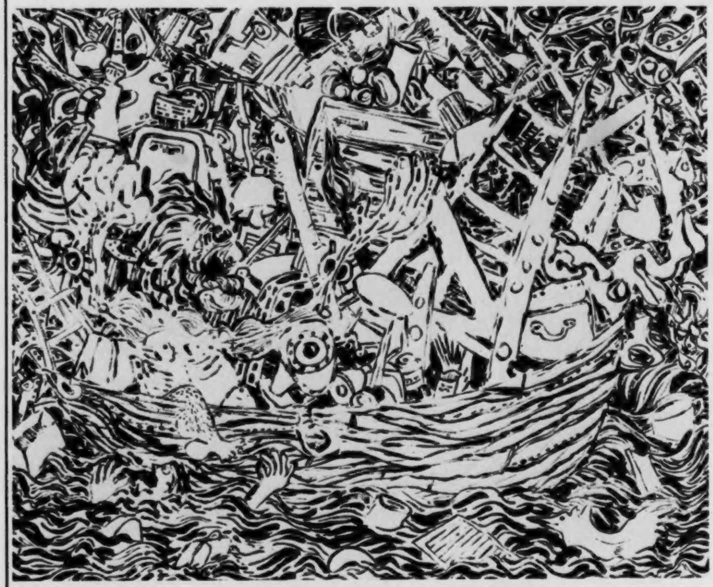
2701 Canton Street, Dallas Texas 75226
214-744-1346

December 18–February 2

Delahunty



JOHN HIMMELFARB

PAINTINGS, DRAWINGS & PRINTS

JANUARY 8 – FEBRUARY 3, 1983

RIDING HIGH 1982 ACRYLIC ON CANVAS 48" x 58"

TERRY DINTENFASS 50 W 57 STREET NEW YORK CITY 581-2268

GALERIE MICHAEL WERNER

BASELITZ
BYARS
IMMENDORFF
KIRKEBY
LÜPERTZ
A.R.PENCK

D — 5000 KÖLN — 1 —
GERTRUDENSTR. 24/28 T.210661

SERGI AGUILAR
ALEXANCO
ARRANZ BRAVO
BARTOLOZZI
JUAN BORDES
CARMEN CALVO
JOAN CARDELLS
CHEMA COBO
TERESA GANCEDO
GORDILLO
NINO LONGOBARDI
MUNTADAS
MIQUEL NAVARRO
TEIXIDOR
ZUSH

GALERIA FERNANDO VIJANDE
Nunez de Balboa, 65 Tel. 435 80 25
Madrid, 1

VOL
71
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

Susanne Doremus
New Paintings

&

Artists Create Musical Instruments
As Art Objects

January 7 through February 15, 1983

ZOLLA/LIEBERMAN GALLERY
356 W. Huron•Chicago 60610•312/944-1990

VISION GALLERY

19th & 20th Century
European Photographs

Eugene Atget
The Art of Old Paris

Charles Marville
Bois du Bologne

Adolphe Braun
Flower Arrangements

Inquiries Invited:
Brent Sikkema, Inc.
216 Newbury Street, Boston, MA 02116
Telephone: (617) 266-9481

Frank
Faulkner
New Paintings
January 8-29

Monique
Knowlton
Gallery
19 East 71st Street
New York 10021
(212) 794-9700

Jean Arp "Saint de la lisière" bronze

DOMINION GALLERY
1438 Sherbrooke St. West, Montreal H3G 1K4
514-845-7471 and 7833

Art in America

Savings Certificate

FOR THE SUM OF UP TO $42.90

☐ YES! Send me 3 years (33 issues*) of ART IN AMERICA – the world's most innovative art magazine – for only $79.95 – a $42.90 savings off the newsstand rate.

☐ Send me 2 years (22 issues*) of ART IN AMERICA for only $59.95 – a $21.95 savings off the newsstand rate.

☐ Send me 1 year (11 issues*) of ART IN AMERICA for only $34.95 – a $6.00 savings off the newsstand rate.

☐ VISA ☐ MasterCard Acct. #__________ Exp.______
☐ Check/Money Order enclosed ☐ Bill me.

Name____________________

Address____________________

City__________ State_____ Zip______

All subscriptions include our new Annual Guide to Galleries, Museums, Artists – the most comprehensive national directory ever published.

EA 303

VOL

71

ISS

1

JA

1983

UMI

NO POSTAGE
NECESSARY
IF MAILED
IN THE
UNITED STATES

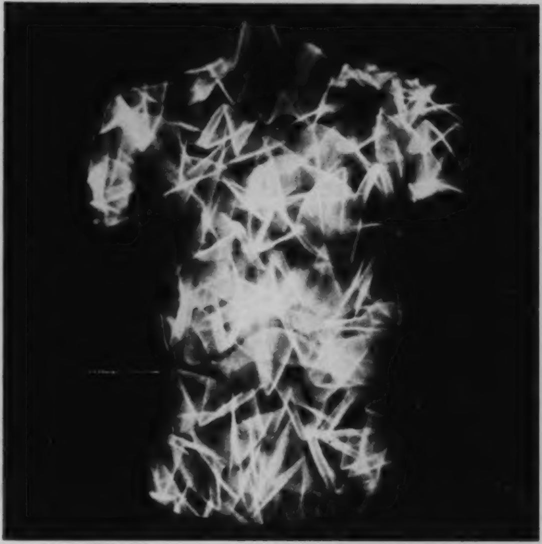
BUSINESS REPLY CARD
FIRST CLASS PERMIT NO. 542 MARION, OHIO

POSTAGE WILL BE PAID BY

Art in America

542 PACIFIC AVENUE
MARION, OHIO 43306

RON COOPER
FLASHLIGHT TORSOS / LIGHT TRAPS



JANUARY 9 - FEBRUARY 5

NEIL G. OVSEY
GALLERY
705 East Third Street, 3rd Floor
Los Angeles, California 90013
Telephone: (213) 617-1351

RICHEBOURG/McCOY
4 East 89 Street New York 10028
212/410.5588

Major Works by CORNELL
DALI
DE KOONING
FRANCIS
KRASNER
OLDENBURG
RIVERS

By appointment
Elizabeth Richebourg · Jason McCoy

Moving
February

Betsy
Rosenfield Gallery, Inc.
212 West Superior, Chicago, Illinois 60610 Telephone 312.787.8020

The Estate of John Altoon
Jack Barth, Eric Fischl
April Gornik, John Lees
R.L. Kaplan, Ken Kiff
Doug Martin, Jane Rosen
Joseph Santore
Martin Silverman
David True

EDWARD THORP
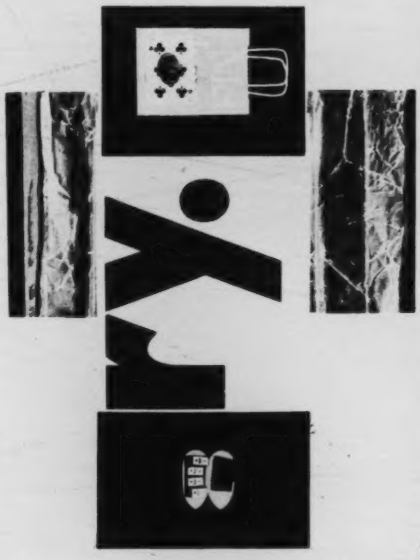
GALLERY

419 WEST BROADWAY, NEW YORK, NY 10012
TELEPHONE 212/431-6880

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

ELIZABETH VOELKER



"Shogun", 1982
55" x 41⅛" w
collage

COLLAGES
January 5 to
January 31, 1983

ALLPORT GALLERY
1000 Magnolia
Larkspur, CA 94939

DAVID
SALLE

January 1983

AKIRA IKEDA GALLERY
17-30, NISHIKI 2-CHOME, NAKA-KU, NAGOYA,
8-18, KYOBASHI 2-CHOME, CHUO-KU, TOKYO

World's Largest
Gallery Collection of Mexican Masters

Paintings, sculpture, drawings
watercolors.
Large collection of graphics.

Felipe Castaneda • Jean Charlot
Rafael Coronel • Ricardo Martinez
Carlos Merida • Gustavo Montoya
Leonardo Nierman • Felipe Orlando
J.C. Orozco • Diego Rivera
D.A. Siqueiros • Rufino Tamayo
F. Zuniga • and others

The
B. Lewin Galleries

266 North Beverly Drive 213-278-5769
Beverly Hills, California 90210 213-550-1852

210 South Palm Canyon Drive
Palm Springs, California 92262 714-325-7611

artprograms
Department of Art
College of Fine Arts

Bachelor of Fine Arts with a Minor.
A 4 year, undergraduate program.
BFA

Master of Fine Arts.
A 2 year master program.
MFA

Pre-College courses are offered on Saturdays during the Academic year and in special 6 week summer programs.

Master of Art Teaching.
A 4 summer program for experienced art teachers.
MAT

Carnegie-Mellon University

Office of Admissions
Carnegie-Mellon University
5000 Forbes Avenue
Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania
15213
Telephone/412/578/2085

Robert Walker
(center gallery)

Tom Bianchi
(west gallery)

Jack Scott
(east gallery)

Kirk deGooyer Gallery

[illegible]
[illegible]

A PAINTING EXHIBITION

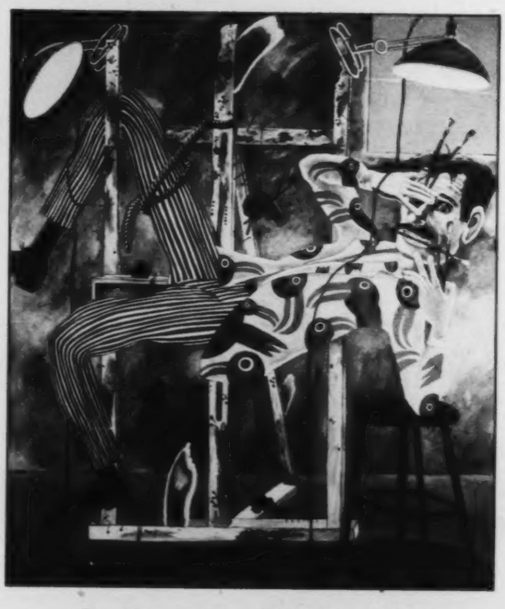
18 JANUARY THROUGH 23 FEBRUARY 1983

JASPER JOHNS
BRICE MARDEN
ROBERT RYMAN
ELLSWORTH KELLY
ELIZABETH MURRAY
FRANK STELLA
ROBERT MANGOLD
SUSAN ROTHENBERG
TERRY WINTERS

PAULA COOPER GALLERY

155 WOOSTER STREET NEW YORK TEL 212 674.0766

WARRENS: "TYRANNOSAUR REX", 1982, A/C, 90 X 75 INCHES



Contemporary Self-Portraits

Part II: The Antic Vision January

ALLAN FRUMKIN GALLERY 50 W 57 NEW YORK

JOAN SNYDER

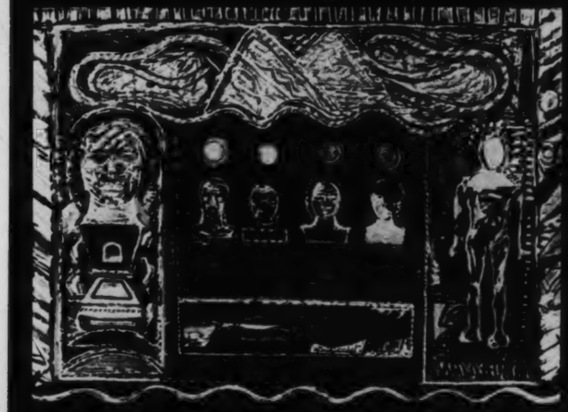
MIA WESTERLUND ROOSEN

DEC 18 TO JAN 22

HAMILTON GALLERY
20 W 57 NY (212) 765-5915

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

Salvatore La Rosa
PAINTINGS & WORKS ON PAPER
January 7 - February 2, 1983



Untitled
22½" x 30"
1977 mixed media on paper

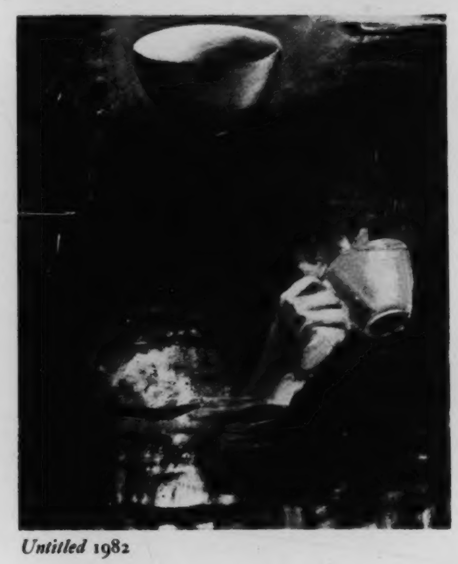
Barbara
Gillman
Gallery
270 N.E. 39 Street / 3886 Biscayne Blvd
Miami, Florida 33137 / (305) 573-4898

Dimensional Aspects of Painting

Tony Berlant
Stephen Davis
Sam Gilliam
Barbara Houskeeper
Thomas Lane
Brian Longe
Frank Pannier
Salvatore Pecoraro
Liliana Porter
Thomas Rose
Steven Sorman

KLEIN GALLERY
356 WEST HURON, CHICAGO, IL 60610
312/787-0400



Untitled 1982

Christopher Brown
Paintings
12 January - February 1983

Gallery Paule Anglim
14 Geary St. San Francisco (415) 433-2710

2
2nd Edition!
Available March, 1983
Directory
of Corporate Art Collections

An indispensable reference tool for arts councils, arts administrators, museums, libraries, art dealers, art consultants and artists.

Save hours of research time by using this up-to-date resource directory. Provides you with information on over 350 corporate art collections

- over 50 totally new corporations
- contact person, address and phone
- description of the collection
- size and location of the collections
- cross indexes by state and personnel
- and much more

Pre-publication price of $29 each plus shipping and handling until February 15, 1983, $35 thereafter postage paid on prepaid orders

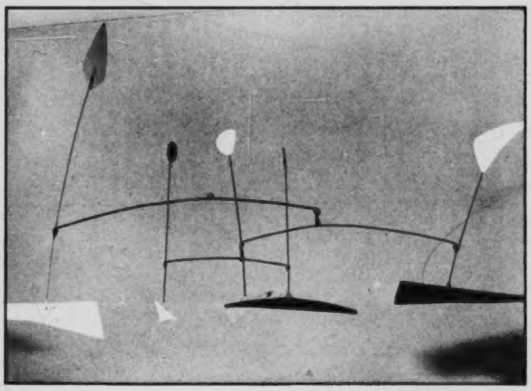
International Art Alliance,
P.O. Box 1608, Largo, Florida 33540 813-581-7328

CHAMPIONS

JAN. 15-FEB. 19

JOHN AHEARN
DONALD BAECHLER
JEAN-MICHEL BASQUIAT
JAMES BROWN
RONNIE CUTRONE
BRETT DEPALMA
FUTURA 2000
KEITH HARING
TOM OTTERNESS
KENNY SCHARF
ZADIK ZADIKIAN

TONY SHAFRAZI GALLERY
163 MERCER STREET NEW YORK 10012 (212) 925-8732



CALDER, "HORIZON WEEDS," 1963
59½" long, hanging mobile.

Other major works also available by Cornell, DeKooning, Lichtenstein, Louis, Oldenburg, Rauschenberg, Rosenquist, Twombly, Warhol and others.

MARVIN ROSS FRIEDMAN & CO.

15451 SOUTHWEST 67 COURT
MIAMI, FLORIDA 33157
BY APPOINTMENT ONLY
PHONE (305) 233-4281

JANUARY 7—FEBRUARY 5

JOHN MANDEL

FEBRUARY 9—MARCH 9

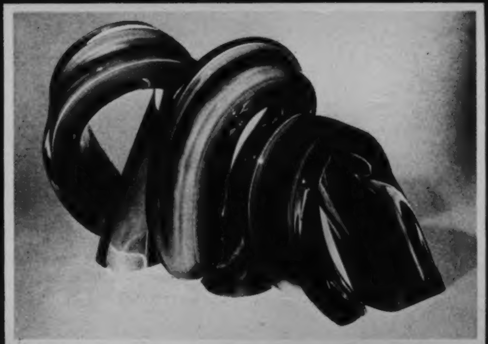
IDA APPLEBROOG

Koplin Gallery

8225½ Santa Monica Boulevard • Los Angeles, CA 90046 • 213/656-3378

HARVEY K. LITTLETON

January 27–February 22



holsten galleries

PALM BEACH, FLORIDA STOCKBRIDGE, MASS.
206 Worth Ave. Palm Beach, Fla. 33480 (305) 833-3403

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
J A 1983
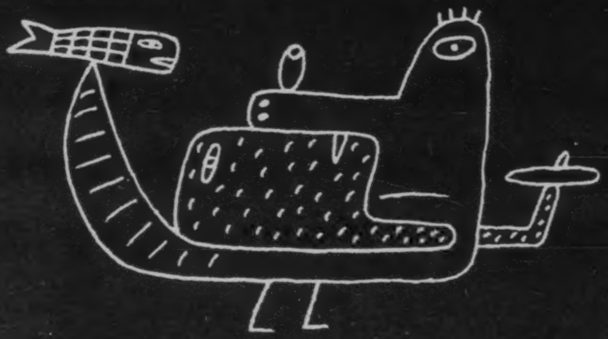
UMI

TODD McKIE
DECENT PAINTINGS

January 15 - February 9



Harcus Krakow Gallery
Boston 02116

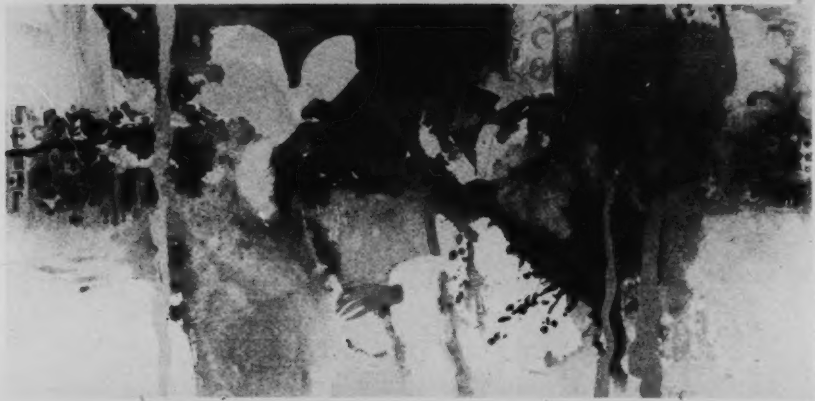
7 Newbury St.
(617) 262-4483

ONE of ONE
AN EXHIBITION ABOUT THE MONOPRINT

JOYCE BEZDEK
LILIBET DEWEY
CHERYL DUDEK
MARCY EDELSTEIN
VIDA HACKMAN
YVONNE HIBBS
JENNIFER HILTON
LUCY HODGSON
MARTIN LEVINSON
GWEN STONE
RANDI VICK-HALL
ELIZABETH WHITELEY
JUDITH ZIEGLER

MIRIAM PERLMAN

Lake Point Tower 505 N. Lake Shore Drive Suite 5410 Chicago



GLYN JONES

Paintings

CARONE GALLERY

600 Southeast Second Court,
Fort Lauderdale, Florida 33301
Telephone: (305) 463-8833

JANUARY 8-28, 1983

SVEND WIIG-HANSEN

RECEPTION: JANUARY 8, 6-8 PM

BONLOW GALLERY
JEANETTE BONNIER
150 GREENE ST. NYC 10012 (212) 925-4482

A FINE
SELECTION OF
CONTEMPORARY AMERICAN ART

incorporated
gallery

1200 MADISON AVE. (87th ST.) NYC 10028 • (212) 831-4466

Margaret
Newman

LINDA DURHAM
GALLERY,
SANTA FE

400 Canyon Road
Santa Fe, N.M. 87501
505-988-1313

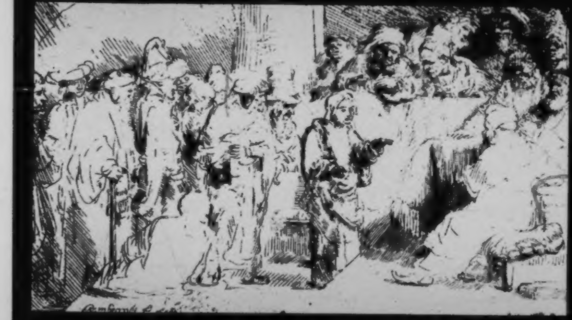
The New Year Salon Hanging

Roselyn Ablow
Nancy Andell
Mary Anderson Armstrong
Christina Bertoni
Paul Bowen
Susan Bush
Robert Ferrandini
William Flynn
Nan Freeman
Harvey Goldman
Rick Hirsch
Jan Holcomb
David Kelley
Robert Kelly
Anne Neely
Miklos Pogany
Jain Tarnower
Sarah Westlake

January 8 through 29

IMPRESSIONS GALLERY
275 Dartmouth Street, Boston MA 02116 (617) 262-0783

Rembrandt



Christ Disputing with the Doctors 1652. Original Etching H. 257.

The Touch of the Master
A Selection of Etchings from His Lifetime

December 4–January 15, 1983
Catalog Available

PASQUALE IANNETTI
ART GALLERIES, INC.
575 Sutter Street, San Francisco, CA 94102,
(415) 433-2771

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

JUDITH SELKOWITZ FINE ARTS, INC. announces
THIRD ANNUAL COMPETITION $3,000

Category: ABSTRACT PAINTING
No entry fee or application
Eligibility: Limited to American artists who have no affiliations with New York City commercial galleries.
Requirements: Artists may send slides of up to six works. Slides must represent available works at least 36" x 50". A self-addressed, stamped envelope for the return of the slides is to be enclosed.
Award: There will be a $2,000 cash award to purchase the winning work, which will be placed in a corporate art collection. A travel stipend of $1,000 will also be given for the winner to travel to two cities in the U.S.
Deadline: Slides must be received by March 5, 1983. Judith Selkowitz Fine Arts, Inc. is not responsible for lost or damaged slides.
Address: Judith Selkowitz Fine Arts, Inc. Award
P.O. Box 5268, New York, New York 10150
Selection: The winner will be selected by an advisory board of six, consisting of members from the art, architecture, and business communities.

ANTONIO PETICOV

Sculptures et Peintures Fevrier 1983 Galerie 212
212, Boulevard St.Germain 75007 Paris

VINCENT MASTRACCO

7 January to 26 January 1983
The Lamont Gallery
Phillips Exeter Academy
Exeter, NH 03833

5 February to 26 February 1983
Walkey Gallery
32 Main Street
Concord, MA 01742

ASPECTS OF DANISH
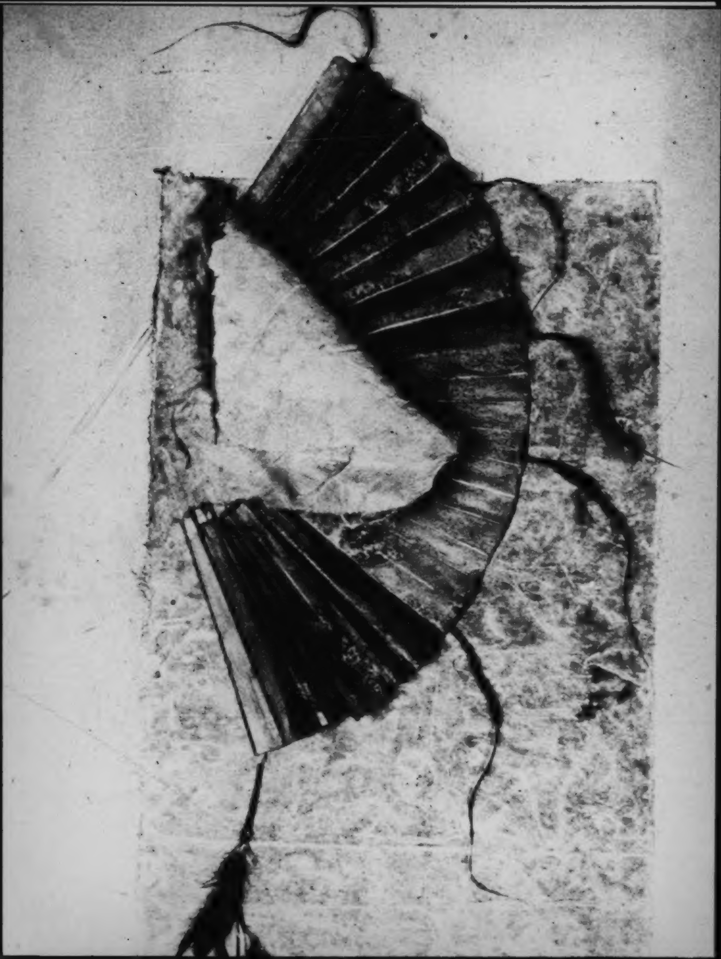
ART

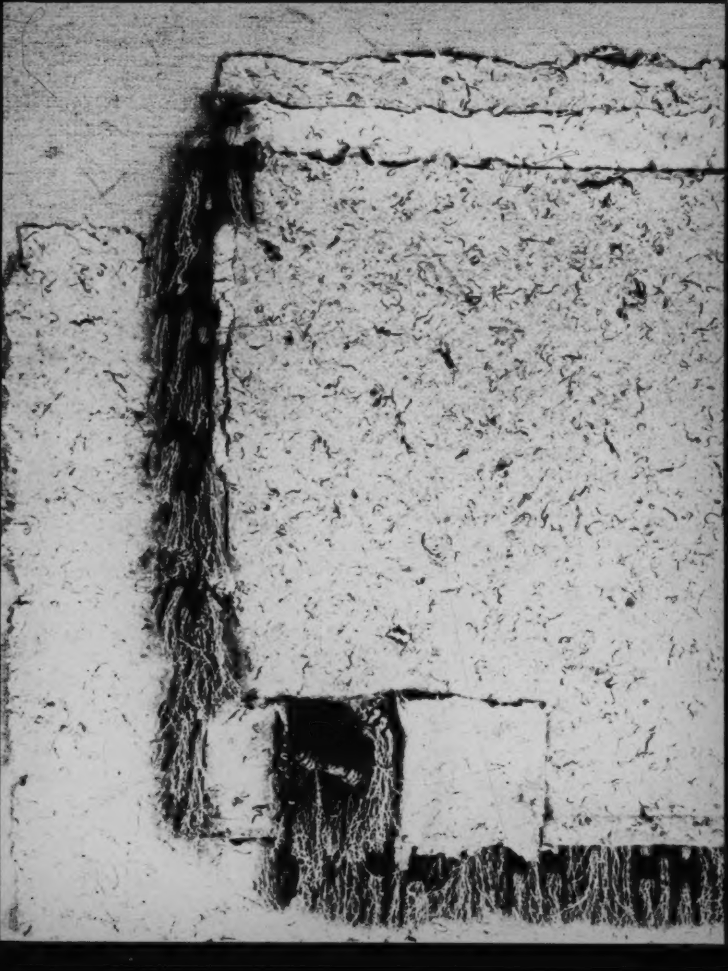
LEO CASTELLI GALLERY 142 Greene St.	• Margrete Sørensen	Jan. 8-29
CHARLES COWLES GALLERY 420 W. Broadway	• Jorgen Haugen Sørensen	Feb. 5-26
BETTY PARSONS GALLERY 24 West 57 St.	• Frede Christoffersen	Jan. 8-Feb. 2
BONLOW GALLERY 15[illegible] Greene St.	• Svend Wiig Hansen	Jan. 8-29
LEFEBRE GALLERY 47 E. 77th St.	• Asger Jorn (Lefebre family collection)	April 26-May 28
ARCO CENTER FOR VISUAL ART•LOS ANGELES	• Svend Wiig Hansen	April 11-May 21

ARMOND LARA

9 GRAMERCY PARK
NEWYORK, NEWYORK 10003
212-2540781

TARA





ARMOND LARA

9 GRAMERCY PARK
NEWYORK, NEWYORK 10003
212-2540781

TARA

VOL
71
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

Brentwood Gallery

The Pacific Northwest Today January

Tom Rippon February

Leon Anderson March

The Southwest Now April

1221 South Brentwood Boulevard
Saint Louis, Missouri 63117
(314) 863-0808

TEXAS GALLERY

December
Billy Al Bengston/Ed Ruscha

January
Chuck Arnoldi

February
Matt Mullican

March
William Wegman

April
Gary Stephan

2012 Peden • Houston • Texas • 77019

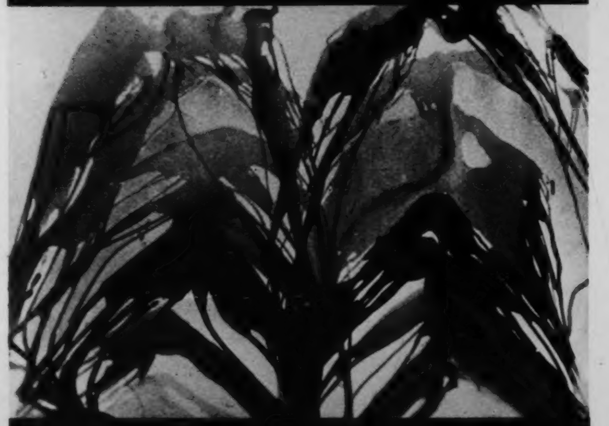
TIBOR DE NAGY GALLERY
29 W. 57, NY 10019 (212) 421-3780

JOE SHANNON
"DISCRETIONS & LIES (PICASSO)"

RAY CIARROCHI
"RECENT MONOTYPES AND PASTELS"

8 JANUARY - 2 FEBRUARY 1983

JERRY WRAY



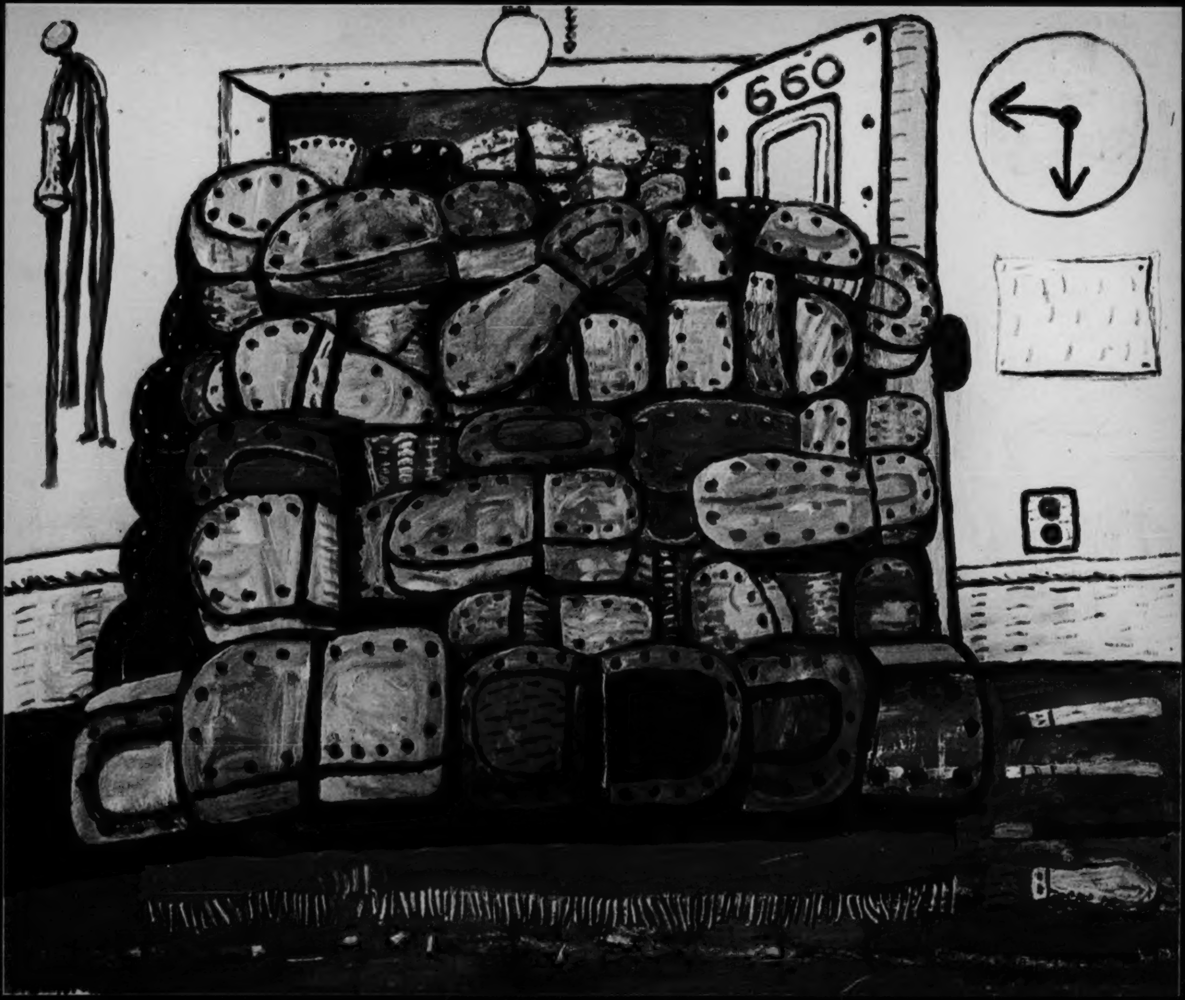
"Birthday Party" Acrylic 34" x 48"

January 7-29

db

DONALD BATMAN GALLERY
825 WESTPORT RD KANSAS CITY MO 64111 (816)531-2588

PHILIP GUSTON



"THE DOOR" 1976 oil on canvas 81"x96"

SELECTED PAINTINGS

JANUARY 23 - FEBRUARY 18, 1983

YARES GALLERY

3625 BISHOP LANE SCOTTSDALE, ARIZONA 85251 (602) 947-3251

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
J A
1983
UMI

PHILIP PEARLSTEIN

NUDE IN HAMMOCK 1982 etching / six colors 30" × 40½" edition of 50
published by:
724 PRINTS, INC.
inquiries invited

724 PRINTS
93 MERCER STREET, NEW YORK 10012 • (212) 431-1890

ELEANOR ETTINGER INC. & ATELIER ETTINGER INC.

publishers and printers of fine art lithography have moved their offices to magnificent new quarters. Occupying 15,000 square feet in Soho, our new location features a gallery/showroom, glassed in printing facilities and private naturally lit work areas for artists.

With this move the Ettinger organization rededicates itself to the creation of the finest original graphics in the world.

OUR NEW ADDRESS
155 Avenue of the Americas, New York, New York 10013 212-807-7607

SHIVAIR®

OPAQUE and TRANSPARENT airbrush colors

NEW FROM SHIVA

Success. As an artist, you know Shiva® — a leading maker of fine art paints for over 40 years. Now after extensive development, SHIVAIR® airbrush colors are introduced. And now you have the ideal paint for use with airbrush, tech pens, and of course, the brush.

SHIVAIR colors are formulated for instant use. No mixing, no clogging. They are completely consistent and intermixable. The 13 vibrant colors, plus black and white, come in 2-ounce bottle with no-clog, easy dispensing caps. And they are available in both opaque and transparent. These could be the best paints for their use you will ever find.

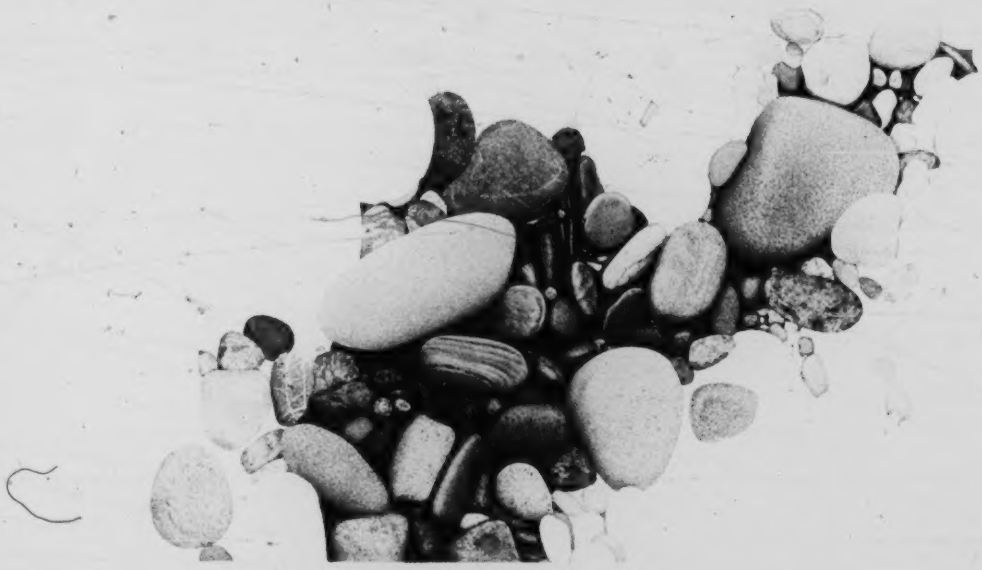
Join the Shiva success. You will find SHIVAIR airbrush colors at your complete art supply stores.

4320 WEST 190th STREET, TORRANCE, CA 90509
(800) 421-1325/(213) 542-5583

Design: IMAGE ONE
MANHATTAN BEACH, CA

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

A L A N   M A G E E



December 26, 1982 to February 6, 1983
SAN JOSE MUSEUM OF ART
110 South Market • San Jose, California 95113

Poster available:
ALLPORT GALLERY
1000 Magnolia • Larkspur, Ca 94939

"Constellation"
Watercolor, 22" x 30"
© Alan Magee, 1982

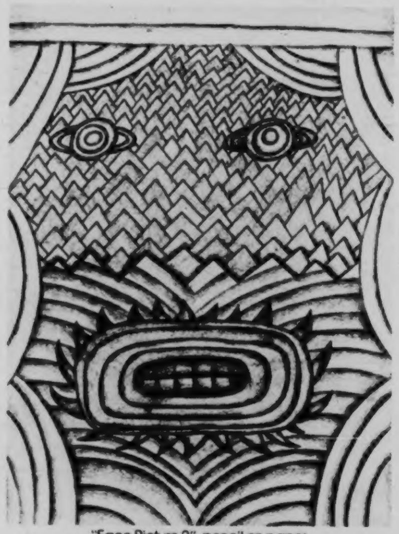
MIAMI

BAY HARBOR GALLERIES

ON KANE CONCOURSE

GALERIE NINETY-NINE 1088 Kane Concourse 33154 305-865-5823 Tues.-Sat. 10:00-5:00	January 14: February 11:	Terence La Noue New Works Ben Schonzeit Paintings
GLORIA LURIA GALLERY 1033 Kane Concourse 33154 305-865-3060 Tue.-Sat. 10:00-5:00	January 14: February 11:	Lynne Golob Gelfman Jennifer Bartlett DeWain Valentine
MEDICI-BERENSON GALLERY 1052 Kane Concourse 33154 305-864-5355 Tue.-Sat. 10:00-5:00	January 14: February 11:	Richard Saba-Helen Bershad Dorothy Gillespie-Vasa Ronnie Landfield - Paintings Peter Reginato - Sculpture
RAUCHBACH GALLERIES 1007 Kane Concourse 33154 305-861-9992 Tue.-Sat. 11:00-5:00	January 14: February 11:	Milt Surrey Kaleidoscope series Bruno Lucchesi Bronze Sculpture
ANA SKLAR GALLERY 1019 Kane Concourse 33154 305-868-2008 Mon.-Sat. 10:00-5:00	January 14: February 11:	Jan Sawka Mosaic Paintings Margaret Cheeseman Theodora Gavenchak Harriet Kittay Sculptures

SUELLEN ROCCA
new paintings & drawings



"Face Picture 2", pencil on paper,
1982, 15 x 11 inches

JANUARY 14 - FEBRUARY 9, 1983

PHYLLIS KIND GALLERY
226 E. ONTARIO, CHICAGO (312) 642-6302

1983 one person shows

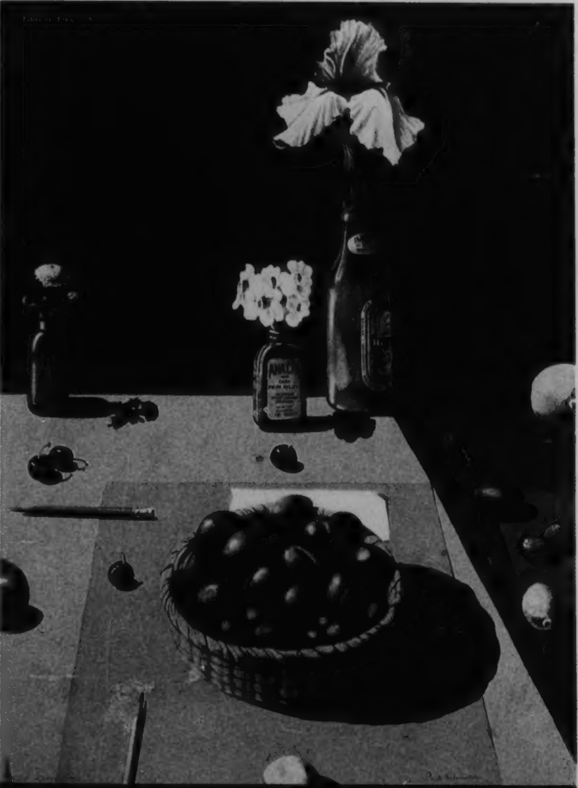
STEVE PENTAK
PETER PLAGENS
OWEN McHUGH
JOEL BASS
COREY POSTIGLIONE
RANDALL TIMMONS

JAN
CICERO
GALLERY

437 N CLARK CHICAGO, IL 60610 312 644 5374

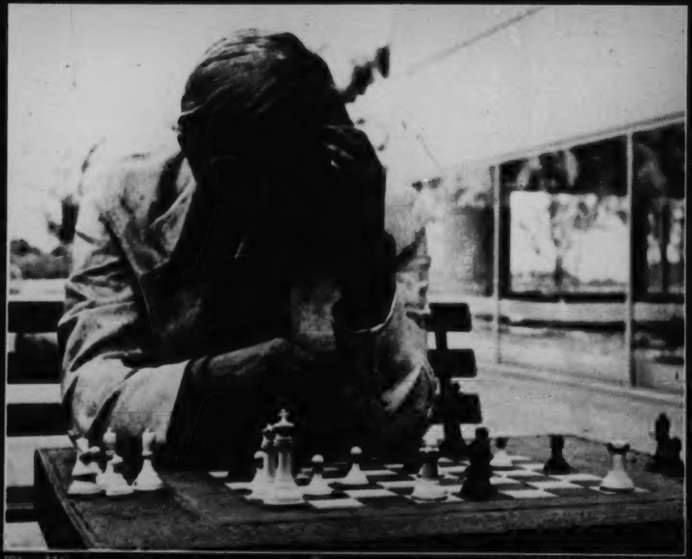


PAUL WONNER:
THE FIRST LITHOGRAPH

In the Summer of 1982, Paul Wonner completed a remarkable seventeen color lithograph in the workshop of Editions Press. It is entitled Basket of Plums, measures thirty by twenty two and a half inches, and is hand printed on white Arches Cover paper. It is offered in a numbered edition of seventy five. Please call or write for information.

EDITIONS PRESS
915 Bryant Street, San Francisco
California, 94103 U.S.A.
Telephone: (415) 626-1846

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI



The Winner

Lifesize Bronze Sculpture By

CURRENT EXHIBITIONS:

FOUR SEASONS HOTEL
WASHINGTON, DC

YALE CAMPUS and
NEW HAVEN PARKLANDS
NEW HAVEN, CT

1982 WORLDS FAIR
KNOXVILLE, TN

BOCA RATON HOTEL and CLUB
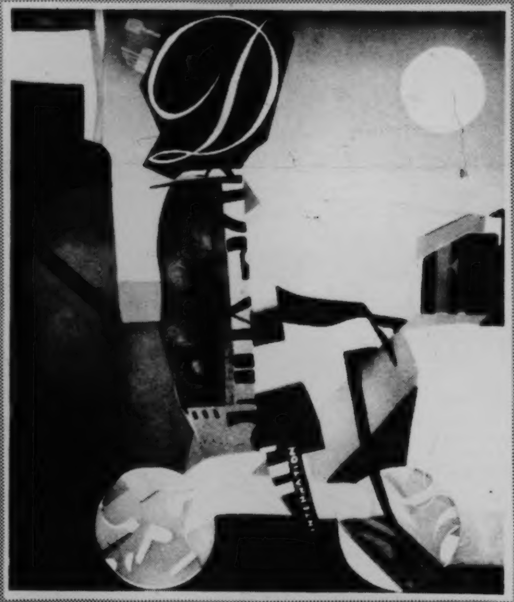
BOCA RATON, FL

MIDDLESEX HOSPITAL
NEW BRUNSWICK, NJ

J. Seward Johnson, Jr.

For information and brochure contact: Sculpture Placement • P.O. Box 9709 • Dept. 5 • Washington, D.C. 20016 • 202—362-9310

AN IMPORTANT NEW AQUATINT



"The Cyclist" 40¾" x 47" Edition of 60

Brochures & price lists available — Dealers inquire.

MAX PAPART

MEET THE ARTIST

January 27, 1983
BALL-STOCKER, 151 14th St., Atlanta, Ga.

February 13, 1983
LANGMAN GALLERY,
Willow Grove Park, Willow Grove, Pa.

March 26, 1983
PATRICIA JUDITH ART GALLERY
720 East Palmetto Park Road, Boca Raton, Fla.

NAHAN
GALLERIES

Exclusive agents and publishers for Max Papart
540 Royal Street, New Orleans, Louisiana 70130
(504) 524-8696

DAVID FERTIG recent pastels

TOM GOODMAN
"Enigma Variations" photo-constructions

JANUARY 7-29, 1983

Marian Locks Gallery
1524 Walnut Street
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania 19102
215 546-0322

GREAT NORTHERN

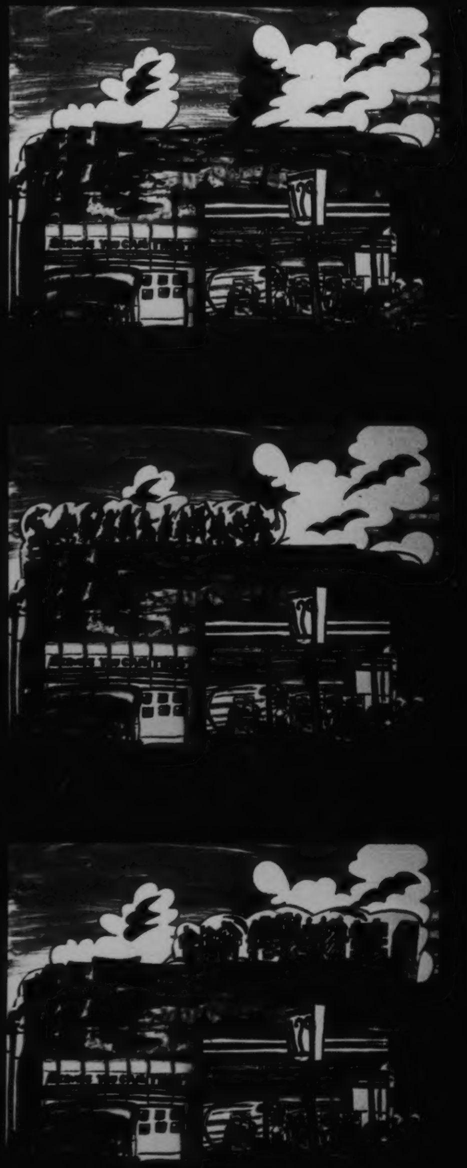
INSURANCE
SPECIALISTS
TO THE
ART WORLD

GALLERIES · COLLECTORS
MUSEUMS · PUBLISHERS
AUCTION HOUSES

INQUIRIES INVITED

950 THIRD AVENUE NEW YORK N.Y. 10022 (212)371-2800



Red Grooms
"Tonto Condo"
7 color lithograph with moveable parts.
Cut, folded and assembled in plexiglas frame.
6½ × 23 × 30½"
Edition 75
$1800

Shark's

2020-B 10th Street
Boulder, CO 80302
(303) 443-4601

Dealer inquiries invited.

Prints also available by Laurie Anderson
Rev. Howard Finster

VOL
71
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

Ernst Ludwig Kirchner: Potsdamer Platz, 1914, oil on canvas, 78 by 58 ½ inches. Private collection; photo courtesy Nationalgalerie, Berlin.

Art in America

Alienation in Berlin: Kirchner's Street Scenes

Often seen as mythic depictions of an unchangeable urban estrangement, Kirchner's Berlin street scenes may also be read as specific critiques of the effects of a money economy. Below, a political reading of these images of a city on the eve of severe economic and social crisis.

BY ROSALYN DEUTSCHE

In a group of paintings, and in numerous drawings, pastels, watercolors and graphics executed between 1913 and 1915, Ernst Ludwig Kirchner depicted the streets of prewar Berlin as dead ends. In Potsdamer Platz, the culminating work of the series, he created a symbolic impasse by stranding two prostitutes on a traffic island directly in front of the glowing pink facade of the city railroad station—the very emblem of mobility. As in all the street scenes, grotesque caricature, garish color, entrapping spatial distortion and harshly angular line function as agents of protest against an alienating, impenetrable city. But as protest, the paintings themselves may have been dead ends, for Kirchner's belief in the power of emotion to overcome alienation was soon to be discredited as an inadequate response to—indeed, a withdrawal from—social reality. As Donald Kuspit has pointed out, uninhibited Expressionist feeling, originally directed against bourgeois smugness and repression, has long since been appropriated by the bourgeoisie as a diversion from social problems.[1] In Berlin in 1913, however, emotional expression was difficult to accept; even Georg Lukács, who condemned the entire Expressionist movement as a vague, subjective revolt that obscured the objective causes of war, willingly admitted that the Expressionists were sincere and spontaneous. Kirchner's paintings, then, represent one of the last instances when subjective expression constituted a genuinely subversive stance.

Emotionalism is, however, currently being revived by the German Neo-Expressionists, especially by the Berlin "violent" painters, who enforce a special continuity with prewar Expressionism by raiding Kirchner's art not only for a pedigree or to regain contact with a national heritage, but for imagery and a strategy of rebellion as well. The frontal figure in Helmut Middendorf's Electric Night (1980), for example, is a direct quotation of the child in Kirchner's Street, Dresden (1908/19). Furthermore, the overall conception of Middendorf's nocturnal city pictures—the hectic atmosphere of brilliantly lit streets, the large and sketchy figures pushed up towards the surface, their faces rendered as masks—is derived from Kirchner's Berlin street scenes.

Middendorf, however, does not merely reenact his predecessor's response to urban alienation; rather, he generalizes and exaggerates Kirchner's more thoughtful meditation on reversion to savagery in the modern city. Middendorf turns out images of an anonymous, primitive humanity supposedly stripped—both literally and figuratively—to essentials. In his work urban subjects are removed from contemporary life into a timeless, psychologized space, as the city itself dissolves into a primal place, often with overt references to tribal life. Thus, the isolation, apprehension and violence that pervade his work—as well as that of Rainer Fet-

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

Kirchner: Street, Dresden, 1908/19, oil on canvas, 59 ¼ by 78 ⅞ inches. Museum of Modern Art, New York.

Edvard Munch: Evening on Karl Johan Street, 1892, oil on canvas, 33 ¼ by 47 ⅝ inches. Collection Rasmus Meyers.

Helmut Middendorf: Singer (left) and Electric Night (right), both 1980, dry pigment and acrylic on canvas. Photo courtesy Mary Boone Gallery.

Kirchner: People before a Display Window, 1914, drawing. Staatsgalerie, Stuttgart.

Five Women on the Street, 1913, oil on canvas, 46 ¾ by 35 inches. Museum Ludwig, Cologne.

ting, among others—are presented as the essential lot of humanity.

Just as Middendorf's reworkings of the Berlin street scenes withdraw them from the particularities of time and place, art-historical interpretations of Kirchner's pictures have tended to transform the artist's critique of alienation in the big commercial city into a general statement of the "human condition." Thus, the subject of the paintings is usually identified as one of two supposedly eternal oppositions—man versus woman, or individual versus society. Franz Roh, for example, subsumes the historical moment the paintings represent into a larger struggle, the battle of the sexes: "The eternal schism between man and woman . . . jammed between animalism and the machinery of the big city."[2] Prostitutes on Berlin city streets are, in this view, merely a modern manifestation of eternal sexual conflict.

Most writers, however, find the key to Kirchner's work in a clash between the individual and society: "One senses in the Berlin and Dresden street scenes the essence of Kirchner's spirit: existential isolation combined with a deeply emotional understanding of the condition of all individuals imprisoned by society."[3] Here, the condition of "modern man" in the "modern city" is treated as an existential dilemma—that is, as the unchanging condition of existence itself, the eternal struggle of individuals to reconcile themselves with the objective world. All societies are seen as imprisoning, and no transformation of society will help overcome alienation.

It is the pointed observation of Kirchner's paintings, not their "timelessness," that places his works among the most significant images of alienation in modern art.

Although they correctly identify Kirchner's subject as urban alienation, both interpretations neglect—or repress—its political implications. In failing to relate the estrangement Kirchner depicted to concrete, historical conditions, these writers reveal only their own essentialist bias. The paintings' specific, time-bound subject—Berlin, the center of world capitalism on the eve of a great economic crisis—is neutralized, transposed into myth. We are told that the Berlin paintings exhibit an abstract sympathy for the underdog, for "persecuted individuals of all races and nationalities";[4] the paintings have also been interpreted as manifestations of the "metropolitan psyche,"[5] and as critiques of "urban sin."[6] But the big city has never been identified as what it was—the big capitalist city where the

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
J A 1983
UMI

The Street, 1913, oil on canvas, 47 by 35 ½ inches. Museum of Modern Art, New York.

circulation of money was the primary activity.

Admittedly, the sanction for these ahistorical interpretations comes from the mythologizing that was central to the Expressionists' own stance; they persistently transformed historically conditioned facts—like imperialist war—into everlasting phenomena—like apocalypse. Kirchner was hardly immune to this tendency, for he ultimately believed that isolation and estrangement were inevitable, matters of fate. But instead of uncritically adopting Kirchner's beliefs, we need to return to the paintings themselves for a fresh look. For it is my contention that, in the Berlin street scenes, Kirchner went beyond a mere depiction of alienation to observe its actual cause—the dominance of a money economy. It is their pointed observation, then, and not their "timelessness," that places these works among the most significant images of alienation in modern art.

Berlin Street Scene, 1913. Brücke-Museum, Berlin; photo courtesy Wolfgang Henze.

Contemplating the city crowd, Kirchner depicted its members as commodities. As limited as this insight may ultimately have been, it is the paintings' primary strength, and it conditions both their iconography and style. By choosing as his subject prostitutes and their clients, Kirchner focused on the objectification of human relations inherent in economic exchange; the angular hardening of organic form in all the paintings is a perfect visual analogue for this process of thingification. Moreover, the mask-like faces of Kirchner's figures, as well as their almost mechanical gestures and identical clothing, present them as stripped of all individual attributes.

The Berlin street scenes must be distinguished from a long line of painted depictions of the city, stretching back into the mid-19th century and accompanying the rise of modernism in art. For Kirchner, the city did not engender a new perceptual excitement, as it had for the Impressionists. Nor did it provide opportunities to expose corruption and to examine a wide range of social types, as it had for Daumier, or even to concentrate on contemporary life, as for Manet. Kirchner's pictures of city crowds also differ radically from those of his most obvious predecessor, Edvard Munch. Although Kirchner's 1908 Munch-derived Street, Dresden reiterates, in a less gloomy way, the anxiety of Munch's paraders on Karl Johan Street, by the time he began the Berlin street scenes (approximately two years after his move to the capital in the autumn of 1911), Kirchner had abandoned Munch's Jugendstil line and adopted instead certain Cubist and Futurist techniques, which he applied to a changed description of city life. The figures in Munch's Evening on Karl Johan Street (1892)—or, for that matter, in The Scream (1893) or Anxiety (1894)—seem to project their own inner anxiety onto their world; moody, bloody color and swirling, pulsating line read as externalizations of their inner, psychological states. By contrast, Kirchner's Berliners seem to take on the qualities of their world—the qualities of things.

In the Berlin street scenes, Kirchner's depiction of human behavior is always modeled on commercial transactions and centered on acts of display, buying and selling.

The Berlin street scenes are immediately recognizable as pictures of an unnatural, thoroughly dehumanized world. This atmosphere of artificiality is produced by severe spatial and scalar distortions and by harsh, electric color—acid greens, glaring pinks, icy blues. But these techniques do even

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

Friedrichstrasse, Berlin, 1914, oil on canvas, 48 ¾ by 35 ½ inches. Staatsgalerie, Stuttgart.

more: they link people to this environment. In The Street (1913), for example, the phosphorescent pink blaze of the sidewalk pavement—thrust into the limelight by exaggerated perspective—is reiterated in the faces of the three major figures, thereby identifying them as reflections of their world.

Among the techniques Kirchner used to depict dehumanization, fashion is perhaps the most striking, for here it reduces people to the status of interchangeable objects. The figures in Five Woman on the Street (1913) are virtual replicas of each other (despite slight variations in hat styles). Fashion immediately establishes social position: the women's large feathered hats and fur-trimmed coats identify them as prostitutes. What is more, such clothing overwhelms its wearers; it substitutes for their natural bodies.

As sociologist and philosopher George Simmel had written in 1904, "There is good reason why externals constitute the field of fashion, for here no dependence is placed on really vital motives of human action."[7] But whereas Simmel discussed fashion as the container of two antagonistic social forces—demarcation of the individual and imitation—Kirchner used it only in the latter way. The flamboyant styles of his prostitutes—as well as the dull and sober styles of their wealthy clients—function not as signs of individuality, but only as fields of imitation. In The Street, in which the concentration on clothing reaches its apogee, plunging V-shaped necklines and plush fur and feathers consume their wearers. All "vital motives of human action" are indeed denied; instead, people move down the street as on a fashion runway or an assembly line.

According to Donald Gordon's generally accepted chronology, Five Women on the Street was the first Berlin street scene, and it contains most of the principal elements of the entire series, including one important device that has, until now, stimulated little discussion. The position of the righthand figure, and the gazes of all except the woman at extreme left, point to a store window at right. Although the window's position is marginal, it is displaced onto center stage by the reflection of its light on the pavement, turning the street into a marketplace, and the women into display dummies. Their symbolic containment within the store window's reflected glow effectively situates them as objects for consumption.

The store window is also a significant element in The Street and in several works in other mediums, including a later pastel, People before a Display Window (1914), in which its symbolism is asserted more forcefully. Here, a pair of prostitutes are squeezed between two elements that define their situation—a bright yellow mannequin in the corset shop at right refers frankly to the sexuality they sell, while a male customer, framed by strong red, lurks at left. The women are blatantly confronted with an image of their own bodies in the form of a lifeless mannequin—a strange, external object made more menacing by lurid color and brutal truncation. Trapped between man and mannequin, they seem to observe their own objectification dispassionately.

The display dummy functions as an emblem of the externalization process inherent in objectification—specifically, of the tendency to displace sexuality onto inorganic things. This same kind of displacement is operative in many of the other Berlin street scenes; in Potsdamer Platz, for example, the sidewalk and traffic island have been distorted into sexual symbols—arrow and circle—of hallucinatory size. Permutations of Berlin city streets, the arrow and circle represent the very ground plan of a society in which human relationships have been commodified. (The circle also serves as a pedestal on which prostitutes display themselves for sale, and thus can be interpreted as yet another emblem of commodified sexuality.)

The real acuteness of Kirchner's depictions of prostitutes lies in the fact that he does not present them as alternatives to, but rather as emblems for, a specific social order.

Kirchner stated that he used such geometric configurations to capture the movement of people passing in the street. But if, as has been claimed, the Berlin street scenes "interpret bodily movements and patterns of human behavior in terms of formalized structure,"[8] that behavior is always modeled on commercial transactions and centered on acts of display, buying and selling. The geometric configuration of the men and women in the foreground of Berlin Street Scene (1913), for example, certainly implies more than movement; it circumscribes an interaction between buyer and seller, locking the dark-suited men and the prostitutes together into a single, rhomboid-like formation. The emphatic reciprocity and inversion of blue and red color accents among the four figures also nails them in place, reinforcing their connection.

The two men in this picture may actually be successive images of a single figure—a legacy from Futurism. But Kirchner's use of simultaneity hardly conveys a Futurist vision of the dynamism of modern life; rather, it presents an implied, condensed narrative of perusal and selection of goods (and perhaps rejection, depending on how we interpret the man's averted face). It has been written that Berlin Street Scene shows, for the first time in Kirchner's work, "the business of the urban street"[9]—referring to the bustle of background figures as they busily board trams, collect tickets, etc. But the activity of the large, prominent foreground figures clearly presents "the business of the urban street" as, precisely, business.

Both the depth and the limitations of Kirchner's analysis of alienation are revealed by his choice of the prostitute as protagonist. In modern art and literature, of course, prostitutes were frequently used as vehicles of social comment. From the late 19th century on, they functioned in multiple ways—as a defiance of bourgeois restraint and moral hypocrisy; as symbols of life, love and regeneration; or, as exemplified by Zola's Nana, as embodiments of moral corruption preying on humanity.

Equally common was the rendering of the prostitute as a sympathetic outcast, a socially marginal being who, victimized and misunderstood, could serve artists as an alter ego—a confirmation of their own sense of themselves as outsiders. Kirchner's prostitutes are frequently interpreted in precisely this way—as symbols of the artist's own precarious existence and therefore as analogues for his own life. This interpretation is supported by the artist's letters dating from 1915 and '16; on March 28, 1916 he wrote: "Like the prostitutes I painted am I now myself. Whisked along, gone the next time."[10] But this comment, and others like it, were backward projections made at a time when the artist was terrified of military conscription. The real acuteness of Kirchner's depictions of prostitutes lies in the fact that he does not present them as alternatives to, but rather as emblems for a specific social order. Whereas 19th-century artists portrayed prostitution as the antithesis of respectable sexuality—marriage—Kirchner depicted it as the fundamental transaction in a society ruled by exchange.

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

Kirchner's metamorphosis of his prostitutes into commodity-like things effectively locates the origins of human alienation in the commodification of human functions—in this case, of sexuality. The connection between dehumanization and money had already been articulated by Simmel:

> Of all human relationships, [prostitution] is perhaps the most significant case of the mutual reduction of two persons to the status of mere means. This may be the most salient and profound factor underlying the very close historic tie between prostitution and the money economy.[11]

But this analysis is ultimately insufficient, for prostitution is only one easily recognized form of objectification; Simmel—and Kirchner—never went deeper to link it to the transformation of all human labor into a commodity, which formed the basis for Marx's historical theory of alienation. For Marx, prostitution was "only a specific expression of the general prostitution of the laborer" in a capitalist economy.[12]

This failure to recognize the real sources of alienation accounts for Kirchner's emotional response to the objective conditions he portrayed. Although prostitution can serve as a statement of the economic basis of all human relations under capitalism, it can just as easily be treated as an unchanging phenomenon—remember the conventional dictum about "the oldest profession." Kirchner's Expressionist style indicates that he ultimately understood isolation as an inevitable state, the origins of which remained shrouded in mystery. The relationship of his art to this mystified understanding is explained by his own words:

> I could not get on intimate terms with people. That is fate, and perhaps one of the strongest reasons for my becoming a painter. Art is a good way of showing one's love for human beings without intruding upon them.[13]

In the Kirchner literature, the final sentence of this statement has become a common explanation of the artist's motives. Taken as a whole, however, this passage illuminates the roots of an artistic style conceived as an attempt to regain access to an estranged world. Kirchner ascribed his isolation to fate, just as other Expressionists mythologized war into apocalypse; thus, he could only try to overcome it subjectively, by creating a spiritual alternative to a world from which feeling seemed to have been banished. "I believe," he wrote, "that the artist and philosopher create the world for themselves."[14]

This alternative took the form of a nonalienated painting marked by spiritual and emotional presence. The tense, jagged strokes in Berlin Street Scene, or the radiating brushwork in Potsdammer Platz, are direct records of the artist's presence and desperate attempts to touch the alienated world he depicted. Through line and brushwork Kirchner attempted to reinfuse some measure of humanity into a world from which it had been eliminated. It is the poignancy of the work that today we can see its subject as the clash of subjectivism with social reality.

Through line and jagged brushwork—direct signs of the artist's presence—Kirchner attempted to reinfuse some measure of humanity into a world from which it had been eliminated.

In 1918, the Berlin Dada artists began using the technique of photomontage to indicate "that the city . . . can no longer be experienced as an extension of man."[15] Emerging from Expressionism, they retained the jutting angularity, manipulations of scale and simultaneous viewpoints of Kirchner's street paintings. The great innovation of the politicized Dadaists, however, was their overthrow of feeling as protest. Raoul Hausmann, who in 1918 wrote that Expressionism was "engulfed in esthetically surpassing the world," later said that it "failed because of its non-objectivity."[16] Unlike the Neue Sachlichkeit artists, who also reacted against Expressionist excess, the Dadaists believed in the importance of radical formal innovation—which meant the rejection of painting, which they saw as a "moral safety valve."[17] Photography was crucial to them because its referent is in reality, rather than in the subjective world of emotion. Like Brecht's theater, photomontage was "less concerned with filling the public with feelings, even seditious ones, than with alienating it in an enduring manner, through thinking, from the conditions in which it lives."[18] Unlike Kirchner, who tried to counter alienation with feeling, the photomonteurs appropriated it for socially therapeutic purposes. □

1. Donald Kuspit, "The New (?) Expressionism: Art as Damaged Goods," Artforum, November 1981, pp. 47–55.
2. Franz Roh (with additions by Julian Roh), German Art in the Twentieth Century, Greenwich, New York Graphic Society, 1958, p. 58.
3. Thomas N. Maytham, "Masterstroke by the Museum: A German expressionist master whose painting was a bridge between self and world," clipping in Museum of Modern Art's artist file.
4. Donald E. Gordon, Ernst Ludwig Kirchner, Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1968, p. 77.
5. Ibid, p. 79.
6. Gordon, "Ernst Ludwig Kirchner: By Instinct Possessed," Art in America, November 1980, p. 89.
7. George Simmel, "Fashion," On Individuality and Social Forms, Donald N. Levine, ed., Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1971, p. 298.
8. Phillip Seely Larson, "Drawing Styles and Graphic Detail in Brücke Art 1905–1920," unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, Columbia University, 1971, p. 215.
9. Gordon, Kirchner, p. 93.
10. Quoted in Gordon, Kirchner, p. 27.
11. Simmel, "Prostitution" (1907), On Individuality and Social Forms, p. 122.
12. Karl Marx, The Economic and Philosophic Manuscripts of 1844, New York, International Publishers, 1964, p. 133.
13. Quoted in Kirchner 1880–1938, London, Marlborough Fine Art Ltd., June–July 1969.
14. Letter of Dec. 1, 1917 in Maler des Expressionismus in Briefwechsel mit Eberhard Grisebach, Hamburg, Christian Wegner Verlag, 1962.
15. Dawn Ades, Photomontage, London, Thames and Hudson, 1976, p. 17.
16. Raoul Hausmann, "Synthetic Cinema of Painting" (1918), in "New Painting and Photomontage," Dadas on Art, Lucy Lippard, ed., Englewood Cliffs, Prentice-Hall, 1971, pp. 60, 64.
17. Richard Huelsenbeck, En avant Dada: Die Geschichte des Dadaismus, quoted in William S. Rubin, Dada, Surrealism, and Their Heritage, New York, Museum of Modern Art, 1968, p. 15.
18. Walter Benjamin, "The Author as Producer," Reflections, Peter Demetz, ed., New York and London, Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1978, p. 236.

Author: Rosalyn Deutsche is a doctoral candidate in art history at the City University of New York.

The Short Life of the Sincere Stroke

Rapidly compromised by its inevitable transformation into convention or cliché, the Expressionist's spontaneous brushstroke is doomed from the start. The artistic naiveté it represents may, however, be an essential preliminary for achieving the sophisticated self-consciousness of mature modernism.

BY CARTER RATCLIFF

Alumni of Die Brücke and the Blue Rider group spent the 1920s bringing their Expressionist spontaneity under control. Ernst Ludwig Kirchner's colors stayed vivid, while the patterns confining them grew more orderly. Erich Heckel led his palette into cool, high-keyed regions where sand dunes take up the crystalline attitudes of icebergs. Like Kirchner's, his brushstroke lost most of its improvisatory look. By the early '20s, Kandinsky's springy, scratchy, spattered line of a decade earlier had tightened up into geometric clarity. Nolde's images now generated more space from fewer forms and much less painterly lather. And so on. The New Objectivity (Neue Sachlichkeit) to which World War I drove much of Germanic painting was the expedient, for the most part, of former Expressionists. They sought relief from an ideal of unquestioning service to all that is instinctive and otherwise unaccountable in the self. The search led them to the linear precision that science and technology, with their graphs and streamlining, taught our century to identify with rational control.

Kokoschka stayed messy. Klee remained quirky. Still, the Expressionist tide flowed toward orderliness and calm. From the moment they first appeared, Expressionist brushstrokes fled their own impulsiveness, their reason for becoming visible. This flight is unending, and its episodes often appear in heavy disguise. The figurative forms Mark Rothko and Barnett Newman painted in the early 1940s show as much provincial Expressionism as provincial Surrealism. What these New Yorkers learned from André Masson and other Parisian emigrés had far more to do with the ideal of spontaneity than with the fine points of Surrealism's splintered platform. When Rothko and Newman grew dubious about spontaneity's power to generate myth-sized images, their mature styles began to appear—anti-Expressionist styles (despite the Abstract Expressionist label) keyed to the spread of color. Having suppressed the ostentatiously personal and set painterly messes in order, they forced Expressionism to serve as a point of origin against which to react.

When Robert Coates coined the term "Abstract Expressionism," not knowing that Kandinsky had already coined it, he was thinking of de Kooning's wing of the New York School. The phrase fits Willem de Kooning as well as it fits anyone. Still, his brushstroke is forever wrenching itself free of raw instinct to negotiate with an aggrandized vision of Cubist structure. Franz Kline's blunter, more obviously architectural gesture does the same. As for Jackson Pollock, I wonder if his drip paintings are not best approached with an understanding of the severe *im*personality he attained by giving up brush for stick. The results of his dripping are inimitably his own, yet these webs of paint assert the artist's presence only in the most oblique manner.

During the 1930s and early '40s, the Expressionist brushstroke confronted Pollock on every side, as vitally in Picasso's concurrent painting as anywhere else. Pollock put it to work conveying what he felt about his own being and other mythical absolutes. In the process, he turned this vehicle of self-expression into a medium of high-speed contemplation—flung paint as surging thought, a means of questioning how a painting manifests itself. Thus a canvas became a metaphor for existence, an image of what it is for anything whatsoever to come into being. Whether or not these painterly tropes always or ever succeed, it's clear that Pollock transcended self and art as promulgated by Expressionist usage. So did the next generation of the New York School.

In the 1950s, Joan Mitchell's touch was a slashing insistence on the truth of the feelings that drove her. Now she downplays what earlier she tried to put beyond doubt—emotional states whose urgency requires their expression to be violent. For over a decade, it has made sense to read her art as a calm and, in its way, detached celebration of light. Mitchell's hand stays recognizable but its task has changed. Or look at Larry Rivers's Expressionist touch—even in the '50s, always sardonic, always in quotes. Now, in the '80s, Julian Schnabel has pushed artifice to the point where shards of broken plates function as surrogate brushstrokes.

VOL 7 1 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

Jackson Pollock: No. 8 1949, enamel and aluminum paint on canvas. Neuberger Museum.

Julian Schnabel: Painting Without Mercy, 1981, 120 by 168 inches. Mary Boone Gallery.

Raw spontaneity, uninhibited sincerity, violent immediacy—what use are these Expressionist ideals? How, in fact, could any artist pursue them for long without a strong suspicion that he was kidding himself? If these qualities of feeling depend on the manipulation of paint, Expressionism will surely develop routines and clichés. And indeed, it had done so by about 1905. The style's explosive denial of convention generated new conventions, and of course it still does. When an Expressionist senses his or her spontaneity falling into set patterns, the response is often an ironic leap sideways or an upward trek in search of objectivity. This usually requires a sharp shift in style. Not always. Red Grooms's images of 1982 are surprisingly close to those of 20 years ago. Slight changes of style—along with greatly increased scale—have been sufficient to turn his art from a personal cry into a public spectacle. He fled Expressionism by forcing it to go public, to become the vehicle of a grand and widely accessible cartoon of life in the late-20th-century city.

Grooms's development runs parallel to that of Lester Johnson, a painter with whom he seems to have nothing in common now. Johnson was, early on, a more violent practitioner than Grooms. His splashing, gouging assault on the canvas left flurries of anxious texture and broad stretches of dismal, sour color. Johnson's pictograms of desperate people were convincing, especially as reports on the artist's own state. The pictorial flatness of his paintings read as emotional bleakness, and Johnson refused to let this effect settle into cliché. Also in the early '60s, he sent crowds of bowler-hatted men milling through the mean streets of his art. These figures jostled one another brutally, thanks to the bulkiness, the aggressive volume, with which the artist provided them. Far from relieving the emotional flatness of Johnson's paintings, this dimensionality reinforced it, driving away any hope of gesture or glance uncoerced by urban pressures. Then suddenly, about a decade ago, Johnson's city became the locale of a celebration as lively as Red Grooms's, though very different in atmosphere.

The question is: how long can Expressionist ideals be pursued without losing their crucial immediacy?

Urbanity is grotesque for Grooms, a comic target large and resilient enough to distract him from the inward grotesquerie that made him an Expressionist at the outset—from 1957, say, to 1962. For Johnson, the city has become a place of luminous, youthful optimism. This revision demanded a leap from his original and convincing gloom to what might be called an Action Painter's classicism, a New York School mythologizing that generates bright colors, open spaces and young female bodies so blithely statuesque they levitate. Few Expressionists have sustained their early sincerity as convincingly or as long as Johnson did, and few have abandoned the style as thoroughly, with as few regrets, as he.

Toward the end of the 1960s, the ideal of the painterly trance nearly smothered to death in the atmosphere generated by Conceptualism. It became arguable that painting itself was dead. Lyrical Abstraction, as the Action Painting revival of the moment was called, had the look of an emergency measure. Painting pulled through, but it's not clear that the Lyrical Abstractionists deserve much credit for the survival of messy, Expressionist impulses in New York. It does seem clear, however, that the air of analytical stringency filling the late '60s inspired some younger painters to skip the sincere phase of an Expressionist development. Neil Jenney, for instance, managed to avoid the chore of disentangling himself from the miseries and enchantments of self-expression in the traditional manner. His simulacrum of an Expressionist brushstroke permitted him to go straight to irony, as did Joe Zucker when he substituted rhoplex-soaked cotton balls for the marks of a driven, painterly hand. Those canvases of Zucker's were crowded, messy, heavily textured. They looked idiosyncratic and their subjects were sometimes violent. Yet, like Jackson Pollock's drip paintings and Jasper Johns's chilly exercises in encaustic, they undermined and reversed their Expressionist traits. Zucker's material idiosyncrasy read as the outcome of quirky historical analysis, not as the uncensored outpourings of an estranged psyche. His "spontaneous" textures were not that at all, but the product of wily stylistic calculation. His violent topics were drawn, after all, from funny papers and children's books. Much the same sort of comment applies to the turbulent swirls of black that Allan Turner has sent through recent paintings of his imaginary forest. This is a painterly storm experienced by the painter himself at a remove, not a "natural" event but the outcome of a studio equivalent of cloud seeding. In some of these works, the black reappears, straightened out into patterns with links to Johns's hatchmarks.

Larry Rivers: Next to Last Confederate Soldier, 60 by 44 inches. Collection Guy Weill.

Joan Mitchell: Beleuet, 1981, oil on canvas, 77 by 51 inches. Fourcade Gallery.

A few years ago, a German magazine published a photo of Robert Kushner at work in his loft. The wooden floor is as spattered as that of any Action Painter. Of course. Kushner slings lots of paint, and the results have punch. Only his punch is not violent. It is lilting, decorative, and so Kushner need include in his stylistic repertoire none of those signs of dementia, of psycho-esthetic frenzy, by which Expressionists both excuse and intensify their violence. Kushner's energies are all tactful, even at their splashiest. He owes much to Matisse, toward whom the Expressionist label has never gravitated, not even slightly. Matisse did, however, announce at length his hope that his art was expressive. And it was. We always assume that an esthetic intention orginates, at least partly, in feelings. To impute an intention is to endow it with emotional traits that permeate the outcome of the artist's process, his image. Every work of art expresses some cluster of feelings, even if certain critical attitudes render us unconscious of the fact. Which of Robert Morris's early supporters noted the funereal melancholy of his Minimalist boxes?

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

Lester Johnson: Bowery Portrait, 1963, oil on canvas, 80 by 60 inches. Collection the artist.

It comes down to this: if we're looking for expressiveness, any artwork will do, a Mondrian no less than a van Gogh. To reserve the Expressionist label for a limited number of paintings and sculptures is not to deny this, though it can lead us into an awkward position. To attach the Expressionist label is to imply, or let language imply for us, that certain works of art possess a universal trait—expressiveness—more fully, more powerfully, more sincerely than others do. It's like claiming that in certain regions of the globe gravity is more pressing or that a topic serious everywhere is there more indubitably grave. Reality is more real. This is a silly claim, yet the persistence of the word "Expressionism" suggests that the art of our time needs it, has some use for a pretension that very few artists—even the original Expressionists—have been able to sustain for long.

Perhaps modernism requires a dumb and blind devotion to the hope of absolute sincerity in order to get on with its sophistication. Roy Lichtenstein has generated a great deal of irony in the years since his first mock-Abstract-Expressionist brushstrokes appeared. All that archness would fall flat if we weren't still plagued by the possibility that art could, after all, be simple and immediate and absolutely convincing. With unflagging ambivalence, we nurture the hope that, if it were only pure enough, psychic violence could give all expression an Expressionist power. Innocence retains its allure, whether or not there is such a thing. The likelihood that there is not makes yearning for it a melancholy procedure, bearable only with the help of an acute self-consciousness—as in David Salle's art, where mock-Expressionism (and mock-everything else) comments directly on the indirection, the irony, we employ to sus-

Martha Diamond: Hudson Group, 1982, 108 by 72 inches. Brooke Alexander Gallery.

Donald Sultan: April 28, 1979, mixed mediums, 12 inches square. Blum Helman Gallery.

Neil Jenney: Child and Amusement, 1969, acrylic on canvas. Collection the artist.

Robert Smithson: Asphalt Rundown, L'Attico, Rome, 1969.

Richard Serra: Splashing, 1968, lead; ca. 1 ½ feet high for a length of 26 feet.

tain such ideals as innocence and spontaneity.

Philip Wofford suggests that a New York painter, even one who appeared well after Johnson and Mitchell, can be an unironic Expressionist. His big, spattered paintings have the glow of unmediated energy. Let that glow draw you in, however, and it shifts to a much harsher light—one of doubt cultivated with extreme care, not of anxieties Phillip Wofford: Warrior, 1981, acrylic on canvas, 61½ by 49 inches. Nancy Hoffman Gallery.

Joe Zucker: Successful Pirates, 1979, 60 by 90 inches. Holly Solomon Gallery.

VOL 71
ISS 1
JA 1983
UMI

Allan Turner: Marked Woods, 1981, oil on canvas, 90 by 480 inches overall. Brooke Alexander Gallery.

Robert Kushner: Windy Weather, 1981, acrylic with fabric on cotton. Holly Solomon Gallery.

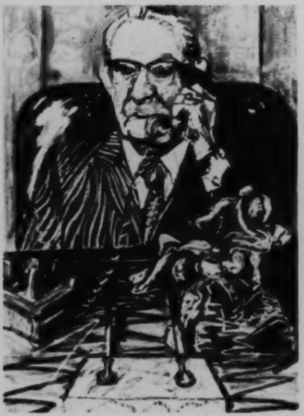
exorcized with painterly gesture. Wofford builds his images out of large forms and endless compunctions, almost a fussiness, about surfaces. Smears, drips, gouges, the most desperate-looking impasto—it's all under delicate control. No self-entrancement sends him off on improvisatory tangents. I'm not arguing that he plans his heavily-painted canvases in advance, or even that he could. Rather, they develop with deliberate passion, not the unleashed kind. A vision of landscape, sometimes complete with figure, absorbs spontaneity, gives it a focus. Likewise, in Martha Diamond's paintings a violent brushiness concentrates its energy on turning urban architecture into pictorial structure. If the function of her art is to convey a brooding appreciation of urban space and its complexities, then one could say that in Diamond's art function follows form. Feeling accommodates itself to outward fact, a reversal of Expressionist procedure.

Donald Sultan's extravaganzas of graphite, plaster and tar show some of Franz Kline's toughness, and more designer-ish flair than Kline ever had. There is an untruth to materials here, or at least to their usual associations. For painters of the New York School's first wave, "truth to materials" sometimes meant giving oneself over to the innocence of sheer matter. Perhaps Richard Serra was trying to revive that primordial (or is it just naive?) possibility when he did his Action Painter's number with hot lead, splashing ladlesful of it along the intersection of floor and wall. A similar impulse may have impelled Robert Smithson to spill a load of asphalt over the edge of a cliff in Rome—topography as canvas—yet I find more here than the bravura devotion to materials and process that animated Serra's lead pieces. The aggrandizement in Smithson's Asphalt Rundown was not heroic, and certainly not Expressionist. It expanded painterly action in order to reveal its (and all of art's) complicity in the natural processes that would erase, and by now surely have erased, the piece from the landscape. Smithson's truth was to the inadequacy of materials, and to those intentions of ours which can only be realized through material mediums. He encouraged our alertness to every variety of decay. Donald Sultan, by contrast, lulls us with elegance. He distracts us from our intimations of ruin, even—or especially—when he brushes on a material the city uses to mend its streets. To return to Joe Zucker for a moment: his detachment from Expres-



Mike Glier: White Male Power, Senator with Rodin, 1981, oil stick on canvas. Nosei Gallery.

Walter Robinson: Confessions, 1981, acrylic on masonite, 16 1/2 by 30 3/4 inches. Metro Pictures.

Andy Warhol: Henry Geldzahler, 1979, acrylic and silkscreen enamel on canvas, 40 inches square. Private collection.

Richard Bosman: Prisoner of Love, 1981, 54 by 42 inches. Brooke Alexander Gallery.

David Salle: Rainy Day Night in the Rubber City, 1980, acrylic and conte crayon on canvas, 57 by 86 inches. Collection Mr. and Mrs. Donald Rubell.

sionist imperatives is so thorough that he was able to employ big splashy brushstrokes in his most recent paintings and run no risk whatsoever of being accused of traditional sincerity. This is remarkable, considering that Zucker's decorativeness is so uningratiating, so anti-Matissean. Artifice, for him, has long been second nature. Does this mean that Zucker might turn out to be, after all these, a natural—some manner of urban primitive? Perhaps his clunkiness will always be read as calculated, and thus block such readings.

Awkwardness provides modernism with a high road to artifice, but there are other approaches. Charles Clough smears paint with brilliant New York-style flair, not to assert his Expressionist spontaneity but to question it. Laid over reproductions of old-master paintings, his brushstrokes enter into animated, mannered repartee with earlier painters' forms. When Clough's marks multiply to the point where they cover up this borrowed imagery, an uninhibited, instinctive Expressionist self appears to have won out, unfastening its ties to history, asserting its primacy over every other self. Then it turns out that many of the brushstrokes in Clogh's densest paintings are photographic images—of his own brushstrokes, but presented with the detachment enforced by mechanical processes. Sometimes bits and pieces of earlier images show through—a Venetian eye, a scrap of foliage from 17th-century landscape. Clough is not, after all, spontaneous, intuitive and blunt. Rather, he displays all those traits, but not with the raw directness we expect from an Expressionist. Yet it isn't enough to say that he eludes the label. He actively opposes Expressionism's claims and promises, no more so than when his painterly energies work up to full pressure.

Sometimes Clough projects the image of his own brushstrokes on a canvas and then fills it in with paint, a process he likens to Photo-Realism—high art's latest form of illustration, redeemable only by the artist's self-consciousness about his part in a world that subsists on photographic images and other forms of second-hand vision. Mike Glier reaches outside the world of high art for his style—an illustrator's Ex-

Continued on p. 137

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

The Expressive Fallacy

Expressionism is here seen as an ideology—a language that would deny its mediated status in order to claim a special immediacy to reality. Below, a look at this language and its uses via recent art.

BY HAL FOSTER

> We know that our entire social language is an intricate system of rhetorical devices designed to escape from the direct expression of desires that are, in the fullest sense of the term, unnameable—not because they are ethically shameful (for this would make the problem a simple one), but because unmediated expression is a philosophical impossibility. And we know that the individual who chose to ignore this fundamental convention would be slated either for crucifixion, if he were aware, or, if he were naive, destined to the total ridicule accorded such heroes as Candide and all other fools in fiction or in life.
> —Paul de Man
> "Criticism and Crisis"

Despite appearances, the art world is not a haven for Christs and Candides: few artists trade in "unmediated expression," though this is the issue over which many are said to contend. At one extreme are artists who suspect the very idea of expression; at the other are artists, mostly painters, whose passion seems earnest indeed. And somewhere in between come the Neo-Expressionists who, consciously or not, play at expression. Neo-Expressionism: the very term signals that Expressionism is a "gestuary" of largely self-aware acts.

As specific styles, German and Abstract Expressionism can now be used by artists, chiefly in two ways—conceptionally, as "second-degree Image-repertoires," or ahistorically, in a way that betrays false consciousness. I have talked about this before (A.i.A., Summer '82); here, I want to look at Expressionism less as a historical style than as a specific language.

This is not easy to do, for Expressionism denies its own status as a language—a denial that is necessary given the Expressionist claim to immediacy and stress on the self as originary. For with a denial of its rhetorical nature goes a denial of many social and historical mediations (dismissed as "mere conventions"). Such a "transcendent attack on culture," as Adorno wrote, "regularly speaks the language of false escape, that of 'nature boy.'"[1] And so with Expressionism: it speaks a language, but a language so obvious we may forget its conventionality, and must inquire again how it encodes the natural and simulates the immediate.

So what is this language, what is its protocol? First and foremost, Expressionism is a paradox: a type of representation that asserts presence—of the artist, of the real. Of course, this Expressionist presence is by proxy only (e.g., the "presence" of the artist signaled by indexical traces—the brushstrokes), and yet it is easy to fall into the fallacy: For example, we commonly say that an Expressionist like Kandinsky "broke through" representation, when of course he replaced (or superposed) one form with another—a representation oriented not to reality (the coded, realist outer world), but to expression (the coded, symbolist inner world).

Here, it is useful to compare Expressionist representation with classical representation. According to Louis Marin, the material elements in classical painting (especially, the traces of the artist) tend to be "concealed by what the painting represents, by its 'objective reality.'"[2] In Expressionist painting, another type of transparency is operative: the material elements tend to be subsumed by what the painting expresses, by its subjective reality.[3] Both types of representation are codes: The classical painter suppresses nonnaturalistic marks and colors so as to simulate (a staged) reality; the Expressionist "frees" such marks and colors of naturalism so as to simulate direct expression.[4] And as codes both types are based on substitution (and thus on absence): The classical painter "substitutes for things his representations of them" (Marin) in such a way that reality seems to speak; the Expressionist substitutes for these representations the freed marks and colors that signal self-expression. Inasmuch as a stretched canvas "already exists as a picture,"[5] the Expressionist is faced with a given (representational) paradigm, which he must cancel or supercede with a paradigm of his own. Expressionist "immediacy," then, is an effect—of a two-fold mediation.

Of course, this effect was conceived by the original Expressionists quite differently—in terms of "inner necessity" (Kandinsky) and "abstraction" (Worringer) in a formula such as this: via Expressionist abstraction the viewer is compelled by the inner necessity of the artist. But this "monologue" is an address, a formula—one that suppresses its rhetorical nature, it is true, but a formula nonetheless.[6]

Recently, Donald Gordon has cast Nietzsche as the great philosophic precursor of Expressionism (A.i.A., December '82). But Nietzsche wrote precisely against such naive notions of self-expression, which derive, as Paul de Man notes, "from a binary polarity of classical banality in the history of metaphysics: the opposition of subject to object based on the spatial model of an 'inside' to an 'outside' world"—with the inside privileged as prior. To Nietzsche such "inner necessity" is based on a linguistic reversal:

> The whole notion of an "inner experience" enters our consciousness only after it has found a language that the individual understands—i.e., a translation of a situation into a familiar situation—: "to understand," naively put merely means: to be able to express something old and familiar.[7]

This "translation" precedes, indeed constitutes, any formed expression so that "between" the self and expression a rhetorical figure intervenes. The adequation of self and expression is thus blocked—by the very sign of expression.[8] (Such is the pathos of the Expressionist self: alienated, it would be made whole through expression, only to find there another sign of its alienation.) And this sign, this self, belongs to a preexistent image-repertoire: it is less freely "expressed" than "newly" constructed. To deconstruct Expressionism, then, is to show how it is constructed rhetorically. (This was the strategy of Jasper Johns vis-à-vis Abstract Expressionism. In a work like Target with Plaster Casts he revealed Abstract-Expressionist marks of presence to be ambiguous traces—"casts," in effect, of absence.)

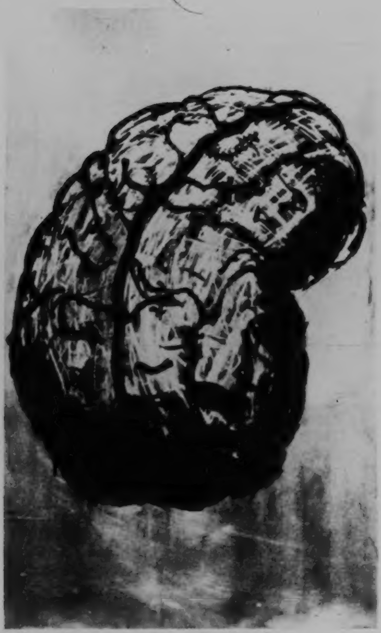
A few examples of the rhetoricity of Expressionism may be helpful here. At the level of technique: In Expressionism feeling and formlessness are often related (Gordon: "Expressionist feeling could be direct and unruly to the point of formlessness"). But this equation, which seeks to suspend mediation, is coded and entirely conventional: formlessness is a form, a formula, too. So too at the level of inspiration: In Expressionism the unconscious is privileged as a source, but (at least today) the unconscious is seen to be "structured like a language" (Lacan), a language which in turn structures the self (precisely as it accedes to language, to the Symbolic). That way does not lie "immediacy."

Cindy Sherman: from the "Pink Robe" series, 1982, Cibachrome print, 45 by 30 inches.

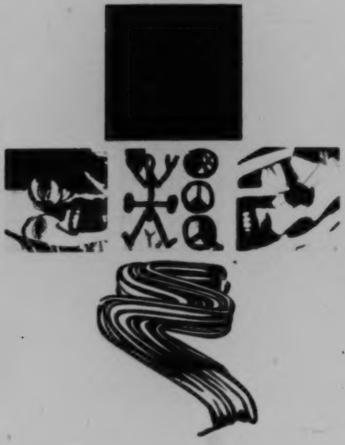
The quest for "immediacy" is taken up in the belief that there exists a content beyond convention, a reality beyond representation—in short, a Nature opposed to Culture. This belief may well be the essence of Expressionism—or at least of its ambivalence as regards the natural and the primitive. For in Expressionism the natural and the primitive are both embraced and feared—as the site of the human and the nonhuman, the free self and the Other. Often, this ambivalence is reduced, made mythical or psychological; but these are projections. At bottom, it arises from a social contradiction—of the natural and the primitive privileged culturally precisely when endangered historically. (At the climax of the great industrial-imperial period, ca. 1914, how could the natural and the primitive not be ambivalently thought?) This is not to say that the value placed on the natural and the primitive by Expressionists is misbegotten: it is a "natural" response to social alienation. But to oppose Nature to Culture so abstractly is to mythify both as absolute forces—almost as fates before which one is supine. As the social connection is severed, political redress seems futile, and one is left with a subjectivist response, which quickly becomes its own form of domination: "the more the I of expressionism is thrown back on itself, the more like the excluded world of things it becomes."[9]

This contradiction is finally that of a language that would be immediate, a cultural form that would be natural. Perhaps, in the end, Expressionism's denial of its rhetorical nature is simply the repressed recognition of how thor-

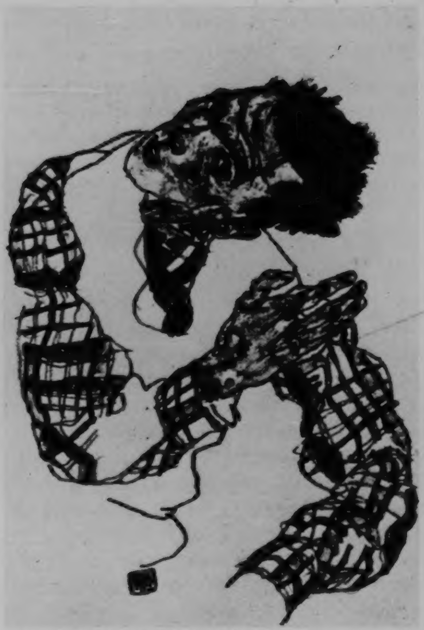
VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI



Jenny Holzer & Peter Nadin: from "Eating Friends," 1981, enamel and enamel spray on copper on board, 5 by 3 feet.



Gretchen Bender: from "The Pleasure is Back" series, 1982, photo silkscreen with enamel ink on sign tin, 6 by 4 ½ feet.



Sherrie Levine: Self-portrait After Egon Schiele, 1981, color photograph, 14 by 11 inches.

oughly language invades the natural, mediates the real, decenters the self.

Essentially, my own desires have very little to do with what comes out of myself, because what I put out (at least in part) has already been out. . . . My way to make it mine is to make it again and making it again is enough for me and certainly, personally speaking, almost me.
—Richard Prince

In a way, my analysis is redundant: the work of several young artists reflects critically upon the language of Expressionism. This critique, by no means the sole motive of such art, arises logically from its different premises: for this art, often of purloined and montaged images, is opposed to the Expressionist model of the expressive self and the empathic viewer (it is less opposed, however, to the ironic use of this model by certain Neo-Expressionists). Moreover, the critique is not limited to Expressionism the historical style or Neo-Expressionism the art-world phenomenon: For these artists, "expressionism" is much more—it is the official rhetoric of both our old metaphysical tradition and our new consumerist society.

In "Eating Friends," a show held at Artists Space last winter, Jenny Holzer and Peter Nadin presented an ensemble of short texts and crude images of body parts, printed and painted on large copper plates. In the context of the time, this strategy of (Johnsian) literalism debunked Expressionist "inner necessity," for here the only inner was innards (brains and bones), the only expression and empathy biochemical reactions (one text read: "It's Awful To See Them Deformed Because They Are Rigid With Fear."). Such literalism mocks the psychosexual rhetoric of Expressionism; but more, it indirectly debunks a metaphysical order based on opposed terms, whereby one term—the "eternal life" of the spirit—suppresses the other—the "dead letter" of the body. This order privileges Expressionism precisely as an art of the "inner life." In "Eating Friends," however, it is reversed: inner life is reduced to body parts, and "ex-pression" is strictly seen to be a fallacy.

For many young artists "expressionism" is more than a style—it is the official rhetoric of pop psychology and consumerist society.

That the self is a fiction is the subject of work by many young artists, a few of whom are now well-known. For example, the photos of Cindy Sherman are portraits of the self constructed by the social other—in types presented by the media as women. In her work we see that to express a self is largely to replicate a model—to the extent that another metaphysical opposition (the original versus the copy) is all but dissolved. This is especially true of her recent "Pink Robe" series, in which Sherman seems to expose her own self but in fact exposes the type of the exposed self, in casual, confessional poses. Here, "no longer is there any imperative to submit to the model or to observation: 'You are the model.' "[10]

For Richard Prince this control-by-simulation is a given. Thus, recently he has reshot travel-and-leisure ads (see A.i.A., Summer '82, p. 143) and night-club and movie displays in a way that distorts them extravagantly. He does this, I think, not to expose the manipulations therein (that is didactic and, besides, they are blatant enough), but to catch seduction in the act, to savor his own fascination with such images—even as they manipulate him via insinuated desire. His enterprise, then, is less a critique of the "false" image than an exploration of simulation—of a society in which the self is reflected everywhere and nowhere.

For these artists, "expressionism" is more than an artistic style: it is an ideological site where discourses of many sorts meet and may be caught out. Here, then, we must open up the term to include the "expressionist" rhetoric of pop psychology and consumerist society in general. Express yourself, we are exhorted—but only via the type, only via the commodity.[11] This expressionism thus has a social as well as an economic agenda, for expression is largely judged by authenticity, which in turn is largely judged by typicality—i.e., fidelity to sexual models, economic function, class position. (For example, in the traditional novel the villain is usually a transgressor of class lines—an imposter who climbs too high, a rake who falls too low.)[12] Now it is precisely this social use of typicality that Eric Bogosian exposes in performances like "Men Inside." As he impersonates a lowly cast of urban characters (the M.C., the hood, the punker), he reiterates the social type—but in such a way that the type is made defiant, and the label of marginality is turned into a sign of identity. Thus submission and transgression are made equivalent, and "that is the most serious crime, since it cancels out the difference upon which the Law is based."[13]

Gretchen Bender returns us to expressionism as an ideology which renders desire particularly instrumental. In her recent series "The Pleasure is Back," she reproduces emblematic images (from both contemporary ads and art) on tin squares used for signs. A typical work may juxtapose a detail from a painting by Penck or Schnabel or Chia, with an image of a Lichtenstein depicted brushstroke and a photo (from a Dial soap ad) of an ecstatic woman in a shower. One image comments on another: the false freedom in the Neo-Expressionist detail is exposed by the Lichtenstein, and both signs are revealed, in the false pleasure of the woman, to be complicitous with the commodity. (A question arises, though: Does Bender finally contest or confirm the reified nature of her images?)

The work of Sherrie Levine is of a more deconstructive order. Recently, she has turned her strategy from photos of the Other (women, the poor, landscape) to Expressionist images ("Horse" paintings by Marc, photos of and self-portraits by Schiele), which she simply buys as posters or photographs from books.[14] Thus reframed, the image may tell us two things: that far from univocal, it is riven with (conflicted) motives, and that our explanations, far from neutral, use these motives ideologically. Refocused then, the Expressionist image may confess a cultural agenda—in the Marc paintings, the ideological use of nature as Other; in the Schiele portraits, the mystifications of the psychobiographical—based on an economy of exclusion.

Expressionism is thus seen to be a specific language, authentic in its era (when subjective revolt was not yet absorbed) but ideological in our own. This is an important insight, for only insofar as it can deny its status as a language can Expressionism claim a transparency to reality and truth. Under the gaze of these artists, this transparency opacifies and cracks.

> . . . psychoanalysis, the Sartrean critique of bad faith, and the Marxist critique of ideologies have made "confession" a futility: sincerity is merely a second-degree Image-repertoire.
>
> —Roland Barthes, "Deliberations"

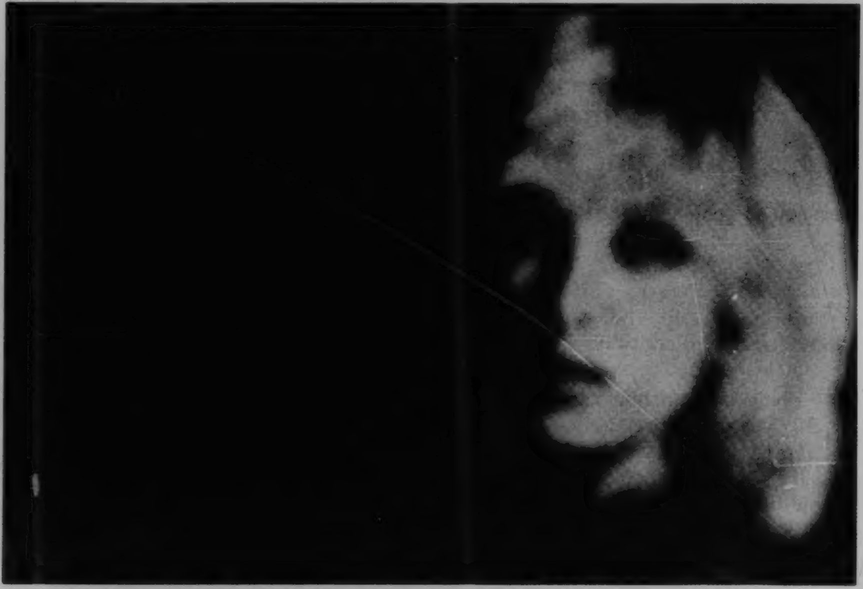
Why then, if the Expressionist fiction seems suspect, is it renewed today? The art market is only one factor: it depends on the doxa of the time, and this (radically condensed) still sees art as an individual retreat, a last refuge of humanism. In this view, the self, decentered in relation to its other languages, is sovereign in art. Strangely, this popular position is now "reinvented" by critics and curators alike—which is provocative, momentarily, as a reaction, but is precisely reactionary. However real alienation is today, the crisis of the individual versus society is largely a cliché, as is the crisis of high versus low culture. Indeed, both these "crises" may act to obscure real ones (e.g., that the individual is now an instrumental category—the entrepreneur of early capitalism returned, in late capitalism, as a consumer of "individuality").

So the return of Expressionism is less than a turn in the Zeitgeist and more than a local reaction. It is a later response to the same historical process that once educed German Expressionism—a process of progressive alienation. The German Expressionist, at least, could hope to reclaim lost reality via a new investment in subjectivity. But this subjectivity has proven to be no more exempt from reification and fragmentation than objective reality. Indeed, modernity has witnessed repeated decenterings of the self—in relation to society (Marx), the unconscious (Freud), language (Saussure), and the sign. Neo-Expressionism, then, occurs as one more, belated attempt to recenter the self in art.

But this is too easy a conclusion. A common complaint is that Neo-Expressionism is "inauthentic" (see "Artists' Symposium," A.i.A., December '82). Well, yes. Many Neo-Expressionists are ironic—with work as mediated as any "media art." Which is to say not only that they come to sources, and even to success, via the media (today, all "successful" artists do, to an extent), but also that they offer us old media models of the artist.

One such model (of the "expressive artist") is Picasso: the bourgeois artist who romanticizes the primitive in himself. Now this type is still with us, and

Continued on page 137



Richard Prince:* The Counterfeit Memory, *1982, Cibachrome print, 30 by 46 inches. Metro Pictures.

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

Roy Lichtenstein: Paintings with Roses, 1982, oil and magna on canvas, 37 by 59 inches. Castelli Gallery.

Lichtenstein's Expressionist Takes

In Roy Lichtenstein's ongoing dialogue with Expressionism, there are two conflicting voices: one speaks of intuition and artistic presence; another denies that one can still deploy that kind of unbridled artistic invention.

BY DAVID DEITCHER

In Roy Lichtenstein's art of the past 20 years, Expressionism—American Abstract, German and, now, Neo—has been a recurrent theme. Like many artists who matured in the 1950s (Johns, Rauschenberg, perhaps Stella), he has devised a number of strategies which enable him to examine critically the values embodied in these styles. Just last spring, for example, he painted four large vertical canvases, based on de Kooning's "Women," in which the savagery of the originals is neutralized, rendered rather comic by Lichtenstein's "depicted" brushwork—linear descriptions of painterly gesture derived from his famous "Brushstroke" paintings of 1965.

But then, in his next works, Lichtenstein actually returned to a free-wheeling, Abstract-Expressionist technique. One of the earliest of these canvases is covered from edge to edge with broad gestural strokes that tend to run parallel to the frame. At center and lower right, however, these strokes are juxtaposed with a couple of depicted brushstrokes.

In his most recent work, however, executed since the summer of 1982, such unbridled Expressionist gesture is once again contained—literally, framed—by Lichtenstein's classic Pop style. Now he depicts paintings in elaborate pseudo-Rococo frames which, like the wall on which they hang, are rendered in Lichtenstein's familiar comic-book manner. Within these frames, though, direct gestural brushwork and a few depicted brushstrokes mingle uneasily to form images that are oddly reminiscent of Lichtenstein's own Abstract-Expressionist paintings from the late '50s.

Between 1958 and '60 Lichtenstein had worked in a highly charged late Abstract-Expressionist mode that emphasized the material properties of two opposing methods of paint application. Laid on with a rag, the dominant compositional masses, in variously tenebrous or candy-striped colors, reiterated the shape of the canvas or deviated from it in attenuated arcs. As if to counterpoint these swaths of heavy pigment, Lichtenstein added networks of more spontaneous linear brushwork that echo the color chords of the rest of the painting, but to very different effect. Uniting two contrasting methods of paint application—one weighty and deliberated, the other spontaneous and calligraphic—these early works exemplify the situation of much second-generation New York School painting at the end of the '50s, as artists moved from painterly Expressionism to a mode of abstraction that implies a critique of "action painting."

Lichtenstein's dialogue with Expressionism continued in his first mature Pop works. In war paintings like Varoom (1963), O.K. Hotshot (1963) and Tex (1962), he systematically used commercially derived artistic means to produce images with an extraordinary expressive power. The explosions in these images bring to mind—they almost diagram—the pictorial pyrotechnics of such latter-day Abstract-Expressionist paintings as Adolf Gottlieb's Blast I (1959). Yet Lichtenstein gained access to the violence of such imagery only through the Dada-derived strategy of mass-cultural appropriation—in this case, from a comic-book source.

Lichtenstein's continuing concern with Abstract Expressionism is demonstrated by two series executed in 1965: the "Explosions," the enamel-and-steel freestanding sculptures and wall reliefs based on his war paintings; and the "Brushstroke" paintings, gestural abstractions devoid of real gesture. The idea of creating these premeditated images of spontaneity—of "freeze-drying" the Expressionist arsenal—was the final product of a logic that, not surprisingly, had its source in a comic-book image. This we know from the first painting of the series, Brushstrokes, in which a configuration of strokes is balanced with the cropped image of an artist's hand wielding a housepainter's brush—that requisite piece of equipment for the action painter. What is not generally known, however, is that Brushstrokes was derived from a specific comic-book panel in which a woman, while painting the picket fence in front of her new suburban house, splatters paint all over the boy next door, making fun of the suburban '60s tuxedo he wears to impress the other woman in his life.

Sunset Through the Trees, 1981, oil and magna on canvas, 70 by 50 inches. Castelli Gallery.

Lichtenstein's career can be read as a protracted meditation on his own relationship to the modernist tradition; in series after series of paintings, drawings, prints and sculpture he has represented such styles as Cubism, Purism, Art Deco, Futurism, Surrealism and, recently, German Expressionism. With uncanny timing, he completed his foray into the art of Kirchner, Heckel, et al., in 1980—one year before the "official" arrival in this country of Neo-Expressionism.

In a recent article, Lawrence Allo-

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

Dr. Waldman, 1979, oil and magna on canvas, 60 by 50 inches. Private collection.

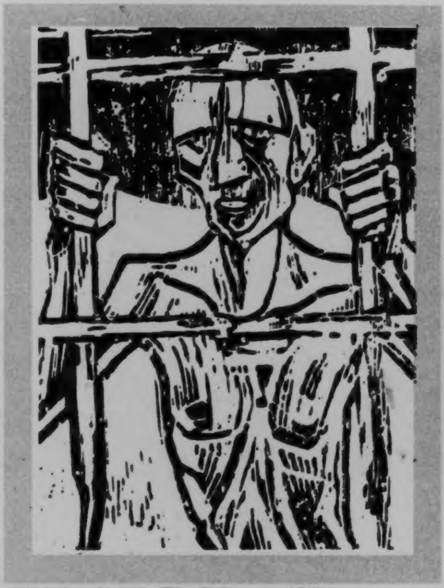
way discusses Lichtenstein's perusals of past art and summarizes the attitude of most writers towards them when he claims that Lichtenstein's work "proclaims a romance with modern European art." Yet this "romance" has all the trappings of a long-distance relationship, one that must depend upon postcards, snapshots and fading memories.

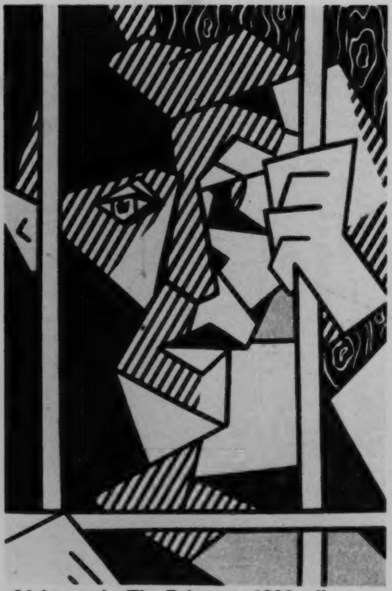
Like all of Lichtenstein's appropriations from art history, his German Expressionist works are a collage of recollections. His departures from the precise nature of images once seen produce a telling and critical distillation of a period style. The series (22 paintings, 8 woodcuts and one sculpture) can be divided into three groups of works that summarize the predominant characteristics of German Expressionist art. Most numerous are the portrait heads—angular masks whose skyward-looking, faraway gazes literalize the frankly transcendental aims of the movement. There are also several nudes, including large-scale compositions set in idyllic landscapes, referring to the liberating and often pantheistic ideals that permeated the movement prior to World War I. Finally, there are single-figure images that record aspects of a prototypical early-20th-century German social milieu: an ominous male visage with a monocle, a fashionable woman in a flowered hat and fox fur, a student, even a political prisoner behind bars.

In all of these works, the surface texture of the originals is eliminated; Lichtenstein has streamlined and generalized the formal distortions, primitivizing tendencies and dissonant colorism upon which German Expressionist style depended for its effect. By reducing to a generality an artistic mode for which the specificity of individual creation was of paramount importance, Lichtenstein presents the rhetoric of this movement while emptying it of its content. After all, the German Expressionists believed in the ability of the artist's supremely subjective creative sensibility to visualize the "essence" of his own experience, and thus to create works of art with liberating, even regenerative powers.

When Lichtenstein's imagery closely resembles a specific Expressionist source, this adds, paradoxically, not to our sense of proximity to that art, but to our awareness of our immense distance from it. For example, The Prisoner is a painting by Lichtenstein which, down to the wood-graining behind the figure's head, bears a striking resemblance to a 1918 woodcut by Christian Rohlfs. Far from suggesting the continuity of a pictorial tradition, this comparison serves only to reveal the breadth of a fissure that has opened up between the two images. How utterly inconsequential to Lichtenstein's image is the once-troubling urgency of Rohlf's subject—the internment of a political prisoner by a repressive regime—an urgency that offered an intense emotional justification for Rohlf's lacerating formal distortions. In his own highly abstract painting, however, Lichtenstein seems far more concerned with maintaining pictorial rather than political or even emotional tensions.



Christian Rohlfs:* The Prisoner, *1918, woodcut, 24 ½ by 19 ¼ inches.



Lichtenstein:* The Prisoner, *1980, oil and magna on canvas, 60 by 40 inches.

Yellow and Green Apple, 1981, magna on canvas, 24 inches square.

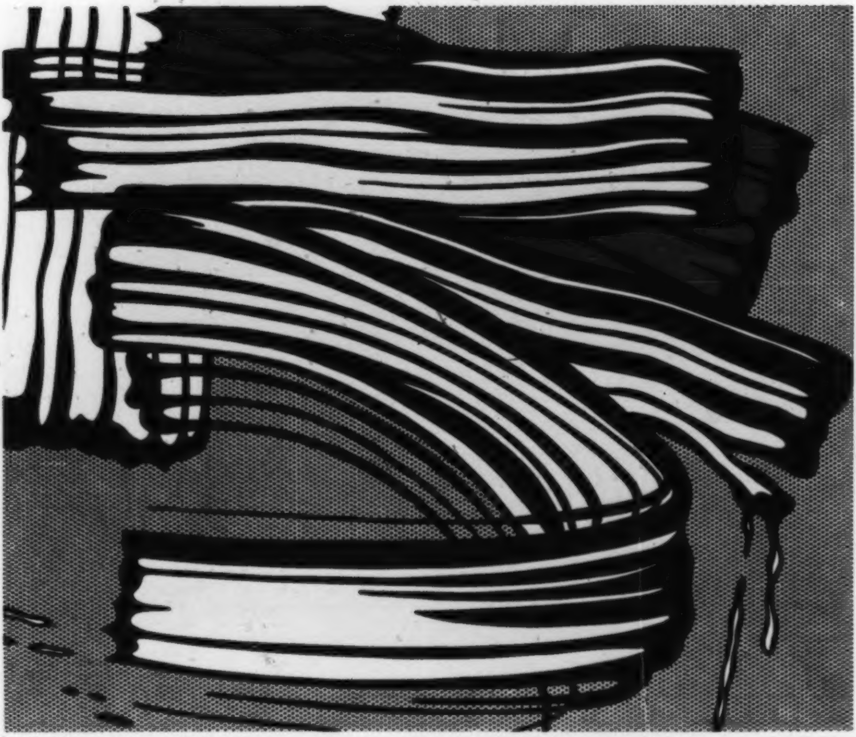
Untitled, 1960–61, oil on canvas, 48 by 70 ¼ inches. Collection the artist.

In more recent work (1980–81) Lichtenstein leaves behind the stock of historically specifiable art styles that provided him with nearly a decade of preexisting motifs. But even in these works he does not acquiesce to the temptation of unhampered intuitive invention or expressive directness. These paintings are as elaborately rigged with systems for restraining intuition and checking conventional modes of expression as any of his previous works.

Thus, we cannot help but notice the great difference between a Lichtenstein painting like Yellow and Green Apple and the loosely and directly brushed sketch for it. Seen by itself, the sketch might appear to signal an unexpected retreat to the intuitive, expressive tradition; yet Lichtenstein is willing neither to confront nature so directly nor to employ gestural spontaneity so naively. In the final painting he has removed himself yet again from that tradition and produces instead an image that measures his distance from it. In the process of enlarging his sketch and executing the final painting, the accidental mark becomes deliberate, and the painterly image is again transformed into a linear representation of one. As a result of this shift in emphasis, Lichtenstein's fanciful motifs—landscapes and seascapes, portrait heads and still lifes—are rendered nearly illegible, so exuberant is the veil of hypertrophied brushwork that simultaneously describes and conceals them. These are paintings which suggest the idea of nature obscured by a powerful temperament.

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI



Little Big Painting, 1965, oil and magna on canvas, 68 by 80 inches. Castelli Gallery.

In Sunset through the Trees, for example, we become so involved in following the speedy trajectories of blue and yellow brushstrokes, and in observing the extraordinary range of arabesques created by their contours, that the ostensible subject—a corner of nature—becomes all but indecipherable. A portrait head of a blond youth is comprised of what seem to be a multitude of heavily impastoed daubs that weave over and under one another in the highly stylized manner that Lichtenstein perfected some 16 years ago; but all that texture is, of course, merely implied by the linear design on Lichtenstein's virtually uninflected surface.

That Lichtenstein would ironically employ the direct, expressive sketch as a means to create images which are not easily recognizable—that are in many cases difficult to decipher even after extended viewing—does not correspond to the generally held view of his art as being designed for instant apprehension. In fact, these works mark Lichtenstein's most economical solution to date to the problem of slowing down the viewer's perception of his art. For, to judge from his works since 1977, when he embarked on his complicated Surrealist-style images, such strategies for arresting the viewer have emerged as one of his more durable and compelling artistic concerns.

It is noteworthy that, while making this series which represents no one's art but his own, Lichtenstein gradually eliminated the benday dots and parallel striations that, in his art, have always denoted the intercession of mechanical reproduction. In this way he has gone to considerable lengths to make it difficult for the critic or viewer to categorize these images as just another elaboration on his old theme of reproducing reproductions. In addition, this strategy has the effect of bringing into far greater proximity the two factors that comprise the dominant and often conflicting voices in Lichtenstein's dialogue with Expressionist art—on the one hand, the will to create intuitively and to emphasize artistic presence; on the other the critical denial that one can, in this day, responsibly deploy that kind of unbridled artistic invention.

All of Lichtenstein's works speak eloquently of his profound estrangement from the historical and philosophical ambience that made Expressionism seem possible and even imperative. This estrangement is in part a product of the passage of time and the progressive isolation of art in a culture than now seems best equipped to celebrate art's value as pure commodity. But this explains neither Lichtenstein's reluctance to invent new imagery, nor his treatment of existing imagery as so much neutral data for his art.

To understand his attitude, we must look closer to home, to our own late-20th-century experience. In Lichtenstein's selective and streamlined reminiscences of European and American art we find a sophisticated analogue for the way we know art today—swiftly, in the museum, and denuded of scale and texture in reproductions. It has been some 60 years since Walter Benjamin, in his famous essay "The Work of Art in the Age of Mechanical Reproduction," claimed that photography would irrevocably alter the art experience and eventually art itself. Today's Neo-Expressionists and their supporters, however, work to deny this claim; they attempt to reconstitute what Benjamin called the "aura" of the unique work of art. But for Benjamin the dissolution of the aura was part of an irreversible historical process—a process which is the precondition for Lichtenstein's art.

There may be times when Lichtenstein's art seems intolerably premeditated, overly controlled and, however witty and skillful on the delivery, annoying and even cynical in its view of what is possible for art. After all, this is an art that denies the freedoms claimed by the modern tradition, and we in this culture have a lot at stake in that tradition, as demonstrated by our resistance to works of art which insist that such freedom is, in fact, an illusion. But if in his art Lichtenstein has enunciated the loss of the Romantic modern tradition, he has done so not without a considerable sense of personal loss—evident in his continuing fixation on precisely what it is that has been lost. ☐

Author: David Deitcher is a Ph.D. candidate in art history at CUNY and is writing a dissertation on Lichtenstein.

Woman IV, 1982, oil and magna on linen, 70 by 50 inches. Castelli Gallery.

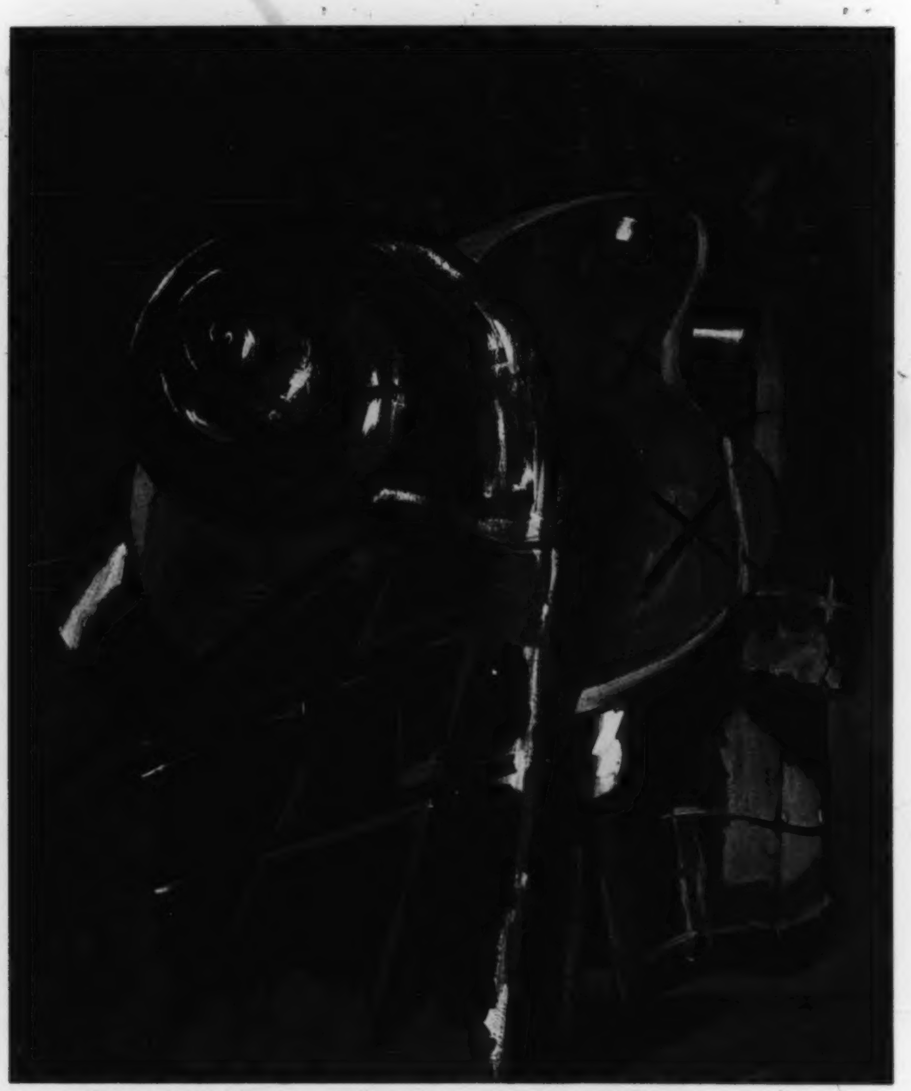
VOL
71
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI



Markus Lüpertz:* Death and Painter—Dithyrambic 11, *1973, 109 by 83 ½ inches.

Acts of Aggression: German Painting Today,

Part II

BY DONALD B. KUSPIT

Georg Baselitz: The Shepherd, 1965, oil on canvas, 63 by 51 inches. Galerie Michael Werner.

Current German painting is here viewed as a virtual second coming of modern art to a country deprived of its artistic past, rent by ideational contradictions, and politically divided against itself. In this concluding section, the author analyzes the conflicts, ironies and iconoclastic lyricism of the major exponents of the new movement.

Baselitz and Lupertz

Georg Baselitz in his castle, Markus Lüpertz in his bar: these "senior" artists are the touchstones of the new German painting. Baselitz inhabits a sign of tradition, surrounded by more signs of tradition—his seemingly antithetical collections of Italian Mannerist prints and African sculpture. One recalls Arnold Hauser's argument that modernism begins with Mannerism; one also recalls the inescapability of primitivism in modernism. Baselitz consciously associates himself with the symbols and sources not only of traditional German culture but of modern art. Baselitz is rooted, one might even say entrenched, in tradition; he offers a new conception of freedom based on a new relation to—a fresh interpretation of—tradition.

He starts from a new emphasis on directness—the directness with which man can act, can relate to God and paint. To compare God to paint may seem farfetched, but the self-esteem of the painter depends on his relation to paint, just as the self-esteem of man depends on his relation to the divine. Baselitz communicates a fresh sense of the ultimacy of the medium of paint through the directness of his relation to it, the directness with which he gives it presence in his pictures.

There is a kind of divine madness to this pursuit of directness, this effort to free paint of the harness of form that tradition supposedly insists it wear. The message of tradition—old and new—for Baselitz is to be as fanatically sensuous—direct—as possible, and thus to become divine, like the "divine" Michelangelo. The allusion to Michelangelo is not gratuitous; the same harsh, tragic, insistent stroke that informs Michelangelo's late, unfinished sculpture convulses Baselitz's figures, subtracts from them in the very act of rendering them—negates them to affirm the stroke's own intensity, and ultimately the artist's personal, radically individual intensity.

Intensity is also what Lüpertz thinks is crucial, intensity driving toward—and the very upshot of—individuality. Again and again in conversation the note of individuality was sounded by Lüpertz. It was sounded in his refusal to be the epigone of the American abstractionists—particularly Arshile Gorky, an artist with whom he had an early affinity. (This refusal to be the decadent understudies

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

Baselitz: Male Nude, seated, 1976, oil on canvas, 97 ½ by 78 inches. Galerie Neuendorf.

Baselitz: Untitled, 1966, oil on canvas, 52 ½ by 30 ¾ inches. Galerie Michael Werner.

Baselitz: Man in Tree, 1969, oil on canvas, 97 ½ by 78 inches. Galerie Michael Werner.

of American movements was stated again and again, not only by Lüpertz, but by other German artists, younger and older.)

According to Lüpertz, an almost explicit rebellion against assumed American leadership was in the works from the time of Baselitz's early '60s Pandemonium manifestos. (It should of course be noted that during the same period there were similar anti-social and anti-formal manifestations in the U.S.—the rougher side of late Abstract Expressonism, Happenings, etc.—which don't seem to figure in the German's retrospective view of the early '60s situation.) Lüpertz told me the Americans were not his "fathers," and they did not initiate him into any stylistic order—although he volunteered the information that early Pollock was "crucial" for him.

Lüpertz went on to observe that a reaction against American art is even more central to the second generation of German artists than it was to him and his contemporaries. If anything, the younger artists' conception of American avant-garde art (admittedly generalized and schematized) was a kind of collective jumping-off point for the development of their own individuality. As they saw it, American avant-garde production was typically characterized by highly consistent individual styles. By contrast, these younger German artists, like Lüpertz before them, were eager to free themselves from the dominance of any one style—hence, like him, their constant variability.

Another point of resistance to things American, and hence of self-definition for the younger Germans: in the American avant-garde world during the period of their artistic maturing, painting was as abnormal as it was in the German bourgeois world. To the younger German painters, the American art world seemed by the late '60s (to use Lüpertz's melodramatic analogy) as authoritarian and unthinking in its rejection of painting per se as Hitler was in his rejection of Expressionist painting. So why not make a fetish of painting—and indeed, of Expressionist-type painting? Why not be ironically decadent, by going back to the first truly modern painting Germany had seen?

Baselitz: Finger-painting—Nude, 1972, 78 by 63 inches. Galerie Michael Werner.

Baselitz consciously associates himself with the symbols and sources not only of traditional German culture but of modern art.

And why not be more profoundly decadent than the American avant gardists could ever imagine—dangerously, politically decadent? For the move was not only to paint, but to encompass meaningful subjects drawn from the real world. It was not only Beuys who, during the '60s and early '70s, was developing in Germany a new connection between art and life. One should be equally aware of Baselitz's early paintings, of looming Slavic soldiers, Lüpertz's more recent German helmets and cannons, Immendorff's trenchant social satire, Penck's obsessive sense of discrepancy between East Berlin and West.

To me, the restlessness in Lüpertz's art—its constantly shifting stylistic base—is an ironic embodiment of an already ironically conceived decadence and degeneracy. These strategies Lüpertz sees as necessary to avoid creeping stagnation, bred by previous normalization of Baselitz: Crouching Dog, 1968, oil on canvas, 63 by 50 ¾ inches. Galerie Michael Werner.

Baselitz: Anamorphic Landscape, 1959, watercolor and ink, 8 ⅜ by 11 ¾ inches.

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

Lüpertz: Evening, 1980, oil and mixed mediums on canvas, 97 ½ by 128 ¾ inches. Ludwig Collection, Cologne.

Lüpertz: The Big Spoon, oil on canvas, 78 by 117 inches. Galerie Michael Werner, Cologne.

the abstract condition of advanced art. Picasso's development—his decadent relationship to his own past history (Cubism) and to past art in general—is almost a model for the development of Lüpertz. Not steadiness in a single style, but perverse quotation and reconstitution of what seems stylistically obsolete—seems Lüpertz's conceptual method for advancing his art.

While Lüpertz is conceptually restless, Baselitz is restless in his touch. The paintings of both artists have a peculiar morbidity, articulating a sense of the absurd. This is most obvious in the upside-downness of Baselitz's figures and the determined, unrelenting bizarreness or eccentricity of Lüpertz's ongoing "Alice in Wonderland" series, which unfolds in both painting and sculpture.

Baselitz conceives of himself as an abstract painter, arguing that the effect of his topsy-turviness is to free us from the associations aroused by his traditional (portrait) subject matter. With his images inverted, all attention presumably turns to his aggressive painterliness. It's as though his content must suffer the scars of a saber slash or the wounds of an ax; we attend more to these marks of its honor than to what it was before it was marked.

But there is more to Baselitz's paintings than their painterly method. Base-litz's early figures are clearly constructed according to a mannerist esthetic. The principle of small heads and large, long bodies usually holds; in any case, the body's parts are out of proportion, so that the body seems divided against itself, about to come apart. It seems to be constituted of extremities with no natural relation; it exists in self-contradiction, an asymmetrical structure of opposites.

Lüpertz: Floating Dithyramb, 1964, water-base paint on canvas, 78 by 76 inches. Galerie Michael Werner.

Lüpertz: You Don't Know Much, Replied the Duchess, 1981, plaster.

Lüpertz: Alice in Wonderland—Bill Flies Out the Chimney, 1981. Marian Goodman Gallery.

The upside-downness of his later heads or busts is simply an extension of this, a grimmer way of pulling the figure apart, of stretching it on the mannerist rack. And the harsh painterliness is a final mannerist violation of the figure, another way of pushing it to the limit of self-contradiction and of affirming its non-naturalness—its lack of conformity to any normative conception. Baselitz's mannerism articulates a fundamental anti-harmony.

Baselitz spoke to me of his obsession with anamorphic distortion, evidenced at the very beginning of his career in two landscape drawings (1959). His subsequent upside-down paintings are quasi-anamorphic distortions, which cannot be set right. There is no key that permits us to read them normally; they offer the image of a world fundamentally at odds with itself.

I see Baselitz's mannerism as, implicitly, a metaphor for the situation of modern Germany, a country divided against itself, symbol of a world divided against itself. A sensitivity to this self-destructive situation is at the root of much of the new German painting, directly or indirectly.

> Not steadiness in a single style, but perverse quotation and reconstitution of the stylistically obsolete is Markus Lupertz's restless method for the advancement of his art.

Penck, who only recently came to West Germany, deals explicitly with border-crossing in his highly personal painting. In fact, almost to a man (Immendorff was born on the Western side of a town directly on the border), the major artists of the older generation of painters are Easterners who have crossed to the West. They remain obsessed with the East, the land of their childhood, the land that formed them. This is sometimes explicit, as in Immendorff's iconography, which incorporates personages prominent in both worlds; and these two worlds are epitomized in the two contrasting allegorical columns that support the roof of his recurrent subject, the Café Deutschland.

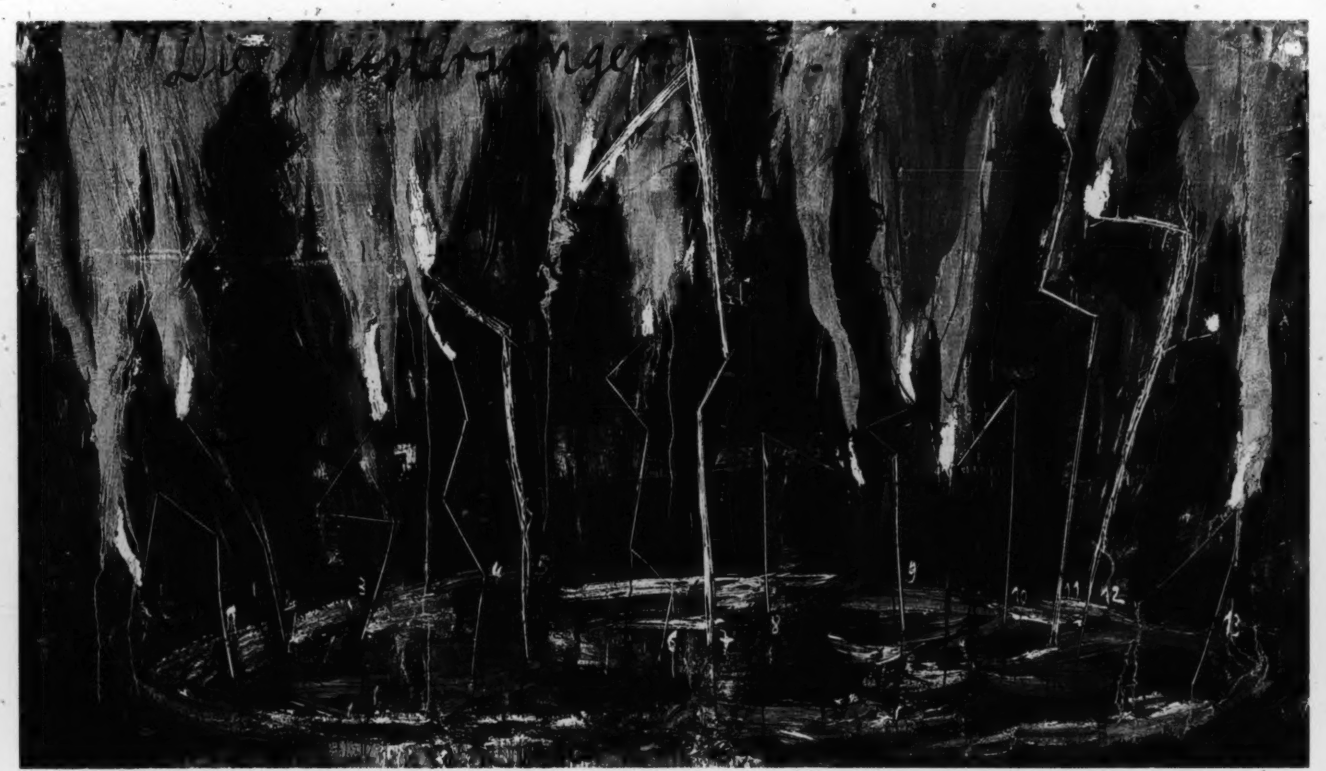
At other times, references to the East are less obvious, as in the Russo-Slavic soldier that figures heroically in Baselitz's early paintings, reminding us that the East Germans are as oriented to the Russians as the West Germans are to the Americans.

In still other cases, the East/West contrast, or the effects of the dichotomization of Germany, are so hidden as to be almost enigmatic in effect. Thus, Dokoupil told me of his sense of shock—of confronting another world—when he first came to the West in the summer of 1968, in the aftermath of the Russian invasion of his native Czechoslovakia. I think that sense of worlds which superficially look alike but which are radically different—serious alternatives—is the source of his highly variable fantasy, his creation, in his paintings, of "life on another planet."

I don't want to overstate the influence of a divided Germany on the imagery and stylistic zigzagging of the new German painting, but it seems to me to be fairly decisive. This can sometimes seem to get out of control and become dangerously anarchic, even destructive. It sometimes comes across as an erratic attempt to bridge opposites that once had a common basis, and in the remote future might have one again. Meanwhile, in the present, there is the love/hate, attraction/repulsion intimacy of close relations. Wherever one lives in Germany, one is in exile, because there is always a part of Germany in which one is an outcast and to which one cannot return.

Baselitz chooses the conventions of process painting to achieve a new effect of contingency, of vulnerability. It is interesting to contrast his use of paint to that of Pollock and de Kooning. In the mature Pollock, figural elements emerge from the spontaneous flow of direct painting,

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI



Die Meistersinger
1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9 10
11 12
13

Anselm Kiefer: The Meistersinger, 1981, straw and oil on canvas, 74 by 109 inches. Galerie Paul Maenz, Cologne. Photo Hans Biezen.

märkischer Sand
Rheinsberg
Freienwalde
Oranienburg
Kossenblatt
Küstri

Kiefer: Sand of the March, 1982, sand on oil on canvas, 128 ¾ by 216 ½ inches. Photo Hans Biezen.

whereas in the mature Baselitz the high-powered strokes seem to flow from the figure, which at times seems no more than a flint on which they whet their appetite. Baselitz has sometimes been understood in terms of de Kooning, but Baselitz's figures are not sealed into a framework of Cubist space as de Kooning's are—they do not come to us with their position predetermined by a fixed structure of space. De Kooning works to dig his figure out of space; Baselitz digs into his figure, letting the chips of space fall where they may; it is this lack of underlying spatial containment that, I think, makes Baselitz's strokes seem to have more "surplus value"—be more "passionate"—than those of de Kooning. They seem more "erotic" because they are more hectic, less anchored to the figure they constitute—less bound to an articulation of the figure.

Kiefer's conceptual images, manipulated in an abstract context, lead to a peculiar kind of affirmation both of heroic German culture and of abstract painting.

Kiefer: The Meistersinger, 1982, straw and oil on canvas. Galerie Paul Maenz, Cologne. Photo Hans Biezen.

Kiefer: Way of World Wisdom, 1976-77, oil on canvas, 119 by 195 inches. Collection Martin Visser, Bergeyk. Photo Hans Biezen.

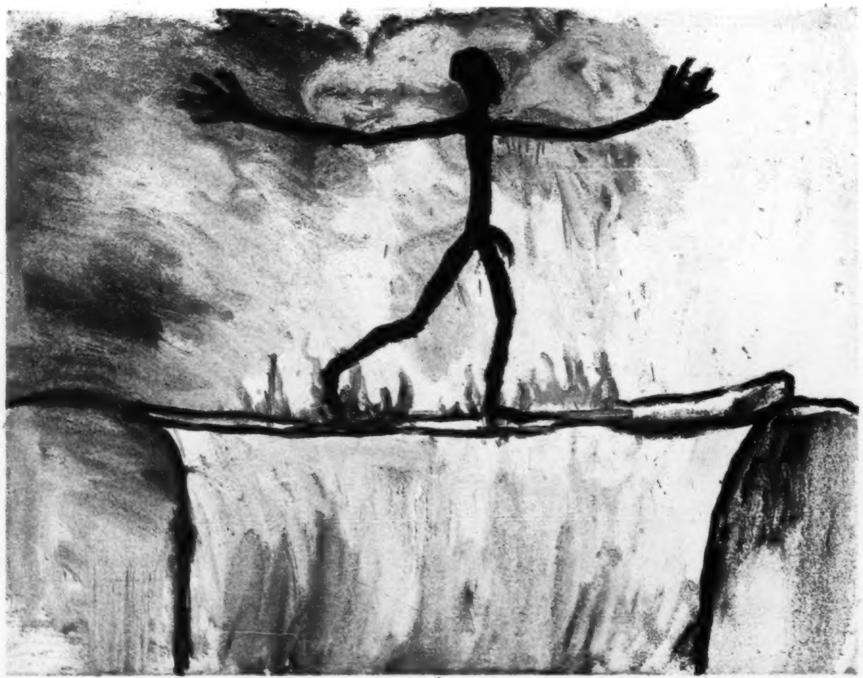
What Baselitz is for stroke, for line, Lüpertz is for mass. He offers us a manneristic handling of mass as free from gravitational pull, a post-gravity world in which volumes are still weighty, but displace no space. Lüpertz's is literally an "Alice in Wonderland" attitude—apart from his works which use sentences from Lewis Carroll's text as their titles.

Lüpertz offers us images of forms that have become unrecognizable—fantastic—that seem debauched by their own twisting-in upon themselves. He gives us a debauched treatment of a variety of past styles and German themes as well. Used in a way that contradicts their normal meaning, they become crazed, peculiarly congealed in appearance, for all the briskness with which they are rendered. (Lüpertz represents the beginning of what later becomes the free-fantasy mode of several younger artists, particularly the Mulheimer Freiheit group.)

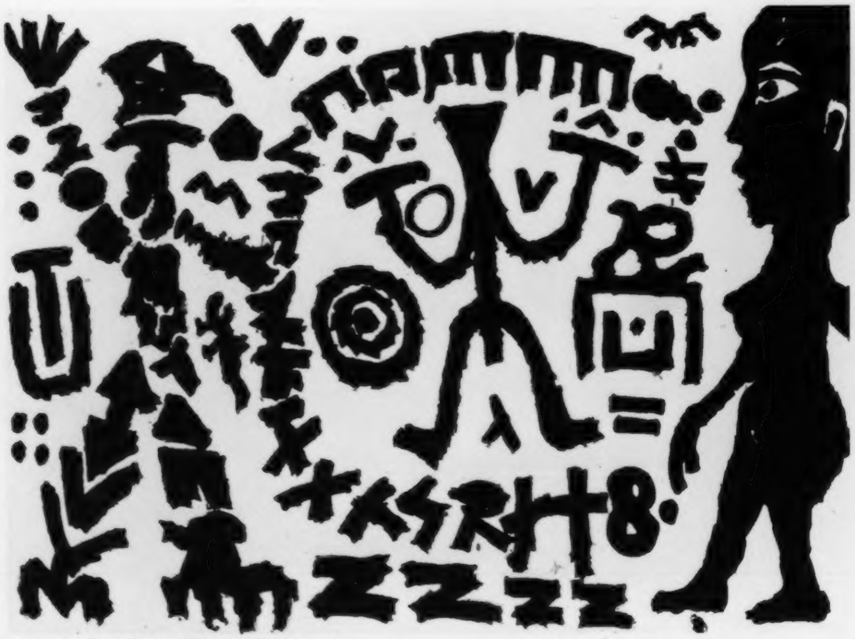
Lüpertz claims to make dithyrambic painting. The dithyramb is a wild, irregular lyric that celebrates Dionysus. In Lüpertz there is a kind of identification with Dionysus and Nietzsche (who identified with Dionysus as well). It is an identification with their madness as the only normal mode of being in a mad world divided against itself. To force things together orgiastically in the Dionysian manner is a visual strategy in Lüpertz. His madness is of course a construct, and his "mad" forms are constructions welding together individual things that don't belong together in a Dionysian manner, so that they have a collective identity.

Lüpertz offers a Dionysian, lyrical—by German standards—treatment of epic material weighty with historical significance. This is most explicit in the pictures where he makes emblems of Nazi helmets and images of Hitler's head. But Lüpertz also deals with the burdensome reality of modern art history—a reality that weighs as heavily on today's German artist, isolated by Hitler from modern roots, as recent

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI



A.R. Penck:* The Crossing Over, *1963, acrylic on canvas, 36 ⅝ by 46 ¾ inches. Ludwig Collection, Neue Galerie, Aachen.



A.R. Penck:* T. III, *1981, dispersion on canvas, 79 by 110 ½ inches. Sonnabend Gallery.

German history.

Lüpertz is engaged in a dialectical duel with the recent past—an attempt to subsume and transcend his personal collective history as a German and a modern artist. Lüpertz's encounter with Picasso is as important for him, he claims, as his encounter with Hitler. Lüpertz wants to unmake the history they made—or rather, to use it to convey another attitude. In this contrariness, he too is mannerist; mannerism is as anti-historical as it is anti-natural—as little a respecter of historical or traditional forms and meanings as it is of natural ones. It has so little respect because it sees history as botched and "unnatural."

Lüpertz violates our sense of historical inevitability by treating historical materials lyrically. In conversation, he insists that he has no anxiety—that he is part of the first German generation in this century born without anxiety. He says he is not an Expressionist because Expressionism is about anxiety. But his freedom from anxiety is earned through his deliberate Dionysianism. His freedom from anxiety is in fact itself a mannerist achievement—a mannerist, expressionist achievement.

It is not so much that Lüpertz is positively happy as that he refuses to suffer because of the past, for to do so is to accept it as a burden rather than as an opportunity. One's relation to the past can be lightened by conceiving it in a hallucinatory, dithyrambic way, which is at least a partial negation of its negativity. Lüpertz confronts the world-historical—in art as well as society—with the lyrical, which disputes its authority. From this encounter, a lighter attitude to life, and to the powers that be, emerges. We will find this same lyrical acknowledgement of the inevitable—mythologized by being symbolized—in Hödicke and Koberling, although with them it is the heroically conceived German version of primordial nature as the source of all originality and value.

Sometimes Lüpertz achieves an extraordinarily mellow, delicate lyricism as in Morning and Evening (both 1980). These works may seem out of character. Yet they are hallucinatory visions of everyday life in which a strange beauty is recovered from banality, or rather life's estranged beauty is restored. There is a powerful lyrical impulse behind the paintings of both Baselitz and Lüpertz, an impulse that is a last-ditch defense, the final line of retreat, for art in a world whose norms are hardly worth respecting, so miserable is the history and existence they have bred. All lyricism is mannerist and implies survival in the face of oppressive norms. The mannerist lyricism which is the basis for the new German painting has a fundamental existential meaning. Lüpertz has emphasized the necessity, again and again, for "arbitrariness, music," in the face of the dead weight of ugly historical reality. The mannerist lyricism of dithyrambic painting becomes a way of denying authority and power to that reality by responding to it ecstatically, against all odds and with almost complete absurdity, even frivolity. Indeed, Lüpertz first strikes that note of absurdity and frivolity which is an essential component in the work of the Mulheimer Freiheit group.

As has been pointed out, "Dionysus dithyrambos" literally means "Dionysus, who stands before the double door." For the Dionysian cult this referred to the initiate who had experienced the fearful mystery of second birth—a second coming. The new German painting represents the second coming of modern German painting, its reappearance after its death at Hitler's hands. German culture as a whole, through the new German painting, is having a second birth. Baselitz and Lüpertz, Penck and Immendorff and Kiefer, show us in their art the German experience of death and rebirth. All have a dithyrambic element to their art—a weird lyricism, one might say an unholy, irreverent lyricism. The vehemence of their handling suggests at once the convulsive labor of birth, and death throes. It lightens the weightiness of their content, reconstituting it lyrically so that it engages one personally.

Their art implies the passage from death to life, from enslavement to the past to life in the present and future. It is an art of self-initiation into art as well as into life. This is why Lüpertz involves himself with death imagery (skulls, or his crematorium mural), and why his "Alice in Wonderland" theme says it all, for Alice's visit to Wonderland is like Ulysses's voyage to Hades, the land of the dead who still live in the unconscious. This confrontation with the dead, who still have a hold over us because they presumably set the norms—and from whom we can free ourselves only by taking a lawless lyrical attitude to them—is the essence of the mannerist position.

Penck and Immendorff are spiritual counterparts, alter egos, brothers from opposite parts of the same world. Each fuses the political and the personal in a highly individual way—almost to the point of eccentricity.

Jörg Immendorff: I, at Power, oil on canvas, 27 ⅜ by 20 inches. Galerie Michael Werner.

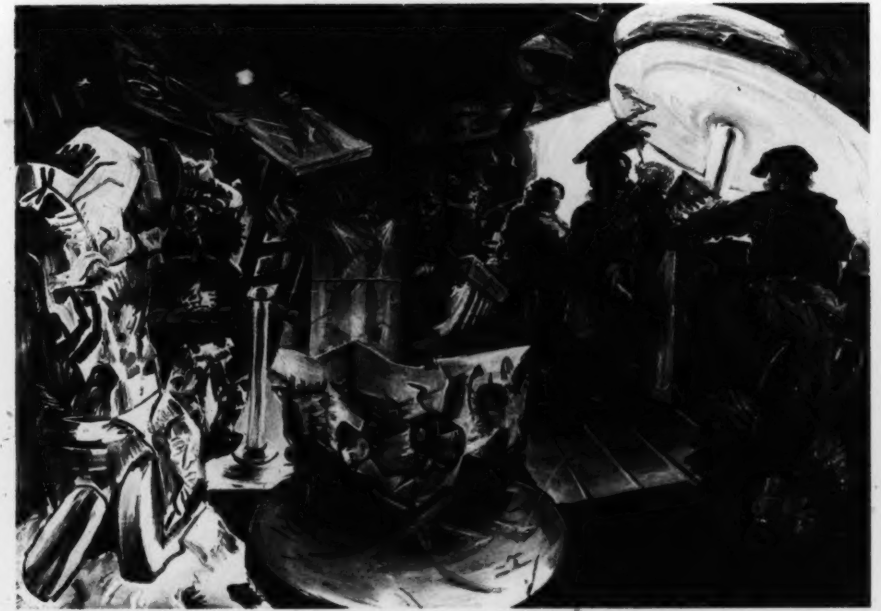
Kiefer

For Kiefer, painting is a conceptual art—he shows us that the whole so-called revival of painting is really the result of a conceptual way of thinking. Conceptual art, with its vision of art as idea, suits the Germans, and Kiefer in particular, in their search for the German spirit, which exists in modern Germany only as a tempting abstraction. In Kiefer, one finds direct engagement with the idea of a heroic German past, and also with the idea of abstraction in art. Almost alone among his colleagues, Kiefer is concerned with the relationship between culture and abstract art. But Kiefer's abstraction does not imply formalism; it implies, rather, a dialectical experience of historical reality (including the reality of the history of abstract painting).

Despite his concern for abstraction as a means of permitting the discovery of unexpected associations and meanings, Kiefer's art has always had an imagistic base. His images (sometimes photographs, sometimes old engravings or illustrations) are invariably obscured by heavy overlays of paint and often other substances. The paintings develop thematically, using a repertory of images that is limited in number but complex in implication. The paintings are directly and powerfully materialistic, revitalizing collage "realism," as if to counterbalance their enigmatic implications.

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI



Immendorff*: Café Deutschland XII—Eagle's Half, *oil on wood, 110 by 156 inches.

In works like Märkische Strand (1974), Wege der Weltweisheit (1976-77), or Die Meistersinger (1982), Kiefer abstractly articulates his conceptual images. Märkische Strand is a sweeping panoramic view of a great plain stretching off to the sea in the distance. The horizon line is extremely high, and the work recalls Altdorfer's famous Battle of Issus. The locale is a real one, and Kiefer has written the names of the towns on little slips of paper like signs which punctuate and flatten out the deep view. Simultaneously a map and a panorama, the painting also pulls us close to it in a more traditional landscapelike manner, by a repoussoir element at the edge composed of birch trees. Complex in its physical substance as well as its multiple readings, the painting is heavily layered with earth colors, grays and whites, along with a lot of black. There is an air of pervasive gloom typical of Kiefer.

Wege der Weltweisheit (literally Way of World Wisdom) presents a group of heads of famous Germans, taken from old illustrations—poets, philosophers, semi-legendary figures; they seem to grow from the forest's roots—from a Germanic tree of life. The forest, clearly labelled, is Hermann's; he is the legendary German "barbarian" who destroyed the Roman legions of Valerius. The poets and thinkers are Hermann's "spiritual" descendants standing for a fiercely independent—dare we say uncivilized?—way of thinking. They show the same forest spirit as Hermann's, idealized and intellectualized. Again, there is a heavy overlay of oil paint—mostly blacks and browns with some whites.

Generally speaking, Kiefer can be seen increasingly obliterating his imagery from the early '70s to now. A recent Meistersinger painting which adds collaged straw to oil paint, appears entirely abstract. However, the 13 vertical units of straw correspond to the 13 meistersingers, and are so numbered. They stand in the midst of dense earth or forest colors, the "traditional" German browns and greens.

Thus Kiefer's conceptual images, manipulated in an abstract context, lead to a peculiar kind of affirmation of both heroic German culture and abstract painting. Kiefer is in effect saying that the only concreteness that we have today is through abstraction. He abstracts from concrete events, creating a construct of meaning incarnate in a few images manipulated to achieve a newly concrete effect. Drawing on what he sees as the stress points of history, he arrives at a construction which is more than the sum of these points. In the act of abstractly recreating a German culture that only exists abstractly, he establishes a new sense of the possibilities that might constitute a contemporary German self. Indeed, the conceptual tokens of German culture Kiefer uses have an almost mathematical function, in the sense that their use is almost formulaic; they are abstract tokens or forms that can be filled with whatever contemporary German content we want to give them.

Polke's work summarizes the pervasive ambivalence that exists between the postwar German artist and contemporary American art.

For me, there is a certain poignancy to Kiefer's abstraction, particularly when it deals with this mythically conceived culture. Thus, a series of paintings titled Dein Goldenes Haar Margarete is derived from a poem by Paul Celan about the German destruction of Jewish culture, involving simultaneously the self-destruction of German culture. Margaret (the heroine of Goethe's Faust?) is the Aryan blond; her opposite number is a dark-haired Shulamite who appears, similarly symbolized but not depicted, in other paintings in the same series. There are no images at all in these works, merely thickly worked paint, light or dark. We have, in them, a sense of the piling of abstraction upon abstraction, as the only way to bring home both the conflict and reciprocity between German and Jewish culture.

Thus it is on the conceptual level of abstract essences that Kiefer operates, and it is his use of abstract art that permits this. German culture, both because of its abuse in German history in the name of the German nation, and because it in fact seems inappropriate to contemporary "international" German life, exists abstractly but in depth in Kiefer's work. This seems one way of overcoming the seemingly inherent perversity, the "fatalistic" aspect of German culture.

Penck, Immendorff

Penck and Immendorff are also, despite their quite different styles, Conceptualists. Penck, working with a quasi-automatist approach—like Lüpertz, he acknowledges the importance of early Pollock for himself—and Immendorff, working Sigmar Polke: Crowd, 1969, screen painting, 74 by 72 inches. Städtisches Kunstmuseum, Bonn.

Polke: Carl Andre in Delft, dispersion on cloth, 34 ⅜ by 29 ¼ inches. Collection Reiner Speck.

Polke: Vacation Picture, 1966, 39 by 35 inches. Galerie Karstein Greve, Cologne.

Höhere Wesen befahlen: rechte obere Ecke schwarz malen!

Polke: Higher Beings Command: Paint the Upper Right Corner Black!, 1969.

ironically in a social (and socialist) realist vein, depict worlds in conflict, figures torn apart. In Penck, the figure, reduced to minimal terms, becomes a cipher in a system: its fragmentation self-evident, it becomes the standard product of a machine. In Immendorff, the figure is allegorically presented as torn between two worlds; Immendorff's figures straddle opposites, never escaping the self-contradictoriness of their situation.

In the work of both artists, this tension is ultimately presented autobiographically. Penck's "Standart" figure stands for himself, crossing the border between the two Germanys: the Übergang theme appears as early as 1963, in a painting where a stick figure crosses a burning footbridge over an abyss of fire, and as recently as 1980, when a fragmented stick figure is contrasted with a soldier. And the real subject matter of Immendorff's Café Deutschland series is himself, sometimes centered and sitting between two enormous allegorical columns that symbolize his two worlds.

In Café Deutschland I (1977-78), Immendorff depicts himself twice, in the one case dancing in clothing that is emblematically half disco-bourgeois (jeans and tee-shirt), and half outcast-bohemian artist (leather top to bottom—as he was dressed when I met him in Ghent). His other self-image in the same work shows him centered between the columns, as he reaches through an image of the Berlin Wall to Penck, also depicted.

Penck and Immendorff are spiritual counterparts, alter egos, brothers from opposite parts of the same world. Penck's overpersonalized conception of his art complements Immendorff's socially oriented, powerfully critical attitude. (Every time I asked Penck what was going on in his art, stylistically, he described its highly personal subject matter).

Continued on page 131

VOL
71
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

Fantasms and Fragments: Expressionist Architecture

Although there have been repeated attempts to co-opt more recent buildings as Expressionist, Expressionism proper was one of architecture's briefest and brightest flames—a deeply utopian response to the decidedly non-utopian years immediately following World War I.

BY MARTIN FILLER

> In order to raise our culture to a higher level, we are forced, whether we like it or not, to change our architecture.
>
> —Paul Scheerbart
> Glasarchitektur, 1914

> Faustian outbursts against an inimical world and the cries of outraged humanity cannot create new levels of achievement. They remain transitory facts—however moving they may be—and not constituent ones.
>
> —Siegfried Giedion
> Space, Time and Architecture, 1941

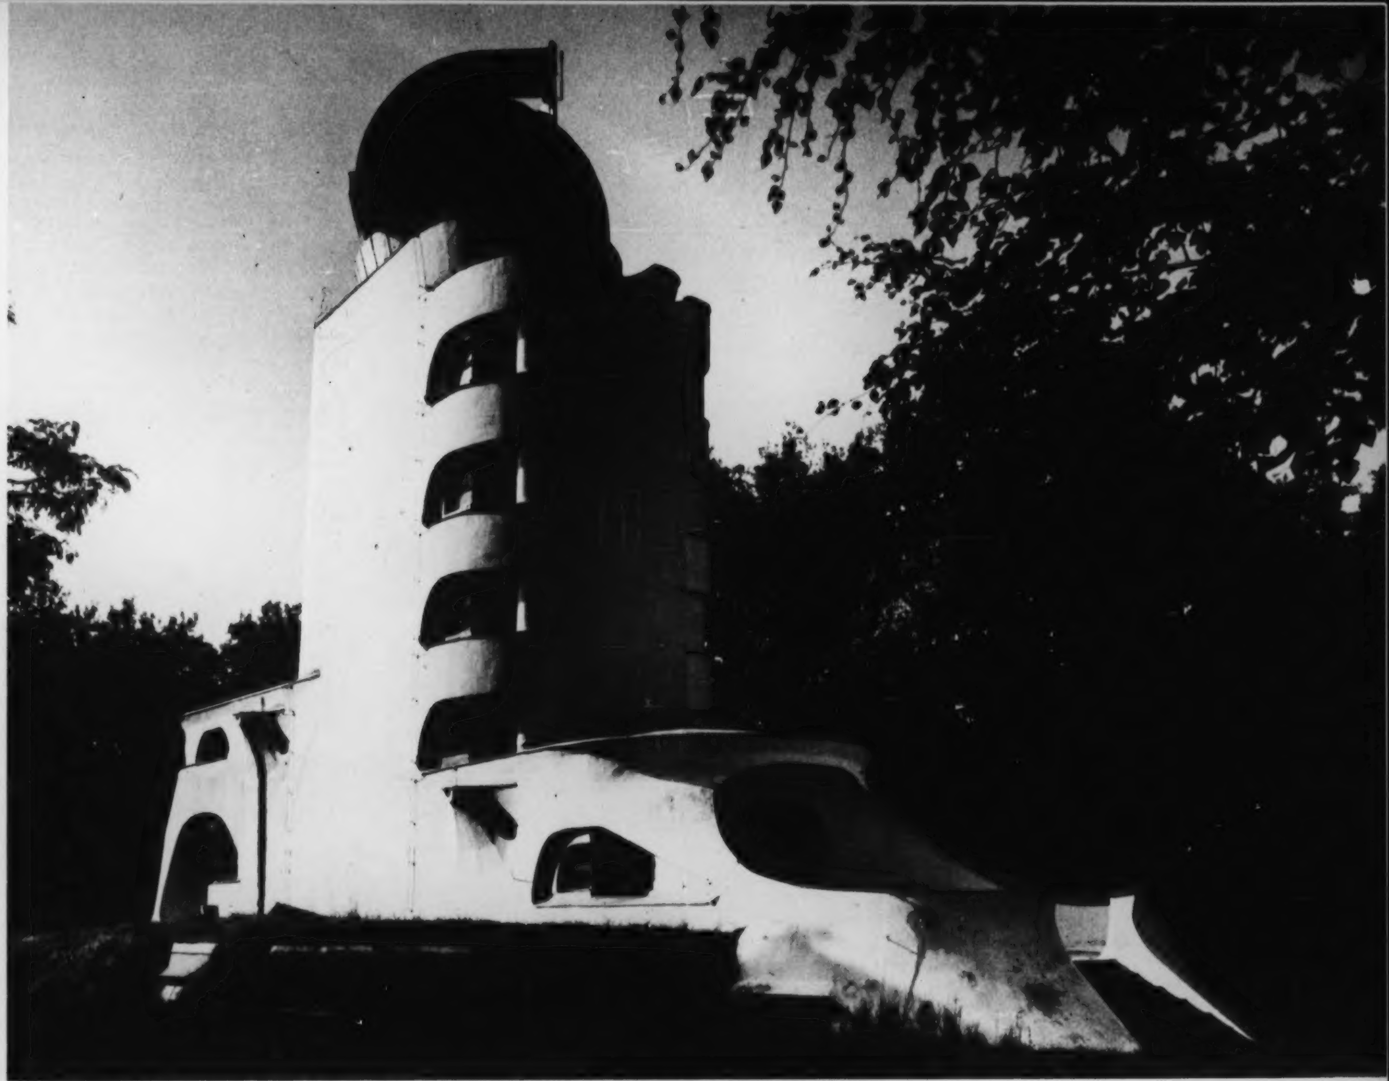
The cataclysm of World War I resulted in two very different kinds of reactions among the European architectural avant-garde. On one hand, there was the reductivist esthetic typified by the architects of De Stijl and Suprematism, who believed that the miseries of the holocaust could be transcended through spiritual and artistic purification. On the other hand, there was the more overtly emotional approach of the Expressionists, who sought not so much transcendence as transformation. If the purists sought to eradicate the memory of the world catastrophe by expunging all visual reminders of earthly travail via their rigorously exclusionary approach, then the Expressionists embraced a representational method that all too graphically spoke of a shattered vision of the world—one that, at best, could only be reassembled in a highly fragmented manner. Despite the striking stylistic differences between those two approaches, they were nonetheless alike in their utopian responses to decidedly non-utopian times, sharing a fervent conviction that the world not only could, but indeed must, be transformed through architecture.

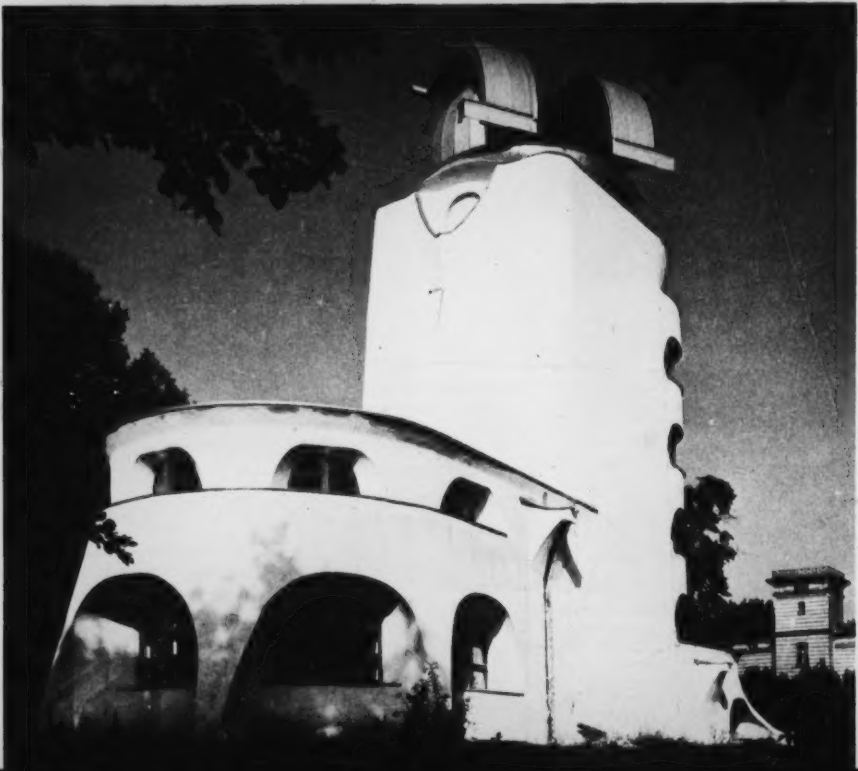
The first question that must be confronted in any discussion of Expressionist architecture is how one chooses to define it. All architecture, after all, is to some degree expressive of something. Henry-Russell Hitchcock, for example, though essentially dismissive of Expressionism, usefully delimits Expressionist architecture to that done by an avant-garde faction in Germany in the years just before and after 1920.[1] Restricting the Expressionist label to work executed between 1919 and 1923 is given further meaning by the fact that that period is bounded on one side by the end of the Great War and the establishment of the Weimar Republic, on the other by the stabilization of the German economy and the resultant resumption of building activity.

As that bracketing implies, Expressionism was to a great extent an architecture of vision, not execution. For despite—or rather because of—the difficulty architects faced in the immediate postwar years in bringing their projects to realization, their imaginations were freed for the creation of some of the most original and astonishing architectural designs ever seen. It is doubtful that even in an optimal economic climate such fantastic structures would ever find the necessary patronage to assure their completion. That fact, along with the difficulty some historians have with art that resists easy characterization and runs counter to seamless interpretations of cultural evolution, has led Expressionism to be largely overlooked or quickly dispensed with in most standard treatments of 20th-century architecture.

It was only during the 1960s, a period that placed a strong emphasis on the value of personal expression, the validity of the intuitive over the rational, and the importance of imagination and invention rather than received tradition in the arts, that Expressionism at last was seriously reexamined as one of the most important movements in modern architecture. If Expressionist architecture now appears to be more significant than Art Nouveau or Futurist architecture, to cite two other "minor" episodes in the early 20th century, it is because for all its phantasms Expressionism was rooted in a true social vision that its distorted morphology and the resultant focus on its formal aspects have tended to obscure. But it was precisely that social component that gave Expressionism the substance of content that Art Nouveau and Futurist architecture largely lacked, and which distinguishes the architecture of Expressionism from later, expressionistic examples that have had affinities of style, but not of meaning.



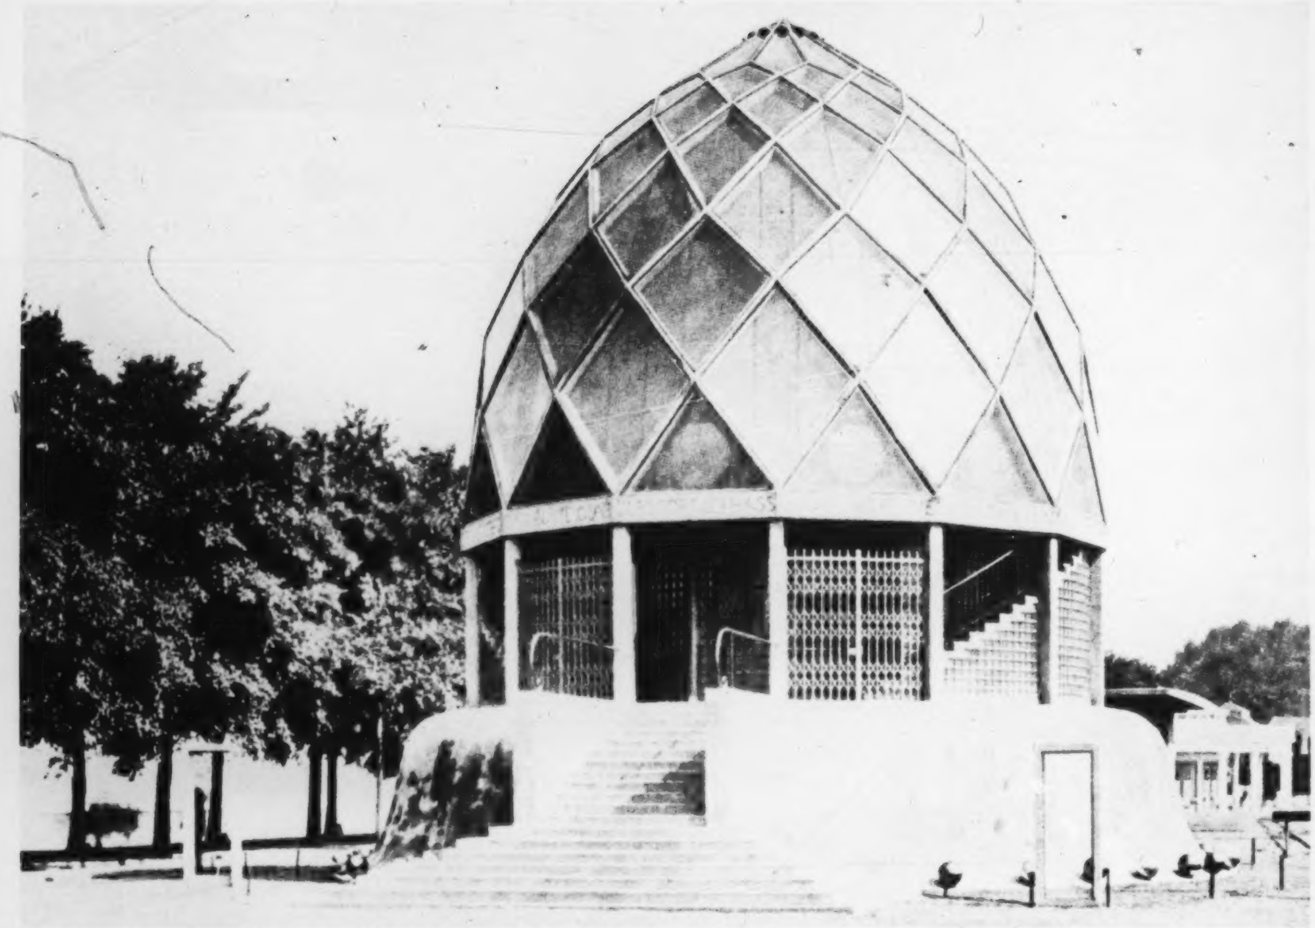
Erich Mendelsohn: Einstein Tower, Potsdam, East Germany, 1919–21. Both photos Cervin Robinson.



The origins of Expressionist architecture can be traced rather directly to the Deutsche Werkbund, a group founded in 1907 for the promotion of a stronger link between progressive German artists, architects and designers and the German industrial establishment. Of the three major founding figures of the Werkbund—Hermann Muthesius, Friedrich Naumann and Henry van de Velde—it was perhaps Muthesius who had the greatest philosophical impact. His deep respect for the English Arts and Crafts Movement, with all its attendant nostaligia for a return to a pre-industrialized society, its belief in the desirability of the medieval guild system, and its missionary faith in the perfectability of mankind through art and design, eventually led to the incorporation of those traits into the character of Expressionism.

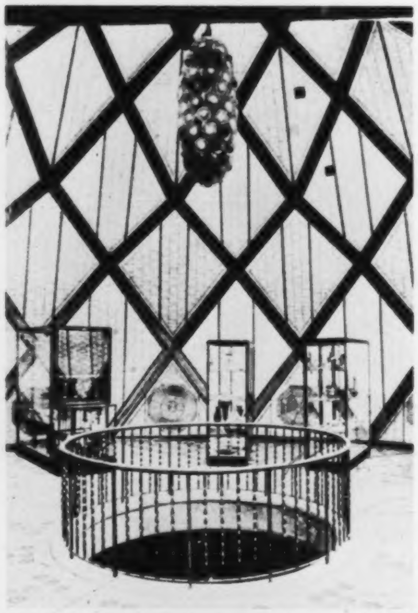
But as is often the case with reform movements, the Werkbund quite early on was polarized between more conservative and more radical factions.

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI



Bruno Taut: Glass House (destroyed and reconstructed), Cologne, 1914.

That split within the Werkbund, however, was not merely one of generational temperament, as some critics have claimed; in fact, some members of the older contingent of the Werkbund sided with their younger colleagues who predominantly supported the concept of Formwille (will to form, or individualism) over that of Typisierung (typification, or standardization), which had more adherents among the elder members. Concrete evidence of those two disparate points of view was given at the famous Deutsche Werkbund Exhibition held in Cologne in 1914, the major prewar manifestation of the Werkbund philosophy in applied form. Among the older generation, the essential conservatism of Peter Behrens's classicizing Festival Hall contrasted dramatically with the plastic modeling of van de Velde's Model Theater, while among the generation 20 years their junior, Walter Gropius's and Adolf Meyer's reductivist but still vestigially classicizing Administration Building and Model Factory were quite different in feeling from the proto-Expressionist Glass House by Bruno Taut. Five years later, even the more conservative architects of those two pairs of examples were to exhibit definite Expressionist tendencies in their designs, but the earlier alignments are worth bearing in mind in relation to the architecture of 1919 to 1923.



Bruno Taut: Glass House (interior). The building's tightly controlled promenade first deposited the visitor here, in the "cupola room" under the structure's colored glass dome.

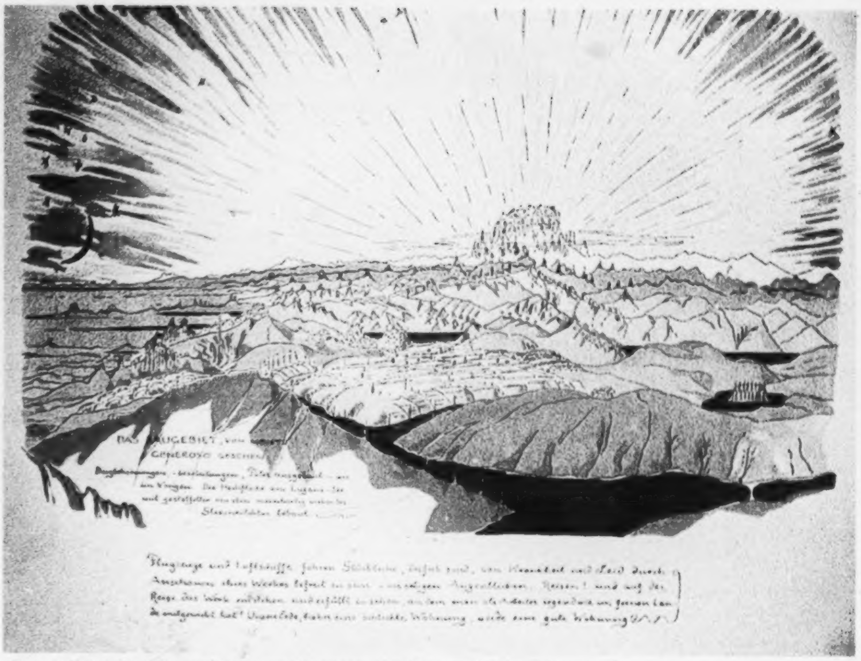
The end of World War I galvanized the radical wing of Werkbund architects in Berlin and led to the formation, exactly a week after the armistice, of the Arbeitsrat für Kunst, or Work Council for Art. The Arbeitsrat differed from the Werkbund in rejecting union with the incumbent establishment, preferring instead the creation of a new order after the fall of that establishment. Though several similar groups arose in other German cities in the months that followed, none had the importance of the Arbeitsrat in its successful dissemination of the ideas of a small but powerfully influential band of architects.

The Arbeitsrat called for a unification of all the arts under the aegis of architecture. As Bruno Taut wrote in the group's architectural manifesto:

> . . . there will be no boundaries between the crafts, sculpture, and painting, all will be one: Architecture. A building is the direct carrier of spiritual values, shaper of the sensibilities of the general public which slumbers today but will awaken tomorrow. Only a total revolution in the realm of the spiritual can create this building; yet this revolution, this building, does not happen by itself. Both have to be sought—today's architects must prepare the way for this edifice.[2]

That revolutionary agenda was already implicit in Taut's earlier work, especially his Glass House at the 1914 Cologne Werkbund Exhibition. One of the most richly symbolic structures of this century, it consisted of a faceted glass dome set atop a smoothly modeled round concrete base. Greatly influenced by the works of the Expressionist writer Paul Scheerbart, Taut dedicated the structure to him and had Scheerbart's inspirational aphorisms carved onto the exterior of the building—among them this motto, over the main entrance: Das bunte Glas zerstört den Hass ("Colored glass destroys hate.") The visitor was led in controlled progression through the building, first up into the "cupola room" under the colored glass dome, and then down into the "fountain room" in the drum beneath the dome, in which stained glass panels by several Expressionist painters, among them Max Pechstein, surrounded a stepped, cascading glass fountain.

The outside of Taut's famous Glass House bore the legend, "Das bunte Glas zerstört den Hass," meaning: "Colored glass destroys hate."



Bruno Taut:* Das Baugebiet, vom Generoso gesehen *("The Construction Area, Seen from Generoso"), from* Alpine Architektur, *1919.

Bruno Taut:* Tal als Blute ("Valley as Blossom"), from Alpine Architektur, *1919.

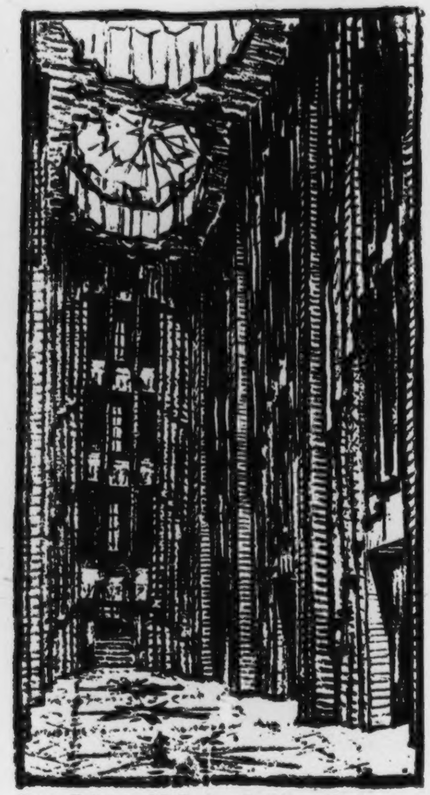
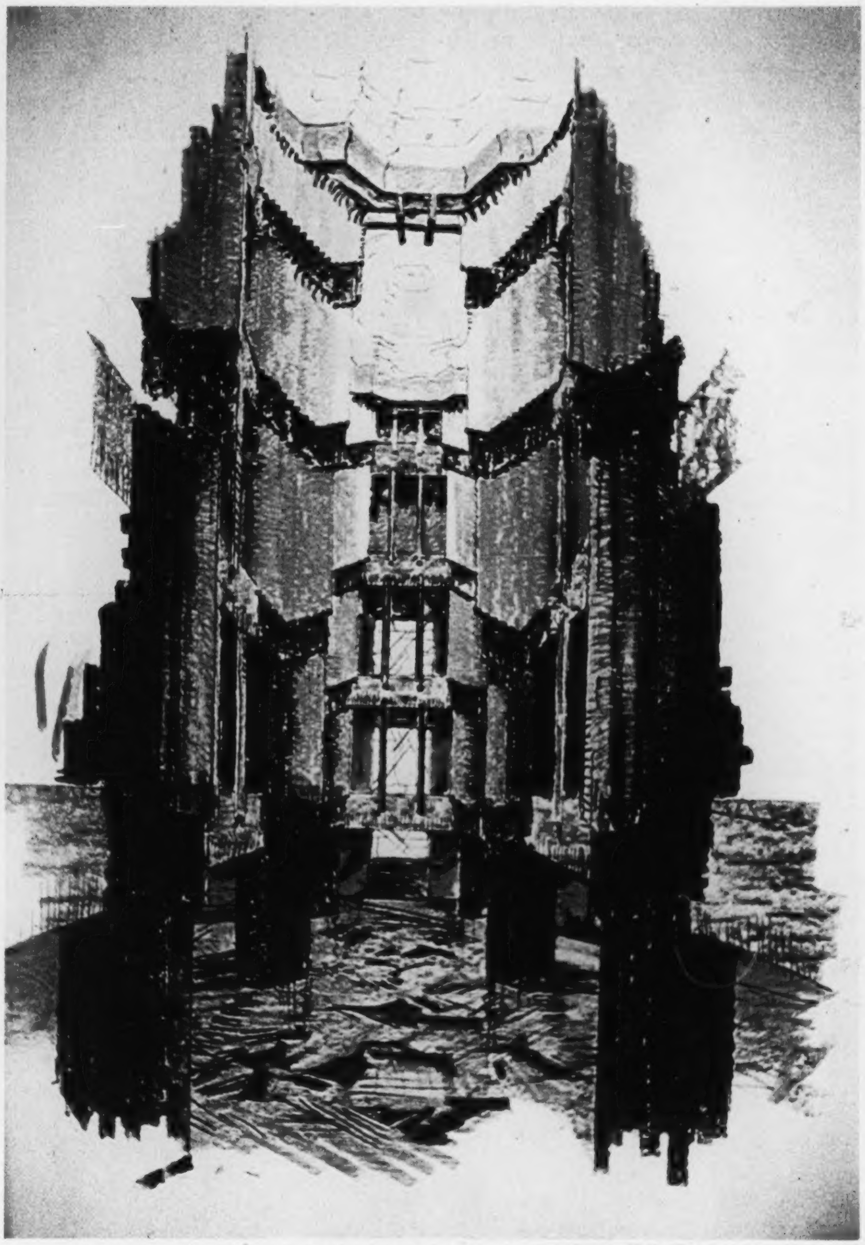
The Glass House's debt to medieval conceptions of the spiritual aspects of architecture was acknowledged in Taut's epigraph in the exhibition's program: Der gotische Dom ist das Präludium der Glasarchitektur ("The Gothic cathedral is the prelude to glass architecture"). But far from a stylistic antecedent (in truth, the Glass House just as closely recalled Moslem architectural conventions), Taut's invocation of the Middle Ages had more to do with its intended reestablishment of an iconography of crystal symbolism, one that had long embodied notions of physical transformation and metaphysical purification. To the alchemists of ancient times, the crystal represented the highest state of physical existence, having begun as base matter only to be transformed into transparent purity; in the same way, the Expressionists hoped for a similar transubstantiation of their contemporary world through their richly symbolic architecture. This parallel was pointed out by Rosemarie Haag Bletter,[3] who has also described the experience of the Crystal House:

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI



Peter Behrens: IG Farben Building (Höchst, 1920–24), main hall and bridge with clock-tower. Charcoal drawing. Farbwerke Archives.



Peter Behrens: Sketch for IG Farben Building, Höchst, West Germany, 1920–24.

> A walk through this building was like an alchemical rite of passage: it began in an aura of crystalline lightness but the most intense experience occurred, paradoxically, at the end of a long, dark corridor . . . .The primary impression of the building was theatrical, synesthetic, and mystical.[4]

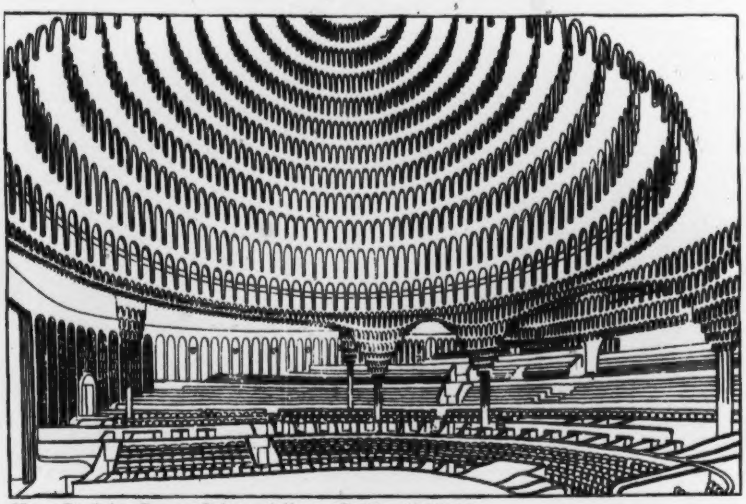
Those last three adjectives sum up not only the most salient aspects of Taut's work until 1923, but also those of Expressionist architecture as a whole.

Taut's work in the immediate postwar years was largely limited to his creation of a remarkable sequence of books in which his visionary schemes were given dazzling, if only two-dimensional life. His Alpine Architektur of 1919 proposed titanic schemes such as crystalline colored-glass cathedrals to be built in the Alps, large, earthwork-sized colored glass flowers to be set in the Alpine valleys, and large, diatom-like colored-glass floats to be placed in mountain lakes. All were calculated to be visible from the heavenly spheres, and to modify the face of the earth to the extent that the globe itself would become a work of art. No less extreme, though somewhat more socially oriented, was Taut's Die Auflösung der Städte ("The Dissolution of the Cities") of 1920, which called for the dismantling of existing urban centers and the construction of new towns—in plan much like medieval idealizations of the New Jerusalem—whose nuclear, radial design struck another of the predominant Expressionist themes. The radial notion was actually implemented by another architect, Hans Poelzig, in the same year that Alpine Architektur was brought out, and his Grosse Schauspielhaus, or Great Playhouse, of 1919 in Berlin must count as the first major executed work of Expressionism. Built for the innovative theatrical director and impresario Max Reinhardt, it was a renovation of an existing semicircular theater. Poelzig retained the original configuration of the structure, but further emphasized it through the addition of his famous stepped domical ceiling for the auditorium, which, with its row upon row of concentric, suspended arches in continuous sequence, gave the hall the feeling of a stalactite-hung cave. Illuminated indirectly, it created a setting that in its majestic focus gave the clear implication of the theatre as a sacred place, a kind of Grail Temple for the new German drama.

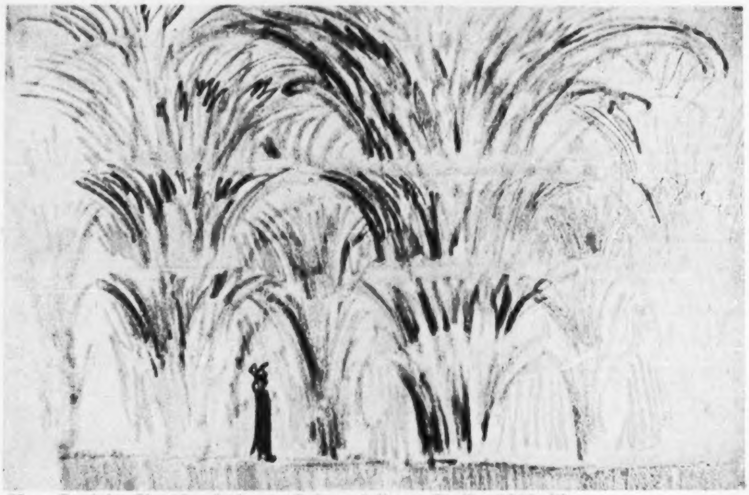
If it is true that innovation in the arts is often first experienced in the "minor" mediums, then it is especially true in times of economic hardship, when financial constraints limit patronage in costlier art forms. Thus it is not surprising that some of the most influential Expressionist architectural design was done as sets for the relatively new medium of film. The best-known example, and the one which often serves as a veritable definition of Expressionism, is Das Kabinett des Doktor Caligari of 1919, directed by Robert Wiene, with set designs by Hermann Warm. To a great degree the film has a pictorial, rather than architectonic, feeling to it: though the walls and stage-like flats have the angular, angst-provoking feeling of an amusement park funhouse, their surfaces are worked over in a broad, painterly fashion that reminds one more of the early works of Kirchner than even the most extreme contemporary architecture, with the possible exception of the Merzbau by Kurt Schwitters, himself a painter.

The lack of architectural construction between 1919 and 1923 led several architects to design film sets themselves, including Poelzig, who did those for Paul Wegener's Der Golem of 1920. The medievalizing component of Expressionist architecture was fully and appropriately exploited in this movie version of the legend of a retributive monster brought to life in a ghetto in Middle Europe of the Middle Ages. The quaint völkisch domestic architecture of that period—steeply pitched roofs, irregular, half-timbered walls, set in narrow, winding streets, was exaggerated almost to the point of caricature. Yet, as in the case of the sets for Caligari, the results corresponded to other contemporary developments, such as the interest Lyonel Feininger, among others, displayed for medieval German

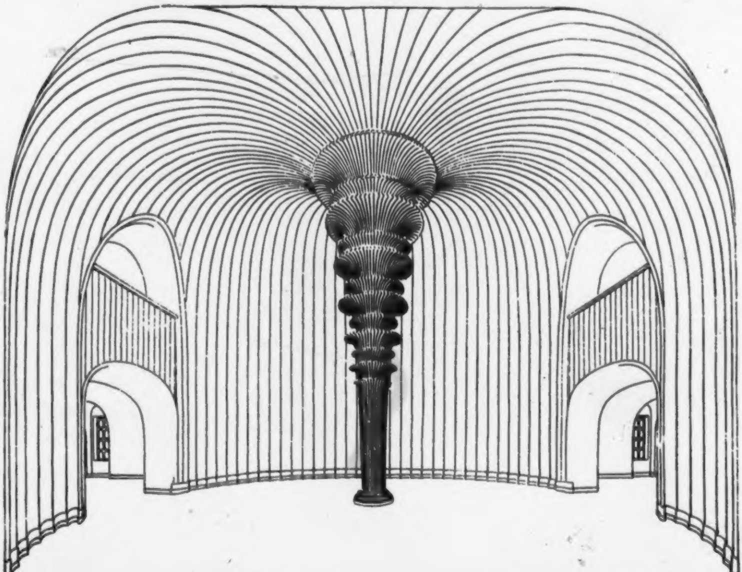
The famous stepped domical ceiling which Poelzig gave his Grosse Schauspielhaus of 1919 produced the effect of a stalactite-hung cave, a place sanctified for drama.



Hans Poelzig: Grosse Schauspielhaus, Berlin, 1918–19.



Hans Poelzig: Sketch relating to Schauspielhaus, Berlin, 1918–19.



Hans Poelzig: Drawing of main foyer, Grosse Schauspielhaus, Berlin, 1918–19.

VOL 71
ISS 1
JA 1983
UMI

Hermann Warm: Set design for "Das Kabinett des Doktor Caligari," 1919. Photo Museum of Modern Art.

Hermann Warm: Set design for "Das Kabinett des Doktor Caligari," 1919. Photo Museum of Modern Art.

architecture depicted in the fragmented manner of the Cubists. As might be expected by the wide distribution of films, the influence was felt as far as the U.S. both in terms of set design (though Expressionist influences were largely subsumed into the more populist Art Deco style) and also construction. The Irvin Willat Studios in Culver City, Calif., commissioned architect Henry Oliver to design a witch's cottage for a film version of Hansel and Gretel in 1923, and the resultant structure bore a close resemblance to the distorted and attenuated forms of Poelzig's Golem sets of three years earlier. The house was later used as the studio's headquarters and eventually was moved to Beverly Hills, where it still stands, an odd testimony to the accelerated "trickle-down" effect of artistic transmission in the age of film.

But far more idiosyncratic was the Merzbau (or "Merz Building") created by Kurt Schwitters in his home in Hannover between 1923 and 1936. part architecture, part interior design and part sculpture, the Merzbau defies precise definition as any one of those. In Schwitters's own term, it was his "Cathedral of Erotic Misery," an accretion of fragments and mementoes relating to his life experiences, a continuous construction that charted his physical, emotional and creative transmutation through the years. Its faceted, angular forms were similar to the familiar Expressionist motifs, though much more freely handled, especially in terms of their general direction as an overall composition. Thus, when the cave-like room the project began as became too small for Schwitters's next series of additions, he simply evicted the tenants in the apartment above it, sawed through the ceiling, and continued upward, eventually taking over large portions of the house.

Hans Poelzig: Set design for "Der Golem," 1920. Photo Museum of Modern Art.

An intensely personal work of art, the Merzbau was filled with a plethora of interstices dedicated to the artist's arcane enthusiasms. There was a Nibelungen Cave, for example, celebrating the ancient German mythic saga, a Goethe Cave, and even a Sex-Crime Cave. There were also grottoes dedicated to his friends Hans Arp, Naum Gabo, El Lissitzky, Kasimir Malevich, Piet Mondrian and Theo Van Doesburg, among others, each containing, like an enshrined reliquary object, such talismans of those friends as a piece of hair, a cigarette stub, a bit of shoelace, or even a small vial of urine. In characterizing the Merzbau as "the only truly Expressionist building ever executed,"[5] Rosemarie Haag Bletter explains that > such Expressionist architects as Bruno Taut had wanted a nonmechanist flexible architecture, one that could be adjusted to constantly changing emotional needs . . . . The paradoxical and wonderful quality of Schwitters' Merzbau was that it had no clear beginning and no clear end. A time capsule was not buried in its foundation, but new ones were added, making for a built-in self-renewal.[6]

Despite their necessary employment in ancillary areas of architecture, the architects of Expressionism received an impressive number of commissions in their chosen idiom. Peter Behrens, while hardly in the forefront of the movement, did nonetheless have a brief Expressionist phase, and his headquarters building of 1920–24 for the IG Farben company in the Frankfurt suburb of Höchst is, along with Poelzig's Grosse Schauspielhaus, one of the largest executed works in the style. Its most impressive feature is its central, skylit, four-story main hall, with its sharply-faceted brick piers (graduated in color from dark bricks at the base of the piers to increasingly lighter ones farther up) culminating in faceted glass domes that complete the crystalline imagery and the phototropic effect (with its obvious spiritual metaphor) shared by much other Expressionist architecture.

More forward-thinking by far than Behrens was Eric Mendelsohn, whose Kurt Schwitters: Merzbau (detail), in his own home in Hannover, started about 1924, destroyed in World War II.

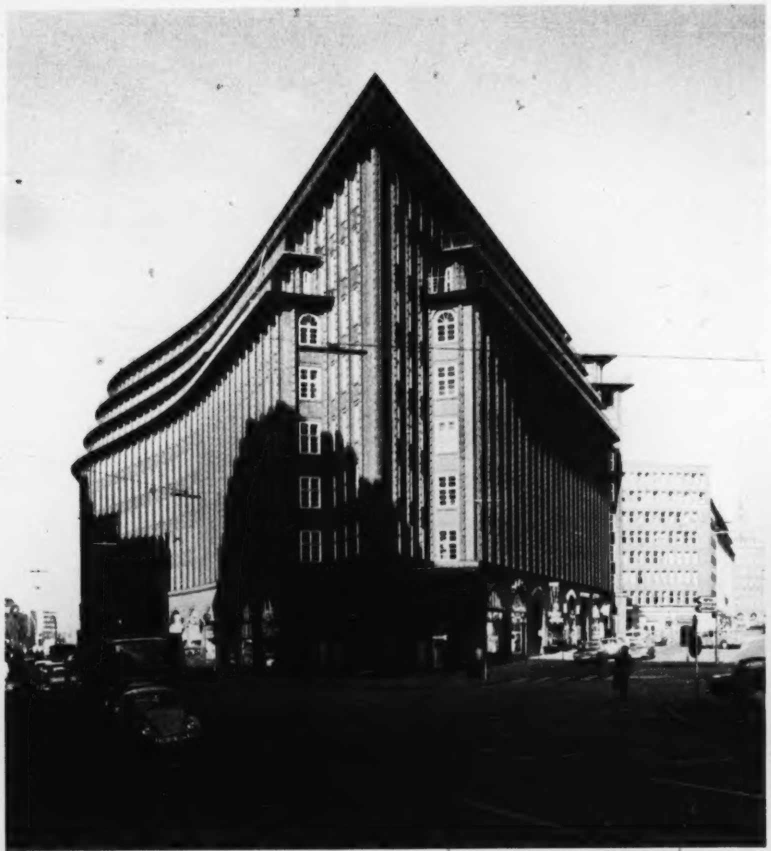
VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI



Fritz Höger: Chilehaus, Hamburg, 1923–24. This shipping company office building marshals the forms of Expressionism to mimic an ocean liner. Photo Cervin Robinson.

Michel de Klerk: Eigen Haard housing estate (detail), Amsterdam, 1917–19. Photo Dick Frank.

works did not share the crystalline esthetic of Expressionism at its most familiar, but who yet belongs to any discussion of the innovative architecture of Germany from 1919 to 1923. "I have found a pupil at last," Henry van de Velde proclaimed upon seeing the architectural sketches of Mendelsohn, and one can understand why immediately. The sensuously contoured forms of Mendelsohn's designs were obviously more of a piece with van de Velde's Belgian Art Nouveau origins than the angular shapes of the other Berlin Expressionists.

Three important Berlin exhibitions of architectural designs stand out in the early postwar period. One was the Arbeitsrat für Kunst's "Exhibition for Unknown Architects" held in 1919, and another its "New Architecture" show a year later, which included works by the Gläserne Kette ("Glass Chain") group led by Bruno Taut, including Wilhelm Bruckmann, Hermann Finsterlin, Paul Gösch, Carl Krayl, the brothers Hans and Wassili Luckhardt, Hans Scharoun and Max Taut, among others. But at least as sensational as those two exhibitions was the one of Eric Mendelsohn's sketches at the Paul Cassirer Gallery in 1919. If most Expressionist architecture implied discontinuity, fragmentation and a heightened emotional state, then Mendelsohn's approach was one of dynamic propulsion kept in harmonious but steady control.

Michel de Klerk: Eigen Haard (doorway detail), Amsterdam, 1917–19. Photo Dick Frank.

Mendelsohn's earlier designs convey the impact of the Italian Futurists on his architectural thinking, but by the time of his Cassirer exhibition he had devised a style that was distinctively his own. His most famous work, and one of the great masterpieces of Expressionism, is the Einstein Tower of 1919–21 in Potsdam, a combination laboratory building and astrophysical observatory for the verification of Einstein's theory of relativity. Not since the advent of Antonio Gaudí's sensuously modeled forms had such an extreme departure from architecture's predominant orthogonal rule been seen in Western architecture. Built of brick covered with stucco, it nevertheless implies reinforced concrete construction, and in fact has fooled some critics[7] into claiming for it that more advanced form of fabrication. Mendelsohn indeed had originally intended to use reinforced concrete, but his limited budget and the difficulties of dealing with a new technology in the depleted postwar labor force led him to settle for the more traditional method. Though the relatively small Einstein Tower has two vertical rows of windows on the shaft of the structure, it remains basically ascalar in design, possessing none of the usual scale references of Classically-derived architecture, so that its true size is correspondingly difficult to judge.

Rudolf Steiner: Goetheanum (south elevation), Dornach, Switzerland, 1924–28.

This is organic architecture if there ever was any, but one which does not make trite representational references to the plant world or to the scenographic tradition in architecture. Rather, it is pure sculpture, dynamic, soaring and alive. Some later critics found it necessary to retrieve the imagery of Art Nouveau in order to deal with this powerful and anomalous building. When Siegfried Giedion spoke of architects who "built concrete towers as flaccid as jellyfish,"[8] it was clear that he had the Einstein Tower in mind. What that Paul Gösch: A portal, 1920 or earlier, pen and ink. Collection Oswald Mathias Ungers, Cologne.

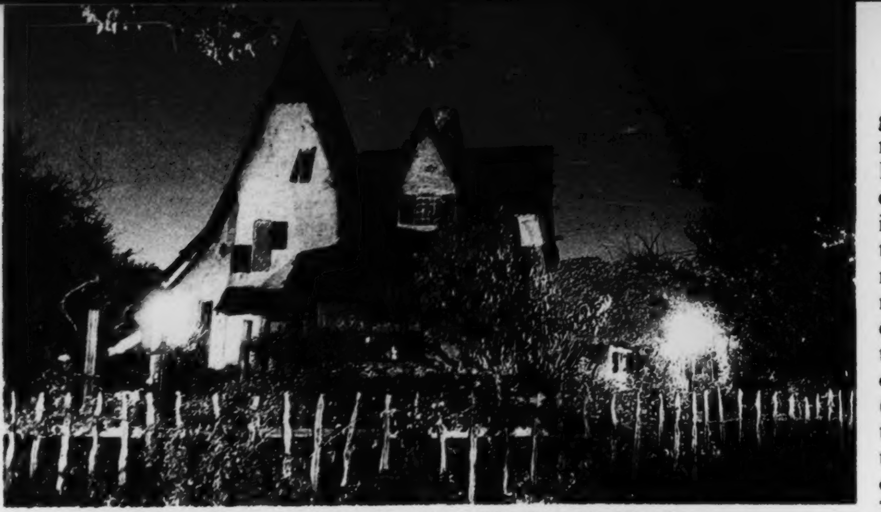
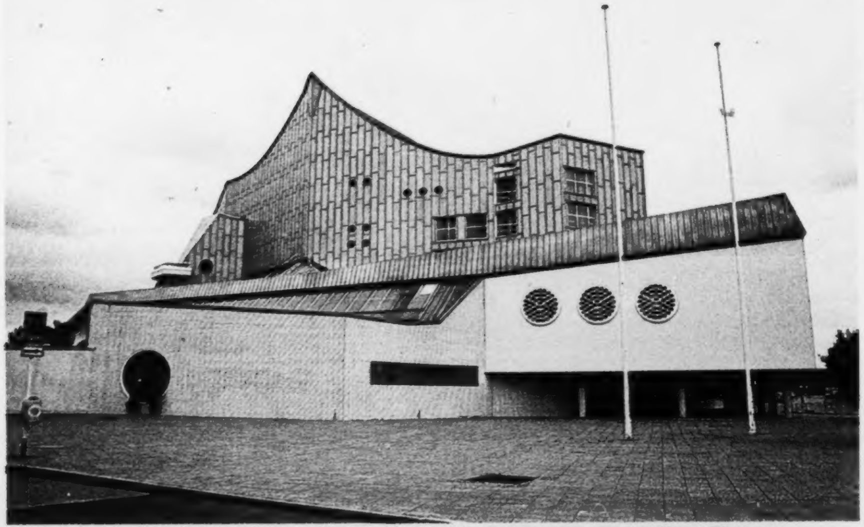
VOL
7
1
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI



Harry Oliver: "Witches' House," Beverly Hills, Calif., 1923. Photo Paul Ruscha.



Hans Scharoun: Die Philharmonie, West Berlin, 1960–63. Photo Rosemarie Haag Bletter.

Frank Gehry: Gehry House, Santa Monica, Calif., 1978. Photo Tim Street-Porter.

great champion of functionalism did not comment on was how successfully Mendelsohn integrated the observatory dome into his total composition, making it appear as natural an outgrowth of the design as it might have been were it not an integral programmatic requirement. The firmness of Mendelsohn's conception led one contemporary critic to surmise, incorrectly, that the name of the building referred to a monolith (ein Stein, or a single stone) rather than, as it actually did, to the name of the world-famous physicist.[9] Yet there can be no confusion over the Einstein Tower's position as one of the true milestones of modern architecture; it is a continuing inspiration to architects who seek to diverge from the expected way.

Once building activity began to revive to a significant degree after 1923, a curious role reversal began to occur: presented with the opportunity to aid in the postwar reconstruction of Germany and the eradication of the appalling housing conditions that had severely worsened since the war, several of the most radical Expressionists turned their backs on stylistic pursuits that had no place in their urgent new work, while watered-down imitations of front-line Expressionism entered the architectural mainstream. Speaking of the phase that preceded this turn of events, Siegfried Giedion crankily wrote that "men who were later to do grimly serious work in housing developments abandoned themselves to a romantic mysticism, dreamed of fairy castles to stand on the peak of Monte Rosa."[10] This obvious reference to Bruno Taut slights his staggering imagination as much as his fine and exceptionally practical (though by no means grim) housing designs. How, then, does one characterize such efforts as Fritz Höger's well-known Chilehaus of 1923–24 in Hamburg, in which the familiar forms of Expressionism were marshalled ostensibly to mimic the form of an ocean liner for this shipping company office building, placing the demands of an architecture parlante ahead of all other meaning?

Another popularized offshoot of Expressionism dating from the same late phase of the movement is the Goetheanum, the great auditorium built in Dornach, Switzerland, to the designs of the mystic philosopher and founder of Anthroposophy, Rudolf Steiner. Replacing an earlier, Jugendstil-inspired Goetheanum he designed and had built at Dornach from 1913–20, this second version was based on Steiner's very schematic model (vaguely resembling a bust of Darth Vader) that was detailed and executed after Steiner's death by Ernst Aisenpries and a team of other collaborators. Like the Einstein Tower, the Goetheanum recalls little other architecture, although the Goetheanum's similarity to an inflated version of van de Velde's Cologne Exhibition theater seems clear enough. Though an impressive tour de force of concrete construction, the Goetheanum is a marginal curiosity, superficially Expressionist in style while remaining, under its forcefully modeled exterior, basically as modern as the Wagner Festspielhaus at Bayreuth.

More properly associated with the Expressionists are the architects of the Amsterdam School, whose experiments with form and material predated the postwar German developments by several years because of Holland's neutrality in the conflict. The expressive handling of red brick—the predominant material employed by the Amsterdam School architects—had its origins in the strong Dutch Art Nouveau crafts tradition of which such works as the Scheepvaarthuis of 1911–16 by Johan van der Meij must be seen as a late example. The most important and extensive product of the Amsterdam School was the Eigen Haard housing estate of 1917–19 by Michel de Klerk. The medievalizing character of Eigen Haard—picturesque vistas, quaintly archaic forms and village-like clusterings within the larger scheme—avoids the triviality of Hollywood haunted houses or of architecture-as-something-else by virtue of its morphological originality and semi-abstractness. The distinctive red brick tower designed by de Klerk is not, as it would have been in the Middle Ages, the sign of a church, nor, as it would have been in a Kitsch village, appropriate for some totally incongruous use—a snack bar, say, or a subway kiosk. At Eigen Haard it is merely, though effectively, decorative, and the honesty with which de Klerk treats it is echoed in the straightforwardness and honesty of the rest of the ensemble.

It would seem likely that the virtuoso brickwork of the Amsterdam School influenced that of Behrens's IG Farben headquarters and Höger's Chilehaus, though it is interesting to note that it wasn't widely imitated in the German housing estates designed by the former Expressionist radicals. They knew what the architects in this country were to realize with the onset of the Great Depression: that the kind of careful craftsmanship and costly detailing required to convey the expressionistic effects so easily attainable on paper could be executed only at considerable expense in real architecture. That fact, as much as anything else, led to the demise of a style that ranks among the briefest candles in the history of art. When it came down to a question of human needs versus artistic aims, the truly revolutionary architects of post-World War I Germany did not hesitate to come down on the side of the former.

It is important to remember that the Bauhaus itself began with an Expressionist phase, and that its subsequent shift to a machinelike esthetic was not accompanied immediately by equivalent means of production: much of what seemed industrially produced was in fact as laboriously crafted as that of the earlier Expressionist period. But what was genuine was the realization among the artists and architects of the Bauhaus of the role economics would play in the success or failure of their program. That imperative, more than anything else, was responsible for the shift, as it was much later on in this country, when modern architecture triumphed over Classicism and Art Deco, the last (until Post-Modernism) of the decorated styles.

The fact that successive periods still try to identify works of their own times with the fruit of Expressionism's brief, feverish season attests to its power.

Ever since the reawakened interest in Expressionist architecture began there have been repeated attempts to co-opt subsequent architecture as Expressionistic. Le Corbusier's boldly modeled Notre-Dame-du-Haut at Ronchamp, France, of 1950–55 was inevitably included in studies of Expressionist architecture, as was Hans Scharoun's Philharmonie of 1960–63 in West Berlin—the latter somewhat more understandable because of Scharoun's association, albeit some 40 years earlier, with the Gläserne Kette. Both those buildings share the jutting, prow-like roofline that is seen as an easy emblem of Expressionist architecture, though the interiors of neither structure carry the claim much further. Although the chapel at Ronchamp has survived well, weathering the eclipse of critical interest in Le Corbusier's Brutalist phase, the Philharmonie has fared less happily. The exterior of the Scharoun building suffers from the state of its shoddy materials; the interior, in better repair, seems extremely dated by its excessively crafted finishes, resembling some early-'60s cruise ship, the S.S. Caligari. Nevertheless, set against the tepidly pseudo-Classical concert halls built in America at the same time, it appears no worse than an honest failure.

One recent work with allegedly Expressionist tendencies is Frank Gehry's own house of 1976–78 in Santa Monica. Its aggressively protruding forms, its unsettling use of unconventional materials and its resolutely anti-rationalist tone all qualify it as this generation's entry to the roster of new claimants to the ranks of Expressionism. That such latter-day works can hardly be absorbed in any real way into the canon would have been especially clear to the architects of Expressionism themselves, some of whom spent only a fraction of their creative lives in the creation of work that can be deemed authentically Expressionist. But the fact that successive periods still seek to identify architecture of their own times with the works of that short, feverish and thoroughly unique moment is the most convincing evidence of the hold that Expressionism still has on the minds of architects of imagination. ☐

---

1. Henry-Russell Hitchcock, Architecture: Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, New York, Penguin Books, 1977, p. 464.
2. Bruno Taut, "Ein Architektur-Programm," Berlin, 1918.
3. Rosemarie Haag Bletter, "The Interpretation of the Glass Dream—Expressionist Architecture and the History of the Crystal Metaphor," Journal of the Society of Architectural Historians, Mar. 1981, pp. 20–43.
4. Ibid., p. 34.
5. Rosemarie Haag Bletter, "Kurt Schwitters' Unfinished Rooms," Progressive Architecture, Sept. 1977, p. 99.
6. Ibid.
7. Dennis Sharp, Modern Architecture and Expressionism, New York, George Braziller, 1966, p. 119.
8. Siegfried Giedion, Space, Time and Architecture: The Growth of a New Tradition, Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1941, p. 486.
9. Gustav Adolf Platz, Die Baukunst der neusten Zeit, Berlin, 1927, p. 70.
10. Giedion, p. 486.

Author: Martin Filler is editor of House & Garden and frequently writes criticism on architecture and design.

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

Chicago International Art 1983 Exposition

May 19-24, 1983
Navy Pier, Chicago

For more information:
Chicago International Art Exposition CIAE
600 North McClurg Court
Chicago, Illinois 60611 USA
312.787.6858

Chicago International Art Exposition

A Project of the Lakeside Group

Review of Exhibitions

NEW YORK

Rebecca Howland at ABC No Rio

On the lower East Side in the lot behind ABC No Rio, Rebecca Howland, current president of Colab, the artists' group that runs this alternative museum, has built a large, outdoor fountain. It works in the following way: water is pumped from a tank in the ground up to the ocher and black cement mountains atop the piece whence water trickles down to the bottom again by two routes.

One way for the water to flow is through a transparent tube, down a little two-lane highway, under a miniature bridge resembling the one at the west end of Canal Street. After passing under the bridge, the water emerges into a large boat-shaped trough painted electric green with copper-colored squiggles on its side and a little cement World Trade Center near its tip. It then passes through a hose and into an hourglass-shaped pool. There, five miniature oil storage tanks with the names "Shell," "Exxon," "Gulf," "Occidental" and "Mobil" on them are depicted as being in flames.

From the hourglass pool, the water gurgles down a three-stepped staircase whose sides are decorated with carvings of big frogs. While the water goes down the stairs, the frogs go up it, in some cases licking the behind of the frog in front. Having descended the stairs, the water ends up in a small pentagonal pool whose bottom sports the GE logo in each corner. Water also shoots into the pentagon pool from six life-size play machine guns in profile. Their far sides are rigged with tubing in squiggly patterns while their near sides are covered with intestinal forms in high relief.

Rebecca Howland: Brainwash, 1982, cement, wood, steel, fiberglass and water, 20 by 10 by 10 feet; at ABC No Rio. Photo Tom Warren.

Dennis Oppenheim: Formula Compound, activated July 1982, Battery Park landfill, N.Y.C. (review on p. 116).

The other water route is shorter and more direct. It runs out of the mountains into an amphitheater-oculus shape, pours down a cement form that resembles an executioner's block, and splashes over a large relief of the human brain studded with bottle caps. After bouncing off the brain, whose Structalite shell is rapidly wearing away, water falls into the hourglass pool and down the frog staircase.

Some water does not make this full route and falls behind the brain into a cavern or grotto beneath the mountains. There water clings to the metal armature of the brain, drips over a wall imbedded with images of diamonds and coal, and falls into a white eye-shaped pool reflecting the oculus above.

Other incidents not directly involving the flow of water include a large, standing geological table in low relief showing the composition of coal and oil in reverse evolution, beginning with representations of a money bag and a severed human head at the bottom. These two forms recur in three dimensions as the round "feet" of the legs supporting the hourglass pool—or pooltable. The geological table supports the mountain range, as does a column of black bombs shown exploding into red-orange flames above the mountains, so as simultaneously to suggest a volcano and reflect the sheet-metal oil flames below. Scattered around the site are small electrical transmission towers made of orange metal rods. One tower contains a large, fractured lightbulb reminiscent of the General Electric logo. Standing alone near the hourglass pool is a lifesize plaster sculpture of an upside-down hot pink strapless '50s-style dress. Its curvy elevation rhymes with the angular plan of the hourglass pool. Peering down into the dress sculpture, we see at the bottom a small carving whose forms are hard to make out, but which supposedly shows two people fucking.

The fountain's overall shape can be read in several ways—as a festooned boat, as a map of Lower Manhattan, as a fractured geography lesson, as a chart of America's skewed economic priorities, and as an architectural model of the artist's mind. Its concerns are feminist, ecological and broadly political. Money is depicted as the bottom line and human life as the price that has to be paid for exploiting the environment. The mountains are shown being strip mined. The old-fash-

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

Al Held: R II, 1982, liquitex acrylic on canvas, 9 by 12 feet; at Andre Emmerich.

Works by Malcolm Morley, Claes Oldenburg and Julian Schnabel in "The Expressionist Image" at Janis (review on p. 119).

Carolee Schneemann: Maximus at Gloucester, 1963, mixed mediums, 29 by 73 by 15 inches; at Max Hutchinson (review on p. 120).

ioned, Boris-and-Natasha-style bombs are a literal support system for the mining. The guns are covered with guts—playing upon the murder-and-victim motif. Depending on how you see it, the pentagon pool either controls GE or is its subsidiary. Howland seems to allude here to President Reagan's public relations stint for the company and to the fact that GE is one of America's largest arms producers. The motif of one frog licking another's ass may comment on the relation of government to industry and point up nature's mockery of man.

The fountain does not explicitly condemn this state of affairs so much as it subtly draws our attention to it. The fountain's political content can be seen as both naive and knowing because its forms are so cute. Howland's choice of materials and techniques, mostly primitive casting in cement and plaster together with assemblage, is part of a larger Cave Girl esthetic which attempts to subvert the machismo of high tech. Likewise, her imagery deconstructs male figures of speech. We do not look up the pink dress but down it. Her sculpture proposes many comparable overturned clichés, hence new feminist prototypes.

The fountain has aspects both of a work-in-progress and a piece in decay. Its brain in particular is falling apart. And by involving our empathy as well as the artist's ambition, it manages, in the end, to live up to its own name: Brainwash. —Brooks Adams

Dennis Oppenheim at Art on the Beach

After several years of making large, hybrid machine works, Dennis Oppenheim lately has been building related structures that are more temporary, intended for the enactment of a single event. While his machinery pieces alluded to a variety of complex cerebral and machinic processes, his more recent "Fireworks" series celebrates singular and convulsive moments of intensity. One piece in the series, a sort of pyrotechnic Rube Goldberg device called Formula Compound. (A Combustion Chamber). (An Exorcism)., was set off one night late last July at Manhattan's Art on the Beach.

In the 1970s Oppenheim occasionally characterized his art works as "launching pads" for ideas. With his fireworks pieces the rocket metaphor becomes literal: elaborate, large-scale metal armatures are loaded with projectiles arrayed on large pinwheels and tilted ramps, and layered onto racks like banks of sacred candles in a myriad of interconnected systems. The construction at Art on the Beach suggested both an overblown, Hollywood version of a mad scientist's laboratory and the ramshackle relic of a lost industrial era.

The ignition of a single fuse triggered a chain reaction of the projectiles on the launching structure. Situated in the hallucinatory urban vacuum of the Battery Park landfill, Oppenheim's work threw off rockets for half an hour, tracing overlapping inscriptions and lines of flight in the night sky. Once ignited, the piece performed autonomously, operating out of control. Numerous rockets shot out in low trajectories at high speeds into the attending crowd of several hundred, causing spectators to run for cover; other rockets landed amidst traffic on West Street. Clearly, Oppenheim is now asking his audience to take risks along with him.

Throughout his abundant career Oppenheim has formulated what might be called a physics of thought, in which dynamic activities of consciousness are realized through material operations. Resolutely anti-Cartesian, he insists that physical crystallizations of thought can be catalytic processes, generating new and unexpected syntheses. In the "Fireworks" series, the incandescent expenditure of fireworks, their volatility and potential hazards, the play of chance, all objectify Oppenheim's vision of creative activity. That fireworks are most fully materialized at the instant of dissolution also ties into his consistent concern with a threshold zone between physical and non-physical states. Some of Oppenheim's aspirations are almost alchemical; the words "conversion," "transformation," "passage" and "way station" occur in the titles of recent works, bespeaking his desire to "activate matter at a higher level."

But the fireworks pieces are self-dissipating and, like some other Oppenheim work, seem haunted by the prospect of exhaustion. In the late 1970s, in his Dry Wells, his poisoned soil pieces, the Death Holes, and his Exit Ramp for the South Bronx, this exhaustion could have social, physical and intellectual ramifications. The "Fireworks" event also reads as a social image, recalling Jean Baudrillard's reflections on the burn-out, saturation and implosion of late capitalism. Particularly against the colossal, nocturnal backdrop of the New York financial district, Oppenheim's piece occurred as a spectacle of self-depletion, as the incarnation of a cultural apparatus in which production and consumption are no longer separable.

—Jonathan Crary

Elaine de Kooning: Bacchus #20, 1980, acrylic on canvas, 84 by 66 inches; at Gruenebaum (review on p. 119).

Martin Disler: Unknown Soldier, 1982, oil on canvas, 112 by 135 inches; at Multiples/Marion Goodman.

Al Held at Emmerich

Certainly one of the hardest things for an artist to do these days is to make abstract paintings that are imbued with formal rigor, spatial invention and a sense of high moral purpose. Al Held's paintings aspire to these old-fashioned virtues, but at some risk, for he presents us with a number of pictorial strategies that allude to an ideal world of order and grandeur.

In some of Held's new paintings we look into a cage of curved and angular scaffolding; we seem to be seeing but a portion of an endless expanding structure. Other works present interior spaces formed by planes of sweet, almost lurid, color that are both defined and interrupted by thin bands of different color; these bands move with angular and quirky steps across the surface of the painting and into its depths.

The most problematic of these new works is Rome II (9 by 18 feet). Held spent several months last year at the American Academy in Rome, and the Eternal City is invoked in this huge painting as an interior space of great power and measure. But its illusion of zero gravity suggests a fantasy of the future as well as a vision of the past. Indeed, Held is so relentless in his pursuit of spatial dynamics that he seems indifferent to the sci-fi overtones of his paintings. This brings up some interesting problems as we try to relate his work to contemporary reality.

In modernism the ideal of an optimistic geometry goes back to such post-Cubist movements as Constructivism and the Bauhaus. For all their differences, Léger, Mondrian and El Lissitzky shared a vision neither clouded by the personal anxiety of Expressionism nor undermined by the morass of the Surrealist unconscious. This vision had no irony. But since World War II it has been almost impossible for artists to deal optimistically with geometry. Stella's black paintings used geometry as a last resort, an anti-metaphor: What you see is what you get. Lichtenstein mocked Art-Deco geometry in his "Modern Painting" series. And Color-Field painters used geometry simply as an anonymous container for the energy of color. Only in the dated modernism (itself now under attack) of much contemporary architecture is there any consistent retention of an optimistic geometry.

When Held sets out to reverse all this skepticism regarding geometric purity, he goes it alone (except for some younger artists he influenced while teaching at Yale). Rome II is so serene, so ordered and so aspirational that it can't be our own time that it alludes to. It must be about some as yet unattainable future. Held's risk is that of a Cartesian who will be seen as Buck Rogers. —Paul Brach

Martin Disler at Marian Goodman

Through magazines and repetitive group shows we are now familiar with the "look" of most of the art chosen to represent the new European painting, but we have yet to see many of these artists as independent figures. Martin Disler, a Swiss painter, has been in just

VOL
71
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

With Winsor & Newton's new Artists' Acrylic Colours we've made only one concession to the ordinary.

Permanent
WINSOR & NEWTON
ARTISTS' ACRYLIC COLOUR
Violet Quinacridone
Permanentviolett
Violeta Quinacridona
60ml ℮ 2 US
Burnt Sienna
WINSOR & NEWTON
ARTISTS' ACRYLIC COLOUR
Terre de Sienne Brûlée
Siena, gebrannt
Terra de Siena Tostada
Permanence AA SL
60ml ℮ 2 US fl
Quinacridone
WINSOR & NEWTON
ARTISTS' ACRYLIC COLOUR
Rouge Quinacridone
Permanentrot
Rojo Quinacridono
Permanence A SL (3)
60ml ℮ 2 US fl o

You'd hardly expect Artists' Acrylics from Winsor & Newton to be ordinary, and they're not! They're every bit as extraordinary as all our world-famous Artists' Colours. Many of the pigments used are identical to those in our other high-quality products so they provide outstanding brilliance and permanence. Their smooth, creamy consistency is unequalled and the unique formulation ensures a durable paint film that is waterproof when dry, permanently flexible and will not yellow with age.

The only concession we've made in presenting this exceptional new line is the size of the tubes in which we've put it. They're the standard, convenient 2 fl. oz. tubes artists prefer.

Competitively priced, Winsor & Newton's new Artists' Acrylics in 33 marvelous colours, plus white, are now available wherever Winsor & Newton artists' materials are sold. Look for them or send for our Special Introductory Set (an $8.95 value for only $5.95) by completing the coupon below. You'll probably never settle for ordinary acrylics again! Winsor & Newton Inc., 555 Winsor Drive, Secaucus, New Jersey 07094.

WINSOR & NEWTON
1832 150th ANNIVERSARY 1982

Mail to: Winsor & Newton,
555 Winsor Drive,
Secaucus, NJ 07094.

Please send me an Introductory Set of Artists' Acrylic Colours for which I'm enclosing $5.95 (U.S. Check or Money Order only.) Set contains six #8 tubes (21 ml each). Offer expires: June 30, 1983. Limit: one set per customer.

Offer not available in Canada. Please allow 4 to 6 weeks for delivery.

Name ____________________

Address ____________________

____

____________________ Zip ________

AIA 1/83

Time and expense aren't our main concern. Quality is.

such a limbo. Although duly certified by exhibitions in Europe, appearances in several summer smorgasbords here, and by inclusion in Documenta, Disler had not till now had a one-man show in New York, and what was here demonstrated was just how various are the attitudes and accomplishments marshaled under the banner of the New Expressionism.

It seems more and more that the only common denominator for this broad tendency is personal drive and agitated paint surfaces. The smash-and-grab strategy employed by artists such as Immendorff or Middendorf, or the ironic or formal eclecticism of Penck and Kiefer share more with Schnabel's hasty grandstanding and Salle's schooled cleverness than with anything Disler has produced. Indeed, Disler appears to want from the New Expressionism pretty much what the old had to offer—art as purgative, art as transcendent aggression. Accordingly, for all their straining after catharsis, these paintings have a vaguely old-fashioned look.

In essence, Disler's assumptions are simple: sex, pain and violence are the taboos of the bourgeoisie, and regressive drawing is a means to point up the vacuity of artistic good manners. As the stuff of manifestos, such insights are hardly very exciting, and at times the smeary, coded genitalia, grimacing heads and flailing limbs border on cliché. But the scale and ambition of Disler's work are capable of forcing it beyond the banal impertinence of his ideas.

Scale is perhaps the most important variable. Certainly, the drawings, which are small, are the weakest part of this show. With few exceptions they seem to have come into existence too quickly for invention to have a chance against vehemence, and their resemblance to poster-paintings pinned up in kindergarten is too literal for there to be any dynamic tension between infantile immediacy and adult alienation. The paintings, however, manage to be convincing even when they are predictable. Disler has recently executed a huge mural enclosure at the museum in Württemburg, and clearly, grand scale puts the sort of pressure on the artist that is needed to harness his manic hand. Though the paintings in this show are not contiguous they are large and do function almost as episodes in a single piece of work. Their narrative drama is based on images of war, plane crashes and boisterous lovemaking, but the pictures' real drama is in the graphic bite of Disler's line, the chalky beige-blue-lavender washes and the sudden shifts of context and size in the laying out of his emblematic shapes.

In the final analysis, though, this work is satisfying without really being moving. One can only guess at the cause, but it seems as if Disler's determination to be serious, to be an expressionist in an historically understood manner, has made him dampen a grim humor latent in much of the drawing. Seriousness and urgency are not always the best weapons against a jaded public, and one hopes that the satiric edge blurred in so many of these pictures will soon be sharpened and brought into plain view. —Robert Storr

Elaine de Kooning at Gruenebaum

To start with, I must state, without equivocation, that this selection from her series of "Bacchus" paintings is the strongest and most lyrical show by this painter that I can remember in almost 30 years of E. de K. watching. (It is also true that I did not get a chance to see her recent retrospective of portraits at the Port Washington Gallery, Oct. 11–29.)

The "Bacchus" series started some years ago, when, in Paris on a teaching assignment from the New York Studio School, the artist happened to be walking in the Jardins de Luxembourg and came upon a bronze figure group on a pedestal, the work of the 19th-century sculptor Jules Dalou. Seized by this vision of a work environed by sky and foliage, she made some 50 watercolors and drawings on the spot, and afterwards, back in the United States, she began an ever-multiplying series of much larger acrylic paintings. Later, she returned to Paris and made more on-the-spot studies; still more acrylic painting followed.

The subject of Dalou's exuberant group is Bacchus riding a rearing horse; indeed, the animal would already have pitched him headlong were it not for a chorus of Bacchantes keeping him in place and restraining his mount. This 19th-century version of Baroque sculpture gives off a melody of excitement, a rising crescendo held in check by solid structural strategies, and it is this tension between soaring and restraint that held de Kooning's interest, and eventually made her captive.

Each painting, then, is the same in subject, and even in general aspect. Nonetheless, as with Monet's 20 views of Rouen cathedral, each is made unique by the way it is painted. Color and mood clearly comprise the dominant variables. For de Kooning, the Dalou sculpture must have long ago ceased to be "art," becoming instead as much a part of "nature" as the environment. Having found a congenial subject, she could relax, almost forget, and so practice the art of painting in the way she knows best—as a means of spontaneous invention. It is the colors that excite me. There are washes of color, thick colors, hidden colors, twisting ribbons of color, shards of color, colors as piercing as spears, colors which churn and curdle like milk or sea foam—and always there are Baroque rhythms of colors.

The English word "color" comes from the Latin color, which is in turn related to the Latin verb celare, meaning "to hide." De Kooning's color, always a kind of writing in paint rather than a blanket stretching from line to line, usually tends to cover or hide her forms. She paints the figures in these canvases as totalities of foliage, sky, and metal surfaces that respond to the dominating light and weather; then she manages to recover the presence of the motifs by the use of a supple line brushed atop the colors. The latter technique is somewhat reminiscent of the way Cézanne occasionally restated the edge of a form he had lost in the blur where one color plane impinges upon another. These lines in her paintings make a second voice, polyphonal to the others, within the total orchestration of these superb works. —Lawrence Campbell

"The Expressionist Image" at Janis

"The Expressionist Image: American Art from Pollock to Today" was a prominent event of the fall season in New York. A tastefully and meticulously assembled collection of work by 27 artists, it brought together works by younger New York artists (including Borofsky, Longo, Fischl, Haring, Salle, Rothenberg, Schnabel, Zakanitch) with those of the '50s and very early '60s by Johns, Pollock, Kline, Rivers, de Kooning, Segal, Bourgeois, Oldenburg, Rauschenberg, and others. While it offered a variety of pleasures, cunning juxtapositions, and some rarely seen work, it was also a show with an appearance of judiciousness and intelligibility. It seemed like a sober, thoughtful pull back from the cacophonous arena of the current art scene, as if finally someone were imposing order and perspective on recent developments.

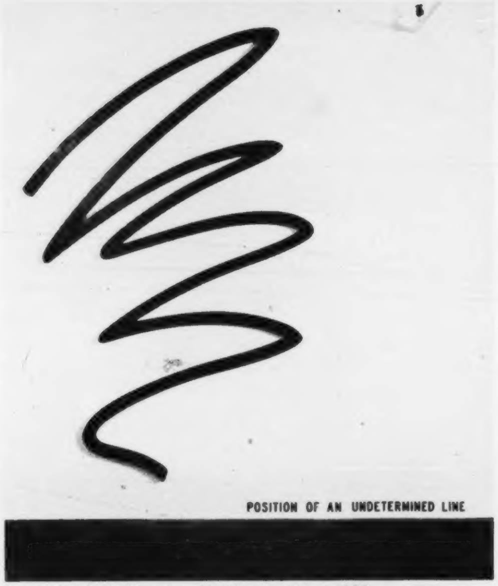
Unfortunately the museumlike ambience and the semblance of reasonableness masked the primary functions of the show and the willful confusion at its core. Granted, it's easy to nitpick with the content of any historical or thematic exhibition; but in this case, the scattershot, all-inclusive selection effectively obliterated the significance of the word "expressionist." When Johns and Rauschenberg, along with a highly disparate aggregation of younger painters, are all made into "expressionists," when Pollock, Gorky and Kline unproblematically become painters of "images," it is no longer a matter of discussing intellectual positions, however questionable. When critical terms are used so indifferently, as fashionable tags sounding appropriately art-historical, then anything can be made to fit with anything else, anything can descend from anywhere.

The show, to no one's surprise, served to create an auspicious climate for the promotion of contemporary painting. Complementing the hard sell under way at many galleries, it undertook the delicate task of establishing good bloodlines for newer painters. Official confirmation of noble parentage is essential for selling racehorses and on the fast tracks of today's art world apparently important for emerging artists. But in addition to genealogical certification the older work performed a talismanic service: Pollock's Number 19 and Gorky's Water of the Flowery Mill, objects of almost mystical status, infuse any nearby painting with small quantities of aura by virtue of sheer proximity. At the same time the show invoked the excitement (and opportunities) of the heroic postwar years of American painting and constructed a national cultural heritage for those wary of art with a German or Italian flavor.

To refute the historical narrative and notion of causality implied here is beside the point. In a sense any reading of history is true when it is dominant and effective. And if the desultory "reading" here can be said to hold sway now, it is as part of a much wider cultural phenomenon—as a symptom of the general neo-conservative effacement and depreciation of the advanced art and counter-cultural politics of the '60s. In a show that presumes to trace a continuity in American art, not just painting, there is a remarkable wasteland of 14 years, from 1961 to 1975. Only two works from this period are included, by the idiosyncratic figures of Neil Jenney and Philip Guston, who became influential only in the mid 1970s. In even the most cursory examination of the fate of "expressionism" in Ameri-

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

Salvatore Scarpitta: Moondog, 1982; metal, glass, canvas, 119 by 114 by 58 inches; at Castelli Greene Street.



POSITION OF AN UNDETERMINED LINE

Bernar Venet: Position of an Undetermined Line, 1982, at Bonlow (review on p. 122)

can art, documentation of Robert Smithson's Asphalt Rundown, Richard Serra's Splashing, or scores of other '60s art works would have been more pertinent than much of the work included here, regardless of how loosely one defines the word "image."

It seems important now to respond to such a narrative with an alternate history or counter-memory, one that will preserve and affirm those dimensions of Pollock, Johns and Rauschenberg that this show suppresses. What these and other artists did in the '50s was to point toward an immense range of possible operations, materials, processes that could be deployed over a much wider physical and social terrain, that in part nourished the work of Smithson, Kaprow, Serra, Morris, Hesse, Oppenheim, Levine and many others in the '60s. It is their experiments and achievements that are excluded as options for young artists today by the lineage suggested in this show. Instead, Pollock et al. are inscribed within a narrow tradition in which "expressionism" is a neutral, timeless stylistic possibility and in which art making is synonymous with the production of pedigreed painting. —Jonathan Crary

Carolee Schneemann at Max Hutchinson

Debris juts out and settles in among coagulated thicknesses of gestural painting: composts of rope and lace, shards of glass and mirror, wood fragments, ribbons, egg shells and sea shells, tattered and paint-smattered umbrellas, photographs and shreds of tar roofing. One montage, Pandora (1963), bears the stenciled word "SCRAP"; another, Native Beauties (1962-64), has a glassed-over paper clipping proclaiming "DEPOSIT." These 30 works from the '60s—exhibited here for the first time—are indeed scraps and deposits, but not static ones. Bright and soft colored lights blink; motorized parts whirr with chirring, clickety sounds; glass stalactites clink against one another.

In 1960 a favorite tree in front of Schneemann's Illinois house was felled by a tornado. From the resulting wreckage she evolved a performance in which the participants were to pick out pathways through the obstacles posed by the fallen branches, overturned rocks and uprooted vegetation. Her assemblages propose analogous mental courses, analogous enactments of loss and recovery.

Maximus at Gloucester (1963) is a large—roughly 7 by 3 feet—conglomerate of wood, rusty wire, decaying nets and ropes and more, all found on the beach near the home of the poet Charles Olson. These disparate fragments are unified, however, by Schneemann's use of paint. Colors—greens, pinks, blues and yellows—and application—at times a thin wash, at times pasty thick, at times de Kooning creamy—suggest unexpected correspondences between, for example, a bit of wood and a photographed swatch of green tweed. Other photographs—of a woman's cheek, eye and nose, of a breast, a torso—are also embedded in these varying hues and thicknesses of paint. Two long, centrally located blades of mirror reflect our own splintered presence in among these shards from Olson's landscape.

This work is a visual parallel of Olson's enterprise as a poet in which the body of the poet (the breath), ancient Mayan civilizations and the history of Gloucester and its citizens, past and present, are all looped into the web of a poem. In 1963, in fact, Olson was researching the family tree of James Tenney, then Schneemann's husband (photographs of whom appear, alongside those of Schneemann herself, in many of the exhibited works). Not coincidentally, the shape of the central pondlike area of Maximus at Gloucester is reminiscent of the configuration of Illinois where the couple used to live. We see the enactment of Olson's lines in his poem "Maximus, to Gloucester": "He sd, 'You go all around the subject.' And I sd, 'I didn't know it was a subject.' "

Sir Henry Francis Taylor (1961), a smaller work on masonite, shows us the titled poet as photographed by Julia Margaret Cameron. ("I was photographed, I think, almost every day.") His white-bearded head is cupped pensively in his hand, his arm apparently leaning on a red swing. Paint—mostly rich reds and browns—slurs down past him, eddying by a pair of torn men's underpants, past a plaster sculpture in the manner of Seymour Lipton (one of Schneemann's teachers), past cigar-box labels, a map of Illinois, a recessed tinsel echo of that map. Down, down goes the paint, catching in its sludge smiling pin-ups and shreds of a de Kooning reproduction. The old patriarch ("immortalized" by a woman, for whose camera he also played various Shakesperean and mythological roles) leans atop the toy swing of childhood, looking out over the roles women have played.

The point of view in these works is insistently female—not feminine. Womanliness is not set apart from or contrasted to objects associated with men and actual images of men, but is deliberately couched within the context of a life shared with men, as well as with women, and recycled through the stuff of its wake.

But, just as these works refuse physical stasis, neither are they intended as static mental fallout, as reminiscence for its own sake. Rather, their aim is regenerative. Tellingly, these montages and paintings are not the side- or after-effects of the performance work for which Schneemann is best known. They, like the fallen tree of 1960, function to generate elements which are transposed in performance to a larger arena, to the more immediate but less contemplative space and time of action. Conversely, in that "real" space and time of her theater Schneemann often folds back to the distancing space of the depicted. Performers become "particles bombarding space," audiences are "wedges," light sources swirl and flick like paintbrushes. To fault (as some have) these assemblages for turning inwards (narcissistically to Schneemann's personal life), or derivatively backwards (to the visual languages of men such as Schwitters, Rauschenberg or Cornell) is to ignore the very core of this artist's transformative enterprise.

—Julia Ballerini

Brice Marden at Pace

Cézanne is supposed to have said once that he wanted to make paintings that had the permanent aura of those in museums. It is a remark that rings true both in its humanity and in its frank acknowledgement of the bond between formal modernism and the classical tradition. Brice Marden does not rival Cézanne as an unconscious radical, but he has always been comparably direct in expressing his admiration for the masters of classical reserve, from the Spanish Baroque to the present. As with Cézanne, admiration is here a form of ambition.

There are natural dangers for an artist who so explicitly declares the intent to make "museum art." When does the desire to make "timeless" art become an empty piety? There are also rhetorical dangers for such an artist and for those who support his work. Some critics nervously cite Marden's esthetic lineage as if his monochrome panels needed exculpation or the blessing of the Holy Ghost of a painting tradition with clear human content. They do not. Nor do they need the sort of scattered apologetics one reads in this show's catalogue essay, which uses everyone and everything, from Heisenberg to the Victorian occult, to provide an "intellectual" context for Marden's art.

Marden can work a physical magic altogether free of parlor arcana. The paintings themselves speak plainly of his debt to Zurbarán, Johns and Reinhardt, while at the same time establishing their own independent presence and authority. There are nevertheless signs that Marden is restless with his early mastery.

All the work in this exhibition was done in the past couple of years, and yet in its diversity the show is almost like a mini-retrospective. In part this variety may come from the fact that unlike Rothko, to whom he has been compared, Marden arrived at his most fertile format with a relative lack of evolution. He now seems caught between cautious experimentation and a kind of graceful circling of his primary terrain. Thus, the ink and gouache "Melia" drawings are like disciplined Abstract-Expressionist exercises, while in the card-grids Marden appears still to be looking for a formal dynamic and a flexing line that would be his own equivalent to the faint fusain studies of Mondrian. The oil-on-paper paintings are similarly refined and deliberate, but do not really come to life.

Most remarkable of all the new work is a series of oil paintings on marble. Thinly applied bars of tone and color are set against the accidental edges and seeping mineral tints of the chosen fragments in a way that reminds one of Joel Shapiro's chalk drawings or, at times, of bits of archaic De Stijl geometries. They are extraordinarily seductive objects, but in their present state they owe too much to their preciousness of scale and to the uniqueness of the original stone scraps of which they are made.

These secondary formats provide the novelty and decorative charm of the show, but its real conviction is to be found in the multi-panel post-and-lintel paintings, especially the four-part Green Study and the solitary Black and White Study. Marden's greatest strength is not finally his capacity to orchestrate complexity but rather his ability to fabricate living wholes, and these latter two paintings have a pulse and an individuality unmatched by the work of any other contemporary artist sharing Marden's general concerns. Two such paintings an exhibition are enough to put Marden in the ideal company he imagines. —Robert Storr

Brice Marden: Marble #4, 1981, 9 3/8 by 32 3/4 by 3/4 inches, oil on marble; at Pace.

Ted Stamm: (left) SLDR-001, 1981-82, 67 by 186 inches, (right) ZCT-002, 30 by 210 inches, 1982, both oil on canvas; at Harm Bouckaert (review on p. 122).

Don Gummer: Spiral Crown, 1982, marble, mankado, slate, steel, 22 by 22 by 4 1/2 feet; installation on the Seagram Plaza, N.Y.C.

Salvatore Scarpitta at Castelli Greene St.

This compressed retrospective of Scarpitta's art (1958–1982) in Castelli's large space gave some perspective on a body of work that has never received the attention it deserves. Scarpitta was born in America but spent his formative years as an artist in Italy. He returned to the states in 1958 to work on a series of relief paintings made of canvas webbing. At the time I jokingly called them "trusses for a cosmic rupture." They still appear intensely physical, projecting the energy of Abstract Expressionism into a literal push-and-pull. As he continued with the webbing paintings into the early '60s he introduced more ready-made elements such as harnesses and buckles—like those of parachutists' gear or, as it turned out, racing drivers' safety belts.

As a kid Scarpitta had hung out at the Legion Ascot Speedway in Los Angeles. There he began a lifelong fascination with dirt-track racers. As the collective energy of Abstract Expressionism waned in the early '60s, Scarpitta took a major step into literalism and started constructing full-scale replicas of dirt-track racing cars. He made 13 cars, though only two were shown here. Rajo-Jack, 1964, is a homage to a black driver. The car is totally accurate in scale and specifics but is almost completely handmade; only the wheels are real. (Scarpitta balked at the idea of carving spokes). The car has a blunt immediacy; even its environment is suggested by a backdrop of two garage doors. In short, it is a labor of love that takes its permission from the '60s "de-definition" of art—the opening-up of art's possibilities.

In the early '70s Scarpitta was working on the frame of a car but didn't yet have the wheels. Struck by its resemblance to an Eskimo sled, he proceeded to do a series of sled works. These are more abstract than the cars. They depart from real sled prototypes and, in a way, return to the preoccupation with process that marked the earlier webbing pieces. Then late in the '70s Scarpitta made a wood-and-fabric construction based on a manger for deer. This particular function is obscure so we are able to see the piece in more formal terms. With this work he was once more again into abstract art.

Moondog, 1982, was the most recent piece in the show. It has something of the same immediacy that the cars have, but it works with metaphor rather than quotation. The found objects included in the piece are a fireman's circular rescue net bent to serve as both base and backdrop, and a metal shield of the type that protects X-ray technicians. The shield is the personage; it is crowned by a snake-like metal coil and crescent. Some of us will remember Moondog, the prophet-poet-beggar who stood for years on the same street in New York in his robes of olive drab blankets, with his Viking headdress and beard and all his curious opaque "thereness." Scarpitta's piece gets it all.

What happens to a gifted artist whose career develops outside the spotlight of stardom? Scarpitta provides the clue: he keeps on working. —Paul Brach

Don Gummer at Sperone Westwater Fischer and Seagram Plaza

Don Gummer's Spiral Crown, a thigh-high quasi-labyrinth in marble with shimmering slate panels spiraling out from it to shoulder height, successfully held its own this summer on Seagram Plaza where it was temporarily installed.

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

The spiraling panels' skyward tilt, coupled with the weight of the yellow and gray supporting stone, produced a ponderous rotational effect, which led the eye centrifugally to the steel and glass buildings above and beyond. The slate panels mediated between the partial labyrinth, scarcely legible as such, and the Park Avenue monoliths. Walking among the elements of the sculpture you felt both the labyrinth's concentration of space and the infinite upward expansion of the spiral.

Like Spiral Crown, the new wall pieces Gummer showed at Sperone Westwater Fischer in the spring were structured in two superimposed patterns, the outer one spiral or circular, and the inner one more amorphous. The wall pieces, however, are more pictorial, apparently weightless and much concerned with light. A few, like Silver Wind, seem to pinwheel kaleidoscopically. These works consist of lacquered or silver-leafed wooden grilles surmounted by arrangements of wood and silk screens. The screens are identical, but the grilles vary in length, color and shape so that they suggest a pattern without actually determining one. Gummer's introduction of color in these works, mainly reds and greens, enhances their pictorial properties, as does the fact that we are able to view them more schematically than his freestanding sculpture. Nevertheless, their presence is primarily a sculptural one, and pieces like Silver Wind negotiate a turbulent space between the viewer and the wall.

While a constructivist use of geometry continues to be an important part of Gummer's method, he keeps it unobtrusive. It is important to him that the viewer not feel compelled to ferret out compositional ratios. Like Gummer's materials, surfaces and workmanship, his arrangement of elements has a straightforward elegance. Apparently the spatial message of his pieces as transmitted in their gestalt is his major concern.

Gummer's earlier work was highly evocative of architectural forms, and seemed most clearly thoughtout along interior or infrastructural lines. This tendency raised some questions about scale and opened the pieces to unfortunate misreading as architectural models. Gummer has successfully eliminated that problem in his new work, where the circle or spiral of screens (or slate panels), by leading the eye outward from the sculptures, balances their sophisticated internal structures with a sense of the external. The structuring of these sculptures around dispersed groups of elements rather than in an enclosing framework is also an essential part of Gummer's tuning of their gestalt. He forces us to consider questions such as, How different can two patterns be and yet be read as a unit?, How can a pattern be suggested without actual definition?, and How do color shape and position effect these spatial readings?

Such questions imply that Gummer's sculpture may also be seen as an attempt to extrapolate from spatial perceptions to metaphysical or transcendental issues; in this respect he is more influenced by Mondrian than by recent sculpture. These new pieces represent Gummer's most highly developed statements to date concerning unity and disunity, pattern and chaos. —Paul Stimson

Ted Stamm at Harm Bouckaert

Ted Stamm's new paintings mark an important development in a career whose concerns were first cogently stated in the late '60s. Stamm was at that time developing his light, almost diaphanous Minimalist monochromes into achromatic "cancel" paintings in which all color or image was systematically obliterated by means of vehement eraser-fluid-like application of thick black paint over the entire picture surface. The effect was a complex one, wavering between coquettish expressivity (some of the original color seemed always to show through somewhere) and pure, determined nihilism. The monochromes, stripped of their chromatic lightness, had become extraordinarily dense, high-mass objects whose inertia seemed to press downward and back towards some invisible structural support. (Serra's sculpture would almost invariably come to mind.) In this way, Stamm's work had ceased being "painting" in any but the most superficial sense.

The recent show presented what might have passed, back in the Minimalist heyday, under the rubric of "objects" but, given the development of Minimalist ontology that this work represents, can be properly expressed perhaps only in terms of pure moment or quanta of force.

Of the eight works in the show, four were half-scale models, prototypes or drawings—any of which could be read as "programs" or specifications for the four principal works in the main gallery space. These latter consist of massive yet perfectly sleek aerodynamic shapes (though assembled from such decidely "slow" materials as wood stretcher and canvas), each spanning nearly 20 feet and rising (with one exception) no more than 30 inches. These works, which at first recall traditional rectangular canvases collapsed by the physics of acceleration, give way to an impression of extremely delicate tensor structures built according to machine rather than human tolerances. Thus the "front" ends of ZCT-002 and C-Dodger compress neatly into an acute 13 degree angle, making the rest of the work seem to develop in a long expanding horizontal sweep behind it or else appear as a lagging form of unconverted mass still caught in a state of becoming.

The works hang from the walls like paintings, but extremely low slung (four to 30 inches off the floor), hovering well below eye level in such a way as to resist traditional references such as the window; at the same time, this positioning frustrates the phenomenological tendency to physically posit a human viewer outside the painting as an intimate part of its structure. Within the shaped canvases Stamm has laid bold architectonic bands of black paint (one D-type painting uses silver paint) which read almost as beams or oblique edges of slabs of great weight and inertia. Though the surface is slick and utterly uniform, this is the same, ever-recurring Stamm-black which, since the first "cancel" paintings, has served as both nihilist erasure and signifier of mass and gravity.

Some of the complexity of these works derives from their close, floor-hugging positions where the obvious suggestion of gravity is in part subverted by the neat asymptotic tracer line that they form along the "horizon." Only SLDR-001 seems to have more mass than speed (and perhaps for this reason hovers closest to the floor), already an entropic element in a system making excessive demands on available energy. Stamm has succeeded in transforming the gallery into a field of pure force: no longer the static, metric articulations of body/non-body relationships of Minimalism, here all relations are virtualities in which terms are subject to instant conversion, where time seems to exist only as infinitesimal moments, and space only as a function of tensor variables. True, one experiences these works as sheer physical presences—but in terms of their effects. In a period when most important art has temporarily ceded the spotlight to frivolous celebration of tired modes and media, Stamm's work seems an important contribution to the field of post-Minimalist practice which, since Smithson, has continued in its attempt to found an ontology and theory of nature free from the metaphysics of objecthood.

—Sanford Kwinter

Bernar Venet at Bonlow

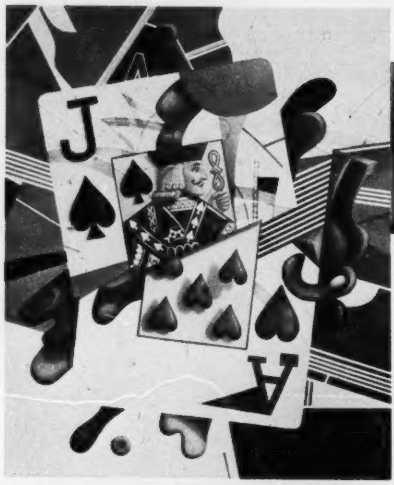
Spilling lazily along a wall or fluttering menacingly at a corner, the monumental calligraphic lines in Bernar Venet's new work are at odds with their glib mathematical captions. The lines, cut from plywood and coated with graphite—so that they are seen in relief, flickering above their shadows—parody the petulant gestures and illegible signatures of subway graffiti, albeit on an operatic scale. The phrase "Position of an Undetermined Line," repeated beneath each of the huge scribbles, domesticates them through classification, rather as if they were handwriting samples collected for analysis. During the last year, works of this type have been seen in New York at Bonlow, in Los Angeles at Malinda Wyatt and in Paris at Daniel Templon, where they have caused both fascination and confusion among viewers anticipating continued unambiguous elucidation of "The Rational Image"—the long-term project to which Venet has previously devoted himself.

The recent works are the most ambitiously scaled of Venet's mature work, the first to interact significantly with their architectural environment. This plus their peculiar juxtaposition of gesture and rationality, along with the ambiguity they introduce, makes these works particularly significant in the artist's development.

Venet became serious about "The Rational Image" in 1967, when he declared that from then on his artistic evolution would proceed along exclusively logical lines. Accordingly, he devised a program within which he would explore and present information from the frontiers of various theoretical sciences. At colleges, galleries and museums both here and abroad, Venet arranged lectures by scientists and presented various kinds of documentation (rational imagery) of material encountered in physics, astronomy, set theory, computer science and genetics. He structured this program according to a timetable which allowed for the treatment of a group of subjects annually from 1967 until the end of 1970, at which time his function as an artist would terminate. Guided by the principle that art should serve a purely didactic—and utterly unambiguous—function, he appropriated graphs, charts, diagrams and other single-message images encountered in his program and

The most beautiful savings account in the world. Rare limited editions.

Vasarely's "Door"
original serigraph
signed limited edition 325

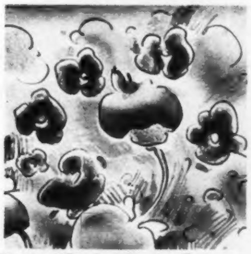


A word about Yankel Ginzburg.

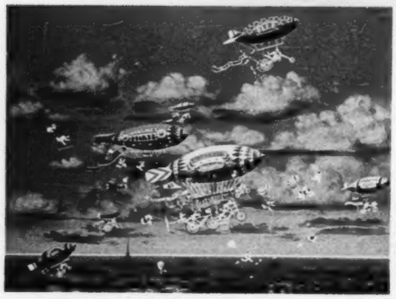
He is often referred to as the artist of the 21st century, combining color, patterns and his inventive mind to create his unique style.

Yankel Ginzburg was born in Russia, educated in Israel and Paris. He currently resides in Bethesda, Maryland. Many of his works have been displayed in the White House.

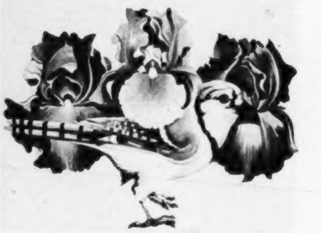
Yankel Ginzburg's "Blackjack"
original serigraph
signed limited edition of 275



Peter Max's "Spring"
original lithograph
signed limited edition of 280



Hiro Yamagata's "Sky Cycles"
original serigraph
signed limited edition of 275



Lowell Nesbitt's "Bluebird"
original serigraph
signed limited edition of 200

Imagine the thrill of surrounding yourself with your very own original art treasures by celebrated artists.

World-renowned artists like Dali and Max, Agam and Miro and other prominent artists like Adami, Vasarely, Serrier and Yvaral.

Martin Lawrence offers limited editions that everyone can afford. In fact, limited edition prints are one of the best investments you can find today, often appreciating as much as 30% a year or more.

To receive a full color catalog, send in the attached coupon or written request with a check for $7.00 (to be applied to first order) to Martin Lawrence Collectors Group at 7011 Hayvenhurst Avenue, Dept. AA1, Van Nuys, California 91406. Or call TOLL FREE 800/982-2222 (In California, call 213/988-0630).

Remember, you can receive your full color catalog at no obligation whatsoever. Take a minute, SEND FOR IT RIGHT NOW. And discover the pleasure of owning some of the most beautiful investments in the world.

Each print is individually numbered and hand-signed by the artist. Only a limited number of prints are ever made. A certificate of authenticity comes with each museum quality framed print which states the exact number of prints published.

You'll find the finest contemporary artists at Martin Lawrence. Artists whose works are likely to make sound business investments and exquisite additions to your living room, bedroom, den or office.

Yes! I want a full color catalog of original prints sent to me immediately. Enclosed is my check for $7.00.

MARTIN
LAWRENCE
COLLECTORS GROUP

7011 Hayvenhurst Ave., Dept. AA1
Van Nuys, California 91406

Name ____________________
Address ____________________
City __________ State ______ Zip ______
Telephone (   ) ____________________

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

translated them into drawings and paintings.

At the close of 1970 Venet stopped working for a while as planned, but before long he went on to produce a series of uninflected but shaped monochromatic canvases shown in pairs so that they depicted sectioned squares or circles. These paintings were shaped by arcs, angles or chords delineated along the edges of the canvas and specified in words and numbers on or below the canvas: "Two Chords Subtending Arcs of 185° and 147°," for example. Venet stopped making the shaped canvases in 1979 and began to construct large arcs and angles from plywood. These were coated with graphite, captioned with their specifications and, in their placement on the wall, anticipated the lyrical compositions of Venet's new calligraphic works.

The latter continue to make use of the image-and-caption format, but a different syntax is employed. And because the parts relate to each other differently, they suggest a semantic shift. Whereas in the earlier work the verbal and the graphic terms were interchangeable, so that neither modality was privileged, in the new work the same phrase is used to describe a variety of lines, and the latter thus acquire a certain priority of interest. What's more, because they are intuitively rather than mathematically determined, their scale is far more crucial to their presence than before: not only are there newly complex internal proportions to consider, but the eye tends to relate the works more explicitly to the walls on which they are hung.

All of which is to say that these lines insist on being dealt with as gestures, frozen in time. Of course they are gestures once removed—in quotation marks, as it were—rather like a more sober and theoretical version of Lichtenstein's "Brushstrokes." Furthermore, as scribbles they stay away from many of the artistic functions of line—eschewing, for instance, both contour and shading—so that their character is more that of handwriting or signature. At the same time, of course, it is actually the terse, descriptive phrase conjoined to each of these lines that in effect constitutes Venet's artistic "signature"—the device by which we identify these works as "Venets." The irony, perfectly deadpan, is of the sort that has been marginally present in Venet's work right along. But his new willingness to open his previously mathematical structures to ambiguity both strengthens that irony and gives new range and depth to his chosen project—the isolation of the knowable, and, ever more explicitly, a critique of our instruments for knowing it.

—Paul Stimson

Helen Oji: Diver #3, 1982, acrylic on paper, 60 by 72 inches; at Monique Knowlton.

Nicholas Africano: The Face of Hyde Haunted Him, 1982, acrylic and wax on canvas, 70 by 92 inches; at Holly Solomon.

Nicholas Africano at Holly Solomon

From stout, mournful, battered women, lumpy legs issuing from housedresses, to Western prairie mise-en-scènes of romance, danger and cowardice, through dramas of Byronic passion and a plenitude of villains in Renaissance garb, Nicholas Africano, storyteller of comicry-novella sensibility, has emerged unscathed to posit, pour la première fois, a metaphysical quest of fulgurous portent. He titled this exhibition of 11 paintings "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde: A Crisis Between Knowledge and Faith."

A background of solid color sets the atmosphere, and assists the expression of mood registered in the body postures and facial features of manikins lovingly modeled from a wax medium. These creatures, closer to the proverbial lump of clay than to human flesh, have long peopled Africano's tales of destiny and distress.

It is Africano's considerable sense of humor derived from psychological insight, that infuses the loutish, amicable manikins gesticulating 'neath the vast heavens o'erhanging the human condition with the exaggerated, incomplete power alotted to frantic activity in the Realm of Caricature.

The esthetic prerogatives that lurk behind these paintings combine in tandems, and toot the same motet. American curio color schemata dominate the depth of emotion and attitude. Strong outbursts are conveyed with passivity and at a distance. The situations are as ambiguous as they are clear; all is lulled into a touchingly funny mildness.

Wielding a sceptre of caricature in the domain of his own lilliputians, through a tale of double personality, crime and the monster within, Nicholas Africano has arrived, along with the population of his bodikins, at the inroads of the unconscious, at "The Crisis Between Knowledge and Faith."

Our heartstrings are touted by the shapeless but distinguished Dr. Jekyll, who has brought a gummy white glass to his lips—Body and Soul I. He has imbibed the potation. Transformation has commenced in the viscera of the manikin—Body and Soul II. Body and Soul III—the flushed, agitated manikin is convulsing. The outstretched spatulate digits of Dr. Jekyll's cumbrous hands mock Nicholas's own hands preparing to remove the wax medium from his implements.

Leaving behind a plump, candified victim with petticoats in disarray, He Fled from His Own Excesses. Then, Dr. Jekyll is thrown face to face with his counterpart. On an expanse of darkling turquoise, Dr. Jekyll has pinned his own shadow with solid feet. He stands puzzled and helpless before the grinning, floating face of the evil Hyde—The Face of Hyde Haunted Him.

Though the powerful Africano has loomed over his flock, and they have cavorted at his bidding as well as they knew how, one manikin, Dr. Jekyll, has torn this fabric of neatness and revealed Africano's own adversary. In the wake of such doings one can only wonder, head in hand, whether Africano's arsenal of esthetic prerogatives has prepared him for this tussle of no small pale.

—Austs

Helen Oji at Monique Knowlton

Helen Oji fuses richly decorative painting with a Neo-Expressionist interest in subject matter. Her latest series of work derives from her 1978 abstract, shaped canvases based on the silhouette of a kimono. In those paintings the kimono shape was punctuated by bas-relief patterns in the same color as the ground. In 1980 Oji introduced subject matter into her work—whimsical images of birds and bees, rain scenes and ocean views. Her recent show consisted of several shaped and rectangular paintings (predominately Rhoplex on heavy, mounted paper) featuring more images of nature, plus a

VIRGIN OF GUADALUPE

Miraculous Vision through the eyes of

SALVADOR DALI

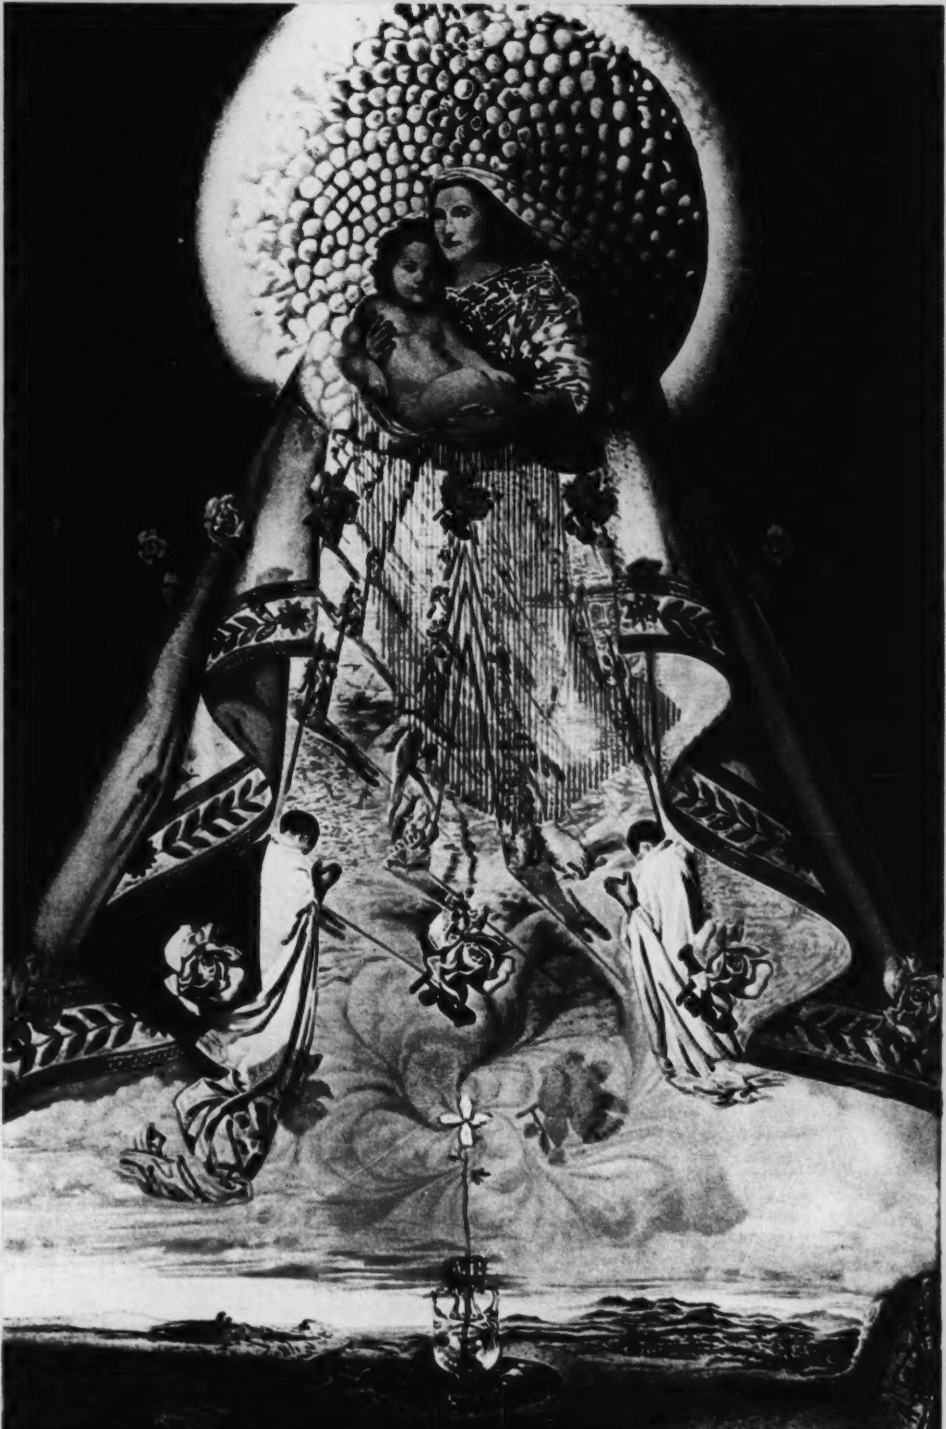
Guadalupe Shrine

In Mexico City is the Basilica of Our Lady of Guadalupe, Mexico's patron saint. It is said that on December 9, 1531, a young Indian convert named Juan Diego was on his way to Mass in Tlatelolco when a vision appeared in his path — the Virgin Mary, dark-skinned and clad in the robes of an Indian princess. It was her desire that Juan should go to the Bishop, relate his experience, and express her wish that a chapel be erected there, on Tepeyac Hill, where she might minister to her Indians.

The Bishop was understandably skeptical. On the following day the Virgin again appeared to Juan and repeated her instructions. Still unconvinced, the Bishop requested that Juan bring him proof of the Virgin's identity. Reluctant to embarrass both the Virgin and himself, Juan remained at home on December 11. On the 12th, though, he set out in haste for Tlatelolco to fetch a priest, for his uncle was gravely ill. As he had feared, he again encountered the Virgin and had to tell her of the Bishop's demand.

Unperturbed, she sent Juan to gather the roses she said he would find growing on the desolate hillside. Then she assured him that there was no need to worry about his uncle, who had recovered his health, and asked Juan to take the roses immediately to the Bishop, When Juan opened his cloak in the prelate's presence, its inner side contained a portrait of the Virgin. Satisfied at last that a miracle had occurred, the Bishop ordered construction of a chapel on Tepeyac Hill; the sacred painting was placed above its altar.

The Virgin of Guadalupe became Mexico's patron saint. Her portrait, in a heavy gold frame, hangs over the altar of the Basilica. Skeptics continue to assail its authenticity, but experts have confirmed that the "canvas" is genuinely of 16th century Mexican manufacture, and that in 1531 there was no one in Mexico capable of painting such a portrait. As for the paints, they have so far successfully defied analysis.



A magnificent, very limited edition, hand signed 28 color lithograph, 21" x 30" after the Virgin of Guadalupe by Dali. A certificate of authenticity signed by world renowned artist Salvador Dali accompanies each lithograph.

This work has been accepted into the Basilica Museum of the Shrine of Guadalupe, Mexico City. You will receive a copy of this letter numbered with your lithograph.

Universal Fine Arts
10636 MAIN STREET, SUITE 332, BELLEVUE, WASHINGTON 98004
(206) 747-3536 OR (206) 747-6524

VOL 7 1 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

few pieces of sculpture.

In these new works Oji explores parallels between her subject matter and her medium—between, say, the depicted movement of water and the physical properties of her paint. In one painting waves appear as thick impasto curves sparkling with glitter, and in another, a large work called Inky, an octopus looks like a paintbrush that has been plunged into water.

For the past three years, bees have figured prominently in Oji's painting and sculpture. They serve both as an occasion for a dazzling display of color (bees symbolize wealth) and as an opportunity to comment upon her urban environment (the beehive being an exaggerated model of human society). Indeed, her beehives resemble weird apartment houses—spiraling, zigguratlike towers. In each of the sculptures, peanut-shaped bees fly, attached by wire, around a brightly painted hive, while others cluster at its mouth. The colors of bees and hives contrast vibrantly.

Last summer, as part of an "Art in the Park" exhibition, Oji floated beehive sculptures (Rhoplex on styrofoam) on the pond in Central Park near 103rd Street. These hives could be seen as an ironic comment on both New York City life and the over-organized utopias dear to modern architects like Le Corbusier.

Over the past few years Oji's work has become stronger. Her kimono paintings, her pond scenes and her bee pieces provide her with perfect pretexts to marry decorative surfaces and magical content.

—Ann-Sargent Wooster

Gwenn Thomas at John Weber

Gwenn Thomas, who previously confined herself to the more conventionally painterly mediums, now combines color photographs of New York with abstract, and rather amorphous, painted frames.

The work is witty and elegant—its irony as intellectual as visual. In the unexpected relation of frame to photograph, Thomas's work recalls Picasso's Still Life With Chair Caning. Picasso's actual rope frames a work in which a real strip of oilcloth "falsely" purports to be chair caning. At first Thomas's photographs, with their streets and buildings, would seem to represent "reality," as distinct from the "illusion" of the freely painted frames. In this sense, they pun upon the conventions of realist representation, since, like the oilcloth, they are precisely not painted and thus cannot be considered feats of rendering. Furthermore, while the photographs have the fixed perspective characteristic of realism, the forms making up the painted frames are related to each other—and to the photographs upon which they at times intrude—in an exclusively formal way. Thomas's work turns upon the tension thus created, so that her subject becomes the constant interplay of realities between the two mediums.

The New York depicted here is a kinetic city of cars and people moving amidst graffiti, junk and deteriorating machinery. Large Hudson Street focuses on the city's dynamic angles, its juxtaposition of planes and forms. The frame exuberantly fractures the tight structure of the image. This tense geometrical composition—of buildings, gas pumps and a junked kitchen stove—exudes an agitated excitement, from the dislocated central vertical planes to the jumps of scale in the foreground. This work delights especially in a cubistic inversion of identities. A terra-cotta strip of molding looks painted, while the part of painted frame of the same color appears photographed. Is the long black vertical a solid, a cast shadow, or an errant part of the painted frame? The frame dissects the photograph's forms, colors, and zigzagging rhythms. This work adapts compositional ideas of Cubism, its paradoxes of reality and illusion, to dramatize Thomas's own vision. Her camera image is aggressive, but her frame's brushstrokes of jazzy color and exploding shapes are even more so.

Thomas evokes menace, like de Chirico, through shadows cast by people outside the photographs' field of vision. The painted passages extend the shadows and halt the motion. Static and general rather than kinetic and specific, they make the work of art more contemplative in effect.

Thomas's New York is still the "Cubist Futurist City" Picabia declared it to be in 1913, presenting a multiplicity of intersecting moods and perspectives. Whereas Ger van Elk or Donald Newman's photography-painting amalgams stress matters of craft over content, Thomas emphasizes the clash of her mediums to intensify her content. Her technique, encoding two views of reality in abstract and realist styles and contradictory mediums, is the perfect vehicle for evoking a relentlessly protean city—and its refusal to yield up any single view of the real.

—Margaret Sheffield

Donald Sultan at Blum Helman

The current art scene demonstrates how taste is formed by the erosion of patience and by curiosity. Having investigated abstract painting for several decades, no doubt without exhausting it, many artists have expressed a need to question again what can be done with the familiar objects of the world. A number of painters are at this most recent crossroads, and Donald Sultan typifies how interesting such crossings can be.

He takes upon himself, in these 13 new paintings, the task that artists of ambition always do—a categorical revision of the medium. Sultan's new works incorporate many things: a fascination with the industrial landscape and with industrial materials; a respect for the Minimalist precept that materials have an intergrity demanding our complete attention; and an allegiance to geometric abstraction with its desire to raise to spiritual status the perfect harmonies of the square. Each of these concerns is buried in his paintings' thick surfaces.

Sultan's method is to start with a wooden stretcher on which he places plywood rather than canvas; to this he affixes linoleum tiles that give the undersurface of a grid and speak plainly of industrialism; on top of the tiles he spreads a dense coat of tar from which he cuts an image that he plasters and paints or leaves white. The result is that his pictorial forms seem to rise through the depths of the abstract principles and materials on which his works are literally based. That many of the paintings are of great size enforces the visual weight of each layer—and, by implication, what it may signify in the art history of our time.

The intellectual cunning of Sultan's procedures, however, does not explain his simplistic imagery. We are supposed to be bowled over by the power of his smokestack's huge cylinder and brilliant flame against a field of pitch, by the strength of the stark blue and white of his street lamp—what Carter Ratcliff optimistically calls "emblematic figuration." But what are these emblems of? The precisionist architectural fragments of Sheeler's or Ralston Crawford's industrial scenes? Or the flat atmospheric planes that Whistler brought to American art from his oriental studies? But then we can only remark how unsubtle Sultan's images are in the context of his predecessors' work, because he establishes no underlying symbolic language. And if these simple forms are meant, as many critics say, to play with the ambiguity of abstract shape and pictorial reference, then we are left with nothing more than didactic diagrams. Sultan's technical ingenuity in reconsidering so much artistic form and matter had brought him his early recognition. His new work is sufficient to hold our attention for the moment as an interesting example of what is most promising in current painting. But only when his imagery equals the subtlety of his intellect will it be time to write more seriously of his accomplishments.

—Steven Henry Madoff

Harry Soviak at Pam Adler

The vase, probably the most tried and true symbol of classicism and tradition in art, emerges renewed and radicalized in Harry Soviak's work—a new emblem for the aggressively visual sensibility of the 1980s. Since the late '60s the vase image has turned up repeatedly in Soviak's collages, prints and paintings. His recent watercolors, and his first group of freestanding, painted steel sculptures, offer his most expressive treatment of the vase theme to date. It was a confrontational, eye-dazzling display.

Combining references to historical vessels and newly invented ones, Soviak generates a personal vocabulary, rich in pictorial potential, ripe with metaphorical meaning. The watercolor Hide and Seek (1982) is revealing of his approach. In it, the spatially complex but unitary form of a vase is abstracted into a flat, hieratic icon that occupies all of the paper (40 by 60 inches) except for narrow areas at the edges and corners. The stability of the symmetrical, full-bodied vase silhouette in Hide and Seek is gently undermined by linear tension—collar-shaped fragments arranged in an expansive, decorative tracking-pattern. Both color and scalar relationships also contribute vivid sensations of movement in depth and across the surface. Using Windsor red for the vase, cadmium orange in many of the motifs and alizarin red for the ground, Soviak makes us see red and other colors too—pink, black, green and blue. All of this encourages both representational and abstract reading of the composition. Of course, the title, by referring to the somewhat subtle presentation of the vase, focuses attention on the relationship of figure to ground—an important issue in modern painting that Soviak clearly delights in exploiting.

The textural handling of watercolor and emphasis on color contrasts in these works brings to mind the high-keyed hues of Matisse, Delaunay and, from the Russian avant garde, Goncharova and Exter. There is, for example, nothing wishy-washy about Clown (1982), a wild pattern of a green circle inside white-within-black rings animating a yellow vase on a Windsor red ground. The emphatic specificity of shapes helps bring out the strong figural presence inherent in Soviak's vases (this is strikingly demonstrated in Red Cap—A Portrait, 1982, where a Chinese covered jar takes on facial proportions).

Figural presence is also a major aspect of the painted steel sculptures, each of which comes in an edition of three and consists of a vase and a specially scaled base. Presented flat and frontally, these silhouetted vases have the iconic qualities found in the watercolor vases, but are undecorated. Viewers who like flamboyant sculptures will particularly enjoy Chicken Leg (1982), a serrated and bulbous vase based on a Chinese pot.

As the last title aptly demonstrates, humor and a delicious sense of modernist irony abound in Soviak's latest work but hardly detract from its seductive and sensuous beauty. His numbers among the most constructively dynamic art seen in New York last season. —Ronny Cohen

WASHINGTON, D.C.

"Neon Fronts" at W.P.A., "Luminous Tubes" at Zenith

In the past few years the Washington Project for the Arts has sponsored a number of large-scale temporary sculpture installations around the city, but for this project, which opened last year and continues in modified form, something a great deal more subtle and insinuatingly effective was devised. Thirteen artists contributed a diversity of neon pieces (some multipartite), which were placed in shop and hotel windows, on building facades and blank walls, throughout a 25-block area in the old downtown district. Just north of Pennsylvania Avenue, this area is an eclectic mix of down-at-the-heels commercial buildings, government offices, department stores and revitalized structures. The landmarks range from the National Portrait Gallery and the National Museum of American Art (with the attendant concentration of commercial galleries on the new "7th Street Strip") to the F.B.I. Building and the old Willard Hotel. What's more, what with the various theaters, hotels, restaurants and bars in the area there is enough indigenous neon to provide both a natural setting and a kind of protective coloration for the influx of neon art pieces.

Gwen Thomas: Large Hudson Street, 1982, color photograph and oil paint on panel, 49 3/4 by 39 3/4 inches; at John Weber.

Harry Soviak: Clown, 1982, watercolor, 42 by 29 1/2 inches; at Pam Adler.

Indeed, it was this tendency to "fit in" with their environment that gave these works much of their consequence. Removed from a gallery setting and forced to compete with "legitimate" neon signs whose main purpose is to advertise or inform, they took on an ironic, almost subversive character, quite apart from their intrinsic merits and concerns. Fundamentally, they functioned as a kind of visual double-talk, provoking bemused passers-by into trying to discover just what these strange signs "meant." The most pointed works, in this regard, were Bruce Nauman's deadpan pseudo-advertisement Perfect Door/Perfect Odor/Perfect Rodo triptych in the windows of a 7th Street cafe; Stephen Ludlum's diagrammatic representation of two Parsons tables on a brick wall, and especially Stephen Antonakos's frieze of letter-like shapes fitted over the faded five-and-dime sign on the facade of the renovated building which now houses the W.P.A. The Antonakos work (still in place), with its tease-the-eye configurations that seem always on the edge of intelligibility (in some instances following the contours of the worn letters beneath), actually becomes a kind of abstract advertisement for the W.P.A., attracting the eye with its brilliant color and enigmatic calligraphy, and promising, by its very example, something unusual inside.

The double-take effect depended to a degree on a sensitive selection and placement of the pieces, and here curator Olivia Georgia excelled. Most were specifically commissioned, but even the already existing or recreated works were located so appropriately it was impossible to tell they were not specially constructed for their sites. Thus Keith Sonnier's Triple Lips (1969), a punning, knowingly casual combination of electrical wires, looped neon tubes and reflector-head incandescent floodlights, seemed made for its reincarnation in a large display window of a defunct department store, where its elegant flamboyance could be seen as an affectionate take-off on high-tech window dressing.

Among the commissioned pieces, there were a number of standouts, with success in each case due as much to an intelligent connection with place as to an inventive use of the medium. In an unusual technical manipulation, Cork Marcheschi erased the hard neon line and filled two boxy display windows (flanking an entrance to the Willard Hotel) with soft rectangular washes of yellow, green and purple-blue; the glow that defined the glassed-in spaces replayed the nightly wash of light on the floodlit Washington Monument, immediately visible past the edge of the building. William Kane poked more pointed fun at the city's monumentality with his swooping graffito-like green scribble on the side of a scruffy army-surplus store; across the street and looming above the work, the self-important F.B.I. Building became the backdrop for this tongue-in-cheek desecration, like a dowager hit by a custard pie.

Neon lighting began in this country some 60 years ago as a commercial medium so assertive that it effectively blotted out perception of its surroundings; in short order (and for many years), the nighttime look of most American cities was largely determined by it. The W.P.A. project spun a satisfying turnaround on this old story: the neon in these works responded to the shapes and incidents of the city's structures and design; it underlined and pointed out, rather than obliterated. A number of the pieces remain in operation indefinitely; the W.P.A. has printed a map to show their locations, and a catalogue of the exhibition is forthcoming.

A smaller companion show at the Zenith Gallery, "Luminous Tubes," dealt with neon works designed for interior spaces. The six local artists included (some also involved in "Neon Fronts") were represented by work that was generally modest-sized, multicolored, abstract and geometric. The most interesting of the 19 entries, though, took off in less predictable directions. Ted Bonar's Forecast, technically impressive for its antic glass-bending and combination of colors, was a good-natured parody of a scrawled TV weather map, and Sal Fiorito's Light Column and Olive Loaf and Rat Hair Mirror managed to blend punk pattern paint jobs, encrusted neon tubes, eccentric sculptural furniture and unexpected light effects into funny and surprisingly harmonious compositions. —David Tannous

LOS ANGELES

Michael C. McMillen at Asher Faure

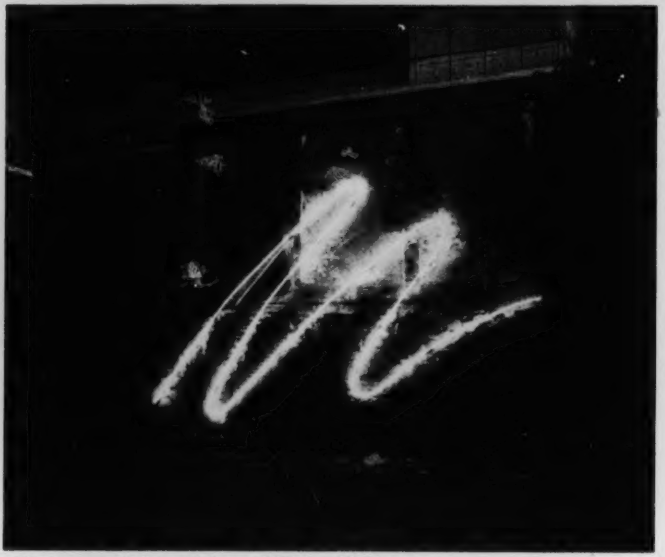
Michael C. McMillen's work borrows heavily from his experience in film set construction. His last major work seen in Los Angeles was a contribution to "The Museum as Site: Sixteen Projects" at the County Museum. A full-scale garage, complete with the hulk of an old car and chock-a-block with the decaying, dust-covered junk of an entire civilization, this installation invited the viewer to walk through the burial chamber of contemporary society, encountering the ghosts of his own life. One was torn between suffocation and hilarity.

McMillen's latest installation, The Journey, was airy by contrast, though no less concerned with decay. Beginning outside the exhibition space proper with tiny wharf shacks, winches, ladders and cranes erected on the facades and roofs of the gallery's two buildings, The Journey led the viewer into a dimly lit interior space. Here, one was invited to sit in a comfortable, overstuffed chair, flanked by votive, candle-topped lamps, and to ponder the end of the world—at a contemplative distance.

Slung high across one corner, at the opposite end of the gallery,

VOL 7 1 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

Michael C. McMillin: The Zanzabar, 1982, 50 by 33 by 10 inches; at Asher/Faure.



William Kane: Untitled (816 E Street), 1982, from Washington Project for the Arts "Neon Fronts" exhibition, Washington, D.C.

a ramshackle bridge connected two miniature doors; starting at floor level in the other corner, a miniature stairway of absurdly disproportionate length wound its way up, following the contour of the wall, to a third door. Approaching it, one discovered that its glass panel afforded a peepshow glimpse down a dingy, dimly lit corridor, illusionistically crafted to appear to lead into and through the gallery wall. At the mock-corridor's far end, where it seemed to turn out of sight, was a small patch of imagination-teasing sunlight. Overhead, within the gallery and suspended from the ceiling, the skeleton of a large fish hung like a blimp, surrounded by ghostly swarms of dried anchovies. Nearby, in similar suspended animation, a single bomb threatened to fall.

The theme of the main installation was further developed by other three- as well as two-dimensional works in the exhibition, such as a wall construction titled The Zanzabar. Like relics, these pieces evoked abandoned urban dwellings or deserted landscapes, miniature scenes from which some future archeologist might draw melancholy conclusions about our disintegrating civilization. Peeling paint and wallpaper, tanks and rusting pipes, electrical fixtures, shattered lumber and glass bore silent testimony to systems that had once helped keep a social environment in functioning order.

A series of paintings on similar motifs also emphasized the extent to which McMillen is an illusionist in the tradition of Peto and Harnett, creating convincing models of mundane reality which persuade the viewer by the accuracy of their depiction. But to this tradition McMillen brings another ingredient–the heritage of Surrealism. His illusionistic walls are pierced with thorns, and grotesque organic matter oozes from the plumbing. The work blends nightmare with farce, exploring individual alienation and fears in the context of the decaying fabric of contemporary society.

The risks involved in this kind of work are high. Like the comedian Steve Martin, McMillen flirts outrageously with sophomoric, even childish, humor. What allows him—often brilliantly—to get away with it is a deadpan delivery and the quality of his execution. Our attention is deflected from the "message" into the absorbing detail. It is clear, too, that McMillen's focus is not simply current social decay, but the ephemerality of all constructions—and indeed of life itself. Reality, his work reminds us, is continually replaceable by other realities. Strip away the finish, scratch the surface, and you'll find still another illusion. McMillen's sympathy with the human condition is tempered by the wry smile of the satirist. —Peter Clothier

SAN FRANCISCO

Christopher Lane at the San Francisco Museum of Modern Art

Though he exhibited widely in New York, Paris, Amsterdam, London and Tokyo during the '60s and early '70s, and though he has continued to show his work on the West Coast since he moved to San Francisco ten years ago, Christopher Lane has not had much public attention. One reason, as Henry Hopkins suggests in the small catalogue that accompanied this exhibition, may be that Lane's work is out of step with currently fashionable modes of painting.

Lane's show consisted of a modest 12 paintings on linen and paper, of which the centerpiece—and the oldest work—was an 18-foot-wide triptych completed in 1979. In contrast to the somber themes of traditional triptychs (one thinks of the line that leads from Northern European crucifixions to Francis Bacon's tripartite depictions of modern torments), Lane does not present a narrative of anguish. His imagery deals, rather, with the lofty, transcendental (and metaphoric) subject of space in time. Hung at a 6 degree angle from the wall and with its wings opening out to enclose the viewer, Lane's triptych evokes the sensation of flight over water and air. The painting, which took Lane two years to complete, grows out of his experience living on an island off the coast of Holland as well as from actual feelings of flight. It also represents Lane's attempt to define visually the cyclic changes of time.

The triptych's linked canvases are divided into 15 vertical stripes. The viewer begins by scanning the work from left to right, at the same time noting the presence of ascending and descending movements. Scanning is not, however, an adequate response to Lane's work. Unlike so much contemporary painting, in which the message is swiftly delivered, Lane presents us with a canvas for slow contemplation. The attention and patience his work requires are rewarded by insights into the artist's particular perceptions of light and time. A large part of the triptych is white, or very light, with the subtlest tints of orange, vermilion and turquoise blue. Other sections, such as the bottom right, are dark; these function as anchors for the composition's descending diagonal movement. The dark passages also allude to nature: they suggest the nocturnal sky, the flow of rippling waves, the sea viewed from a great height. Furthermore, they are evidence of the inner flow of the artist's feeling, of his observation of the world around him and himself, and a record of the time in which he permitted the unfolding of this painting to take place.

Lane talks of the importance to his work of significant personal encounters. In 1962, while studying and working in Paris, he sought out a meeting with Giacometti, whose questioning of existence and reality, as well as his particular vision of structure, seemed close to Lane's own interests. Equally significant had been his earlier meeting with Zen Master Tobase and his later study with Toshio Sekiyama in San Francisco, an artist from whom he learned much about Zen calligraphy.

The Zen esthetic is important for Lane's working method. After a long period of planning and meditation, he allows his brushes to create their own passages within the blank space of his canvas. As in sumi painting, no changes are possible. Lane's recent paintings are neither the results of impulsive, personal self-expression, nor of conscious formal design. They are perhaps best described as a process of disclosure which creates and responds to its own rhythm. The blank spaces of the triptych, the large areas of white that segment the work's flowing dark regions, remind one, above all, of the silences in John Cage's "total soundspace." In Lane's triptych, dark matter is counterposed to the lightness of the void. —Peter Selz

CHICAGO

Linda Murphy Robbennolt at Dobrick

Linda Murphy Robbennolt's color photographs are takeoffs on those turn-of-the-century studio sets through which people would stick their heads to be photographed. Robbennolt has taken the idea a step further by creating pastel drawings on cardboard with holes and slits through which human appendages protrude and in the process are transformed: fingers, for example, become Christopher Lane: Triptych (detail: upper right), 1977-79, oil on linen, each panel 74 by 74 inches; at San Francesco Museum of Modern Art.

Linda Robbennolt: Primping, 1982, pastel on cardboard, hair, at Dobrick.

wings on animals, teeth or tongues, even bristles on a brush. The results are clever and often humorous.

Lost in a Crowd depicts a bevy of pastel bunnies sniffing the air. Most of them have little pink noses drawn in, but three do not. Instead, three women's nipples stick through the bunnies' nose holes. In Cleanliness is Next to Godliness, a black pastel dog has human thumbs for his penis and tongue. In another doggy drawing, a canine chows down on a string of real sausages with a mouthful of toothlike fingers.

While the subjects of some of these works seem rather frivolous, they are nevertheless ingeniously composed. Just a Slight Touch-Up shows a woman from the back looking into a mirror and applying lipstick. The woman's back and arms are drawn, as is the vanity table, but her long auburn hair and "reflected" face are real.

Several works do have serious undertones, though. One Last Kiss is a pastel drawing of a woman standing over a man in a casket. Her head is buried in her hand as if in mourning, and both are real. The rest of the picture is drawn, except for a pair of actual red lips located on the corpse's cheek, mimicking the imprint of a kiss.

There are also two photographs devoted to the Falkland Islands crisis. They present a sheep's-eye view of things, with the animals flying fancifully through a pastel sky, fingers flapping from their backs like wings. One is called Escape from the Falklands—Stanley Saves the Sheep. It seems Robbennolt went to Texas and visited Stanley Marsh at his Cadillac Ranch. Marsh was raving about the Falkland situation and suggested that the sheep could be saved by tying balloons to them and launching them toward safety. Although Marsh's balloon rescue idea never quite made it intact in Robbennolt's interpretation (just as well), she still gave him credit in her title for the inspiration.

Robbennolt is a 31-year-old native of White Plains, N.Y. and currently teaches part-time at the University of Oklahoma in Norman. The dozen photographs in her present show, her first solo exhibition in Chicago, show her walking an esthetic tightrope. The cutesy quality of her bunnies, doggies and sheep narrowly escape being misread as children's storybook illustrations. They are pleasant enough, but could hardly be taken seriously without the addition of witty conceptual elements. And yet, it is the natural simplicity of the work which makes her unexpected juxtapositions of flesh and fiction so effective. Meanings are reversed and things become their opposites. A "reflection" is real. A kiss-print is an actual "kisser." A real hand is painted to look like a white glove being put on by a drawn hand. Reality, in those photographs, becomes as much an illusion as the pastel drawings it interrupts. —Michael Bonesteel

Review Contributors

Brooks Adams, Steven Henry Madoff and Margaret Sheffield are free-lance critics living in New York . . . Julia Ballerini teaches history of art and photography at Adelphi University, Garden City, N.Y. . . . Paul Brach, Lawrence Campbell, Paul Stimson, Robert Storr and Ann-Sargent Wooster are artists who also write on art . . . Michael Bonesteel is a free-lance critic based in Chicago . . . Peter Clothier is dean of the College of Fine and Communication Arts, Loyola Marymount University, Los Angeles . . . Ronnie Cohen is a New York free-lance curator and critic . . . Jonathan Crary and Sanford Kwinter are doctoral candidates at Columbia University . . . Peter Selz is a professor of art history, University of California, Berkeley . . . David Tannous writes on art from Washington, D.C.

Corrections

A number of abstract paintings have regrettably been printed on these pages either upside down, or sideways, and, where a collection is mentioned, mis-credited: Oct. '82, p. 94: Liubov Popova's Untitled, upside down; p. 98: Popova's Painterly Architectonics (Dallas Museum of Fine Arts), upside down; p. 99: Popova's Architectonic Composition (Thyssen-Bornemiza Collection), sideways—the bottom should be right-hand side; Nov. '82, p. 122: Louis Fishman's Tabernacle, sideways—bottom should be right-hand side; Dec. '82, p. 71: Frank Young's Untitled, upside down; p. 73: Bill Jensen's Memory of Closeness (Metropolitan Museum), sideways.

New Directory Lists Sources and Prices for Contemporary Prints

The international print market at your fingertips

More than 8,000 print listings ☐ 600 top artists' profiles ☐ 388 pages.

In USA: $35. Postage/Handling — $3.50
Outside USA: $40. Postage/Handling — $7.00
NAME
ADDRESS
VISA/MC # EXP
SIGNATURE

1982 PRINTWORLD DIRECTORY

PRINTWORLD P.O. Box 785 • Bala Cynwyd, PA 19004 (215) 649-5140

VOL
71
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

JULIE GRAHAM
Works on paper

STAN SNYDER
Sculpture

Jan. 19 - Feb. 12

22 WOOSTER GALLERY
22 Wooster Street
New York, N.Y. 10013
(212) 431-6445

JAN BROOKS LOYD

RECENT WORK

DAVIDSON COLLEGE ART GALLERY JANUARY

Holly Daly Herman
Palm Beach Art Galleries

WHY ARE WE SO SUCCESSFUL?

BECAUSE WE ARE SO NOTABLY DIFFERENT!

240 Worth Avenue
Palm Beach
655-9364

523 Rue Dumaine
New Orleans
525-6457

THE GALLERIES FEATURE CONTEMPORARY AMERICAN AND EUROPEAN SCULPTORS AND PAINTERS

DEBBIE ADAMS
MAREA ALEXANDER-EDYNAK
DAVID ANDERSON
ELAINE APTEKAR
MARC AVRIN
RTO TYLER BAER
MARION BEAUREGARD BEZOU
CATHERINE BRODEUR
DORTHE CHILCUTT
JOSEPH CICCARELLI
DOROTHY CROWLEY
WHITNEY CUSHING
EVIE DAYMAN
WALTER DIERICKX
DANIEL DOBRZENSKI
DANA ALAN EASTWOOD
ANDREW FERGUSON JR.
LEONARD FROIO
AUBREY GARNER
JANE GASTON
CHARLES GILLESPIE
LAURA GSCHWANDTNER
JOHN HAVRILLA
GINGER HESTAND
PATRICIA HOLLSTEIN
HIROKO ISHIDA
MICHAEL JAMES
LESTER KENT
BUD KOVERMAN
YVES LAROCHE
PEGGY LEIGHNINGER
DARLA DIANN LEWIS
MARY BERN LEWIS
JUNE LITTELL
BETTE MASON
JOSEPH MAYNARD
RAYMOND MCDOWELL
MIRIAM MCVEIGH
BOONCHAIB METHANGKOOL
BARON MINTZ
FLOYD NORRIS
ELIZABETH O'NEIL
DAVID JOSEPH PAVLAK
ED RIVARA
IDA ROBERTS
THOMAS RUNDQUIST
JUDY SALE
SIDNEY SMITH
JAIME SPILMAN
ZOLTAN STEINER
FRANCIS SWEET
RICHARD SYLVESTRE
JOSEPH TAUBER
JOSEPH TONINI
ROBERT TRANSPOTA
CAROL RAE TVEDT
JON NEAL WALLACE
VIOLET WINDELL
HERMAN YOKERS
JIM ZINGER

GALLERY'S HOURS:

PALM BEACH
monday thru saturday
11:00 to 4:00
closed; tuesdays & sundays

NEW ORLEANS
monday thru sunday
11:00 to 4:00
closed; tuesdays & wednesdays

Galerie St. Etienne

Klimt Schiele
Kokoschka Kollwitz
Eugène Mihaesco
Representing the Estate of Grandma Moses

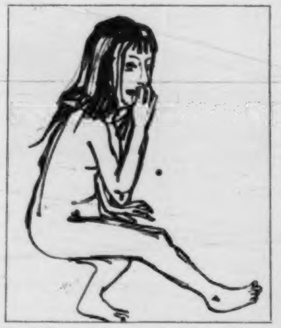
24 W. 57th St. NYC 10019
(212) 245-6734 Tues.-Sat. 11-5



Oskar Kokoschka: Squatting Girl. 1919-20. Pen.

ZOMA GALLERY
327 Columbus Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10023

GROUP SHOW

- Hely Lima • Sanae Takahata
- Robert Lowe • Luis Lugo
- Fran Dropkin • Max Forti

German Painting

Continued from page 101

Penck moves toward Immendorff's sense of social reality through his own cybernetic conception of man, and Immendorf moves toward Penck's autobiographicalism through his self-consciousness about his own ambivalent social role: he is an egalitarian Maoist oriented towards the lost cause of a democratic China, and a successful bourgeois artist appropriated by the market. Penck and Immendorff are, like the two Germanys, fraternal twins, whose paintings mirror each other spiritually if not stylistically. Both conceive their art as tied to a particular historical and political period. Both fuse the political and the personal in a highly individualized way—almost to the point of eccentricity.

Polke

Of the older generation, Sigmar Polke epitomizes, I think, the conflicts and the ironies attendant upon the complex, contradictory situation of the postwar German artist. Polke particularly summarizes the pervasive ambivalent relationship to contemporary American art, which the postwar German artist found he had to deal with if he was to develop. Polke—like Immendorff—has been consistently producing a socially oriented, politically engaged art, from his involvement with the "Capitalistic Realism" movement (1963-69) to his involvement with Fluxus (in the mid '60s). He has always been against the idea of the work of art as a useless commodity, and against the egotism of artists, their use of their art to articulate an empty individuality.

His means have always been anonymous and ironically socially relevant. His Urlaubsbild (Vacation Picture), 1966, presents tourist images (the Parthenon, the moon) painted in a commercial illustrational style; his Menschenmenge (Crowd of People), 1969, uses an obtrusive benday technique. In a series of stencil works, all touch is in fact hand- rather than machine-made. He has always made an ironical use of mass-produced, mechanically rendered images. Yet more crucially, his work involves a dialectical subsuming and transcending of what in the '60s—and to the present day—has been regarded as international high art, perhaps most obviously Pop art and Minimalism, but also abstract and Conceptual art. Thus his painting, Carl Andre in Delft (undated, probably ca. '68), transferring Andre's modular metal plates into painted images of Dutch tiles, is a trenchant, demystifying critique of Minimalism.

The same kind of debunking—done with epigrammatic succinctness and pungency—occurs in Höhere Wesen befahlen: rechte obere Ecke schwarz malen!, 1969, (Higher Beings Command: Paint the Upper Right Corner Black!). Here, hard-edge abstraction is the target, as the finickiness of abstract painting—its obsession with nuances of placement and color relationships—is mocked. There is anarchism behind Polke's irony, but also daring criticality. Like Kiefer neither presentational nor representational but freshly conceptual, Polke demythologizes recent avant-garde high art, leaving us with a sense of excruciating void.

What is left? Ambivalence about the nature and value of art—a sense of the indeterminateness of both, and an insistence that art be left in an undefined state, that it be left as an abstract text that the spectator can read concretely, according to his sense of what it tells him about his situation.

Thus, in an untitled work of 1971–73, Polke places conventionalized images of sophisticated smokers—images derived from movie scenarios, but dislocated, out of narrative and even scenic context—against a ground of decorative, wallpaperlike material. Execution is by no means coarse—it is popular-culture-esthetic. The juxtaposition of images is unresolved, figure and ground synthesize optically, and perhaps ironically or conceptually. The aura of glamor that results—and that I find increasingly typical of Polke's work, especially in his new

SUN VALLEY
SUMMER 1983
June 13 - August 26

PHOTOGRAPHY [illegible]

[illegible] Gayle [illegible] Paula Winokur [illegible] Winokur

Workshops • Resident Program
Scholarships • V.A. Benefits

SUN VALLEY CENTER
for the Arts and Humanities
Box 656, Sun Valley, Idaho 83353 (208) 622-9371

Art expo NY

NEW YORK COLISEUM, APRIL 7–11, 1983
The most important art fair in the world's art capital.

Save time & money–
Pre-register now!

International Art Exposition, Inc. 509 Madison Ave., Suite 702, NY, NY 10022 (212) 935-7607

(Special preregistration rates)
Please send ___ tickets at $5.50 Daily, or ___ 5-Day Passes at $22 (pass includes official catalogue).
Check enclosed: Amount $ ___
☐ Please send information regarding seminars & cultural events programs, hotel accommodations, special airfares

Name ___
Company/Organization ___
Address ___
City ___ State ___ Zip ___
Country ___

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

K.H. Hödicke: Boys Under Palmtrees, 1978, oil on canvas, 72 ¼ by 90 ¼ inches. Annina Nosei Gallery.

Bernd Zimmer: Haldensee, 1980, acrylic and hand-ground pigment on canvas, 82 by 120 inches. Gladstone Gallery.

Bernd Koberling: Cormorant II, 1981, oil and resin on canvas, 78 by 101 ½ inches.

Rainer Fetting: Figure and Overhead Railway, 1981, acrylic and raw pigment on canvas, 78 ½ by 98 inches. Mary Boone Gallery.

abstractions shown at Documenta 7—is the real content and form.

He refuses false consciousness—the illusion of harmonious unity—and accepts inconsequential yet charged togetherness. The will-o'-the wisp glamor that hovers over his images is a mock statement of happy unity. It is like the lie of the happy ending of a movie. Glamor is utopian, a form of populist idealism, but it is cosmetic on present banality rather than heroically projective of a better future.

It is worth noting that aspects of both Julian Schnabel's and David Salle's work seem clearly indebted to Polke. But the Americans estheticize, make overly decorative their quotations, and the glamor they evoke is not utopian but practical—it is esthetic rather than ironical, another way of conveying egotism through high art rather than eschewing it. This is not to say that these artists are inauthentic, only that they are not in a world that offers the opportunity for authenticity that a divided Germany does. Schnabel and Salle deal with solely artistic ambivalences, to which, at best, they can give certain psychological import.

The Berlin Neo-Expressionists

While the Berlin painters have the same dichotomous mentality, it shows itself in a less cultural-historical way—in a more strictly art-historical way. Their encounter is explicitly with German Expressionism, as emblematic of the German idea of nature as the source of all significance. Hödicke, Koberling and Zimmer work with nature in the conventional sense—with animals, vegetation, the earth; Salomé, Middendorf and Fetting work with human nature, understood as a luridly dynamic force. What is instructive about the first three artists is their extensive traveling to foreign, even exotic places; what is instructive about the second group is their preoccupation with conventionally "foreign" erotic experience.

It is hard, today, to authentically strike the note of strangeness or estrangement that was so crucial to the original Expressionists. The Berlin painters travel—to Indonesia (Hödicke), Iceland (Koberling), the Austrian Alps (Zimmer); or the exotic is found close to home—an automobile burning in the streets of the city (Zimmer), an odd view of a glider or escalator (Hödicke). Above all, though, there is exoticism, in the forced spontaneity of the relationship to their medium.

This is where Expressionism comes in—a modified, one might almost say reduced Expressionism, in which, in a compulsive, obsessive way, one has a kind of relationship-on-the-run with one's medium. Superficially, this results in a sense of facility of handling and in images with a facile effect; but ultimately it is indicative of the difficulty of sustaining a relationship with one's original or primordial nature (Urnatur), with realizing nature as a source (Quelle). One is always in danger of falling out of touch with the nature in oneself, so one takes it on the run, relates to it rapidly, grateful for its gifts—gifts of perception which seem transient, but whose appearance of transience only bespeaks the moment of response to "nature."

Salomé: Geisha with Dog, 1981, oil on canvas, 95 by 79 inches. Annina Nosei Gallery.

Maina-Miriam Munsky: Overhead Light, 1978, oil on canvas, 78 by 54 5/8 inches. Galerie Poll, Berlin.

In a somewhat analogous way, nature is gotten at by Middendorf, Salomé and Fetting through a strategic use of Expressionism coupled with traditionally unconventional subject matter of another sort. The eroticizing techniques of all three, and the homoerotic content of the latter two, are only initially shocking and unconventional, being already media-familiar, if in relatively domesticated form. What counts is the stylistic fluidity achieved by these artists as a sign of the immediacy of their relationship to their subject matter—as a sign of the naturalness of their art. Yet all the talk about spontaneity in connection with these artists, is misleading, for it is the meaning of this already stylized spontaneity that counts. Pushed to a new fluidity, it is meant to evoke a sense of ecstatic swooning—essentially Dionysian swooning into instinctual depth, away from the social surface of things to their primordial nature.

Traditional Expressionism is simply a vehicle, an instructive starting point, for the Berlin artists, as well as for the new German painters in general. For they are making worn out, already familiar and assimilated Expressionist techniques freshly evocative by treating them with a mannerist sense of fluidity—a loose, artificial freedom. The pleasurableness of the paint is incidental—although, no doubt, it seems particularly suited to Berlin (Penck called Berlin, isolated in the cultural desert of East Germany, the Las Vegas of Germany).

It should be noted that the escapist dimension of this pursuit of nature and sexuality is, as it was for the traditional Expressionists, a typical big-city phenomenon. In Berlin the life-force, the culture, artificially flourishes as if in a hothouse. Thus painting there sometimes has the look of a conflagration—because of the city's inescapably risky, buried-alive situation. The risk of being in Berlin, however, is sublimated in the energy of painterly outpouring, from which blossom an ambivalent life-force, a haunted energy.

Berlin & Hamburg Realists

There is also a group of political realist artists in Berlin, producing works which in general show a mockingly muscular, mockingly grotesque contemporary German mass culture. Their works (involving an exaggeratedly vulgar, behind-the-scenes—even "obscene"—observation of social reality, often using photographs of such things as silicon breast operations and gory hospital births)—have a satiric-caricatural dimension which links them with the conceptual/political art of Ina Barfuss and Thomas Wachweger in Hamburg.

This Hamburg art uses painting in the same conceptual way as the other major German artists I have discussed, but they add to it a cynicism about painting—almost a disapproval of it as an instrument of revelation and communication. These Hamburg artists will always be disappointed with any "reflective" medium, I suspect, for they really want social action. Their art is a species of terrorism grounded in contempt for "the mediocrity and triviality of bourgeois life," as one critic has said. Such contempt, such an effort to show the triviality of an overgeneralized conception of bourgeois life, seems to me to show its own triviality. It is too pat, a dumbly mechanical reflex to a society it only superficially understands. It also seems to me to issue in pictures that are only nominally interesting—interesting as symptoms rather than for the multidimensionality I see in much other current German art.

Martin Kippenberg's definition of his own painting as "the best of the second class" (quoted in Wolfgang Max Faust and Gerd de Vries's recent book Hunger Nach Bildern: Deutsche Malerei der Gegenwart) speaks for all the artists who share this attitude. But I am not sure that their painting is that good, even as satire. Hatred of the existing social reality was one of the motivating forces of traditional Expressionism as well. However, Expressionism developed a critical method for understanding and transcending the values of society. The "anti-pictures" of the Hamburg artists become self-defeating. Like other new German painters, they are responsive to German reality, but in an undialectical way.

There are two major exceptions among the Hamburg artists, however, Werner Büttner and Albert Oehlen, who to my mind link up, however obliquely, with the Mülheimer Freiheit group. Both artists have a Hamburg sense of social engagement—awareness of what has been called the "disaster of democracy," or really of mass society—but they understand this in terms of the problems of modern art. For them, working one's way through the mindlessness to which all art is reduced in a mass communications society becomes a way of asserting independent artistic identity in that very society.

The independence comes in the handling of what one critic has called "painted symbols," generally executed in a provocatively murky manner. Büttner's Self-Portrait Masturbating in a Movie (1980) deals with the artist as the "exemplary masturbator," mucking about with his self-image. This work, to me, sums up the unhappy consciousness of the Hamburg artists, discontented at once with civilization and with "artistic" release from it. To masturbate to mass media images summarizes the absurd situation of high art today.

Oehlen's Washing and Dressing Room Under the Motorhall on the Rosenberg (1980), with its drastically foreshortened, tilting, altogether muddled space, and such combine pieces as Time Tunnel (1982) also epitomize the Hamburg artists' unhappiness with the eerily vacuous and eerily transitory world they inhabit.

One can see slightly different attitudes among the Hamburg artists: Barfuss, Wachweger and Kippenberg seem satirically bitter about their German world and their place in it; Büttner and Oehlen are merely sour. In all five, however, there is a peculiar infantilism in the face of the world—an infantilism conceived as anti-bourgeois. Their paintings are a kind of throwing of visual tantrums. Sometimes, this conceptualized infantilism leads to "fantastic" re-

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

Ina Barfuss: Cheesehead, 1982, gouache on cardboard, 41 by 24 1/4 inches.

Thomas Wachweger: Pair, 1982, gouache on cardboard, 41 by 29 5/8 inches.

Werner Büttner: Self-Portrait Masturbating in a Movie, 1980, oil on canvas, 58 1/2 by 44 3/4 inches. Paul Maenz Gallery, Cologne.

Martin Kippenberger: Horst's Mother in Spandauer Forest, 1982, 19 1/2 by 27 1/4 inches. Photo F. Pickhardt.

Albert Oehlen: The Washing and Dressing Room under the Motorhall on the Rosenberg, 1980, 62 1/4 by 74 1/8 inches. Paul Maenz Gallery.

sults—seems to open the way to a vigorous fantasy life, to a realm of wild free associations that function like portents. It is this, with its sense of speaking in visual tongues, that connects the Hamburg artists, however loosely, with the more rabidly fantastic Mülheimer Freiheit group.

Mulheimer Freiheit

The Mülheimer Freiheit group has been in existence for three to four years, and as is often the case with artist groups, seems now to be disintegrating. However I shall discuss them here as a group, and point out the differences among them. The group consists of Walter Dahn, Georg Jiři Dokoupil, Peter Bömmels, Hans Peter Adamski, Gerard Kever and Gerhard Naschberger.

While these artists sharply distinguish between the "painters" (Dahn, Bömmels, Dokoupil) and the "conceptualists" (Adamski, Kever, Naschberger) among themselves, all are in fact painters. All have a sense of irony which seems to derive from Polke, but they express it more extravagantly, through a protean exploration of artistic roles. The artists in this group are great play-actors, metamorphosing rapidly, shedding artistic skins before they become too comfortable in them—before they even know how to wear them well. But to wear them well would be to become "good artists" and to forfeit the exploratory enthusiasm that is at the root of their art impulse.

Thus, Walter Dahn's Die Gotik lebt in den Beinen betrunkener Cowboys (Contort Yourself II) (The Gothic Lives in the Legs of Drunken Cowboys), 1981, takes as its stimulus the resemblance between bowlegs and the Gothic arch, but then perversely twists or negates both—negating the analogy in a fantasy act. The Mülheimer Freiheit artists find visual analogies—puns—everywhere, locking things together in transformational metaphors worthy of a contemporary Lautréamont. But they do this with a self-consciousness about the history of modern art which amounts to a disclosure of its lawlessness. As they see it, there is no consistency in the modern tradition, only a number of loosely related fantasies—style being nothing but fantasy that has settled down and lost its metamorphic power, and the freewheeling character which signaled its vitality and authenticity.

The Mülheimer Freiheit artists, particularly Dahn and Dokoupil, explore a wide range of stylistic sources—Miró, Picasso, Hanna Hoch, Meidner—getting at the dream behind them. As might be expected, their art has certain targets among prominent contemporary artists with whom they are in categorical disagreement, and whom they see as "trying to set the law." They mock such artists as academic, fantasyless. Thus Dahn and Dokoupil's collaborative drawing—as conceptual as any by Polke—Robert Ryman, Can You Hear Me? (1980). By contrast, Picasso, who remained "fantastic" to the end, and Picabia, who remained anarchistic to the end, are Mülheimer-Freiheit heroes—implicit and explicit—as they are for so many younger painters today in Italy, France and the U.S.

The Mülheimer-Freiheit artists' restlessness, their sense of slapstick, their irritation with known styles and contents, their general sardonic tone, are deliberate strategies for escaping the typical, for avoiding premature sedimentation of individuality. The simultaneity of corniness and "violent" handling, and a recklessly conceived, hard to fathom imagery whose meaning they themselves are uncertain of, fuse in a fantasy where strange yet half-familiar things happen. This fantasy is the unavoidable outcome of Germany's division. The grotesqueness latent in Lüpertz and other members of the first postwar generation becomes lavishly explicit in the Mülheimer Freiheit artists. The sense of fantastic relations innocently present in Baselitz's upside-downness becomes a positive outburst, leading to a fairytale world in which people can swallow brooms (Dahn), figures grow out of rivers (Bömmels), and there are weird conjunctions, often with ominous erotic implications (Adamski, Kever).

The question posed in one of Dokoupil's Documenta 7 pictures, "God, Where are Your Balls?, in which the slang "eggs" is used for "balls," is the question these artists seem to be asking themselves. They use slang versions of various modern styles—mass mediation has turned every style into a slogan spoken in slang—to try to make freshly offensive statements about their world's divided condition that itself offends them. They use an international art shorthand to try to recover the offensiveness with which modern art masked its sense of outrage at the world. Their art is a highly personalized way of articulating the absurd condition of being modern, i.e., new to oneself (because one is always different from oneself, divided against oneself). ☐

Gerard Kever: O.T., 1981, gouache on canvas, 85 3/4 by 56 1/2 inches.

Hans-Peter Adamski: "Kiss . . ." 1981, 86 1/2 by 57 11/16 inches. Paul Maenz Gallery.

Peter Bömmels: Traversale, 1981, dispersion on linen, 85 3/4 by 70 7/8 inches. Paul Maenz Gallery.

Walter Dahn and Georg Jiří Dokoupil: Robert Ryman, Can You Hear Me?, 1980, charcoal, varnish and dispersion on linen, 43 5/8 by 76 inches. Paul Maenz Gallery.

Gerhard Naschberger: Flaming Love, 1981, dispersion on linen, 60 5/8 by 78 inches. Paul Maenz Gallery.

VOL 7 1
ISS 1
JA 1983
UMI

JERRY'S ARTARAMA INC.
SUPER-SAVERS

GRUMBACHER FRENCH SKETCH BOX-EASEL
No. 286 $159.95 ppd.

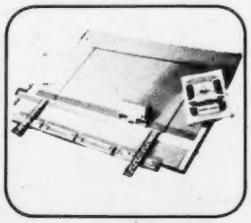
This is the original world famous combination sketch box/easel/canvas carrier. It is made from seasoned hardwood and precision handcrafted. Will hold canvas up to 32" high and can be titled. Comes complete with a finished palette. Measures only 6½x16x21" collapsed, and weighs only 13 pounds. Nationally advertised for $259.50, but now available to you delivered at this low Jerry's price.

3-DRAWER PASTEL CABINET
No. J-301 18.95 ppd.

By popular demand, we're introducing a new 3-drawer wood Pastel Cabinet. The practical home for all your soft pastels. Triple drawer cabinet measures 10x16x3". Crafted of natural wood with the highest degree of perfection. Specially slotted to organize over 150 pastels. A must for the pastel artist on the road or in the studio. Offered to you at an unbelievable post-paid price.

THE ARTIST'S HANDBOOK
No. AH-82 16.95 ppd.

Written by Ralph Mayer, this 1982 revised edition of this most popular artist's handbook is loaded with facts on supplies, materials & methods. A complete source of knowledge covering oils, tempera, pigments, mediums, mural paintings, etc., in addition to a new chapter on synthetic materials. All this at delivered to you savings.



ALTO'S E/Z MAT CUTTER
No. EZ-32 $35.95 ppd.

This simple machine makes beveled mat cutting easy. Comes with blades and a guide to cutting mats. This one machine can save you 10-times its low, low cost, and right now, it is offered at an unusually low delivered price. Manufacturer's list price $49.95.

The Jerry's Catalog #7A

An Art Store for $1.00 (free w/all orders). Discounts from 15-66% off manufacturers list.

SEND CHECK, MONEY ORDER, OR MASTERCARD & VISA NUMBER TO:
JERRY'S ARTARAMA, INC.
248-12 Union Turnpike, Bellerose, NY 11426

SHIP TO: ______
ADDRESS ______
CITY ______ STATE ______ ZIP ______
CARD NO. ______ EXP ______

NO.	QTY	DESCRIPTION	PR EA	AMOUNT
	7A	Art Store (120 pg. catalog) free with order	1.00
	286	Grumbacher French Easel Box	159.95
	J-301	3-Drawer Pastel Cabinet	18.95
	AH-82	The Artist's Handbook	24.95
	EZ-32	Alto's Mat Cutter	35.95
		Sub-Total
		NY State Residents add Sales Tax
		Outside Continental USA add 15% for shipping
		Total

This sale expires Feb. 10, 1983. All items include Shipping and Handling within the Continental USA. Outside add 15% of order. All items are shipped UPS, allow 2 weeks for delivery, include street address.

TO ORDER BY PHONE ☎ Please have your MasterCard or Visa ready (sorry No CODs)
CALL TOLL-FREE 1-800-221-2323
In NY, Alaska, Hawaii, Canada call 212-343-0777

The Art Students League of New York Founded 1875

215 West Fifty-Seventh Street, N.Y.C. 10019 (212) CIrcle 7-4510
R.A. Florio, Executive Director

The 108th Regular session is now in progress. Students may register at any time. Tuition is on a monthly basis. There are no entrance requirements. Part-time as well as full-time registration. All instruction is directed to the individual. Life models in most classes. 55 instructors with national reputations as professional artists. A.M., P.M., Late P.M. and Evening classes, Monday through Friday. One and two evening a week classes. Saturday classes for children and adults. The League accepts students of any race, color, religion or national or ethnic origin. Write or telephone for free, illustrated catalogue.

Drawing, Painting, Sculpture, Fine Arts Illustration, Mural Painting, Portrait Painting, Landscape, Anatomy for Artists, Perspective, Watercolor, Graphics (Etching, Engraving, Silkscreen, Woodcut, Lithography), Abstract Art, etc.

SIGGRAPH'83

Call for Participation
Art, Film and Video

ART SHOW

Computer-generated drawings, photographs, sculpture, prints and murals are being reviewed for inclusion in the July 25-29 SIGGRAPH '83 art show. Also being solicited for the art show are film and video works and installations involving computer graphics.
Deadline: April 1, 1983
Contact: Copper Giloth at (312) 663-0584

FILM & VIDEOTAPE SHOWS

The latest scientific, commercial and artistic computer-generated motion graphics on film and videotape are being reviewed for the two evening SIGGRAPH '83 film and videotape shows.
Deadline: June 24, 1983
Contact: Doris Kochanek at (514) 333-3434

General SIGGRAPH '83 information can be obtained by contacting SIGGRAPH '83 Conference Office, 111 East Wacker Drive, Chicago, Illinois 60601; (312) 644-6610.

acm

SIGGRAPH'83

Expressionist Fallacy

Continued from page 83

several Neo-Expressionists are presented in its image. This, though, is public relations. The artists tend to assume another role—the old model of the artist as charlatan, as fake (who thieves from art, high and low). But finally this (Dali) model cannot redeem its given status as camp; it is scandalous, if at all, mostly to other artists.

Institutional supporters, of course, enwrap these artists in a rhetoric of authenticity and originality—but this too is ironic. For clearly, these artists trade, if not in fraudulence and pastiche quite, then in simulations of authenticity and originality. Indeed, they often seem to confect masterpieces: in the paintings of Schnabel or Kiefer or Chia, say, pastiche may mime the grand synthesis of the masterwork and a disavowal of present conditions may simulate the timeless virtues of Great Art. Usually this simulation comes with masterpiece trappings—huge canvas, heavy frame, grand style, very heavy thematics.

None of this is meant as an ethical argument against such art. To me, this art is provocative, if mostly as a symptom of our historical moment, which is seen by some as a "perpetual present."[15] Far from a return to history (as is so ideologically posed), recent culture attests to an extraordinary loss of history—or rather a displacement of it by the pseudo-historical. Thus today, artists and architects only seem to prize open history (a necessary disruption that frees it from mere continuity) to redeem specific moments; in fact, they only give us hallucinations of the historical, masks of these moments. In short, they return to us our historically most cherished forms—as kitsch. And strangely not only do we acquiesce in this liquidation of a tradition, we relish it. The irony, however, is that this only seems to be the old bourgeois self-hatred; in fact, it is a flaunted privilege—a kind of hubris. For now it seems we no longer need meaning, no longer need ideological control of "history" or "culture." (Or is it rather that our new ideological control is that we seem able to dispense with these things?)

Neo-Expressionism appears then as a problematic response to this loss—of the historical, the real, and of the subject. By and large, the Neo-Expressionists would reclaim these entities as substances; the work, however, reveals them to be signs—and Expressionism to be a language. This, finally, is the pathos of such art: it denies what its practitioners would assert. For the very gestures that insist on the presence of the historical, the real, and of the subject testify to nothing so much as a desperation at their loss. There is an idealism here, to be sure, but it is an idealism "shown to be an idolatry, a fascination with a false image that mimics the presumed attributes of authenticity when it is in fact just the hollow mask with which a frustrated, defeated consciousness tries to cover up its own negativity."[16]

---

1. Theodor W. Adorno, "Cultural Criticism and Society," Prisms, MIT Press, 1981, p. 31.
2. Louis Marin, "Toward a Theory of Reading the Visual Arts: Poussin's The Arcadian Shepherds," in Suleiman and Crosman, eds., The Reader in the Text, Princeton, Press, 1980.
3. This may be less the case in Abstract-Expressionist painting where the material elements are said to exist "as such"—but do they not then encode, or re-present, "flatness," etc.?
4. Of course not all "non-naturalistic" marks are Expressionist; here, the coded act of freeing or cancelling should be stressed.
5. This intuition of Greenberg's ("After Abstract Expressionism"), revised by Michael Fried ("Art and Objecthood"), remains true: the canvas signals a representational paradigm first. (And if this paradigm is superceded, it may be by a textual rather than an abstract model—the canvas as Rauschenbergian "site.")
6. This suppression was partly due to a conflation of the rhetorical with the ornamental—which, according to one modern project, had to be expunged.
7. Friedrich Nietzsche in Will to Power, quoted in Paul de Man, Allegories of Reading, Yale University Press, 1979, pp. 107, 108.
8. This sign appears less as expression than in its stead: expression is always deferred, desire always displaced—to another sign.
9. Adorno, "Notes on Kafka," Prisms, p. 262.
10. Jean Baudrillard, Simulacres et simulation, Paris, Edition Galilée, 1981, p. 52.
11. The rise of the commodity, the social upheaval of 19th-century capitalism, and the rise of the type (in journalism, the novel, caricature, etc.) are all obviously related.
12. See Lionel Trilling, Sincerity and Authenticity, Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1972, a sort of "proto-neoconservative" text. Nancy Marmer points out to me that the artist is often an exception: in the novel he is allowed to cross class lines. Allowed: this is his function—to attest to the (false) liberality of the system.
13. Baudrillard, p. 52.
14. See Craig Owens, "Sherrie Levine at A & M Artworks," A.i.A., Summer 1982, p. 148.
15. This term is used by Fredric Jameson.
16. Paul de Man, "Criticism and Crisis," in Philipson and Gudel, eds., Aesthetics Today, New York, New American Library, p. 345.

Sincere Stroke

Continued from page 79

pressionism, a cluster of sketchy, impassioned-looking devices in support of his attack on corporate power. It's not clear in his case that he knows about Expressionism's propensity for burn-out, the weaknesses that quickly turn signs of sincere feeling into parodies of signification. Richard Bosman, on the other hand, understands those weaknesses well. Drawing on the violence of B-movie stills and kung fu comic book frames, he puts painterly violence to work exaggerating pop-Expressionism's most dubious traits. The outcome is a bizarre sentimentality, a doting on his own worst fears. The purpose, perhaps, is to set the merely fearful apart from the actual, a sincerely-felt motive for Bosman's seeming insincerity, his Expressionist overkill.

If Bosman swamps his ironies in turbulent paint, Walter Robinson thins out the medium, letting his detachment and self-mockery rise to the surface and glitter. Robinson's remakes of pulp-fiction book covers indicate a crush on melodrama; on the extravagant manners melodrama affects; and, most of all, on the poignance of all that cheapness, all that excess, all that inevitable doom. In Robinson's paintings, the necessary failures of Expressionism join with the cruel fates of pulp-fiction characters in something like a torrid embrace.

Contemplating the impossibility of innocence, Robinson's art suggests that not even the sheerest vulgarity of which commercial publishing is capable can achieve it—a point he makes from well within those high-modernist precincts where a yearning for innocence is more than an occupational hazard. It is a way of life. It is what leads Andy Warhol to his desire to be a machine: functional but neither culpable nor tempted to assign blame. Such desires point to the modernist extreme at which Warhol arrived with his portraits of the 1970s. Here painterly, Expressionist touches flaunt an utter absence of sincerity. These flourishes are innocent of any regrets about the impossibility of innocence, spontaneity, unmediated directness. Warhol in recent seasons has become as machinelike as it is possible for an artist to be, a state he could only achieve by means of a self-consciousness that renders him unbearably human. Only those who have achieved something close to the absolute emptiness of innocence can know how replete with its opposite they are. And only the most sordid flirtation with Expressionism and its ideals could have brought Warhol to his present knowledge.

Some modernists have tried to transcend all questions of personal innocence, of singular knowledge. They are reductivists, led by Malevich and Mondrian and the Minimalists. For them, Expressionism's promises are beside the point, as is the style's failure to make those promises good. Staking nothing on an earthbound sincerity, a reductivist couldn't care less if it turns out to be a mirage. But I think artists should care about such things. I think that they should confront Expressionism and its traps, for only out of such risks can come persuasive forms, images that acknowledge the difficulties of expressiveness. Modernism needs the entranced, distracted naiveté of Expressionism as a starting point on the way toward its sophistication, its ironies, its fictions of unmitigated consciousness. The Expressionists themselves needed Expressionism for this purpose. The style is the sphinx whose stupid riddles must be solved if an artist is to gain full entry to the world. ☐

Author: Carter Ratcliff's most recent book is John Singer Sargent (Abbeville).

VOL 7 1
ISS 1
JA 1983
UMI

TATISTCHEFF

DAVID DEWEY

WATERCOLORS

JANUARY 4-28

TATISTCHEFF
38 EAST 57 • NEW YORK • 888-1599

14 JANUARY TO 18 FEBRUARY

MILTON AVERY

SELECTED WORKS ON PAPER

JIM DOW

FAY GOLD GALLERY

3221 CAINS HILL PLACE NORTHWEST
ATLANTA, GEORGIA 30305 (404)233-3843

GARY KURODA

WATERCOLORS

William Sawyer Gallery

JANUARY 1983

3045 CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, CA 94115
Tuesday-Saturday 11-6 (415) 921-1600

Important
Contemporary Ceramic
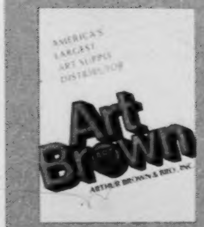
Art

Exhibit A
233 E. Ontario Street Chicago, Illinois 60611
312-944-1748

FREE
catalog with purchase of Stumpy or Great Crate.



AMERICA'S LARGEST ART SUPPLY DISTRIBUTOR
Art Brown
ARTHUR BROWN & BRO., INC.

- Unique 228p resource for artists
- Use for one-stop shopping
- Contains over 20,000 items

Just purchase
STUMPY™

$5.95
clutch sketching pencil
3 extra lead refills included

OR

Just purchase
GREAT CRATE™

$4.95
beautiful studio and desk top organizer

Enclosed find check for items checked below:

Stumpy ☐ plus catalog $5.95
Great Crate ☐ plus catalog $4.95
Art Brown ☐ catalog only $3.00

C183AIA

Name__________
Address__________
City/State/Zip__________

America's Largest Art Supply Distributor
ARTHUR BROWN & BRO., INC.
2 West 46th Street, New York, N.Y. 10036

VIVIENNE THAUL WECHTER
Paintings and work on paper
January 8-January 22, 1983

RAQUEL RABINOVICH
Sculpture
January 25 - February 5, 1983

KOUROS GALLERY
831 Madison Avenue New York, NY 10021 (212) 879-5454

We'll make you work hard so you'll have an easier time getting the job you want. For information about our programs in Graphic Design, Advertising, Illustration, Fine Arts and Photography, call (617) 262-2844.

THE ART INSTITUTE OF BOSTON
700 Beacon St., Boston, MA 02215
We'll put your creativity to work.

BURL JONES

The Barrister
Bronze Edition: 25
Height 12″ including base
Representation:
Arts Focus, Inc.
401 Capitol St., Charleston, WV 25301
(304) 345-9059

Item No. 101

$41.95

Item No. 102

$32.95

Item No. 103

$13.95

OUR PRICES ARE A WORK OF ART

Rowney Egg Tempera Set. England's reknown color maker recreates this medieval medium in a 12 color sampler (22ml tubes). Reduce with water and apply in thin glaze for brilliant luminosity. Lists at $45. You pay only $41.95. Item No. 101.

Strathmore Red Sable Brushes. The famous name says it all – superior quality. This set of #1, #4 and #12 watercolor brushes have excellent spring and hold ample color. Our 33% discount makes them affordable at $32.95. Item No. 102.

Caran D'ache Neocolor II Aquarelle Crayon Set. For high color strength and permanence in a wash effect, this full color assortment of 30 crayons is a solid buy at $13.95. Regularly sells for $14.95. Item No. 103.

Our Gift To You. A deluxe set of 12 Derwent pastel drawing pencils. Yours FREE with any order from this ad.

To order, send in coupon below with VISA or Mastercard number and expiration date, check or money order. Outside Washington state call TOLL-FREE 1-800-426-6740, 8:30AM-5:00PM, PST, Monday-Friday.
All prices include shipping.

Please send me Item No.(s) ______________ Total $ __________
Name ______________________________________
Address ____________________________________
City __________________ State ________ Zip __________
6 Mail coupon to: Daniel Smith Ink Co., 1111 W. Nickerson, Seattle, WA 98119.
Washington residents add 6.5% sales tax. Offer and prices shown for U.S. only and good through February, 1983. Orders generally shipped within 48 hours.

THE STRETCHER COMPANY
153 WAVERLY PLACE, NEW YORK, NEW YORK 10014
989 3939

attention artists and gallery owners

we offer the finest custom artist stretchers
made to your size;
expandable or rigid.

our ball socket joints
are unique and create the ultimate in artists stretchers

we also have available:

stripping—applied or
in any length in:

cherry	maple
walnut	tenite
oak	gilded
ash	painted

with or without shadow line

unprimed cotton duck and linens

FRAMEMASTERS INC
CUSTOM PICTURE FRAMERS
WHOLESALE/RETAIL (AT DISCOUNT)

- natural wood frames
  (oak, ash, maple, cherry and walnut)
- gold and silver leaf
- round corner frames
  (natural wood, gilded or painted)
- painted frames
- shadow boxes
- welded aluminum frames
- welded brass frames
- plexiboxes
- crating and shipping
- commercial prefinished moldings
- nielsen metal sections
- shrink wrapping
  (to hang or for display)
- stripping for paintings
- matting (paperboard, acid free, all rag, fabric, hand wrapped, (etc.)
- mounting (wet or dry)
- linen backing
- plexiglas (standard, UF 3, etc.)

pick up service in New York City (Manhattan)

153 WAVERLY PLACE, N.Y., N.Y. 10014
691-0486

VOL 7 1
ISS 1
JA
1983

STEVEN MOLASKY
BOXERS

Ziller and Associates
1095 East Twain, Suite 2-Z
Las Vegas, Nevada 89109
(702) 737-2046

The League Takes Pleasure in Presenting an Unusual Exhibition

THE IMMORTAL EIGHT AND ITS INFLUENCE

Stressing the artists who studied with them and formed the "Ashcan School" at the ART STUDENTS LEAGUE

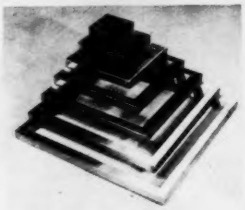
215 WEST FIFTY-SEVENTH STREET
January 10 - 29, 1983

In conjunction with the Whitney Museum's exhibition, "The Eight"

MORTON
RACHOFSKY
SCULPTURE

3 Three Sisters Gallery
2300 Mercantile Bank Bldg.
Dallas, Texas 75201
214/748-1248

Catalogue Available
$6.00



Untitled #178 Stainless Steel H: 10½"

BRANCHVILLE SOHO GALLERY
RIDGEFIELD, CONN.
NEW YORK QUALITY ART at COUNTRY prices
IN JANUARY
BY APPOINTMENT ONLY

S. SWEET
FLATTENED PEOPLE
JANUARY 8 - JANUARY 27
P. JESSEE
MONUMENTAL MINIATURES
FEBRUARY 19 - MARCH 10
AARON·HASTINGS
GALLERY
1130 St. Charles Ave., New Orleans, La., 70130 (504)523-7202

theOctober
GALLERY

Specializing in Contemporary Works on Paper by
American, Canadian and European Artists

1226 Spring St., St. Helena, CA 94574 707 963-7501

Galería San Jerónimo
Condado Holiday Inn - 999 Ashford Ave. Condado, P.R. - Tel. 722-1808 / 721-1000

FEATURING ARTISTS OF PUERTO RICO
and
J. D'ESOPO, J. KRESMAN,
C. PFAHL, L. MARCOS,
M. LOVELAND MILLER,
T. SPINNER

FORTALEZA Watercolor JAN D'ESOPO

Galería San Juan
Blvd. del Valle 204-206 Old San Juan, P.R. - Tel. 722-1808 / 725-3829

Paintings,
Drawings &
Sculpture

Tasende
Gallery
820 Prospect Street, La Jolla, California 92037
(714) 454-3691

UMI

JON LEON GALLERY

David Novros

January 12-February 19

31 Desbrosses Street New York City 226-7789

Open Saturday 12 to 6 pm. Other Days by Appointment Only

Tyler School of Art
TEMPLE UNIVERSITY,
A Commonwealth University

Programs Offered:
Graphic Design,
Painting, Printmaking,
Metals/Jewelry,
Ceramics/Glass,
Weaving/Textiles,
Sculpture,
Photography

Tyler Degrees:
BFA, MFA, MEd.,
Tyler in Rome: Semester/Year,
Teaching Certification

For Information:
Tyler School of Art, Box 2901B
Philadelphia, PA 19126

THE PRINTMAKING WORKSHOP
JEROME FOUNDATION AWARDS

ARTISTS PRINTS

3/3

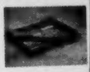
January 12-28
Cayman Gallery/Soho
381 West Broadway NYC
Opening:
January 12, 5-9 pm

'Biach' Galleries

Cleveland Plaza suite 108
123 North Union Ave.
Cranford, New Jersey 07016
(201) 272-7070

PEARL
WORLD'S LARGEST
ART & CRAFT DISCOUNT CENTER

PREMIER 36" Paper Cutter



- 10 Year Limited Warranty
- High Carbon Steel Blade
- Skid Resistant, Non-Mar Feet
- Adjustable Paper Guide

LIST $199.95 PEARL $134.95

Call or Write for our FREE Professional Mail Order Catalog

ASTRASCOPE
Opaque Projector #5000
- Enlarges to 5' X 5'
- With 250mm F/3.5 Multiple Coated Lens

LIST $289.50 PEARL $210.00

GRUMBACHER
96 Color Pastel Set
- Two plastic interlocking module trays
- Suited for all pastel work

LIST $115.70 PEARL $75.95

KOH-I-NOOR RAPIDOGRAPH

4 pen set
#3165SP
–Improved metal nib
Sizes 00/0/1/2
LIST $46.75 PEARL $23.35

REMBRANDT PASTEL SETS

- Finest quality soft pastels
- Two set Sizes

*30 Color LIST $26.40 PEARL $13.20
45 Color LIST $41.50 PEARL $20.75
*Not Shown

SNO BRAND
P - 11 Kiln
- Works on 240 Line
- Cone 7 • Max Temp 2307
- 120 Volts

VALUE $425.00 PEARL $275.00

THE SILENT GIANT
AIR FORCE COMPRESSOR
- Gives up to 120 PSI
- Quiet, Tank & Line Pressure gauges

LIST $539.99 PEARL $405.00

BUFFALO ARTIST COLOR MARKER SETS

30 Color Set
LIST $13.20 PEARL $7.26
60 Color Set
LIST $26.40 PEARL $14.52
Specify 1300 Medium Point, 1400 Fine Point

Pearl Art & Craft
2411 Hempstead Tpke.
East Meadow, NY 11554
(516) 731-3726

(Above specials mail order only)
Your order will be shipped C.O.D. plus shipping & handling
N.Y.S. residents add applicable sales tax. *These prices will be held to 1/31/83
All sale items while supplies last.

OTHER LOCATIONS
New York City, Long Island, Paramus, New Jersey, Woodbridge, New Jersey, Ft. Lauderdale, Fla., Miami, Fla.
We honor: Visa. Master Charge. Certified check or Money order

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

monthly exhibitions of significant contemporary artists the eason

gallery

338 east de vargas
santa fe, nm 87501
(505) 982-9573

KRAUSHAAR GALLERIES
724 Fifth Ave (Bet. 57th & 56th Sts New York
Tues. thru Sat., 9:30 to 5:30

GALLERY GROUP
New Works • Dec. 15-Jan. 8

WILLIAM KIENBUSCH
Memorial Exhibition • Jan. 12-Feb. 5

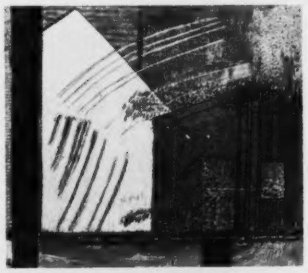
NANETTE CARTER
COLLAGES

OLIVER STEINDECKER
WATER-COLORS

JANUARY 15 - JANUARY 29

ERICSON GALLERY
23 E 74 ST NYC 10021 737-6155

Shelley Haven
January 11 -
February 6



Making It Home No. 4, 1981,
Pastel & Watercolor, 29½" x 34"

Yvonne Séguy Gallery
61 West 62 Street • Harkness Plaza • New York, New York 10023
(212) 265-3314

ESTEBAN VICENTE
New Paintings
Commemorating His 80th Birthday
January
GRUENEBAUM GALLERY
38 East 57 Street
New York, New York 10022
212-838-8245

Skowhegan School of Painting &
Sculpture

June 21-August 23, 1983

An independent work program for sixty advanced painters and sculptors with twelve resident and visiting artists working in a rural Maine community.

Application deadline:
February 28, 1983

For information write:
329 East 68th Street
New York, N.Y., 10021
Tel. 212 861-9270

Art Books and Illustrated Books

Rare and scholarly books in all fields of the visual arts.

Important illustrated books from the fifteenth century to the present.

ars libri, ltd.
286 SUMMER STREET • BOSTON, MA 02210
(617) 357-5212
Mon.-Fri. 9 to 6 • Sat. 11 to 5

KENNETH LYNCH & SONS
Art Gallery
and Museum supplies

Picture hanging rods, mouldings, security devices, stanchions, vitrines, art storage racks, gallery carts, tablets, and plaques.
• Free Catalog •

KENNETH LYNCH & SONS
Box 488-AM, Wilton, CT 06897 (203) 762-8363

Yoseido Gallery

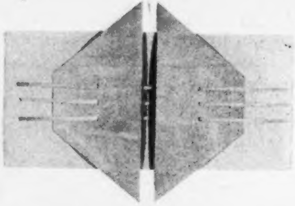
Contemporary Japanese prints

5-5-15, Ginza, Chuo-ku, Tokyo,
Japan phone: 571-1312, 2471

100 page catalog upon request— $8.00

YVONNE ROSSER

jan 15 - feb 28



"Passage Way" #1 19"x27"
Acrylic on Paper Construction

JAN·WEINER·GALLERY
3014 EVENINGSIDE TOPEKA KANSAS 66614 BY APPOINTMENT 913 272-5535

MARTHA MACKS
New Works • January 6 — 30, 1983

C. GRIMALDIS GALLERY
928 N. Charles St. Baltimore, MD 21201
Hours: TUES-SAT 10-5; SUN 1-5 (301) 539-1080 modern paintings

& sculpture pierre matisse gallery
41 east 57th street
new york

GALLERY GROUP SHOW
JANUARY 11 THROUGH FEBRUARY 12

DBR GALLERY
13225 SHAKER SQUARE CLEVELAND OHIO 44120 216/491-8062

MIDTOWN
GALLERIES EST. 1932 11 East 57 St., N.Y. (212) 758-1900

"RECENT PAINTINGS BY ARTISTS ASSOCIATED WITH MIDTOWN GALLERIES SINCE THE 30s & 40s"

SINCE 1932 FOREMOST IN AMERICAN CONTEMPORARY ART

ROBERTO WHITE
and associates

Museum quality paintings and sculpture
16th to 20th century

by appointment only
225 Central Park West, New York, N.Y. 10024
(212) 580-2416

January 11 - February 26
TAPESTRY • FIBER

BAYER	AKERS
MOTHERWELL	BOUSSARD
NOLAND	GROSSEN
SCHOLDER	KAO
YOUNGERMAN	MARTENS
ZOX	SMITH

MODERN MASTER TAPESTRIES INC.
11 East 57th St., N.Y. 10022. (212) 838-0412. Tues.–Sat., 9:30–5:30.

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
JA
1983
UMI

inter-american Art gallery
1000 madison avenue new york n.y. 10021 (212) 772-7760

DUNOYER
LARRAZ
LLONA
TACLA

Editions Limited Galleries, Inc.

Artists: Altman, Alvar, Barnet, Block, Closson, Fannin, Faust, Kipniss, Kitchell, McMillan, Meyers, Peters, Puhalla, Price, Shorr, Sherri Smith, Summers, Weinberg, Williams and Wolters.

Dealer Inquiries Invited

8702 Keystone Crossing
Indianapolis, IN 46240
Tel. (317) 848-7878

1 Market Plaza
San Francisco, CA 94105
Tel. (415) 777-5711

The Erté 90th Birthday Retrospective

The most comprehensive collection of gouaches, sculpture, graphics, tapestries, posters and silks ever assembled for the collector.

Exhibition Extended to February 6.

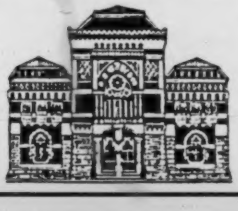
Dyansen Gallery
122 Spring Street • New York 10012
212-226-3384 800-847-4234

PENNSYLVANIA ACADEMY OF THE FINE ARTS

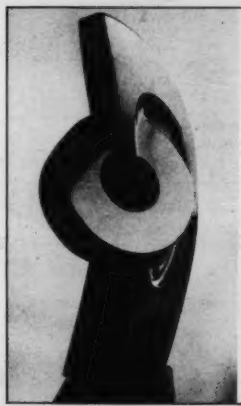
Oldest art school in America offers majors in Painting, Sculpture & Printmaking. Admission to Day school by Portfolio. Accredited by NASAD. Financial Aid available. Approved for Veterans.

Evening & Summer programs in Painting, Drawing and Sculpture.

Founded 1805



For catalog write:
PAFA, Room M,
Broad & Cherry Sts.,
Phila., PA 19102



54" high

ANNE HARRIS
RECENT WORKS
Feb. 12 - Mar. 18

PATRICIA JUDITH ART GALLERY
720 East Palmetto Park Road
Boca Raton, FL 33432
(305) 368-3316

MARVIN KING

ORIGINAL PERFORMANCES OF NEW MUSIC, HARDWOOD CARVINGS AND VIDEO ILLUSTRATION ON VHS.
30 min/8 tunes/107 pieces
Signed Drawing and Cassette $268.0

JANE-LEE VIDEO GALLERY
P.O. Box 50014
Austin, Texas 78763
512-476-2799

ART SPELLINGS

FORCE FIELDS

January 4-18, 1983

TIFFANY'S WINDOWS 5th AVE at 57th ST
New York, NY 10022 212-605-4418

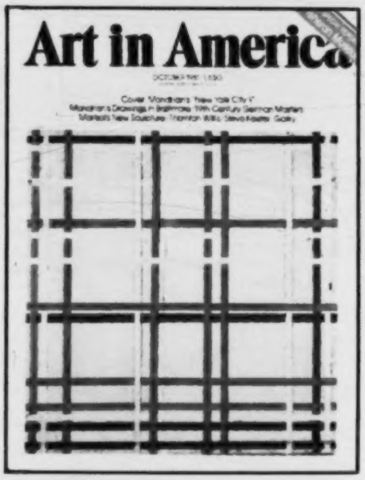
E.A.T. BIBLIOGRAPHY 1965-1980
by BILLY KLUVER

Lists 969 publications documenting the evolution of art and technology since 1965

$7.50 plus $1 postage and handling

EXPERIMENTS IN ART AND TECHNOLOGY
49 East 68th Street New York, N.Y. 10021
(212) 285-1690

TIMELESS.
REVOLUTIONARY.
CLASSIC.
AVANT-GARDE.
ELEGANT.
SPONTANEOUS.



JUST PICTURE IT.

At ART IN AMERICA, we believe an art magazine should be as vital, immediate, and unpredictable as art itself.

In a single issue of ART IN AMERICA, you might find Jasper Johns sharing the spotlight with J. M. W. Turner...or 17th Century Dutch landscape painting juxtaposed with "The Thing" in the South Bronx...or Le Corbusier competing with Miami Beach Art Deco.

And, we have one more surprise for you...

If you subscribe now to ART IN AMERICA, you'll also receive the new ART IN AMERICA Guide To Galleries, Museums, Artists as part of your subscription. The most comprehensive national directory ever published, the Guide will be your year-round reference to more than 2,000 art galleries and museums and the artists they exhibit. It's a $5.95 value–and it's yours at no additional cost when you subscribe to ART IN AMERICA.

By now, you've probably realized that at ART IN AMERICA we don't follow any formulas...with one major exception: our formula for savings! When you subscribe to ART IN AMERICA, you'll receive 11 spectacular issues for only $34.95–a hefty 15% savings off the single copy price. So don't delay–detach the convenient order card at right and mail today.

SAVE 15%!

Art in America

542 PACIFIC AVENUE
MARION, OHIO 43306

☐ Yes! Send me one year (11 issues*) of ART IN AMERICA for only $34.95–a 15% savings off the single copy rate.

☐ Check/Money Order enclosed ☐ Bill me later

☐ VISA ☐ Mastercard

Acct. # ______ Exp. ______

Name ______

Address ______ Apt. # ______

City, State, Zip ______

*All subscriptions include our new, annual Guide to Galleries, Museums, Artists–the most comprehensive national directory ever published. In U.S. Possessions and Canada, add $8 per year; elsewhere, add $10 per year.

EA301

SAVE 15%!

Art in America

542 PACIFIC AVENUE
MARION, OHIO 43306

☐ Yes! Send me one year (11 issues*) of ART IN AMERICA for only $34.95–a 15% savings off the single copy rate.

☐ Check/Money Order enclosed ☐ Bill me later

☐ VISA ☐ Mastercard

Acct. # ______ Exp. ______

Name ______

Address ______ Apt. # ______

City, State, Zip ______

*All subscriptions include our new, annual Guide to Galleries, Museums, Artists–the most comprehensive national directory ever published. In U.S. Possessions and Canada, add $8 per year; elsewhere, add $10 per year.

EA301

Art America

NO POSTAGE NECESSARY
IF MAILED
IN THE
UNITED STATES

BUSINESS REPLY CARD
FIRST CLASS PERMIT NO. 542 MARION, OHIO

POSTAGE WILL BE PAID BY

Art in America
542 PACIFIC AVENUE
MARION, OHIO 43306

NO POSTAGE
NECESSARY
IF MAILED
IN THE
UNITED STATES

BUSINESS REPLY CARD
FIRST CLASS PERMIT NO. 542 MARION, OHIO

POSTAGE WILL BE PAID BY

Art in America
542 PACIFIC AVENUE
MARION, OHIO 43306

VOL 7 1 ISS 1 J A 1983 UMI

Machorro Gallery Inc.

MAJOR WORKS BY

Francisco Zuñiga

January 4 - February 4

3400 MONTROSE BLVD
SUITE 103
HOUSTON TEXAS 77006
(713) 526-9270

5015 WESTHEIMER SUITE 3195
HOUSTON TEXAS 77056
(713) 629-5678

THE SOURCE

R C Gorman

AT

Now & Then Gallery Ltd.

797 Merrick Ave. East Meadow, L.I., N.Y. 11554
(516) 481-1447 (212) 895-1145

LITHOS—CERAMICS—SCULPTURE—SILKSCREENS

Curt Brill
ceramics

Karl Umlauf cast paper

JAN. 22-FEB. 12

GALLERY ONE INC

(817) 737-9566

4935 Byers
Fort Worth, Texas 76107

Monumental Drawings

Richard Fishman Richard Nonas William Tucker
Jene Highstein Richard Serra Mia Westerlund

January 7 - February 9, 1983
Large format drawings by sculptors

Hillwood Art Gallery
C.W. Post Center
Long Island University
Greenvale, N.Y. 11548

*Catalogue available

ART SERVICES

ADVERTISING AGENCIES

WEBB DESIGN STUDIO/TAOS Circle No. 1
501 Ranchitos Road
Taos, NM 87571 (505) 758-3447
Graphic design to promote the arts: exhibition catalogues, brochures, advertisements, quality color postcards.

APPRAISERS

PIERCE GALLERIES, INC. Circle No. 2
721 Main St. Route 228
Hingham, MA 02043 (617) 749-6023
19th and Early 20th Century American Art.
By Appointment Only.

ART CONSULTANTS

ANN H. BISSELL Circle No. 3
2844 Wisconsin Avenue, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20007 (202) 363-2867
Art Installation, Lighting Design and Framing on a Consulting Basis.

COLSON SCULPTURE SERVICE INT'L Circle No. 4
1375 5th Street
Sarasota, FL 33579 (813) 365-3818, 953-5892
Ceramics Shell Sculpture Casting Set-up and Related Information.

ART POSTERS

POSTER ORIGINALS LTD. Circle No. 5
924 Madison Ave. New York, NY 10021 (212) 861-0422
158 Spring Street New York, NY 10012 (212) 226-7720
Major Distributor of American and European Art Posters.

ART SUPPLIES

ARTHUR BROWN & BRO., INC. Circle No. 6
2 West 46 Street
New York, NY 10036 (212) 575-5555
America's Largest Art Materials Distributor.
Home of the International Pen Shop.

EASTERN ARTISTS & DRAFTING MATERIALS 7
352 Park Avenue South
New York, NY 10010 (212) 725-5555
Everything for the Artist, Draftsman, Photo-Studio at 20% to 50% off list.

JERRY'S ARTARAMA, INC. Circle No. 8
248-12X Union Turnpike
Bellerose, NY 11426
Huge savings on art materials and picture frames.

KENNETH LYNCH & SONS Circle No. 9
Box 488, Wilton, CT 06897 (203) 762-8363
Picture hanging rods, mouldings, security devices, stanchions, vitrines, art storage racks, gallery carts, tablets, and plaques. FREE CATALOG.

PEARL PAINT CO. Circle No. 10
2411 Hempstead Turnpike
East Meadow, NY 11554 (516) 731-3726
Largest art supply discount center for the professional.

Continued

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

ART SERVICES

RISING PAPER COMPANY Circle No. 11
Dennis M. O'Connor
Housatonic, MA 01236 (413) 274-3345
Manufacturers of Mirage, Dansk, Stonehenge, and more. Now in pads.

THE SAINT ARMAND PAPER MILL, INC. Circle No. 12
110 Young
Montreal, Canada H3C 2E7 (514) 935-7526
Finest Linen watercolor papers.
22x30, 300 lbs., $7.50/sheet: samples.

SHIVA® INC. Circle No. 13
4320 West 190th Street
Torrance, CA 90509 (213) 542-5583
Artists PAINTSTIK®, solid oil paint in stick form.
Call (800) 421-1325

THE STRETCHER COMPANY Circle No. 14
153 Waverly Place
New York, NY 10014 (212) 989-3939
Custom artists stretchers. Canvas, stretching, stripping, etc.

WINSOR & NEWTON Circle No. 15
555 Winsor Drive
Secaucus, NJ 07094
Manufacturers of the world's finest artists' materials since 1832.

ARTS ATTORNEYS

KAUFMAN AND GARSHELL Circle No. 16
275 Madison Avenue, Suite 1501
New York, New York 10016 (212) 683-9330
Legal Representation in the Arts for Fine Artists, Galleries, Collectors, Publishers and Distributors.

EXHIBIT DESIGN

ART LAB Circle No. 17
610 North American Street
Philadelphia, PA 19123 (215) 925-4999, 922-2937
Museum Quality Exhibit Design and Production—Artist's Projects Fabrications, Museum, Corporate and Private.

EXHIBITION CATALOGUES

WORLDWIDE BOOKS Circle No. 18
Brian Gold 37 Antwerp Street
Boston, MA 02135 (617) 787-9100
The foremost specialist in Int'l Art Exhibition Catalogues since 1960.

FINE ART PHOTOGRAPHERS

D. JAMES DEE Circle No. 19
The SoHo Photographer.
12 Wooster Street
New York, New York 10013 (212) 966-7884
Photographing Art is our ONLY Business.

THOMAS MOON PHOTOGRAPHY Circle No. 20
1 Holden Street
Brookline, MA 02146 (617) 232-8044
Photography Services for the Fine Arts. Black & White, Color, INFRARED. Print or Transparency. All formats.

M. TINCHER PHOTOGRAPHY Circle No. 21
320 Artist Road
Santa Fe, NM 87501 (505) 988-1342/982-4899
All Formats, B&W. Special Attention to Color—Processed in my own Lab. Sculpture, All Mediums in the Fine Arts.

FINE ART PRINTERS

COLOR Q AFFORDABLE FINE ART REPRODUCTIONS Circle No. 22
2835 Springboro W./Box 1007 Dayton OH 45401 (513) 294-0406
Get your FREE booklet: "How to gain wider recognition for your artistry, and make more money, too."

CINDI ETTINGER Circle No. 23
142 Vine Street
Philadelphia, PA 19106 (215) 928-9897
Printing Services, Instruction and Plate Restoration. Will Collaborate with Artist.

GALAPAGOS PRESS Circle No. 24
2337 Philmont Avenue, Huntingdon Valley, PA 19006
Contact Cynthia Draper Steuber. (215) 947-5388,89
Excl. Serigrapher for Jerry Schurr. Now expanded to include Printing of Ltd. Silkscreen Edns. for other Fine Artists.

FINE ART TRAVEL

ART EXPLORER'S TOURS Circle No. 25
P.O. Box 26689-P
San Francisco, CA 94126 (415) 921-7677
Egypt & Kenya Feb. '83, China May '83, Africa Aug '83
Sao Paulo Biennale Oct '83, Venice Biennale Sept '84

FOUNDRIES/FABRICATORS

MATTHEWS CLASSIC BRONZE DIVISION 26
2230 North Chico Avenue
South El Monte, CA 91733 (213) 444-0468
Our lost wax casting capabilities assure the quality and fidelity of your art. Contact Mel Schelbauer.

JOEL MEISNER FOUNDRY & GALLERY Circle No. 27
120 Fairchild Avenue
Plainview, NY 11803 (516) 349-0260, (212) 895-1472
THE COMPLETE CENTER FOR BRONZE SCULPTURE: for the Sculptor . . . for the Collector . . . for the Art Dealer & Publisher.

FRAMERS

AESTHETIC FRAME DESIGN Circle No. 28
800 Traction Avenue
Los Angeles, CA 90013 (213) 680-4710
Wholesale Custom Framing Specializing in Archival Presentation for Artists, Galleries, Museums, Consultants.

JACK BARNETT CUSTOM FRAMES Circle No. 29
144 North Second Street
Philadelphia, PA 19106 (215) 629-1766
Specializing in Molded Plexi Frames, U.F.3. Fully Rounded Leaf Frames, Complete Frame Restoration.

BRADIN CUSTOM FRAMING Circle No. 30
3646 South Westshore Blvd.
Tampa, FL 33609 (813) 837-5916
Archival Framing, Nielson Metal Molding for Artists, Designers. Wood Frames. Wholesale.

ART SERVICES

FRONTIER FRAMES Circle No. 31
495 Montezuma
Santa Fe, NM 87501 (505) 982-1370
Quality Custom Framing, Specializing in Conservation Framing for Artists, Galleries, and Collectors.

GREY GOOSE CUSTOM FRAMING Circle No. 32
5046 West Pico Blvd.
Los Angeles, CA 90019 (213) 938-6795
Art Framing to Museum Standards. Plexiglass, Aluminum, Brass, Hardwood. Wholesale.

MARK L.V. FRAMES Circle No. 33
330 Hudson Street
New York, NY 10013 (212) 620-0522
Museum Quality Custom Framing.
Poster Mountings. Plexiboxes.

TURNER FRAMING Circle No. 34
7508 Leesburg Pike, Falls Church, VA 22043
Also locations in Great Falls, Fairfax.
Excellence in Quality Custom Framing. Private Individual and Commercial Accounts.

WALLNUTS FRAME DESIGN Circle No. 35
2018 Locust Street
Philadelphia, PA 19103 (215) 732-8850
Design Consultants to PROFESSIONAL PICTURE FRAMERS ASSOC.
Museum Matting, Exotic Woods, Acrylic Boxes, Pedestals.

HANGING & DISPLAY EQUIPMENT

WALKER SYSTEMS, INC. Circle No. 36
530 South 21 Avenue East
Duluth, MN 55812 (218) 728-4434
Picture Hanging Devices (Rails, Rods, Hooks, Holders)
Panel Hardware for freestanding displays & exhibits.

INSTALLATIONS

DENIS CONLEY GALLERY Circle No. 37
86 West Bowery Street
Akron, Ohio 44308
(216) 376-3884
Framing, Crating, Installations.

INSURANCE

FLATHER & HAYES COMPANY, INC. Circle No. 38
888 Seventeenth Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20006
(202) 466-8888
Fine arts insurance for collectors and dealers.

GREAT NORTHERN BROKERAGE CORP. 39
Norman Newman or Larry Morreale
950 Third Ave
New York, NY 10022 (212) 371-2800
Insurance Specialists to the Art World.

MOVERS AND PACKERS

AIR CARGO EXPRESS Circle No. 40
7851 Airpark Drive
Gaithersburg, MD 20879 (202) 258-0955
Door to Door by Air, Nation and Worldwide
Pick-up and Crating.

PRO-PAK PROFESSIONAL PACKERS, INC.® 41
527 Dundee Road
Northbrook, IL 60062 (312) 272-0408
Fine Arts Packing, Crating and Shipping Specialists.
Pick-up and Delivery Service. Full Insurance Coverage.

SCULPTURE SUPPLIES

CUYAMUNGUE STONE COMPANY Circle No. 42
Route 5, P.O. Box 360B
Santa Fe, New Mexico 87501 (505) 455-7915
Translucent Italian Alabaster, Oklahoma Alabaster.
All Types Marble. African Wonderstone and More . . .

PREMIER WAX CO., INC. Circle No. 43
3327 Hidden Valley Drive
Little Rock, Arkansas 72212
(501) 225-2925
Microcrystalline Waxes for Casting and Sculpture.

To receive information from the companies listed, circle the corresponding number on the REPLY COUPON below, and drop it in an envelope. You will receive information directly from them.

Art in America REPLY COUPON
Reader Services Dept., 850 Third Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10022

JANUARY 1983
THIS COUPON EXPIRES
March 31, 1983

NAME (PLEASE PRINT)
ADDRESS
CITY STATE ZIP TELEPHONE

Art Services & Schools

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12
13 14 15 16 17 18 19 20 21 22 23 24
25 26 27 28 29 30 31 32 33 34 35 36
37 38 39 40 41 42 43 44 45 46 47 48

◁ Please send information circled.

ALLOW 6-8 WEEKS FOR DELIVERY

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
J A 1983
UMI

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION DIRECTORY

A guide to current exhibitions abroad

ARGENTINA	BUENOS AIRES	☎ 54 (1)
	RUTH BENZACAR Talcahuano 1216-1° • Tel. 41-8549, 42-5614/5568	Arnaiz, Aizenberg, Audivert, Benedit, Benguria, Cáceres, Castilla, De Monte, Esteves, Kleiman, Puente, Robirosa, Smoje, Torroja, Vegezzi.
	DEL RETIRO Florida 943 • Tel. 32.5850	Gallery artists: Pablo Bobbi, Marcello Bonevardi, Sergio Camporalle, Dalla Cujat, Lea Lublin, Aldo Parella, Daniel Selaga.
AUSTRIA	INNSBRUCK	☎ 43 (5222)
	KRINZINGER Adolf Pichlerplatz 8 • Tel. 32,131	Until Jan. 20, Oswald Oberhuber Jan. 20-Mid Feb., Martin Walde
	VIENNA	☎ 43 (222)
	ARIADNE Bäckerstrasse 6 • Tel. 52.94.79	Thomas Reihold, oil paintings and aquarelles
	GALERIE HUMMEL Bäckerstrasse 14 • Tel. 52 12 96	Expressiver Pathos: Rodin, Stuck, Rohlfs, Kampendonk, K. Moser, Kokoschka Oppenheimer, Rainer, Merz, Paladino, Brus, Attersee, Anzinger, Cucchi
	GRITA INSAM + GALERIE H Köllnerhofg. 6 • Tel. 52.53.30	Jan. 11-29, Terry Fox: Drawings, objects and scores.
	NÄCHST ST. STEPHAN Grunangergasse 1/11 II • Tel. 52.12.66	Until Jan. 22, Siegfried Anzinger, paintings (Catalogue available)
	ULYSSES Opernring 21 • Tel. 57.12.26.	Arnulf Rainer - Finger paintings (Catalogue on request)
BELGIUM	ANTWERP	☎ 32 (2)
	AVANTGRADE Volkstraat 60 • Tel. 216.04.81	Jan. 7-Feb. 9, Urbain Mulkers, drawings and photo installations.
	LENS FINE ART Mechelsesteenweg 146 • Tel. 237.68.57	Robert Guinan
	"121" Mechelsesteenweg 121 • Tel. 218.68.73	Luigi Ontani: "Masks"
	BRUSSELS	☎ 32 (2)
	ALBERT BARONIAN 89, Avenue Emile de Beco • Tel. 647.3414	Baselitz, drawings and aquarelles
	ISY BRACHOT 62a, Avenue Louise • Tel. 511.05.25	Until Jan. 15, ART SANS FRONTIERES XIV-Salon d'ensemble Jan. 19-Feb. 19, Jacques Lennep (Belgian artist)

BRUSSELS (CONT'D) ☎ 32 (2)

CAMOMILLE 30, Rue Vilain XIV • Tel. 649.23.68	Jan Vos (Reykjavík)
FABIEN DE CUGNAC 55, Rue de Livourne • Tel. 537.14.15	Accrochage
CHARLES KRIWIN 20, Rue de Belle-Vue • Tel. 647.3109	Accrochage
PALAIS DES BEAUX ARTS 10, Rue Royale • Tel. 512.04.03	Until Jan. 16, Swiss drawings 1970-1980. Jean Tinguely; Paul-Emile Borduas; paintings—Collection Museum of Modern Art of Montreal
POST-SCRIPTUM 37, Rue des Eperonniers • Tel. 511.96.43	Books and catalogues on contemporary art and photography, records

GHENT ☎ 32 (91)

BARONIAN/LAMBERT Oudburg 22 • Tel. 254.057	Futura 2000
MUSEUM HEDENDAAGSE K'NST. Citadelpark • Tel. 21.17.03	Willi Baumeister (in collaboration with the Goethe Institute Brussels)

KNOKKE ☎ 32 (50)

ELISABETH FRANCK 124 Kustlaan • Tel. 606.881	The gallery is closed until February

COLOMBIA

BOGOTA ☎ 57

QUINTANA Carrera 11 N° 85-62 • Tel. 236.8226	XIXth and XXth Century paintings: Botero, Degas, Gauguin, Hockney, Matisse, Moore, Picasso, Rodin, Vuillard

ENGLAND

CAMBRIDGE ☎ 44 (223)

KETTLE'S YARD GALLERY Northampton Street • Tel. 352.124	Jan. 15-Feb. 20, Victor Willing, paintings since 1978

LONDON ☎ 44 (1)

ANNE BERTHOUD GALLERY 1 Langley Court • Tel. 836.73.57	Jan. 13-Feb. 11, Frank Auerbach, studies for paintings
ART HOUSE 213 South Lambeth Road • Tel. 735.2192	By appointment. Contemporary British Artists represented. Visits to studios arranged. Also Outsider Art
IAN BIRKSTED 37 Great Russell Street • Tel. 637.2673	Jan. 6-Feb. 2, "History Paintings" today, accompanied by slides and a lecture by professor Norbert Lynton on Jan. 18-19
BLOND FINE ART 33 Sackville Street • Tel. 437.1230	Ardizzone, Blond, Cooper, Grandjean, Griffin, Hyman, McFayen, Sinnot, Turnell, Williams; Jan. 27-Feb. 19, British drawings 1900-1950.
CHRISTIE'S PRINT COLL'CTION 8 Dover Street • Tel. 499.6701	Graphics by British and international artists. Hockney, Moore, Sutherland, Miró, Chagall, others. Catalog (quote AIAED).
ANTHONY d'OFFAY 23 Dering Street • Tel. 499.4695	Francesco Clemente, paintings and works on paper
12 DUKE STREET GALLERY Duke Street, St. James • Tel. 930.52.47	19th and 20th century paintings, drawings and sculpture
FISCHER FINE ART 30 King Street • Tel. 839.3942	Until Jan. 21, Wiener Werkstatte & associates 1903-1932, an exhibition of furniture, glass, metal work and original designs. Jan. 27-Feb. 19, Gerardo Pità
GIMPEL FILS 30 Davies Street • Tel. 493.2488	Until Jan. 23, Christmas Show: James Tower, Ceramics, Michael Vaughan, paintings. Jan. 25-Feb. 19, Stroke, Line and Figure, paperworks by 15 artists.
NIGEL GREENWOOD, INC. 41 Sloane Gardens • Tel. 730.8824	Until Jan. 22, Per Kirkeby, paintings 1981-1982
I.C.A. The Mall, SW1. • Tel. 930.3647	Until Jan. 9, Before it Hits the Floor: Bainbridge, Bevar, Johnson, Morris; American adult comics. Jan. 19-Feb. 20, Art & Architecture: Ten new buildings: Aldo Rossi
NICOLA JACOBS 9 Cork Street • Tel. 437.3868	Until Jan. 28, Collaboration: An installation by gallery artists
BERNARD JACOBSON, LTD. 2A Cork Street • Tel. 439.8355	Recent publications: Abrahams, Heindorff, Hodgkin, Kossoff, Moore, Ruscha, Smith, Tillyer, Willing
LEWIS JOHNSTONE GALLERY 7 Bolton Gardens (Old Brompton Rd.) • Tel. 373.1192	Jan. 5-Feb. 5, Peter Lloyd Jones
ANNELY JUDA/JUDA ROWAN 11 Tottenham Mews • Tel. 637.5517/8	Jan. 4-29, Arp, Chasnik, Kliun, Lissitzky, Tapies, etc. Jan. 4-29, Anthony Green, John Golding, Alan Green, Nigel Hall, Michael Kenny, Phillip King, Bridget Riley

VOL 7 1 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

LONDON (CONT'D)	☎ 44 (1)
KNOEDLER GALLERY (Kasmin, Director) 22 Cork Street • Tel. 439.1096	Until Jan. 15, Photographic portraits of artists, writers, and musicians in the 50's
LISSON GALLERY (Nicholas Logsdail) 66/68 Bell Street • Tel. 262.1539	Stephan Willats: "Inside the Night"
MAYOR GALLERY 22A Cork Street • Tel. 734.3558	Jan. 6-29, A loan exhibition of the recent acquisitions from the Whitworth Art Gallery in Manchester
PETERSBURG PRESS 59A Portobello Road • Tel. 229.0105	Roy Lichtenstein, 7 woodcuts; Frank Stella, "Shards." Other works by Hockney, Hodgkin, Johns & Motherwell.
PICCADILLY GALLERY 16 Cork Street • Tel. 499.4632	Jan. 10-End Jan., mixed exhibition of gallery artists and new discoveries
REDFERN GALLERY 20 Cork Street • Tel. 734.17.32 734.05.78	Jan. 1-27, Georges Rouault, an exhibition of his coloured aquatints
EDWARD TOTAH GALLERY 39 Floral Street • Tel. 379.6241	Jan. 13-Feb. 12, Gavin Jantjes recent paintings
WADDINGTON GALLERIES 2, 4 & 34 Cork St. • Tel. 439.1866	Jan. 1-29, Barry Flanagan: Stone Carvings Jan. 1-29, Roger Hilton: Paintings and gouaches
OXFORD	☎ 44 (865)
MUSEUM OF MODERN ART 30 Pembroke Street • Tel. 722.733	Leonid Pasternak 1862-1945 paintings. Paul Ritha as a film socialist; "Twice told tales" by Stephan Fartin & Glenn Fujo; New MU/ZE/UM: Mills, Gilbert, Lewis
SOUTHAMPTON	☎ 44 (703)
JOHN HANSARD GALLERY The University, Southampton • Tel. 559.122	Until Jan. 22, Norman Gaches: Until Jan. 22, Woodworks by craftsmen working with wood. Until Jan. 29, "Waste Land" photos by Ron McCormick
FRANCE
BORDEAUX	☎ 33 (56)
C.A.P.C. ENTREPOT LAINE Rue Ferrère • Tel. 44.16.35	Until Jan. 15, "l'Art du Cinéma d'Animation." Jan. 31-Mar. 5, Castelli, Fetting, Salome paintings, David Hockney photographs
CANNES	☎ 33 (9)
GALERIE HERBAGE 17, Rue des Etats-Unis • Tel. 39.19.15	En permanence: Calder, Max Ernst, Matisse, Miró, Picasso, Chadwick, Hepworth, Moore, Nicholson, Sutherland
LYONS	☎ 33 (7)
LE NOUVEAU MUSEE 11, r. Dr. Dolard-69100 Villeurbanne • Tel. 884.55.10	Jan. 20-Mar. 7, Richard Prince Jan. 20-Mar. 7, Marianne Eigenheer
NICE	☎ 33 (93)
GALERIE PAUL HERVIEU 26, Rue Pastorelli • Tel. 80.02.10	Paintings and gouaches by Atlan, Clavé Coignard, Goetz, Hélénon, Marchand des Raux, Papart and Key Sato.
PARIS	☎ 33 (1)
BAMA 40, Rue Quincampoix • Tel. 277.38.87	Until Jan. 25, Artists of the gallery, early works Jan. 29-Mar. 5, Paula Gabriel "The State of Being Side by Side"
BAR DE L'AVENTURE (Caroline Corre) 53, Rue Berthe • Tel. 255.37.76	Farewell gifts: "Souvenirs" of the Bar de l'Aventure
BEAUBOURG 23, Rue du Renard • Tel. 271.20.50	A retrospective of Matta's work in the 50's
CLAUDE BERNARD 5-7-9, Rue des Beaux-Arts • Tel. 326.9707	Accrochage of Gallery artists
ISY BRACHOT 35, Rue Guénégaud • Tel. 354.22.40	Jan. 12-Feb. 26, Jan van Riet
GALERIE JEANNE BUCHER 53, Rue de Seine • Tel: 326.22.32. 326.75.23	As of Jan. 25, Gérard Singer: "Le Permutant, dispositif paysagé"
FARIDEH CADOT 77, Rue des Archives • Tel. 278.0836	Jan. 8-29, Georges Rousse
LOUIS CARRE ET CIE. 10, Avenue de Messine • Tel. 562.57.07	Accrochage
JEAN CHAUVELIN 147, Rue St. Martin • Tel. 887.77.76	Russian and European Constructivists, gallery artists.
CREATIS ESPACE ALTERNATIF 50, Rue du Temple • Tel. 887.28.56	Until Jan. 18, Video: "The Babel Conference" by Fred Forest As of Jan. 18, Eric Fayol

PARIS (CONT'D)	☎ 33 (1)
CHANTAL CROUSEL 80, Rue Quincampoix • Tel. 887.6081	Until Jan. 15, Georg Jiri Dokoupil As of Jan. 15, Walter Dahn
JACQUES DAMASE Galerie de Varenne, 61 Rue de Varenne • Tel. 705.55.04	Calder, Cocteau, Sonia Delaunay, Robert Delaunay, Max Klinger, Man Ray, Patrick Raynaud
DURAND-DESSERT 3, Rue des Haudriettes • Tel. 277.6360	Panamarenko, recent work
LE DESSIN 27, Rue Guenegaud • Tel. 633.04.66	Until Jan. 30, François Martin "Far from Manhattan"
ERIC FABRE 6, Rue du Pont de Lodi • Tel. 325.42.63	Group Show: "Vol de Nuit"
PAUL FACCHETTI 20, Avenue de Friedland • Tel. 563.80.26	By Appointment
KARL FLINKER 25, Rue de Tournon • Tel. 325.18.73	Until Jan. 20, Aillaud, Arroyo, Gäfgen, Hélion, Jenkins, Ménétrier, Raysse, Thalmann: new works; As of Jan. 22, Moninot: new work
GALERIE FARIS 50, Rue de l'Université • Tel. 544.29.48	Until Jan. 15, works on paper, 12 artists from the Arab world End Jan., Lebanese painter, Aki Nada, one man show
GALERIE DE FRANCE 50-52, Rue de la Verrerie • Tel. 274.38.00	Jean Pierre Pincemin
LILIANE FRANCOIS 15, Rue de Seine • Tel. 326.94.32	Jan. 5-26, Mari Orelli drawings, photos and colors. Jan. 27-Feb. 20, Zenenhaus, sculpture and watercolors.
MAURICE GARNIER 6, Avenue Matignon • Tel. 225.61.65.	Bernard Buffet, permanently.
DANIEL GERVIS GALLERY 34, Rue du Bac • Tel. 261.11.73	Benrath, Constant, Dubuffet, Eterovic, Gerzo, Ghertman, Malaval, Montyn, Mutal, Nevelson, Olson, Pan, Pasotti, Toledo, others.
GILLESPIE/LAAGE/SALOMON 24, Rue Beaubourg • Tel. 278.1171	Per Kirkeby
GALERIE MARWAN HOSS 12, Rue D'Alger • Tel. 296.39.45	"Important works: Masters of the 19th and 20th century," drawings and sculpture
SAMY KINGE 54, Rue de Verneuil • Tel. 261.1907	Until Jan. 15, Souki Sivalax: "Quantum objets" recent work As of Jan. 20, Farchid Mesghali, drawings and sculpture, recent work
LAHUMIERE 88, Bd de Courcelles • Tel. 763.03.95	New catalogue available: Amarger, Bauduin, Delaunay, Dahmen, Dewasne, Dorny, Herbin, d'Imbleval, Masson, Miró, Picasso, Vasarely.
LA HUNE GALERIE 14, Rue de l'Abbaye • Tel. 325.54.06	Artists books: Jiri Kolar, Folon, Fassianos
LA HUNE-LIBRAIRIE 170, Boulevard St. Germain • Tel. 548.35.85	Books, catalogues and magazines: Fine arts, literature, architecture, graphics, photography and fashion.
YVON LAMBERT 5, Rue de Grenier St. Lazare • Tel. 271.09.33	Jan. 8-Feb. 2, Futura 2000
GALERIE JEAN-PIERRE LAVIGNES 15, Rue St. Louis en l'Ile Paris • Tel. 633.5602	Group show
BAUDOIN LEBON 36, Rue des Archives • Tel. 272.09.10	Accrochage, artists of the gallery
ADRIEN MAEGHT 46, Rue du Bac • Tel. 222.12.59	Aki Kuroda Photographic Exhibition: Steinberg, Bellocq, Tal Berg
GALERIE MAEGHT 13 & 14, Rue de Téhéran • Tel. 563.13.19	Until Jan. 10, Titus Carmel As of Jan. 20, Henry Moore, sculpture and drawings, graphics
MUSEE D'ART MODERNE de la Ville • 11 Ave. Prés. Wilson • Tel. 723.61.27	Until Jan. 10, Duane Michals; Until Jan. 16, Prix Air France de la ville de Paris; Until Jan. 30, Fellini, drawings & photographs; Until Feb. 20, COBRA 1948-1951
DENISE RENE 196, Blvd. St. Germain • Tel. 222.77.57	Agam, Albers, Arp, Max Bill, Claisse, Cruz-Diaz, De Marco, S. Delaunay, Gerstner, Gaurin, Herbin, Leparc, Marignoli, Mortensen, Picelj, Soto, Vasarely
DARTHEA SPEYER 6, Rue Jacques Callot • Tel. 354.78.41	Jan. 5-29, gallery artists
STADLER 51, Rue de Seine • Tel. 326.91.10	Jan. 15-Feb. 19, Lucebert, paintings
NANE STERN 25, Ave. de Tourville • Tel. 705.08.46	3 French painters, Yves-Marie Peron, Bernard-Marie Laute & Alain Grosajt. Oper 3-8:30 p.m., Sat. 10-12 a.m. & 3-8:30 p.m.

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

PARIS (CONT'D)	☎ 33 (1)
DANIEL TEMPLON 30, Rue Beaubourg • Tel. 272.14.10	Jan. 8-Feb. 10, Roy Lichtenstein, recent work
TRANS/FORM 22, Ave de la Bourdonnais • Tel. 550.40.32	Artists of the Gallery
GALERIE VALLOIS 41, Rue de Seine • Tel. 329.50.94	Csaky, Biegas, Rodin, Dunand, Ruhlman, Franck, Cheret. Fine furniture of the Thirties.
ZABRISKIE 37, Rue Quincampoix • Tel. 272.35.47	Jan. 15, "Coloriages" John Batho and André Léocart
LES SABLES D'OLONNE	☎ 33 (51)
MUSEE DE L'ABBAYE STE. CROIX Rue de Verdun • Tel. 32.01.16	11 recent paintings by Victor Brauner, recent acquisitions of the museum
ST. PAUL DE VENCE	☎ 33 (93)
FONDATION MAEGHT Saint Paul de Vence • Tel. 32.81.63	Until Jan. 30, Appel and Alechinsky—Two brush paintings
GALERIE CATHERINE ISSERT Saint Paul de Vence • Tel. 32.96.92	Until Jan. 23, Patrick Lanneau; Artists of the gallery Louis Jammes: photography
TOULON	☎ 33 (94)
MUSEE DE TOULON 20, Boulevard Leclerc • Tel. 93.15.54	Jan. 20-Mar. 6, Hélène et Rachel Theret, Anne Françals—Collection—painters from Toulon XVIIth-XXth century.

GERMANY

BERLIN	☎ 49 (30)
GALERIE LIETZOW Knesebeckstrasse 32 • Tel. 881.28.95	The Gallery is closed in January
R. ONNASCH AUSTELLUNGEN Niebuhrstr. 5 • Tel. 882.77.18	Until Jan. 12, John Wesley: "Cheep" 1962-1982 Jan. 16-Mar. 12, Dieter Roth "Ladenhüter"
GALERIE POLL Lützowplatz 7 • Tel. 261.70.91	Until Feb. 13, Harald Duwe, paintings
GALERIE FOLKER SKULIMA Niebuhrstrasse 2 • Tel. 881.8280	As of Dec. 15-Feb. 5 works on paper, M. Duchamp, M. Ernst, Alexis Jawlensky Mathis, Schlemmer, Jannis Kounellis, Cy Twombly, F. Léger
BONN	☎ 49 (228)
GALERIE LINSSEN Prinz-Albert-Strasse 47 • Tel. 21.89.09	German Expressionists. Russian Avant Garde. International classics. Osvaldo Romberg and Jan Voss.
COLOGNE	☎ 49 (221)
ERVEN'S ART SERVICE Theodor-Heuss Ring 10 • Tel. 12.34.36	We hang the shows
GALERIE GMURZYNSKA Obenmarspforten 21 • Tel. 23.66.21/2	"Small Sizes 1915-1930"
GALERIE KARSTEN GREVE Wallrafplatz 3 • Tel. 21.39.21	Paco Knöller, drawings
GALERIE HOLTMANN Richartzstr. 10 • Tel. 21.51.50	Charly Banana
GALERIE JOLLENBECK Lindenstrasse 20 • Tel. 24.67.59	Gallery closed while moving
KÖLNISCHER KUNSTVEREIN Josef-Haubrich-Hof 1 • Tel. 21.70.21/221.3740	Young German art, sponsored privately
PAUL MAENZ Schaafenstrasse 25 • Tel. 21. 81.02	Francesco Clemente As of Jan. 21, Walter Dahn
GALERIE ORANGERIE REINZ Helenstrasse 2 • Tel. 23.46.84	Marc Chagall "For his 95th Birthday," original graphics (Catalogue DM 20.)
GALERIE RECKERMANN Albertusstr. 16 • Tel. 21.20.64	Shirley Goldfarb
GALERIE ROLF RICKE Volksgartenstrasse 10 • Tel. 31.57.17	"Triumph" Sculpture by painters: Anzinger, Buthe, Dorner, Immendorff, Köhler, Münch, Lüpertz, Penck, Schmalix, Schulze, Tannert, Thomas.
GALERIE WENTZEL St. Apernstrasse 26 • Tel. 24.24.00	Jack Bush, paintings and watercolors Paul Suter, sculpture.
MICHAEL WERNER Gertrudenstrasse. 24/28 • Tel. 21.06.61	Höckelmann, sculpture, etchings never before shown

COLOGNE (CONT'D) ☎ 49 (221)

GALERIE RUDOLF ZWIRNER
Albertusstrasse 18 • Tel. 23.58.37/8
Accrochage

DUSSELDORF ☎ 49 (211)

KONRAD FISCHER
Platanenstrasse 7 • Tel. 685.908
Ulrich Rückriem

GALERIE GMYREK
Mutter-Ey-Strasse 5. • Tel. 32.77.70
Through Jan., K.H. Hödicke, Standbilder 1980-1982

DENISE RENE HANS MAYER
Grabbeplatz 2 • Tel. 36.59.72
Norbert Kricke, sculpture

KUNSTVEREIN
RHEINLANDE/WESTFALEN Grabbeplatz 4 • Tel. 327.023
As of Jan. 14, Konrad Klapheck, drawings, paintings and graphics 1971-1982

HAMBURG ☎ 49 (40)

THOMAS LEVY GALERIE
Tesdorpfstrasse 18 • Tel. 45.91.88.
Until Jan. 5, Meret Oppenheim, retrospective Expressionists—Accrochage

GALERIE MUNRO
Barmbeker Str. 138 • Tel. 48.45.52.
Until End Jan., Accrochage, new works by artists of the Gallery

GALERIE NEUENDORF
Feldstrasse, Hochhaus 1 • Tel. 43.11.75
Robert Graham, sculpture

MUNICH ☎ 49 (89)

GALERIE + EDITION A
Amalienstrasse 81 & 87 • Tel: 28.13.64/280.97.88
Jan. Ovadia Alkara, paintings

GALERIE SIX FRIEDRICH
Maximilianstrasse. 15 • Tel. 29.50.21 & 29.61.10
Until Jan. 29, Hubert Schmalix, new paintings and drawings

EDITION SABINE KNUST
Maximilianstrasse 36 • Tel. 29.21.13
A.R. Penck, early prints

TANIT
Maximilianstr. 36 • Tel. 29.22.33
Until Jan. 31, Michelangelo Pistoletto, sculpture, early work

NUREMBERG ☎ 49 (911)

GALERIE JOHANNA RICARD
Königstrasse 33/37 • Tel. 22.50.20
Russian Avant-Garde

STUTTGART ☎ 49 (711)

MAX-ULRICH HETZLER GmbH
Schwabstrasse 2 • Tel. 62.15.38
Jan.16-Feb. 10, Andreas Schulze, paintings

GREECE

ATHENS ☎ 30 (1)

KAREN & JEAN BERNIER
Marasli 51 • Tel. 723.5657
Blais, Blanchard, Combas

HOLLAND

AMSTERDAM ☎ 31 (20)

GALERIE KRIKHAAR
Spuistraat 330 • Tel. 26.71.66
Appel, Brands, Constant, Cormeille, Cottavoz, Henning-Pedersen, Lindstrom, Saura, Sonderlinque and others.

STEDELIJK MUSEUM
Paulus Potterstraat 13 • Tel. 73 21 66
Until Jan. 13, Jaap van den Ende; Until Feb. 13, Polish, French and German Posters; Until Feb. 6, Cindy Sherman, Photos; Jan. 14-Mar. 6, Philip Guston

EINDHOVEN ☎ 31 (40)

STEDELIJK VAN ABBEMUSEUM
Bilderdijklaan 10 • Tel. 44.85.55
Until Jan. 26, Bruce McLean, Martien Coppens; Jan. 21-Mar. 6, Markus Lüpertz

ITALY

BARI ☎ 39 (80)

MARILENA BONOMO
Via Nicoló dell' Arca 19 • Tel. 21.01.45
Tony Cragg

BOLOGNA ☎ 39 (51)

DE FOSCHERARI
Via Goidanich 1 • Tel. 27.52.26.
Recent works by: Mario Ceroli, Piero Manai, Marcello Jori, Concetto Pozzati

FABJBASAGLIA
Via Farini 26 • Tel. 23.49.22.
Bruno Benuzzi

GALLERIA FORNI
Via Farini 26 • Tel. 27.07.60
Joseph Picillo, one man show
Picasso, engravings

STUDIO G7, G. GRIGOLO
Via Val d'Aposa 7C • Tel. 26.64.97.
Bill Beckley

VOL 7 1 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

BRESCIA ☎ 39 (30)

MASSIMO MININI Via Apollonio, 68 • Tel. 56.275	Maurizio Corona, new paintings
PIERO CAVELLINI Via Fratelli Bandiera 18 • Tel. 57.401	Radu Dragumirescu

FLORENCE ☎ 39 (55)

GALLERIA SCHEMA Via della vigna nuova 17. • Tel. 28.40.90.	Art and Language: Bartolini, Bochner, del Re, Durnseif, Graham, Kosuth, Lüthi, Masi, Moretti, Rainer, Ripps, Rohling, Rockburne, Violetta, Windheim

MILAN ☎ 39 (2)

SALVATORE ALA Via Mameli 3 • Tel. 716-500
ARIETE GRAFICA Via S. Andrea, 5 • Tel. 79.55.73	Michelangelo Pistoletto
ARTE BORGOGNA Via Borgogna 7 • Tel. 709.330 704.826	Group show of 22 artists: Corneille, Dova, Hartung, Lam, Rotella, Schifano, Vasarely
ARTRA/STUDIO Via Fiori Chiari 8 • Tel. 861.190	Carlo Maria Mariani
STUDIO CANNAVIELLO Piazza Beccaria 10 • Tel. 837.6368	Arnulf Rainer
DIAGRAMMA (Luciano Inga Pin) Via Pontaccio 12a • Tel. 874.237	"Plum Cake" Gianni Cella, Romolo Pallotto, Claudio Ragni
DISEGNI DI ARCHITETTURA Antonia Jannone Via del Carmine 5 • Tel. 878.384	Architecture drawings, stage design, classical and modern
STUDIO CARLO GROSSETTI Via dei Piatti 9 • Tel. 837.5594	Maurizio Corona
FRANCOISE LAMBERT Bastioni di Porta Nuova 11 • Tel. 650.087	Tino Stefanoni, Roberto Caspani
LORENZELLI ARTE Via Sant'Andrea 19 • Tel. 783.035	Paradisos 15th - 19th centuries
STUDIO MARCONI Via Tadino 15 • Tel. 225.543	Group Show
GALLERIA DEL MILIONE Via Bigli 21 • Tel. 780.879	Fellini and Bestetti, Chiappori
MASSIMO MININI Via Cavalieri des S. Sepolcro • Tel. 86.71.30	Daniel Buren, New works on glass
GALLERIA SENO Via Ciovasso 11 • Tel. 805.80.64	Enrico Baj
GALLERIA STENDHAL Via Santo Spirito 10 • Tel. 781.825	Sculpture and architecture; Andrea Cascella, Gio Pomodoro: Projects for Linate and Malpensa airports
GALLERIA 32 Via Brera 6 • Tel. 86 76 29	Lino Mannocci Gregorio Cuartas
FRANCO TOSELLI Via del Carmine 9 • Tel. 805.0434	Alighiero Boetti, Bill Woodrow

MODENA ☎ 39 (59)

GALLERIA EMILIO MAZZOLI Via Nazario Sauro 58a • Tel. 357.605/243.455	Agnetti, Boetti, Calzolari, Chia, Clemente, Cucchi, De Maria, Germanà, Paladino, Schifano, Turcato.

NAPLES ☎ 39 (81)

LUCIO AMELIO Piazza del Martiri 58. • Tel. 42.20.23/769.0521	A.R. Penck, Paladino part of the Terrae Motus Series

ROME ☎ 39 (6)

GALLERIA ANNA D'ASCANIO Via del Babuino, 29 • Tel. 678.5920	Marcel Broodthaers
GIULIANA DE CRESCENZO Via del Paradiso 41 • Tel. 656.9846	Man Ray
MARIO DIACONO Via Victoria 60 • Tel. 679.57.74	Francesco Clemente

ROME (CONT'D)	☎ 39 (6)
UGO FERRANTI Via di Tor Millina 26 • Tel. 654.2146	Until Jan. 20, Jean-Charles Blais
L'ISOLA Via Gregoriana 5 • Tel. 679.00.29./678.54.77	Luisa Gardini, watercolors
PIERONI Via Panisperna 203 • Tel. 465.706	Collective show: Castellani, Fabro, Melotti
GALLERIA IL PONTE Via S. Ignazio 6 • Tel. 679.6114	Until Jan. 12, Nino Longobardi Jan. 14-Feb. 5, Milton Gendel, photographs
PRIMO PIANO Via Vittoria 32 • Tel. 678.00.39	Antonio Violetta—Exit editions
SPROVIERI 3 Piazzi del Popolo • Tel. 360.8918/361.0975	Futurism Dada Surrealism.
TONINELLI 86 Piazza di Spagna • Tel. 679.34.88	Important sculpture by: Bodini, Fontana, Marini, Arturo Martini, Melotti, Moore, Medardo Rosso, Schmettau, Vangi.
TURIN	☎ 39 (11)
GIORGIO PERSANO Via dei Mille 29 • Tel. 835.527	Until Jan. 15, Luigi Ontani As of Jan. 15, Michelangelo Pistoletto
TUCCI RUSSO Corso Tassoni 56 • Tel. 779.304	Luigi Mainolfi
CHRISTIAN STEIN Piazza San Carlo 206 • Tel. 535.574	Guilio Paolini
ALBERTO WEBER Via S. Francesco da Paola 4 • Tel. 839.7493	Bruno Ceccobelli
VERONA	☎ 39 (45)
STUDIO LA CITTA Via Samaritana 10 • Tel. 25.728	Until Jan. 15, 30 gouaches by Sonia Delaunay As of Jan. 15, Enzo and Rafaello Bassotto

SPAIN

ALMAGRO	☎ 34 (926)
FUCARES San Francisco, 2 & 3 • Tel. 86 09 02	Andy Warhol, Jim Dine, David Hockney, Jasper Johns, Jan Voss
BARCELONA	☎ 34 (3)
GALERIA CIENTO Consejo de Ciento 347 • Tel. 215.63 65	As of Jan. 12, Susana Solano, sculpture
SALA GASPAR Consejo de Ciento, 323 • Tel. 318.87.401.318.87.36	Alfaro, A. Bravo, Bartolozzi, Clavé, Fenosa, Gudiol, Ibars, Llové, Miró, Picasso, Riera, Rojas, Tarrats, Torralba, Vila-Casas, Viladecans, Villelia.
GALERIA MAEGHT Calle Montcada 25 • Tel. 310.42.45	Manolo Valdes, paintings and sculpture
RENE METRAS Consejo de Ciento 331 • Tel. 302.05 39	José Morea, paintings
LA CAIXA DE PENSIONS Passeig Sant Joan 108 • Tel. 258.89.07	"German Expressionism"
GALERIA JOAN PRATS Rambla Catalunya 54 • Tel. 216.02.84	Fina Miralles
GALERIA TRECE Rambla Catalunya, 49 • Tel. 318.08.73.	Until Jan. 22, Nelson Leyva As of Jan. 27, Argimon
BILBAO	☎ 34 (4)
GALERIA DE ARTE MUN Gran Via 60 • Tel. 441. 24 00	Gallery Artists
IBIZA BALEARES	☎ 34 (71)
GALERIA ES MOLI Carretera San Miguel Sta Gertrudis	Azocar, Bechtold, Calbet, Faber, Galbraith, Hedrich, Kugler, Monreal, Segui, Tomlin, Villanueva, Zush.
MADRID	☎ 34 (1)
OBRA CULTURAL "LA CAIXA" Paseo Castellana 51 • Tel. 419.0440	"26 Painters, 13 Critics," Young Spanish painting
EGAM Villanueva 29 • Tel. 435 3161	José Manuel Prada

VOL 7 1
ISS 1
JA 1983
UMI

	MADRID (CONT'D)	☎ 34 (1)
	GALERIA HEINRICH EHRHARDT Barquillo 44 • Tel. 276.17.28	As of mid-Jan., Per Kirkeby, paintings
	GALERIA JUANA MORDO Villanueva 7 • Tel. 435.84.42	Jan. 10-Feb. 5, Matias Quetglas
	GALERIA DE ARTE MUN Hermosilla 26 • Tel. 401.01.92	Gallery Artists
	RAYUELA Claudio Coello 19 • Tel. 275 3146	"En en taller": Chillida, Saura, Tapiès, Mompó, Miró, Farreras, Palazuelo, J.L. Sanchez, J. Caballero, J. Hernandez, Orlando Pelayo, Genovés, Guinovart, Valls
	GALERIA SEN Nunez de Balboa 37 • Tel. 435 52 02	Jan. 10-Feb. 5, Henry Dechanet
	GALERIA THEO Marqués de la Ensenada, 2 • Tel. 410.26.51	Andreu Alfaro, sculpture
	TORCULO GRAPHICS & BOOKS Claudio Coello 17 • Tel. 275 86 86	Until Jan. 15, Grau Sala, retrospective As of Jan. 15, Bartolozzi, works on paper and prints
	GALERIA FERNANDO VIJANDE Nuñez de Balboa 65 • Tel. 435 8025	Andy Warhol
	GALERIA YNGUANZO Antonio Maura 12 • Tel. 231 54 10	John Ulbricht
	MURCIA	☎ 34 (68)
	GALERIA YERBA Vinadel 6 • Tel. 21 00 15	Ferrán García Sevilla
	SEVILLE	☎ 34 (54)
	GALERIA JUANA DE AIZPURU Calle Canalejaz, 10 • Tel. 22.85.01	José Maria Bermejo
SWEDEN	MALMO	☎ 46 (40)
	GALERIE NORDENHAKE Ostra Ronneholmsvagen 5 • Tel. 23.15.33	Claes Eklundh, paintings
	STOCKHOLM	☎ 46 (8)
	KONSTRUKTIV TENDENS Nybrogatan 69 • Tel. 61.16.65/61.50.65	The early development of the Constructivist Movement
SWITZERLAND	BASEL	☎ 41 (61)
	KUNSTHALLE BASEL Steinenberg 7 • Tel. 23.48.33	Jan. 23-Feb. 27, Malcolm Morley, retrospective, David Hockney, photographs
	GALERIE BEYELER Baumleingasse 9 • Tel. 23.54.12	Jan.-Feb., Samuel Buri
	FELIX HANDSCHIN GALERIE Petersgraben 18 • Tel. 25.59.85	Jan. 18-Feb. 28, Reminiscence from the 60's
	BERNE	☎ 41 (31)
	MARBACH Wasserwerkgasse 37 • Tel. 22.42.05/22.38.25	Contemporary art. By appointment only.
	GENEVA 41 (22)
	GALERIE BONNIER 4, Rue Saint-Laurent • Tel. 35.87.35	Paul Rotterdam, drawings and recent paintings
	CENTRE D'ART CONTEMPORAIN 16, Rue d'Italie • Tel. 28.88.03	Group show
	ECART/BOOKS & FLUXKIOSK 16, Rue d'Italie • Tel. 31.34.73, & 28.88.03	Artists Books, Catalogues and Magazines.
	GALERIE ERIC FRANCK 15 Route de Florissant • Tel. 47.08.09	Martin Disler, drawings
	CLAUDE GIVAUDAN 3, Rue du Soleil-Levant • Tel. 29.91.61.	Until Jan. 25, Kurt Seligmann, graphics, drawings & paintings. Just issued, Kurt Seligmann's graphic work.
	MARIE-LOUISE JEANNERET 59, Avenue de Champel • Tel. 46.34.57	20th Century Masters—Picasso, Giacometti, Miró, Max Ernst, Léger, Tanguy, Klee, Kandinsky, Noland and others
	DANIEL VARENNE Galerie Clos de Sierne 15, Chemin de Sierne • 84.15.93	Impressionist and 20th Century masters. By appointment only

GENEVA (CONT'D) ☎ 41 (22)

WEBER 13, Rue de Monthoux • Tel. 32.64.50	Patrick Llovera Loste, oil paintings André Bucher, Sculpture

ZURICH ☎ 41 (1)

THOMAS AMMANN FINE ART Restelbergstrasse 97 • Tel. 362.62.31	Impressionists & 20th Century Masters—by appointment only.
KONRAD FISCHER Ackerstrasse 44 • Tel. 42.71.61	Isolde Wawrin
GIMPEL • HANOVER • EMMERICH Tödistrasse 40 • Tel. 202.03.00	Max Bill
M. KNOEDLER Kirchgasse 24 • Tel. 69 35 00	Until Jan. 15, Nancy Graves Jan. 22-Feb. 26, Theodoros Stamos
GALERIE MAEGHT Predigerplatz 10-12 • Tel. 251.11.20	Rebeyrolle
MAURER Münstergasse 14-18 • Tel. 47.85.00	Jan.-Feb., Alfred Klinkan
PETER NOSER St. Jakobstrasse 11 • Tel. 242.55.16	Jan.-Feb., Bernhard Lüthi, Jean Pfaff, Mireille Wunderly
GALERIE SCHLEGL Minervastrasse 119 • Tel. 251.4963	Jan. 11-Feb. 5, Brigitte Malche
ANNEMARIE VERNA Mühlegasse 27 • Tel. 252.27.70	Jan.-Feb., Emilio Vedova, drawings
ANNEMARIE VERNA Röntgenstrasse 44 • Tel. 44.27.15	"Drawings-Disegni-Zeichnungen"
JAMILEH WEBER Schanzengasse 10 • Tel. 47.79.89	Jan.-Feb., Aldo Rossi
WORK GALLERY Trittligasse 24 • Tel. 482.39.58	Jan.-Feb., Man Ray
RENÉE ZIEGLER Rämistrasse 34 • Tel. 251.23.22	Jan.-Feb., Meret Oppenheim, paintings, sculpture, drawings

VENEZUELA

CARACAS ☎ 58 (2)

DURBAN Calle Madrid-Urbanizacion Las Mercedes. • Tel. 92.42.31.	Spanish and American Contemporary Art.
GALERIA MINOTAURO Calle Madrid-Entre Mucuchies y Monterrey • Tel. 92 27 40

ART IN AMERICA
IS AVAILABLE IN EUROPE AT:

Amsterdam

Athenaeum Boekhandel, B.V.
Spui 14-16

Art Something Co.
Herengracht 259

Robert Premsela Boekhandel
van Baerlestrasse 78

Antwerp

Boekhandel Ban Den Bosch
St. Jacobsmarkt 1-B

Basel

Stampa
Sapienberg 2

Berlin

Galerie 2000
Knesebeckstrasse 56

Bern

Hans Huber
Länggasstrasse 76 und
Marktgasse 9

Brussels

Librairie Post Scriptum
Rue des Eperonniers, 37

Cologne

Walther Konig
Breite Str. 93

Eslangen

Buchhandling Redmann
Bohlemplatz 6/12

Florence

Centro Di
l/r Piazza de' Mozzi

Geneva

Ecart
16 rue d'Italie

Hamburg

Sautter & Lackmann
Klosterstern 8

London

Arts Bibliographic
37 Great Russell Street

Arts Council Shop
8 Long Acre
Covent Gardens, WC2E 9LG

Lyon

L'Ollave
58, rue Tramassac

Madrid

Torculo Graphics & Books
Claudio Coello 17

Milan

PAC - La Libreria
via Palestro 14

Idea Books Bookstore
Via Cappuccio, 21

Paris

Artcurial
9 Avenue Matignon

Flammarion 4
Librairie du Centre Georges Pompidou
Plateau Beaubourg

Galerie Jean Fournier
44 rue Quincampoix

Librairie La Hune
170, boulevard Saint-Germain

Librairie Musee d'Art Moderne
de la Ville de Paris
11, Avenue du President Wilson

Rome

Galleria Nazionale d'Arte Moderna
Viale delle Belle Arti, 131

Strasbourg

Librairie Les Idees et Les Arts
Place Brant

The Hague

Artline
Toussaintkade 67-68

Toulouse

Ombres Blanches
Librairie/48
rue Gambetta

Turin

OOLP
Via Principe Amedeo

Vienna

Buchhandlung am Hafnersteig
Hafnersteig 10

VOL
7
1

ISS
1

JA

1983

UMI

Rosa Esman
Gallery

29 West 57
Street
New York City
10019

212
421 9490

New Paintings by Thomas Nozkowski
January 18
to February 12

"Still Life in a Minister's Desk," 1980, pencil, 12" x 8"

LAURA SHECHTER
RECENT PAINTINGS

JANUARY 8
TO
JANUARY 29

FORUM GALLERY
1018 MADISON AVENUE · NEW YORK 10021

RICHARD SMITH

MONOTYPES

JACOBSON/HOCHMAN GALLERY
24 West 57 Street New York NY 10019 Tel 212 581-8346

Avery
Burchfield
de Kooning
Dine
Dove
Ferren
Graham
Hartley
Jensen
Marin
Maurer
Noguchi
Spencer

Estates of:
George Ault
Maurice Sievan
Bob Thompson

TWENTIETH CENTURY AMERICAN ART
VANDERWOUDE TANANBAUM
24 E 81 STREET/NEW YORK/212.879.8200

Recent Photographs
Duane Michals
Sidney Janis 110 West 57 St.

Artists Use Photographs

Ahrendt • Baldessari • Hilla and Bernd Becher
Beckley • Brakke • Casebere • Charlesworth
Gilbert and George • Parada • Prince • White marianne deson gallery 340 west huron

chicago, illinois 60610
312-787-0005

McINTOSH/DRYSDALE GALLERY
ARCHITECTURAL FANTASIES URBAN SITES

RICHARD HAAS
JOYCE KOZLOFF
NED SMYTH

JAN. 19-FEB. 12

2008 PEDEN HOUSTON TEXAS 77019 713 520-1888

PAINT AS IMAGE

AN INVITATIONAL · JANUARY 22-FEBRUARY 19

MAX HUTCHINSON GALLERY
138 GREENE STREET NEW YORK, NY 10012 212-966-3066

Index of Advertisers

Aaron-Hastings 140
Adler Gallery, Pam 36
Akira Ikeda Gallery 48
Alexander, Brooke 37
Allport Associates 48, 60
Ars Libri 142
Arte Fiera '83 (Bologna) 14
Artexpo, N.Y. 131
Art Institute of Boston 138
Art Students League 136, 140
Arts Focus 139
Arts Publishers, The 43

Balkin Gallery, Barbara 42
Batman Gallery, Donald 56
Berggruen, John 36
Biach Gallery 141
Blum/Helman Cov IV
Bonlow Gallery 52
Boone Gallery, Mary 36
Borgenicht Gallery 28
Bornstein, Karl 34
Boyd Gallery, Roy 30
Branchville SoHo Gallery 140
Brentwood Gallery 56
Brown & Bro., Inc., Arthur 138

Carnegie-Mellon University 48
Carone Gallery 52
Castelli Graphics 42
Castelli, Leo 33
Chicago Int'l Art Exposition 114
Christie, Manson & Woods 17
Cicero, Jan 61
Clark Gallery, Garth 43
ConStruct 40
Cooper Gallery, Paula 49
Cowles Gallery, Charles 40
Crown Point Press 32

Danish Ministry of Commerce 54
Davidson College Art Gallery 130
DBR 143
De Gooyer, Kirk 49
Delahunty Gallery 44
Del Re Gallery, Marisa 4
De Nagy, Tibor 56
Deson Gallery, Marianne 158
Dintenfass Gallery, Terry 45
Dominion Gallery 46
Durham Gallery, Linda 53
Dyansen Gallery 144

Eason Gallery 142
Editions Ltd. 144
Editions Press 61
Ericson Gallery 142
Esman Gallery, Rosa 158
Ettinger Inc., Eleanor 58
Exhibit A 138

Findlay Galleries, David 18
49th Parallel 44

Forum Gallery 158
Fourcade, Xavier 16
Friedman, Marvin Ross 51
Frumkin Gallery, Allan 49

Gagosian Gallery, Larry 44
Galeria San Jeronimo 140
Galeria San Juan 140
Galeria Fernando Vijande 45
Galerie Gmyrek 27
Galerie Linssen 28, 29
Galerie Maeght 2
Galerie 99 60
Galerie St. Etienne 130
Galerie 212 54
Galerie Ulysses 12
Galerie Michael Werner 45
Galerie Rudolf Zwirner 15
Galleri Bellman 10
Gallery Paule Anglim 50
Gallery One, Inc. 145
Getler/Pall 40
Gillman Gallery, Barbara 50
Gold Gallery, Fay 138
Goodman Gallery, Marian 41
Great Northern Brokerage 63
Grimaldis Gallery, C. 143
Gruenebaum 142

Hadler-Rodriguez 30
Hamilton Gallery 49
Harcus Krakow 52
Harris, Anne 144
Hillwood Art Gallery 145
Hirschl & Adler 30
Hoffman Gallery, Nancy 35
Hokin Gallery 24
Holsten Galleries 51
Horwitch Gallery, Elaine Cov III
Hutchinson Gallery, Max 158

Iannetti, Pasquale 53
Impressions Gallery 53
Incorporated Gallery 53
Inter-American Art Gallery 144
Int'l Art Alliance 50
International Art Exposition, Inc. 131
Irving Gallery 34

Jacobson-Hochman 158
Janis Gallery, Sidney 158
Jerry's Artarama 136

Kind Gallery, Phyllis 61
Klein Gallery 50
Knoedler & Co., M. 29
Knowlton Gallery, Monique 46
Koplin Gallery 51
Kouros Gallery 138
Kraushaar Galleries 142

Lamont Art Gallery 54
Lee Video Gallery, Jane 144
Leon Gallery, Jon 141
Lewin Galleries, B. 48
Locks Gallery, Marian 63
Luria Gallery, Gloria 60
Lynch & Sons, Kenneth 142

Machorro Gallery 145
Marlborough Gallery 33
Maroney & Co., James 8
Martin Lawrence 123
Mathes Gallery, Barbara 6
Matisse, Pierre 143
Medici-Berenson Gallery 60
Metro Pictures 36
Midtown Galleries 143
Miller Gallery, Robert 25
Milliken, Alexander Cov II
Modern Master Tapestries 143
Molasky, Stephen 140
Museum of Art/Ft. Lauderdale 39
McIntosh/Drysdale 158

Nahan Art Galleries 62
Newport Harbor Art Museum 38
Now & Then 145

October Gallery 140
Onnasch, Reinhard 31
Oscarsson-Hood 42
Ovsey Gallery, Neil 47

PA Academy of Fine Arts 144
Pace Gallery 1
Palm Beach Art Galleries 130
Parsons, Betty 38
Pearl, Marilyn 38
Pearl Paint Co. 141
Perlman, Miriam 52
Petersburg Press 26
Peticov, Antonio 54
Printmaking Workshop 141
Printworld Directory 129
Protetch Gallery, Max 39, 42

Rachofsky, Morton 140
Rauchbach Gallery 60
Ricco-Johnson 41
Richebourg/McCoy 47
Rosenfield Gallery, Betsy 47
Rutberg Gallery, Jack 38

Sawyer Gallery, William 138
Sculpture Placement 62
Segal Gallery, Thomas 31
Séguy Gallery, Yvonne 142
Selkowitz Fine Arts, Judith 54
724 Prints 58
Shafrazi Gallery, Tony 51
Sharks Lithography 63
Shiva, Inc. 59
Siggraph '83 136
Sikkema Inc., Brent 116
Sklar Gallery, Ana 60
Skowhegan School 142
Smith Inc., Daniel 139
Sonnabend Gallery 33
Spellings, Art 144
Sperone Westwater Fischer 37
Stoller & Co., John 32
Stretcher Co. 139
Sun Valley Center 131
Surovek Fine Arts, Inc., John H. 39

Tara 55
Tasende Gallery 140
Tatistcheff & Co., Peter 138
Taylor Art, Carol 35
Texas Gallery 56
Thorp Gallery, Edward 47
22 Wooster St. Gallery 130
Tyler School of Art 141

Universal Fine Art 125

Vanderwoude Tananbaum 158
Vision Gallery 46

Waddington Galleries/London 1
Walkey Gallery 54
Weiner Gallery, Jan 143
White & Assoc., Roberto 143
White Gallery, Martha 16
Wildenstein & Co. 5
Winsor & Newton 118

Yares Gallery 57
Yoseido Gallery 143

Zabriskie Gallery 44
Zolla Lieberman 46
Zoma Gallery 130

VOL 71 ISS 1 JA 1983 UMI

Artworld

IBM Sets Up Madison Avenue Kunsthalle

Corporations and museums have become so intimate that their functions are beginning to mesh. Starting one year from now, IBM will present traveling museum exhibitions in the 13,000-square-foot, lower-level gallery the corporation has integrated into its new building on Madison Avenue at 57th Street. It will take only those shows not mounted by New York-area museums, such as last year's El Greco and Eakins exhibitions, which bypassed the city.

Director of the still unnamed IBM gallery is David Hupert, former head of education at the Whitney Museum (1968–81) and director of the Whitney's downtown branch ('73–81). Hupert plans to schedule six major and 10 smaller shows per year. IBM-funded exhibitions will be considered for inclusion.

The gallery will also hold IBM-originated science and techology exhibitions and will prepare introductory material, most likely in the form of short films to be screened in an adjacent auditorium, for both art and science shows. The budget for the exhibition program is said to be "sufficient." Admission will be free.

Hulten Resigns as Director of L.A. MOCA

Pontus Hulten, director of Los Angeles's still unbuilt Museum of Contemporary Art [see A.i.A., May '81], will cede his title to deputy director and chief curator Richard Koshalek this March in order to assume his position as principal organizer of the art and cultural programs of the 1989 Paris World's Fair. Hulten has agreed to stay on as founding director of L.A. MOCA, serving half-time until March '84 and quarter-time thereafter, concentrating on fund-raising and on preparing exhibitions to be held in the museum's temporary quarters, which are scheduled to open this fall.

In his 15 months with the museum, Hulten has reportedly had numerous conflicts with the board of trustees, notably over their dissatisfaction with architect Arata Isozaki's design for the building and their handling of press relations. The degree to which trustees can involve themselves in the operations of U.S. museums poses far different administrative problems for a director than those faced in state-run European institutions, such as Stockholm's Moderna Museet and the Centre Georges Pompidou, which Hulten headed previously.

Koshalek received the board's unanimous approval to succeed Hulten, and is optimistic about L.A. MOCA's future. Koshalek says he will take his new responsibilities as director "one day at a time—I'll give it my best shot." He emphasizes the crucial significance of his predecessor's continuing involvement with the museum and the gains that have been made both in settling the architectural dispute and in obtaining interim exhibition facilities.

Provisional exhibition space, dubbed the Temporary Contemporary, will be located in a city-owned warehouse and gas station to be refurbished according to designs by architect Frank Gehry. The 35,000- and 15,000-square-foot buildings are leased to L.A. MOCA for five years at $1 per year, and are slated for eventual demolition. Over one million dollars has already been pledged for work on the buildings and programs at the interim show space, and additional funds are expected from the sale of print portfolios by 15 artists, a project being organized by artist and museum board member Sam Francis. Temporary Contemporary is scheduled to open in September '83 with an exhibition of works from the Panza, Ludwig and De Menil collections as well as the private collections of Robert Rowan and the Marcia Weisman family.

People

Marlborough Gallery owner Frank Lloyd was convicted in December on three counts of tampering with the evidence presented during the 1971–77 Rothko trial. Lloyd's attorney said he planned to appeal the verdict. Sentencing by Judge Herbert Altman is scheduled for Jan. 6. According to the New York Times, the judge plans to announce his decision on the same date on three defense motions that, if granted, would immediately overturn the jury's verdict.

Obituaries

Gene Baro, 58, critic, lecturer and prolific, often controversial organizer of contemporary exhibitions in the U.S. and abroad. Baro had been consulting curator of prints and drawings at the Brooklyn Museum since 1977, and, since 1980, adjunct curator of contemporary art at the Carnegie Institute's Museum of Art, where his final and perhaps most prodigious exhibition, "The 1982 Carnegie International," closes Jan. 2. (It travels to the Seattle Art Museum Feb. 7–Mar. 27.) The show includes works by 63 artists from 27 countries, all of which Baro visited in his 18 months of research.

Gene Baro

Outstanding among the approximately 150 museum exhibitions Baro curated since 1970 were several large surveys of prints and drawings as well as monographic shows on Hans Hofmann, Sol LeWitt, David Hockney and Helen Frankenthaler. He was the director of the Corcoran Gallery in 1972 (resigning after a notorious black-tie fist fight with the museum's chief executive officer, who also resigned). In his short tenure at the Corcoran he organized over 40 shows. He was the author of The Drawings of Claes Oldenburg and of a catalogue raisonné of Louise Nevelson prints.

Rory McEwen, 50, Scottish painter known for his detailed, meticulously rendered watercolors of flowers, leaves and vegetables which combine the accuracy of botanical illustration with the intimacy of portraiture. He made illustrations for a number of collaborative projects: From the Air with Kenneth Koch, '79; Tulip & Tulipomania with Wilfred Blunt, '76; The Auricula with C. Oscar Moreton, '64; Old Carnations and Pinks with Sacheverell Sitwell, '55. In '69, McEwen and Jim Dine made a record, Poems, Songs, Prints, which is accompanied by a written text and printed images. His first solo show was in New York in 1962. Throughout the '70s he showed at London's Redfern Gallery. Exhibitions of new work were held in 1982 at New York's Staempfli Gallery and at Wave Hill.

Rachel bas-Cohain, 45, one of the founding members of A.I.R., the cooperative women's gallery in New York. Over the years her work addressed issues of visual perception—its cognitive properties and limitations. Her last show in spring of '82 included documentation of outdoor works and hanging, transparent fabric constructions with texts.

Museum Preview of the Month

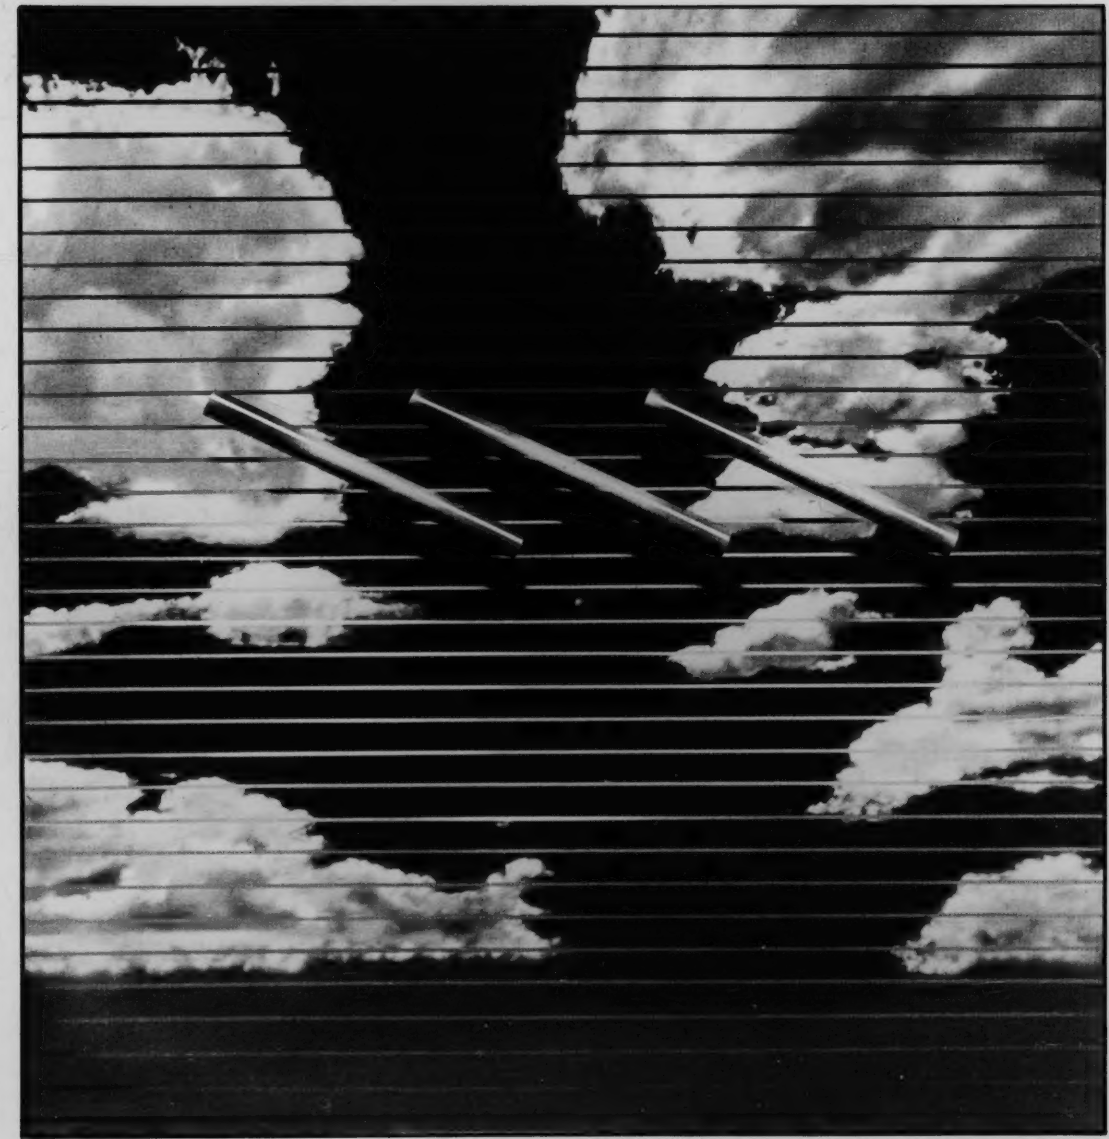
"Alfred Stieglitz" at the National Gallery [Feb. 3–May 8] will be the first retrospective of Stieglitz's photographs since the 1934 show at his New York gallery, An American Place. Approximately one-third of the 171 prints to be included have not been shown since Stieglitz died in '46, and several have never before been publicly exhibited. Works in the show date from the late 1880s, when Stieglitz was a student in Berlin, to 1935, two years before he stopped making photographs.

Public acquaintance with Stieglitz's photographic oeuvre has declined since his death due to the inaccessibility of much of the work, and to what Metropolitan Museum curator Weston Naef terms Stieglitz's "aura of impenetrability" which has "slowed the wheels" of scholarship. The forthcoming exhibition is selected entirely from the National Gallery's master set of 1,600 photos, containing the finest print of every image Stieglitz left at his death. Georgia O'Keeffe presented the collection, the museum's only photography holding, to the Gallery in 1949. (The Met, Boston's Museum of Fine Arts and the Chicago Art Institute received more modest gifts at the same time.) The National Gallery showed small Stieglitz selections in '58 and '77, but given photography's low priority on the museum's agenda and the absence of a photography curator, the works were not even formally accessioned until '78, when they were catalogued by art historian Sarah Greenough, then working at the museum on a Kress fellowship. Greenough, who initiated the retrospective, and Juan Hamilton, sculptor and O'Keeffe associate, are the show's guest curators.

According to Greenough, the exhibition will balance famous images (The Steerage, 1907) with unknown "great" ones, particularly from the late teens and early '20s. There will be photos from a trip Stieglitz made to Europe in 1894; from his 1890–1917 views of "old" New York; portraits, primarily from the 1910s, of artists with whom he associated—Demuth, Duchamp, Hartley, Marin, Strand; 26 portraits of O'Keeffe (1917–35); 28 cloud studies from the 1920s "Equivalents" series; his early '30s photos of New York skyscrapers; and, also from the '30s, studies of his Lake George house and the surrounding countryside.

A 248-page illustrated book ($75 cloth; $35 soft cover; Callaway Editions) contains an introduction by Greenough and 50 pages of Stieglitz's own writings on photography, some of them published for the first time. The exhibition travels to the Metropolitan Museum [June 14–Aug. 14] and to the Art Institute of Chicago [Oct. 11–Jan. 3, '84].

MASOUD YASAMI



"Arizona Portfolio: Page Sky" acrylic on canvas 72" x 68"

SCOTTSDALE EXHIBITION:
JANUARY 6 - 20, 1983

ELAINE HORWITCH GALLERIES

SCOTTSDALE:
4211 N. MARSHALL WAY, SCOTTSDALE, ARIZONA 85251 • (602) 945-0791
4222 N. MARSHALL WAY, SCOTTSDALE, ARIZONA 85251 • (602) 941-5290

SANTA FE:
129 W. PALACE AVE., SANTA FE, NEW MEXICO 87501 • (505) 988-8997

SEDONA:
FOREST ROAD AND HWY. 89A, SEDONA, ARIZONA 86336 • (602) 282-6290

VOL
7
1
ISS
1
J A 1983
UMI

RICH ARDS
ERRA

Around the Corner 1982

BlumHelman
20 West 57 Street, New York

12 January - 12 February 1983

VOL
7
1
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

Art in America

FEBRUARY 1983/$3.50
Outside North America/$5.00

Cover: Winslow Homer's "Undertow" (detail)
Braque's Late Paintings/Hamish Fulton/Helen Lundeberg/Charles Simonds
Winslow Homer/Edwin Dickinson/The Met's "18th Century Woman" & "Belle Epoque" Reports from London & Australia/Books/Review of Exhibitions

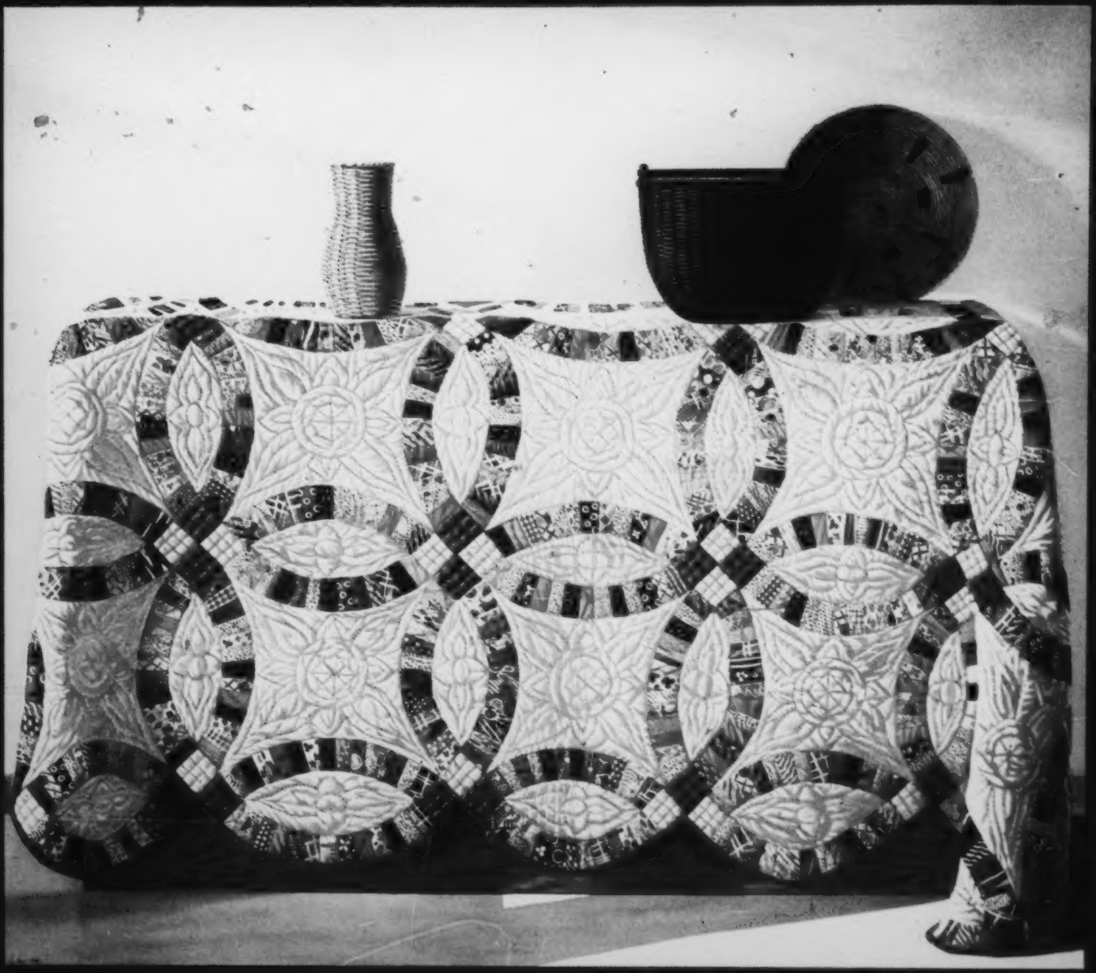
VOL
71
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI



STEPHEN LORBER

New Work • February 5 - March 2, 1983

ALEXANDER F. MILLIKEN INC.
98 Prince Street, New York, N.Y. 10012 • Telephone: 212 966-7800

Double Wedding Band Quilt, 1981, oil on canvas, 60 x 66 inches

"Art in America works for Crown Point Press"

"At Crown Point Press we're interested in using our advertising budget in the most productive way.

This season, our first ad in Art in America featured Eerie Grotto? Okini, the 85 color woodblock print by William T. Wiley. We advertised the print along with two others at a special subscription price of $900. The response was impressive . . . 13 direct sales from the ad.

Art in America's editorial content is consistently good and attracts the audience we want to reach."

—Karen McCready
Sales Director, Crown Point Press crown point press introduces

3 WOODBLOCK PRINTS IN THE UKIYO-E TRADITION

Pat Steir
William T. Wiley
Francesco Clemente

Eerie Grotto? Okini — WILLIAM T. WILEY — 22 x 30 inches — PRINTED IN KYOTO, JAPAN

CROWN POINT PRESS 1555 SAN PABLO AVE. OAKLAND, CA 94612 (415) 835-5104
IN NEW YORK CITY AT 545 BROADWAY (212) 226-5476

Art in America ...essential

VOL
7
1
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

LOUISE NEVELSON

CASCADES
PERPENDICULARS SILENCE
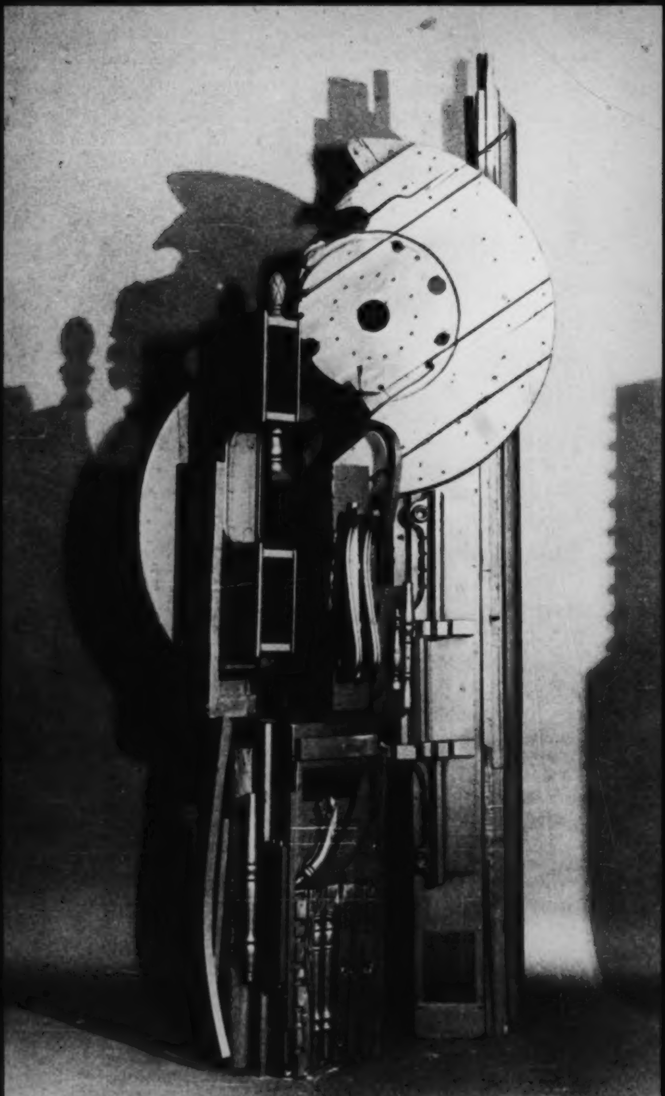
MUSIC



THE PACE GALLERY 32 E 57 NYC

Art in America

FEBRUARY 1983

Late Lyrics: Braque Jed Perl 78
Braque's stylish late works include nocturnal visions of the artist's studio as well as radically simplified expressionist images of nature.

Hamish Fulton: Moral Landscapes Michael Auping 87
Combining image and text, Fulton's photographic works present a highly personal experience of a variety of natural terrains.

Charles Simonds: The New Adam Ted Castle 94
Architect-archeologist for his own mythical "Little People," Simonds makes miniature clay civilizations with organic overtones.

Deep Space Prudence Carlson 104
Immediate fact gives way to metaphysical ponderings in Helen Lundeberg's formally acute, lyrical paintings.

American Romantic Donald B. Kuspit 108
At once traditional and unorthodox, limpid and obscure, Edwin Dickinson's paintings depict a private, fantastical universe.

Mortal Themes: Winslow Homer Henry Adams 112
This psycho-biographical analysis discovers, beneath the physical beauty of Homer's art, a profound psychological ambivalence.

DEPARTMENTS

Review of Books 11

Report from London
Art in the Year of the Falklands John McEwen 17

Report from Sydney
The Fourth Biennale Leon Paroissien 25

Fashion
The Corset Years Jeff Weinstein 57
Du Barry Was a Feminist Robert Fisher 63

Artworld 168

REVIEW OF EXHIBITIONS

New York, Roslyn, N.Y., New Haven, Chicago, San Francisco 129

Cover: A detail from Winslow Homer's Undertow, 1886, oil on canvas, 29¾ by 47⅝ inches; Sterling and Francine Clark Institute, Williamstown, Mass. See "Mortal Themes: Winslow Homer," beginning on page 112. (The entire painting is reproduced in color on pages 124–25.)

Editor: Elizabeth C. Baker

Managing Editor: Joan Simon / Executive Editor: Nancy Marmer / Senior Editors: Ted Mooney, Craig Owens / Associate Editors: Prudence Carlson, Hal Foster / Assistant Managing Editor: Kathryn Howarth / Assistant Editor: Robert Fisher / Designer: Alberto P. Gavasci / Directory Manager: Amy Slaton / Consultant: John Peter / Contributing Editors: Donald B. Kuspit, Lucy Lippard, Sarah McFadden, Linda Nochlin, Carter Ratcliff, Bryan Robertson, Irving Sandler, Peter Schjeldahl, Roberta Smith, Charles F. Stuckey / Corresponding Editors: Chicago, Franz Schulze; San Francisco, Peter Selz; Washington D.C., David Tannous; London, Suzi Gablik; Rome, Milton Gendel

Publisher: Paul Shanley

Director of Advertising: Susan B. Anthony / Advertising Sales: Susan McCall, Ruth Rothseid / Advertising Services: Susanne Vorster, Mary Baez / Production: Mary Jontry / Production Assistant: Sarah King / Circulation Manager: Susan Blattman / Art in America, 850 Third Ave., N.Y.C., 10022, Tel. (212) 593-2100
Director for International Development: John H. Liesveld Jr., Art in America, 39 Quai des Grands Augustins, 75006 Paris, France. Tel. (1) 325.26.55.

WHITNEY COMMUNICATIONS CORPORATION MAGAZINE DIVISION
PRESIDENT John S. Prescott SENIOR VICE PRESIDENT, FINANCE/ADMINISTRATION Gordon H. Duncan
VICE PRESIDENT MARKETING William Hitzig VICE PRESIDENT PLANNING Dean Heine
VICE PRESIDENT PRODUCTION James Kearney VICE PRESIDENT PRODUCT DEVELOPMENT Virginia Evans PROMOTION DIRECTOR James Anderson

WHITNEY COMMUNICATIONS CORPORATION
CHAIRMAN Walter N. Thayer
PRESIDENT Charles H. G. Rees

Vol. 71 No. 2 (February) Art in America is published 11 times a year (monthly except July) by Art in America, Inc., 850 Third Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10022. Telephone (area code 212) 593-2100. Cable address: AMARTMAG. A member of the Magazine Division of Whitney Communications Corporation. Contents copyright © 1983 by Art in America, Inc., and may not be reproduced in any manner or form without permission. ISSN 0004-3214. The opinions expressed in "Issues and Commentary," apart from the editor's comments, are those of the writers themselves and not necessarily those of this magazine. Not responsible for unsolicited manuscripts or photographs. Art in America is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature and the Art Index. Back volumes of Art in America are available in microfiche from Bell & Howell, Att. Periodical Department, Old Mansfield Road, Wooster, Ohio 44691. Microfilm copies are available through Xerox University Microfilm, Ann Arbor, Michigan 48106. Articles appearing in this magazine are abstracted and indexed in Historical Abstracts and/or America: History and Life and RILA. Circulation is verified by the Audit Bureau of Circulations. Controlled circulation postage paid at Concord, N.H. and New York, N.Y. BACK ISSUES AND COMPLETE VOLUMES: Lawrence McGilvery, P.O. Box 852, LaJolla, Calif. 92038. SUBSCRIPTIONS: U.S. 11 issues $34.95, 22 issues $59.95, 33 issues $79.95. Possessions & Canada add $8.00 per year. All others add $15.00 per year. Domestic single copy $3.50 prepaid. Outside North America $5.00. Single copy August/Annual $7.45 prepaid (includes $1.50 postage and handling). SUBSCRIPTION OFFICE: Art in America, 542 Pacific Ave., Marion, Ohio 43302. Telephone (area code 614) 383-3141. FOR CHANGE OF ADDRESS send old and new addresses and label from a recent issue. POSTMASTER: Send Form No. 3579 to Art in America, 542 Pacific Avenue, Marion, Ohio 43302.

Member of the Audit Bureau of Circulations

VOL
7
1
ISS
2
F E 1983
UMI

MARISA DEL RE GALLERY is pleased to announce that we now exclusively represent

ARMAN

TEN FELLOWSHIP ARTISTS in residence at the Fine Arts Work Center in Provincetown
An exhibition of their current work
January 20–February 19

MARISA DEL RE GALLERY
41 East 57th Street, New York City 10022 212-688-1843

from the collection of early dubuffet paintings

La Coiffeuse (Corps de dame), 1950. Oil on canvas, 45¾ x 35 inches pierre matisse gallery

41 east 57 new york

VOL
71
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

PALM BEACH

Trova

February 8 – March 3, 1983

BAY HARBOR ISLANDS

Kenneth Noland

February 11 – March 3, 1983

HOKIN GALLERY INC.

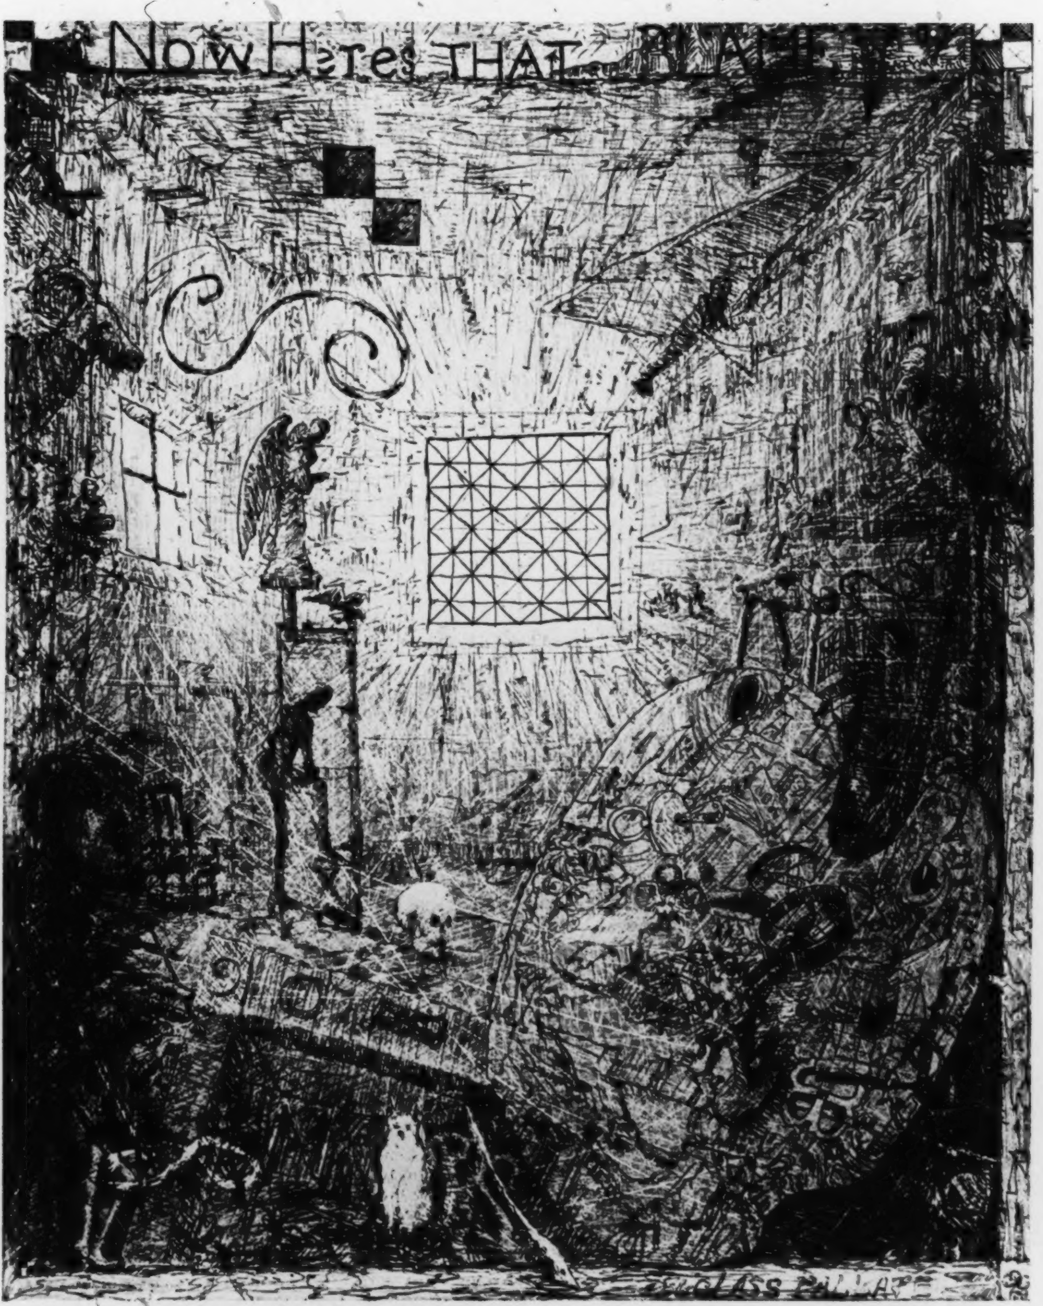
Member, Art Dealers
Association
of America, Inc.

Hokin/Kaufman Gallery
210 W. Superior, Chicago, Illinois 60610
Telephone 312/266-1211

245 Worth Avenue
Palm Beach, Florida 33480
Telephone 305/655-5177

1086 Kane Concourse
Bay Harbor Islands, Florida 33154
Telephone 305/861-5700

New Etchings by
William T. Wiley



NowHeres That Blame Treaty 1982, softground, aquatint, and drypoint, 51" × 42"

Crown Point Press

1555 San Pablo Oakland CA 94612 (415) 835-5104
545 Broadway New York NY 10012 (212) 226-5476

VOL
71
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

ROBERT LONGO
5-26 FEBRUARY 1983

METRO PICTURES
169 MERCER STREET, NEW YORK

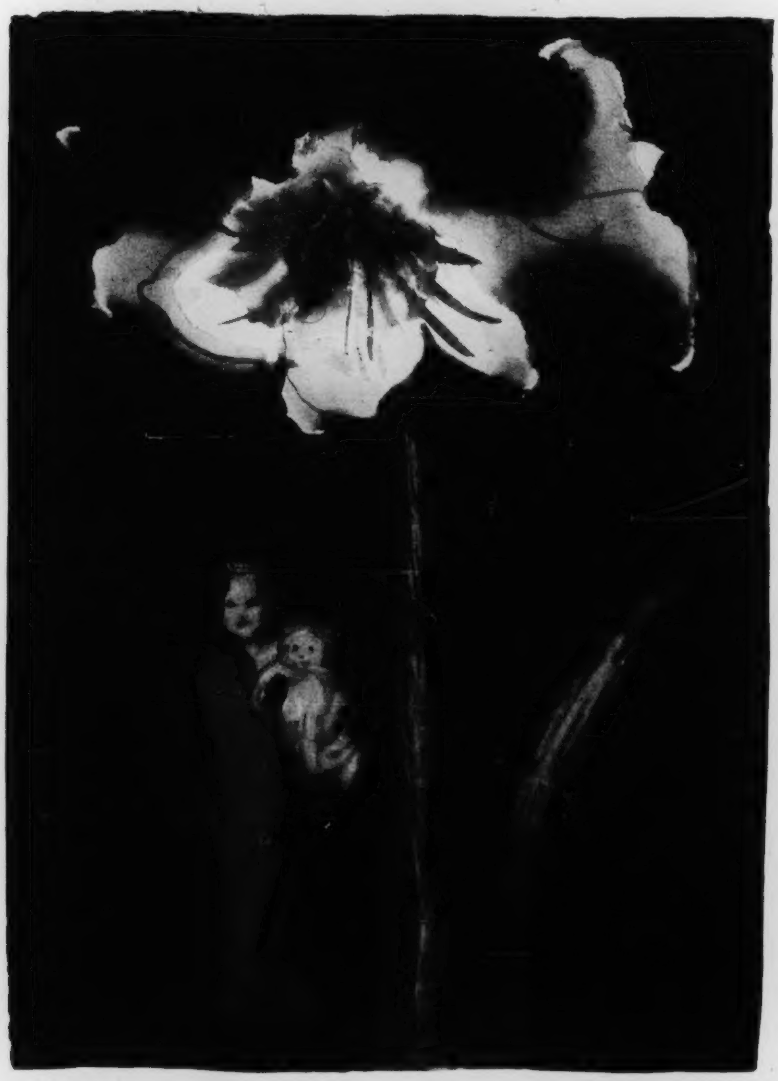
LEO CASTELLI
142 GREENE STREET, NEW YORK

Gérard Garouste
Paintings & Drawings 5-26 February

Leo Castelli 420 West Broadway, New York
Sperone Westwater 142 Greene Street, New York

German Expressionists

Exhibition
January 18 through February 19, 1983



Emil Nolde
Amaryllis and Red Madonna

Watercolor, signed
18⅛ x 13 in., [46 x 33 cm.]

Illustrated Catalogue $15.00

Galleri Bellman

41 East 57th Street, fifth floor, New York, New York 10022 • (212) 486-7944
19th and 20th Century Paintings and Graphics

VOL
71
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

Frank Stella. Island No. 10, 1961. Alkyd on canvas, 6½ x 6½ feet.

Important Works by Contemporary Masters

André Emmerich Gallery

41 East 57th Street · New York, NY 10022 · Tel (212) 752-0124

Review of Books

CRITICISM

The Art Presence: Painters, Writers, Photographers, Sculptors, by Sanford Schwartz, New York, Horizon Press, 1982; 247 pp., $13.95.

What's immediately striking in the reviews and catalogue essays collected here is the engaging pithiness of Sanford Schwartz's writing. He can capture the essence of an artist's work in a few well-chosen words: "The spirit of Lachaise is of something powerful and large which is only able to move in tiny, dainty steps." And he has a knack for metaphors plucked from everyday life. The shapes in Myron Stout's paintings "halt us, like a traffic cop's outstretched palm." Sometimes Schwartz's verbal jeux d'esprit get out of hand. When he writes, "The smallness of Stout's output is spectacular—he's with Vermeer in that department," the coyness of the conceit is annoying rather than amusing. Another verbal tic is Schwartz's tendency to treat his own metaphors as if they were realities, and then to be surprised when reality contradicts them. Describing one of Alex Katz's multiple portraits of his wife Ada, he comments: "Set in the dark, unexplained space, the five Adas nudge each other like a bunch of balloons bobbing around on separate strings, all held together by a single hand (which we don't see)." Of course we don't—the balloons are Schwartz's invention, not Katz's. Nonetheless, the relentless activity of Schwartz's language bespeaks a viscerally articulate involvement with art which cannot help but involve the reader.

In the essays of The Art Presence, Sanford Schwartz is concerned almost exclusively with American art, especially the period from the late 19th century to World War II. He writes movingly about the painters Albert Pinkham Ryder, Marsden Hartley, Ralph Albert Blakelock, Arthur Dove, Georgia O'Keeffe, Max Weber, and Charles Demuth, and the sculptors Elie Nadelman and Gaston Lachaise. Schwartz's approach to these artists seems at the same time novel and old-fashioned: he is concerned with their careers, almost more than with their art.

His reviews jump from this group of artists to the painters and sculptors of the 1960s and '70s, such as Lucas Samaras, Anne Arnold and Joel Shapiro, leaving the heroic generation of Abstract Expressionists conspicuous in their absence. This is curious because Schwartz's critical frame of reference seems to derive from painters like Pollock, Gorky and Rothko who, after a long apprenticeship, finally succeeded in synthesizing the American and European strains in modernism and producing really major American art. Nonetheless, Schwartz never writes directly about them. He is more interested in the tragic failure of the preceding American generation to achieve a durable synthesis of this sort; the dramatic, Balzacian theme that fascinates him is the struggle of minor artists to achieve major work. Many art critics are poets; Schwartz, on the other hand, writes as if he has a novel in a desk drawer next to his carbon paper.

At the same time, the problem with these essays may be that Schwartz's stress on the inner logic of each painter's struggle leads him to scant the esthetic issues to which the artist's work responded. The link between a painter's personal motivation and the esthetic significance of the resulting formal decisions in the larger context of the art of his time may be extremely indirect. Ironically, Schwartz's biographical method seems better suited to the photographers he writes about, such as Diane Arbus, Jacques Henri Lartigue or August Sander—those who deal with formal issues in terms of the realities they choose to photograph. Since the choice of subject for these photographers is, as Schwartz persuasively argues, a personal one, their pictures will necessarily be related in a fairly direct fashion to their lives.

Of the several art critics whom Schwartz discusses, it is the long-time newspaper reviewer Henry McBride who receives the most sympathetic treatment. Schwartz discounts the value of McBride's writing as art criticism, but warmly praises it as an ongoing chronicle of the New York art scene from the 'teens to the '50s. And in Schwartz's own writing there seems to be a subliminal tension between his intellectual response to art and his desire to remain no more than a sympathetic chronicler.

One expects a positive review of Lincoln Kirstein's biography of Elie Nadelman, since Nadelman is Schwartz's favorite minor-league hero, but instead Schwartz comes down hard on Kirstein for drowning Nadelman's sculpture beneath a torrent of ideas about art and culture. Indeed, although Schwartz writes with conviction and insight about critics like Kirstein, Leo Steinberg, Peter Gay, and Susan Sontag, he seems to deeply distrust ideas as tools for thinking about art: "the art work," he states firmly, "is devalued when it is turned into an illustration of a larger concept." Well, yes—but without a concept or two it can be hard to say why an art work should be valued in the first place.

Many of the essays in The Art Presence, originally written in the early '70s, were revised before publication here—in order, Schwartz says, to clarify key points or to add "a little more descriptive flesh." (Though he includes a note informing us that the essays first appeared in Artforum, Art in America, The New Yorker and various other magazines and catalogues, unfortunately the precise date and place of publication for each piece is not given.) In his 1973 review of Leo Steinberg's Other Criteria, Schwartz states that, "Hilton Kramer has for long shown how formalism, the dominant 'serious' art criticism, is an inadequate and deadening approach." It seems a pity that Schwartz did not use the occasion of his 1982 revision to add a few words detailing his reaction to the neo-Marxist or deconstructionist writers who have also struggled to overthrow the formalist orthodoxy in the last decade. But Schwartz's common-sense, colloquial approach, and his apparent preference for American semi-Realist art, seem to align him with Kramer and those "neo-conservative" critics who vocally condemn most critical theories spawned on the Left Bank. Indeed, The Art Presence received an ecstatic review in Kramer's New Criterion (where Schwartz recently published a refreshingly skeptical article on Milton Avery).

Schwartz's steadfast avoidance of ideas ultimately vitiates the power of his criticism. His commitment to figuring out what's good and bad in American art, and why, is admirable, but he never quite gives us a sense of why the artists he writes about should be considered important to us today for other than historical interest. Paradoxically, his most persuasive argument remains implicit: if a critic of this intelligence and wit takes them seriously, there must be something to them.

—Pepe Karmel

BIOGRAPHY

Van Gogh: A Documentary Biography, by A.M. Hammacher and Renilde Hammacher, New York, Macmillan, 1982; 240 pp., $36.50.

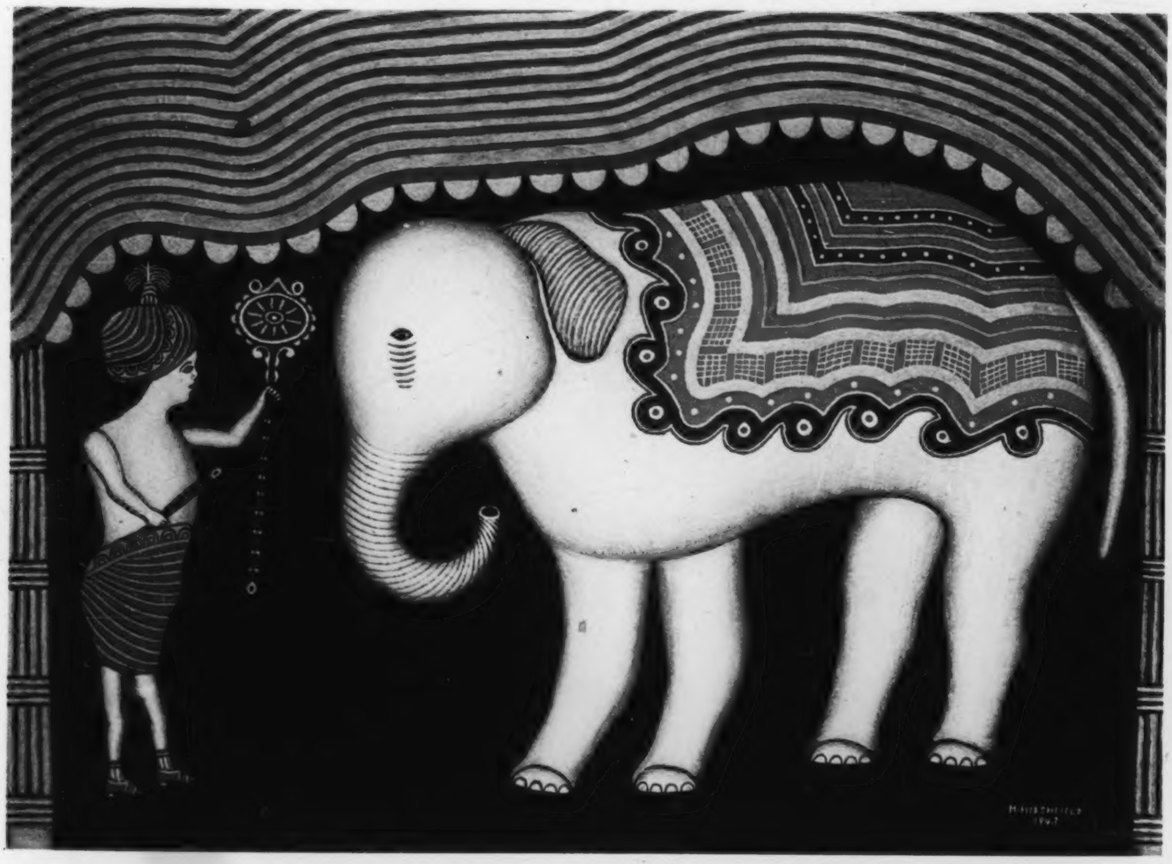
Ideally, this book should be a fugue between van Gogh's letters (which make up most of the text), the authors' comments (interspersed throughout) and documentary material (photographs of van Gogh and his family, of houses he lived in, places he painted and prints and paintings he owned or admired). The most resonant theme in such a counterpoint, of course, would be van Gogh's own paintings and drawings, which are in fact reproduced here in profusion. Alas, there is no interplay in this book, and the heart of the problem is that the comments of art historians A.M. Hammacher and Renilde Hammacher sound like program notes. Neither do they illuminate the letters, nor smooth the necessarily choppy structure of any book constructed of letters and excerpts of letters.

The purpose of this documentary biography, the authors say, was "to study the artist's entire personality" and to concentrate "on the area where art merges into life and vice versa." Indeed, they tell us in scholarly terms just what van Gogh was reading and the art he was looking at from year to year, but this information does not build a picture of van Gogh's art or life. This biography is famished for dramatic and personal detail. Sometimes our curiosity is pricked and then frustrated. An 1883 letter, for example, is introduced with the following words: "Again he wrote about his problems with women, describing the situation in increasingly powerful terms." But instead of including the letter, the authors offer another letter describing a trip across a heath.

Why skimp on biographical incident? Justifiably, the Hammachers feel that the van Gogh story has been distorted by sensationalism. Even so, cutting off an ear and handing it to a prostitute happens to be sensational. This episode, the authors say, has been given too much emphasis: to avoid theatricality, they neither tell the story, nor attempt to understand the act. Instead they quote a brief account of it in the local paper, adding that the closest thing we have to a first-hand report on van Gogh's self-mutilation is in a letter in which Emile Bernard tells Gau-

VOL
71
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI



Morris Hirshfield
Baby Elephant with Boy
Oil on canvas, 32 x 44 inches
Signed and dated M. Hirshfield 1943, lower right

JAMES MARONEY incorporated

129a East 74th Street, New York, N.Y. 10021 (212) 879-2252
Church Street, Roxbury, CT 06783 (203) 354-6783

guin's version of the incident. But this letter is omitted, and again we feel thwarted.

As far as studying van Gogh's personality goes, the book contains a fair amount of opaque psychologizing. About van Gogh in 1874, for example, the authors write: "Vincent now clearly began to subordinate his social ego to the undefined being which contained his true self and its psychic structure." Or: "Vincent was unable to escape the desire for totality, the constant reliving of previous experiences, always present as such in the actuality of what he was engaged in doing. Of course it goes without saying that there was in all this an element of regression—but dominated by the urge to transcend the moment: to possess the whole."

Van Gogh's own statements about his psychology are far more penetrating. The letters he wrote between 1872, when he was 19 and working for an art dealer in The Hague, and 1890, when he committed suicide at Auvers, are, like Delacroix's letters, one of the great testimonies to the struggles and doubts that go into being an artist, or for that matter, into being a man. These letters describe van Gogh's battle against depression and other ailments with a directness and lucidity that make the reader's heart ache. Of his depression in 1883, he wrote:

> . . . there were days when I could not see anything in the most beautiful landscape just because I did not feel myself part of it . . . much worse still, I felt exactly the same toward people.
>
> They said I was out of my mind, but I knew myself that it was not true, for the very reason that I felt my own disease deep within me, and I tried to remedy it. . . . I will rise above it, let me keep hold of patience to redress things.

In Arles in 1888, van Gogh wrote that were it not for his "double nature, that of a monk and that of a painter" he would have gone hopelessly mad long ago. For van Gogh, it seems, painting was both salvation and destruction. In July, 1890, the month he shot himself, he summed it up this way: "Well, my own work, I am risking my life for it and my reason has half foundered because of it—that's all right."

From the beginning, van Gogh's prose was extraordinarily visual. Whether he was describing a painting he had seen or a walk he'd taken, he noticed everything, and built up a picture out of a multitude of sharply focused details. Like his paintings, his letters become clearer and more forcefully expressive as the years go by. In the last two years of his life, the descriptions of his painting motifs gain a kind of vibrancy and poetic pitch that is very like the paintings themselves. At Arles, for example, he wrote:

> This bush is green, touched with a little bronze and various other tints.
>
> The grass is bright, bright green, malachite touched with citron, and the sky is bright, bright blue.
>
> The row of bushes in the background are all oleanders, raving mad; the blessed things are flowering so riotously they may well catch locomotor ataxia. They are loaded with fresh flowers, and quantities of faded flowers as well, and their green is continually renewing itself in fresh, strong roots, apparently inexhaustibly.
>
> A funeral cypress is standing over them, and some small figures are sauntering along a pink path.

By contrast, the authors' prose seems leaden. Part of the lifelessness comes, I think, from their concept of what can or cannot be said about an artist and his art. Espousing a generally formalist approach, they talk blandly about color, form and composition. They avoid interpretation. Of the St. Rémy landscapes, for example, they write that "Vincent found his way to a direct transformation of the observed landscape into curving, moving lines that are sometimes outlines but mostly a fusion of brushstrokes that convey both color and line." In discussing The Italian Woman, 1887–88, they first inform us that the sitter is said to have had an affair with van Gogh and then advise us that "we can easily forget the sitter," and concentrate on what is more important—"Vincent creates here a modern, and greatly intensified, symphonic structure of contrasting colored brushstrokes . . . ." They make few imaginative leaps between biography and imagery, and even when they do, they don't seem capable of reaching beyond the strict measure that facts would allow. For example, they agree that Skull with Burning Cigarette, 1885, has "a connection with his own state: faint, overstrained, undernourished," but they fail to see the possible link between the image of the smoking skull and van Gogh's idea (taken from Dickens, and mentioned more than once by them) that cigarettes are a remedy against suicide.

Nor do the Hammachers seem curious about why van Gogh painted certain paintings at certain moments. In the month that he died, van Gogh drew a reaper, not laboring in the distance—as was usual in his work—but this time looming in the foreground and bowing towards us. He holds his scythe in both hands; this gesture is not one of work but of greeting or confrontation. Since van Gogh's letters make it perfectly clear that for him the reaper is a symbol of death and wheat is a symbol of humanity, this sketch might be seen as a kind of suicide note. The Hammachers view it in formal terms: "The reapers of Nuenen had mostly been seen from the back or in profile. This front sketch proves how the grasp of movement dominates; curling lines unite figure, clouds and field."

Not every art historian has to be an iconographer, of course, but when the stated intention is to focus on "the area where art merges into life," the reader has the right to be annoyed at supercilious formalism. Consider the comment about Old Boots, 1886: "The image is so powerful as to cause most attempts to verbalize it to seem beside the point." This is double nonsense. If art historians did not bother to muse about art's meanings, art history would be an arid field indeed. And just because a painting is "powerful" doesn't mean that its visual poignancy need be diminished by verbal interpretation. As Meyer Schapiro's great book on van Gogh reveals, a critic or historian able to meet the artist through the force and depth of his or her imagination and empathy can bring the public very much closer to the art. —Hayden Herrera

PHOTOGRAPHY

Hungarian Memories, by André Kertész, introduction by Hilton Kramer, Boston, Little, Brown and Co. (a New York Graphic Society Book), 1982; 194 pp., $55.

A Lifetime of Perception, by André Kertész, introduction by Ben Lifson, New York, Harry N. Abrams, 1982; 259 pp., $45.

André Kertész's Paris photographs of the late 1920s and early 1930s have shaped our image of Paris as much as have the photographs of Cartier-Bresson and Brassaï, the paintings of Renoir and Pissarro, the novels of Hemingway and Henry Miller, the films of Godard and Truffaut. Kertész photographed the clochards under the bridges, the sudden rainstorms, the trees along the Seine, the artists in the fashionable cafés and the poor in the unfashionable ones. The very brilliance of Kertész's Paris oeuvre has tended to overshadow his earlier and later work. These two new volumes serve to correct that imbalance. Hungarian Memories presents Kertész's earliest work, largely unseen until now. A Lifetime of Perception offers an overview of his career, stressing the later American pictures and their continuity with his Paris work.

A few of the photographs in Hungarian Memories, like the 1921 image of the blind violinist led by a boy, are already well-known. These early pictures of Kertész's birthplace, some made while he was still supporting himself as a clerk, possess a straightforward sincerity disguised in his later work by an ironic stance. As Hilton Kramer remarks in his introduction, Kertész's early work shuns "the imperatives of artifice" in favor of a direct "revelation of experience." Although he is sophisticated enough at this point to portray his homeland's peasants, gypsies and countryside as picturesque, he still feels himself at home among them. Kertész served in the Austro-Hungarian army in World War I, and his photographs from the war express the traditional peasant view that soldiering is a mixed business, something that unfortunately takes you away from home but in compensation offers the carefree open road and the easy comraderie of the shared uniform. In Kertész's pictures the army seems like a gigantic summer camp for grown-ups.

In another series, he photographed his brothers and friends swimming, jumping, playing leapfrog—a set of images inescapably reminiscent of another contemporary, Lartigue. Like Lartigue's, Kertész's early photographs are essentially 19th-century in content, though modern in form. In Hungarian Memories they have received the magnificent reproductions they deserve (Kertész has all too often, in the past, been the victim of mediocre printing).

In 1925, Kertész moved to Paris in search of an artistic community. Some of his greatest Parisian pictures are as aggressively artless as his Hungarian ones: the 1929 portrait of a smiling, smocked schoolboy standing beside his desk, the 1927 image of a legless, one-eyed veteran in a cheap café. But many are more complex and ironic. Critics have often noted Kertész's affinities with the Surrealist art and literature of the time, and with the photographic formalism of his contemporaries Rodchenko and Moholy-Nagy. Though many of his themes and devices today seem like standard stage properties of 1920s and '30s art, Kertész turned them to personal ends. His surrealistic juxtapositions showed the real counterpoint of activities and classes in the modern city; his formalist compositions registered the urban tension between individual passion and the conventions of daily life. Throughout his Paris work, Kertész wrestled with the paradox that art, like civilization, requires the deferment or disguise of raw feeling and raw experience, and yet derives its power from just those things.

Moving to New York at the outset of World War II, Kertész was compelled to start his career over again from scratch, as Ben Lifson

VOL
71
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

Galerie Maeght

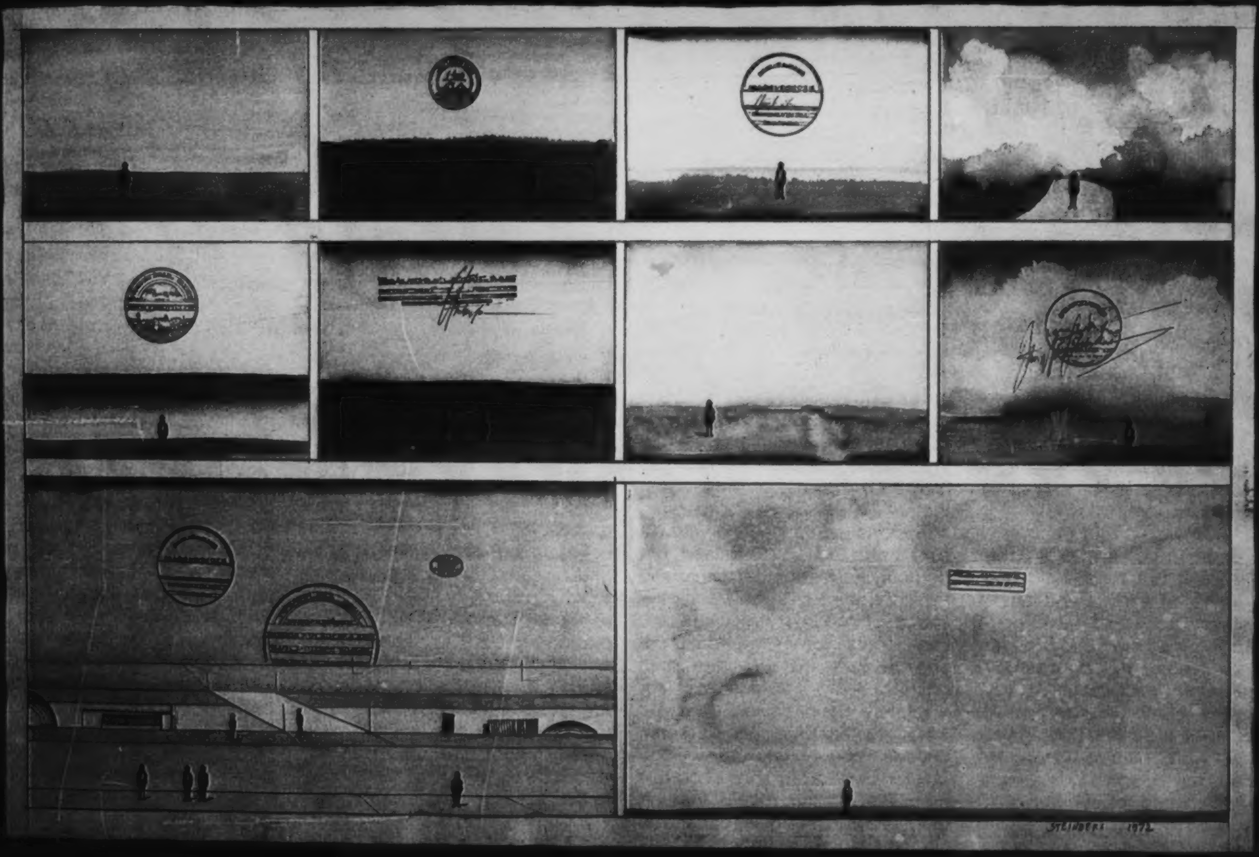
Arnold Herstand, President
U.S. Office, 9 West 57th Street
New York, New York 10019
Telephone 212 371-9077
Telex 428931

Galerie Maeght, Paris, Zurich

Saul Steinberg

"Japan Postcards" 1972
Watercolor
20 x 30 inches (50.8 x 76.2 cm)

By Appointment Only



explains in his eloquent, insightful (though brief) introduction to A Lifetime of Perception. In contrast to the naturalness Kramer remarks in Kertész's early photographs, Lifson emphasizes the degree to which the beauty of Kertész's American work lies in its "assertion of the artist's power." The thematic sequencing of Kertész's pictures here, by photograph editor Jane Corkin, is intelligent and thought-provoking, and the 150 plates are well reproduced (although the printing is not up to the standard of Hungarian Memories). Within each thematic category (e.g., birds, chairs, cityscapes) the pictures jump back and forth between older and more recent images, drawing comparisons and illuminating changes. (It is a bit troubling, however, to notice that at least one picture—the view of southern Manhattan on page 189—is incorrectly dated; it's from 1972, not 1952.)

It was in Paris that Kertész began to photograph city streets from above; in New York that approach became almost his only one. Often he has, in this way, brilliantly captured the unique geometry of New York City, and yet something has unmistakably been lost. It is not merely the intimacy of his Paris overhead shots that is missing, although they were certainly never taken from such great distances as his New York pictures; what we sense, rather, is the loss of his humanist vision. Kertész's images of New York are images of isolation. The instances of joy he discovers—a couple necking in Washington Square park, a bikinied sunbather reading on a rooftop—remain minute and distant, separate from the city around them. Similarly, Kertész's earlier still lifes maintained a faith in the innate humanity of man-made and natural objects; the recent still lifes, published here for the first time, seem to lack this faith, however intellectually and formally suggestive they may be. If, in Hungarian Memories, we discover a young Kertész miraculously in touch with his world, A Lifetime Of Perception seems to express the dilemma of a man isolated from the world by the passage of time (he was born in 1894). Kertész's work of the last ten years suggests that he does not want to make photographs about isolation and loss—but those are the realities his camera involuntarily records.

—Pepe Karmel

FICTION

Mistral's Daughter, by Judith Krantz, New York, Crown Publishers; 531 pp., $15.95.

"O.K., is the tape on? Well, this dude old enough to be my Dad, a real zod, comes up to me and Michelle and Kristie at McDonald's in the Sherman Oaks Galleria and says he has this book he wants to give me. I go, 'O.K., howcum?' because, like, he could be hitting on me like the dudes at the mall do sometimes, you know, and want me to go cruising with him in a skanky car or something. And he goes, 'I write book reviews for this art magazine and they gave me this book that, like, gags me with a spoon and I can't finish it, so could you read it for me and tell them what you think?' So he pulls out this incredibly pink book that's totally Bubbleicious, like I'd like to have some lip gloss the same color, and it's by Judith Krantz! My Mom, who takes night classes in painting and stuff at Valley College and knows about art, except she still wears totally base designer jeans with elastic butts and comes off like a total Joanie, has these other books by Judith Krantz, like Scruples and Princess Daisy. She's been dropping hints that she wants this book, it's called Mistral's Daughter, for her birthday because it's all about art. So, when I take it from this grody dude, Michelle and Kristie go, 'Oh, wow, it's five hundred pages long!' So I go, 'Bite the ice,' on accounta I'm not maximum brilliant or anything, but I passed eighth grade English.

Anyway, this book is about this awesomely beautiful chick named Fauve whose old man was a great artist, kinda like Picasso or somebody but who painted pictures that really look like things but still modern. Actually, the book is more about this artist dude because he made it with Fauve's grandma about a hundred years ago in Paris when things were clearly tubular and chicks with names like Kiki of Montparnasse posed naked for all these great artists. After they split up, Fauve's grandma was still real young so she made it with this rich dude who was still married back in America, and they had a kid that they named Teddy even though it was a girl. Fauve's grandma ends up broke 'cuz the rich dude dies so she opens a modeling agency in New York. I mean, the book is really more about modeling than art, and I liked the parts about Vogue and Bazaar because I want to be a model, or a contestant on Dance Fever, even though my Mom says you have to have an agent and I still don't have my braces off.

Well, Teddy becomes the most awesomely famous and beautiful model ever and gets to go to France to model in front of these paintings that turn out to be done by Julien Mistral, who made it with Fauve's grandma, and who is now awesomely famous himself. If you really want to know, practically all the people in the book are awesomely famous and beautiful, and practically all the awesomely famous and beautiful people who ever lived, like Jean Shrimpton and Twiggy and Charlie Chaplin and Richard Avedon and Mrs. Douglas MacArthur, whose husband was a famous general, are in the book. I figure it's on accounta Judith Krantz knows them all very personally. Her picture on the back of the book is all retouched, like the kind of person who would know awesomely famous and beautiful people, even though she looks like a kinda blowchoice chick, with this Rona Barrett cut and everything. Anyway, Teddy gets preg and jams with this artist dude who's supposed to be totally buffo even though he's, like, 50 or something, which is older than the guy who gave me the book. It's a real gnarly sitch with Fauve's grandma, who's also awesomely famous but not quite so beautiful anymore from running the modeling agency which is the world's largest or best, but the writing is really mondo surfo, like this:

> Julien Mistral stood poised on the edge of the diving board. His powerful, tanned body was bisected only by the thin strap of bikini that men in Europe had been wearing for the past four years. He was fifty-two and his heroic proportions were those of a man of thirty. He had painter's muscles, the firm solid legs of a man who spends his life standing before a canvas or walking around a studio, and the well-developed arms and back of any man who wields a tool, whether it be a paintbrush or a shovel.

Anyway, Teddy falls off this bitchen boat at a party and dies and the grandma comes over to get the baby, who is Fauve who I told you about at the beginning, and takes her back to New York to make her a totally famous and beautiful model, too. But it doesn't work out, because some of the people in the book are Jewish. Like, Fauve's grandma was Jewish, and Teddy was part Jewish, and Fauve is part Jewish, too, but not so much. Well, during the war, the one with the Nazis and everything in it, the artist dude, who is clearly a major killer-type artist who can even put down Picasso, wants to keep on painting, so he tells his Jewish friends to bagpipe it when they try to hide out in the part of France where he has this outrageously excellent studio on a farm. He even finks on some guys who are against the Nazis but who steal the sheets he's painting on and he's friends with this bu-fu Nazi dude who likes art, and the Nazi dude totally tweeks the good dudes who stole the sheets.

Anyway, when Fauve comes to visit her Dad after the war when she's a little older than me, like 15 or 16, she meets this hunky babe who turns out to be the son of this Jewish guy her Dad wouldn't let hide out during the war but who survived and turned into an awesomely famous art dealer. The foxy son is Jewish, too, and Fauve falls in love with him and gets real into being Jewish on accounta she knows she's part Jewish but didn't know that Jewish people ever lived in France. Then she finds out the airhead things her Dad did during the war, and she almost rolfs before she bails.

She doesn't even phone him or anything until after he dies and she's awesomely famous for helping run her grandma's modeling agency and she goes to Italy and meets the foxy son again, and they fall in love again, but she won't marry him. They make it together, though, and there's a lot of sex and stuff in the book when everybody makes it so they can get pregnant to have the kids the book needs to keep the story going, but none of it really grossed me out, like somebody giving cone or something. Fauve ends up getting all these bitchen paintings and even the farm from her Dad's will, and she gets stoked on becoming an artist herself without even having to take a design class on accounta she's got all this natural talent like my Mom who does portraits of the whole family that look like the picture of Judith Krantz.

Finally, Fauve falls in love a third time with the foxy son who's now an awesomely famous architect and they find out that Fauve's Dad, before he died, painted these mondo-major pictures that are all about being Jewish and totally make up for all the dudes he had snuffed during the war, which confused me because all through the book there's this stuff about how art isn't worth anybody's life. But the part I thought was the best is the part on the pink wrapper where they tell how Judith Krantz lives in Beverly Hills, which is even better than Sherman Oaks, and how her husband is an important TV dude and they have two sons who are probably totally awesome babes. It's really weird, 'cuz that's what the guy who gave me the book said he thought was best, too."

—Shauna
as told to Peter Plagens

Contributors

Hayden Herrera is author of the recent Frida, A Biography of Frida Kahlo (Harper & Row) . . . Pepe Karmel is a free-lance critic living in Manhattan . . . Peter Plagens, painter and writer, is chairman of the art department at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

VOL
7
1
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

ROBERT MOTHERWELL

El Negro

A signed and numbered book of seventeen original Robert Motherwell lithographs illuminating the Rafael Alberti poem El Negro Motherwell.
Printed on TGL handmade paper in an edition of fifty-one.
Seven of the lithographs are available individually, in separate signed and numbered editions of ninety-eight.

A limited number of books are available at a pre-publication price.
Offer expires April 15, 1983. Color brochure available upon request.

EL NEGRO
Negro negro elegía negro con sangre negro coagulado con la cal de los huesos recortando las formas Elegy: black black black with blood coagulated black with the white line of bones outlining forms

Tyler Graphics Ltd.

Report from London
Art in the Year of the Falklands

BY JOHN McEWEN

London this summer and fall saw an unusually rich array of exhibitions—ranging from Neapolitan painting to native-born Neo-Expressionism, from the sobrieties of Freud to Cotman's landscapes.

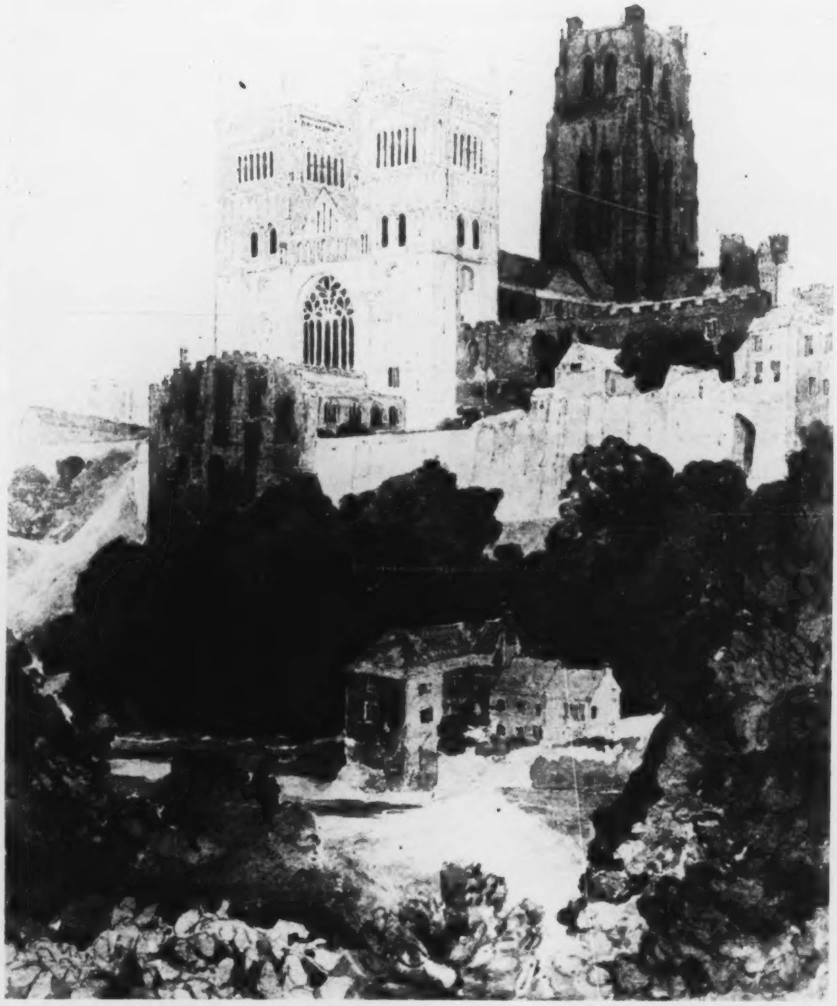
Shops and entertainments suffered unseasonal losses of business during the weeks of the Falklands crisis, so it was no surprise to find exhibition attendances—even of such a hardy annual as the Royal Academy's Summer Show—significantly down, and many dealers reporting their worst sale figures since the months of the Arab oil embargo almost a decade ago.

During and beyond this blighted time the Festival of India continued to dominate the institutions. In scale the Arts Council's "Image of Man" exhibition at the Hayward Gallery remained outstanding, but of the various Indian exhibitions (including lamentable examples of Indian contemporary art at the Tate, Royal Academy and Barbican, as well as an exquisite exhibition of Mughal art at the Victoria and Albert Museum) the most surprising and entertaining was at the Barbican Center.

"Aditi"

"Aditi" (Sanskrit for "creative power") is an attempt, supported by the Indian Government, to save and encourage the subcontinent's traditional craft skills through a continuing series of ever-expanding exhibitions. At the Barbican, men, women and children—practicing professionals gathered from around India—demonstrated their various skills: painting, sculpting, potting, playing music, singing, juggling, tumbling and so on. In an attempt to link these contemporary artisans with their predecessors, valuable objects from museum collections were placed alongside their more humble contemporary derivations.

The theme of the exhibition was the cycle from birth to marriage and rebirth, and implicit in it was a proposed marriage between the pragmatics of the present and the spiritualities of the past, with cultural rebirth the hoped-for issue. Technology is beginning to detach today's Indians from the manual skills and traditions of their forebears as effectively as it has everyone else, and, on the face of it, the conservationism of the "Aditi" scheme already seems to admit that the old ways can only be artificially maintained. Yet the exhibition's merit lay precisely in the zest of its authenticity. One had no doubt that the frightening "Behrupia" or "Monkey Man," with his whitened body, fringed fur and black-painted face, or the six-year old Bhopa Sheesh Ram, who charmed every audience with his unselfconscious showmanship, would, after their jet-age tour, return to the hard life of making a living wandering the roads of Rajasthan. Perhaps there is enough vigor in Indian craft traditions to ensure with time that the exhibition's director, Shri Rajeev Sethi, and his collaborators will after all prove creators rather than embalm-



John Sell Cotman:* Durham Cathedral, *1806, pencil and watercolor on paper. The British Museum.

VOL 71 1 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

Lucian Freud: Naked Man with his Friend, 1978-80, oil on canvas, 35 ½ by 41 ½ inches. Anthony d'Offay Gallery.

Victor Willing: Cythère, 1982, oil on canvas, 97 ½ by 156 inches. Collection Doris and Charles Saatchi.

ers, despite every logical pointer to the contrary. "Aditi" in London certainly offered hope of it. Americans can decide for themselves at the Smithsonian in 1984.

17th-century Painting in Naples

The major institutional exhibition of the autumn was "Painting in Naples 1606–1705, from Caravaggio to Giordano" at the Royal Academy. Following the recent earthquake near Naples many of the paintings here included—in their original installations often dimly lit or inaccessible—were moved for safekeeping and thus made available for exhibition for the first time. The city's name may itself be a byword for decay, but Neapolitan studies, after some very thin years, have recently undergone a revival, and the disaster of the earthquake ironically affords this interest the scholarly exhibition it deserves. The result is the greatest assembly yet of 17th-century Neapolitan painting, surely one of the most influential schools of its time.

During the years in question, Naples was the capital of the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, a patrimony of the Spanish Hapsburgs ruled by regally appointed Spanish viceroys. It was the largest city of southern Europe and the wealthiest port of the Mediterranean; collectors and patrons—the viceroys not least among them—abounded. Yet this taste for refinement took place against a background of unprecedented turbulence and disaster in the city's history, misrule, revolt and massacre finding their natural equivalents in earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, famine and, in 1656, a plague that exterminated 250,000 of the city's 450,000 inhabitants. The art encompassing such extremes resorted, naturally enough, to some extremes itself, and English reviewers of the present show, venting the national distaste for the agonies and ecstasies of the Baroque, wasted many column inches detailing the horrors depicted in some of the more gruesome works. Far worthier of note is the fact that one is given the opportunity to see six Caravaggios in ideal conditions at a single time, or to assess the true strengths of a painter like Ribera, or to glimpse the work of some hitherto neglected minor masters. Also on offer are some paintings by Artemisia Gentileschi, who, recently enshrined as a feminist cult figure, turns out to be an observant and radical, though slightly incompetent, painter in the naturalist mode of Caravaggio. She falls in the better and earlier half of the exhibition, before the dark and light of the Counter-Reformation are dissipated by Venetian color and increasingly vapid emotion. Here also the "discoveries" are to be found: an as yet unnamed Master of the Annunciations to the Shepherds, Guarino, Stanzione, Spinelli. But the importance of Neapolitan painting ultimately rests with two foreigners to the city, the Valencian Ribera and, most especially, the Milanese Caravaggio.

> Paula Rego's work lacks reserve, preaches no moral message and often displays events of, for an English audience, quite shocking earthiness. It seems hardly surprising that Rego disciples have already appeared.

Caravaggio's longest stay lasted only six months, but in that short time he painted two of his grandest masterpieces, and it was from Naples that his influence spread. His superb Seven Acts of Mercy, virtually seven pictures in one, dominates the exhibition; its highlights—an ear here, a sword's glint there—are so occasional as to make a near abstraction of the composition. This painting is as daring in its devices as its creator was in his own violent life, yet it commands an extraordinary range of emotion. In it and the handful of his other paintings included here it is easy to spot the various elements that were to inspire Rembrandt, Velázquez, Ribera and even those great fragmenters of form who have so dominated 20th-century art. Caravaggio is shown to be an immense figure, concluding the Renaissance and prefiguring modernism. The exhibition can be seen at the National Gallery, Washington, D.C., during February and March, and subsequently in Europe at the Grand Palais, Paris.

Cotman

Who have been the most remarkable English landscape painters? Current critical opinion would seem to incline to Turner for spiritual content, Constable for expression and Cotman for design. Cotman's reputation is based on only a handful of watercolors from his total pictorial output, so the touring exhibition (organized by the Arts Council and first shown at the Victoria and Albert Museum) mounted to mark the bicentenary of his birth, represented a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to reassess his achievement. Previous judgment was upheld. The exhibition, featuring work from every period of his career, confirmed that the best of his work is as remarkable as reproductions suggest, and that almost all of it was done when he was in his 20s, most of it between 1806 and 1808.

These Cotmans are the "abstract" ones, harmonious arrangements of shapes and tones, memorable for their formal qualities more than for what they depict. "Two-thirds of mankind, you know, mind more about what is represented than how it is done," chided one of his displeased patrons, and the "what" of it—portraits in oils, architectural etchings, pattern drawings for ladies to copy—increasingly got the better of the "how," as he became more and more entrenched in family and provincial life. Cotman's originality went unrecognized in his own time—not a single obituary notice marked his death in 1842—and it was only at the turn of the present century that he gained a reputation. He sketched in front of the subject, but the daringly geometric alignments and spatial emphases were clearly worked out back in his room. His vision was so ahead of his time that it was not till the post-Cubist '30s that English artists, notably Paul Nash, were sufficiently attuned to capitalize on it.

Freud

Lucian Freud's exhibition of new paintings at Anthony d'Offay's warehouse gallery proved to be his largest since his major retrospective at the Hayward Gallery in 1974. Freud, now 59, has long been acclaimed as one of the most original of contemporary English artists, his charismatic individuality most commonly provoking comparisons with his friend Francis Bacon. The work has always been difficult to place, as if one of his guiding intentions is to paint in a way that defies categorization. It makes his autobiographical art (everything and everyone he paints has a significant position in his private life) preternaturally self-alert—to the possibility of misinterpretation, to the pitfalls of artistic banality. He has done many self-portraits over the years but none of them captures this quality so well as the glimpse of his legs, skipping out of the right-hand corner of a recent painting otherwise devoted to a naked girl.

In a book published to coincide with the exhibition (Lucian Freud by Lawrence Gowing, Thames & Hudson, £18), Freud is quoted as saying that he would wish his "portraits to be of the people, not like them. Not having a look of the sitter, being them." The sitters are invariably deprived of the normal props of portraiture, being posed in the artist's studio at dead of night and usually stripped of their clothes. To describe the results as "portraits," therefore, is inadequate, and other categories are evaded no less successfully. He could be said to be a naturalist, but not in the normal sense of being programmatically against flattery, since for him it doesn't seem to be an issue one way or another; he may be equally seen as a realist, but with none of the political or moral purposes typical of that particular strain of British painting. A young man holds a rat near his genitals, sitters are scrutinized on a couch—but Freud's interest in the rat and inattention to the couch both testify to his disregard of symbolism. As the grandson of Sigmund it is as if he is determined to evade any kind of analysis, artistic or couch-bound. That he largely succeeds is the strength of his painting.

His recent adoption of a heavily leaded pigment, Kremnitz White, makes the surfaces of his new paintings the lumpiest, driest and least pleasing of his career. This marks a change from the oilier, smoother and more appetizing style of a few years back, another escape from repetition and easy acceptance. His surfaces have never been less readable at close range, or come into focus so effectively across a room—a fact emphasized by the larger space in which they were shown. "I want paint to work as flesh," he insists, and the weight and transparency of it are now as much his subject as character is. The remark of a painter in a Henry James story, "I wonder what you will do when you are old," never seems far from his thoughts. He can trace the passage of emotion in a face, but it is the passage of time that more and more preoccupies him as he enters old age. If there is a certain primitivism in the obduracy of his individualism, there is a certain puritanism Paula Rego:* Nanny, Small Bears and Bogey-Man, *1982, acrylic on paper, 48 by 60 inches. Edward Totah Gallery.

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

HANS HOFMANN
(1880-1965)
Gleaming Nightfall
1960
Oil on canvas
25 x 30 inches
Signed and dated, l.r.

Other works by

AVERY
BENTON
BLUEMNER
CORNELL
DEMUTH
DOVE
FRANCIS
HARTLEY
LICHTENSTEIN
STELLA

BARBARA MATHES GALLERY
19 East 71 New York
212/249-3600

February 5 – March 19, 1983

30 New Paintings and Figure Drawings

JIM DINE

Full color catalog available, $10.00 ppd.

RICHARD GRAY GALLERY
620 North Michigan Avenue · Chicago, Illinois 60611 · Telephone 312/642-8877

Christopher LeBrun:* Amphion, *1981, oil on canvas, 98 by 84 inches. Private collection.

in his self-mortification; a certain puritanism, too, in his tonality—at present predominantly a stew of bacon pinks, sausage browns and dumpling grays. In this exhibition one craved more sweetness of color and tenderness to counteract the salt of so much distanced sexual meditation and sobriety, invigorating though it was.

Willing, Rego

Victor Willing was one of the brightest artistic lights of his English generation when he left for Portugal in the late '50s, but once abroad he never exhibited his work, so that his exhibition at the London AIR Gallery in 1978 was in effect a debut. The reestablishment of his reputation quickly followed. Two years ago the Tate Gallery bought two large paintings, and during 1982 he spent his time at Cambridge University as artist-in-residence. The seven paintings completed there were exhibited at the Arts Council's Serpentine Gallery through early November. Painted with the gallery space in mind they proved, as an entity, his most ambitious and successful effort to date—larger than their predecessors, more subtly colored, more ambiguous in imagery.

Willing's 1978 paintings were faithful records of scenes he saw in his mind's eye when in a state of reverie. He was not finding it easy to sleep much at the time, and this insomniac condition may have added to the hallucinatory quality of the experience. Since then the inevitably illustrational nature of these earlier paintings has disappeared, and so have his states of reverie. On the other hand, he no longer thinks of reality and dream as separable. "Our world is desire made concrete symbol," he writes, suggesting that the separation of the conscious from the unconscious is going on all the time; no clear distinction between the two can be made. This attitude has brought about a greater fusion of subject and form in his latest paintings. Objects are describable but not namable and stand in equally ambiguous surroundings: shallow spaces, not definitely indoors or out but somewhere between the two, like stage sets.

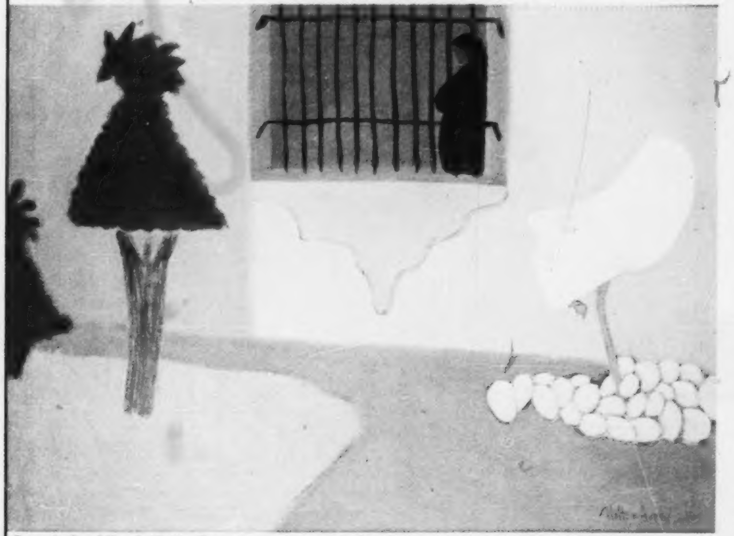
If the picturing of space in Western art may be interpreted as a sign of optimism—a willingness to believe that the world can be known by the eye and rendered by the hand—then Willing's paintings can be seen as a fight against pessimism, a struggle to make space in time. Enigmas abound. Shadows are cast by no apparent light. There is a sense of gravity, of imminent collapse or slide, but not of weight. In the diptych Cythère (a reference to Watteau's famous painting) a wild red plant suggests that even ecstasy cannot halt time, blooming and dying in the same ecstatic moment. A labyrinth-like structure stands behind. Are we moving in circles, lost in the mind's maze, monotonously indecisive? It is Willing's achievement that he succeeds in making boldly substantial images of something as insubstantial as solitude and time passing.

Paula Rego is famous in her native Portugal, less so in her adopted England. Since her first solo exhibition in London in 1981, however, English interest in her work has been growing, and her September exhibition at the Edward Totah Gallery helped solidify that reputation. Her pictures lack reserve, preach no moral message and often display events of, for an English audience, quite shocking earthiness. Her artistic attitude, too, differs from the standard English in being decidedly unsnobbish: she deplores divisions between high art and low and makes no such differentiation herself. Fairy stories in general, Portuguese folklore in particular, have proved a lasting influence. The Portuguese folk tradition is harsher, more matter-of-factly close to the soil than the gentler and lusher fancies of the English, and she animates it further with what is practically an inventory of graphic styles, from the Catalan primitives that once influenced Picasso to the cartoon inventions of Disney.

Paula Rego's Portuguese reputation was largely founded on paintings in which the imagery was first painted on paper, then cut out and collaged to make the composition. The exhibition at Totah showed her to have abandoned this method in favor of simply painting (in acrylic) directly on the paper support. In this way the skill and energy of her drawing is channeled to the benefit of her painting, which for the first time is left uncurtailed by scissors. Even within the time span represented by the paintings on view she greatly increased the complexity of color and composition—a considerable achievement for an artist of her assurance and experience (she is in her mid-'40s)—and as a result she now plans finally to paint directly on canvas.

As for subject matter, the works in this show evidenced Rego's continued interest in allegorical figures—usually grouped in threes—engaged in a range of violent, sometimes cruel, always warring, predominantly sad and invariably triangular predicaments of social life. One character, not necessarily male, usually dominates another at the

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI



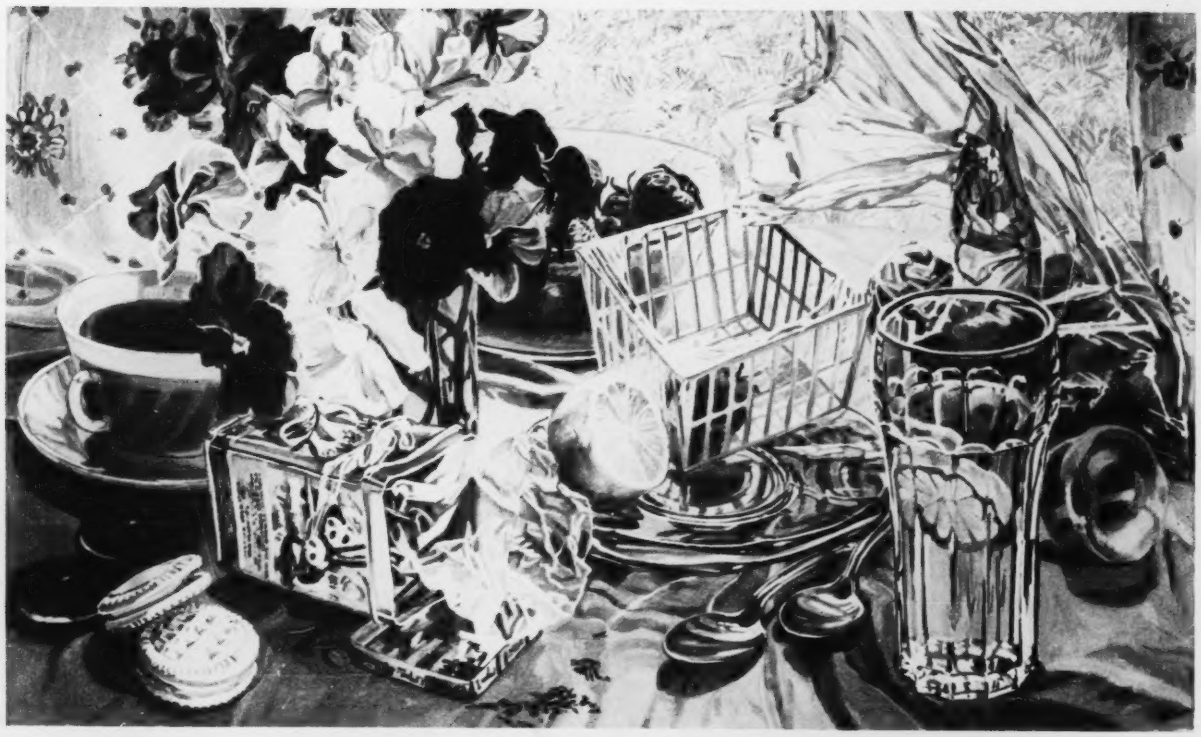
Street in San Miguel, 1946, oil on canvas, 30 x 40 inches

MILTON AVERY: MEXICO

February 5–March 3

A fully illustrated catalogue is available at $10.00 postpaid.

GRACE BORGENICHT GALLERY
724 Fifth Ave, NY, NY (212) 247-2111



JANET FISH AT ROBERT MILLER FEBRUARY 1 - FEBRUARY 26
PAINTINGS AND PASTELS 724 FIFTH · NEW YORK

expense of a third; increasingly, however, the situation appears more disparate and complicated. Human beings are often characterized as animals and vegetables, though not, apparently, for any particular symbolic reason. The scenes depicted sometimes arise from the artist's own experience, sometimes from elsewhere; always they are worked into a story as she goes along, and it is here that her impulse for collage and busy rearrangement persists. Rego disciples have already appeared on the scene—perhaps the best indication of the effect her zest and originality has already had here.

LeBrun, Setch

Two of the best exhibitions of the summer and autumn in the private domain were at Nigel Greenwood. LeBrun is very much the young lion of British art at the moment, the only British painter apart from Bruce McLean to have been taken on board the fashionable Zeitgeist train. This year, for example, he was chosen for the international section at the Venice Biennale. His show at Nigel Greenwood's was sold out before it opened, and there is a possibility that he may decorate the new drop curtain at Covent Garden.

LeBrun's paintings of two years ago, his first to attract attention, looked strangely old-fashioned—a combination of Symbolist, 19th-century Böcklin, and arcadian, 17th-century Claude, with only a certain lèse-majesterial rough-and-readiness to hint at contemporary authorship. Nevertheless, the canvases were large in size and unashamedly grand in aspiration, and LeBrun has spent the last two years whipping the results into more personally expressive shape. The flying horse Pegasus, eventually shorn of its wings, has emerged as the dominant and finally single image, surrounded by ever less descriptive brushwork. This swarthy form, shot through with color and energetically handled in the manner of late Guston, has grown progressively more abstract—indeed the horse itself would appear to be on the verge of extinction—since LeBrun's adoption of larger brushes. These help him to work more quickly and expressively, and, by continually overpainting, he can now keep the whole surface of his large canvases fluid till the conclusion. Lebrun is not ashamed to say that his pictures attempt to reintroduce nobility as once again a proper subject for art, and this high ambition, coupled with the growing confidence of his technique, justifies the high hopes he inspires.

Terry Setch's work provokes obvious comparison to Julian Schnabel's, but, to many English eyes, Setch's looks harder won, more baldly born of the mood of its making.

LeBrun has just turned 30, and Terry Setch is 46, but Setch, too, despite his much greater experience, must also be classified a "discovery" of the last two years, since the theatricality of his art made him something of an outcast till Minimalism was replaced by its dialectical opposite. In September, Setch's second one-man exhibition at Nigel Greenwood showed his subject (junk on the seashore) to be unchanged, but the color was brighter, spatial distinctions sharper and the scenes more easily read.

Just as shorelines are the battlegrounds of sea and land, so Setch's canvases are battlegrounds of meaning and form, depth and surface; these conflicts themselves act as metaphors for elemental and personal turmoil. Such empathizing is in the grandest tradition of romantic art, and there is a somber grandeur in the purpose and design of his paintings. Ultimately, in an English context, they derive from Constable's expressionism rather than Turner's mysticism, but they also relate to performance in the way they document (by depicting) the ritualistic junk sculptures he builds on the beach near his home in Wales. His paintings are therefore doubly theatrical—conceptually, expressively.

The method and physicality of the work further reflect contemporary awareness of the sea as a dumping ground, our experience of the foreshore as, all too often, a rubbish tip. Black streaks his encaustic like smears of oil; in places the paint is as thick and lumpy as tar. As with all impressionistic work, the viewer must stand back to appreciate subject, and move close up for subtleties of handling. The occasional introduction of an allegorical theme, such as a modern Andromeda in a posture of sacrifice, emphasizes the symbolism. These paintings are not dainty or pretty, but neither is the daily grind of the world, nor, for that matter, most of the jetsam and weather of the Welsh coast. The rough-hewn imagery and crudely slung, unstretched canvas provoked obvious comparisons with some of the work in Julian Schnabel's exhibition at the Tate. To many English eyes, Setch's looked of a different order of achievement—more hard won, more logically and powerfully born of the mood of its making and the pictorial tradition of its subject. ☐

Author: John McEwen is the art critic for* The Spectator.

Terry Setch: Andromeda, 1981-82, encaustic and oil on canvas, 96 by 101 inches. Nigel Greenwood.

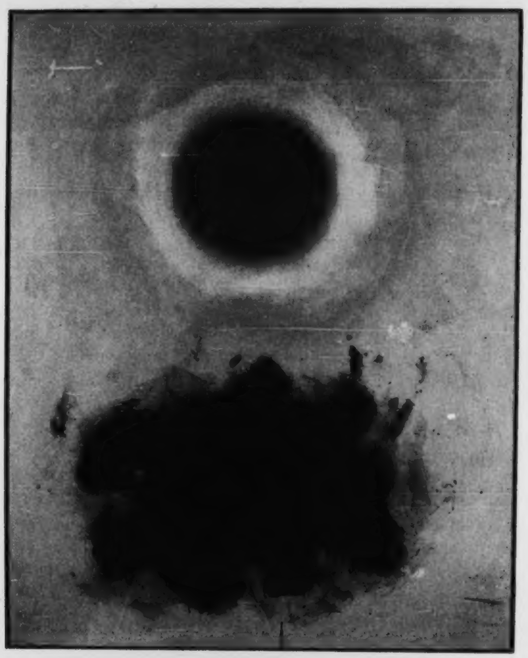
VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI



ADOLPH GOTTLIEB

"ROSY HALO" 1970
ACRYLIC ON CANVAS
60 x 48 inches

JOHN C. STOLLER & CO.
400 MARQUETTE AVE MINNEAPOLIS 55401 (612) 339-7060

FRIEDEL DZUBAS

Recent Paintings / January 29 - February 17

JULES OLITSKI

Recent Paintings / February 19 - March 10

M. Knoedler & Co.
19 East 70 Street. New York 10021. Telephone (212) 794-0550

Report from Sydney
The Fourth Biennale

BY LEON PAROISSIEN

The Fourth Biennale of Sydney (April 7–May 23, 1982) confirmed that this late starter among international exhibitions is the most important event in Australia's contemporary art calendar, and is also serving to direct increasing foreign attention to the burgeoning Australian visual arts.

The Biennale of Sydney is the creation of Franco Belgiorno-Nettis, Italian-born joint managing director of Transfield, which comprises a group of construction engineering companies and is one of the very few patrons of contemporary art in the country. Transfield funded an annual art prize from 1961 until its sponsorship was transferred to the Biennale, whose first tentative edition opened in the inadequate exhibition space of the new Sydney Opera during its first season in 1973. The establishment of the Biennale of Sydney and the opening of the Sydney Opera House marked the beginning of Sydney's successful attempt at wresting the country's cultural leadership from Melbourne, which had been the most vital cultural center for more than a century. Transfield's sponsorship, now a small proportion of the escalating Biennale budget, was from the start a vital factor in attracting financial support and endorsement from all levels of government in Australia as well as from government agencies in participating countries. Despite the title of the event, subsequent Biennales have been held at three-year intervals (1976 and 1979), largely as a result of delays in appointing the new director for each exhibition.

> The Sydney Biennale, begun in 1973 to counter Australia's artistic isolation, is now very much part of the international art circuit.

During the 1970s, when "regionalism" ceased to have only negative connotations, Australia's isolation came to be seen by many as a fortunate protective barrier against foreign cultural domination. But until that shift in attitude, a recurrent Australian obsession had been with what historian Geoffrey Blainey called the "tyranny of distance," an obsession which produced a thirst for information about other cultures.

That tyranny has since been lessened, and the thirst is more easily served. The 1970s brought the introduction of comparatively cheap airfares and allowed artists to travel abroad for short periods—instead of making a six-week sea voyage, which necessitated staying abroad for six months, a year or, in some cases, for life. The 1970s also brought government-funded travel grants, giving artists a mobility previously unknown, and bringing foreign artists, curators and critics to Australia. Art museums in Australia not only shared in the worldwide boom in touring exhibitions, but, goaded by their previous sense of isolation, began their own international exhibitions—with a surprisingly effective combination of innocence and ingenuity.

Nor has the impact of the Biennale been limited to Sydney. Works in the exhibition, at times whole segments of the Biennale, tour subsequently, and visiting artists and critics usually visit other cities. Meanwhile, several foreign artists who have been represented in a Biennale have returned to work and exhibit—among them Los Angeles artist Michael McMillen, Marina Abramović and Ulay from Holland, West German artist Klaus Rinke and English artist Hamish Fulton.

For these reasons among others, the Biennale has prompted Australian artists to reexamine their identity and role, not only in the international context, but in the face of the newly emerged art bureaucracy at home. The selection process for the Third Biennale (1979) attracted artists' protests and ultimately led to the formation of the Artworkers Union, now active in four of the country's six large states. Of several concessions sought, the major victory in 1979 was the principle of equal representation for women artists in the Australian section. Prior to the Fourth Biennale, The Artworkers Union won fees for Australian participants, but failed to win agreement to a more comprehensive contract, in part because a draft of the document was published prematurely in Art Network.

Expatriate artist William Wright returned after living abroad for 23 years, mostly in Britain but more recently in New York, to direct the Fourth Biennale. Eventually settling on a broad and ambiguous title for the show, "Vision in Disbelief," Wright set about selecting an exhibition representing 45 Australians and 162

Sydney Biennale, installation, Art Gallery of New South Wales (left to right): Philip Guston: Pit; Bernhard Blume: Magischer Determinismus; Francesco Clemente: Il Mio Corpo e Rosso per Formaggio; Jorg Immendorff: Brrdmaler, Ddrrrmaler, BrrrrD.

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

Jean-Luc Vilmouth: Street Shadow, 1981, wood and metal; wall figure 74 inches high.

Min Tanaka: Drive, 1982, performance. Photo Kerry Dundas.

Aboriginal artists of the Walpiri tribe: Ground Image of the Snake Dreaming Center at Jundu.

artists from 16 other countries. Half the works were temporal: a wide selection of video (primarily from the U.S., Canada, Japan, France and Australia), film and performance. In addition, sound works made their debut as a separate section, with 32 artists represented.

Because of space restrictions at the Art Gallery of New South Wales, the main venue, four other exhibition spaces throughout the city were pressed into service. The work was distributed among these five locations in a way which was intended to equalize the importance of the various spaces, with the regrettable result that related works, and in several cases works by the same artist, ended up being shown in different galleries. However, the spreading of Biennale events throughout the city certainly gave the sense of its being an occasion involving a wider audience. There were other signs of broad community involvement, such as the broadcasting on FM radio of selections from the sound program, and a series of public forums which provided a framework for the debate inevitably associated with such exhibitions.

Subjects such as "Regionalism and Cultural Dependency," "A Decade of Feminist Art in Review," "Sign, Symbol and Imagery: Subjectivism Revived or Revised" and "Art, Social Context and Validation" were addressed by Australian speakers and visitors (including Miriam Schapiro, Lisa Tickner, Mary Kelly, Achille Bonito Oliva, Irving Sandler, Rudi Fuchs, Bruce Ferguson, Wystan Curnow, Marijan Susovski, Jean-Christophe Ammann, Peter Fuller and Jean-Hubert Martin).

The rejection of mainstream modernist notions that occurred during the 1970s, and the accompanying widespread assertion of regional and subcultural identities, have not been reflected to any large extent in international exhibitions. The very concept of such exhibitions as we know them today is steeped in the modernist enterprise, and as long as the internationalist model is still followed, the most one can expect is shifts in emphasis—such as the one which brought European art in general, and Italian and German art in particular, to prominence in the 1980 Venice Biennale and "Westkunst."

A new generation of Australian artists have inherited a longstanding concern with myth, ritual and space.

The Sydney Biennale was no exception. In the absence of national pavilions, it was primarily an exhibition of Western European and North American art, with limited representation of other countries: Finland, Yugoslavia, Argentina, Colombia, Japan and New Zealand. And even among those nations accorded extensive treatment, representation within any one medium was limited, simply because so many mediums were included.

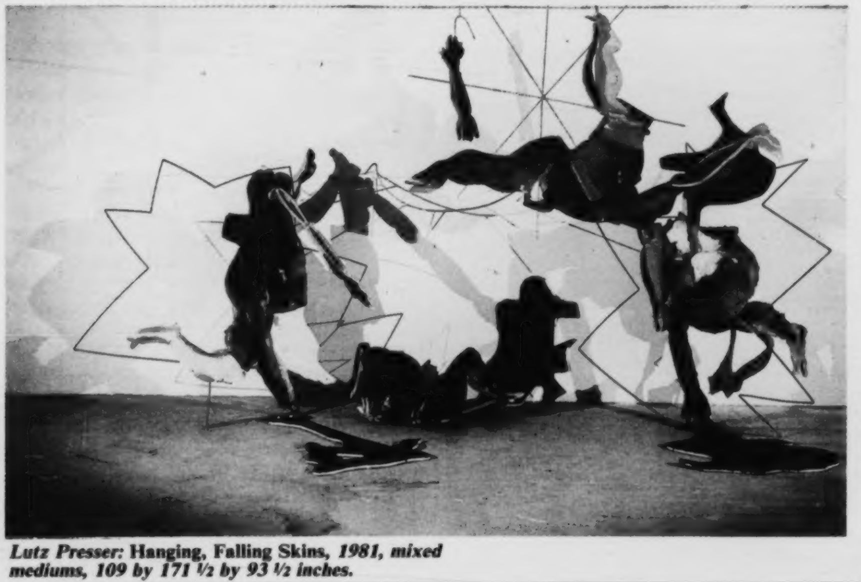
The international resurgence of figuration and pattern in painting was as clearly the major preoccupation in this show as it has lately been elsewhere. Whether the artists thus preoccupied are reacting against modernism, or, as is the case with some younger artists and artists remote from the art capitals of the world, working largely in ignorance of recent developments, they all tend to share certain general methods: spontaneity of technique, often evidenced in an overly expressive manner; freer use of pre-industrial mediums such as oil paint; an interest in the human figure as a potent symbol; and the deployment of fantasy, dream, and psychological intensity to assert the personal as well as the regional.

Enzo Cucchi's La Zingara Calva exemplified the haunting expressiveness and private symbolism of what Bonito Oliva has dubbed the Italian Trans-avantgarde. Other members of the group represented were Francesco Clemente and Mimmo Paladino, whose work ranged freely across figurative references including quotations from past styles. Sandro Chia was included in the catalogue, but his work did not arrive for the exhibition.

Work by a small group of West German painters briefly outlined the revival (or survival?) of expressionism in Germany. With the exception of Michael Buthe, whose single work did not do him credit, the German painters were fairly well represented. There was a four-canvas work by Baselitz, three works by Immendorf and five by Lüpertz. Salomé, the youngest of the German artists, brought to Sydney a large canvas with underdrawing completed and, in a manner reminiscent of the Action painters, rapidly applied a fabric of pure color, thoroughly sensuous in both its elusive figurative references (suggesting the ambience of a Berlin nightclub) and its surface.

The common expressionist base of many of the paintings in the exhibition certainly does not reflect the emergence of another international style. The cartoon-like narrative paintings of Dutch artist John van't Slot and American Susan Rothenberg's primitive glyphs have little in common other than the expressive application of paint. There were some regional inflections visible within the exhibition, but these were seldom as explicit as Immendorf's Germanic symbols. The employment of personal symbolism and calligraphic signs by such disparate artists frequently precludes specific meaning as emphatically as pure abstraction.

Mike Parr:* Parapraxis III: Cold Photography (Menippean Discourse as the Garments of the Moon), *1982, photographic installation, 8 panels, 61 ½ by 41 inches each.



Lutz Presser:* Hanging, Falling Skins, *1981, mixed mediums, 109 by 171 ½ by 93 ½ inches.

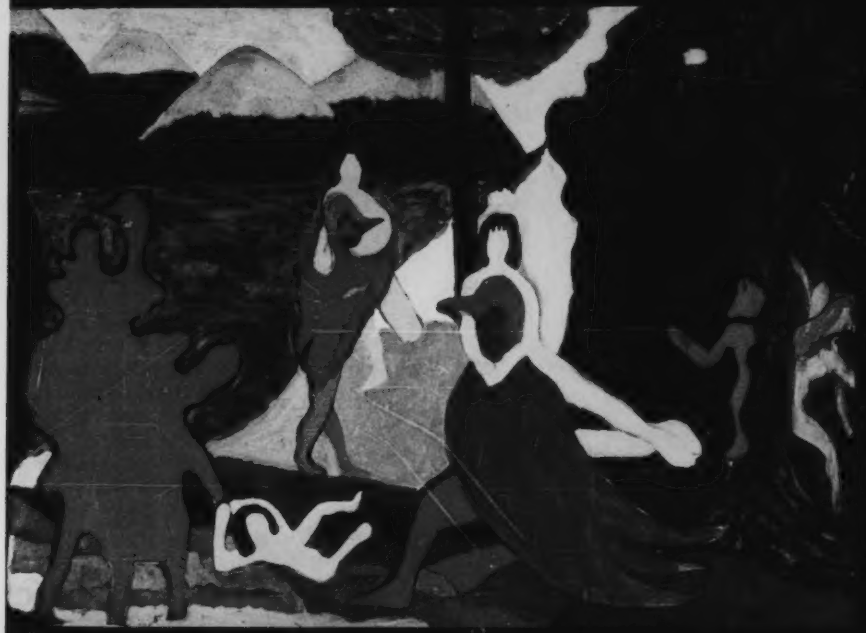
Revived expressionism is not confined to painting. The oblique narrative qualities of the photographs by Bernhard Blume included in the Biennale have been juxtaposed to new painting in previous exhibitions, as have sculptures by Baselitz and installations by Jonathan Borofsky and Judy Pfaff. (The latter two the Biennale sought unsuccessfully to represent during a time of competing international shows.) Biennale performances by Japanese artist Min Tanaka and sculpture by Jean-Luc Vilmouth were imbued with personal symbolism and obviously shared the neo-expressionist concern with the human figure.

The exhibition underlined another aspect of the Neo-Expressionist tendency. In marked contrast to the advent of most modernist styles, the widespread return to an expressionist mode seems to have occurred simultaneously in many countries. Of course there were a few precursors such as Philip Guston, whose return to figurative painting late in his career was represented in the Biennale by a work from the collection of the Australian National Gallery, Pit (1976), a fiery, apocalyptic vision. Nevertheless the suddenness with which Neo-Expressionism has found acceptance is striking.

Australia, like other countries, can point to artists who independently abandoned abstraction and sought new vitality in figuration several years ago, artists whose work has recently won public acclaim because of the change in critical climate rather than through any major shift in their own agendas. A case in point is Australian painter Peter Booth, who was not represented in the Sydney Biennale because virtually all his major recent work had been sent to London and to the Venice Biennale. The expressive power of Booth's figurative work was evident in his drawings long before 1976, when it emerged in his paintings. Bosch, Brueghel and Goya, together with the early 20th-century expressionists, are his obvious mentors. But there were other models for Booth and for Australian artists who were in the Sydney Biennale: those Australian painters who from the late 1930s and early 1940s conveyed their highly personal responses to the distinctive environment and space of their country—Arthur Boyd, John Perceval, Sidney Nolan, Albert Tucker and Danila Vassilieff. A new generation of Australian painters, represented in the Biennale by Davida Allen and Lutz Presser, are inheritors of this tradition. Allen's broadly and vigorously painted canvases are immediate and intuitive responses to domestic crises and family tragedies. Like Presser, she has been producing figurative work since she was a student. Presser's concerns are distinctly different from those of Allen. Having earlier done a major theoretical study of art and anatomy, he has recently been exploring the ancient theme of martyrdom and its ghoulish practices and rituals in a contemporary idiom—painting on foam rubber stretched on a wire substructure.

The concern with myth and ritual on the part of the older generation of Australian figurative painters was undoubtedly an enriching influence on performance art when it was adopted from

VOL
71
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI



"BIRD PARTY," 1961, OIL ON CANVAS, 54 x 74 INCHES

BOB THOMPSON
(1937-1966)

JANUARY 18-FEBRUARY 26

VANDERWOUDE TANANBAUM
24 E 81 STREET NEW YORK
212 879 8200

EXCLUSIVE REPRESENTATIVE
FOR THE ESTATE OF BOB THOMPSON

Joan Mitchell
February 19 - March 26

Georg Baselitz
April 2 - May 7

XAVIER FOURCADE INC.
36 East 75th Street New York, New York 10021 212 535-3980

Europe. But one of the most moving performances in the Biennale, that by Australian Ken Unsworth, was European in its references. Overtly nostalgic, but with a tragic edge, the work consisted of the artist sitting in a corner wearing a mask of a child's face. A rag doll and a mechanically bouncing ball under a conical umbrella constituted the spare installation, while a sound tape of Mahler's Fourth Symphony and a child's laughter gradually adopted an hysterical and ominous note.

Australian artist Mike Parr, known for the self-inflicted violence of his early 1970s performances, was represented by an installation which used the immediacy traditionally confined to spontaneous painting, but added a photographic dimension. Parr's interest in ritual's relation to mental and bodily states emerged here through highly expressive Cibachrome prints. The photographic printing process (without a camera) collated and assimilated disparate symbolic elements: blood; his mother's glassware used as a distorting filter; his mother's self-portrait and three of his own; a portrait of his brother by his mother; and Dada-like "accidental" paintings. The final work was shown in an awkward space in the museum to subvert the formality of the surrounding architecture and incorporate it into the work.

> Unlike most modernist styles, Neo-Expressionism seems to have shown up simultaneously in a number of countries—Australia among them.

While Western art searches for new modes of signification, there was a work in the Biennale from another culture, a work with strong ritual associations and one which projected its compressed meaning to its creators and their community. Ground Image of the Snake Dreaming Center at Jundu by Australian aboriginal artists of the Walpiri Tribe (Northern Territory) was a ground painting on rich red sand. Inscribed with the tracks of snakes going between two waterholes, it symbolized the home country of Werril Werrilpa, who was killed for breaking aboriginal law. A song cycle and dance told the story of Werril Werrilpa. While the transporation of this ancient ritual to an installation-performance context and a white-walled air-conditioned art museum suggested a perilous dislocation, the piece had a profound impact on the white audience, whose ancestors had progressively dislodged and neglected aboriginal culture for nearly two centuries. ☐

Author: Leon Paroissien is a free-lance writer living in Paddington, New South Wales.*

Davida Allen: Eschatological Dog, 1980, oil on canvas, 48 inches square. Collection John Buckley.

Ken Unsworth: Rhythms of Childhood (from the series "Memories of Childhood"), 1980–82, installation and performance.

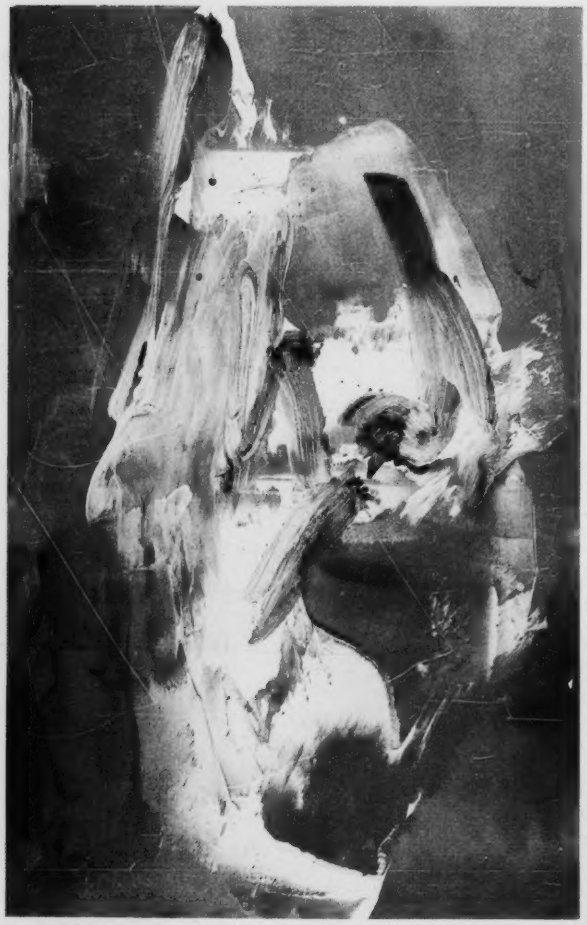
VOL
7
1
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

DARRYL HUGHTO



"Red Rooster," 1982. Acrylic on canvas, 69 x 44 inches

February 5-26

Salander-O'Reilly Galleries

22 East 80 Street New York, NY 10021
Telephone: (212) 879-6606
Gallery hours: Tuesday-Saturday, 10 to 5:30

John Chamberlain

Reliefs: 1960 - 1982

January 28 - March 27

The John and Mable Ringling Museum of Art

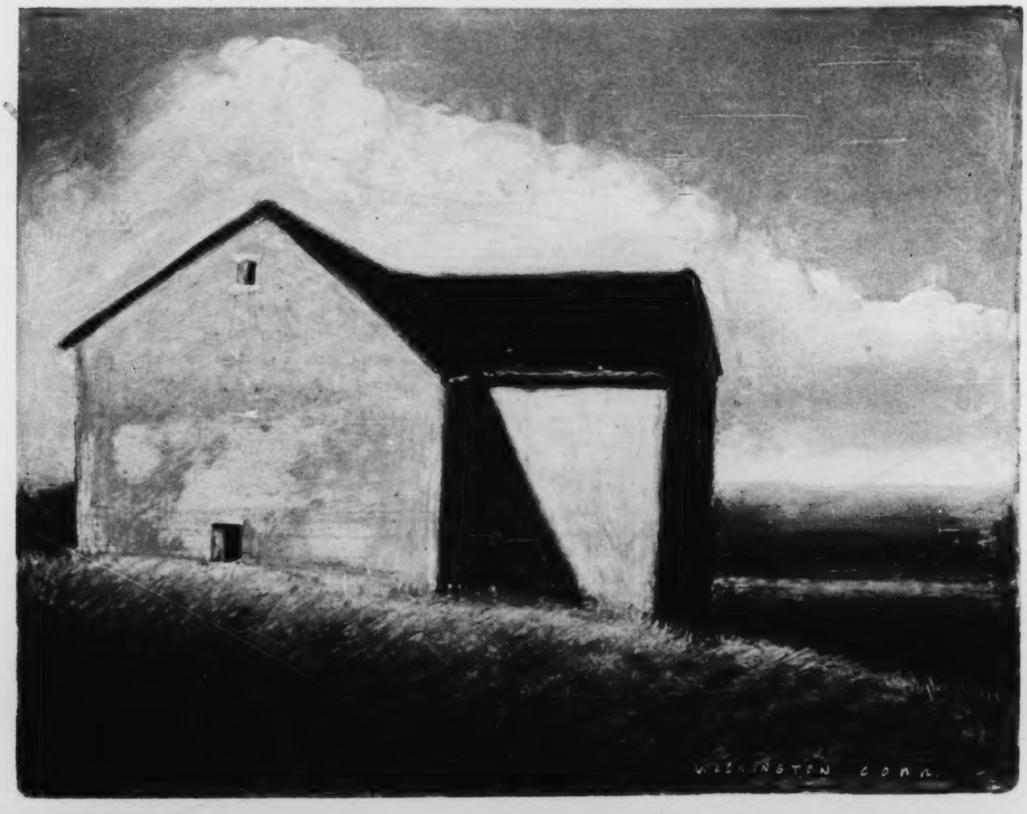
Sarasota, Florida

Exhibition supported in part by the National Endowment for the Arts, the Fine Arts Council of Florida, the Women's Exchange of Sarasota

GALERIE JEANNE BUCHER
53 rue de Seine 75006 Paris - tél 326 22 32

GERARD SINGER

CAROL ANTHONY "The Quieter Season"



WASHINGTON CONN.

CARONE GALLERY
600 Southeast Second Court Fort Lauderdale, Florida 33301 (305)463-8833

VOL
71
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

Ida
Kohlmeyer
New Paintings

February 8 - March 11

William
Sawyer
Gallery
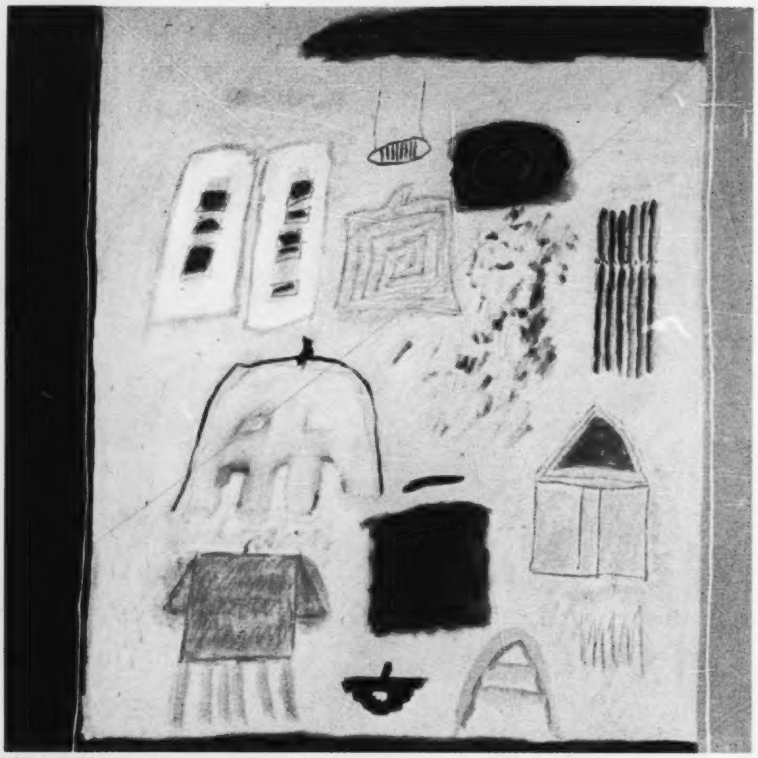
3045 Clay Street
San Francisco, CA 94115



"SYNTHESIS-CC", 72" x 72", Mixed media

Frank Lloyd Wright: Art in Design

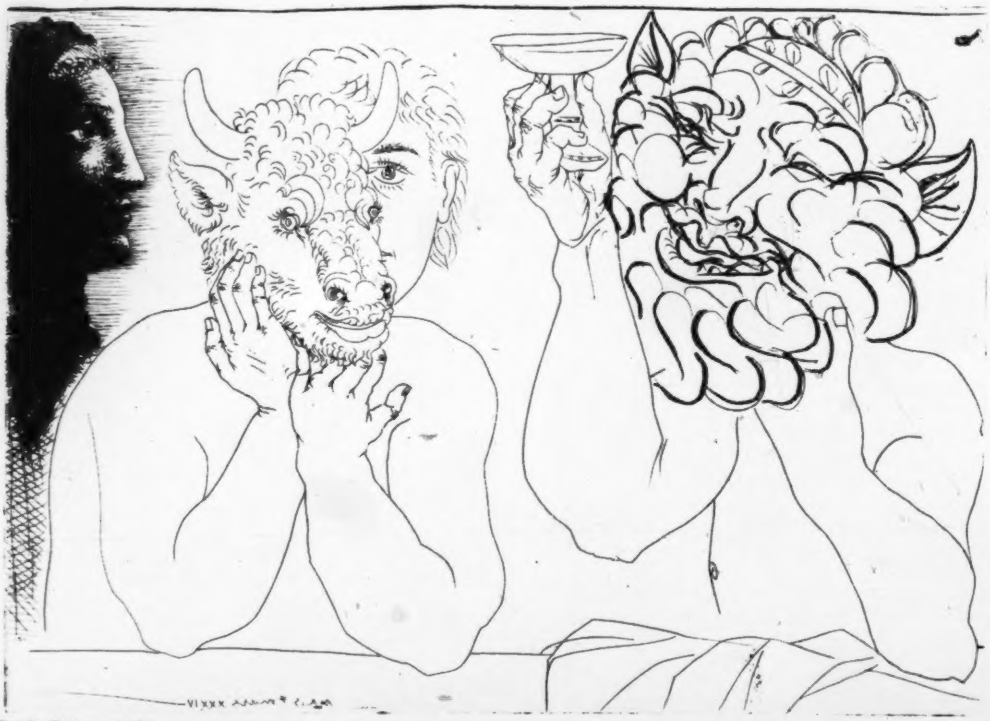
5 February - 26 February, 1983

HIRSCHL & ADLER Modern

851 Madison Avenue New York, New York 10021 212 744-6700



Pablo Picasso 1934

PICASSO
Caisse á Remords
45 Etchings
Feb 17 - March 19

EDWARD TOTAH
GALLERY
39 Floral Street
London WC2
01-379 6241

DOMELA
Réalisations 1922-82

February–March
GALERIE DE FRANCE
50–52 RUE DE LA VERRERIE 75004, PARIS
Tel. 274–38.00

VOL 71
ISS 2
FE 1983
UMI

MERION ESTES

FEB 1–MAR 5

LEONARD KOSCIANSKI

KARL BORNSTEIN GALLERY
1662 12TH ST/SANTA MONICA
CA 90404 (213) 450-1129
GALLERY HOURS/TUES–SAT 11AM–5PM

LEONARD KOSCIANSKI IS ALSO REPRESENTED BY
PHYLLIS KIND GALLERY/NEW YORK + CHICAGO

TIMOTHY APP

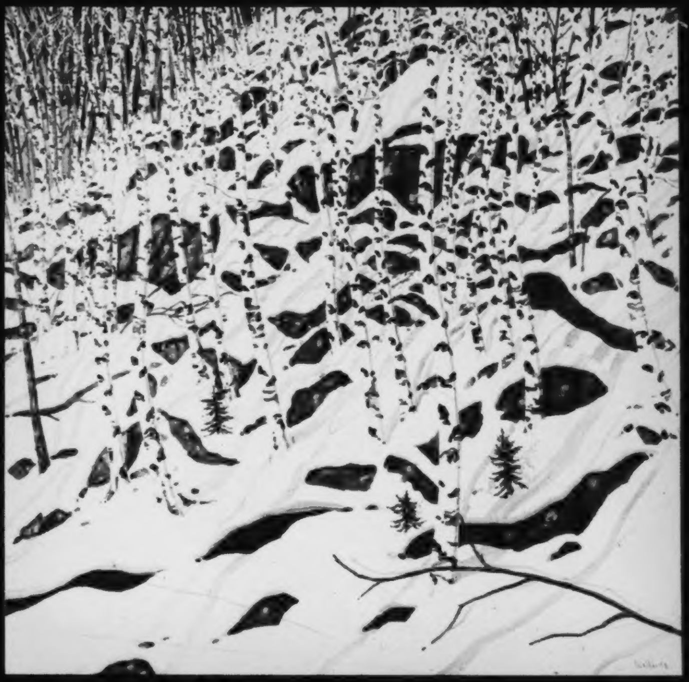
LINDA DURHAM GALLERY, SANTA FE

400 Canyon Road
Santa Fe, N.M. 87501
505-988-1313

DENNIS OPPENHEIM

7 February - 26 March

AKIRA IKEDA GALLERY
8-18, KYOBASHI 2-CHOME, CHUO-KU, TOKYO



Old Avalanche, 1982. Oil on canvas, 96 x 96 inches

NEIL WELLIVER

Recent Paintings

Illustrated catalogue available with essay by Mark Strand
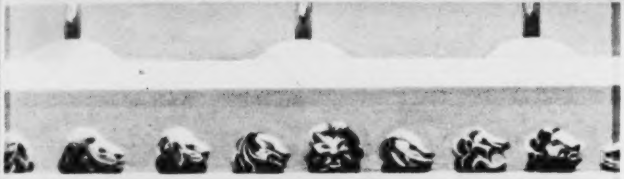
$14 U.S. and Canada, postage included

February 5 – March 2, 1983

Marlborough

40 West 57 New York 541-4900



BELLO BELLO 1982 MIXED MEDIA 6¼" x 4¾"

CARL NICHOLAS TITOLO

RECENT WORK

FEBRUARY 5 – MARCH 3, 1983

TERRY DINTENFASS 50 W 57
NEW YORK CITY 212-581-2268

VOL
71
ISS
2
FE 1983
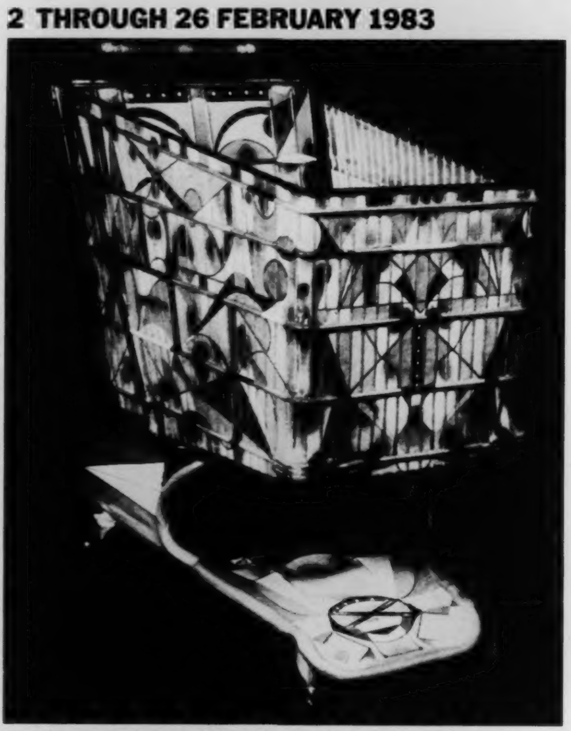
UMI

Judy
Rifka

Brooke Alexander, Inc.
20 West 57th Street
New York, New York 10019
Telephone 212/757-3721

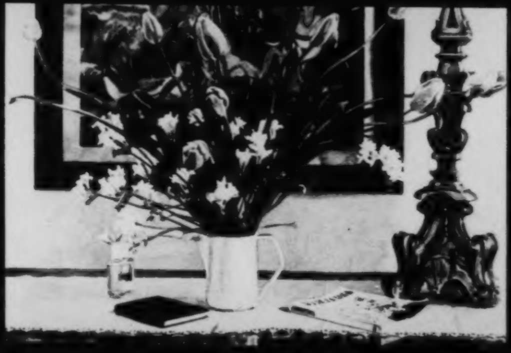
MARTIN JOHNSON
2 THROUGH 26 FEBRUARY 1983



'Show Pink Art for Access' 1982 Mixed media & rhoplex 40 x 23 x 37"

PHYLLIS KIND GALLERY
139 SPRING STREET NEW YORK

CAROLYN
BRADY



AVVENTURA (VIA REGNALIA), 1982, WATERCOLOR ON PAPER, 40 x 60 INCHES.

NANCY HOFFMAN
429 WEST BROADWAY
NEW YORK 10012

JOHN LEES

EDWARD THORP
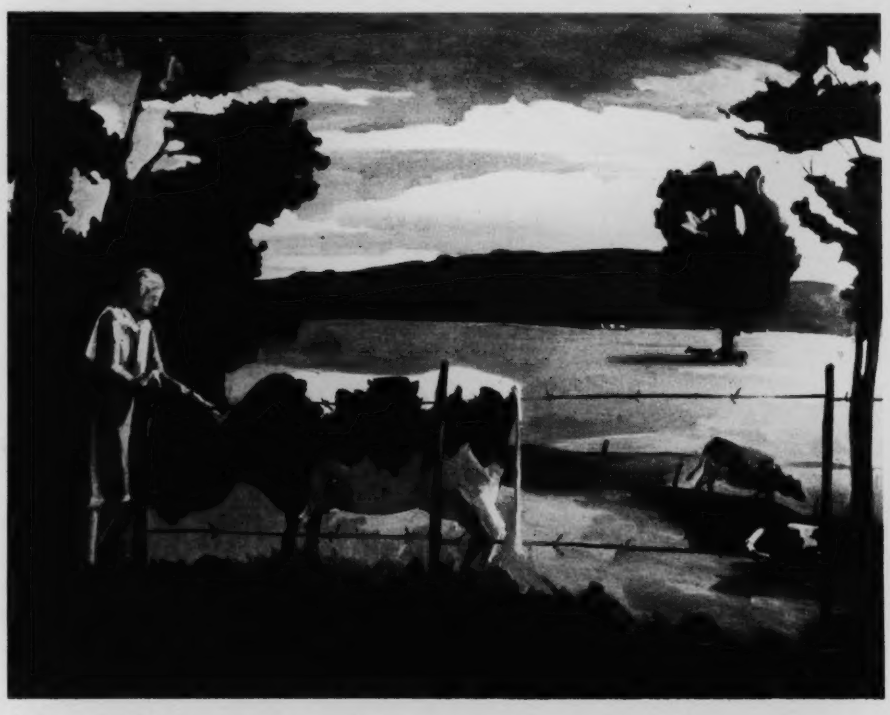
GALLERY

419 WEST BROADWAY, NEW YORK, NY 10012
TELEPHONE 212/431-6880

RICHARD
PITTS

February 9
through March 5



DAVID FINDLAY JR INC Fine Art Established 1870
41 East 57 Street New York 10022 212-486-7660

WM. SCHWEDLER

A MEMORIAL EXHIBITION
5 FEBRUARY—9 MARCH

TIBOR DE NAGY GALLERY
29 W. 57, NY 10019 (212) 421-3780

VOL
7
1
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

Charles Cowles Gallery

Wilhelm Moser	February
Hermann Spoerel	February
Laddie John Dill	March
Nino Longobardi	April
Tom Holland	May
Peter Voulkos	June
Gerald Incandela	June

420 West Broadway New York 10012
(212) 925-3500

PHIL SIMS

"THE BLACK PAINTINGS"
FEBRUARY 9—MARCH 5

OSCARSSON HOOD GALLERY
41 WEST 57TH, NYC 10019 (212) 750-8640

WE ANNOUNCE WITH PLEASURE
THE EXCLUSIVE REPRESENTATION OF
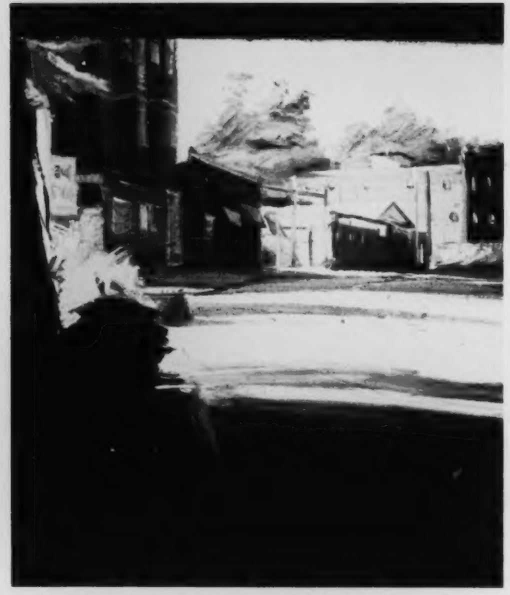
CHARLES SIMONDS

CASTELLI·FEIGEN·CORCORAN
1020 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK
TELEPHONE: 212/734.5505

Richard Sheehan

Recent Paintings



Under Freeport Bridge, 1982, oil on canvas, 48" x 42"

February 5
through
March 2, 1983

The Alpha Gallery
121 Newbury Street
Boston, Massachusetts 02116
617-536-4465

Nina Beall Paintings

Nina Beall. California Landscape. 1982 acrylic on canvas 48" x 72"

February 18–March 19, 1983

Betsy
Rosenfield Gallery, Inc.
212 West Superior, Chicago, Illinois 60610 Telephone 312.787.8020

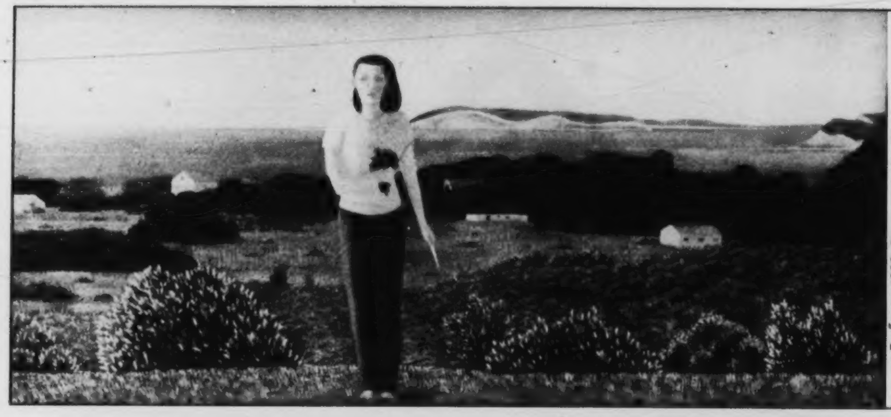
GALERIE MICHAEL WERNER

BROODTHAERS

FEBRUARY-MARCH

D-5000 Koln-1
Gertrudenstr. 24/28
Tel. 210661

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI



Romance, 1982. Oil on masonite, 6⅜ x 14 in.

Helen Miranda Wilson
Paintings / Feb. 2-26

Monique Knowlton Gallery
19 E. 71, N.Y. 10021
Tel. (212) 794-9700

LEWIS BALTZ
SAN QUENTIN POINT

FEBRUARY 5-26 CASTELLI GRAPHICS 4E77 NEW YORK

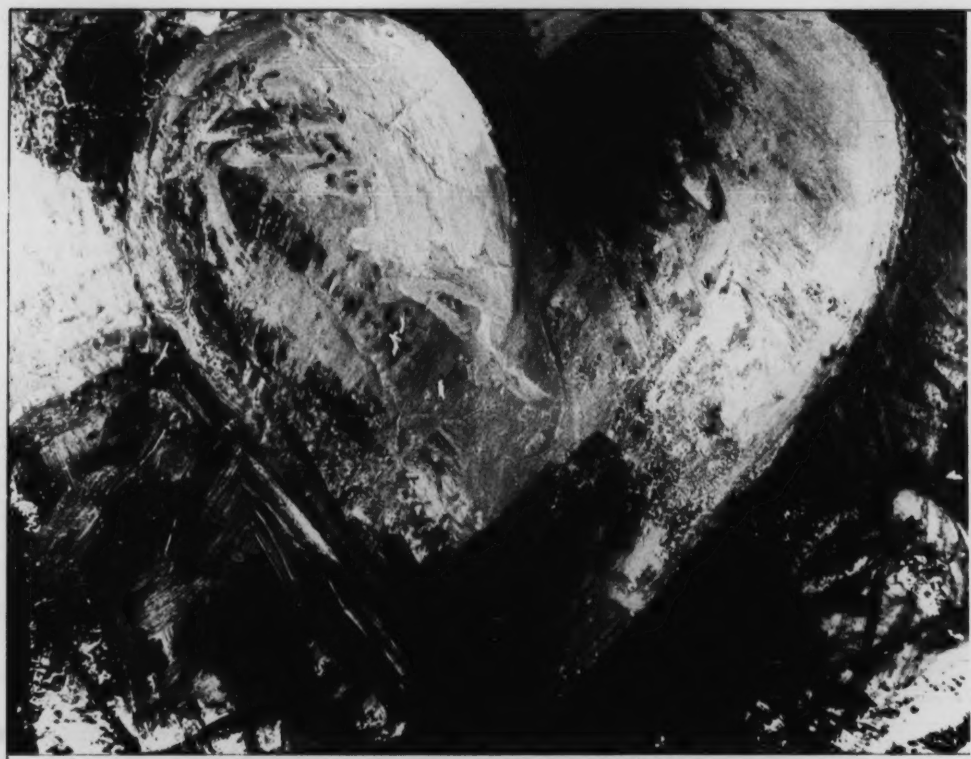
REPRESENTING Carl Andre, Jennifer Bartlett, Lynda Benglis, Jon Borofsky, Peter Campus, Robert Grosvenor, Michael Hurson, Elizabeth Murray, Joel Shapiro, Alan Shields, Jackie Winsor

THROUGH 23 FEB PAINTING EXHIBITION: Jasper Johns, Ellsworth Kelly, Robert Mangold, Brice Marden, Elizabeth Murray, Susan Rothenberg, Robert Ryman, Frank Stella, Terry Winters

PAULA COOPER GALLERY
155 Wooster Street New York 212 674.0766

OSVALDO ROMBERG
University of Delaware Gallery
February 8-28, 1983

Galleri Bellman, New York & Galerie Linssen, Bonn



IRVING GALLERIES

332 Worth Ave.,
Palm Beach,
Florida 33480
(305) 659-6221

JIM DINE Gray Charterhouse Printing 1981 28 x 36 inches

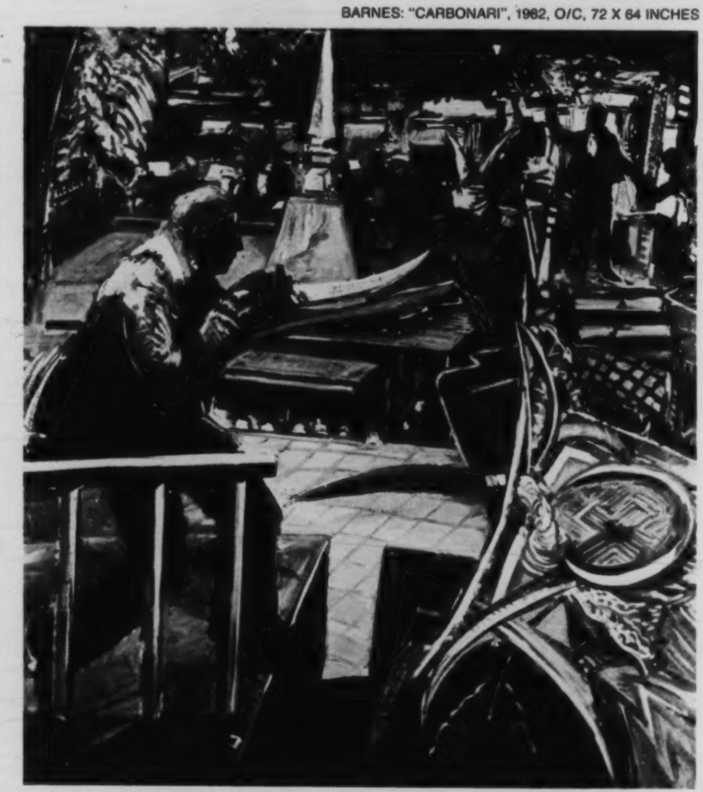
BARNES: "CARBONARI", 1982, O/C, 72 X 64 INCHES



ROBERT BARNES

NEW PAINTINGS AND PASTELS

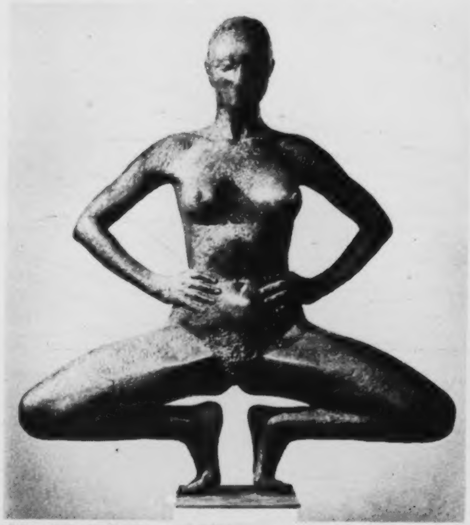
FEBRUARY

ALLAN FRUMKIN GALLERY
50 WEST 57TH STREET NEW YORK

EDWARD

GLAUDER

FEBRUARY 19 — MARCH 19



"BO", 1982, BRONZE, 47 INCHES.

JACK RUTBERG FINE ARTS, INC.

357 N. La Brea Avenue, Los Angeles, California 90036 (213) 938-5222

DAVID HARE

New Work

January 28–February 19

HAMILTON GALLERY

20 West 57th Street, NYC 10019 Tel (212) 765-5915

---

5 FEBRUARY TO 26 FEBRUARY

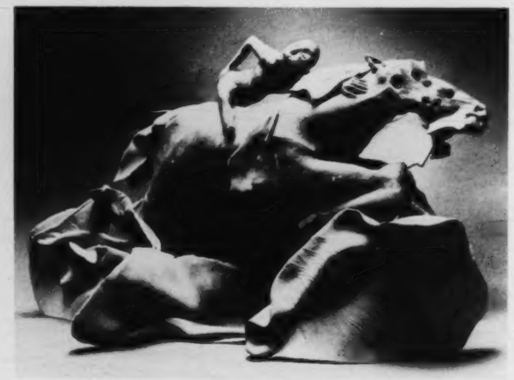
DAVID SALLE

MARY BOONE

GALLERY, 420 WEST BROADWAY
GALLERY, 417 WEST BROADWAY
NEW YORK, NEW YORK 966-2114

MARY FRANK

SCULPTURE & MONOTYPES

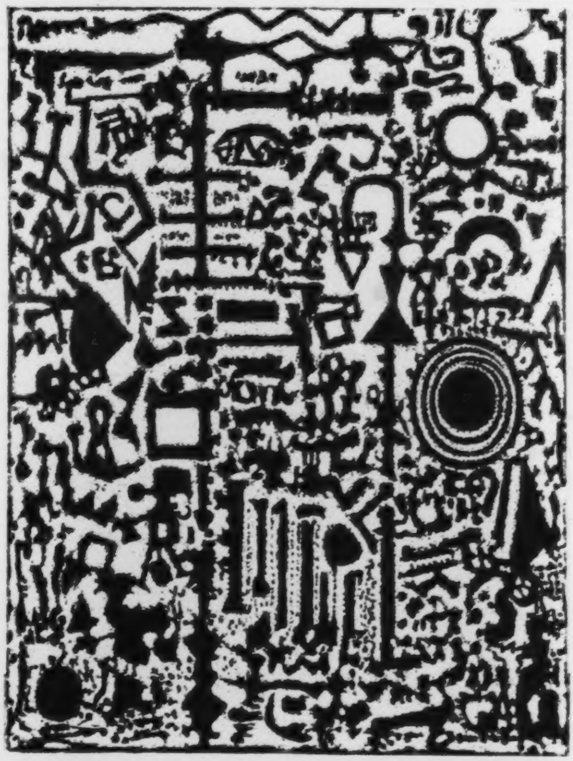


Untitled (Horse and Rider), 1982. Ceramic, 23½ x 48 x 28 inches

FEBRUARY 17-MARCH 19

ZABRISKIE

724 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK



RICHARD POUSETTE-DART, #118 "Spiral of Darkness", 1979-80, Acrylic on linen 72 x 54"

COLOR III

January 6 to February 26

Avery
DeKooning
Francis
Frankenthaler
Motherwell
Noland
Pousette-Dart
Twombly

Martha White Gallery
330 West Main Street
Louisville, Kentucky 40202
(502) 589-3347

10:00-5:00 Monday-Friday
10:00-3:00 Saturday

MIRIAM SCHAPIRO

NEW WORK

February 1-28, 1983

ML
Marian Locks Gallery
1524 Walnut Street
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania 19102
215 546-0322

DIANE BURKO

RECENT WORK

The Waterways of Pennsylvania

February 1-28, 1983

ML
Marian Locks Gallery
1524 Walnut Street
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania 19102
215 546-0322

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

Gary Komarin
New Works February 1-26
Maxwell Davidson Gallery
43 East 78 Street New York 212 734-6702

THE TWINING GALLERY INC
33 BLEEKER ST., NYC 10021 (212) 674-2070

SAM MESSER

OPENS FEBRUARY 10

Formerly Alexander Carlson Gallery

HENRI CARTIER-BRESSON
PORTRAITS 1932-82

GALERIE ERIC FRANCK
15 Route de Florissant • Geneva • Tel. (22) 47.08.09

DANIEL WEINBERG GALLERY

DRAWING CONCLUSIONS
A SURVEY OF AMERICAN DRAWINGS: 1958-1983

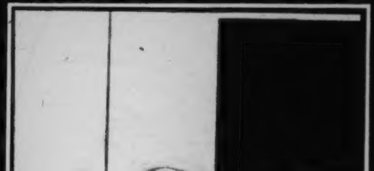
619 NORTH ALMONT DRIVE, LOS ANGELES

JEAN MICHEL BASQUIAT

NEW PAINTINGS
MARCH

LARRY GAGOSIAN GALLERY
510 N. ROBERTSON BLVD., LA, CA 90048
213/276-6051

MILANES-GALA



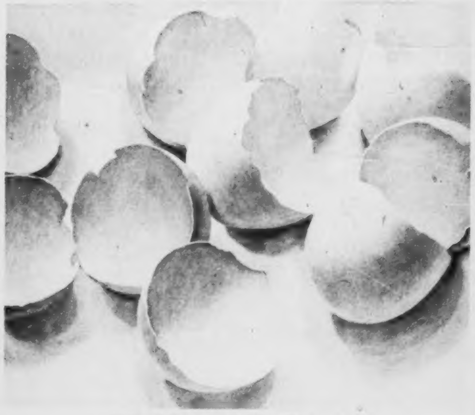
"Tom's Window", 19 x 24" Pencil, 1981,
A Limited Edition of 75 is now available
February 17 - 28
ART GATHERING GALLERIE
3448 Main Highway, Coconut Grove, Florida 33133
(305) 444-2406

GALERIE MICHAEL WERNER
BASELITZ
BYARS
IMMENDORFF
KIRKEBY
LÜPERTZ
A.R.PENCK
D—5000 KÖLN—1—
GERTRUDENSTR. 24/28 T.210661

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

CATHERINE KOENIG

PASTELS AND TEMPERA PAINTINGS



"Shell Scape" 22 x 26 inches

LILLIAN HEIDENBERG GALLERY
50 WEST 57 STREET NEW YORK CITY 10019 (212)586-3808

CLEVE GRAY

Zen Gardens
February 5-23, 1983
Betty Parsons Gallery

Threnody
January 30 - June 12, 1983
Neuberger Museum
State University of New York
Purchase, N.Y. 10577

BETTY PARSONS GALLERY
24 WEST 57 STREET NEW YORK N.Y. 10019

Barbara Winkelstein

PORTRAITS AND DRAWINGS

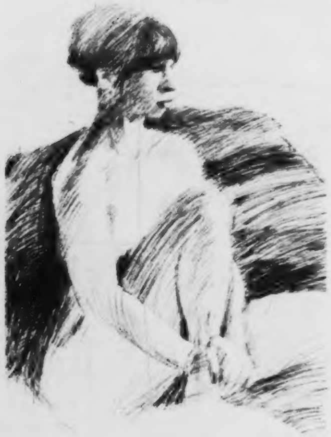
FEBRUARY 3 TO
MARCH 8, 1983



Untitled, 1982 Pencil drawing

ALLPORT ASSOCIATES GALLERY
1000 MAGNOLIA AVENUE, LARKSPUR, CALIFORNIA 94939 415/461-2522

LEONARD SKURO

SCULPTURE

February 22 - March 26

NEIL G. OVSEY GALLERY
705 East Third Street, 3rd Floor
Los Angeles, California 90013
Telephone: 213/617-1351

ROBER RACINE
DICTIONNAIRES A (1980-1982)

LIEUX CITÉS/CITÉS (ANALYSE: BOSSUET, CONDILLAC). INSTALLATION VIEW, DETAIL

FEBRUARY 19-MARCH 19
49TH PARALLEL
CENTRE FOR CONTEMPORARY CANADIAN ART
49E PARALLÈLE
CENTRE D'ART CONTEMPORAIN CANADIEN
420 WEST BROADWAY NEW YORK 925-8349

CLAY AND PAPER WORKS:
MARGIE HUGHTO

PAINTINGS:
Alternative Approaches to the Landscape
JENNIFER BARTLETT
ROGER BROWN
DAVID DEUTSCH
WOLF KAHN
SYLVIA PLIMACK MANGOLD
ELLEN PHELAN
ELIZABETH ROSENBLUM
ALAN TURNER

Thomas Segal Gallery
73 Newbury Street
Boston, MA 02116
Tel (617) 266-3500
Tues-Sat, 10 to 5:30 or by appt

SERGI AGUILAR
ALEXANCO
ARRANZ BRAVO
BARTOLOZZI
JUAN BORDES
CARMEN CALVO
JOAN CARDELLS
CHEMA COBO
TERESA GANCEDO
GORDILLO
NINO LONGOBARDI
MUNTADAS
MIQUEL NAVARRO
TEIXIDOR
ZUSH

GALERIA FERNANDO VIJANDE
Nunez de Balboa, 65 Tel. 435 80 25
Madrid, 1

ROBERT
MOTHERWELL

PRINTS

FEBRUARY-MARCH

IVORY/KIMPTON GALLERY
55 GRANT · SAN FRANCISCO
415/956·6661

VOL
71
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

GALERIA JOAN PRATS
29 W. 57th. Street - NEW YORK N.Y. 10019
T. 486 67 70

January-February
HANS HARTUNG oils on cardboard

February-March
Joan Hernández Pijuán paintings and watercolours

ARCO '83
MADRID
February 18-25
JOSEP GUINOVART
one man show

GALERIA JOAN PRATS
Rambla Cataluña, 54 - Barcelona-7 (Spain) - T. 2160284

January-February
SINA MIRALLES objects in space

March
CHRISTO
Surrounded Islands
Project for Biscayne Bay

REPRESENTING
BEN BENN
The Artist's Own Collection
Catalogue Available $8.00

BRANCHVILLE SOHO GALLERY
Ridgefield, CT 06829
203-762-3145 or 544-8636 Tues.-Sat. 1-4 p.m.

LARRY FINK

REPRESENTED BY
NICHOLAS F. RIZZO FINE ARTS
Contemporary, 19th & 20th Century
Art and Photography
by appointment
18 Strong Place Brooklyn, New York 11231 (212) 852-7995

Chicago International Art 1983 Exposition

May 19-24, 1983
Navy Pier, Chicago USA

2RC Showroom/Rome • 369 Gallery/Edinburgh • Alice Adam Ltd./Chicago • Pam Adler Gallery/New York • Agenzia d' Arte Moderna/Rome • Brooke Alexander Inc./New York • Gallery Paule Anglim/San Francisco • Gallery Yves Arman/New York • Barbara Balkin Gallery/Chicago • Jacques Baruch Gallery/Chicago • John Berggruen Gallery/San Francisco • Galerie Claude Bernard/Paris • Karen & Jean Bernier/Athens • Roy Boyd Gallery/Chicago Braunstein/Quay Gallery/San Francisco • Timothy Burns Gallery/St. Louis • Leo Castelli Gallery/New York Leo Castelli Graphics/New York • Jan Cicero Gallery/Chicago • Cirrus Gallery/Los Angeles • ConStruct/Chicago Paula Cooper Gallery/New York • James Corcoran Gallery/Los Angeles • Charles Cowles Gallery/New York Crown Point Press/Oakland, CA • Dart Gallery/Chicago • Maxwell Davidson Gallery/New York • Delahunty Gallery/Dallas • Marisa del Re Gallery/New York • Marianne Deson Gallery/Chicago • Terry Dintenfass Gallery/New York Dobrick Gallery/Chicago • Linda Durham Gallery/Santa Fe • Andre Emmerich Gallery/New York • Exhibit A/Chicago Fairweather Hardin/Chicago • Linda Farris Gallery/Seattle • Feigenson Gallery/Detroit • Fendrick Gallery/Washington DC • Erick Franck/Carouge, Switzerland • Robert Freidus Gallery/New York • Allan Frumkin Gallery/New York Allan Frumkin Photographs/Chicago • Frumkin & Struve Gallery/Chicago • Fuller/Goldeen Gallery/San Francisco Gemini GEL/Los Angeles • Getler/Pall/New York • Gimpel & Weitzenhoffer Gallery/New York • Barbara Gladstone Gallery/New York • Goldman's Art Gallery/Haifa, Israel • James Goodman Gallery/New York • Richard Gray Gallery/Chicago • Greenberg Gallery/St. Louis • Patricia Heesy Gallery/New York • Nancy Hoffman Gallery/New York Jacobson/Hochman Gallery/New York • Hokin/Kaufman Gallery/Chicago • Vivian Horan/New York • Max Hutchinson Gallery/New York • Ivory/Kimpton Gallery/San Francisco • Sidney Janis Gallery/New York • Janus Gallery/Los Angeles • R.S. Johnson International/Chicago • Annely Juda Fine Art/London • Douglas Kenyon Inc./Chicago Galerie Rudolf Kicken/Cologne • Phyllis Kind Gallery/Chicago • Klein Gallery/Chicago • Monique Knowlton Gallery/New York • Galerie Sabine Knust/Munich • B.R. Kornblatt Gallery/Washington DC • Lakeside Studio/Lakeside, MI Lahumiere/Paris • Galerie Linssen/Bonn • R.M. Light & Co./Santa Barbara, CA • Galerie Maeght/New York • Kathryn Markel Fine Arts/New York • Barbara Mathes Gallery/New York • Galerie Denise Rene Hans Mayer/Düsseldorf Modern Art Galerie/Vienna • Moody Gallery/Houston • Donald F. Morris Gallery/Birmingham, MI • Multiples/Marian Goodman Gallery/New York • Pace Editions/New York • Galerie Alice Pauli/Lausanne, Switzerland • Judith L. Posner & Assoc. Inc./Milwaukee • Galeria Joan Prats/Barcelona • Galerie Redies/Herrischried, West Germany • Betsy Rosenfield Gallery/Chicago • Dorothy Rosenthal Gallery/Chicago • Schellmann + Kluser/Munich • Robert Schoelkopf Gallery/New York • Thomas Segal Gallery/Boston • Semaphore Gallery/New York • Galerie Seroussi/Paris • Siegel Contemporary Art/New York • Galerie Skulima/Berlin • Carl Solway Gallery/Cincinnati • Samuel Stein Fine Arts, Ltd./Chicago • John C. Stoller & Co./Minneapolis • Tamarind Institute/Albuquerque • Tasende Gallery/La Jolla, CA • Carol Taylor Art/Dallas • Barbara Toll Fine Arts/New York • Tortue Gallery/Santa Monica, CA Tyler Graphics Ltd./Bedford, NY • van Straaten Gallery/Chicago • Daniel Varenne/Geneva • Vermillion Editions Ltd./Minneapolis • Galeria Fernando Vijande/Madrid • Waddington Graphics/London • Galerie Watari/Tokyo John Weber Gallery/New York • Stephen Wirtz Gallery/San Francisco • Young/Hoffman Gallery/Chicago • Sonia Zaks Gallery/Chicago • Galerie Renee Ziegler/Zurich • Zolla/Lieberman Gallery/Chicago

For further information:
Chicago International Art Exposition CIAE
600 North McClurg Court
Chicago, Illinois 60611 USA
Telephone 312.787.6858

A Project of the Lakeside Group

VOL 71
ISS 2
FE 1983
UMI

HENRY MOORE

"INTERNAL AND EXTERNAL FORMS" 1951, BRONZE, EDITION OF 7, HEIGHT 8¼ inches

DOMINION GALLERY
1438 Sherbrooke St. West, Montreal H3G 1K4
514-845-7471 and 7833

---

representing

LARRY BELL

January
LESLIE KUTER

February
BROR UTTER

March
CHARLES WILLIAMS

April
SAM GILLIAM

May
HAROLD JOE WALDRUM

June
ARTHUR FRANCE

FORT WORTH GALLERY
901 Boland • Fort Worth, Texas 76107 • 817/332-5603

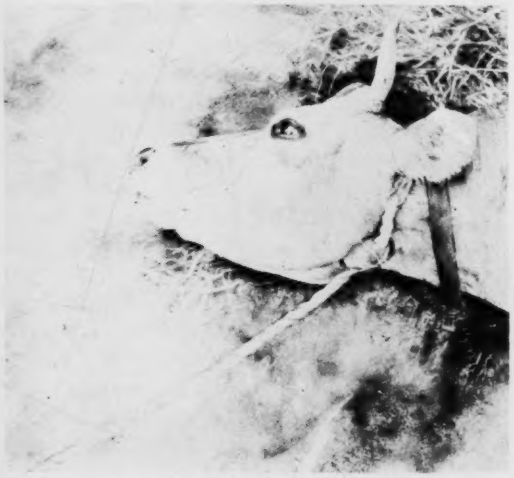
GER VAN ELK

10 February-5 March

MARIAN GOODMAN GALLERY
24 WEST 57TH STREET NEW YORK NY 10019 (212) 977-7160

ROBERT FERRIS

Paintings on Paper
February 5 - 26



"Dead Cow", 1980, painting on paper, 28" x 30"

Catalogue available

IMPRESSIONS GALLERY
275 Dartmouth Street, Boston MA 02116 (617) 262-0783
In New York, by appointment (212) 410-9179

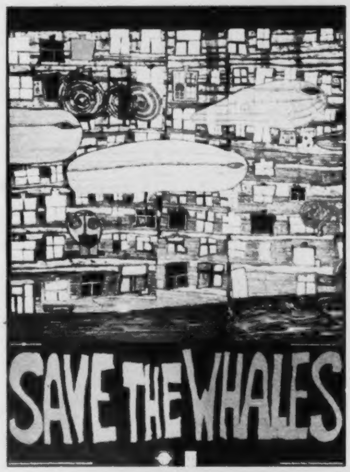
STANLEY BOXER
JACK BUSH
HELEN FRANKENTHALER
SAM FRANCIS
ROBERT GOODNOUGH
AL HELD
HANS HOFMANN
MORRIS LOUIS
KENNETH NOLAND
JULES OLITSKI

SELECTED PAINTINGS
FEBRUARY 20-MARCH 16

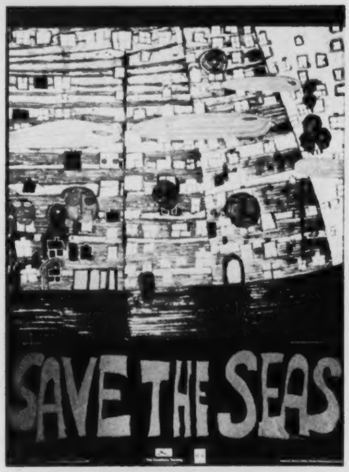
YARES GALLERY

3625 BISHOP LANE SCOTTSDALE, AZ 85251 (602) 947-3251

HUNDERTWASSER



Hundertwasser has dedicated his brilliant new posters to GREENPEACE PACIFIC SOUTHWEST (left) and THE COUSTEAU SOCIETY (right). These two special edition posters with silver and gold metallic imprints are offered as a pair creating a double sheet measuring 33.5 x 47 ins. $100.00 plus $5.00 shipping. California residents add 6% sales tax. (San Francisco residents add 6.5%.) Published by Harcourts Gallery. Dealer inquiries invited.



HARCOURTS GALLERY
535 Powell Street. San Francisco.CA 94108.(415) 421-3428

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

FEBRUARY 1 - 26, 1983

de KOONING & GORKY

A SELECTION OF DRAWINGS AND PAINTINGS

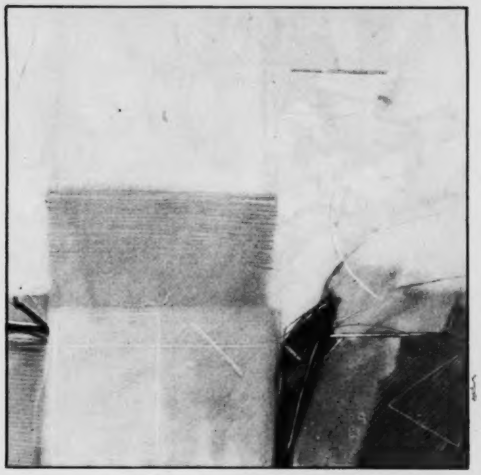
JEREMY STONE GALLERY
126 POST SAN FRANCISCO CA 94108 415/398 6535

MARYROSE CARROLL
DAVID MIDDLEBROOK
JOSEPH ZIRKER
February 18-March 18

KLEIN GALLERY
356 WEST HURON, CHICAGO, IL 60610
312/787-0400

Helen Bershad



"Briboci Gold" 1982, acrylic on canvas 46 x 47"

February

HABER THEODORE GALLERY
29 West 57th Street, New York 10019 (212) 752-3338

RICCO · JOHNSON GALLERY
SOHO · 475 BROOME ST
NEW · YORK
212 · 966 · 0541

Exceptional American Folk Art
February New Acquisitions

CHARLES ARNOLDI • FEBRUARY 1983 • TEXAS GALLERY
2012 PEDEN HOUSTON TEXAS 77019 713/524 1593

Akio Takamori, Untitled 1982 stoneware

Akio Takamori
The Archie Bray Series

Beatrice Wood
New Luster Work

February 12 - March 5, 1983

GARTH CLARK GALLERY
5820 Wilshire Blvd Los Angeles 90036
(213) 939 2189

VOL
7
1
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

TONY NAPONIC
NEW PAINTINGS & DRAWINGS

FEBRUARY 18 TO MARCH 22
ZOLLA / LIEBERMAN GALLERY
356 W. Huron Chicago 60610 312/944-1990
Gallery Hours Tuesday through Saturday 11:00 to 5:30

DAVID SIMONS
CERAMIC SCULPTURE

SAM GUMMELT
February 8 - March 4, 1983

CAROL TAYLOR, Art
2508 cedar springs dallas, texas 75201 (214) 745-1923

RICHEBOURG/McCOY
4 East 89 Street New York 10028
212/410.5588

Major Works by CORNELL
DALI
DE KOONING
FRANCIS
KRASNER
OLDENBURG
RIVERS

By appointment
Elizabeth Richebourg · Jason McCoy

Sarah Canright
January 29 - February 23

Pam Adler Gallery
37 West 57 New York 10019 212/980.9696

GARY LANG

Kirk deGooyer Gallery

1308 Factory Place Los Angeles 90013
Tuesday-Saturday 10:30-5:30 213-623-8333

FRANKENTHALER, "SCENE, PROVINCETOWN," 1961
oil on canvas, 25" x 30"

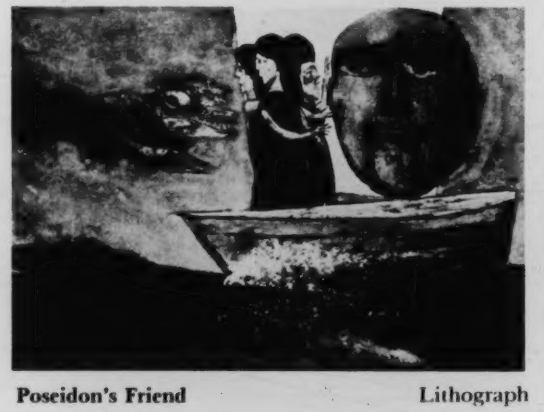
Other major works also available by Cornell, DeKooning, Lichtenstein, Louis, Oldenburg, Rauschenberg, Rosenquist, Twombly, Warhol and others.

MARVIN ROSS FRIEDMAN & CO.

15451 SOUTHWEST 67 COURT
MIAMI, FLORIDA 33157
BY APPOINTMENT ONLY
PHONE (305) 233-4281

Federico Castellon, 1914-1971
American Surrealist
Prints & Drawings

February 1 — March 31



Poseidon's Friend Lithograph

Anderson & Anderson
Master Prints & Drawings
Red House Gallery & Art Bookstore
525 N. Garfield Avenue, Loveland, Colorado 80537
303-669-2122

Catalogues Available

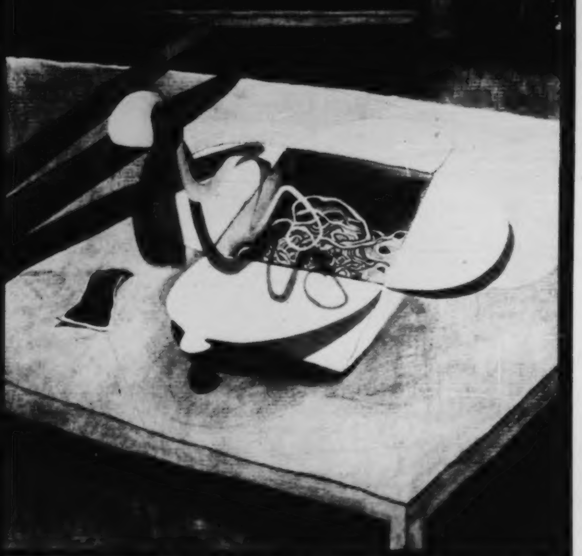
GREGORY GILLESPIE

FEBRUARY

JOHN BERGGRUEN GALLERY
228 GRANT AVENUE
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA 94108
(415) 781-4629

VOL
7
1
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

MASTERWORKS IN CONTEMPORARY ART
REPRESENTING MAVIS SMITH | GEORGE NOBL | SANDRA JACKMAN



"CHINESE TAKE-OUT" BY MAVIS SMITH
PASTEL ON BOARD 48" x 48" x 10"

Reynold C. Kerr
16 EAST 82ND STREET, NEW YORK, N.Y. 10028
10:30-6 PM TUES-SAT (212) 737-7299

AKAN SEATED REGAL FIGURE CIRCA 1900
WOOD, DARK BROWN AND BLACK PATINA HEIGHT 10¼

MASTERPIECES OF ANCIENT PRIMITIVE ART EXHIBITION 6 JAN TO 15 FEB
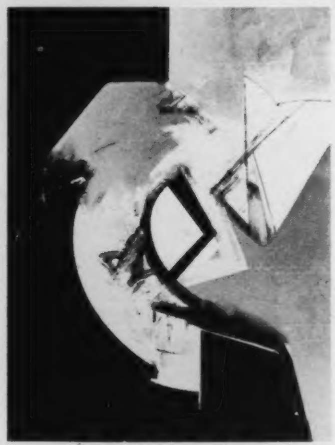
"REGAL AFRICA"



From the "Apex" Series 1982 Oil on canvas

Jay DeFeo
9 February - 12 March 1983

Gallery Paule Anglim
14 Geary Street San Francisco 94108 Tel. [415] 433-2710

MARCH 12—APRIL 9
CARL FREDRIK
REUTERSWARD

APRIL 16—MAY 21
DAVID LIGARE

Koplin Gallery
8225½ Santa Monica Boulevard • Los Angeles, CA 90046 • 213/656-3378

Fashion
The Corset Years

BY JEFF WEINSTEIN

Turn-of-the-century sports clothes, including motoring dusters, polo coats, bicycle suits and hunting capes. Photo Robert E. Mates.

Clothes do not fit easily into museums of art. Curatorial strategies range from the "anthropological," treating clothing as behavioral artifacts, the grass skirts of particular times and locations, to the formalist, where color and texture of fabric, construction, and shape alone determine a garment's inclusion. The anthropological show has had an easier time, for clothing exhibited this way does not seek validation as art. It needs only identification and restoration; it requires no exact provenance and is not expected to be anything but typical. Strictly formalist shows are rare and have so far depended upon the unformalist crutch of being able to identify the couturier—the artist. A recent exhibition at the Brooklyn Museum of evening gowns by Charles James mounted his works without context, on neutral mannequins, as "soft" sculpture. Labels identified only the title, the medium, and the date, qualified in a few cases with names of the heiresses or movie stars who sponsored the artist and wore this or that one-of-a-kind design.

> Emphasizing high fashion and conspicuous consumption, the Met's "La Belle Epoque" is an ahistorical survey of lavish costumes worn by pre-World War I aristocrats.

"La Belle Epoque," Diana Vreeland's eleventh annual exhibition for the Metropolitan Museum's Costume Institute, is anything, everything, but formalist. Her major criterion for selection of more than 150 costumes seems to be the best available of what was typically worn by the upper classes in France, England and the United States from 1890 to 1914. The result, however, is typical only by definition; "best" becomes meaningless when curatorial purpose is impossible to determine, as it is here.

The Metropolitan is no stranger to theater. As we approach the Costume Institute's threshhold, we hear strains of music by Lehar, Massenet, and what children know as "Ta Ra Ra Boom Tee-Ay." We note the evocative fragrance of Guerlain's l'Heure Bleue sprayed through the galleries, as we view the first set of afternoon suits, evening dresses, and a few examples of male formal wear. These are modeled on mannequins set in front of wine-red wall covering, carved wood paneling and stained glass constructed to recreate fin de siècle decor at Maxim's. We therefore assume that the clothing exhibited was appropriate for such a restaurant.

The viewer may recognize Maxim's as the source of the background, but there is no identification as such. Lighting is dim, as it is throughout the show, to protect colors from fading and fabric from heat. However, accessories behind glass in another room, articles just as subject to damage, are more conveniently lit. We conclude that drama determines at least some of the gloom.

The Maxim's rooms flank a hall exhibiting sports clothes on one side (Newport-like backdrop) and summer day dresses of white lawn, Irish lace and broderie anglaise (rose-garden backdrop) on the other. These lead to two "ceremonial" rooms, one hung in Costumes of evening and daytime flâneurs, ca. 1912–14, with Henri Gervex's Le Pré Catelan, 1909. Photo Robert E. Mates.

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

Edwardian style with green flocked paper, and the other with hand-painted deep-hued floral. These galleries are ceremonial because they hold ball gowns and court dresses worn by royalty or famous personages—Eleanora Duse, diva Lina Cavaliere. A last room moves from the 19th century to the 20th with great speed. All galleries save the hall are hung with art from the time, and in some cases with art beyond it. Kees van Dongen's Fauvist Woman Before a Mirror, 1920, oddly displaces the relatively muted smoking costume and evening gown, 1910 and 1912, displayed in front.

The starting date for Vreeland's Belle Epoque was arbitrarily chosen, though everyone agrees that the 1914 shot in Sarajevo marks the close of the period. Within this range, both small and major changes took place in Western fashion, and in clothing in general. The Parisian couturier system of commercial dress design and manufacture grew to become fashion's generative institution, with houses such as Worth, Doucet, Redfern, Paquin, Callot Soeurs and Premet moving from the 19th century to the 20th. Examples from most important houses are represented in the exhibition. In small variations of fashion, sleeves ballooned and deflated again, skirts thinned then flared, and dresses could be identified by year and season, then as now. But couturier Paul Poiret's innovations using Bakst-color, unboned shape, integral ornament, and skin-show, though not all immediately accepted, abruptly changed the direction of la mode. Through Poiret, in the first decade of the new century, fashion became modern.

The bicycle, the automobile, the mid-century influence of Amelia Bloomer and later influence of feminist anticorseters demanded sports clothes for women as well as for men. Some bicycling and motoring garments were as impractical as the day wear they were supposed to replace and served only to signify a new mode of leisure. However, cycling trousers and shirtwaists were important progenitors of the practical everyday wear designed during and after World War I.

Yet the greatest change of dress during La Belle Epoque has not to do with couturier fashion or sports wear but with the mass production and distribution, through flourishing factories, department stores, and mail-order houses, of a cornucopia of styles to the growing middle class. Couturier fashion may have "trickled down," but it trickled in enormous rivers of ready-to-wear.

Most of these milestones are conflated or ignored by Vreeland's show, which defines La Belle Epoque through the creation of an undifferentiated atmosphere of conspicuous consumption. The attempt to meld pre- and post-Poiret design is the show's major thematic flaw. Popular clothing is excluded, which is to be expected, but even a maid's costume would be welcome among so many silk redingotes and so much Valenciennes lace (there is, though, a palace servant in livery standing next to a Tussaud-like Queen Victoria in black). Costumes five, ten, even 15 years apart stand side by side, held together by perfume and loud, repeating waltzes. Small changes in fashion become impossible to discern, and larger changes are noted only by their hopeful self-evidence. Viewers must organize their own show.

Louis Sabattier's The Stands at Longchamps, in The New York Herald, June 26, 1910.

George S. Clairin: Portrait of Sarah Bernhardt, 1876, oil on canvas.

Paul Nadar's photograph of Le Comtesse Hélène Greffulhe, 1896.

This is possible, because individual examples are splendid. A 1905 automobile duster (male) in gray mohair trimmed with celluloid buttons; a 1909 Brooks Brothers polo coat of white wool in beautiful condition; and an 1889 black wool wedding suit, badly wrinkled, indicated perfectly how slowly male styles change. Pre-Poiret horror of undecorated surface ranged far; Emile Pingat's 1891 evening wrap of cream wool broadcloth trimmed with matching chenille stands out among its peers because of an American Indian motif appliqué in blue, purple and gold, with turquoise-colored stones. Queen Alexandra wore a small black-velvet pillbox hat (1905) on which she anchored 15 circular glass frames containing photographs of the royal family. This anthropological object successfully embodies ritual and sentiment. Queen Alexandra also possessed a train, properly exhibited in the ceremonial room, embroidered by the wives of all the ruling princes of India. In the semiology of royal fashion, wives are to husbands as Indian princes are to their emperor-king. A Mucha-purple beaded theatrical costume from 1894, thought to be worn by Sarah Bernhardt in Gismonda, is supposed to look exaggerated and foreign; compared with much of the royal finery in the ceremonial room it is neither. A women's shoe truck that neatly holds in line more than a dozen tiny pairs could easily have served as Thorstein Veblen's muse.

Neither a checklist nor catalogue was available or is planned, which undercuts further the show's achievements and turns curatorial results into ephemera. In an "exhibition booklet" called La Belle Epoque on sale at the museum bookstores, we learn from Vreeland that the era contained "highlife, lowlife, life, life—grandeur and poetry—and a real sense of fun." A hiccuping and gossipy essay by the late Philippe Jullian, full of wit and proper names—and previously published—fleshes out this opinion. According to him, "A stylish aristocracy at least helped to make the world a little more amusing and much less ugly." The reader may remember, however, that the same fashionable aristocracy has been blamed for causing at least some of the ugliness it is supposed to have assuaged. □

"La Belle Epoque" will be on view at the Metropolitan Museum until Sept. 4, '83. Accompanying the exhibition is a booklet with text by Philippe Jullian.

Author: Jeff Weinstein is a fiction writer, a free-lance critic and a regular contributor to the Village Voice.

Clothes for an evening at Maxim's, ca. 1914; gowns by Worth, Jeanne Hallée and Weeks. Photo Robert E. Mates.

French and English evening clothes, ca. 1890–1905; paintings by Clairin and Madrazo y Garreta.

Evening and fancy-dress costumes by Poiret and Jeanne Hallée, ca. 1912. Photo Robert E. Mates.

VOL
7
1
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

Arco
CONTEMPORARY ART - INTERNATIONAL FAIR OF MADRID
EXHIBITION HALL PASEO DE LA CASTELLANA 257 MADRID 16 SPAIN TELEPHONE 470 10 14 AND 479 78 06 TELEX 44025 IFEMA E 83
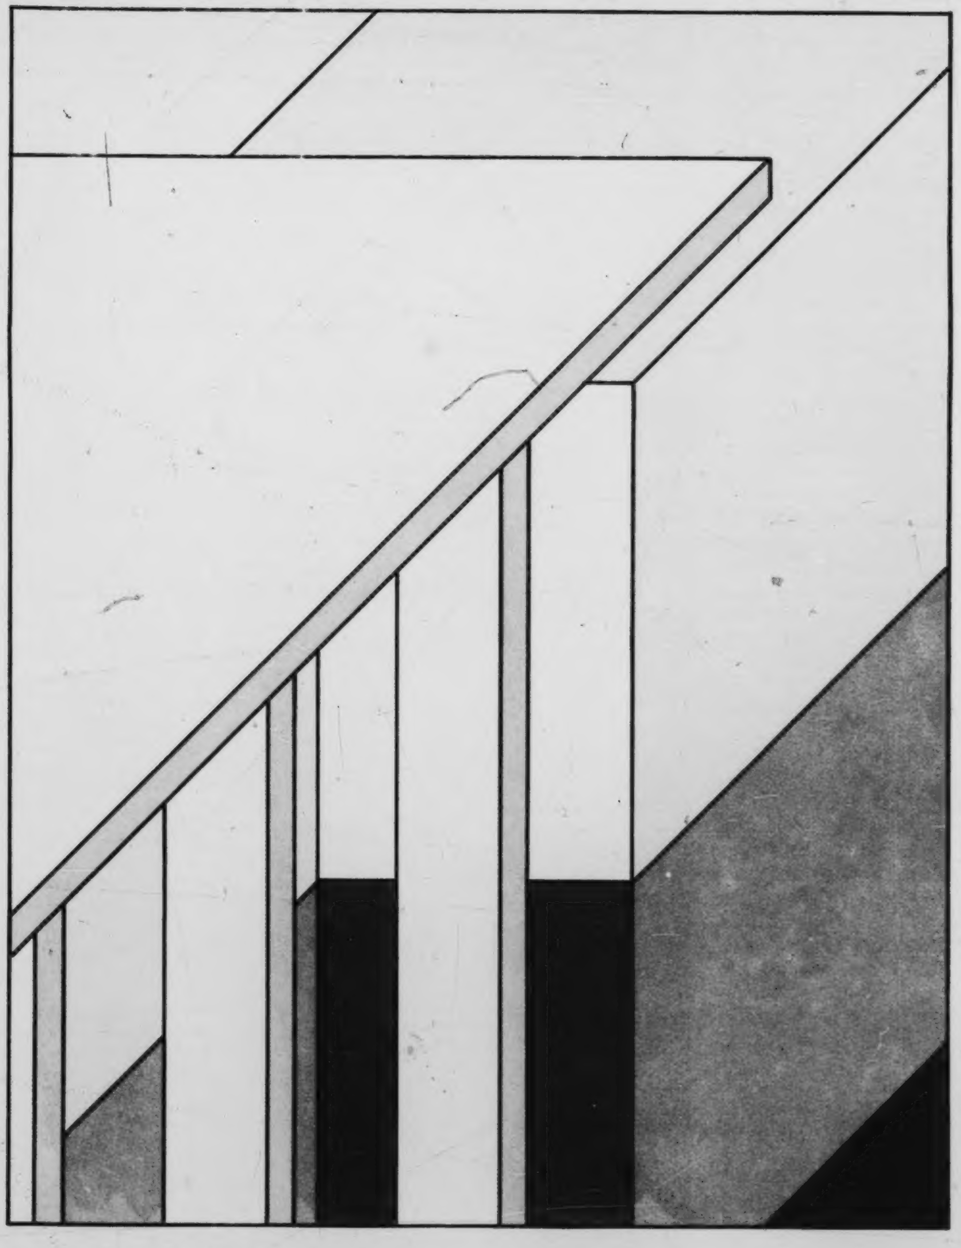
18-25 FEB.



PASQUALE
IANNETTI
ART GALLERIES

Dürer
Rembrandt
Hogarth
Goya
Manet
Renoir
Helleu
Lautrec
Gauguin
Picasso

Miro
Chagall
Braque
Leger
Magritte
Amaya (sculpture)
Calder
Folon
Cassatt
Vasarely

Above: Toulouse-Lautrec, Le Divan Japonaise, c. 1893, original lithograph in color, Catalog ref. A.11.

575 Sutter Street, San Francisco, CA 94102

Telephone (415) 433-2771

SAMUEL BURI
paintings and watercolors
February

FERNANDO BOTERO paintings and watercolors
March - April

Galerie Beyeler
Baumleingasse 9
CH-4001 Basel
23 54 12

Brentwood Gallery

The Pacific Northwest Today	January
Tom Rippon	February
Leon Anderson	March
The Southwest Now	April

1221 South Brentwood Boulevard
Saint Louis, Missouri 63117
(314) 863-0808

STEPHEN PENTAK
new work

JIM
DE FRANCE
BUDD
HOPKINS
MARTIN
HURTIG
JAMES JUSZCZYK group show paintings

JANUARY 14 - FEBRUARY 20 1983

JAN
CICERO
GALLERY
437 N CLARK CHICAGO, IL 60610 312 644 5374

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

PHOTOGRAPHS

GER VAN ELK
BARBARA KRUGER
CINDY SHERMAN
WILLIAM WEGMAN

YOUNG HOFFMAN GALLERY
215 WEST SUPERIOR
CHICAGO 60610
TEL 312.951.8828

JOHN HEJDUK

SOLOPACAN VARIATIONS

Architecture, drawing and models February 10 - March 5

Max Protetch
37 West 57 Street New York

FRANK MARINO GALLERY
489 BROOME STREET NEW YORK 10013 212 431-7888

Gary Bandy

Important Contemporary Ceramic Art

Exhibit A

233 E. Ontario Street Chicago, Illinois 60611
312-944-1748

Fashion
Du Barry Was a Feminist

BY ROBERT FISHER

Last season's "18th-Century Woman" at the Met and Turbeville's book 'Unseen Versailles' illuminated the power—and pathology—of fashion.

Fashions change by the month, by the week, and—for those specially attuned—by the hour. But, within an era, they revolt only once. One came to this conclusion while gazing at the lapidescently beautiful costumes on view in "The Eighteenth-Century Woman," the Met's last Costume Institute exhibition, for one realized this beauty would not, indeed, last. In 1787, the children of France for the most part looked like Louis Le Nain's 1640 dead end kids, and because their "look"—that of Cold and Hunger—had not changed, the Revolution occurred. With it, women were shunted offstage: Like so many phalli, the upraised arms of David's Oath of the Horatii announced the masculinization of Western culture. Since then and nearly into our own times, the concept of the feminine has been trivialized into a vision of the "fair sex," a thing of pink feathers and silk roses. As we shall see, however, any such vision of female frailty immediately becomes the occasion for ambiguities as convoluted as the rose blossom that is its attribute.

Many of the most famous 18th-century women present us with an elegant but puzzling diptych of transposable mirror images: fashion plates (who could talk Spinoza and run countries) are confronted with femmes fortes (who are also ultra-feminine). It is those qualifying parentheses that are so tricky. In the Costume Institute show, one saw example after example of haute mode spotlit in rooms painted in fainting Redoutesque pastels, and one realized that they showed the 18th-century woman the way she was—or rather, the way she was not at all. In her usual mode of l'air-du-temps saturation, not explication, Diana Vreeland, the show's organizer, certainly showed us enough: appearance, however, isn't everything.

To regard 18th-century fashion as "Fashion"—that adorable silly thing that ever since the Revolution we have found important precisely because it is silly—is to miss the point. Before the Revolution, fashion was a thing of almost druidical meaning—it was, at least in the proper hands, a direct emblem of power. Both fashionists and feminists, the most renowned 18th-century women—Madame de Pompadour, Madame Necker, Madame du Barry, Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire—used fashion as power; they aimed at a center-stage position by dressing for the part. Compared to Louis XIV with his florid plumed hats and diamonded shoes, the 17th-century woman was a dowdy affair. By trading in Madame de Sevigné's feuille morte colors for the power—yes—of pink, the 18th-century woman became, sartorially, the 17th-century man.

Madame du Barry in Hunting Dress, after portrait by Francois Hubert Drouais, 1769.

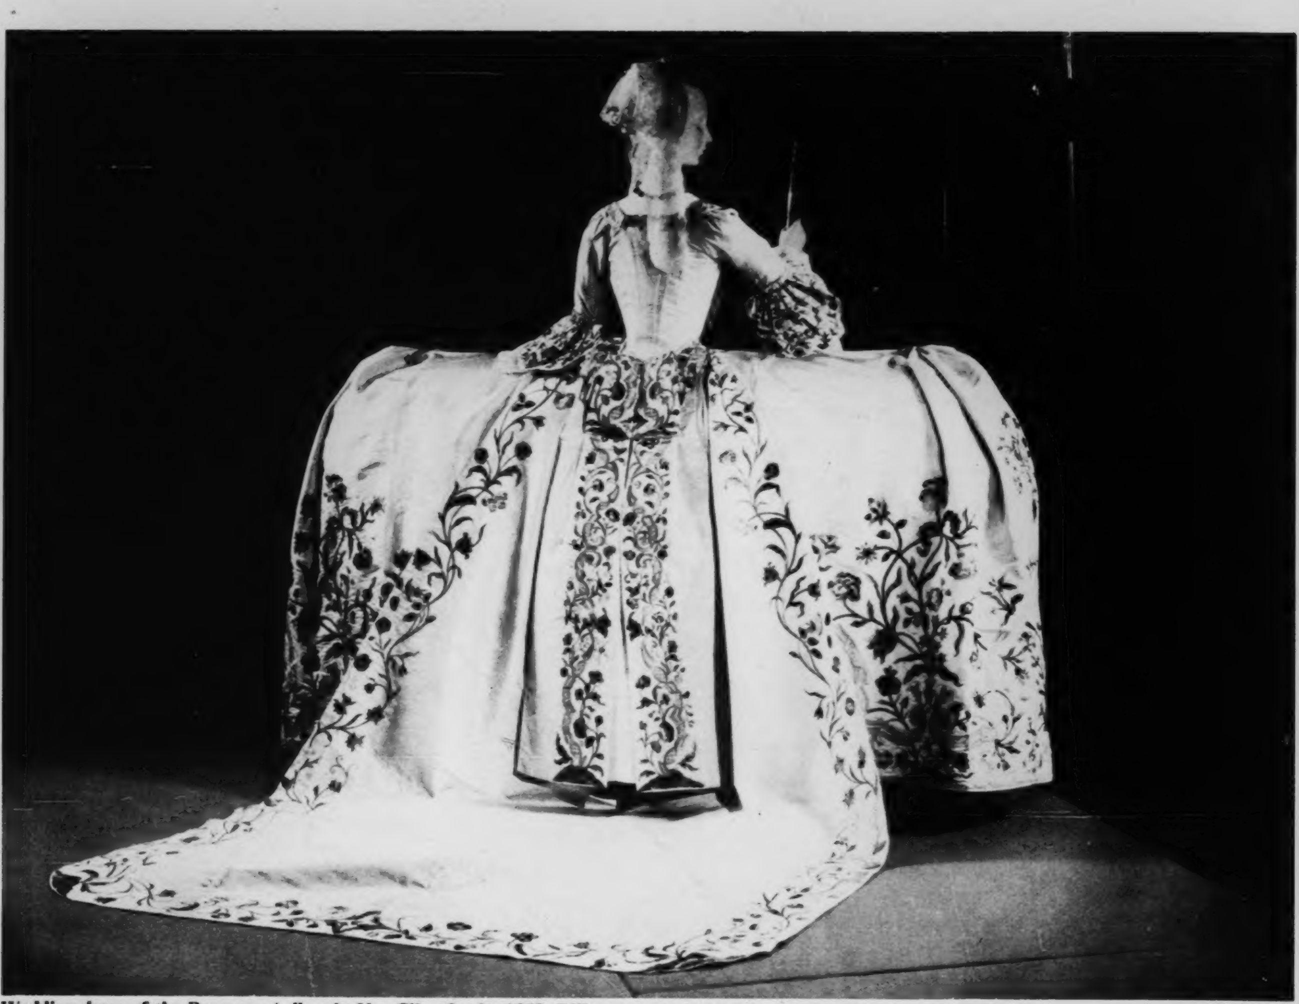
This, if not by the power, then by the psychology of pink. Men of course prefer their women to be stylish and attractive. But if men of the 18th century began to listen to women because of their attractiveness, they continued to listen to them because they were walking volumes—say, Sal-Zen—of Diderot's Encyclopêdie. Salons were run by them, wars declared, generals persuaded to change sides and ministers appointed and dismissed on their advice because they knew things, they were interesting. They influenced the influencers. Or, as Madame de Coicy put it, "if men rule the world, women rule men." In this exhibition, we confronted Powder Power at full force.

By mixing gowns of differing decades, the show not only spared the viewer the tedium of a strictly chronological progression, but revealed that, in fact, there was none. La Ligne—the cut or silhouette—barely changed; in an absolutist age, it was absolute, decreed. (There were differing cuts in dresses but, interestingly, they were referred to—in a sort of sartorial xenophilia—by way of their national origins: à la polonaise, à la piedmontaise, à l'anglaise.) Indeed, it is possible to speak of a Versailles Uniform: a dress consisting of a bodice filled in by a stomacher shaped like a shield, on top of a voluminous skirt, which distended sideways in panniers—basket-like constructions of whalebone. Today all is tailleur, cut square: then, everything was cut round. However, as with all shaped fashions, divorce an 18th-century gown from its cut and you don't have its "look," one which Women's Wear Daily would have undoubtedly called "The Heap."

What we call the garment center would have then been called the garniture center. Fashion was virtually dependent on, as the Goncourts put it, "the disposition of diamonds, the placing of jewels and the suspending of feathers." Individuality originated in the detail—those special just-for-you tricks of dressmakers. If, as they called it then, le détail terrible—the aigrettes, garlands, ruchings, bandeaux, ribands and, always, diamonds (lots)—was agony to arrange, it also permitted women to create an individual silhouette within the larger decreed one. These were Dresses To Do Things To, though unfortunately, most of the things done to them were not explained in the labels of the exhibition—much to the frustration of many viewers.

To our age of rational dress, all this runaway luxury is de trop. Too-muchness here, however, tells the tale of sartorial insubordination, a surmounting of the limits on ornament once prescribed by 17th-century sumptuary laws, which correlated the amount of ornament one could wear with how much money one earned. By the 18th century, the haute bourgeoisie, rushing to attain nobility by marriage or office, spent fortunes adorning itself in the hope of alchemizing bourgeois baseness. Fashion is always the great equalizer. No one knew this better than Madame de Pompadour, who started life as simple Jeanne Antoinette Poisson—indeed, a Pompadour only comes about when a women must wear a cloth coat as if it were one of mink. Fashion became the conspicuous display of un luxe insolent, a luxury for which, as Fénelon said, no amount of wealth could suffice. A dress of seamless silver fabric so costly it was turned down by the Queen of France was bought by an ambitious minor vicomtesse who, thus, squandered her family's entire fortune.

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI



Wedding dress of the Baroness Aelbrecht Von Slingelandt, 1759. Rijksmuseum, Amsterdam.

Keeping Up with the Pompadours was an activity, in fact, that bankrupted many noble houses.

Unfortunately, the dresses on view at the Met did not represent the pinnacles of the period's extravagance. While the simpler Early Afternoon Look at Versailles was nicely shown, the exhibition's idea of Versailles soir was a bit bon marché. Except for one or two examples—including an extraordinary gown of taffeta embroidered with leopard spots—Du Barry and Marie Antoinette would have considered the Met's ballgowns throwaway clothes, to be worn only by the court rabble. Taffeta was all things to all women—unfortunately, all could afford it. Gowns—when cloth of gold or silver scarcely sufficed—had to make an effect, so to speak, from an opera box. All these luxury-gone-mad gowns were, no doubt, sent back to the foundry by the mob and so were not in the show.

One could get an idea, at least, of one of those great span-the-aisle panniers à coudes (literally, skirts so wide and high they were elbow-rests) from the show's single knockout, the wedding dress (1759) of the Baroness Aelbrecht Von Slingelandt. Such a gown required its wearer to sit apart and rewarded her efforts to become ambulatory, perched on heels of no less than six inches, with the status symbol of falling over. These dresses were attempted architecture: to wear one was to become a monument. The veritable cathedrals of fashion, they succeeded in reliquarizing their occupants.

By concentrating, however, on the few supremely accomplished women of the 18th century—as Olivier Bernier did in a companion volume to the show—one denies their exceptionality. It is unfair to ask Madame de Pompadour to continue to shoulder the entire burden for all her 18th-century sisters. The women of Bernier's cast—Madame des Ursins, Madame du Deffand, Madame Vigée Le Brun, among others—possessed an extraordinariness which belongs to a woman indigenous to every age: the free spirit. It is time to dé-pompadouriser the 18th century. We should become acquainted with that less unique creature, Miss Average Vicomtesse, born solely to papillonner her way from cradle to grave, evaporating millions in a shower of gowns and jewels. Strangely enough, we can do so in Deborah Turbeville's Unseen Versailles.

Like an iceberg of which nine-tenths lies below the sea, there was a great deal going on behind the "see" of the Cytherean surface provided by the Costume Institute exhibition, and in Turbeville's recent photo essay on the "backstairs" Versailles, we can go behind the "seen." As if the 18th-century woman had been brought blinkingly into our own angst-ridden age, Turbeville's models appear in the photographer's signature, eyed-but-sightless, emotionally anorexic stance, posed in those atypical parts of Versailles—the intimate bedrooms, rear storerooms and petits appartements—looking for all the world as if they had just read Fear, War and the Bomb.

Had Boucher been familiar with Freud, and had he been a daguerreotypist to boot, he might have taken better images. Ostentatiously (and wonderfully) arty as ever, Turbeville chose to rip her sepia-toned prints and scatter them with lint: the effect remains less one of artifactual authenticity than the record of some stoned pillow fight in the apartment of Mme. du Barry. Turbeville's unpeopled shots of the fountains and stables remain merely imitation-Atget. It is only as hypothesis that her book succeeds at all. Her editor's extraordinary idea was to go into the hidden recesses of Versailles—then as now, the Penn Station of châteaux—to show Versailles as a Dalí or Poe would have seen it. To the extent that this aim is realized, or this intention is perceptible, Unseen Versailles may modify the general view of the 18th-century woman as someone always blessed with the good-fairy gifts of beauty, grace and intelligence: Turbeville's view of her turns out to be pathetically different.

Ball gown with leopard-spot meander, France, 1770. Metropolitan Museum. Photo Evelyn Hofer.

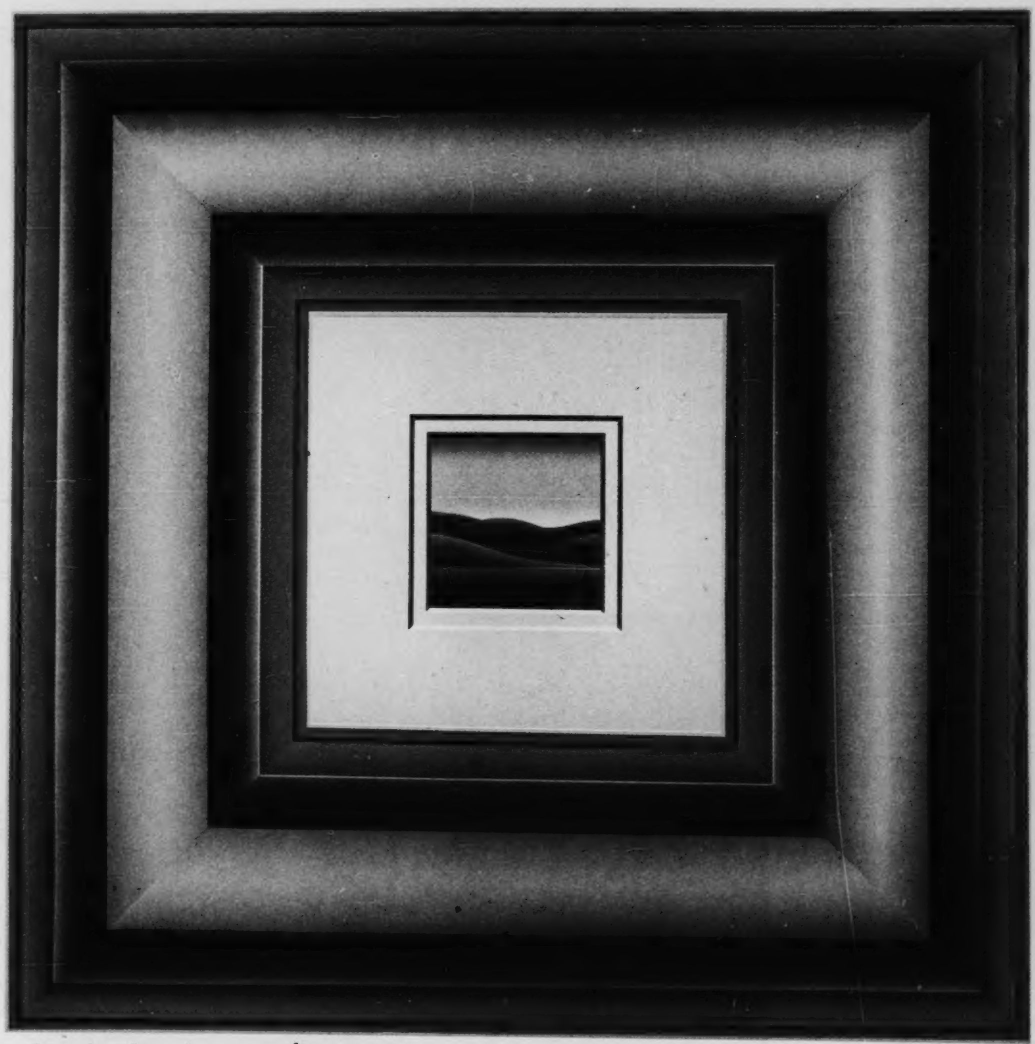
It is to Turbeville's credit that she has attempted to capture what one can only call the hemlines of the soul. Like actors in some 18th-century film—"The Ennui and the Ecstasy"?—Turbeville's models achieve a hybrid between high fashion self-consciousness and somnambular unconsciousness: self-*un*consciousness. They appear lost and bereft. In fact, Versailles did operate in a unique time zone: Versailles Time—that is, anytime. In their gauzes and diamonds, Turbeville's models seem, like their 18th-century counterparts, virtually impaled on luxury. Turbeville's manner of not getting the most from her models, but rather the least, perfectly reflects the feeling of nothingness with which many women—influential or no—were afflicted. Le néant is a word that came to pervade the secret memoirs of many women: Vapors, fainting fits, duchesses getting up 20 times in as many minutes at a salon gathering, became common signs of le maladie de languer. At home, footmen padded boudoir walls with massive silken pillows to prevent the injuries of l'épilepsie passagère. These women had been only taught Versailles, that is, the art of display. They dressed for a living.

Like some sort of sartorial Siamese twin, overpoweringly dazzling gowns required women themselves—for their own self-preservation—to become just as overpoweringly elegant and magnificent: to those who were not "up" to their clothes, a gown of 140 yards of lace became a lace cocoon—or shroud. The sense of desolation at night—when the dress came off and the show closed—with the realization that one had, for all intents and purposes, a career as a Wearer of Clothes could have been shattering. Turbeville captures these women in the morning, looking into mirrors while studying the unbeauty marks that will soon be hidden by silk patches.

The voluminous 18th-century gown was a home: without one, women could feel adrift. If Turbeville has chosen to go behind the "seen," she has also chosen to go behind the seams. Many of her models appear posed in les sous-vêtements, a labyrinthian system of undergarments (to extricate oneself from the countless vertugales, stays, corsets and busks required a skill worthy of a Houdini). Alluring breasts may have been pushed up by the massively encrusted gowns—chaperones of virtue in themselves—but the numerous layers of undergarments were a greater obstacle. In a society as much under glass as Versailles, where all moments of becoming were public ones, sex probably remained the only truly private event. Consequently, the garments of court presentation, as those in the exhibition, do not show the entire picture. Those undergarments of, so to speak, court *de*presentation probably remained even more important to many Doña Juannas. In the exhibition, a series of manikins showing the sequential layers from first busk to last stay would have been enlightening—if a bit frightening.

Nowadays, it is customary to study the past in terms of its angsts, its malaises—in short, its modernism. It may be odd to view fashion as pathological—is satin a contagion, taffeta an influenza? But at court, no one worked, and when one did nothing, how one did nothing became very important: Style, indeed, became maniacal. To get the Sèvres porcelain look, women had themselves bled, then painted their veins with vein-bleu watercolor. Women forwent sleep to preserve six-foot-high hairstyles incorporating such things as blown glass windmills, forest scenes with flocks of porcelain birds with hunters shooting at them, and crystal solar systems—in movement. Fashion became neophilia; the shape of a hairstyle, the color of a trim, the cut of a flounce could last but a day, some only a few hours. It was the snob sadist's heyday. To be seen at the Opera coiffed in the Comet style when for two days now the style had been the Rhinoceros would have met with a cold reaction from les dames de haut-goût; but to see that the dress was by Mercier and not trimmed by Lempereur—brr; and to realize that the diamonds might be of the first water but not set by Bassenge—ice. For those women caught up in this pace, fashion truly professionalized femininity: they worked for their

VOL
7
1
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI



America, America acrylic on canvas
60" square

George Snyder

401 Capitol St., Charleston, WV 25301 (304)345-9059
San Francisco Bay Area
3708 Mt. Diablo Blvd., Suite 210, Lafayette, CA 94549
(415)284-7703

Representation:
Arts Focus, Inc.

Deborah Turbeville: Untitled, from Unseen Versailles, 1981, color photograph.

clothes.

For a few, like La Pompadour, their clothes worked for them. If these women realized that fashion was a device which, in itself, raises women, they, in turn, rose above it—or rather, potentiated themselves through it. Historians of feminism like Leon Abensour have called this theory—succinctly enough—l'argument-beautê. Certainly, some women turned femininity to subversive ends. Soldiers of style, they used beauty as a weapon of guerrilla warfare. Most, however, had no need for manipulation. Man and woman respected each other's intelligence. Louis XV and La Pompadour were like today's professional career-couple: the accomplishments of each augmented the other's. Women came to appoint cabinet ministers and advise war marshals, as Pompadour did, and run the National Treasury, as Du Barry did. Ravot d'Ombreval, the Cardinal of Fleury, became Lieutenant of Police thanks to Madame de Prie; Chauvelin became the same thanks to Madame de Mailly; Machault rose to power via Pompadour, as, through the offices of La Du Barry, did Puissieux, de Saint-Contest, Beruis, Choiseul and the Duc d'Aiguillon. The Counts of Saint-Germain, Seguin de Castries and Lomerie de Brienne were imposed on Louis XVI by Marie Antoinette. These women ruled through the all-important empire of reputation—there was no public opinion then; through innumerable coteries and cabals, 18th-century women raised and destroyed men.

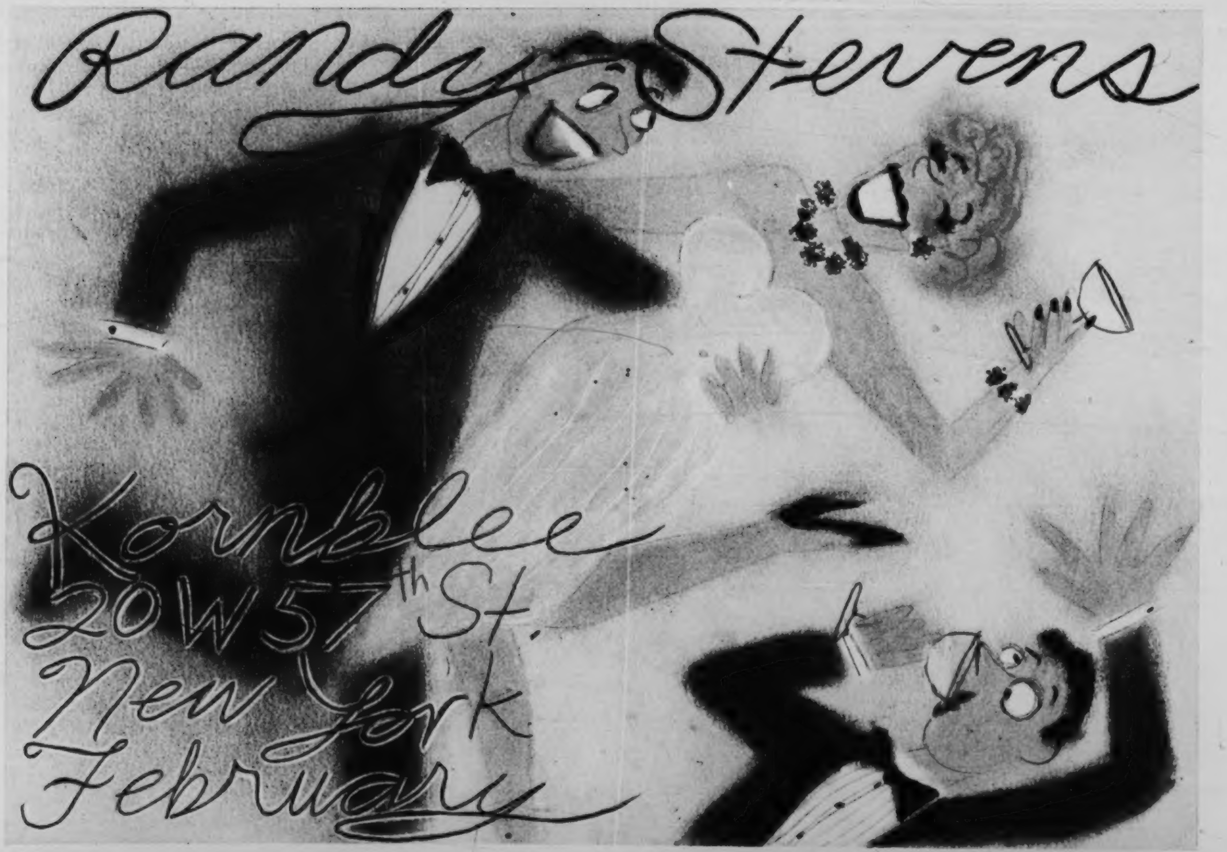
Within the salons, women whittled their tongues: they were witty, and from a present-day feminist perspective, maybe being witty was, for 200 years ago, enough. To these women, it didn't matter if everything you wore was right, if your mind was wrong. The unique image of a fashionplate discussing Torcy's treatise on the Tracts of Utrecht—it's your intellect showing, my dear—came, in fact, to embody the ideal of beauty of the New Woman: la beautê intêressante. Instead of the android features that marked the exhibition's manikins, shaded eyes and ruby lips about to speak would have underscored the fact that for the consummate 18th-century woman the most perfect, most costly gown remained—mental poise.

If the exceptional 18th-century woman strove for power, Marie Antoinette—to whom it was given—virtually threw it all away. The rigors of de rigueur—let alone government—got to be too much. Diamonds were no longer an 18th-century girl's best friend: châteaux—retreats for casual friends and lovers—took their place. To go with her new milkfarm, she wanted a look that might be called R.F.D. Versailles: a simple shepherdess dress of English linen (in white—the color of conspicuous consumption). By dressing the queen as a country maid, this look went a long way towards transforming fashion, once a deadly serious affair, into the "trivial" thing it is today.

Triviality—as well as the trifles that attach to it—can lead, however, to unexpected depths. I tried to fathom this paradox by studying a mock-up of the "Queen's Necklace" in the exhibition and realized that these 547 stones (I counted) of white caviar spoke eloquently of any society which lived totally for pleasure. Posed not on a manikin but plumped on a vast pink pillow, the necklace screamed out the fact that an object is luxurious when it does nothing. Luxury, almost existentially, is nothing. That in addition this diamond necklace had a price tag equivalent to $25 million when most of France was going without bread led one to the conclusion that there is no justification for beauty—moral or otherwise. It just must exist. The show was a tribute to those 18th-century women who conquered these nihilistic thoughts and used fashion to become Persons. The proposition must be put: Du Barry was not just a Lady, and indeed, underlined with a fist sûblime en bijoux—raised. □

"The Eighteenth-Century Woman" was seen at the Metropolitan Museum Dec. 16, 1981-Sept. 5, '82. It was accompanied by a checklist with essay by Paul M. Ettesvold. Olivier Bernier's book of the same title was issued in conjunction with the show (Doubleday/Metropolitan Museum, 1981; 168 pp., $35). Deborah Turbeville's Unseen Versailles (Doubleday, 1981; 160 pp., $40) covers related material.

VOL
7
1
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI



MIAMI

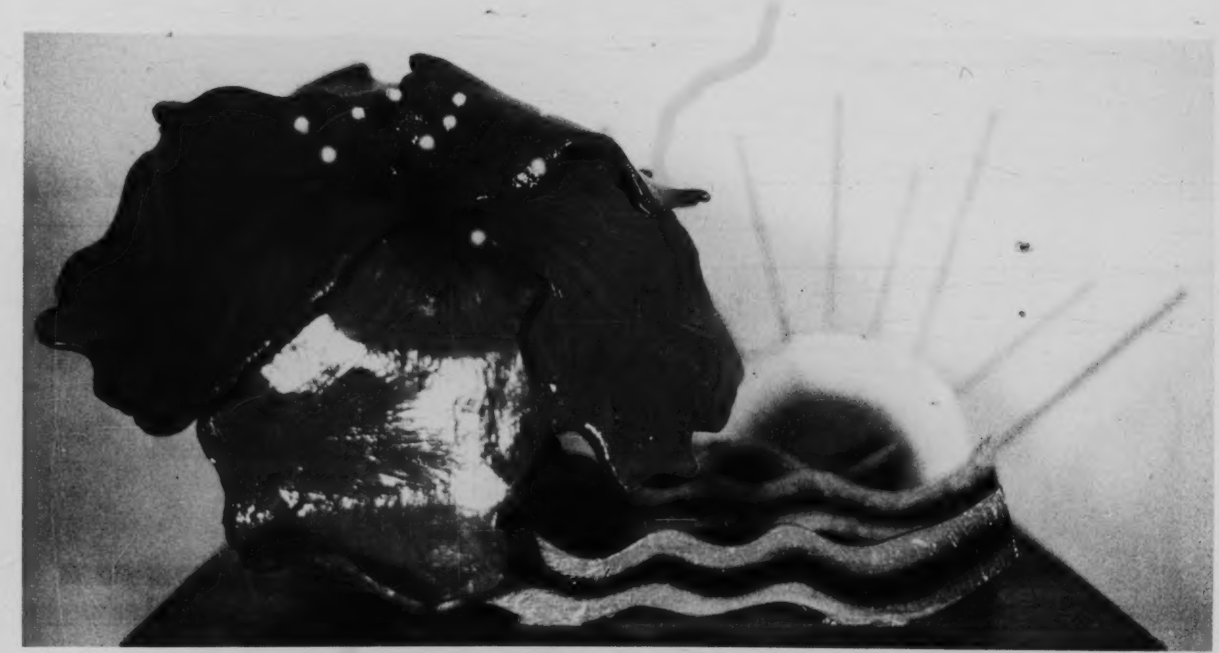
BAY HARBOR GALLERIES

ON KANE CONCOURSE

GALERIE NINETY-NINE 1088 Kane Concourse 33154 305-865-5823 Tues.-Sat. 10:00-5:00	February 11: March 11:	Ben Schonzeit New Works Kenny Schneider Animated Sculpture
GLORIA LURIA GALLERY 1033 Kane Concourse 33154 305-865-3060 Tue.-Sat. 10:00-5:00	February 11: March 11:	Jennifer Bartlett De Wain Valentine Nancy Graves Andy Warhol
MEDICI-BERENSON GALLERY 1052 Kane Concourse 33154 305-864-5355 Tue.-Sat. 10:00-5:00	February 11:	Ronnie Landfield Paintings Peter Reginato Sculpture
RAUCHBACH GALLERIES 1007 Kane Concourse 33154 305-861-9992 Tue.-Sat. 11:00-5:00	February 11: March 11:	Bruno Lucchesi "Bronze Sculpture" Jeanne Norman Chase "New York - New York"
ANA SKLAR GALLERY 1019 Kane Concourse 33154 305-868-2008 Tue.-Sat. 10:00-5:00	February 11: March 11:	Margaret Cheeseman Theodora Gavenchak Paintings Harriet Kittay Sculptures Dee Shapiro Paintings Murray Gaby Sculptures

MARJORIE STRIDER

10 Years, 1970 - 1980, A Traveling Exhibition



"Hawaii II," 1980, painted bronze, 8 x 12½ x 10½"

Curator: Dr. Judith K. Van Wagner
Director, Hillwood Art Gallery
C.W. Post Center, Long Island University

Myers Fine Arts Gallery
State University College
Plattsburgh, New York
October - November 1982

Hillwood Art Gallery
C.W. Post Center
Long Island University
Greenvale, New York
November - December 1982

The Sculpture Center
New York, New York
January - February 1983

The College of Wooster
Wooster, Ohio
February - April 1983

The Alexandria Museum
Visual Art Center
Alexandria, Louisiana
May - June 1983

Joslyn Art Museum
Omaha, Nebraska
November - January 1984

Museum of Art
The University of Arizona
Tuscon, Arizona
January - February 1984

The McNay Art Institute
San Antonio, Texas
March - April 1984

Museum of Art
The University of Oklahoma
Norman, Oklahoma
June - July 1984

Brainerd Art Gallery
State University College
Potsdam, New York
September - October 1984

The Robert Hull Fleming Museum
University of Vermont
Burlington, Vermont
November - December 1984

Trout Art Gallery
Dickinson College
Carlisle, Pennsylvania
January - February 1985

Concurrent exhibition of new work, Bernice Steinbaum Gallery January 12 - February 12, 1983
903 Madison Avenue New York City (212) 734-3373

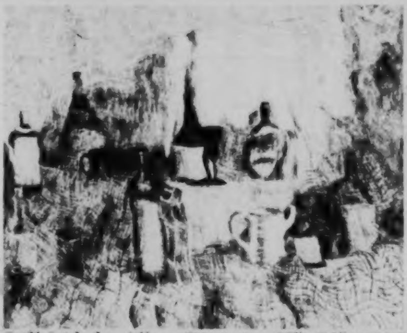
VOL
7
1
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

RAMMELLZEE

TSENG KWONG CHI

ROBERT KITCHEN
February 5th-March 3rd 1983

BONLOW GALLERY
JEANETTE BONNIER
150 GREENE ST. NYC 10012 (212) 925-4482



Still Life for Albert Einstein, 37"x72", 1982

JUAN
GOMEZ
QUIROZ

Paintings and
Works on Paper
February 1–26, 1983

Sutton
GALLERY 29 W 57 NEW YORK CITY 10019 (212) 888-0636

Roy Boyd Chicago

Works on Paper
Carol Burch-Brown
Stephen Luecking
Robert McCauley
Buzz Spector

215 W. Superior
Chicago 60610

Roy Boyd Los Angeles

Barry Tinsley
Sculpture

170 S. La Brea
Los Angeles 90036

PRINTWORLD

NEW WORK IN PROGRESS!!!!

PRINTWORLD DIRECTORY is unique! It is the only print/price catalog with complete documentation of limited edition prints.

PRINTWORLD DIRECTORY quotes the market price of current & sold out editions. It also lists awards, exhibits, publishers, etc.

Pre-publication offer ends March 30, 1983. Money-back guarantee if not completely satisfied.

☐ 10,000 print listings
☐ 800 top artists profiles
☐ 600 photos ☐ 600 pages

1983 PRINTWORLD DIRECTORY

PRINTWORLD DIRECTORY is a "must" reference for anyone actively involved in the print marketplace . . . an invaluable guide for galleries, collectors, appraisers, collectors, libraries, etc. Send for your copy today! Save!

COVER PRICE $49.95
PRE-PUB PRICE $35.00
1982 EDITION $35.00

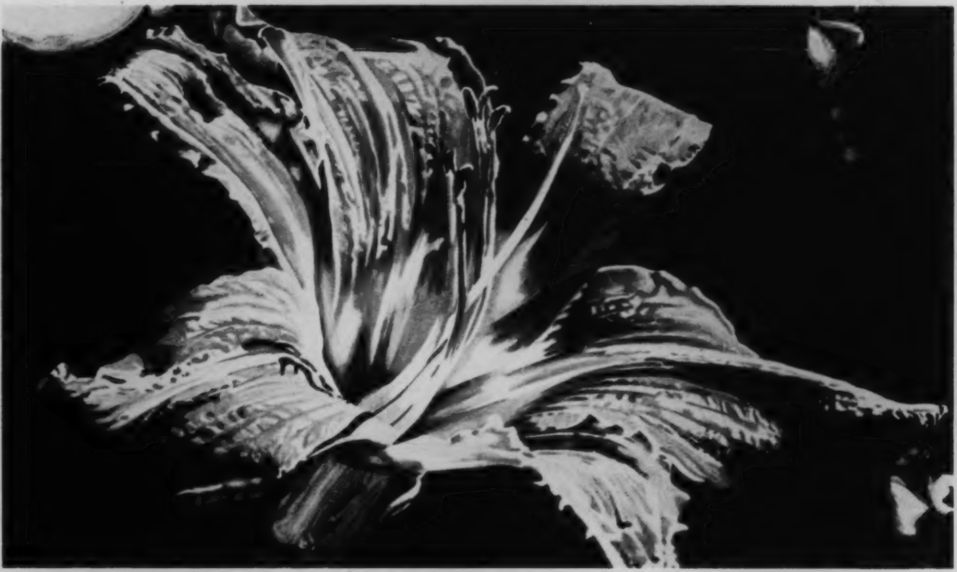
Postage/Handling: $5. USA—$10. Outside USA
NAME
ADDRESS

VISA/MC # EXP

P.O. Box 785 • Bala Cynwyd, PA 19004 (215) 649-5140

JAMES MALONE

Chicago Exhibit January-May
National Office Institute of Business Designers
1155 Merchandise Mart



RED DAY LILY oil on canvas 45"x75"

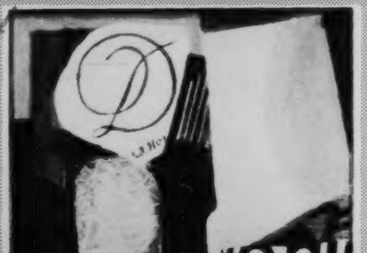
JAN·WEINER·GALLERY

3014 EVENINGSIDE TOPEKA KANSAS 66614 BY APPOINTMENT 913 272-5535

MAX

PAPART

UNIQUE WORKS



Oil, "Mrs. Two" 46 x 55 cm

NAHAN GALLERIES

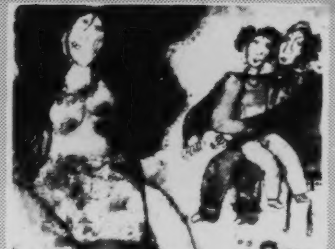
540 ROYAL ST. • NEW ORLEANS, LA. 70130
(504) 524-8696 Open Everyday, including Sundays

World Agents for Max Papart - Inquire about Oils & Gouaches

THEO

TOBIASSE

UNIQUE WORKS



"Je Sais qu'un Jour un Train Viendra"
Oil 25½" x 31½"

NAHAN GALLERIES

540 ROYAL ST. • NEW ORLEANS, LA. 70130
(504) 524-8696 Open Everyday, including Sundays

World Agents for Theo Tobiasse - Inquire about Oils, Pastels & Gouaches

VOL
7
1
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

REBECCA RILEY LITHOGRAPHY

JOSÉ MARTINEZ
VISCOSITY

TRANSLATIONS OF CONCEPTIONAL ILLUSIONS

MIRIAM PERLMAN
Lake Point Tower 505 N. Lake Shore Drive Suite 5410 Chicago

Graduate Program

Architecture
Ceramics
Design
Fiber
Metalsmithing
Painting
Photography
Printmaking
Sculpture

Limited
Enrollment
Resident Artist Faculty
First year financial aid available
for qualified students

Cranbrook Academy of Art
Registrar CAA
500 Lone Pine Road
PO Box 801
Bloomfield Hills, Michigan
48013

Cranbrook

HELEN LUNDEBERG
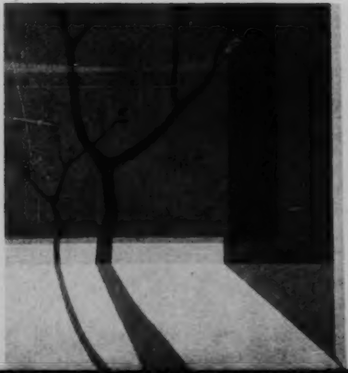
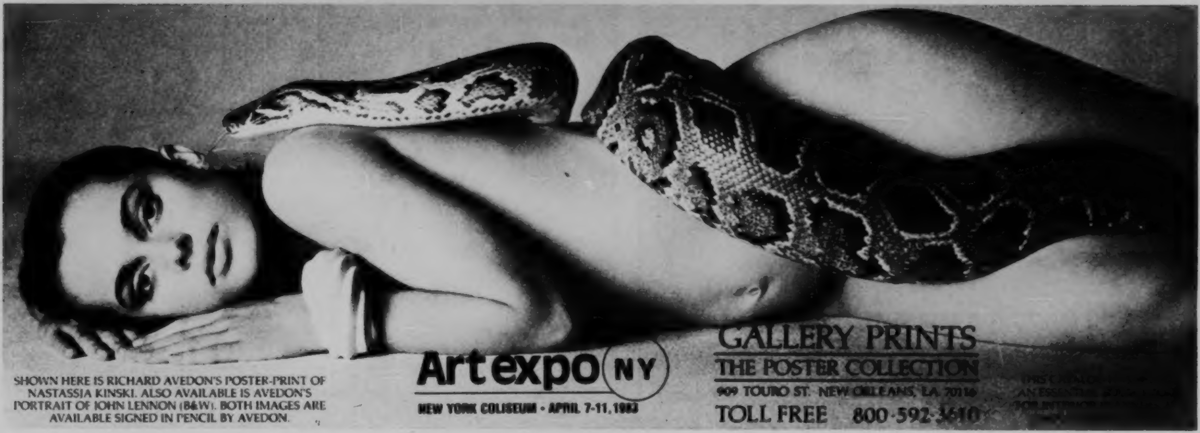
Paintings Prints Drawings

Tobey C. Moss

7321 Beverly Boulevard
Los Angeles, California 90036
Telephone 213 933 5523



Tree Shadows 1982 40 × 56 inches



SHOWN HERE IS RICHARD AVEDON'S POSTER-PRINT OF NASTASSJA KINSKI. ALSO AVAILABLE IS AVEDON'S PORTRAIT OF JOHN LENNON (B&W). BOTH IMAGES ARE AVAILABLE SIGNED IN PENCIL BY AVEDON.

Artexpo NY
NEW YORK COLISEUM • APRIL 7-11, 1983

GALLERY PRINTS
THE POSTER COLLECTION
909 TOURO ST. NEW ORLEANS, LA 70116
TOLL FREE 800-592-3610

[illegible]

Art expo NY

New York Coliseum • April 7–11, 1983

The world's most important art fair in the world's art capital. Over 300 exhibitors from around the world. Art lovers, artists, dealers, curators, collectors, publishers:—meet your colleagues. Seminars—Lectures—Workshops.

Dealer Day–Open to the trade only:
Thursday, April 7, 11-7pm

Open to the general public:
Friday, April 8, 11-8pm
Saturday, April 9, 11-8pm
Sunday, April 10, 11-7pm
Monday, April 11, 10-4pm

Save time & money–
Pre-register now!

Just fill out the coupon below and mail together with your check to Artexpo NY.

C

TO: International Art Exposition, Inc.
509 Madison Ave.
Suite 702
New York, N.Y. 10022 (212) 935-7607

(Special pre-registration rates)
Please send ______ tickets at $5.50 Daily, or ______ 5-Day Passes at $22.
(pass includes official Artexpo catalogue, $10 value)

Check enclosed: Amount: $______
Please send information regarding
☐ seminars & cultural events programs
☐ hotel accommodations
☐ special airfares

Name ______
Title ______
Company or Organization ______
Business or Home Address ______
City ______ State ______ Zip Code ______
Country ______

Type of business
☐ Art Dealer
☐ Art Gallery
☐ Auction House
☐ Collector
☐ Corporate Art Buyer
☐ Interior Designer
☐ Print Publisher
☐ Other (describe) ______

Additional names and titles ______

*Ticket orders received after March 25, 1983 will be held at the door.

VOL
71
ISS
2
FE 1983
UMI

ART AND PEACE
JAMALI

Man of Peace 26" × 20"

War and Peace 20" × 26"

Major Paintings from the Theme
March 4 - March 31

EDNA HIBEL GALLERY • 1018 Madison Avenue, New York City 10021 • 212-734-4448

---

the Winner

Lifesize Bronze Sculpture By

J. Seward Johnson, Jr.

CURRENT EXHIBITIONS:

CITICORP CENTER
NEW YORK, NEW YORK

INN ON THE PARK
HOUSTON, TEXAS

YALE CAMPUS and
NEW HAVEN PARKLANDS
NEW HAVEN, CT

GEORGETOWN PARK
WASHINGTON, D.C.

BOCA RATON HOTEL
and CLUB
BOCA RATON, FLORIDA

For information and brochure contact: Sculpture Placement • P.O. Box 9709 • Dept. 7 • Washington, D.C. 20016 • 202—362-9310

Walter Robinson: Willie's Girl, 1982, acrylic on canvas, 48 by 36 inches; at Metro Pictures.

announcing

Art in America's

1982 Full-Color Slide Survey of Contemporary Art

200 four-color slides of outstanding contemporary art works published in Art in America in 1982 . . . as selected by the editors.

At the request of slide librarians throughout the United States, Art in America will deliver in February 1983 this invaluable full-color survey of the state of contemporary art.

Shot from the original transparencies and filmed on the highest quality Kodak stock, this superb selection enables slide librarians to systematically update and strengthen their coverage and review of contemporary art, simplifying an increasingly complex, yet necessary task.

The cost is $295, slightly less than $1.50 per slide. The editors of Art in America have selected 200 slides in all, conveniently indexed for ready reference to the issues and pages in which they appeared.

Slide libraries may send purchase orders or enclose remittance, which ever is more convenient. But be sure to mail the coupon today.

Art in America
1982 Slide Survey of Contemporary Art
850 Third Avenue, New York, NY 10022

For additional information call:
(212) 593-2100

Yes, please send us the 1982 Full-Color Slide Survey of Contemporary Art—200 slides for just $295.00

☐ Please send invoice ☐ Purchase order enclosed ☐ Payment enclosed

Name ____________________

Title ____________________

Institution ____________________

Address ____________________

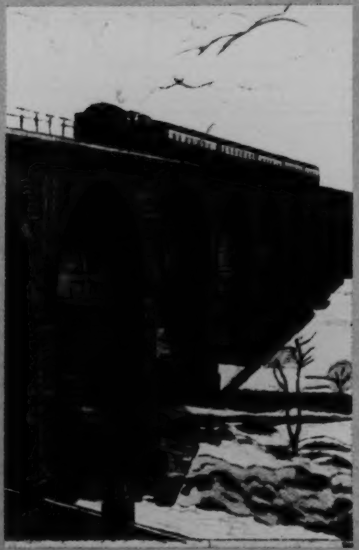
City ____________ State ____________ Zip ______

NB: Non-institutional orders must be prepaid

2/83

VOL 71
ISS 2
FE 1983
UMI

DUNCAN HANNAH
FEBRUARY 16 - MARCH 12



"THE RED BRIDGE," OIL ON CANVAS 50"x32"

SEMAPHORE GALLERY
462 WEST BROADWAY, NY, NY 10012 226-7990
MONOGRAPH AVAILABLE

ARMOND LARA

TARA
NINE GRAMERCY PARK • SECOND FLOOR • NY • (212) 254-0781

World's Largest Gallery Collection of Mexican Masters

Paintings, sculpture, drawings
watercolors.
Large collection of graphics.

Felipe Castaneda • Jean Charlot
Rafael Coronel • Ricardo Martinez
Carlos Merida • Gustavo Montoya
Leonardo Nierman • Felipe Orlando
J.C. Orozco • Diego Rivera
D.A. Siqueiros • Rufino Tamayo
F. Zuniga • and others

The B. Lewin Galleries

266 North Beverly Drive 213-278-5769
Beverly Hills, California 90210 213-550-1852

210 South Palm Canyon Drive
Palm Springs, California 92262 714-325-7611

LANDSCAPE '83
MID-AMERICA

WILBUR NIEWALD
LAURA CANSLER
GARY ANGELO
VICTORIA CHICK
MICHAEL FOWLER
VIRGINIA HILLIX
DAN HOWARD
CATHERINE MASSARO
RICHARD BARTON
ANNE BURKHOLDER
PHILLIP ROBERTS
MARY FRANCES KRAUSE
DAVID MELBY
MARILYN PROPP
MICHAEL WALLING
SUSAN BOOMHOUWER
STANLEY LEWIS
LA DELL STONECIPHER
DENNIS SOUTHWICK
ANN BAGBY
JERRY KENISON HART
NORMA COWDRICK
JOSEPH KEENAN
SANDRA McALLISTER
DONALD BATMAN
LESTER GOLDMAN

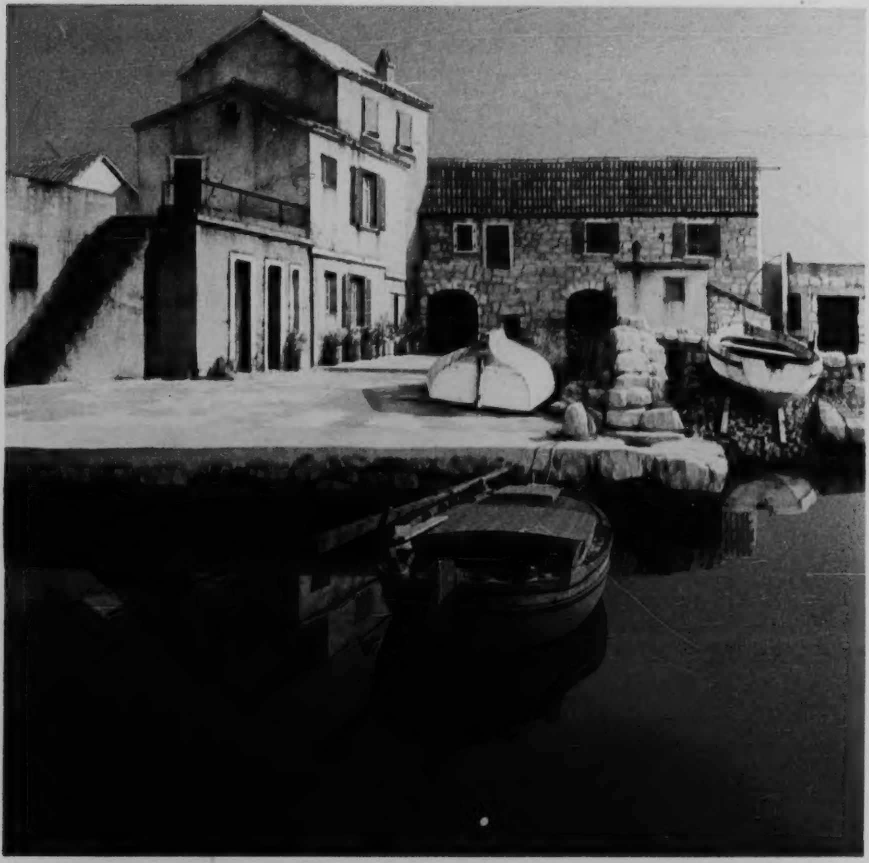
February 4-28

db
DONALD BATMAN GALLERY
825 WESTPORT ROAD / KANSAS CITY, MISSOURI 64111 / (816) 531-2588

Wally Findlay Galleries

339 North Rodeo Drive, Beverly Hills, California 90210

New York · Chicago · Palm Beach · Paris · Beverly Hills



Fishing Village

Oil: 43½ x 43½ inches

PAINTINGS

Zvonimir Mihanovic

FIRST EXHIBITION IN CALIFORNIA

February 24 through March 26

Telephone (213) 275-2165
Hours: Monday through Saturday 10 a.m. to 6 p.m.

VOL
71
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

Georges Braque: The Field of Colza, 1956–57, oil on canvas, 7 ⅞ by 25 ⅝ inches. Collection Mr. and Mrs. Claude Laurens.

Art in America

Late Lyrics: Braque

Including hallucinatory visions of the studio as well as rapid, expressionist images of nature, Braque's stylish last period both alludes to the past and adventurously explores new terrain.

BY JED PERL

Braque's late paintings are powerfully seductive. The hand of the artist is omnipresent and gives to the surfaces an extraordinary richness. When I first walked through the rooms full of late Braques at the Phillips Collection in Washington, D.C., I felt dazed by a grave lyricism. In these interiors and landscapes, figures and still lifes, each stroke of the brush carries a miniature revelation of the mysterious, sensuous power of paint.

In 1949, when Braque began his great series of canvases on the theme of the studio, he was 67 years old. In the 14 years that remained before his death it was as if he sought to recapture and encapsulate his entire life in art. The richness of the last paintings is at least in part due to a kind of double perspective: even as the artist is pressing into the future, he is recalling his own past. The brilliantly colored bouquets and landscapes of the 1950s recall the Braque of 1906, who entered the avant-garde when he took up the raucous color that had earned for Matisse, Derain and Vlaminck the nickname of Fauves—Wild Beasts. The flicker of short, staccato, silver-gray brushstrokes in the two heroic female figures of 1959—Reclining Woman and Night—invokes the Cubism of 1910 and 1911. Every stroke in the last paintings seems to carry an awesome weight of memory, both of Braque's own earlier personas, and of those artists who had obsessed him his whole life long.

In his last paintings Braque holds nothing in reserve. He has no preconceptions as to what a painting ought to be or what it ought to contain. While some paintings are starkly reduced, others embrace an overelaboration that approaches horror vacui. They flirt with sentimentality, yet revel in pure painting as if it were some divine, Platonic game. Braque's insistent juxtaposition of closely related yet strikingly distinct bits of brushwork, color and form yields images so fully worked-up, so utterly realized as to achieve a kind of hyper-refinement. To many, these paintings have seemed elegant, decorative. The are immensely stylish, but they insist on their stylishness with such a ferocity as to shatter all normal, conventional ideas of style. They achieve, paradoxically, a kind of stylelessness.

"Georges Braque: The Late Paintings, 1940–1963," has been organized by the Phillips Collection as a celebration of the centennial of Braque's birth in 1882. Although many of the major late paintings were included in a show called "Braque: The Great Years" that Douglas Cooper organized at the Art Institute of Chicago in 1972, the current exhibition is the first attempt by an American museum to deal exclusively with the period from World War II to the artist's death in 1963. For Braque, this was a productive period, of which the Phillips show gives but a partial portrait. For example, of the eight very different flower pieces done in 1953, the show includes only one. Those of us who love the late Braque would have gladly seen more; but given how hard it is to see these paintings at all in America—most of them are in European collections—one must be grateful for what the Phillips has provided. Containing 50 paintings, among them small cabinet pictures as well as major compositions, the Phillips show gives a fair view of Braque's final achievement.

Picasso's voraciousness has always made Braque seem, by comparison, somehow pale. Braque's achievement is less various, more circumscribed in its range of concerns. Yet Cubism, which was probably the greatest revolution in Western art since Masaccio and one-point perspective, belongs as much to Braque as to Picasso. In the Cubist era, both artists had a large dose of that mad, stubborn single-mindedness which a genius must have if he is going to turn the world upside down. A small, beautiful show of Braque's Cubist paper collages, which the Centre Pompidou in Paris and the National Gallery in Washington organized together, and which was in Washington at approximately the same time as the Phillips show, brought into high relief the radicality of Braque's Cubist years.

Cubist painting, by its very nature, is a kind of halfway house, part related to our world, part invoking other, alternative realities. In this sense Cubism is, almost by definition, an impure, hybrid form. But the supreme emphasis that Cubism places on the expressive power of composition can yield, especially in Analytic Cubism, a kind of classic purity. For Braque, it was not the hybrid but the classical side of Cubism that held the greatest appeal. From 1912 to the beginning of the 1930s Braque was a classicist who treated objects abstractly, as somehow detached from the emotional and associational pressures of everyday existence. Braque removed the knife, pitcher, lemons and oysters of the French kitchen from their old, sentimental context and gave them new life within the impassive, architectonic structures of Cubism.

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

Studio VI, 1950–51, oil on canvas, 51 3/16 by 64 inches. Fondation Maeght.

In the 1930s the classical element in Braque's art began to dissolve. A new richness of color and form pervaded the work. Obsessively decorated surfaces and discordant elements turned the clear linear structures and orderly progressions of planes inside out, and the bones of the compositions were lost in a welter of new sensations. Braque had begun to lose his taste for pure, classical form. The shift was a gradual one; but by the time he began the Studios in 1949 Braque had become an entirely anticlassical artist. In 1957, when he spoke with the English critic John Richardson, Braque rejected logic, moderation and measure in art, observing that the process of working his way into a painting was "rather like a fortune teller 'reading' tea-leaves." Art, he felt, should disturb, and "the whole Renaissance tradition," he asserted, "is antipathetic to me." Renaissance perspective, especially, seemed "a ghastly mistake," for it tended to create a distance between the spectator and the object, when what art ought to do was bring them closer together and offer a "full experience of space."

Initially, the most striking aspect of the late paintings is their impurity. Cubism, despite its hybrid nature, had always—at least in Braque's hands—tended to be of a piece, homogeneous. In the late paintings, the canvas becomes heterogeneous, a clash of diffuse elements. Nature invades the scene as never before. At the Phillips, Studio IX, which hung next to a window that framed backyard leaves and branches, provided a striking illustration of Braque's odd naturalism. Turning back and forth between the sun-splashed web of leaves and branches out the window and the flicker of insubstantial forms in Studio IX, I felt that what Braque was trying to do, more than anything else, was create his own nature. Whoever placed pots of flowers and plants with dark green leaves in a few of the Phillips galleries must have sensed what I sensed. It was startling to look from the live plants and flowers to the plant and flower forms in Braque's paintings, for at moments Braque seemed to have caught the chaotic richness of nature so effectively as to dissolve the line between nature and art.

In the great series of paintings on the theme of the studio that Braque worked on from 1949 to 1956, he staked out and explored new territory—a densely forested, enchanted terrain. When Braque painted Studio I in 1949 he can have had no inkling of where the Studios were going to take him. Studio I—a simple picture, in which the most compelling form is a starkly silhouetted pitcher, white against a black ground—sounds a theme: the studio not as a place, but as a state of mind. The white pitcher looms, somehow empty, one might almost say inscrutable. The muffled dialogue that it begins to conduct with the black pitcher of the picture-within-the-picture is the first of a series of dialogues between objects that will echo through all the Studios.

In Studio I the objects are fixed in space, firmly related to one another. After Studio I all clear demarcations evaporate. The studio becomes spacious, yet impenetrable; dense and solid, yet evanescent. Since the Studios contain palettes, easels, bits of sculpture, they are generally referred to as still lifes. But these objects are so dis-

Studio IX, 1952–53/56, oil on canvas, 57 ½ inches square. Musée National d'Art Moderne, Paris.

VOL 71
ISS 2
FE. 1983
UMI

Reclining Woman, 1930–52, oil on canvas, 29 ¼ by 70 ⅞ inches. Galerie Maeght.

solved, so shattered, as to render the pictures hardly still lifes at all. Maybe they are anti-still lifes—the annihilation of a genre. In any event, their raison d'être is not to be found in genre, but in a view of life and art.

Two years before he began the Studio series, Braque published a book of his reflections on art. Each page of Notebook 1917–1947 combines a thought with an image; taken together image and text form a kind of prolegomena and key to the vision of the late works. The decorations are a free-flowing rush of images: heads, leaves, vases and coffeepots, palettes and brushes and easels, figures of goddesses and hunters that recall the illustrations Braque had done for Hesiod in an Etruscan style in the 1930s.

These elements, which all appear in the paintings of the 1950s, are drawn with a variety of strokes of the pen—thick and thin, jagged and flowing, elegant and awkward—that reveal the awesome dimensions of Braque's graphic imagination. The image on a page does not, in general, illustrate the text. Braque himself comments in the Notebook that "form and color do not blend. There is simultaneity." Similarly, the Notebook's text and drawing do not so much blend as coexist in a free but mysterious union.

The spirit of Braque's Notebook can be seen in the following excerpts:

> I am far more concerned about being in tune with nature than copying it.
>
> In art there is no effect without twisting the truth.
>
> There is only one thing in art that has value: that which one cannot explain.
>
> Impregnation—Obsession—Hallucination.
>
> The painting is finished when it has blotted out the idea.
>
> Emotion is neither added nor imitated. It is the bud, the work is the blossoming.

Surrounded by Braque's elegant, calligraphic leaf forms, these aphorisms argue that art must be "in tune with nature." But the truth must be twisted. Above all, for Braque painting seems to be a kind of heroic loss of self and consciousness. The idea, he says, must be "blotted out"; emotion is merely "the bud." To paint, one must begin with an idea—"impregnation"—and go through a process of search and struggle—"obsession." But where one will end up is somewhere mysterious: "hallucination." Painting, then, is an act of transcendence that dissolves both thought and emotion within itself.

Before the Studios, Braque's paintings had always been rather frontal. No matter how mazelike the patterns of wallpaper and cloth became in the 1930s, one felt that the objects were arranged parallel to the picture plane—and close to it. All Braque's objects seem to "face" the viewer; Braque brings things near. What is therefore so astonishing about the Studios is their depth. It is not a naturalistic or perspectival depth, but a depth that one slips or sinks into. The solid and the insubstantial are not discrete, but melt into one another at will. The Studios are all atmosphere, no substance. They are hallucinations.

At the Phillips, the magnificent Studio VI hung at the very hub of the show. Though this 64-inch wide painting is, for Braque, very large, it feels rather small, almost intimate. More than anything else, it seems to be about a conversation—a kind of song—between a bird, perched atop an easel, and the bust of a woman. These two address each other in a duet that is as attenuated, as insubstantial as the pulled-out strands of paint which compose so much of the painting. Out of the darkness that surrounds this surreal pair loom lamps, palettes, jars and brushes. Things emerge, flicker for a moment and then disappear. Every element is utterly informal and spontaneous, yet bound to every adjacent form through a series of echoing, interpenetrating voices. There is something bittersweet about Studio VI. Nothing is real. Everything exists only through the benign power of Braque's brush, and it will all simply evaporate if that brush fails to realize the artist's imaginings.

Though Studio VIII, painted between 1952 and 1955, is bright and almost exuberant, the prevailing mood of the series is muted, nocturnal. Studio IX, completed in 1953 as Studio VII and then completely repainted in 1956, is a densely impacted thicket of grayish-greens. Here the bird—symbol of all that is gentle, of peace and hope—is exploded by the gridlike matrix in which it is caught and bursts forth in a series of spiky projections. In the Notebook Braque observes that "the poet may say: a swallow is stabbing the sky, and makes a dagger of a swallow." In Studio IX he produces exactly this metaphor. This bird of agony, as well as the lightbulbs and strange heads that inhabit some of the other Studios, curiously recalls, at least to my mind, the imagery of Picasso's Guernica. Guernica is a great, public cry of rage. The Studios are intimate, chamber dramas. In Guernica, Picasso is a political artist; in the Studios, Braque is a mystic. Still, both artists use the shattered glass of Cubism as a means to explore the darkest aspects of the human condition.

Night, 1952, oil on canvas, 63 $^{15}/_{16}$ by 28 $^{3}/_{4}$ inches. Galerie Maeght.

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

Mauve Garden Chair, 1947–60, oil on canvas, 26 by 20 1/16 inches. Collection Jacques Gelman.

Further glimpses of the terrain mapped out in the Studios are provided by such enigmatic images as The Checkered Bird (1952–53) and The Cauldron (1949). Braque's sublime brush, his unsurpassed control of tone draw one into the maze; but no answers are offered. Why is the bird trapped in a grid of red lines? What is the meaning of the smoky gray patches in The Cauldron? The questions seem almost impertinent, and the paintings, more often than not, convince us to go with them. In two of the last large figure paintings—Night and Reclining Woman (both 1952)—Braque reclaims the dappled brushstroke and silvery-gray palette of Analytic Cubism as the vehicle of a sort of mythic figuration. Out of a welter of short brushstrokes emerge women whose weird visages seem calculated to inspire a kind of archaic awe.

Braque's last decades were marked by several grave illnesses, and for the last half-dozen years he experienced a general decline in his health. Yet he remained extraordinarily adventuresome.

Some of the late motifs—especially the bird image—do not always produce convincing paintings, but Braque's open-ended, experimental method encourages us to follow him wherever he goes. The Studios and the late paintings of birds, landscapes and seascapes are not a summing up. Rather, like the work of Braque's Fauve and early Cubist years, they are explosive—full of new ideas, new directions and surprising resolutions. The radicality of Braque's late work is demonstrated by our inability, two decades after his death, to place it. The dense, mannered surfaces of the Studios and the abbreviated statements of the bird and landscape paintings retain the power to shock.

When Braque died in 1963 he was given a state funeral, and André Malraux, then Minister of Cultural Affairs, composed a great funeral oration. Malraux emphasizes, first, the freedom that Braque, along with Picasso, had brought to painting, and how this new freedom had opened our eyes to the nonillusionistic art of the past, "from our Romanesque painting to the beginning of time." But it is not the high color of Fauvism or the brown and gray traceries of Cubism that Malraux evokes in his closing images. As he summons up darkness, rain, a worn peasant-woman's hand and the farmers and sailors of the little town of Varengeville where Braque had lived, what comes to my mind, at least, are the somber landscapes and seascapes of Braque's last decade.

After Braque had made of Cubism, in the Studios, a kind of mannerism, he turned in the other direction and became a kind of realist. The dense landscapes that he painted from 1951 to his death in 1963 may be the most radical departure of his last years. Often small, often consisting of just two great planes—one of sky, one of earth or sea—they do away with the entire language of Cubism. The color of these landscapes, like the color of Braque's Studios and other late paintings, is not easy to describe. Perhaps it is more accurate to refer to Braque's colors as charcoal, earth, clay and wheat than as gray, brown, red and yellow. For in the late paintings Braque's colors always seem to be metaphors for natural things. In the Studios, the metaphor is ambiguous, but in the landscapes and seascapes paint truly becomes earth, air and sand.

The rapid strokes with which Braque evokes sky and field in The Field of Seashore, 1958, oil on canvas, 12 3/16 by 25 5/8 inches. Collection Mr. and Mrs. Claude Laurens.

The Weeding Machine, 1961–63, oil on canvas, 47 1/4 by 69 5/16 inches. Musée National d'Art Moderne, Paris.

5

Colza (1956–57); the dabs, flashes and flickers of paint in The Shower (1952), Seascape Near Dieppe (1952), Landscape with Somber Sky (1955), Wheatfields (1960) and The Weeding Machine (1961–63) show Braque for the first time as an Expressionist nature poet. At this point, Braque's artistic memory seems to circle back to the first grand years of the modern movement, when Post-Impressionism had just begun to cut the cord that tied art to nature. Seurat is evoked in the dappled world of a number of the late paintings, among them The Plough (1959–60), as well as in the idea of allowing the tonalities of the picture to cover its frame, as in Seashore (1958). But the artist who comes, more and more, to haunt the work of Braque's last 15 years is van Gogh, whose example had been essential for so many of the moderns. Both Matisse and Picasso owed an almost incalculable debt to van Gogh, and one is hardly surprised, in photographs of Braque's engraving studio, to find a reproduction of one of van Gogh's Sunflowers pinned to the wall, since Braque's own Sunflowers (1946) is an evident salute to the Dutchman. Braque's fascination with van Gogh irradiates many aspects of the late work. The more high-keyed, sunny side of Braque's palette mirrors van Gogh's desperately optimistic, throbbing blues, yellows and golds; the extremely horizontal, bluntly composed landscapes recall van Gogh's late, horizontal formats; the ears of wheat in Braque's Wheatfield (1951) are a quotation from van Gogh's Ears of Wheat; and the birds that fly over so many of Braque's late fields evoke, inevitably, van Gogh's final Wheatfield with Crows. Braque's Weeding Machine, with its darkening sky and swooping birds, is the kind of homage—both selfless and very personal—that very old, very great artists sometimes make to the image-makers who have meant the most to them.

Van Gogh is the only kind of Expressionist that Braque could have loved, for van Gogh's Expressionism does not reside in subject matter or narrative. Van Gogh discovered, within the most ordinary aspects of our world, forms and colors whose pure, elevated force could convey the deepest kinds of emotions. Van Gogh, in his letters, writes of nature in terms of pure color effects: he describes deep violet ground and foliage against a yellow sky, and red earth against a background of delicate mauve hills. The color statements in Braque's late landscapes and still lifes are equally direct and quite as unusual. There are yellow skies, red tracks of field, and a piquant harmony of yellow and lavender that recalls one of van Gogh's favorite combinations.

It is partly through this Expressionism of color relations that Braque conveys his final, intense feelings about the world around him. Also new, in some of the last works, is a reverence for the particularity of certain objects—a plough, a garden chair. Braque seems less willing than ever before to abstract from nature. Braque's small, strange close-up views of garden chairs present chairness as some sort of absolute state in much the same way as van Gogh's picture of Gauguin's chair. Van Gogh had always pushed his chairs, shoes, flowers and fields right up against the viewer, so that we can almost touch them. Braque does not have van Gogh's concern for precisely how the parts of the chair fit together—there is something tenuous, almost insubstantial about the Fauvishly colored Mauve Garden Chair (1947–60)—but Braque does, with van Gogh, seem to be exclaiming: "This chair matters!" No classicist could care so much about a piece of garden furniture.

The late paintings are not a summing up. Rather, like the work of Braque's Fauve and early Cubist years, they are explosive—full of new ideas, new directions and surprising resolutions.

The canvases of Braque's last eight or ten years are increasingly simple. The paintings are talismans, emblems. Everything rests on the power of the brush, on the meaning of a painted surface. In some of the pictures thick globs of paint rear up like volcanic eruptions. Others are rapidly, almost breathlessly brushed. In Seashore (1958) we are confronted with the blinding, dense gray-black of a seastorm sky so overpowering that it invades the frame as well. In The Field of Colza (1956–57) the world is two rippling, narrow, horizontal planes, one of sky blue, one of harvest gold. These paintings are an avowal of the painter's craft, beyond all artifice, in its most elemental form. The last paintings are facts, unvarnished truths. And, though not so well known in America, they have found a most diverse group of admirers. It is not surprising that Jean Hélion, the pioneering French abstractionist who turned to figuration some 40 years ago, should admire them, as he said in an interview in New York last year. "Maybe," Hélion speculated, "Braque had not painted the pictures he should have painted and at the end of his life had the feeling of these unpainted pictures and tried to indicate what he could have done." Clement Greenberg's comments on the late landscapes, in Art and Culture, are less expected:

> These broadly and emphatically treated pictures, murky yet pungent in color, adumbrate new and very un-Cubist ideas of design as well as of color, ideas that are more original and also more relevant than anything discoverable in Picasso since 1939. They demonstrate how radically independent Braque has it somewhere in himself to be.

In his funeral oration, Malraux commented that the glorious funeral accorded Braque might, in some way, be considered as a "revenge" for the pitiful ends of Modigliani and van Gogh. Speaking from the Colonnade of the Louvre, Malraux said that "Braque expressed France with a symbolic force so great that he is as legitimately at home in the Louvre as the angel in Reims Cathedral." At the Phillips Collection, his greatness was gloriously, abundantly clear. But it was all the more interesting for being a complex, paradoxical kind of greatness. To the end, Braque remained an experimenter, unafraid. It is not yet possible to know if Braque's paintings achieve that transcendent state of "poésie" which he saw in the work of late Rembrandt, Cézanne and Corot. It is a measure of the largeness and newness of Braque's vision that we cannot yet place it. Though dead, he remains, with the angel in Reims Cathedral, among the living. □

"Georges Braque: The Late Paintings (1940–1963)" was organized by the Phillips Collection, where it was first exhibited from Oct. 9 through Dec. 12, 1982. Currently it is at the Fine Arts Museums of San Francisco, the California Palace of the Legion of Honor [to Mar. 15]; it will subsequently travel to the Walker Art Center, Minneapolis [April 14–June 14] and the Museum of Fine Arts, Houston [July 7–Sept. 14]. "Braque: The Papiers Collés" was jointly organized by the Centre Georges Pompidou and the National Gallery of Art; after its initial exhibition in Paris last summer, the show appeared in Washington, D.C. from Oct. 31 to Jan. 16, 1983.

Author: Jed Perl is a New York artist and critic.

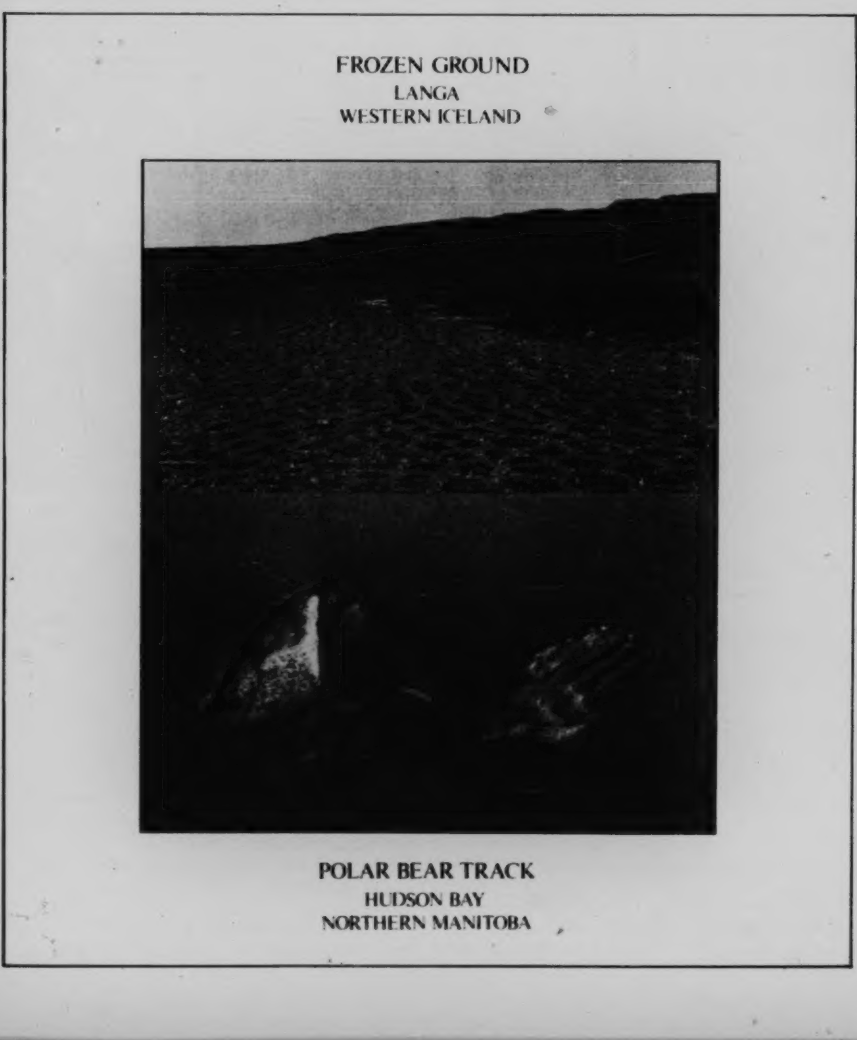
Hamish Fulton: Moral Landscapes

Combining image and text, Fulton distills his personal experience of nature in photographic works that have less in common with the Conceptual artists with whom he is frequently associated, and more with a longstanding tradition of topographical painting and a love of the English scene.

BY MICHAEL AUPING



Even within the context of much recent landscape art, Hamish Fulton is somewhat of a romantic outsider, making art that is sympathetic to a 19th-century sensibility in a science fiction age. Robert Smithson, generally considered the patriarch of the genre, dealt with the larger concept of nature from an essentially rational Western standpoint. He could see bulldozers as 20th-century dinosaurs, small pawns in a huge entropic, spiraling universe of disintegration and change. Fulton finds suspect the notion of Manifest Destiny, of man balancing nature through his own control. In Fulton's art, pastoral landscape appears as a microcosm in a state of grace. Be it Transcendentalist, Eastern, Aboriginal or American Indian in philosophy—and Fulton readily acknowledges the extreme variety of his sources—the work projects a sense of the mystery and nobility of nature, elevating those feelings to the spiritual level. Fulton has said, "Being in nature for me is direct religion."[1]

Since 1969 Hamish Fulton's art has stemmed from walks he has taken in the landscape. The duration of Fulton's walks ranges from one day to several weeks. He represents these walks through the combined mediums of words and photographs. Fulton's reaction to the character of the landscape determines the length of the walk and the number of photographs made dur-

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

BARKING

A NONSTOP 82 MILE WALK LASTING A DAY

ROADS AND PATHS FIELDS AND WOODS

STANDING COYOTE

A SEVEN DAY WALK IN NORTHEASTERN CALIFORNIA
ENDING ON THE NIGHT OF THE OCTOBER FULL MOON 1981

ing the journey. His tendency is to distill his experience of a walk into precise images, often representing a journey with a single photograph which is placed behind glass in a large, dark wood frame. Each of the photographs is set in a mat, on which is printed a text giving factual information about the walk and brief details of the experience, culled from an ongoing diary. These are essentially country walks, but they take place on what seems a McLuhanesque scale. Over the past decade or so, Fulton has walked literally thousands of miles in Nepal, India, Bolivia, Canada, Peru, Iceland, England, Scotland, America, Mexico, Australia, France and Italy.

Fulton sees the walk as a central aspect of his art. "No walk, no work" has been one of his maxims. His walks have generally been interpreted as a form of Conceptual sculpture, but Fulton, in conceiving and developing what he does, had nothing of the sort in mind. Indeed, until recently, he was somewhat perplexed by the fact that his work has been included primarily in exhibitions of Conceptual art. Fulton prefers to think of himself as a "landscape artist." He believes the physicality of walking helps to evoke a state of mind and a relationship to the landscape that is a crucial factor in his approach.

> There is a very strong relationship between your state of mind and your walking performance. . . . My idea is always to attempt to empty my mind;. . . by emptying your mind as much as possible, you can then let "nature" in. . . . Too much thinking simply blocks out nature and can reduce your energy and navigating abilities. One result of too much thinking is that you become "deaf." You miss all the sounds around you.[2]

In Fulton's work the element of time does not have the element of stillness

DOGS

A NIGHT AND THREE-QUARTERS OF A DAY

KENT AUGUST MOON 1978

RINGDOM GOMPA

LADAKH NORTHERN INDIA JULY 1978

A 14½ DAY WALKING JOURNEY OF APPROXIMATELY 200 MILES TRAVELLING BY WAY OF RINGDOM GOMPA THE PEN 21 PASS THE ZANSKAR RIVER ATING GOMPA HUTTRA THE MUNI GLACIER MACHAIL AND THE CHANDER BHAGA RIVER

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

we associate with landscape painting, but seems more directly connected to the experience. The texts that accompany his photographs relay the time, distance, and, in a number of cases, the condition of a walk. Time is compared to distance, which is measured in relationship to terrain and weather. Fulton's interpretation of nature, the reasons he chooses to photograph particular images, is a direct result of his physical involvement with it. As he moves, each footstep is a form of measurement that mediates between his body and the landscape. When Fulton takes his photographs, he is not separated from the "scenery," as it were; he is walking through it, incorporated into it.

Although Fulton chooses the areas in which he walks largely by instinct, they share a few general characteristics. Many take place near a body of water and most are in out-of-the-way places, areas that show little or no intrusion of modern man and machine. People are seldom represented. He tends to walk in areas that "feel untouched,"[3] and that have a unique history or terrain. At the same time, he comments: "I don't want to get trapped by visiting areas that are more and more obscure or exotic. The site is important, but the walk itself is more important. Although I sometimes travel to make my artworks, most of them are done in England. Kent, in particular, has a very unspectacular landscape which allows my real concerns to surface without an exotic overlay."[4] While Fulton plans his routes in advance, he tries to walk in areas that are unfamiliar to him. Thus the different types of terrain become a crucial element of chance in the work, determining the length of the walk, the direction and the number of photographs taken. Fulton has commented, "My work is about nature and it seems proper to allow nature to determine events in route."[5]

A few of Fulton's walks have been long and strenuous, covering 50 miles on a summer's day. He is inspired by walkers and mountaineers of the Midlands and the North of England and Scotland, his early heroes being Joe Brown, Don Whillans and more recently, Doug Scott. Yet he considers his hiking or walking ability ordinary. In many of the writings on Fulton's work, there has, in fact, been an implied exaggeration of the lengths of his walks. They are seldom, if ever, ritual tests of endurance.

Many of his walks are relatively modest by hiking standards. Several of Fulton's works relate to ancient paths which evoke the spirit of earlier travelers. Hollow Lane, for example, depicts a section of the Pilgrims' Way between the cathedrals of Winchester and Canterbury, a path worn deep beneath the level of the surrounding fields by heavy rains and the feet of previous travelers. Walks in the countryside have always been a particularly English trait, and it is perhaps logical to see Fulton's works as an extension of two centuries of English tradition in which long walks helped restore certain creative forces that urban life muted.

Behind Fulton's work also stretches the long tradition of English topographical painting and a love of the English scene, fortified by the admiration of several generations of English collectors for 17th-century Franco-Italian and Dutch landscapes. Perhaps because they live on an island and are keenly aware of the finite character of their land area, Britishers have always celebrated artists whose works reflect a sensitivity to landscape. Fulton and his English colleague Richard Long have been most recently acclaimed for extending this tradition. A contemporary of Fulton's, Long is a sculptor who, in addition to the floor pieces for which he is now best known, continues to make work that involves walking and that is presented in the form of photographs. Walking through various areas, Long creates sculptures in the landscape by rearranging things he finds—stones, sticks, seaweed, etc. He uses these materials to create simple, basic shapes, many of which date back to prehistory—straight lines, zigzags, circles, spirals, crosses and squares.

Much has been made of the similarities between Long's and Fulton's work. Walking and photography are crucial elements to the work of both artists. They acknowledge a close friendship and respect for each other's art, and have in fact accompanied each other on various walks. Fulton and Long work lightly on the surfaces of fields, seashores, mountains, paths and roads. Their art may be described as a gentle dialogue between the artists and the earth. Indeed, the work of artists who build large-scale constructions in the landscape seems heavy-handed by comparison.

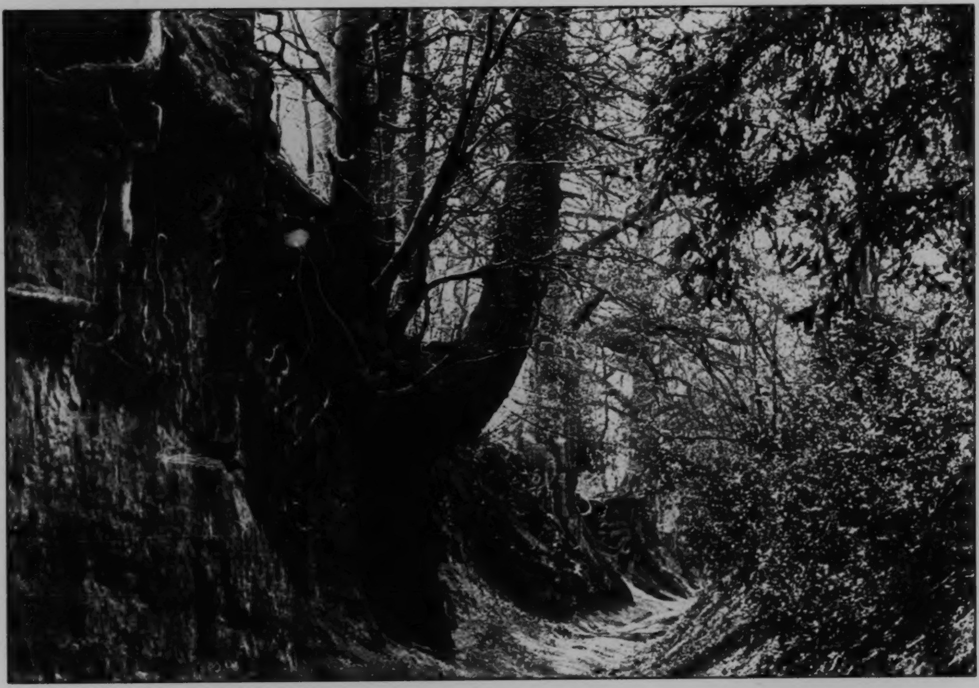
There is, however, a subtle but significant difference between Fulton's art and Long's. While Long chooses to rearrange the landscape, Fulton prefers that the landscape impose itself on him. Avoiding alteration of place, Fulton's photographs document his attraction for "unspoiled" landscape and the fact that "he was there." Fulton agrees with the idea that the only things you should take out of the landscape are photographs—the only things you should leave are footprints.

Fulton's modus operandi as a traveling landscape artist compares on a modest scale to Victorian voyagers who transported easels and sketchbooks to the far corners of the earth, or, for that matter, to itinerant, contemporary landscape photographers. The photographs Fulton takes, however, reflect a relative indifference to conventional photographic methods. Fulton has no formal training in photography and, indeed, does not consider himself a "photographer" per se. He consciously remains at a distance from the technical aspects of the medium. He feels technical considerations are more about photography than nature, which is the central subject of his work.

Essentially, Fulton employs one camera, one lens and one filter. "That way I can keep the emphasis on what is in the picture rather than technique."[6] Since 1970, he has used a Nikkormat 35mm, a camera that is both mechanically proficient and, importantly, very portable. "If the camera weighed more than my Nikkormat, I wouldn't want to carry it."[7] He works with a standard 50mm lens, and his one concession to technique is to use an orange filter to increase the overall contrast of the image. Fulton prefers not to be directly involved with the technical aspects of printing, leaving that task to a firm in London that he has dealt with for some years.

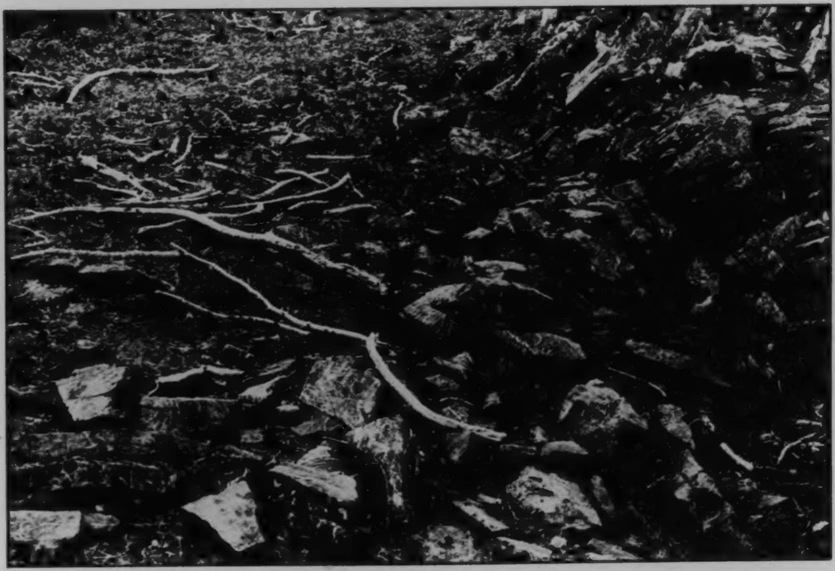
Compared to the immaculate techniques of an Ansel Adams, Fulton's photographs have a raw, direct quality which reflects a person moving through the landscape, responding to an endless series of sensations. The important part of his relationship with photography is that he can walk and take photographs without losing the rhythm of the journey. Fulton does not have a studio proper. He lives in a modest, suburban house in Kent. For the most part, he sees his "art" being made in the landscape. All technical considerations are farmed out.

Fulton maintains a kind of Sontagian skepticism of photography. He breaks the photographic frame with his use of words, redeeming aspects of his experience that would be eliminated in a photograph—sounds, in particular. Within



A HOLLOW LANE ON THE NORTH DOWNS

THE PILGRIMS WAY 1971 ANCIENT PATHS FORMING A ROUTE BETWEEN WINCHESTER AND CANTERBURY 10 DAYS IN APRIL A 165 MILE WALK



FIFTH CAMP

A SEVEN DAY WALK IN THE PYRENEES SPRING 1981
TRAVELLING IN A CIRCLE FROM BEDOUS BY WAY OF IBON DE ACHERITO COL DE LA CONTENDE AU DE COUECQ COL D' AYOUS
LAC DE PEYREGET COL D'ISEYE

VOL
7
1
ISS
2
FE 1983
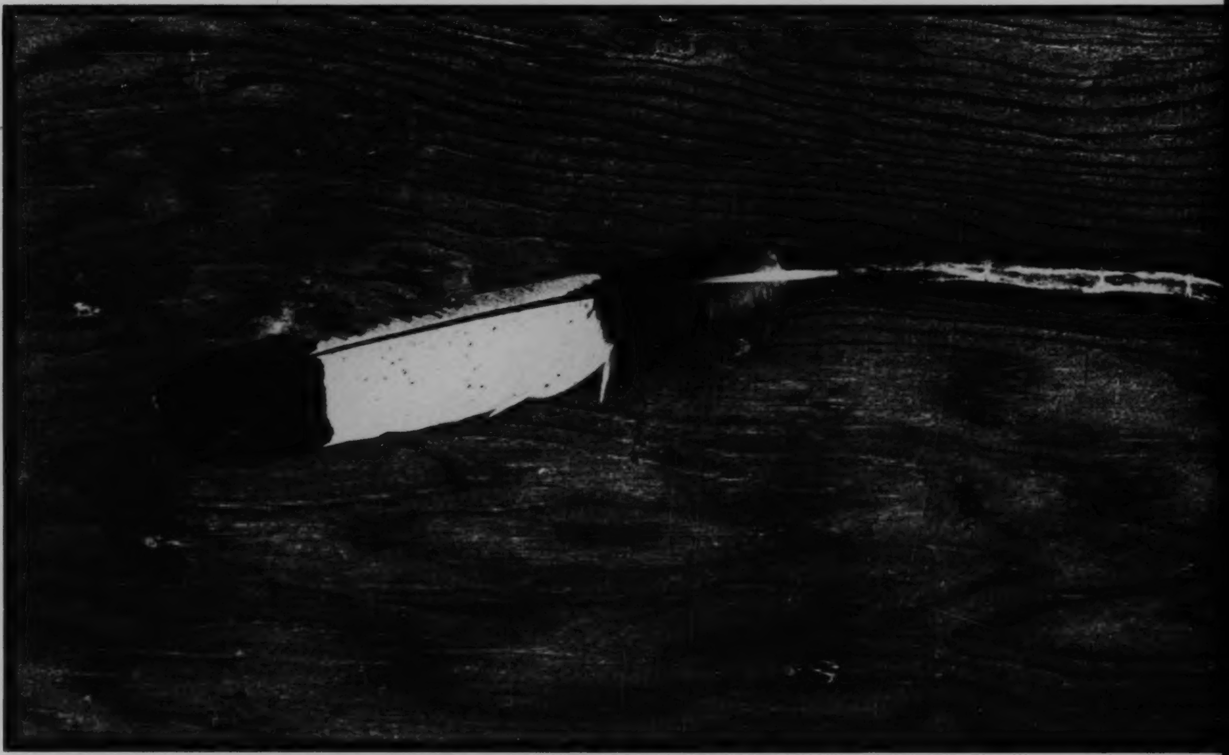
UMI



ELEVEN NOTCHES FOR AN ELEVEN DAY WAL
NORTH COAST OF TAS

Fulton's body of work three basic types of image/text combinations can be identified. The first type consists of a landscape photograph with an inscription below simply describing the length, direction, duration and date of the walk. The second type differs from the first in that the inscription refers to something not present or apparent in the photograph. For example, a work representing a 1978 walk in Kent consists of three photographs butted together to create an expansive panoramic view of a large open field which, punctuated by a few trees, meets a stormy sky approximately one-third of the way up the image. The text below the image reads:

Barking Dogs
A non-stop 82-mile Walk lasting a day a night and three-quarters of a day Roads and Paths Fields and Woods Kent August Moon 1978

In the third type of work, Fulton uses either of the aforementioned approaches to text, but chooses to focus his attention on specific images he encounters along the way: a close-up of a monastery wall, five boulders, a walking stick, or a Buddhist prayer carved in stone. The texts are derived from an ongoing journal Fulton keeps of all his walks. As distillations they are reminiscent of the haiku style of poetry, their rhythmic brevity bringing on a rush of sensations and mental images that seem to fill the photographs with a sense of experience the latter could not impart alone. Fulton's texts provide essentially a "skeleton story," outlining feelings and glimpses, the details of which are meant to be filled in by the viewer. Fulton has been influenced by certain ideas of Zen Buddhism, and has used the following quote to describe his approach to representation:

> The Zenic influence in Art involves a replacement of restless detail by quietness which is the chief action in deep meditation. This is affected by the presentation of the space motive. In painting the leaving of portions blank by the placing of only the very necessary strokes on paper, leaving the open space to be filled in by the mind, as the expression goes, does not set the mind thinking (which is restless) but causes it to poise itself on what it knows (which is quiet or tranquil). This is the discovery that the observer makes when he observes the effect of Zen Art in his own mind. It is not that the discovery of this effect is important, it is the effect itself that is so.[8]

If many of Fulton's photographs have an almost déjà vu quality—no matter how foreign the subject—it is perhaps because on one level they operate like mirrors. By forcing a long leap of imagination from art object to "place," Fulton helps connect us with our past experiences of landscape and ultimately with our feelings about nature in general. Fulton's work reflects back on a very primal instinct, perhaps what Hugh Honour has referred to as "The Morality of Landscape."[9] In one sense, this morality may be generated by thoughts of a preagricultural stage of civilization which Jean-Jacques Rousseau believed to be "the state least subject to revolutions, the best state for man."[10] In Fulton's works, however, nature as source is "louder" than the voice of the artist, who attributes to it a parental role, if you will. Nature, of course, is in fact that ultimate "mother," and the ecology movement notwithstanding, a mother we are having a harder and harder time identifying with. As Barbara Novak recently pointed out:

KING JOURNEY FROM THE MIDDLE TO THE MANIA MARCH APRIL 1979

> . . . The present preoccupation with nature by ecologists, artists, conservationists, occurs in the shadow of another sublime—the awe of nuclear wipe-out.
>
> How can we talk of nature in the 1980's? The fate of nature, constantly eroded, renews in us a very final sense of mortality. Is our own immortality foreclosed if nature itself is mortal—if not in fact at least in concept?
>
> Nature's destruction foreshadows our own. Are we apart from nature or part of it? When Thoreau spoke of old trees being our parents, and our parents' parents, natural catastrophes seemed like the only possible apocalypses. What is the testimony of nature in a nuclear world?[11]

From this view, Fulton's art could at some point take on the quality of familial portraits of a vanished ancestry. ☐

1. Michael Auping, "An Interview with Hamish Fulton," Common Ground: Five Artists in the Florida Landscape, Sarasota, Ringling Museum of Art, 1982, p. 86.
2. Common Ground, p. 89.
3. Peter Turner, "An Interview with Hamish Fulton," Landscape Theory, New York, Lustrum Press, 1980, p. 81.
4. Turner, pp. 81–82.
5. Ibid., p. 81.
6. Ibid., p. 83.
7. Ibid.
8. Ernest Wood, Zen Dictionary, London, Pelican.
9. Hugh Honour, Romanticism, New York, Harper & Row, 1979, p. 57.
10. Ibid., p. 60
11. Common Ground, p. 6.

Author: Michael Auping is curator of 20th-century art at the Ringling Museum of Art, Sarasota.

VOL
7
1
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

Charles Simonds: Dwelling, Dublin, 1980.

Dwelling, Greene Street, New York City, 1971. The Dwelling is pictured here in a state of deterioration.

Charles Simonds: The New Adam

Best known as the peripatetic architect of miniature clay "Dwellings" for a mythical, migrant race of "Little People," Charles Simonds has been described as an archeologizing fantasist, as an urban populist and as the maker of sexually symbolic sculpture. Below, Simonds's microcosms are seen in their macrocosmic aspect.

BY TED CASTLE

Charles Simonds is a creator, a philosopher, a progenitor, a guy who works with clay like a kid plays in the mud, kind of a god for a whole ecological system he has created in order to understand nothing less than the nature of life. It is appropriate to make large claims for serious modern artists; their pretensions are great and we have to bestir ourselves from petty concerns if we even want to tune in to their wavelengths, leaving aside the whole question of completely understanding things that even they are not entirely certain of. In the case at hand, I want to emphasize the grandiose aspects of Charles's work precisely because its scale leads one, deceptively, toward the reassuring conclusion that it is really just a doll's house that he's making.

I think of him as somewhat like the God of Genesis, although modified by Christian influence and much more androgyne and epicene than good old God the dad. Simonds has become famous in different circles all over the world for the generation of a whole world for an imaginary race called the Little People. Unlike God, however, Simonds stops short of creating the Little People themselves. He just makes their world, a vacant world populated by vanished fantasies and characterized by remnants of civilization. In November 1981, Charles Simonds opened a large exhibition of souvenirs of travels at the Museum of Contemporary Art in Chicago where John Hallmark Neff and his staff produced a handsome book to commemorate the show and accompany it on its anticipated travels to Los Angeles, Fort Worth, Houston, Omaha, Denver and New York.[1] I went to Chicago to see the exhibition in its largest version (a few things won't travel and one "Dwelling" was built into a wall at the museum). Later I talked with Charles, whom I've known for ten years, about issues largely concerning meaning in his work. The meaning of his work is so near to the bone of meaning in general that it is often, even usually, overlooked in favor of the superficial charms of the little environments themselves. I want to drop excerpts from the conversations into sections indicated only by italics so I can get to the root of the matter without editorial mechanics getting in the way.[2]

I'm much more interested in my thinking than in my things. The things are extrapolations from what I think. Some of them are more or less economical in terms of getting what I want done. In a sense it's sort of a replacement for writing. I don't think of myself as able to write. When I do write, it's more like assembling thoughts than writing. . . .My work is not generated by art. When I'm thinking about things, I'm not thinking about art. Which is to say I think about life, I think about how organisms go through changes. But I grew up as an artist, from very young. My brother and I were very adept at making portraits in clay when we were young, so we got quite a lot of attention for that. My parents sent us to study with Claire Fizano and John DeMarco, who did church reliefs. Then my brother went away to college and left some clay. So I took this clay and I made this figure with all the muscles and everything. I couldn't believe that I had made this thing, because it was very realistic. I didn't know that I could do that . . . my frame of reference for myself from then on has always been of myself as an artist. Making that thing solved the issue of what you do. I discovered that I could do that, work clay. This was always the thread that linked everything together, dealing with clay. I studied with these sculptors who did church sculpture. A lesson was working in their atelier. I'm very good at angels. There are a thousand ways to touch clay, a million. They're all expressions of love or intention.

What Simonds fashions now are what he always calls either Dwellings or Objects. The Dwellings are not all houses; many are ritual places where he imagines, I think, that the Little People create vegetables and flowers, the sexual organs and offspring of inanimate forms of life, in some mystical process analogous to alchemy (the cairns look a bit like beehives and a bit like ovens). The Dwellings, to be definite, are always in a particular place. The Little People have always already left them to deteriorate. The Dwellings, of various forms, are always made of little unfired bricks about half an inch long and otherwise proportionate. Charles makes the bricks out of clay which for this purpose he rolls out like cookie dough and slices up with a knife before letting it dry. He puts the bricks in plastic bags to tote to the site. The site can be literally anywhere. His largest Dwelling work was done over a period of several years at a few hundred sites in part of New York's famed Lower East Side, the ghettos of successive waves of cheap immigrant labor that were melted down into raw material for the voracious suburbs to swallow up in succeeding generations of outward and upward social mobility.

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

Detail of Dwelling, Chicago, *1981,
at the Museum of Contemporary Art.

The Lower East Side Dwellings are, I should say were, the most important and the most enigmatic of their creator's works so far. They exist only in the past, very few of them ever even having been photographed or written up. They were everywhere and nowhere. They were underfoot and up in the sky, on ledges, nooks and windowsills. They were in gutters, sheltered by a curbstone, or just anyplace that looked like a good place to put one. At the same time they were invisible. Rushing by, you would completely miss them. Parking your car, you could smash one in a millisecond. But out looking around, enjoying the weather, feeling the world, you might chance on a Dwelling being made. There was a guy there with long chestnut colored hair wearing a green shirt or jacket, working fast to put in place an already abandoned earthen hut, usually surrounded by children, mostly little boys, sometimes girls and young men, and, occasionally, a unique individual such as yourself.

Making the Dwellings, Charles Simonds is like a clown of a builder working furiously to finish the concrete work before the frost hits. One brick at a time, he fashions fantasies of times that never were nor will be in an activity as lengthy as time and as unfinished as the world itself. He still makes these Dwellings everywhere he goes. The way he sees it, however, the Little People transport him with them rather than the reverse. This is a kind of modesty that most artists express in some manner when they realize, in the course of their work, that creation is always a vast undertaking and that one would be bragging against luck to say that one does it oneself. The Dwellings have been made in lots of places, and none of the ones in the Lower East Side or China, Germany or Paris still exist, except for the few that were made in Zurich and Chicago and New York as specific permanent installations in museums.

> One brick at a time, Simonds fashions fantasies of ages that never were nor will be. His activity is as lengthy as time and as unfinished as the world itself.

The Kunsthaus in Zurich is like a bunker, it's solid concrete, thick. Even if I could have made a hole in it, it would have taken a week to make the hole. So I went looking for a place to work. I got very anxious and started to measure the thickness of the walls, going behind and going in front, measuring the room widths and everything, and I found this place where it was uneven, and nobody knew about this, and I tapped and I found this wall that used to be a doorway that they didn't even know about. The doorway was bricked up and on the other side they had shelves. So I said here's where we cut and we did and it came out right on a shelf; I didn't even have to build a support in the back! After I built it, everyone loved it so the museum bought it, but I built it in such a shoddy way that now I have to go back and fix it. When I work in the street, I never pay any attention to the issue of drying, I just do it. The clay dries, and it becomes stable once it's dry and you sort of orchestrate how it goes to that point, so that you don't have any major disruptions—cracks—where you don't want them—so buildings don't separate from the landscape and things like that. It's all a process of movement, it's like catching something on the run. In the street it doesn't matter because two days later it's going to be wrecked. If you're making it as an object in the studio, you have all the time in the world to let it sit, each part can dry before you move on to the next step. In a museum, where there's time pressure, you can't. The piece in Chicago is still shrinking, so I've arranged to go back there and fix it up. You fill the cracks, then they dry, then you fill them again. I know where they're going to be, it's like a calculus. When I called them in Zurich they said there's nothing wrong with it, but I know there is. They don't see it, but I can even see it in photographs.

The works in the streets, which Simonds continues to do in all the cities he visits in connection with museum shows such as the present tour, have a performance aspect. Usually a young man or a boy will begin explaining to all the people who gather what is going on. In Paris, not long ago, he was assisted continuously for several days by a young girl whose parents felt compelled to forbid her to go out because she was getting so involved in the project. In China, where he attracted one of the largest crowds with his "illegal" activity, he was unable to communicate with the man who took responsibility for overall length 44 feet.

Detail of Dwelling, Chicago, 1981,
The Museum of Contemporary Art.

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

Dwelling, Kunsthaus Zürich, 1981.

Dwelling, California State College, Los Angeles, 1980.

explaining the work. Simonds says that during his years of working this way on the Lower East Side, he always talked to people while he worked and he got to know many of their life stories and made quite a number of friends. As a result, he became involved in various community issues, such as the use of vacant lots, one of which he was able, with the neighborhood kids, to convert into an indigenous recreation area that many people called Charles's Park. In this way, the work in the streets is a kind of research, an occasion to find out how people are and what is happening in unofficial worlds, unhistorical locales where the peripatetic artist follows this imaginary flock of Little People through vicissitudes and disasters and fantastic developments.

The museum installations, the few there have been, are related to the street works in that they show developments and declines in different parts of the civilizations of which there is no chronicle. These, combined with a few installations made in people's houses, are possibly the most exciting of Simonds's works because the time pressure combined with the possibility of permanence gives greater range to his imaginative constructs, which are also bigger and in most cases better built.[3]

I'm very interested in how we live, or how one lives, which is to say the relationship between your being and your dwelling, through time, relative to your life. There is a realm of things which are not in our consciousness in a way that we can use them as tools or conceptual aids for understanding how one actually goes about living, both what one builds and how one relates to the environment, whatever it is. The forces of life from the point of view of organisms in time relative to the environment are not conscious. I'd like to be very aware of these things, which I think are important for understanding life right now.

Simonds is referring, I think, to the area between the levels of conscious and unconscious and subconscious states of mind, to the synaptic syntax of Dwelling, 1982, 17 by 42 by 15 inches. Castelli Feigen Corcoran.

the nature of understanding. He doesn't build a dwelling that bears any comparison to one of our funhouses, or prisons, or one-family palaces. His art is not allegorical or satirical; it is, precisely, analogical. As Gregory Bateson remarked, "It is not that art is the expression of the unconscious, but rather that it is concerned with the the relation between the levels of mental process."[4] So it is with the relationship between the world of the Little People and your daily life. Like a realized dream, the leftovers of "their world" present a reality that is strange and familiar too. Here are some artifacts that look like flowers. Here are some hills that seem to have penises. Vulvular rivers exude useful materials for the construction of ritual cairns. But it would be another kind of mistake to think that Simonds is showing or portraying a dream or dreams. It is just that his analogies with reality are likewise analogous with Dwelling, 1981. Collection Lewis and Susan Manilow.

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

Brick Blossom, 1981, clay on plywood base, approximately 30 inches square. Collection the artist.

Number 11 (Ritual Furnace), 1978, clay on plywood base, ca. 30 inches square. Collection Dr. Jack E. Chachkes.

dreams. The ritual cairns are not like things we know of—they are themselves, and by examination and imagination we can think of what went on in them in a past time that never was.

> When I'm working, I never see Little People. I'm not insane. But I do think about them. What are they doing in that corner? It's a place you let your mind relax into. Then you fill in what happened in that place. I don't think about the Little People, I think about me in there. It's a mental positioning inside. But I also think of them—they're incorporeal, but they're quite alive. It's tricky because since I'm not crazy, I don't live like they live; they do things I wouldn't do. They drag me into different situations. They also take me all round the world. But there is a separation and I'm not crazy enough not to realize that they come from my imagination.

The works in which the analogies have time to develop and sometimes literally flower are those Simonds calls the Objects. The largest part of the exhibition which started in Chicago last fall is composed of 16 of these objects, 12 of which are a series called "Circles and Towers Growing," first shown in Europe in 1979. Three more are a 1981 series called "House Plants." It is with these objects that Simonds makes his living, selling as many as he makes to museums and art collectors. It is also with these objects that he has the time to develop his ideas.

"Circles and Towers Growing" chronicles various epochs in the "life" of a bit of earth. Really made of clay and set on pieces of plywood about 30 inches square, these 12 objects refer to events and undertakings that are totally imaginary. They are presented like stills from two or three movies that were never made. There is a beginning. The earth has been flooded and has dried. In the next age—rather in the next one we see—bumps of a somewhat mammary type are beginning to burgeon on the land, some of them smooth (immature?), others with prototypical orifices, lips, nipples. Something obscure but lifelike is happening to parched earth. In the next frame there are unmistakable evidences that an intelligence that walks around and builds things is at work. Seemingly useless sticks humanize the desert in a purposeful manner—though we can't really recognize what they're there for, like lots of art—and the central hillock has been developed or is developing itself. The metaphor of growth, and building as growth, the end of the distinction between the organic and the inorganic (and the distinction between the animal and the vegetable), is central to Simonds's vision and it is in these works that he has most clearly expressed it. It would take more than 20 questions to sort out the practical meaning of these object-structures, but they are clearly all animal, vegetable and mineral at once. As the "story of civilization" proceeds, it divides into circular and towering variants. It could be that two species of builder with these different predilections succeeded each other in the same place or that one species followed the other, but it makes no difference. The circles come to dust as do the towers. In the twelfth frame there is only chaos and a few bricks on the earth.

The "House Plants" are a far less geological work. In this series, the ground erupts and gives rise to a conical tower with a spiral staircase on it; Ground Bud, Stone Sprout, and Brick Blossom are three of what could be thousands of imagined possibilities. It is not clear if they are developments of the same thing or of familiar things, as there are some plants that will present the bud and the blossom and intermediate stages at the same time, but their nature is both architectural and organic. The ground around the plants is curiously fluid, like leaves, like buds, like waves in metamorphosis, as well as like earth. They also resemble what they are—a kind of geography in clay.

The metaphor of growth and the end of the distinction between the organic and the inorganic (and between animal and vegetable) are central to Simonds's vision.

When he was beginning to work on the Objects, but before he had started using his characteristic bricks, he wrote three little descriptions of different strains of Little People—those who live in straight lines, those who live in a circle and those who live in a spiral. This often quoted and much referred-to text I find somewhat too definite and clear in its delineation of the possible activities of the Little People. I prefer the enigma of not altogether knowing. When we look at Simonds's work, we are like archeologists on another planet, or maybe extraterrestrial archeologists here. One could easily imagine a complete misreading of an abandoned site of any human undertaking, particularly if it were overgrown, and we had not the habits of mind that we have.

Daniel Abadie, curator at the Centre Pompidou in Paris, wrote an essay in the Simonds catalogue, one paragraph of which sums up much of what Simonds is about:

> It was in order to obey the implicit dictates of the clay that Simonds's first constructions were of ritual places. He strove to transfer his intimate knowledge of the material to them; to make himself, in miniaturizing them, both their creator and witness. This remote possession is in fact identical to that obtained by the witch doctor from his doll: it tends to confer upon one who is at first a submissive participant, the powers of a high priest. Thus it is not without reason that Simonds has naturally reproduced the successive periods of Genesis: life created from dust, the peopling of a formerly deserted world—and this to the very point of creating a miniature cosmogony. Man forms the link between the infinitely great and the infinitely small, between the universe that surpasses him and that he masters.[5]

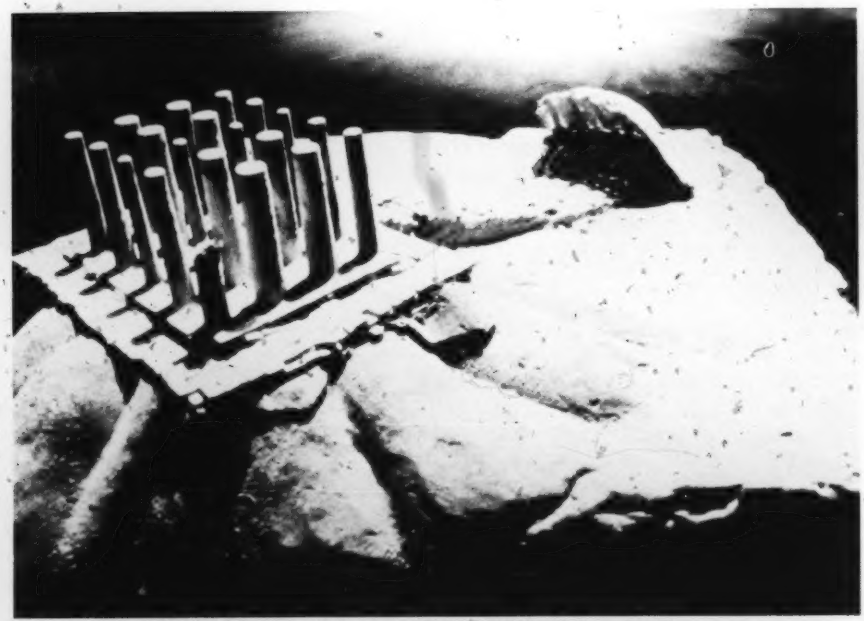
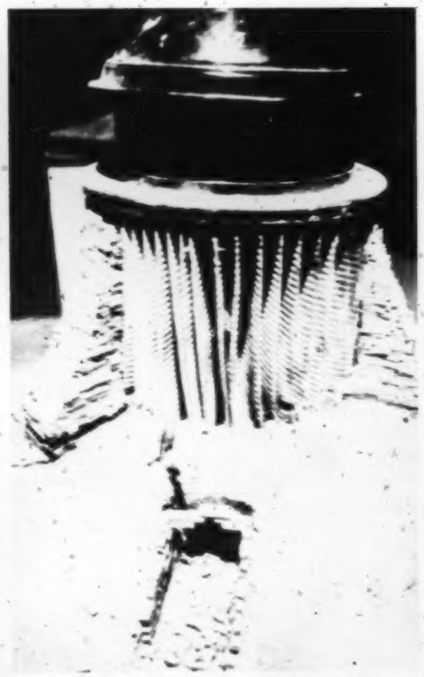
I think it is here, between the scales, between the layers of the mind, between the beginning and the end, between the barriers of species and genres, between the epic and the domestic, between the feminine and the masculine and between here and now that Simonds carries on his unique activities. I imagine that the Little People still have much to do, but Charles is developing what might be called his own work in other ways too. Although he has been asked to do it in situations that were for some reason unsuitable, he wants to continue with ideas for building life-sized dwellings. He started this in his Excavated and Inhabited Railway Tunnel made at Artpark, New York State's unique recreation area oriented to art in Lewiston on the Niagara River, during its first summer season in 1974. The following year, on an infertile toxic waste dump in the park, Simonds built a Growth House. Burlap bags of earth were seeded with flowers and vegetables; by the end of the summer, some of the resident artists were getting their food from this dike-like house.

In Banff, Alberta, this past spring, Simonds organized a long-planned event that might be called a housecleaning. Before arriving at the Walter Phillips Gallery at the Banff

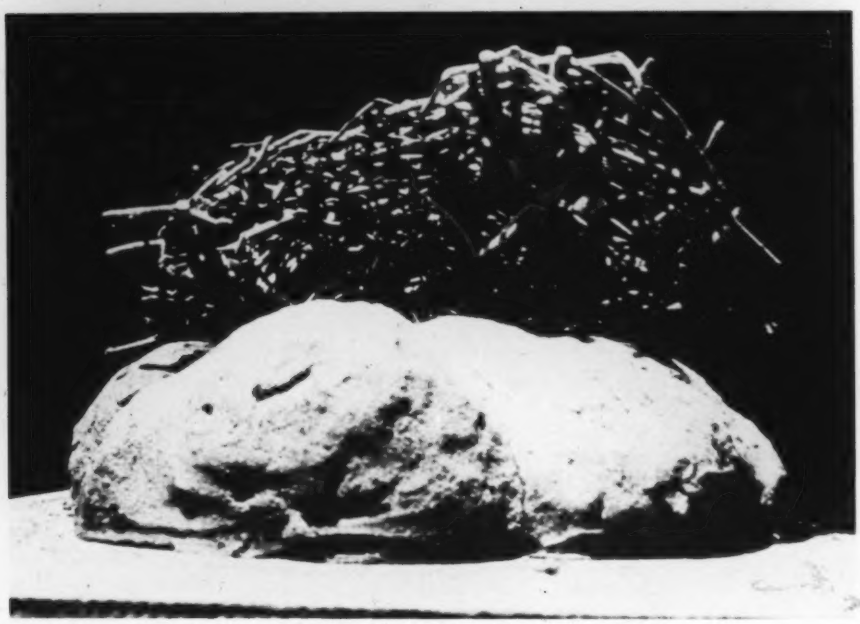
VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI



Untitled house, Feb. 26–Mar. 17, 1982, at the Walter Phillips Gallery, Banff.



Untitled house, 1982. Walter Phillips Gallery.



Untitled house, Feb. 26–Mar. 17, 1982, at the Walter Phillips Gallery, Banff.

Centre School of Fine Arts, Simonds had students collect and sort several grades of detritus—sand, earth, twigs, vines, leaves; foam rubber, fabric stocks, discarded manufactured goods; beer cans, baby carriages, auto parts. Placed in the gallery (which happened to be painted black), this junk was on one side of the space; on the other were 15 pedestals. For 15 days, Simonds skied in the morning and built a house out of junk (as well as his clay bricks and red dusts) in the afternoon. He said that he was surprised how long it took him to rid his mind of preconceived notions for "houses" as well as for "artworks" while he was engaged in this purge.

All the houses are different, and some of them are conceived as being for particular places. Simonds originally had the idea to do such a thing when building the street dwelling of the Little People ten years ago. He imagined another race of people who would come along and make places for themselves out of the trash that Simonds always had to clear away from the sites used by the Little People. The houses took him from the sites used by the Little People. The houses took him anywhere from all day to an hour or less to make. "It was conceived as a ritual, a kind of incantation," he says. By far his most ambitious ritual, however, and one that is still in embryonic form, is his description of futuristic dwellings on the oceans.

The original idea of the Floating Cities had to do with providing everybody with a fantasy landscape. This was ten years ago. If you wanted to live on a South Sea Island and I wanted to live in an English countryside we could construct different landscapes on barges or something, and if we no longer wanted to live together, we could float away. Much later I picked up the Times one day and I saw where shipbuilders in Japan were building these factories and floating them to Brazil. I then had this idea that if these things were tremendously evolved, you could shuffle factories and communities around on the ocean, parking them where they're needed. It's like property without location. It is also a toy for me to explore structural arrangements in society. One of them is a spiral of industry, administration, suburbia and farmland all attached together. It's also a way of making specious analogies between that and simple organisms—different parts corresponding to different kinds of cells. It's a kind of child's play, the same kind of activity as making a dwelling in the street.

Simonds acknowledges his early interests in Claes Oldenburg's early monumental projects and in the work of Yves Klein. He recalls with pleasure his relation with Robert Smithson, whose mind also ranged far beyond sculpture, and his friendship with Gordon Matta-Clark, an artist whose speciality was making fantastic holes in existing buildings. For several years he lived with Lucy Lippard, a writer and chronicler of various art styles, especially Conceptual art and feminist art. But I tend to agree with those who think that one's work is more or less genetically immanent in oneself, just as stone carvers used to believe that the forms they made inhered in the stone. These metaphysical problems are not germane here, but they arise because life has a metaphysical aspect and when you speak of Charles's work you have to consider everything. As someone who loves to go about the world, both looking at it and creating it, his remake of creation is human and comprehensive as well as mystical and strange. His is an epic that isn't finished yet. It is a vast thought to realize that everything of any kind is something that comes originally from the earth and will return to the earth in some form, however undegradable it is at the moment. For many years I have loved a few enigmatic sentences once written by André Gide which also inform this brief discussion of Charles Simonds:

I am torn by a conflict between the rules of morality and the rules of sincerity. Morality consists in substituting for the natural creature (the old Adam) a fiction that you prefer. But then you are no longer sincere. The old Adam is the sincere man; the old Adam is the poet. The new man, whom you prefer, is the artist. The artist must take the place of the poet. From the struggle between the two the work of art is born.[6]

1. The show opened at the Museum of Contemporary Art, Chicago, Nov. 6, 1981-Jan. 3, 1982; it went on to the Los Angeles County Museum of Art, Feb. 11-Mar. 21; Fort Worth Art Museum, Apr. 13-May 30; Contemporary Arts Museum, Houston, June 21-Aug. 15; Phoenix Art Museum, Aug. 25-Oct. 10; Brooks Memorial Art Gallery, Memphis, Dec. 4-Jan. 2, 1983. It is currently at the Joslyn Art Museum, Omaha, Jan. 15-Mar. 6, and comes to New York's Guggenheim Museum, Sept. 23-Oct. 30.

2. All italicized sections in this article are from a version of a conversation between Charles Simonds and Ted Castle on Nov. 20, 1981 in New York.

3. The Dwelling situated in the café wall at the Museum of Contemporary Art, Chicago, is the largest of the permanent constructions. Two "rivers" of clay meet, one flowing pink and one flowing yellow. At one time (1977) it was clearer that such colored clays referred to neutral (yellow) or female (pink) principles while the predominant gray of the bricks was regarded as male. The wall is used like a range of mountains; Simonds was interested in the fact that the wall concealed chimneys for a bakery formerly located in the building, and he punched holes through into these real archeological elements.

4. Gregory Bateson, Steps to an Ecology of Mind, New York, Chandler Publishers, 1972, p. 454.

5. Daniel Abadie, "Simonds: Life Built to Dream Dimensions," trans. by Terry Ann R. Neff, essay in Charles Simonds, Chicago, Museum of Contemporary Art, p. 32. This book gathers together all facets of the artist's work and contains particularly good color plates.

6. This quotation from Gide is here transcribed from my book Anticipation (unpublished, 1966). I believe it appeared in some of Gide's published journals, but I am unable to locate the reference.

Author: Ted Castle is a free-lance art critic and fiction writer.

Floating Cities Photomontage, 1978. Collection the artist.

VOL 71
ISS 2
FE 1983
UMI

Deep Space

Enlivened by a light-touch lyricism and a quiet but free-coursing subjectivity, Helen Lundeberg's paintings, seen in a recent retrospective of her work from 1935 through the present, sweep attention away from immediate fact and into a deeply private zone having no material or sensory correlatives.

BY PRUDENCE CARLSON

In the mid-1930s, ten years prior to the emergence of Abstract Expressionism, a tiny cadre of West Coast artists evolved a distinctly native—a sanguine, supremely clear-headed and incipiently Transcendentalist—response to European Surrealist painting. Dubbed "Post-Surrealism," this response snowballed, briefly, into a movement; it was parented and given its most signal articulation by the painters Lorser Feitelson and Helen Lundeberg (Feitelson's wife and former pupil). Californian Post-Surrealist painting still shared with Surrealism a fascination with tracking down the inmost, enigmatic and ever elusive springs of esthetic/intellectual apprehension. However, it coolly abjured many of the special devices belonging to the Surrealist arsenal: automatic gesture, inchoate subconscious "utterances," a pictorial space often claustrophobic or vertiginously warped, assemblies of incongruous symbols and forms, and the underlying stimulus of a very modern, very urban paranoia.

Instead, as defined in Feitelson's work of the '30s and in nearly all the paintings of Lundeberg's long career (her recent show was a retrospective sampling of works from 1935 through the present), Post-Surrealist art operates by a completely contrary set of practices and assumptions. It is marked, above all, by meticulous facture—by an extreme precision in rendering, intended to mask any trace of the artist's hand, which lends the painting a timeless, even oracular air. Aiming, too, at the poetic ideal of a perfect coincidence—a neat conflation—content and form, Feitelson's and Lundeberg's works are studies in an acutely conscious, at times almost supra-rationalist control; in their paintings, "symbols"—a shell, an archway, a spatial void—are chosen and deployed with exorbitant care so that they function as vehicles of faultlessly synchronized formal and metaphoric meanings. Unlike the Surrealists, Feitelson and Lundeberg thus found the mind's counterpart not in discordancies or in "process," but in a measured, classicizing esthetic order. In Lundeberg's paintings, this order may take the form of an architectural space composed of close-valued planes of color and complicated by an illusionistic play of sudden depths and of lights, reflections, shadows. She also causes it to unfold in eerie, dream-clear landscapes—visions of an abstracted "natural" world that is vast, desolately unpeopled, but always inviting and quickened by an immanent, supervisory intelligence.

Helen Lundeberg:* Grey Interior III, *1979, acrylic on canvas, 60 by 50 inches. Collection the artist.

Feitelson's work drifted rapidly—as did Abstract Expressionist art a decade later—toward an ever more stringent formalism, and eventually issued into Californian Hard-Edge ("abstract classicist") painting. Similarly, in Lundeberg's paintings, a stark or superficially ultrasimple geometric order emerges out of a very intricately, if intuitively, structured composition. The dominant geometry may be static, experienced as inexorable, and lead back to a puzzle of tight-locked angular shapes; or it may invoke a slow wavelike motion, set up a hypnotic, almost visceral tug-and-pull across a painting's surface—as in Lundeberg's Summer Tide (1967), Reclining Landscape (1968) and Icarus Bay (1970), works that are built of a few recurring, undulatory, elastic forms. Usually, though, for Lundeberg, a painting's composition takes as its starting point a clean bisection of the canvas into left- and right-hand halves; this division inaugurates a sophisticated formal counterpoint founded on subtle arrangements of functionally "modular" shapes and on delicate progressions of the artist's signatory desert-pale colors.

Yet, for all this formalist acumen, Lundeberg's motive concerns have never been basically abstractionist. Even those works most closely verging on pure abstraction—like the early, pivotal A Quiet Place (1950) or Sunny Corridor (1959), Estuary (1960) and Landscape: Grey and Pink (1979)—incorporate imaginatively distilled architectural or organic forms and Helen Lundeberg:* The Shell, *1950–1951, oil on canvas, 30 by 36 inches.

The Wind that Blew the Sky Away, 1951, oil on canvas, 36 by 56 inches. All paintings reproduced here were in the retrospective of Lundeberg's work, Oct. 20–Dec. 4, 1982, at the Graham Gallery, New York.

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

Desert Light, 1964, oil on canvas, 36 inches square.

allude to far-receding, finally fathomless, spaces. Lundeberg's paintings revel in the paradoxes attendant upon depicting spatial illusion—here, an illusion not simply of physical volume but of engulfing emptiness—within a two-dimensional field. Further, despite her work's cerebral bias, it is enlivened by a light-touch lyricism and a quiet but free-coursing subjectivity. Each of her paintings is, in a sense, like a well-carpentered Jacob's Ladder, a flawlessly designed—thus plausible and compelling—instrument for conveying thought stepwise both outward and inward: for sweeping attention away from immediate fact (the canvas's edges and surface, the artist's own painstaking activity of composing colors and forms, the mere visual images of a vacant landscape, lonely object or narrow light-striped corridor) into a deeply private zone having no material/sensory correlatives. The ultimate content of Lundeberg's works is an open-ended—a "cosmic"—space of metaphysical and mystical ponderings.

The split or two-part structure of so many of Lundeberg's paintings introduces a scheme of deft switchbacks—a kind of novel dialecticism—meant to elicit a chain of contraries stretching toward the philosophical: object vs. image, concreteness vs. incorporeality, a transcendent reality vs. a "Plato's Cave" of figments and mirages. These contraries are communicated through other oppositions: Lundeberg's smoothly coupling a pictorial depiction of shifting depths to an abstract composition of planar forms, her countering dusky intimate spaces with disquietingly illimitable ones, and her lightly alternating between the "verity" of day, direct vision, blanching sunlight, and that "other reality" of night, mirrors, the artist's easel. In two very fine '50s works, The Shell and The Road, the paintings' left-hand halves fillip easily back-and-forth between literal surface and soft-shadowed interiors comprised of rectilinear panels of color; their right halves let onto preternaturally vivid landscapes that race toward a horizon set at infinity. The fantastical "landscape" sections—one with a bold branching road and one with tapering fish-shaped clouds echoed in a conch at the painting's middle—register as more tangible, more stubbornly "real," than those left-hand sections which hinge upon formalist devices and persistently hug the canvas's surface.

Arches #4, 1962, oil on canvas, 50 inches square.

In overview, Lundeberg's paintings bear witness to a rare consistency in artistic intent and means. They disclose an unbroken preference for calculation and for pristine order over accident and vagueness. Apparent, too, are the artist's abiding absorptions with arrested or visionary time, with both proximate and immense "outer" spaces, and with imaginary geometries posited as universal. Poetic spareness, an unearthly tranquility, an incessant oscillation between abstract and representational concerns—these traits have been continually at play in Lundeberg's work, from her well-known 1935 Double Portrait of the Artist in Time and her little de Chirico-esque landscapes of the early '40s, through her "Mirror" and "Planet" and "Arches" series of the following decades, up to the present. Lately (post-1975), a modified naturalism has reentered her work—a descriptive susceptibility that Lundeberg had assiduously sidestepped for nearly 30 years. Mist-blue fruits sit on a bare plain (Three Plums and a Pear, 1976); a mountain range, pallid as a retinal afterimage, appears in profile, framed by a window, a doorway, or positioned within an inset picture (Grey Interior III, 1979, and Studio Interior, 1980). These images, drained of substantiality and estranged from their customary or temporal contexts, have been rendered perfectly obedient to Lundeberg's purposes; they, too, are employed in vindication of her faith in the epiphanic powers of system, technical expertise and reason. This faith, now much in discountenance in contemporary painting, has not only made for the enigma of Lundeberg's work, but also lent that work its extraordinary poise and assurance. □

> Poetic spareness, unearthly calm, a perfect coincidence of content and form—these traits have been continually at play in Lundeberg's work.

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

American Romantic

Hovering between clarity and obscurity, between dreams and drama, Edwin Dickinson's images depict a private, fantastical universe. The author also finds in them a remarkable "tension between the elegiac and the erotic."

BY DONALD B. KUSPIT

Edwin Dickinson's pictures are confusing: they were made in this century, but they have the look of another world. This is part of their mystique—and their credibility. For the nostalgia that, today, pushes us towards traditionalism makes them, with their seemingly absurd attachment to the spirit if not exactly the letter of tradition, freshly topical. Tradition exists in the residue of ornate objects that Dickinson dwells on, almost as though they were—as they indeed sometimes are—sufficient unto themselves, and no mere context for his individuals. But an exaggerated sense of uniqueness on the part of his individuals, confirmed by their intense involution—inward glance—is also part of tradition. The heavy mood, the allegorical overtone, as if every object and person were the personification of some unnamable depth, indicates a despairing flair for a tradition of feeling experienced as inescapable, with its own laws of dramatic construction.

The wonder is that such a sense of tradition, which one would have thought bankrupt, does not issue in stillborn pictures. But this mix of histrionic grand manner and what can only be described as a retired subject matter—a subject matter that has seen better days—works: it even results in a curiously modern manner. That is, we experience its effect of absurdity as modern. There is an air of little theater, with its self-dramatizations mistaken for acting. Private little worlds are evoked—worlds which are not the microcosm of any larger world. This, I think, is what makes Dickinson's pictures even more of a riddle than they appear to be.

Lloyd Goodrich wrote that Dickinson "does not fit into any neat classification." From the start of his career he was "free from academic molds," even though he studied with the academic realist Charles Hawthorne. But Hawthorne gave him an eccentric sense of the grand tradition, and approved of that mixture of fantasy, naturalism and near-abstraction present, as Goodrich notes, in Dickinson's first self-portrait (1914).

Dickinson's is a very individual art, with no clearly distinct phases. Rather, a recurrent subject matter is treated with a variety of means, although, towards the end of his career, his style evens out, as it were, becoming a relatively consistent if idiosyncratic fusion of clear line and smoldering color. Dickinson himself noted the importance of El Greco's Burial of Count Orgaz—a religious fantasia of extremely flexible figures that add up to an unexpectedly taut structure—for his own work. As Goodrich notes, in Dickinson there is a strong sense of technical virtuosity—in the service of a desperate, defensive idealism.

Elaine de Kooning writes that Dickinson was included every year in the Abstract Expressionists' artist-juried show at the Stable Gallery in the early 1950s. Why would someone whose pictures made one "think of writers rather than painters, nineteenth century writers in particular—Edgar Allan Poe, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Ambrose Bierce, Stephen Crane"—be included? It is because Dickinson was, if not the quintessential American romantic, then a contemporary summing up, in pictorial form, of that personage's most substantial traits. He was a living fossil—a relief after the Social Realists, who tried to see America in tough-guy terms. And he confirmed the romanticism in Abstract Expressionism: the belief in a passionate determination of reality, including the reality of art. Moreover, there was in Dickinson a sense of incomplete release of passion. This came partly through his being bound to obsolete modes of representation, which was repressive in itself; but also, in good romantic fashion, he believed as much in the repression as in the expression of his passion. The two were inseparable for him, and constituted one convention—the sense of control, eager for an objective grip on reality, and the need for release, lending to a momentarily impulsive or unreflective treatment of reality. The result is that mix—to use the term in which John Ashbery described the little drawing Souvenirs of the Fossil Hunters (1927)—of straightforwardness and an "almost sinister strangeness."

There is always the sense of something uncanny—not yet fantastic, as in Burchfield—lurking in Dickinson's old houses, such as the one in Ashbery's drawing. It is this uncanniness, based on a sense of keeping one's distance from an object of passion (or an object, like a house, which is the residue of the passions of others), that gives Dickinson's pictures their air of being riddles to be deciphered. Typically, Dickinson invests heavily in his subject matter, as if seduced by it, but then he pushes it away by keeping it clearly before a detached eye. His themes stir powerful

Edwin Dickinson:* Self-Portrait, 1949, oil on canvas, 23 by 20⅛ inches. National Academy of Design.

Staircase, The Manse at Ulysses, 1928, pencil on paper, 10 by 7¾ inches. Collection Mr. and Mrs. Robert C. Graham.

Young Man's Tombstone, 1962, pencil on paper, 11 by 9½ inches. Collection Mr. and Mrs. Robert C. Graham.

The Skiff, the 85, 1942, oil on canvas, 15 by 18¼ inches. Collection Mr. and Mrs. H. Robert Samstag, New York.

Roses, 1939, pencil on paper, 10¾ by 12¾ inches. Collection Mrs. Robert M. Benjamin.

associations, but are also nothing but containers for visual form—for so many strata of light and dark.

More precisely, what one finds in Dickinson is a style which wavers from the light, even delicate touch of the drawings, to the sometimes very heavy touch of the paintings, as if moving around massive amounts of matter and stirring up lots of mud. There is also at times a deliberately mystifying alternation between clarity and obscurity, as if something was simultaneously in and out of focus—seen at once in its immediacy and through memory.

This has its parallel in Dickinson's typical mix of the erotic and elegiac. He often presents the object of desire, or objects which depict desire or seem to embody or reflect it, as if static, or inert, or dead—like a statue, a favorite Dickinson subject matter. Death disguised as immortal art keeps the object of desire at a distance from us—keeps it "objective." Dickinson's drawings of the statues of Cupid and Psyche, Metropolitan Museum of Art (1944), Olympia (1962), and a Lion (1964) show this neutralization—one might really say masking—of a dynamic subject matter by art or "death." The subject matter, already stilled into art by being made a statue, is further stilled by Dickinson's rendering—which at the same time, through its own dynamic handling, is restored to life—not real life, but emotional life. Through this handling the work of art, and the life experience it reflects and generalizes, becomes part of a personal allegory.

Dickinson in general has a sustained interest in allegorical objects, such as those accompanying Esther Sawyer (1931) and The Cello Player (1924-26). But here again the estheticization of death—epitomized perhaps in the Lycidas-like Young Man's Tombstone (1962)—or an inward stillness is at stake, both of which disguise what can only be regarded as a libidinous potential.

The sense of isolation and loss in these works evokes, paradoxically, through the boldly displayed artifacts, a tangential sense of fullness. The elegance of these objects also adds a muted touch of erotic appeal, which reflects back on the figure whose attributes they are. The artifacts are the figure's libidinous potential made articulate; they also embody the melancholy self-absorption that has made the figures themselves into statues. There is an atmosphere of mythology in the interplay of figure and artifact; the one easily changes into the other because of the magical simultaneity of their presence.

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

Stranded Brig, 1934, oil on canvas, 40 by 50 inches. Museum of Fine Arts, Springfield, Mass.

Dickinson tends to present human beings themselves as statues, or statue-like—they take on the impenetrability of objects. This appears in a number of portraits—Frances Dickinson (1936), a woman (1937), Carol Wolf (1942), Sandra Shaw (1947), David Daniels (1966), and especially in the portrait of his young wife, Frances Foley (1927). Presented as a sleeping beauty, i.e., in a death-like state—recall Poe's Lydia—she is in effect a life-size doll. The self-absorption of all these figures reminds us of similar types by Eakins, but these are blunter, less organic in their inner being. Their self-absorption is less a part of their becoming, of their expressing who they are. They are rather stuck in it, as in some sterile eternity. It is an inwardness from which there is no exit, and which is thus a form of arrested development. It is such an inwardness which seduces Dickinson, as a dubious expression of passion.

This self-absorption can become merely histrionic, an exercise in self-dramatization. Dickinson is obviously theatrical in many works, but in them he is still debating the tension between the elegiac and the erotic—treating this tension with a new recklessness, if not quite abandoning himself to it. This theatricality is perhaps most obvious in the extravagance and pretentiousness of Ruin at Daphne (1943-53), an idiosyncratic triumph of sorts which seems anticipated by the tumultuous Stranded Brig (1934). Both have a loosely "modernistic" manner, with a fragmentation that could be mistaken for Cubist and a sense of dissolved substance that could be mistaken for Futurist. Both dramatize dead worlds in an almost erotic way, the flashing crimson of the Daphne picture especially.

Dickinson's attraction to ruins, to relics of the past—for the emotion they can arouse and the experience that seems sedimented in them—surfaces in another way in his 1942 Self-Portrait in Uniform. The uniform is from the Civil War; the ornate form also clearly belongs to an earlier, grander era. Here, Dickinson searches out the artifacts of a lost heroic age in which he can bury himself. He playacts his own heroic possibilities in an age sceptical of heroes. In this way he faces, with Baudelaire, the problem of the heroism of modern life. But his answer is more sceptical than Baudelaire's: these days, Dickinson seems to imply, one is heroic only through art, whether by dressing up through it or through such mechanisms as what Dickinson called the "premier coup"—a spontaneous glance at reality, and a swift, direct transcription that recovers reality's immediacy.

Reality "taken" from a steep angle, as if off guard, can be freshly paradisiac. Especially the reality of nature, the last refuge for those in pursuit of the heroic or grand. Dickinson's landscapes—often seascapes—seem the one area in which he is finally free of his "deathmask." Yet even here, as stripped down as the landscapes tend to be, in a way that sometimes reminds one of Milton Avery, there is a sense of melancholy, stasis or quietude. Painted spontaneously throughout his life, often in a single sitting of two to four hours, the landscapes have a strangely muted vigor.

Ruin at Daphne, 1943-53, oil on canvas, 48 by 60¼ inches. Metropolitan Museum of Art.

Even in Dickinson's many music pictures—allegories that seem to synthesize the Keatsian belief in an unheard music (of the spheres), sweeter than any heard music, with Thoreau's command to march to a different drummer—there is an aura of dense quiet. No display of passionate ocean or passionate music can break the spell of this stillness, with its strange sobriety about life. This stillness is like the black veil in Hawthorne's story about the minister; or it is the mental space—the breathing space of reflection that seemed longer than it was—that Bierce's hanged man experienced, or the desperateness underneath Stephen Crane's reportorial veneer.

To me, the attempt to break through the stillness, to be passionately responsive despite its presence, is epitomized in Dickinson's use of an erotically quick crimson line to define the space between Frances Foley's slipper and foot. This quirky line, seemingly dashed off, breaks the somber tone of the picture, and shows us that if the self-absorbed—those dead to the world—cannot be aroused, those who behold them can be. Dickinson dares to touch, as if to awaken with a deliberately clumsy artistry, those who sleep contentedly in their own beauty, and so need nothing from art. It is such small but radical touches or "actions," bringing the artist back to self-recognition after his absorption in the model, that may have endeared Dickinson to the Abstract Expressionists. Their relation to him had to be sentimental, yet he, too, acts, if more tentatively than they, to overcome the inhibitions forced upon him by his subject matter—an always intractable, in a sense unreachable subject matter.

What we get in Dickinson is an early inkling, on the American scene, of the modern position at its most basic: the transfer of passion for a subject matter to passionate art-making—in general, the recognition that art is a profound statement about passion, about absence that can be filled only by one's own acts. The result may be, as in Dickinson's case, the dramatic idealization of one's subject matter—which means, paradoxically, that one must come to love it less, for such idealization reminds one that one cannot have a consummate relationship with it, which is why one views it in a detached way. ☐

"Edwin Dickinson: Draftsman/Painter," was organized by John H. Dobkin for the National Academy of Design, New York (Apr. 7–May 9, 1982); the show subsequently traveled to the Museum of Fine Arts, Springfield, Mass. (July 3–Aug. 15) and the Norton Gallery, West Palm Beach, Fla. (Sept. 10–Oct. 17). The accompanying catalogue includes essays by John Ashbery and Elaine de Kooning.

Author: Donald B. Kuspit is Distinguished University Professor at Rutgers University.

VOL
7
1
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

Winslow Homer: An October Day, 1889, watercolor, 14 by 19¾ inches. Sterling and Francine Clark Institute, Williamstown, Mass.

Hound and Hunter, 1892, watercolor on canvas, 14 by 19¾ inches. National Gallery of Art.

Mortal Themes: Winslow Homer

Focusing on recurrent allusions to death and hints of repressed sexuality, this psycho-biographical account of the emotional foundations of Winslow Homer's art discovers, beneath its sheer physical beauty, a profound psychological ambivalence.

BY HENRY ADAMS

The sheer visual beauty of Winslow Homer's paintings often leads us to overlook the dark themes which lie at the heart of his achievement. In the watercolor An October Day, for example, what first strikes us is the visionary beauty of the wilderness. The distant hillside seems almost on fire with autumn color, in brilliant copper and gold, scarlet and alizarin. In contrast with these heated tones, the lake in the foreground seems to possess a cooling wetness, at once serene and pure. It takes a moment to even notice the other elements in the picture—in the right foreground a swimming deer, and in the distance on the left a boy in a blue boat rowing after him. Yet it is these two elements which give a dramatic meaning to the scene and reveal Homer's fundamental expressive intentions.

At the time Homer made this painting, hunting in the Adirondacks often took a particularly cruel and sadistic form. Rather than shooting deer, it was common for hunters to use dogs to chase them into the water, and then, rowing after them, to hold their heads under water until they drowned.[1] This pursuit, which will soon prove fatal to the antlered buck depicted, is the subject of Homer's painting.

That Homer did, in fact, have the death of the deer in mind is suggested by another watercolor, Hound and Hunter, which was painted a few years later. Here we see what is, in essence, the next stage of the drama. The boy in the boat has overtaken the deer, gripped it by its antlers, and is straining, at the risk of capsizing his boat, to push the beast's head under water. His dog at the left is eagerly swimming towards the quarry to assist in the last moments of the kill. There are certain changes, of course, between these two pictures. In the second the landscape has been altered and the boat is not precisely the same. But on the deepest level, that of expressive intention, it is appropriate to think of these two watercolors as successive stages of a single event, like successive frames in a comic strip or a moving picture.

A similar instance of a painting by Winslow Homer whose meaning is not easily grasped at first glance is the wonderful watercolor of a Deer Drinking. Homer never applied watercolor more freshly and directly—as remains particularly apparent in this case, for the work has never been hung in direct sunlight, and consequently even the most fugitive pigments, such as the delicate cobalt blues, remain brilliant and unfaded. Again, the visual beauty of the piece makes us forget what it represents, and indeed, even when we examine the subject closely its ultimate significance is difficult to construe. Homer simply shows a deer, straddling a large fallen tree in order to drink from a mountain stream. We can deduce that the deer has probably heard some slight sound, as its white tail is lifted and it has directed its gaze directly towards us.

What Homer had in mind becomes quite clear when we look at the sequel to this image, the watercolor of The Fallen Deer, in which the deer lies sprawled dead. We can conclude, I think, that Deer Drinking shows the animal just before he is fired on by a hunter, and that the other painting shows the animal just after he has been shot. The first painting shows the moment immediately preceding death, and the second the moment after. Once again, the setting of the two images is not quite identical, but the similarities are striking enough so that I think it is justified to consider them as successive episodes in a single drama.[2]

So far I have considered watercolors, but Homer's tendency to explore the successive implications of an event occurs in his oil paintings as well. An example of this is his The Fog Warning, one of his most powerful depictions of man's struggle to wrest a living from the sea. In the foreground a Gloucester fisherman clad in oilskins rows his dory, in the stern of which he has thrown a huge halibut, a trophy of recent victory over the forces of nature. But this triumph, Homer suggests, is only a temporary one. For as the man rows toward the horizon a gray bank of fog sweeps towards him, moving, as is apparent from the shape of the clouds, from right to left. This threatens to cut the man off from his home ship, the schooner in the background on the right, which he must reach if he is to survive.[3]

VOL 71 1 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

The power of the painting resides in the tension between the effort of the fisherman to reach the schooner, and the power of the natural forces which are drawing him away from it. The ship, as we can tell from the set of its sails, is moving away from the dory, going from left to right. It will soon disappear over the horizon, for already its hull is no longer visible. The dory, on the other hand, is being pushed away from the schooner by the force of the waves. The swell in the foreground creates a mountainous slope, which seems about to slide the skiff down towards the viewer. Homer makes this sinister force, which is pushing the boat backwards, appear more powerful by showing the moment when the fisherman's oars, lifted out of the water, are suspended motionless between strokes. Men tire, Homer indicates, while the destructive forces of nature are relentless.

A rower, Homer had observed, must turn his back on his objective, and consequently it is difficult to steer a straight course. In fact, the man in the dory is slightly misdirected. The schooner in the distance is headed to the right, whereas the dory is pointed almost at right angles to it, to the left. The painting shows the moment in which the oarsman pauses to relocate his target, to realign his course, and to reassess his chances of survival. While this reorientation is essential, every moment of delay in the dory's movement may prove fatal, for the bank of fog which is moving down on the rower will not pause and will soon engulf him.

As with the watercolors discussed already, the catastrophe that Homer only hints at in an initial painting became the subject of a later work. In an oil of a few years later, Lost on the Grand Banks, Homer represented a dory threatened by an approaching fog with two terror-stricken men clutching at the rail, peering towards the shrouded horizon, and, we may guess, listening intently for some sound in the distance, as noises often carry with surprising clarity over the sea when there is fog. The image, once again, is not quite identical to the earlier work—here we have two men rather than one, and there is no fish in the stern. But in its essential narrative the painting is a continuation of The Fog Warning of a few years earlier.[4]

Death is the central theme of all these works. Their fascination lies in the surprising contrast between the beauty of the world Homer shows us, and the horrors which lurk beneath its surface. Each of these paintings, even the ones which at first seem merely exercises in color and composition, convey a narrative which must be understood in order to grasp the work's full meaning.

In a superficial sense Homer's subject matter changed throughout his career. In the early 1880s, for example, he made many paintings of the Gloucester fishing fleet, while in the 1890s he concentrated on hunting scenes in the Adirondacks. On a deeper level, however, once Homer reached artistic maturity his subject matter and his working method remained remarkably consistent. His paintings invariably form narrative cycles which repeat obsessively the progression from life to death. In addition, to a very great extent, Homer tended to make his paintings in the same sequence as the narrative he was depicting, starting with the more ordinary, less dramatic scenes, and gradually progressing toward a depiction of the tragic conclusion, the ultimate moment of death. One might say that he usually began with a straightforward and relatively documentary treatment of each new variety of subject matter, and then turned it in the direction of his personal obsessions. In all the examples cited so far, at least, the more catastrophic scene was the last to be executed.[5]

Homer's paintings invariably form narrative cycles which obsessively repeat the progression from life to death.

Oddly enough, there is little in Homer's early efforts which gives a presentiment of his later seriousness of intention. His early paintings, on the whole, are not much different from those of many other good American genre painters of this period, as is suggested by comparing Homer's Four-Leaf Clover of 1873 and Eastman Johnson's Hollyhocks of about the same date. Both are attractive paintings, bright in color and cheerful in theme, which have no deep psychological overtones, and are enlivened chiefly by the striking manipulation of the contrast between light and shade.[6]

Not long after he painted Four-Leaf Clover, however, in 1879, both Homer's work and his personality began to shift very dramatically. Early descriptions of Homer indicate that while he was rather reserved, he was fairly sociable and quite interested in pretty girls. Beginning in August 1879, however, when Homer was 43 years old, art magazines began to comment on his rudeness towards reporters and visitors, his secrecy about his whereabouts, and his particular hostility towards women.[7] In 1880 he spent the entire summer in self-imposed isolation on Ten Pound Island in Gloucester harbor, painting watercolors and seeing no one but a lighthouse keeper who brought him food. Then in 1881 he set off for England, where for the next two years he spent most of his time in a small fishing village, in almost complete seclusion. It was in these years that Homer turned away from painting schoolteachers, fashionably dressed females, and boys at play, and began to deal with the conflict between man and nature, particularly the hardships and dangers of man's struggle with the sea.[8]

The exact causes of this shift, both in the style of his work and in his mode of behavior, will probably never fully be known. There is some reason to believe that a woman played a role in it. In the 1870s Homer tended to spend his summers making watercolors, concentrating on a new motif each year—whether life at the seashore or the idyllic farmyard world of Houghton Farm. Throughout this period, however, one subject reappears year after year, a woman with reddish hair. Often this individual—for her features are quite distinctive—is shown in a somewhat petulant mood, as in the striking watercolor of a schoolteacher in the Ganz collection, and she was the model for the small oil Shall I Tell You Your Fortune?, which Homer kept throughout his life in his studio, and which seems to have had some sort of personal meaning for him. The identity of this woman, and the nature of her relationship with Homer, are not known, but it may be significant that she suddenly disappears from Homer's work in 1879, the year which marked the sudden alteration in his behavior.[9]

It would be farfetched, however, to suppose that the somber themes of Homer's mature work were based on a single romantic incident. While this woman may have been the immediate Deer Drinking, 1892, watercolor, 14 by 20 inches, Yale University Art Gallery.

The Fallen Deer, 1892, watercolor, 13 ¾ by 19 ¾ inches. Museum of Fine Arts, Boston.

VOL
71
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

The Fog Warning, 1885, oil on canvas, 30 by 48 inches. Museum of Fine Arts, Boston.

cause of a new seriousness of mood in Homer's art, his preoccupation with death must have had deeper roots in the formative experiences of his childhood. I have attempted so far to show that Homer's paintings should be interpreted as a series of narratives dealing with the transition from life to death. I would like now to propose that these narratives can be interpreted in psychological and particularly in Freudian terms, and that his paintings can be read as autobiographical documents.

Homer's numerous biographers never have attempted to use psychological methods to gain insight into his work. In fact, there has been only one investigation of this type, an essay by Thomas Hess, the well-known champion of the Abstract Expressionists.[10] Eager to debunk the popular reverence for Homer, Hess maintains that "strange beasts slouch beneath his nostalgic pastorals and manly posturings."[11] Struck that Homer's paintings show a world of weightless silhouettes, in which objects never come into real physical contact with each other, Hess argues that they reveal the artist's "dread of sexuality," and betray Homer's suppressed autoerotic and homosexual feelings.[12] The essence of Hess's thesis is expressed in the pun that Winslow was "Homer-sexual."

Unfortunately, the page-and-a-half that Hess devotes to his bold interpretations (which appeared as a review in New York magazine) is not sufficient to fully substantiate his arguments. His discussion of The Fox Hunt, the only painting he analyzes in detail, reveals both the virtues and the weaknesses of his method. Ostensibly this painting shows a swarm of crows, who are starving due to the severity of the winter, and who attack a fox, which is trapped and encumbered by deep snow. To Hess, the fox, whom he describes as "dapper, small, inquisitive, shrewd," stands for Winslow Homer himself, while the black birds represent "the nightmare of the flying penis."[13] The painting is thus an expression of Winslow Homer's repressed sexuality.

Like many attempts to uncover archetypal meaning, Hess's exegesis remains quite subjective; the associations on which his explanation depends seem to reflect his own personal interests and recent readings. Hess was evidently influenced by D.H. Lawrence's sexual melodrama The Fox, in which a fox who raids a chicken coop stands as a symbol of masculine, phallic aggression against women. Hess, however, while borrowing the sexual nature of Lawrence's symbolism, differs from him in that he places the fox in the passive role.[14] In associating the black crows with flying penises, Hess most probably had another source in mind, this time a visual one, Robert Motherwell's Elegy to the Spanish Republic, in which black, hanging shapes do indeed evoke penises. As Hess was thoroughly familiar with the art of Motherwell, this connection could have come quite naturally to him. He may even have been aware that Motherwell first expressed the phallic compositional elements of the "Elegy" series as an illustration for Harold Rosenberg's poem "The Bird for Every Bird."[15]

Lost on the Grand Banks, 1886, oil on canvas, 28 by

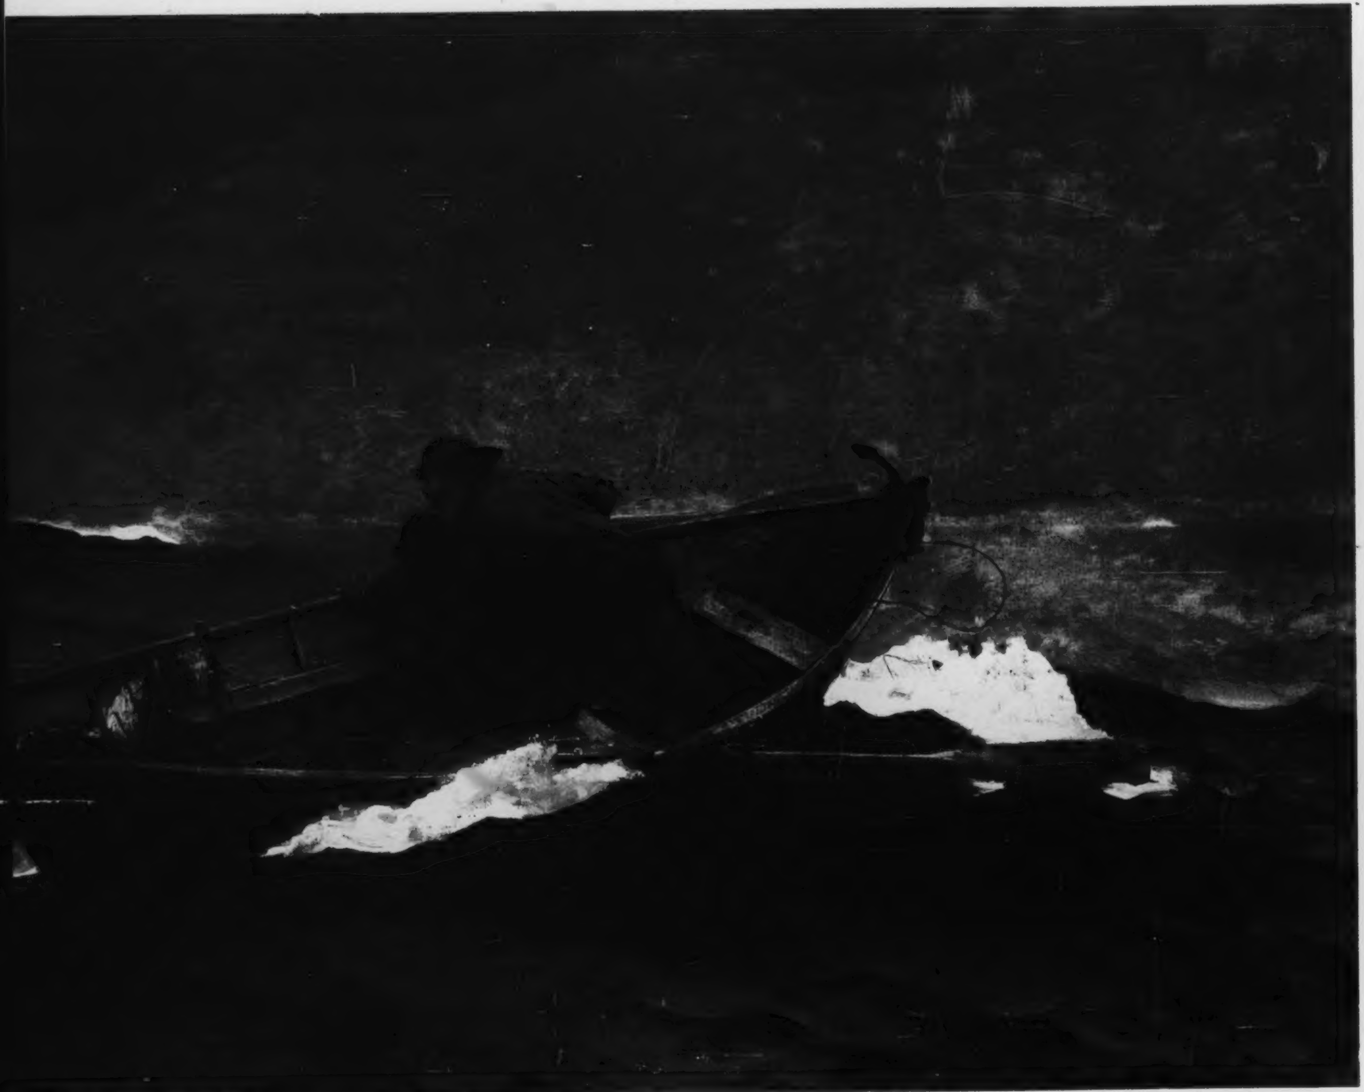
Of course, as with any retroactive Freudian reading, Hess tends to interpret Homer's paintings by means of sources and analogies which would have been unavailable to the artist, and which are extrinsic to his life and work. His interest in the underlying psychological impulses of Homer's work, however, does suggest a promising path of investigation, and indeed, I believe that to some extent his reading of Homer's psychological makeup is correct.

To be convincing, a psychological interpretation of Homer's art should be based on concrete biographical data and on direct relationships between his paintings and the specific events and emotional tensions of his life. In fact,



48 inches. Collection Mr. and Mrs. John S. Broome; photo courtesy Los Angeles County Museum.

Homer's life and art lend themselves readily to such an analysis. His relationships with his parents seem to have been unusually close and filled with emotional ambiguities. In addition, the four most ambitious works of his career, The Life Line, Undertow, The Gulf Stream and Right and Left can all be directly related to traumatic events that affected either his own life or his relationships with his parents.

As is the case with many men who do not marry, Homer had an impressive and overpowering mother, whom he adored, and a weak and largely absent father. His family situation, in short, fits a pattern often considered productive of homosexual tendencies.[16] Homer's biographers like to stress that he came from "good old New England stock," but in fact his parents came from very different social backgrounds.[17] His mother's family, the Bensons, were industrious, level-headed and prosperous, and, by the modest standards of New England society, were considered very high class. His mother's brother, for example, Arthur Benson, became head of the Brookline Gas and Electric Company, and died a multi-millionaire. The Homers, on the other hand, were impecunious, and tended constantly to change their residences and professions.[18]

Homer's mother was a gifted painter in watercolor, many of whose pictures of birds and flowers still survive.[19] These attest to her accuracy and sensitivity of observation, and to her considerable gift for composition. She often sent her work to professional art shows: in fact, early in Homer's career he and his mother often displayed their work in the same exhibitions.[20] One might conjecture that Homer's fondness for watercolor painting, the medium that he always handled most easily, was somehow connected with his mother's example.

As one of Winslow Homer's cousins once reported of him: "He got it all from his mother. She was always painting pictures."[21] In addition to her artistic gift, Homer's mother ably managed household affairs, and kept the family together during the long absences of her husband. Doris Homer has told me that Winslow always kept in his studio at Prout's Neck a picture of his mother, which he would place over his easel whenever a visitor came in, to prevent anyone from seeing the state of his work in progress.

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

Eastman Johnson: Hollyhocks, 1876, oil on canvas, 25 by 31 inches, New Britain (Conn.) Museum of American Art.

Homer: The Four-Leaf Clover, 1873, oil on canvas, 14 ¼ by 20 ⅜ inches. Detroit Institute of Arts.

Homer: Fox Hunt (detail; entire work below), 1893, oil on canvas, 38 by 68 inches. Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts.

Robert Motherwell: Elegy to the Spanish Republic XXXIV, 1953–54, 80 by 100 inches. Albright-Knox Art Gallery.

Homer's father, on the other hand, while full of pompous moral sentiments, was shiftless, and never did manage to hold down a steady job. During much of Homer's childhood he was away in California, trying to cash in on the Gold Rush, but he had no success. While he left New England with splendid brass-bound trunks, when he returned he carried his worldly goods in a little paper parcel tied with string.[22]

Homer's relationship with his father—who overpowered him in stature—was a deeply ambivalent one. Gilbert Gaul, who rented space in the building where, early in his career, Homer had his studio, once noted a sign on the artist's door that read "Coal Bin." On encountering Homer the next day he asked him what it meant. "Oh," Homer replied. "My father sent word that he was coming down yesterday, and I put up that sign so that he wouldn't find me."[23] Homer's attitude towards his father evidently hadn't changed 40 years later, for a few months prior to his father's death Winslow Homer wrote to his brother Charles: "I go to Prout's [Neck] tomorrow,—hope that father will go to Boston."[24]

Despite this desire to avoid his father, however, Homer spent most of his life in close proximity to him, for his father's house was only a stone's throw from Homer's studio. A group of satirical cartoons Homer drew of his father helps illuminate their strange relationship. One of these derides his reluctance to take a bath; another shows him as an autocrat shouting at his black servant to "plant those English split-peas in hills"; still another shows him as a "Prize Old Man," an attraction at the freak show section of a circus.

Homer's mature paintings were all executed in an atmosphere dominated by these formative relationships, for in 1883 when he returned from England and made the final move of his career, he settled in the isolated community of Prout's Neck on the coast of Maine, where his entire family—his parents and his two brothers—all owned property. At this time Homer evidently wished to forsake the city for good and to pursue his own work without distractions. But equally important, it appears that he wanted to reunite himself with his family—in fact to bring the entire family together for virtually the first time, as Homer's father had been away during most of his childhood. This desire to rejoin the family, however, was frustrated by forces beyond human control. For in 1884 Homer's mother, to whom, as we have seen, he had been unusually close, died in Brooklyn.[25]

Homer's move to Prout's Neck, and the death of his mother, which occurred at the same time, coincided with a tremendous burst of artistic activity, from 1883 to 1886. At this time Homer made his first large oil paintings of the marine subjects for which he is best remembered, including The Fog Warning and Lost On the Grand Banks. These two pictures are among Homer's most impressive works, but he himself seems to have worked harder over, and to have taken more seriously, his two large renditions of women being rescued, The Life Line and Undertow, which he also painted in this period.

Homer in his mid-40s, ca. 1880. Photo Bowdoin College Museum of Art.

Homer: Blackboard, 1877, 19 7/16 by 12 3/16 inches. Collection JoAnn and Julian Ganz, Jr.

The exact cause of Homer's shift, both in style and in behavior, will probably never be known, but there is some reason to believe that a woman played a role in it.

Writers have recognized for some time that The Life Line and Undertow both deal with sexual themes in a manner that suggests deep-rooted repressions.[26] The Life Line, by far the most ambitious work that Homer had attempted up to that time, and the first by Homer that the New York critics hailed as a masterpiece, was painted early in 1884, based on sketches Homer had made the previous summer in Atlantic City. Thus its creation exactly coincided with the final illness of Homer's mother, who died in April of that year.[27] The canvas depicts a dramatic and hazardous rescue from a shipwreck, in which an unconscious female is clasped by a robust male. She hangs suspended on a lifeline between on the one side jagged cliffs, and on the other a wrecked ship, which clearly, in such terrible surf, is destined soon to break apart. Her skirt and black stockings lay bare a small area of flesh, and on her left leg is revealed a reddish patch suggesting a bruise or stain.

The focus of attention is the woman's body, and a contemporary critic aptly noted that Homer had rendered the subject with "a sensuousness, a feeling for the physical beauty in a woman's form." This same writer, however, observed that Homer's treatment "will not shock the most decorous."[28] The whole purpose of the painting, in fact, seems to be to express erotic desire in a way which neutralizes its physical implications. The figures are elaborately bundled up in clothes, and in addition, they do not look at each other. Indeed, whereas Homer showed the man's face in his initial sketches, in the final painting he covered it up with the windblown scarf of the woman, as if, motivated by some strange modesty, he wished to render the embrace even more impersonal.[29]

Undertow, which Homer also began at the time of his mother's death, but could not complete until three years later, reveals his ambivalence about sexual themes even more strongly.[30] We see two female swimmers, either unconscious or dead, wrapped in an embrace as they are hauled out of the water by two muscular lifeguards. The implicit sexual message of the painting is once again effectively neutralized or made ambiguous. Here this occurs not so much because of the padding of clothes, as because the two swimmers are unconscious, are both of the same sex, and above all, because of the remarkable way in which the two males in the painting manage modestly to avert their eyes from the breasts and but-

VOL
7
1
ISS
2
FE 1983
UMI

Lewis, Put your fingers wet with cold water in the small of my back — That will "complete my full bath."
Lewis, plant those English split peas in hills.
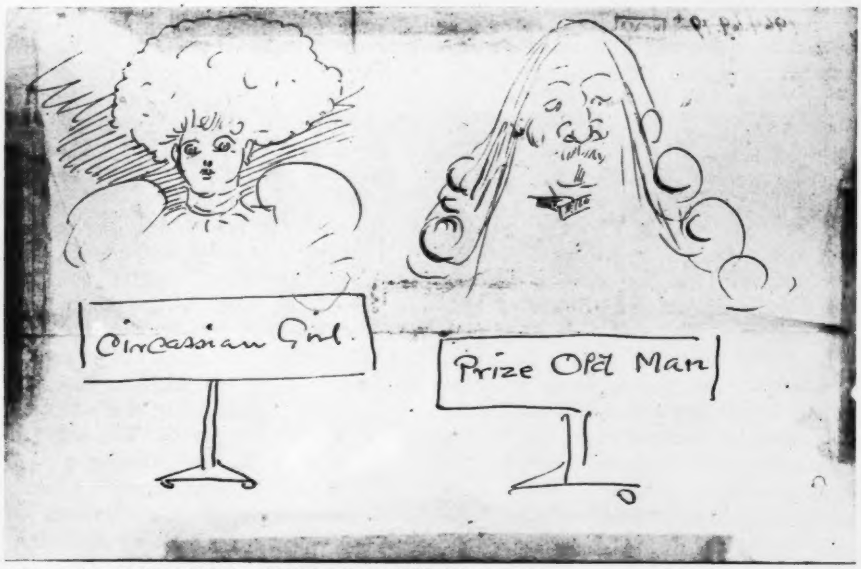
Perpetual Youth

Two sketches deriding Homer's father, ca. 1897, both ink on paper, 9 by 5 ¾ inches. Bowdoin College Museum of Art.



Circassian Girl
Prize Old Man

"Circassian Girl" and "Prize Old Man," ca. 1897, ink on paper, 5 ¾ by 8 ¾ inches. Bowdoin College Museum of Art.

tocks of the women they are rescuing, and to glance off in opposite directions. Even Homer's manner of painting conveys a strange sexual neutrality. The modeling of the figures suggests that they are made of porcelain rather than flesh and blood, and the sense of outline is so hard, the silhouettes of the shapes so independent, that the bodies seem to lose their physical weight and to float in relation to each other without truly touching.[31]

Both The Life Line and Undertow seem to have been inspired by the powerful emotions associated with the death of Homer's mother, and in Freudian terms both very directly express the underlying nature of his relationship with her. They can be interpreted as expressions of Homer's love for his mother, and of his desire to rescue her from an indifferent world and from death. In addition, they reveal the deep-rooted sexual ambivalence characteristic of close mother-son relationships, in which the desire to express affection physically must contend with the fear of incest. While perhaps not the most successful of Homer's works (for to a contemporary viewer they appear somewhat staged), they still, more than any others, reveal the inner conflicts of the artist's psyche. Indeed, these two rescue paintings seem to have dried up Homer's creative energies, for after completing Undertow he did not begin a single oil painting for over two years.[32] Not until 12 years later, shortly after his father's death, did Homer attempt another oil painting as ambitious.

Homer's father died in August 1898, at the age of 89. Shortly afterwards Homer wrote to a friend: "My time has been so taken up by overlooking father that I have not painted anything."[33] The sentence contains an error that would have fascinated Freud, for while Homer presumably intended to say, "look over," instead he wrote "overlook," which of course means "to neglect" or "to disregard." Certainly Homer's reaction to this important event seems rather casual. He departed for Nassau, which he had not visited for 14 years, and painted some of the most colorful and carefree watercolors of his career, such as A Wall and Flower Garden and Bungalow.[34]

These watercolors come as close to anything in Homer's oeuvre to being "pure painting"—that is, pure arrangements of color, composition and form that tell no story and draw no moral.[35] Evidently, however, darker emotions were simmering in Homer's psyche at this time, and I suspect a more profound reaction to his father's death, for shortly after returning from the Caribbean, Homer began work on his most narrative, lurid and melodramatic picture, The Gulf Stream.

Set in the aftermath of a hurricane, the painting shows a black man sprawled on the deck of his dismasted sloop, temporarily sustained by the sugar cane we see beside him, but threatened with eventual death from either thirst or starvation. In the foreground area, which separates us from the man, gaping sharks swim in a sea which is stained with tones of blood red.[36] In the right distance, marked by the line of the man's body, a waterspout bears down on the boat. On the horizon, towards which the severed bowsprit of the vessel points, there is no hint of land, and we can infer from the title of the painting that the boat is being pushed farther out to sea by the Gulf Stream. Thus the figure is threatened in three manners: by the sharks, which represent hostile animal life; by the waterspout, which typifies the impersonal destructive forces of nature; and by the empty sea itself, the inevitable doom which is brought to us simply by the passage of time. Will the poor man, the painting seems to ask, die from thirst, starvation, drowning, sunstroke, or from being eaten? Admittedly, he just might be rescued, for we see a full-rigged, three-masted ship on the horizon. But it shows no sign of stopping, and the black man's gaze is directed in the opposite direction.

No other painting by Homer is so heavily laden with narrative elements, and with such heavy-handed symbolism, and this dramatic burden has troubled many viewers. Barbara Novak, the highly regarded writer on American art, excludes the work from her canon of Homer's masterpieces; and at the time that Homer first exhibited it some people thought it was funny, including a critic who retitled it Smiling Sharks.[37] Homer himself, however, clearly took it quite seriously, and it appears on the artist's easel in the only known photograph to show Homer beside one of his own works.[38]

Despite his desire to avoid his father, Homer spent most of his life close to him. A group of satirical cartoons illuminates their strange, ambivalent relationship.

Along with The Life Line and Undertow, The Gulf Stream was Homer's most ambitious work, and like them it directly followed the death of a parent. It also can readily be interpreted in Freudian terms. After the death of his mother Homer composed pictures of men and women locked in embrace: after the death of his father he created an image of a solitary man, adrift in a dismasted boat, threatened on all sides by the forces of destruction. The rescue paintings seem to portray Homer's relationship with his mother; The Gulf Stream can be viewed as a classically Oedipal statement, an ambivalent form of revenge against his negligent father.[39] Homer had one more death to confront, his own, and I would like to propose that his last major painting, Right and Left, was the consequence of this confrontation.

The Gulf Stream marked a peak in Homer's career after which creative inspiration seems to have become more difficult for him. Significantly, it was in 1898, the year of his father's death, that Homer first began making threats that he would abandon painting altogether. Thus, when he was invited in that year to exhibit with the group of "Ten American Painters," he replied: "You do not realize it, but I am too old for this work and I have already decided to retire from business at the end of the season."[40]

Actually, he did not stop painting immediately, but his oil paintings gradually began to diminish in quantity and to deteriorate in quality. By 1905 the only oil painting he started was Shooting the Rapids, and atypically for Homer, this was not an original conception but a fairly literal repetition of a watercolor he had made three years earlier. Significantly, he was unable to complete it, and it stood unfinished on an easel in his studio until his death.[41] From 1905 until 1908 he produced no new work in oil, contenting himself with repainting an English oil that he had started more than 25 years before, with results which his biographer Lloyd Goodrich has described as "not especially happy."[42]

By this time Homer was declaring in his letters not that he was planning to abandon painting, but that he had actually done so. This, for example, was the substance of a brutal letter he wrote to Leila Mechlin, who wished to do an article about him for International Studio. "Dear Mister or Madam Leila Mechlin," Homer began—an opening that rather dramatically reveals his insecurity in dealing with forceful women. "Perhaps you think I am still painting and am interested in art. That is a mistake. I care nothing for art. I no longer paint. I do not wish to see my name in print again."[43] These comments were evidently motivated by more than Homer's fear of women, for he repeated the same points in a rather more friendly epistle to the Bostonian art critic William Howe Downes, who wanted material for a biography. "You may understand that I have given up painting for good," Homer wrote. "I have much to see and do in these few years, but pictures are out of it."[44]

About the time he composed this letter, in early summer of 1908, Homer suffered a paralytic stroke.[45] It would be reasonable to suppose that this new debilitation would have ended Homer's career as an artist, particularly as he was tired of painting anyway, but actually the opposite was the case. It seems, on the contrary, to have provided a new stimulus for work. In part Homer seems to have wished to demonstrate that he was as healthy as ever. In addition, there was a more profound motivation, his desire to come to terms with death, which for some time had been the chief theme of his work, and which now had a new immanence, a deeper and more personal meaning for him.

VOL 7 1 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

Shortly after his stroke he wrote to his brother Charles: "There is only one thing I do not understand about my recent illness, that is, that I cannot tie my neck tie in the way that I have done for the past 20 years. Every four or five days I try to do it, but as yet it has been no use trying."[46] A few days later he was writing: "I can tie my neck tie very well now and shall be able to shave very soon. I can paint as well as ever."[47] In spite of his infirmity he stayed on at Prout's Neck into the winter alone, and in early December he wrote to his brother: "I am painting, when it is light enough, on a most surprising picture."[48] Homer's letter suggests that he himself was somewhat baffled by what was taking shape upon his easel, and indeed the final painting, Right and Left, which he completed on Jan. 7, 1909, and which was his first oil in over three years, remains a thoroughly unsettling performance.[49]

Here we see duck hunting not from the standpoint of the hunter, but from that of the target and victim. The main elements in the picture are the flash of the hunter's shotgun in the distance, and the contrasting states of the two birds in the foreground, the falling motion of the one on the right which has just been shot, and the rising movement of the one on the left, which is shown in the fraction of a second—that tiny interval between the flash of a gun and the arrival of its bullet—which precedes its death. The arrangement of the birds is a daringly unstable one, based on the principles of asymmetrical balance that Homer's friend John La Farge had praised in Japanese art.[50] The equilibrium of gravities in the painting depends, quite literally, on the tiny white pinfeather that floats in the air on the right-hand side of the composition.

Homer's ill health, I believe, provided the motivation for this painting. I think we can interpret it as his attempt to come to terms with his own approaching death, which occurred a few months later. While he had often painted death before, this work stands as his most forceful rendition of it, both because of the strangely unbalanced composition, which powerfully expresses the irrationality of death, and because here, more than in any of his other representations, he pushed the face of death into the foreground, into direct proximity to the onlooker.

If Homer's rescue paintings portray his relationship with his mother, "The Gulf Stream" can be viewed as a classic Oedipal statement of revenge against a negligent father.

I have sought to demonstrate, in short, that Homer's paintings reflect deep-rooted psychological fears, and express narratives related to the immediate events and family traumas of his life. They reflect a conflict between the "masculine" and "feminine" sides of his personality—that is to say, between those sides of his character shaped by his love for his mother, and those affected by his ambivalence towards his father. Homer's works, I believe, deserve to be interpreted more extensively, using the techniques of Freudian analysis.

One final example, while a small and relatively modest work, may suggest the degree to which Homer's paintings could be interpreted not as literal but as symbolic statements. This is his very last oil painting, Driftwood. It was evidently intended as his final effort, for after executing it Homer smeared together his colors, and hung up his palette, like some battered war trophy, on the wall of his studio.[51]

The canvas shows a man in oilskins, active and resourceful, standing on surf-pounded rocks, holding a lariat with which to pull to land a bulky mast or spar, which hints of some wreck or catastrophe out to sea. The foreground is harshly colorful, with rocks of deep rosewood hues and waves of varied emerald shades. The distance, however, in which the water merges imperceptibly with the fog, is leaden, lifeless and gray. The figure stands companionless, except for the ocean and a lone seagull gliding overhead.

Clement Greenberg has suggested of Homer that "there was some unconscious connection for him (as for Poe) between the sea and sex."[52] Perhaps in addition the sea, in its dark boundlessness, stood for something still deeper than sex—the final fact of death. If so, then this painting is not simply a view of rocks and waves, but an expression of the immensity of death and of the courage and ingenuity of man. Indeed, here, I suspect, Homer created a symbolic autobiographical statement: the solitary artist poised at the outermost boundary of life, watching the wreckage wash ashore. □

---

1. Albert Ten Eyck Gardner, Winslow Homer, American Artist: His World and His Work, New York, 1961, p. 205. There is a detailed description of this process in William C. Prime's chapter on "Deer-Shooting" in I Go A-Fishing, New York, 1873, particularly pp. 133–135. Prime reports (p. 134) that nine out of ten deer that were killed in the Adirondacks died in this way.

2. The connection between these two watercolors was pointed out to me by Theodore E. Stebbins Jr., at the time that he purchased Deer Drinking for the Yale University Art Gallery.

3. Homer initially represented a pair of thole pins just to the right of the fisherman's elbow, but he painted these out to emphasize the relationship between the man and the schooner and fog bank in the right distance. This pentimento is visible even in reproductions. As a pair of thole pins is still visible on the left hand side of the boat, the change is illogical in naturalistic terms, but Homer clearly felt it was desirable for expressive reasons. Philip C. Beam in Winslow Homer at Prout's Neck, Boston, 1966, pp. 69–72, describes how Homer developed this painting from an earlier study of Halibut Fishing, enriching the narrative implications of the design. The study in question is now in the Bowdoin College Museum of Art, where it is not displayed, as its authenticity has wrongly been questioned.

4. The connection between the two paintings was noted by William Howe Downes in The Life and Works of Winslow Homer, Boston, 1911, p. 140.

5. The sequence of execution can firmly be established in the case of two of these pairs, in which the works were made in different years. An October Day was painted in 1889, Hound and Hunter in 1892; The Fog Warning is dated 1885, Lost On the Grand Banks 1886. Deer Drinking and The Fallen Deer are both dated 1892. However, the latter work is somewhat broader and more schematic in handling, in keeping with Homer's tendency to simplify his treatment in his later versions of a theme. Hound and Hunter served as the basis for an oil painting of the same title in the National Gallery of Art, Washington, D. C.

6. A few of Homer's early oil paintings touch on more serious themes, for example, The Morning Bell, probably of 1872, in the Yale University Art Gallery, which represents the encroachment of industrialism into a rural setting; and Waiting for Dad, 1873, owned by Paul Mellon, Upperville, Va., which ominously suggests that "Dad" won't be returning home from the sea to his family. These are exceptional works, however, and

The Gulf Stream, 1899, oil on canvas, 28 by 49 1/8 inches. Metropolitan Museum of Art.

The Life Line, 1884, oil on canvas, 28 3/4 by 44 5/8 inches. Philadelphia Museum of Art.

Homer's subjects grew more cheerful and frivolous in the later 1870s, a tendency epitomized by the Houghton Farm watercolors of 1878.

7. Lloyd Goodrich, Winslow Homer, New York, 1944, p. 73; Art Amateur, New York, August 1879, p. 50; Art Interchange, New York, Dec. 22, 1880, p. 119.

8. Goodrich, pp. 67, 76–80.

9. Ibid., pp. 56–57. Helen Cooper, curator of American paintings at the Yale University Art Gallery, pointed out the connection between the disappearance of this model and the new direction in Homer's work in a talk on "Winslow Homer's Gloucester Summer, 1880: Critical Explorations in Watercolor." This was delivered on May 5, 1979, at the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, as part of a symposium on "American Watercolors and Drawings."

10. Thomas B. Hess, "Come Back to the Raft Ag'in, Winslow Homer Honey," New York, June 11, 1973, pp. 75–76. This piece coincided with an exhibition of Homer's work at the Whitney Museum; Hess's title and many of the themes of his article were derived from Leslie Fiedler's essay "Come Back to the Raft Ag'in, Huck Honey!" in An End to Innocence, Boston, 1965, pp. 142–151.

11. Ibid.

12. Ibid.

13. Ibid.

14. D. H. Lawrence, The Ladybird, The Fox, The Captain's Doll, London, 1923. In addition, Hess refers in his essay to Lawrence's Studies in Classic American Fiction, New York, 1923.

15. For the background to a phallic interpretation of Motherwell's "Elegy" series see E. A. Carmean Jr., Eliza E. Rathbone and Thomas B. Hess, American Art at Mid-Century: The Subjects of the Artist, National Gallery of Art, Washington, 1978, pp. 95–122.

16. Sigmund Freud has written: "The primitive object-choice of the child, which is derived from his need of help, demands our further interest. It first attaches to all persons to whom he is accustomed, but soon these give way in favor of his parents. . . . The child takes both parents, and especially one, as an object of his erotic wishes. . . . The myth of King Oedipus, who kills his father and wins his mother as a wife, is only the slightly altered presentation of the infantile wish, rejected later by the opposing barriers of incest. . . . The genesis of male homosexuality in a large class of cases is as follows. A young man has been unusually long and intensely fixated upon his mother in the sense of the Oedipus complex. But at last, after the end of his puberty, the time comes for exchanging the mother for some other sexual object. Things take a sudden turn: the young man does not abandon his mother, but

VOL
7
1
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

Undertow, 1886, oil on canvas, 29 ¾ by 47 ⅝ inches. Sterling and Francine Clark Institute, Williamstown, Mass.

Winslow Homer
1886

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

Right and Left, 1909, oil on canvas, 28 ¼ by 48 ⅜ inches. National Gallery of Art.

identifies himself with her; he transforms himself into her, and now looks about for objects which can replace his ego for him, and on which he can bestow such love and care as he has experienced from his mother." (A General Selection from the Works of Sigmund Freud, New York, 1957, pp. 28, 186).

17. Downes, p. 21.

18. Goodrich, p. 2; Beam, pp. 38–40; Gordon Hendricks, The Life and Work of Winslow Homer, New York, 1979, p. 96.

19. Some of these are reproduced in Hendricks, pp. 14–15; Beam, p. 37; and James Thomas Flexner, The World of Winslow Homer, 1836–1910, New York, 1966, p. 28.

20. Goodrich, p. 2.

21. Ibid., p. 3.

22. Downes, p. 23. Sigmund Freud has noted that "the disappearance of a strong father in childhood not infrequently favors the inversions [i.e., homosexuality]." (The Basic Writings of Sigmund Freud, New York, 1938, p. 561).

23. Goodrich, p. 74.

24. Hendricks, p. 237.

25. Goodrich, p. 83. Sigmund Freud has commented that: "It is unavoidable and quite normal that the child should make his parents the objects of his first object choice. But his libido must not remain fixed on these first chosen objects, but must take them merely as a prototype and transfer from these to other persons in the time of definite object-choice. The breaking-loose of the child from his parents is thus a problem impossible to escape if the social virtue of the young individual is not to be impaired." (Freud, 1957, p. 29).

26. Goodrich, p. 87; Hess, p. 75.

27. Goodrich, p. 86, 214. According to John W. Beatty, when Homer sold the painting to Catherine Lorillard, he immediately rushed to his mother's bedside to tell her.

28. The New York Times, Apr. 5, 1884.

29. Goodrich, p. 87. The significance of the blowing scarf was noted by Mrs. Schuyler Van Rensselaer in Six Portraits, Boston, 1894, p. 99.

30. Goodrich, pp. 94–96.

31. Hess, p. 75.

32. Goodrich, p. 118.

33. Ibid., p. 153.

34. Goodrich, p. 158; Hendricks, pp. 239, 244.

35. Goodrich, p. 158; Joshua C. Taylor, The Fine Arts in America, Chicago, 1979, pp. 102–103.

36. It is difficult to determine exactly what these streaks of red are intended to represent. They do not seem to indicate blood, for they are found not only in the foreground but in the middle distance to the right. Perhaps they are intended to suggest uprooted kelp. In many other pictures also, however, Homer's use of red is rather arbitrary. His fondness for it may partly have been due to its importance in the color balance of his paintings. In addition, it seems to have had an expressive value, as a signifier of implicit violence.

37. Barbara Novak, American Painting in the Nineteenth Century, New York, 1969, p. 187; Beam, p. 170.

38. Downes, p. 20. Goodrich, p. 162, notes that Homer made watercolors which suggest the main outlines of this painting some 14 years earlier, in 1885. Thus the image was latent in Homer's mind, but was not "released" until after his father's death.

39. Downes, p. 133, pointed out the similarities between The Gulf Stream and The Life Line which set them apart from the artist's other works. A variant of the interpretation I have given would be to see the figure in the boat not as Homer's father but as the artist himself, and to view the painting not as a form of revenge but as an expression of Winslow's own sense of loss and abandonment in childhood. I am not sure, however, that it is necessary to choose between these two readings: at the emotional level they reinforce one another.

40. Goodrich, p. 154. Jules Prown, in American Painting from Its Beginning to the Armory Show, New York, 1970, vol. 1, p. 90, has noted that "Gulf Stream apparently drained Homer of what he had to say. . . ."

41. Goodrich, pp. 184–185.

42. Ibid., pp. 186, 189.

43. Ibid., p. 188. Philip Beame has observed to me that Homer tended to be extremely courteous to those women, such as his brother Charles's wife Mattie, who were feminine and proper in their manners, but that he was often rude to women who exhibited aggressive or masculine qualities.

44. Goodrich, p. 197.

45. Ibid., p. 196.

46. Hendricks, p. 266.

47. Beam, pp. 246, 247.

48. Ibid., p. 247.

49. Ibid., p. 248.

50. John La Farge, "Japanese Art," in Raphael Pumpelly's Across America and Asia, New York, 1870, p. 197. The composition of Homer's painting was apparently based on Audubon's print of the American Golden-Eye Duck, reproduced in John James Audubon, The Birds of America, New York, 1937, plate 342.

51. Beame, p. 254.

52. Clement Greenberg, Art and Culture, Boston, 1961, p. 186.

Author: Henry Adams is curator at the Carnegie Institute in Pittsburgh.

MERCE CUNNINGHAM

DANCE COMPANY

CITY CENTER
NEW YORK CITY
15-27 MARCH BOX OFFICE: 212/246.8989

VOL
71
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

G. LANZI

ARTE
FIERA

BOLOGNA
(ITALY)
MARCH 5/8
TRADE-FAIRS
QUARTER

83

INTERNA-TIONAL FAIR OF CONTEM-PORARY
ART

Review of Exhibitions

NEW YORK

Dorothea Rockburne at Fourcade

Since 1981, Dorothea Rockburne has been at work on "The Way of Angels," a series of brilliantly colored paintings on vellum that she has folded with her usual rigor and subtlety. Inspiration came from Fra Angelico's Linaiuoli Tabernacle at the convent of San Marco in Florence, and if Rockburne's angels do not have the gentle innocence of the "angelic monk," they do have a beatific beauty. The boundless flux of luminous color seems to belong to some region of rapture and sky; it is both enhanced and held in check by the strict geometry of the folds. Color and shape that one expects to be purely abstract turn out, on close inspection, to be symbolic: in Guardian Angel II a protective figure is barely discernible in the geometry, for example, and in Seraphim: Love, an uninflected orange square made up of two softly volumetric triangles that don't quite meet can be read as a metaphor for love's openness (and perhaps also for the female sex). Elsewhere in the series, blue stands for sky, mottled orange represents fire, a slit of light shining through a beam of gold is dawn, projecting angles evoke the heraldic presence of an archangel's wings.

Given the fact that the source for this series was a tabernacle, rather than simply the abstract notion of angels, it is not surprising that Rockburne's paintings are churchly in feeling. Full of gold and velvety color, they are as sumptuous and refined as ecclesiastical robes; the folds' august geometry even hints at the mysterious, ritualistic movements of priestly raiments. Because the vellum (which suggests the parchment used in illuminated manuscripts) is painted on both sides with different hues of watercolor, the works have a silky, shimmering effect that alternately brings to mind church columns of polychrome marble or the celestial light that often surrounds holy apparitions in 15th-century Italian painting.

Dorothea Rockburne: Guardian Angel #2, 1982, watercolor on vellum, 77 by 42 inches; at Xavier Fourcade.

Compared to the ascetic paleness of much of Rockburne's earlier work, and especially the white "Egyptian Paintings" and "White Angels" she showed last year, this blaze of color is dazzling and daring. For the most part, it is effective, too. If we accept the visionary mode in which Rockburne employs it, her color may provide a moment of transport and revery. One imagines the rustle of wings as a host of angels takes to the sky, sun shining on and through feathers and silk, all swiftly vanishing into ether. But the paintings can trigger a more skeptical reaction as well, since today angels don't exert quite the same power over the human imagination as they did during the Renaissance. Spiritual premises questioned, the viewer plunges like Icarus, and with that descent, more philistine associations spring to mind—tie-dye fabric, origami, and the like. Does "The Way of Angels" rise to the spiritual realm to which it aspires? I don't think so, really, but even as fallen angels, Rockburne's paintings do rise to considerable esthetic heights, which for some can be a substitute for heaven. —Hayden Herrera

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

Patsy Norvell and Robert Zakanitch at Janis

This collaborative exhibition was a preview of a show at the Norton Gallery of Art, West Palm Beach, Jan. 8–Feb. 13. Such a collaboration between two artists is rare enough, rarer still when they are also partners in a fairly new marriage. This project involved a great deal of give-and-take. Zakanitch and Norvell started with a set of constants—the particular spaces at the Norton Gallery and the fact that Zakanitch works in paint on canvas and Norvell in etched and blasted glass. But it was their common use of floral and foliate motifs that gave unity to the project.

Essentially, the collaboration was a series of responses from each artist to parts made by the other. For example, Zakanitch made the painted center of Lady in Waiting and then Norvell designed the glass side panels. In Morning Vanities the process was reversed: Norvell made the glass center and Zakanitch added the painted wings and a mirror in the center to double and intensify the etched images of the flowers.

The most complex interaction occurs in the largest piece, Towards the Forest, designed for a 24-by 34-foot room at the Norton Gallery. Zakanitch saw it as a wall piece, Norvell as an enclosure. It ended up as both—which is only natural given that his history is with painting, hers with outdoor structures including fences and pathways. (Indeed, they described their interaction this way: he was trying to get her work up on to the wall while she was trying to get his out into space.)

In Toward the Forest a curving walkway of glass panels leads back from a tall panel of etched leaves and flowers to a huge painting that looms up like a tidal wave. (The arabesque of painted blossoms along the top seems like foam.) The painting is dark and heavily worked—Zakanitch used a broom to push paint in dynamic diagonals into its central area—and yet for all its weighty presence, it never overpowers Norvell's glass panels.

Patsy Norvell and Robert Zakanitch: Toward the Forest, 1982, Liquitex, oil paint and etched glass, 24 by 11 by 20 feet; at Sidney Janis.

Komar and Melamid: The Tempest—Collective Farm Workers with Prize Bull, 1981-82, oil on canvas, 72 by 55 inches; at Ronald Feldman.

In other pieces the brilliance of the glass and the precision of the etched images sometimes outshine the painted passages, making them look earthbound and light-absorbent. In these works the glass seems more overtly decorative than the paint. More often, however, the uneasy, exhilarating interaction between paint and glass extends the possibility of decoration in art. One of the shortcomings of some Pattern-and-Decoration works is that they please too easily. This collaboration offers a tougher situation. Here, the fact that the parts don't easily rhyme make us work harder to resolve them—which in turn gives the whole project a more active tension, a more enduring resonance. —Paul Brach

Komar and Melamid at Ronald Feldman

Stalin once said that Soviet culture should be national in form and socialist in content. In the early '70s in Moscow Komar and Melamid began making their satiric "Soviet" art in the gaps between such crude formulations. Historical styles have been the artists' wild cards and they have played them to the hilt. More recently they have painted classical portraits of dinosaurs (Ancestral Portraits, 1979) and a life-size portrait of Hitler (1981). According to their curious reasoning, these works lead to the 11 "Socialist Realist" canvases in their recent show. (The show also included a large portrait of Reagan as a centaur and a number of earlier works.) A satiric take on world and art-world affairs is certainly present in these new paintings, but the irony goes far beyond simple one-liners or parodies of Socialist Realism to touch on contemporary issues of authenticity and authority in painting, and the relationship of art to political power.

Executed in a manner approximating academic realism, the paintings gleam with the dark hues associated with hallowed museums and academies. And they are rife with art-historical appropriations and references (e.g., the drapery from Caravaggio's Death of a Virgin in The Tempest . . . Collective Farmworkers with Prize Bull); they also contain bits and pieces borrowed from well-known Socialist Realist paintings of the Stalinist period. However, these works are in no sense collages. Rather, they constitute a critically paradoxical, humorous vision of a past (Russia in Stalin's heyday, the artists' childhood) whose official cultural face was itself a nostalgic pastiche of lost—or never attained—grandeur. The actual political reality of that period is a constant presence that both intensifies the paintings' irony and tempers their humorous facade.

In some paintings a specifically Russian cultural unconscious appears to be playing jokes on its own heritage, while in others the broader reserves of Western European tradition are addressed. In Bolsheviks Returning Home After a Demonstration, a gas lantern illuminates an almost surrealistic scene in de La Tour fashion. A man kneels on the snow next to an empty vodka bottle and another stands holding a huge red banner. Their hands are splayed in melodramatic surprise as they behold a small "green dragon"—a Russian metaphor for the hallucinations of a drunken stupor, and a frequent iconographic emblem for the evils of capitalism. In View of the Kremlin in a Romantic Landscape, a red curtain is held open by unseen hands to reveal a Poussinesque landscape complete with ruins and the Kremlin floating like a fairy-tale castle on an island in an azure sea. (The painting once bore the tentative title of "View of the Kremlin from Central Park.") Finally, in The Tempest . . . Komar and Melamid parody Socialist Realism's rhetorical populism, most often manifested in the purely symbolic presence of workers as representatives of "the people" involved in various "heroic" everyday tasks. Here, three collective farmworkers dressed in the traditional white jackets escort their prize bull inside away from an impending storm. The grandeur of their surroundings evokes the kitschy, pompous mouments to Soviet labor and agriculture built in the 1930s and destroyed after the Thaw.

Milton Avery: Gaspé-Pink Sky, 1940, oil on canvas, 32 by 44 inches, collection Mr. and Mrs. Samuel H. Lindenbaum; at Whitney Museum.

Lucy Sallick: Reid State Park Looking Left, 1982, acrylic on canvas, 46 by 65 inches; at G.W. Einstein (review on p. 135).

Edward Schmidt: Departure, 1981-82, 40 by 50 inches; at Schoelkopf (review on p. 132).

In the most enigmatic of the paintings, I Saw Stalin Once When I Was a Child, we glimpse Stalin, half in shadow, peering out the back window of a car. The proportions are distorted as though seen through the telescoped scale of childhood memory; Stalin seems larger than the car which recedes into the dark, bleak ground of the past. If in Stalin and the Muses Stalin is an unattainable god, the great leader who holds the book of history in his hand and dwells gloriously in mythological caricature, then here his presence is disturbingly real. The painting forcefully conveys yearning for the indistinct yet familiar contours of the past, even its tyrannical side.

Socialist Realism was never quite like Komar and Melamid's version of it, of course, but in its most classical, ostentatious moments it strove to emulate the grand scale and manner of 19th-century history painting. Komar and Melamid's paintings can thus be read as a contemporary cautionary fable. Nostalgia—its authoritarian uses—is their subject, and it is presented here as a wily strategist adept at stylization and, like politicians, quite fond of rewriting history as it sees fit.

—Jamey Gambrell

Milton Avery at the Whitney

The commonest misapprehensions of Avery's art are that it is merely decorative and that he is somehow "between" realism and abstraction. The first may result partially from the fact that he is the most difficult of artists to reproduce adequately, so finely calibrated are the correspondences of color and texture in his best work. The second is frequently reiterated by writers who seek to explain Avery's limited recognition over the years; but many of these writers seem themselves to have wondered how, having come to the brink of abstraction in his late work, he could not have relinquished, once and for all, the naturalism that is central to his entire oeuvre. To consider him as an abstractionist manqué, however, is to disregard what is essential to his work. His particular genius lay in his ability to transcribe his experience unmediated by rationalizations of any sort, to find equivalent forms, colors and surfaces that "get it" exactly, and to do so through his characteristically offhand inventions.

To see an Avery landscape or seascape is to experience not a decorative surface but the exhilaration of entering the particular space, light, climate and character of a place. To speak of him, therefore, as bridging "the gap between realist and abstract art," as Barbara Haskell does in her catalogue essay, is somewhat misleading (though her monograph is generally insightful and indispensable for its biographical revelations). Avery is not between one thing and another, located in some network of historical or stylistic conceptions. It is easy enough to position him within such a network—in a moment from across the room or from a reproduction—and be done with it. But Avery's peculiar manner of working should provide the opposite inducement: to forget your mental systems of coordinates and "get" each painting in its singular grasp of reality. There is a sort of American Zen at work here, akin to the poetry of William Carlos Williams, with its unpredictable rhythms and directness: "When over the flowery, sharp pasture's / edge, unseen, the salt ocean / lifts its form . . ."

I am referring here to Avery at his best, from the Gaspé watercolors of the late '30s and '40s through the late, large oils. He was prolific and uneven in a way typical of many American artists and writers who pursue their natural inclinations rather than develop critical acuity. It is precisely when he seems to be consciously designing and playing on the art of others (principally Matisse) that he falters. This awkwardness occurs in many, though by no means all, of his figure compositions; indeed, one speaks of "compositions" in a way one would not in referring to the landscapes. I associate his shift in approach with an occasionally evident ambivalence in his feelings toward women as subject matter. He does not achieve that harmonious, erotic sublimation, the classicism of Matisse, but, instead, a psychological distancing, sometimes alienated in feeling, sometimes sentimental. Those Mexican paintings of the '40s seem wrong on all counts with their hot, synthetic colors. (By contrast, his sense of northern light, in all seasons and times of day, is unerring.)

The exhibition as a whole had its problems of selection and installation. A more ample and coherent presentation of the early work would have shown the shift from realist to anecdotal to perceptual concerns. The placement of the self-portrait series in the basement made it difficult to integrate these highly charged images into a conception of the artist's overall development. And Avery would have made a better overall showing had certain of those lightweight, New Yorker-ish items been excluded and a fuller representation of his drawings and prints, especially the monotypes, been substituted. But the gratifications of this long-awaited exhibition far outweighed these complaints. —Robert Berlind

Idelle Weber: Boulangerie, 1982, oil on linen, 88 by 59 inches; at O.K. Harris.

Raymond Han: Still Life, 1980-81, oil on canvas, 48 by 52 inches; at Schoelkopf.

Edward Schmidt at Schoelkopf

"With the waning of modernism, painters who paint pictures of the real world are back in favor." This pronouncement—only the ignorant or the insane could have made it—was not made by critic Mark Stevens in his much-discussed piece on realism in Newsweek, June 7, 1982, but by an anonymous editor in a punchy subhead which accompanied the text. One wonders where this editor, who so blithely cuts through the Gordian knot, would place Edward Schmidt, who sees the real world as allegory.

Schmidt, a recent winner of a Rome Prize Fellowship long ago reacted against Abstract Expressionism, and is today a classicist, and, as Stendhal once pointed out, a true classicist is one who feels romantically. Even when ostensibly depicting scenes from the real world, as in such small masterpieces as the two landscapes View from Bouccaven and View from Anduz—both almost certainly painted in the open air—it is a Virgilian dream world he perceives through the glimmering light. In these two, as well as in most of the larger paintings, Schmidt offers nature framed, an ideal invention richly clad in the clothes of imagination and romance.

Although Figures in a Forest, one of the more successful of the larger works, is a scene inhabited by stock 17th-century figures, in stock 17th-century poses, there is really nothing stock about the painting as whole. It is like a 19th-century Italian opera about a Bucolic Age existing in some fervently imagined elsewhere. The picture is abrim with a quiet lyricism. Trees, figures, rising foreground, foliage, sky patches, clouds, all have abstract shapes which pull together in a unified surface. Destruction of a City, on the other hand, features figures theatrically attitudinizing in a setting of ruined though improbable architecture complete with billowing clouds of smoke, and the result borders on parody. Here the composition becomes bewilderingly complex, almost as though he had taken a special course in composition with André Lhote.

In one important sense Schmidt is a modernist. He understands, intuitively perhaps, that paint itself is a kind of subject. By leaving his paintings in an advanced ébauché condition, rather than polishing them into slumber (as the great American classicist of another generation, Kenyon Cox, would have done), he preserves the vitality of the surface. He has stated that he has difficulty in adapting his admirable sketches and studies (a number were included with the show) to his larger paintings, but this may well be a strength, in fact—encouraging him to paint the large paintings as sketches, directly, immediately.

As for realism and the alleged waning of modernism, Schmidt successfully avoids what Ruskin in Volume I of Modern Painters called that "dangerous realism which makes the imagination languid." —Lawrence Campbell

Raymond Han at Schoelkopf

On the first encounter, Raymond Han's still lifes may not seem terrifically exciting. Colors range, basically, from tones of gray to tones of silver and white; the style is highly naturalistic, and, in every painting, household objects—pitchers, crockery, bowls, plates, cups and silver—sit unassumingly atop a tablecloth-covered table. Indeed, the similarity of objects within each painting, and the similarity between paintings, can be distressingly monotonous.

Then again, since when—in recent days, at least—has still life been a particularly exciting genre? In the work of Audrey Flack, perhaps, but her success is due mostly to the manic vulgarity of her various vanitas. Jane Freilicher heightens the tone of her still lifes by placing compositions against city or country windows; somehow the flowers and vases themselves wouldn't be enough. Janet Fish has made a sizable career of still life, but only by introducing bountiful color and a variety of light-struck objects—mason jars, liquor bottles, Depressionware glass—into her giant-size canvases. William Bailey turns monotony into a virtue, placing items of crockery together on a bare wooden table to produce paintings that are almost philosophical in their quietism.

Still life of the past isn't terribly involving, either. Trompe l'oeil—from Pieter Aertsen to Peto—is a little too materialistic and hokey to be anything but momentarily riveting. Even Chardin, probably the greatest of all still-life painters, depended heavily on homely virtues for his effects. It would seem that still life was somehow at its most exciting in the very earliest years of its development, when the van Eycks and the Master of Flémalle were incorporating groups of objects into their devotional paintings, infusing the scene with disguised symbolism—and with the implication that what you see isn't necessarily what you get.

And it is something of this same disguised symbolism that—despite the surface monotony of the work—provides the interior light to Han's paintings at their best. The van Eycks, of course, were referring to religious realities with their symbols; we moderns have no unquestioned religious realities to refer to, and Han, like William Bailey, is hard pressed to assign any more meaning to his objects than is apparent. But Han's paintings do, on analysis, seem to refer to some suprasensible world beyond appearances; he arrives at this "symbolism" through a technique of displacement. Among his objects, nothing matches: ceramic pitchers are placed with glass bowls, Delftware with crockery, and lace napkins with humble white tablecloths. But that's not the only unexpected touch: in Still Life with Rose Geranium Sprig, an otherwise fairly standard setting is unbalanced by the geranium sprig itself—why not the flower?—and a half-used matchbox lying open on the table. Still Life with Marble Vase again features standard Han pitchers and bowls, but this time the scene is upset by an urnlike red marble vase that leers gently out of the canvas, a somehow erotic note amidst all the crockery. Still Life with Peonies has a burnt-out wooden match on the tablecloth and, for some reason, a shot glass.

Stephen Antonakos: (clockwise) Neon on Purple Painting; Nine Foot Box with White Light, Untitled #25; at Nassau County Museum of Fine Art (review on p. 140).

Irving Penn: Composition with Pitcher and Eau de Cologne, 1979, platinum-palladium photograph, 11½ by 19¼ inches, at Marlborough (see review on p. 139).

The objects here are not so much posed as disposed; something meaningful, perhaps involving the humans who use the objects pictured, lurks under the surface. It is as if, for Han, those things passing through the human world, however casually, remain permanently infused with its aura. Indeed, Han's canvases evidence a yearning for meaning, for evidence of the otherworldly—or at least the psychological—in the worldly. In a day of auteur still life, Han's conservative but spiritual exercises are refreshing—not exciting, perhaps, but nobly intriguing. —Gerrit Henry

Idelle Weber at O.K. Harris

When Weber left the realm of Pop art ten years ago for the world of Photo-Realism, she concentrated on standard Photo-Realist subjects like fruitstands and storefronts; in the second half of the decade she focused on urban trash sites. In this show, Weber displayed her latest subject—the human figure, set in architectural and/or landscaped settings.

Her real interest, however, continues to be a careful rendering of light and color. From the bright, urban sunlight of New York Weber has turned to the more pastel light of the Caribbean and southern California. After her very close up, almost flat portraits of city detritus, she opened up her painting to several kinds of space, technically outdoors but usually defined and bordered, such as terraces, balconies and sidewalks cafés. Weber flexes her illusionist muscles, ranging in most compositions from nearby surfaces to distant horizons. Her palette has broadened accordingly, capturing the golden pink often perceived in southern sunlight, and her brushwork has followed suit, moving from a tight, seamless facture to a slightly freer, more painterly style.

Obviously delighting in tropical foliage, Weber grants it equal importance with her figures in every painting. Her fascination with greenery and light is most apparent in Boulangerie, 1982, a vertical painting of a scene at an outdoor restaurant in Venice, California, its space moving away from the viewer from lower left to upper right. To emphasize this diagonal and provide some sense of spatial depth, Weber depicts a path of foliage leading from flowers in the lower left corner, to a planter across the center of the picture and finally to a ficus tree against the rear wall that climbs up and out of the painting at the top. The two diners are posed parallel to this sinuous trail of boisterously colored plant life and appear to sit in niches formed by it.

In all of these new works Weber's hand is evident, thus qualifying somewhat the almost photographic anonymity of her earlier work. For this reason, perhaps, these paintings seem somewhat transitional. That she has broken with her more urban and photo-dependent work is clear. Weber has just begun to strike out into new territory. —Ellen Lubell

Jonathan Santlofer at Pam Adler

In his great essay, "The School of Giorgione," Walter Pater remarks: "Each art may be observed to pass into the condition of some other art, not indeed to supply the place of each other, but reciprocally to lend each other new forces." Among Jonathan Santlof-

VOL
7
1
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

FA FABRIANO

FOR THE FINEST PRINTMAKING PAPER, ETCH THIS NAME INTO YOUR MEMORY.

If you want to make prints that make a lasting impression, you need papers that stand the test of time.

The kind of papers they've been making at the Fabriano mills in Italy for 700 years—now available in North America from Grumbacher.

The artisans at Fabriano create their finest printmaking papers today the same way they did for Albrecht Dürer: one sheet at a time.

Whether you require a highly textured surface or a smoother surface, flat white or subtle shades, you get papers of exceptional beauty and dimensional stability.

Papers with the strength to stand repeated printing pressures and a neutral pH to face the years without yellowing.

There are Fabriano handmade and mould-made papers for every type of printmaking: drawings, etching, stone lithography, silkscreen, woodcuts, and embossing.

Ask to see these exquisite papers. Examine them closely. Get the "feel" of Fabriano. You'll never settle for anything less.

Ask for: Umbria, Murillo, Tiepolo, Rosaspina

TM

FABRIANO IMPORTED PAPERS FROM GRUMBACHER

Ask your local artists' material dealers for these products, or write:
M. GRUMBACHER, INC. 460 West 34th Street, New York, N.Y. 10001. In Canada: M. GRUMBACHER (CANADA) Inc. 460 Finchdene Square, Scarborough Ontario M1X 1C4

er's new paintings, three are called Duet after Merce Cunningham's dance, Duets, and the inspiration of dance fills these works with dynamic energy.

In the Cunningham piece, six pas de deux are rapidly executed. The balletic technique essential to the choreography lends each duet its tableau—the abstract aspect of the dancers' forms caught, then turned quickly with fluid invention. The figures become, in T. S. Eliot's words, "the still point of the turning world"—a visual statement framed by stillness but vivified by the possibility of motion. In each of his "Duet" paintings, Santlofer has joined two canvases, shaped to evoke abstract, swirling forms. Thus he recreates the gestural silhouette of a dance tableau, filling his own tableau with undulating, painted volumes. Deep hues of red and blue and golden orange are shaded to give these works the body of moving cloth whose folds occasionally include a trompe l'oeil shadow that presses them forward into the world. Even the rhythm evoked by the brief, rough brushstrokes calls up the pounding drums that accompany Cunningham's dance.

Yet despite the evident inspiration of Cunningham, Santlofer has dealt with his tradition in his own fashion. Cunningham, in the wake of Martha Graham's expressionistic phrasing, introduced into his work vernacular movement and gesture, which, though highly structured in his choreography, allowed him to create dances that qualify the drama of expressionism with irony. Santlofer, on the other hand, has moved toward expressionism. In his earlier paintings (made of two or several canvases), he conformed to the conventional angularity of the rectangle, investigating Cubist space, interspersing geometric forms with curves. Later, these curves came to predominate, and now in his new works, the painterly surface of rhythmic strokes, the high coloration, and the almost bodily sense of movement recall certain aspects of German Expressionism—as if Santlofer's forms were abstract versions of Franz Marc's lushly painted animals.

It comes as no surprise that Santlofer calls his 12 new paintings "organisms." They are organic as his earlier images were architectural, moving with dynamic fluidity as once his sudden shifts of depth spoke of angle, wall and precipice. In the abstractness of his "Duet" series we witness the Expressionist belief that the "inner life" can be thrust outward into visibility, the immanent energy of spirit made dramatically apparent. It seems a brief step from the abstract to the figurative, but Santlofer, with his specific reference to dance and his intriguing use of an amorphic expressionism, is able to work well in the tense space in between. —Steven Henry Madoff

Lucy Sallick at G.W. Einstein

Lucy Sallick's show proved a good occasion for posing the question: what's the state of the brushstroke in current painterly-realist art? In Sallick's case—as with many other young painterly realists like Don Perlis, Marcia Clark, Adele Alsop and Michael Eisenman—the golden mean seems to be the rule. Neither totally given over to gestural expression nor totally devoid of inflection, Sallick's use of the brush strikes a balance between hedonism and puritanism. This doesn't make for a radical art, but it certainly makes for an intriguing one.

Sallick's style calls up a line by poet John Ashbery: "A kind of fence-sitting raised to the level of an aesthetic ideal." In Reid State Park, Looking Left, moss, sand, rocks, sandbars and water are all aptly delineated, the pearl blue of the bay merging almost imperceptibly with the gray of the sky. The stroke is calm, even, only minimally gestural. Sallick is not a colorist: a hint of carmine in the black rocks of Shelter Island, Maine, a handsome tan sandbar in the distance in Half-Tide, Reid State Park, even the broadly purple water in Coming Storm, Montsweag Bay, Maine, all are read as accents within an allover, rather monochromatic field rather than strictly coloristic statements.

Only in one painting does Sallick go all out: Squam Creek, Winter, Maine. The painting evokes a sunny winter chill, with background firs and foreground snowbanks and glistening icy blue waters all painted with neat, slightly frenzied conviction. Here the stroke is noticeably more vivid than in other canvases; Sallick's painterly zeal has somehow been fired by the cold.

In almost every other case, Sallick's brushstroke exudes what can only be called calm ambivalence. Emotive her canvases are not; expressive—isn't ambivalence a feeling?—they are. And it is this very indecision, this "fence-sitting," that makes her art work. For it seems Sallick has chosen to doubt, through her rather neutral stroke, the very act of painting nature (a sentiment she shares, to greater and lesser degrees, with many of her painterly realist peers). Out of that doubt, in her best works, emerges a picture of nature—and implicitly, of human nature—that is yielding yet firm, Jonathan Santlofer: Duet I, 1982, oil on canvas, 81 by 82 inches; at Pam Adler.

Robert Reed: San Romano, Hip Strut, 1982, acrylic on canvas, 47 1/4 by 59 1/4 inches; at Mona Berman (review on p. 140).

VOL
7
1

ISS
2

F E

1983

UMI

Alkyd Colours? We wrote the book.

Winsor & Newton devoted over twenty years to the research and development of alkyd colours before introducing them to the U.S.A. in 1977. The results of this painstaking effort? Winsor & Newton Artists' Alkyd Colours and London Alkyd Colours. Both highly durable, versatile and brilliant colours that offer you all the advantages of oils, without the disadvantages.

Although compatible with oils, alkyds dry much faster, so you can overpaint with them in just a few hours. They're completely dry to the touch in 24 hours and you can apply final varnish in just 30 days. Thanks to their alkyd resins, they're highly resistant to cracking and yellowing, as well.

Our unique alkyds, while not compatible with acrylics, offer advantages over this popular medium, too. Because they don't dry as quickly, you have more latitude for changing and more time for subtle blending of colours.

Yes, we wrote the book on this exciting new medium. Now Wendon Blake has written Painting in Alkyd, the definitive 96-page, soft cover book on the techniques of painting with alkyds. Illustrated in full color, it provides step-by-step demonstrations of alkyd techniques; explains how to mix alkyd colours and mediums; how to create special effects and more.

Ask for Painting in Alkyd wherever Winsor & Newton artists' materials are sold. Find out for yourself how this extraordinary new medium has revolutionized the working methods of many artists and opened exciting new vistas for creative expression.

WINSOR & NEWTON
1832 150th ANNIVERSARY 1982

Time and expense aren't our main concern. Quality is.

Winsor & Newton Inc., 555 Winsor
Drive, Secaucus, New Jersey 07094.

PAINTING IN ALKYD
ALKYD
alkyd colour
LONDON

pliant but resilient, and sometimes beautiful. Sallick shows that expression can come from the mind too, striking an esthetic balance impossible to pure feeling, on the one hand, and to mere recording on the other. Hers is truly a happy medium. —Gerrit Henry

Debra McCall: Hoop Dance, from Oskar Schlemmer's "Bauhaus Dances," performance at Ethnic Folk Arts/The Kitchen. Photo Craig Massey.

Joe Neill: Expansion Model: Elliptical State, 1982, wood, paper and painted plastics, 17 1/2 by 43 by 14 1/2 inches; at Vanderwoude Tananbaum.

"Bauhaus Dances" at Ethnic Folk Arts Center

Amid a plethora of dance and theatrical reconstructions, New York's Kitchen Center has now given us a smartly executed performance of Oskar Schlemmer's "Bauhaus Dances." As reconstructed and staged by Debra McCall with the advice of Andreas Weininger, a former student and performer in Schlemmer's theater course at the Bauhaus, these productions show once again that the history of contemporary dance is best understood from the vantage point of modernist art-making—and not, as partisans of the dance so often suggest, as part of a much more localized and detached history of the dance.

Originally performed from 1926 through 1929, Schlemmer's dances, imbued with a sense of abstraction and metaphysics, seem to have grown with time in a way that works such as Kandinsky's Yellow Sound and Meyerhold's Magnanimous Cuckold (both recently reconstructed by the Guggenheim Museum) have not. One factor protecting this exemplary production from the threat of anachronism is the simplicity and elegance of Schlemmer's choreography and costumes. Performed inside a replica of Schlemmer's austere black-box theater at the Bauhaus, McCall's stagings not only left this simplicity intact but also enhanced the acutely visual, graphic use of cubic space central to Schlemmer's desire to join the mechanics of movement in space with the metaphysical pathos of the human condition. To this end, lighting was kept to a minimum: the softly spotlighted dancers took on a reflective, iridescent glow against the black curtained walls. Even Schlemmer's bowllike, trademark masks enhanced the illusion of contemporaneity, while lending the dancers anonymity.

Figure In Space, a study for one dancer dressed in white, is a carefully metered walk on lines drawn on the floor, dramatizing the architectural dynamics of the space. Space Dance furthers this very literal personalization of surface area by utilizing three characters—one dressed in red (solemn and mundane), another in yellow (funny and fast) and the third in black (mystical and slow)—to invest the space with personality. Gesture Dance experiments with characterization by giving each of the performers emotionally charged tasks: laughter, gossip, anger and shame are all mimed within the confines of the preset structure. Block Dance shows the more conventionally theatrical, comic side of Schlemmer's choreography.

The most interesting dances were those that emphasized the transformation of abstract line and shape into figuration. Form Dance comes to life as different-colored dancers construct tableaux with silver and gold spheres and long poles. The slightest plié turns two-dimensional objects into a total reordering of three-dimensional space. Remarkably, the figures holding these objects seem to dissolve inside this totalized volume. The famous solo Pole Dance is performed by a dancer with long sticks attached to his limbs; those sticks connect the geometry of the figure with the mathematics of space. As in Hoop Dance, where a radiantly lit series of hoops is placed in different configurations around the dancer (sometimes resembling a peacock or a Spanish dancer), the impulse to transform visual abstractions into their mechanical or functional equivalents becomes hard to resist. Here, the utopianism of Bauhaus functionalism—which, ironically, Schlemmer aimed to resist—creeps into the work. The ominous clinking of gears distracts from the feeling for the miraculous which Schlemmer hankered for.

In reconstruction, however, Schlemmer's dances cannot be reduced to mere abstractions. The functional Bauhaus esthetic imposes a scheme of integration (one writer has called it a "calculus of signs") which is countered in Schlemmer's dances by the emphasis on the Kunstfigur (art figure): a human able to release himself from the confines of his physical and mechanical bondage.

Significantly, Schlemmer was forced to leave the Bauhaus in 1931 due to increasing opposition to his nonpolitical theater of abstraction, gesture and form. —Craig Bromberg

Joe Neill at Vanderwoude Tananbaum

In the early '70s Neill's large wood sculptures conformed to the Minimalist esthetic of the single, graspable image; the twist was that they also suggested functional objects like tables and ladders. Around 1977 his art became more Conceptual: in his "Road Pieces" Neill moved away from forms related to familiar objects to structures that resembled models. Made of wood and metal, these pieces combined six-inch sections of "track" in a way that recalled long, circuitous toy racecourses. Later, his pieces became airborne and involuted, resembling models of unknown galaxies.

In his latest work Neill has continued to work this whimsical vein of sculpture in wall pieces and works suspended by wire from the ceiling. The ceiling pieces (about three feet in circumference) are made of strips of plywood glued together so as to resemble bouquets of flowers; plastic semispheres (about the size of baseballs and painted greenish blue) appear at the top like bulbs.

Other readings are possible too. These works suggest fountains, torches, and even new-born worlds—this last association evoked by painted plywood excrescences reminiscent of the relief of topographical globes. But here an ambiguity exists: is this a playful idealization of the world buffeted by gentle winds, or a vision of nuclear demise?

The wall pieces are even more elusive than the ceiling works; more complex in surface and form, they are also more personal. Made of plywood, paper and plastic, and painted gray and orange-red, these two-foot-high elliptical forms project about a foot from the wall. A number of small spheres painted in brown, blue and green patterns are attached to these forms, onto which Neill has also glued cut sections of graph paper. The composite effect is of a bizarre geometry that has somehow taken flight.

Clearly, with this work Neill has achieved a fanciful type of sculptural expression that is unique to him. —John Yau

Mark Tansey at Borgenicht

Like many artists of his generation, Mark Tansey appropriates images from the popular press, specifically, from illustrated magazines of the 1950s—the decade of his childhood and, not coincidentally, of the "triumph" of American abstract art. Not coincidentally, because in Tansey's work media-derived imagery is used to signify the devices of modernist abstraction. His is an allegorical art in which the "high" culture of the '50s and early '60s is represented through "popular" culture of the period—not in order to synthesize the two, but to point to our distance from the history that produced both. For, however fashionable it may recently have become, the kind of imagery Tansey appropriates is clearly out of date, and in his paintings this obsolescence is imputed, by association, to the painterly strategies it is made to represent.

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

Mark Tansey: A Short History of Modern Painting, 1982, oil on canvas, 58 by 120 inches; at Grace Borgenicht.

Unlike other appropriators, Tansey weaves together images drawn from disparate sources so that they appear to depict seamless, entirely plausible narrative situations. On closer inspection, however, those situations turn out to be purely textual—that is, illustrations of verbal conceits. Tansey's work is addressed primarily to the metaphors which sustained late modernist practice in the visual arts: for example, his triptych A Short History of Modern Painting (a condensation of a more complete work exhibited in 1980 at P.S. 122) proceeds from a woman hosing down a window to a chicken regarding its own image in a mirror. Mirror and window—these are, of course, among the most persistent metaphors for painting in the history of art; Tansey deconstructs them simply by taking them literally.

Metaphor taken literally—handbooks of classical rhetoric give a name to this technique: catachresis. (Examples of catachresis: the "arms" of a chair, the "wings" of a building, "illumination"—which is the title of one of Tansey's recent paintings, in which a woman shields herself with a newspaper from the light cast by an indoor lamp.) Because it mistakes the figurative for the literal, catachresis is often defined as an abuse or perversion of metaphor; but the prefix "cata-" also signifies use in the sense of using up, of diminution, reduction, consumption, exhaustion. Tansey, then, uses metaphors in order to use them up, to wear them out, to ruin them.

Another catachresis: Robbe-Grillet Cleansing Every Object in Sight, in which the French novelist is depicted on his knees, scrub brush in hand, literally scouring the landscape. Here, Tansey refers to the author's stated intention of "purifying" objects of their associations. The modernist pursuit of purity is one of Tansey's primary targets, and it inevitably leads him to the account of modernist painting in the writings of Clement Greenberg. (Having been Helen Frankenthaler's studio assistant, Tansey can claim firsthand experience of the relation of formalist theory to late modernist practice.)

It will be remembered Greenberg insisted that, if modern painting were to "purify" itself, it would have to restrict itself to what is given in visual experience alone. In The Four Forbidden Senses, a quadripartite work, Tansey presents allegorical images of Taste, Hearing, Smell and Touch—precisely what Greenberg would eliminate. ("What I'm doing," Tansey said in a 1981 interview, "is saying, 'What can't a painting show?' and then doing it.")

But Tansey does not simply transgress Greenbergian proscription; he also reveals the fundamental impossibility of the formalist pursuit of purity. For modernist painting was sustained by a set of metaphors that were essentially linguistic in character; and it is the way in which the visual arts—and, by extension, visual experience in general—are "contaminated," indeed, structured, by language that is the subject of all of Tansey's work. To judge, as some have, his paintings as "literary"—a frequently derogatory pronouncement—is to overlook their acknowledgement of the inevitable implication of the verbal in the visual—their indissolubility.

—Craig Owens

Christin Couture: The Young Man Predella, 1981–82, acrylic on panel, 16 by 48 inches; at Monique Knowlton.

Christin Couture at Monique Knowlton

Christin Couture calls her paintings predellas. This is perhaps because of their extended horizontal format—certainly there are no altars in sight. But Couture may have other reasons for describing her works in religious terms. Her predellas feature not the lives of the saints, but slices of life from the world of the imagination—discreet but in-depth peeks into an unconscious which might be our last link with the sacred.

Couture explores the Mysteries, not, in this case, of Christ, but of modern life. Most of her predellas are lengthy cut-away views of two or three rooms in a minimally furnished house, the views out the open windows just as meaningful as the activities within the rooms. In The Young Man Predella, a black youth reclines, reading, on a Victorian couch in a livingroom; to his left in another room is a little girl pondering herself in a mirror; to his right a woman's legs are seen in another room, while out the window strolls a woman with a parasol. What, it may be asked, is going on? Both very little and possibly a lot.

Couture's landscapes—all two of them—are just as obscure: in one, lovers are seen in the bushes to the left, while men with metal detectors spread out on the lawn to the right, searching for God knows what element in the soil. Strange goings-on, these, with virtually no explanations given. Couture's symbolism is meaningful but also mute, like a half-remembered dream.

Clearly Couture owes a debt to de Chirico and Magritte, as do many other young visionary painters. But she has arrived at her excursions into the doll house of dreams very much on her own. The flavor of her work is particularly contemporary—though the painting style owes as much to Grandma Moses as to any European—and the Mysteries pictured are almost as funny and sweet as they are disturbing. A distinctly American imagination is at work here.

Still, there is her vaguely religious—and somewhat un-Ameri-

L

Michael Buthe: Ikarus, 1975, watercolor, pencil and crayon on paper and canvas, 157½ by 137¾ inches; at Holly Solomon. (Review on p. 140.)

Ida Applebroog: Thank You Very Much, 1982, acrylic and rhoplex on vellum, 7 panels, each panel, 10½ by 9 by 1 inches; at Ronald Feldman.

can—sensibility to contend with. An aura of the numinous clings to these interiors, a strong sense of the presence of the tremendum, be that tremendum God or Big Brother. It doesn't seem to matter—the people in these paintings go about their business in a weird, ritualistic way, as if divorced from present reality.

And yet these predellas are filled with awe at the dark miraculousness of the everyday. If today the religious sense has to go underground, has to cast itself in the form of a neo-Surrealism to keep itself alive, so be it. The saints' lives painted by Couture are our lives, mundane and majestic, confused and confusing, offering very few clues to who or what we are, but encouraging us to go on with it, as it were, on faith.

—Gerrit Henry

Irving Penn at Marlborough

Whimsy, of course, plays a part in the fashion photographs that made Penn famous, evident especially in his use of natural light and of active poses to make his models less objectlike. Yet what he did was simply to transfer the typical fashion model's objecthood to the consumer, who identified with the "life" of the model and internalized the image, desiring such luxury for herself, such an image for herself. The imagined portrait beneath these great advertisements is ultimately wistful, speaking to the past as to the future: "How lovely I would look in that dress. . . ." And then, with the photograph as remembrance: "How lovely I will have looked. . . ."

With varying degrees of forthrightness, this impulse toward retrospection has always been Penn's subject. But he deals with it most obviously in a second body of work developed over the years and dedicated to the cast-off, the worn and the ugly—dark records of the memento mori. By turns he has given us bleached images of overweight women cropped so as to eliminate heads and hands, close-ups of rotted clothes, studies of cigarette butts and debris—all the death beneath the sensual wealth of his fashions, his books of flowers, his studies of exotic people.

The best of his earlier "alternative" works were "camp"—beautifully but carefully ironic. Bathed in the clean north light seen in Penn's fashion work, those hugely detailed, brilliant blowups of wasted matter also have some of the fashion work's excitement. But in the series of 41 images (from 1979-80) that made up this most recent show—dust-strewn still lifes of skulls, disused bits of steel, crockery, bottles and plumbing parts—Penn seems overwhelmed by the past and by death; in the process, he becomes uninteresting. These works, shot with a 19th-century banquet camera, fall over each other with their desire to evoke 18th-century still life, or 15th-century memento mori; yet they retain the cool sensuality of fashion photographs.

Piled ludicrously together, a skull underneath a sewing machine, rusting plumbing parts adjacent to steel blocks and old bottles, everything is dust and dessication. Penn tries to lift his luminously depicted material details to the metaphysical level by affixing poetic titles to them, as when he stacks two skulls like playthings and calls them The Poor Lovers, or presents a pair of nearly identical images involving a broken plate with cherries and a tipped pitcher, then a third without the pitcher, and calls them, with vaguely post-Edenic overtones, The Fallen Pitcher, The Spilled Cream and Forgotten Fruit. Yet none of these domestic portraits of death are convincing. Photographed with the same techniques and attitude as his ads for Clinique cosmetics, the depicted objects are acquisitions gone wrong, desire inverted, at once depressed and slick. The repetitive, slight alteration of materials from shot to shot reveals an eye for artful arrangement but nothing of the philosopher's discrimination. Coleridge characterized this particular failing most aptly: "A grief without a pang, void, dark, and drear."

—Steven Henry Madoff

Ida Applebroog at Ronald Feldman

When Ida Applebroog started to redefine herself as an artist in the early '70s she had a lot to unlearn. Composition, color, "expressive" drawing were all jettisoned because they were in the way of the serviceable, minimal representation that she needed to depict her take on the human condition. In the mid-'70s Applebroog made her first books. She still makes them. Each has 12 pages (like the dirty books that circulated in school in the '30s and '40s). Each page repeats the same simple line drawing of an enigmatic human situation; one page in the series has the caption. She expanded the scale and variety of these spare, witty tableaux for her first show at Feldman's (spring 1980) and again for this exhibition.

At the first show I missed the intimacy of the books and felt that the large gallery spaces overpowered the work. This time the work felt more confident—for in addition to the small, cut-out vellum stagings there were larger drawings on raw canvas sealed by Rhoplex and a series of tiny spare environments, each with a female figure and a park bench, set on high white pedestals.

A sense of irony pervades all of this work. Its people relate to one another with simple, almost archetypal gestures. Captions, where they are used, don't always illuminate the event but instead set up a psychic reverberation around the work. A good example of this is the piece Thank You Very Much. There are seven panels, each about ten inches square. Each panel presents an almost identical view of five women, nude (except for panties) and seen from the rear. They are part of some event—a chorus line or a beauty contest. Beneath the fifth panel is the caption "Mr. Schlusser is dead" and beneath the seventh and last panel is "Thank you very much." I worked out a partial sce-

VOL 71
ISS 2
FE 1983
UMI

nario. It included my memories of Diane Arbus's nudist colony photographs, her suicide, the Dietrich movie The Blue Angel and the classic Jewish joke in which the stage manager announces that the star has died: "Give him chicken soup," a spectator suggests. "But I said he was dead," the manager replies. "It couldn't hurt," says the spectator. The captions and the images have just the right degree of the inexplicable to encourage interpretation. When I questioned the artist about Thank You Very Much, she told me that Mr. S. was a family friend with an unhappy life. She fantasized that he had secret pleasures like going to burlesque shows and that when he died the women would thank him for his loyal patronage. Who could know all of this? It is her secret agenda, the stories that only Applebroog knows. Yet there is a hint of a deeper common humanity here that allows us all to write our own scripts for these stills from Applebroog's ongoing movie.

—Paul Brach

Michael Buthe at Holly Solomon

Michael Buthe, who has been showing his work in Europe since the late '60s, sent 12 single pieces and a triptych here for his first New York show. His paintings and assemblages, light and prettily colored, were like gingery sweets—pfeffernüssen—and indeed, the six smaller assemblages, from the series "1001 Arabian Nights," reminded one of disarrayed, picked over candy samplers, with their bits of this and that. Exhibiting simultaneously in the gallery's smaller room was Robert Kushner, whose perverse, Halloweenish turqueries made Buthe's seem awfully easy to swallow—and forget. But Buthe's work does, fortunately, leave a bitter aftertaste, and therein lies its subtle interest.

Buthe is an elusive artist. These paintings on paper and canvas, unframed, several with scalloped borders, some painted gold, some sequined, do not so much embrace decoration per se as use decorative devices to convey a haptic message—the memory, transferred onto materials, of a prior touch, sense, place or instant. Buthe appears drawn to alchemy, or some other saturnine branch of metaphysics; he cannot transform his demon, but he gilds it. The tip-off painting in this show, the one to suggest darkness, was the very prettiest, Ikarus (1975), a large, nearly square, shimmering image of this youth doomed by hubris. The figure, at center and in shadow-form, seems more of an impression left than a representation. It is an Icarus already fallen—and gone, leaving a negative picture, a hiatus at the core of this work that stresses the finality at the core of the myth. The rest of the painting—its inward-pointing scalloped border, its lyrical, watercolored and crayoned ground—is but an embellishment of the premise, a lovely, blurred, pointless sum of airy tales received. The hero has, in this work, left his last mark.

Though the pieces in this show date from 1975 to the present, the composite of works amounts to a quote out of context. Buthe, who lives partly in Germany and partly in Morocco, is a missing link in the current export of German art. Like Sigmar Polke, he constitutes a direction unto himself, one that provides a necessary counterpoint to all the misnamed expressionists from Germany to whom Americans have been recently exposed. To judge from these works, Buthe's sensibility is Baudelairean rather then Nietzschean, Symbolist rather then Expressionist, but there are other aspects of this artist's program that could not here even be guessed at. Buthe, for instance, has often, in group shows, been thematically linked to American Minimalists, artists as different as Richard Serra and Cy Twombly. He has also performed and participated in Fluxus-style events. His early work shows very clearly the influence of Joseph Beuys. Even Buthe's "decorative" work has most characteristically been presented within an encompassing "environment," installed, in other words, as part of a whole. Given this range of practice, the work exhibited here seems more curious than enlightening. Two things only are clear: he doesn't paint nightclubs, and he doesn't paint paint.

—Lisa Liebmann

ROSLYN, N.Y.

Stephen Antonakos at Nassau County Museum

Since the late '60s, site-specific art has broadened its range of environmental settings: derelict vacant lots as well as baronial homes have increasingly become the focus of esthetic contemplation—to the benefit of art and setting alike. The site usually endows the work with a cultural complexity and sociological interest that it might not otherwise have. In effect, the site becomes a kind of cultural "memory" or "mind" for the work of art to explore.

For the last decade, Stephen Antonakos has worked with neon elements on the inside and outside of various buildings. Since light installations can look extremely strong in historic estates that have become art galleries, one had high expectations for his installations at the elegant Nassau County Museum (a Neo-Georgian estate until recently owned by Childs Frick). But despite a few strikingly effective pieces, Antonakos did not consistently meet the contextual challenge presented him.

Antonakos distributed 13 neon-edged panels and boxes throughout the museum's ground floor, most of them proportioned and placed to read either as pieces dislodged from a wall or as volumes stationed in the void of a room. This structural ambiguity was deliberate, for these panels and boxes functioned variously as subliminal architectural elements, as painting, as sculpture and—where light gleamed from behind edges or raced across panels in straight, curved or agitated lines—as drawing.

Within a formalist idiom, the works were aptly, if familiarly, employed. In what was once the library a nine-foot-long box casually lay, all white except for a red plane of light cast from its hidden side; the piece deftly and beautifully organized the architectural space around it. Better still was the installation in the adjoining hallway. Painted pale lavender above the wainscoting, the curved wall was bathed in white light cast from an eight-foot-long trapezoidal neon piece—straight, shallow and perfectly opposed to the graceful corridor.

Both as light art and as site-specific elements, the more two-dimensional works were somewhat problematic. To Antonakos's credit, his color was rarely pretty; rather, it was either diffused and low-keyed or piercingly confrontational. Intrinsically intense, neon has a startling chromaticism in the red-to-blue spectrum employed here. Clearly, neon attracts Antonakos as a means to enhance a formalist vocabulary. Indeed, it seems that he intended these skewed squares of light to merge the Neo-Georgian rectitude of the architecture with the Minimalist rationality of his neon structures. But finally, many of these neon pieces seemed inconsequential, hovering as they did between expedient architectural notation and sensuous, freely wrought decor. —Marjorie Welish

NEW HAVEN

Robert Reed at Mona Berman

The seven canvases and three collages that Robert Reed exhibited recently in New Haven were the latest additions to his "San Romano" series. For several years, the artist has been lifting passages from the first panel of Paolo Uccello's famous triptych, The Battle of San Romano, a work in which the 15th-century Italian master's fascination with linear perspective and his fondness for decorative color and contours meet head-on. While Florence's military victory over rival Siena was Uccello's subject, his style was a brilliantly quirky amalgam of Florentine rationalism and Sienese lyric tendencies. Thus, a contemporary painter like Reed, for whom the coupling of hard-edge geometry with color-field abstraction has been an enduring preoccupation, could scarcely find a more congenial historical model.

Reed isolates elements of Uccello's composition and pares them down to their non-objective bones in preliminary sketches. When the results particularly intrigue him, he fuses them with patterns and shapes from his own creative arsenal, sometimes painting them directly atop earlier works. While such transformations make the borrowed motifs virtually unrecognizable, they usually do provide the central "themes" of Reed's paintings. Several canvases seem to ring with the clash of warring armies, although the only visible combatants are vibrant hues and vigorously counterposed geometries.

In San Romano, Hip Strut, Reed tints the brown parabola of one of Uccello's bridles an inky blue. Then, he flattens it out and coils it round to serve as a vortex that tugs at the flying X's and sprung triangles floating nearest the picture plane. At the same time, this maelstrom flings out a jumble of overlapping rectangles, triangles and broken bands, while patches of swirling brushwork appear inside the whirlpool's mouth and at a few outer margins. The painting's physical surface adds to the overall sense of teeming, unpredictable life. Rough, tacky passages are flanked by almost imperceptible brushwork that suddenly gives way to lumps and bulges.

Reed's collages, in which geometric shapes cut from his lithographs are placed on a gridded backdrop and festooned with small paper circles, polygons, pinheads and staples, also bristle with activity. But, here the painter's delight in color is confined to subtle variations in weight of line and density of black against white, while in his canvases it emerges full force. In a painting like San Romano, 10½ Street Retreat, for example, a wealth of hues ranging from cadmium yellow, deep lilac and forest green to fleshy beiges and sallow ochers lends a decorative immediacy to hard-edge shapes, countering without diminishing their directional force and spatial interplay.

The earlier "Plum Nellie" series, which included the outsize paintings Reed showed at the Whitney in 1973, pitted a few lumbering, geometric shapes against buttery masses and billowing veils of paint. At once serious and sensuous, these paintings were elegant critiques of postwar American abstraction. As such, they projected an appropriate air of cool objectivity and monumental stasis. Reed's current work remains stubbornly independent, but the artist now seems to revel in his freedom. —Judith Wilson

CHICAGO

Adam Siegel at Frumkin & Struve

Adam Siegel's first solo show here last year introduced what he called "photoconstructions." They were composed of black and white photographs of Neo-Classical facades, divided by the camera into sections which were then joined to wood frames and reconstructed in building-block fashion. Although there was nothing particularly striking about these non-figurative, architectonic works, they displayed an inventiveness that nearly made up for their dry, formalist rigidity.

Siegel's second show continues to cross-pollinate photography and sculpture, but this time with the addition of both painterly and figurative elements. Nearly life-size photographic cutouts of a nude man and woman, shown individually and as a couple, are combined with wood beams and planks to create some dozen evocative photo-sculptures. The exhibition is titled "Under Eden," and vague Biblical references abound.

The black and white photos in these works have been altered in the negative by expressionist splatters and washes; many of the figures are overwhelmed by sweeps of painterly abstraction. These may suggest body movements or simply a highly charged atmosphere. Taken alone, these images are quite dramatic. Siegel is obviously at home with darkroom manipulation.

Unfortunately, when these photo images are cut out and mounted on wood beams and crosses, they appear contrived and extremely amateur—as a foray into mixed-medium sculpture, half- baked at best.

Michael Todd: Miro's Table #5, 1982 lacquered steel, 35 by 61 inches; at Paule Anglim.

The perversely titled Stop and Enjoy, for example, depicts the cutout figures of a man lifting a woman's naked torso onto an attached wood cross. Their heads and legs are cropped off, and the man sports 12 actual rusty nails pounded into his photographically botch-marked back.

The degree to which all this three-dimensional hokum distracts from what are fundamentally fine photographs is illustrated by the only two-dimensional work in the show, Desire Takes from Desire Its Form. The work consists of a series of nine manipulated images mounted in grid formation on the wall. Seven of the nine repeated images are of the same man and woman bending over together in spoon fashion, each image altered photographically in different and highly interesting ways. However, when this same image is blown up, cut out and utilized in a work which incorporates a horizontal wood beam with a cooking pot hanging from a nail, the effect is ludicrous.

Siegel is the 24-year-old son of two well-known artists, the late photographer Arthur Siegel and expressionist painter Irene Siegel. Adam Siegel certainly has inherited the photographic and painterly gifts of both parents, but his decision to force those gifts into three dimensions has, for the time being, proved a stumbling block.

—Michael Bonesteel

Adam Siegel: Easy Pleasure, 1982, photo construction, 60 inches high; at Frumkin & Struve.

SAN FRANCISCO

Michael Todd at Paule Anglim

Todd has been exploring the possibilities of the circle in sculpture for several years. He has, for example, bent great steel pipes around, and stood them almost to the ceiling. Now he has done a series of sculptures resembling round-topped tables with legs of arcs, cylinders and planes. They vary in height from coffee-table to work-table size. En masse, they seem to comprise a field of horizontal disks levitated well off the floor, with steel forms apparently leaning against them (though of course it is in actuality the latter that support the former). The titles of these pieces acknowledge their resemblance to tables without really doing full justice to their eccentric physical character; Miro's Table #5 (1982), for example, suggests an abstracted face, perhaps a great cartoonish cat head, with wild wire whiskers sticking upward from the horizontal surface (Krazy Kat perhaps?).

In matters of technique, Todd has run the gamut: from the grinder-marked steel surfaces of David Smith, to blackish lacquered steel, to painted aluminum, polished plate glass and, in Small White Table (1980–82), brass-plated steel painted white. Miro's Table #6 (1982) has a horizontal disk of glass for a top, and seen through it is a ring of steel pipe caught in the process of tipping over, apparently discharging a splash of molten steel as it falls. This piece, with its amusing resemblance to a cocktail party accident, is both a caricature of illusionism and a parody of the contact-welding technique made popular by such artists as Anthony Caro. This technique made it possible to bring to sculpture the loose free-fall characteristic already celebrated in painting by Kandinsky and others, and Kandinsky's Table (1982) makes that connection wittily explicit. Rearing up from it are great looping wires, two disk tops and a ring of pipe, all in a horizontal row; flying off one of these disks in turn is a cubic element, along with assorted other bits of space flotsam. The arc, cylinder and plane which serve as legs are improbably askew, but, mysteriously, they hold the tops firmly flat.

Somewhat in contrast is the very correct and geometric Lily Pad Table (1970), its four disks overlapping in what appears to be a low-key act of levitation. The new, zanier work is clearly based on this 1970 prototype, but it has been strongly inflected by the irony so characteristic of the last decade. The method, materials and precedents remain the same, but the humor has broadened. Table #1 (1974) is an intervening piece likewise tied to the lily pad idea of the prototype, but still resolutely correct and serious; Moholy-Nagy might have suggested the model. In the late work, Dali comes more readily to mind, but Kandinsky and Miró are the only influences whom the artist explicitly acknowledges. Enlightened but crazy, Todd's most recent efforts seem very much of their time. —Knute Stiles

Review Contributors

Jamey Gambrell, Gerrit Henry, Lisa Liebmann, Ellen Lubell and Steven Henry Madoff are free-lance critics living in New York . . . Robert Berlind, Paul Brach, and Lawrence Campbell are artists who also write on art . . . Michael Bonesteel is a free-lance critic based in Chicago . . . Craig Bromberg, a performance artist, also writes on dance and art . . . Knute Stiles writes on art from San Francisco . . . Marjorie Welish is a poet, writer and painter . . . Judith Wilson is a free-lance writer John Yau is a poet and free-lance critic

VOL
71
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

Holly Daly Herman

Palm Beach Art Galleries

WHY ARE WE SO SUCCESSFUL?

BECAUSE WE ARE SO NOTABLY DIFFERENT!

240 Worth Avenue
Palm Beach
655-9364

523 Rue Dumaine
New Orleans
525-6457

THE GALLERIES FEATURE CONTEMPORARY AMERICAN AND EUROPEAN SCULPTORS AND PAINTERS

DEBBIE ADAMS
MAREA ALEXANDER-EDYNAK
DAVID ANDERSON
ELAINE APTEKAR
MARC AVRIN
RTO TYLER BAER
MARION BEAUREGARD BEZOU
CATHERINE BRODEUR
DORTHE CHILCUTT
JOSEPH CICCARELLI
DOROTHY CROWLEY
WHITNEY CUSHING
EVIE DAYMAN
WALTER DIERICKX
DANIEL DOBRZENSKI
DANA ALAN EASTWOOD
ANDREW FERGUSON JR
LEONARD FROIO
AUBREY GARNER
JANE GASTON
CHARLES GILLESPIE
LAURA GSCHWANDTNER
JOHN HAVRILLA
GINGER HESTAND
PATRICIA HOLLSTEIN
HIROKO ISHIDA
MICHAEL JAMES
LESTER KENT
BUD KOVERMAN
YVES LAROCHE
PEGGY LEIGHNINGER
DARLA DIANN LEWIS
MARY BERN LEWIS
JUNE LITTELL
BETTE MASON
JOSEPH MAYNARD
RAYMOND MCDOWELL
MIRIAM MCVEIGH
BOONCHAIB METHANGKOOL
BARON MINTZ
FLOYD NORRIS
ELIZABETH O'NEIL
DAVID JOSEPH PAVLAK
ED RIVARA
IDA ROBERTS
THOMAS RUNDQUIST
JUDY SALE
SIDNEY SMITH
JAIME SPILMAN
ZOLTAN STEINER
FRANCIS SWEET
RICHARD SYLVESTRE
JOSEPH TAUBER
JOSEPH TONINI
ROBERT TRANSPOTA
CAROL RAE TVEDT
JON NEAL WALLACE
VIOLET WINDELL
HERMAN YOKERS
JIM ZINGER

GALLERY'S HOURS:

PALM BEACH
monday thru saturday
11:00 to 4:00
closed; tuesdays & sundays

NEW ORLEANS
monday thru sunday
11:00 to 4:00
closed; tuesdays & wednesdays

Biach W Galleries

Cleveland Plaza suite 108
123 North Union Ave.
Cranford, New Jersey 07016
(201) 272-7070

R. J. CHRISTENSEN

oils --- graphics

EXHIBITIONS. FILM. LECTURES. DISCUSSION. PANEL

MUSE Gallery Members and CAROLE FISHER. SUZANNE LACY. HARMONY HAMMOND. LUCY LIPPARD. FAITH RINGGOLD. SYLVIA SLEIGH. MIRIAM SCHAPIRO. BARBARA ZUCKER / Catalogue: BROUDE/GARRARD. DAVIS. LIPPARD. ZUCKER

HER OWN SPACE

Exhibition and symposium have been funded through the generous support of THE PENNSYLVANIA HUMANITIES COUNCIL, the PENNSYLVANIA COUNCIL ON THE ARTS, the Will Penn Foundation, Cameron Memorial Fund, Girard Bank, Rittenhouse Fndn. Catalogue available For further information: MUSE Foundation 1915 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, PA 19103, 215-963-0959

MODERN NATIVE AMERICAN ABSTRACTION

CURATED BY EDGAR HEAP OF BIRDS

LORENZO CLAYTON · LARRY EMERSON · SYLVIA LARK
EDGAR HEAP OF BIRDS · EMMI WHITE HORSE

JANUARY 21 — MARCH 18

GALLERY OF THE AMERICAN INDIAN COMMUNITY HOUSE
386 WEST BROADWAY, 2ND FLOOR
NEW YORK CITY, NEW YORK 10012
PHONE 212-226-7433

CONNOISSEUR

has moved to America with Thomas Hoving as its Editor-in-Chief

CONNOISSEUR

the magazine for people with a passion for the best

Pick up CONNOISSEUR at better newsstands or call (800) 247-5470. In Iowa call (800) 532-1272.

Horse & rider-T'ang Dynasty-Ralph M. Chait Galleries

A publication of Hearst Magazines a division of The Hearst Corporation.

© 1981 The Hearst Corporation

VOL
71
ISS
2
FE 1983
UMI

The School of Visual Arts Master of Fine Arts Program

September, 1983

David L. Shirey, Chairman
(212) 679-7350 extension 225 or 226

SCHOOL OF
VISUAL ARTS
209 EAST 23RD STREET, NEW YORK, NEW YORK 10010

2
2nd Edition!
Available March, 1983
Directory
of Corporate Art Collections

An indispensable reference tool for arts councils, arts administrators, museums, libraries, art dealers, art consultants and artists.

Save hours of research time by using this up-to-date resource directory. Provides you with information on over 350 corporate art collections

- over 50 totally new corporations
- contact person, address and phone
- description of the collection
- size and location of the collections
- cross indexes by state and personnel
- and much more

Pre-publication price of $29* each plus shipping and handling until February 15, 1983. $35* thereafter.
*postage paid on prepaid orders

International Art Alliance,
P.O. Box 1608, Largo, Florida 34294 813-581-7328

GREAT NORTHERN

INSURANCE
SPECIALISTS
TO THE
ART WORLD

GALLERIES · COLLECTORS ·
MUSEUMS · PUBLISHERS ·
AUCTION HOUSES

INQUIRIES INVITED

950 THIRD AVENUE NEW YORK, N.Y. 10022 (212)371-2800

FREE
catalog with purchase of Stumpy or Great Crate.

AMERICA'S LARGEST ART SUPPLY DISTRIBUTOR
Art Brown
ARTHUR BROWN & BRO., INC.

- Unique 228p resource for artists
- Use for one-stop shopping
- Contains over 20,000 items

Just purchase
STUMPY™

$5.95
clutch sketching pencil
3 extra lead refills included

OR
Just purchase
GREAT CRATE™

$4.95
beautiful studio and desk top organizer

Enclosed find check for items checked below:
Stumpy ☐ plus catalog $5.95
Great Crate ☐ plus catalog $4.95
Art Brown ☐ catalog only $3.00
C183AIA

Name
Address
City/State/Zip

America's Largest Art Supply Distributor
ARTHUR BROWN & BRO., INC.
2 West 46th Street, New York, N.Y. 10036

six:6
summer
art '83

Skidmore College
saratoga springs, n.y.

TWO 6 WEEK SESSIONS:
MAY 25 - JULY 1
JULY 6 - AUGUST 12

Painting
Drawing
Ceramics
Weaving
Sculpture
Photography
Design
Watercolor
Printing
Art History

Faculty:

David Miller
David Horning
Peter Baruzzi
Pat Cauley
John Cunningham
James Kettlewell
Doretta Miller
Harry Gaugh
Regis Brodie
Lewis Knauss
Jim Sutter
Bob Mejer
Jane Rehl
Tom Patton
F. deMontequin
Richard Upton

also—
- * Non-credit workshops in Ceramics, Life Drawing, Rendering and Children's Book Illustration
- * Pre-College Art Program for High School Students write or call:

Summer Six Art Program
Skidmore College
Saratoga Springs, N.Y. 12866
(518) 584-5000, Ext. 372

PEARL

WORLD'S LARGEST
ART & CRAFT DISCOUNT CENTER

SEERITE PORTABLE TRACING BOX
- Light Weight, Thin Design
- Front on/off switches
- Carrying Handle (only model #4)
- Specify 2 Bulbs (PTB/2 11" X 18")
  4 Bulbs (PTB/4 16" X 18")

11 X 18 LIST $99.95 PEARL $67.47
16 X 18 LIST $154.95 PEARL $104.59

Call or Write for our FREE
Professional Mail Order Catalog

LOGAN #401 MAT CUTTER
- Hand held
- Professional Quality Beveled Edges
- Uses Standard Single Edge Blades

LIST $37.95 PEARL $29.95

NEW! ARTOGRAPH RT-200 TABLE TOP PROJECTOR
- Lightweight and compact
- Attaches to any Drawing Board
- Projects Directly onto work surface
- 2½ Times reduction to 3 times enlargement

LIST $399.00 PEARL $359.95

STANDARDGRAPH
stano·pen
4 Pen Set
- Leak Proof Design
- No Clogging—Hygro Element Top
- Easy Cleaning & Point Removal
- Value—Pac

VALUE $39.95 PEARL $18.00

KOH-I-Noor
PROFESSIONAL QUALITYBEAM COMPASS #69100
- Special Aluminum Profile
- Up to 38" Diameter Circles
- Very Light and Stable
- Hinged-Cover Hard Plastic Case

LIST $171.75 PEARL $115.76

WATERCOLOR BRUSH SET
50% OFF
- From Loew-Cornell
- Finest Red Sable
- 2 Brushes #8 and #12

LIST $69.95 PEARL $34.97

REMBRANDT 180 PIECE
Talens
PASTEL SET
LIST $200.00
PEARL $133.60

FAMOUS MAKE PORTABLE EASEL/SKETCH BOX
Made in Italy. Fully seasoned Hard beechwood - unbeatable price.
LIST $184.00 PEARL $107.60

Pearl Art & Craft
2411 Hempstead Tpke.
East Meadow, NY 11554
(516) 731-3726

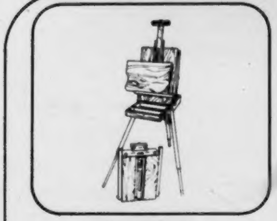
(Above specials mail order only)
Your order will be shipped C.O.D. plus shipping & handling
N.Y.S. residents add applicable sales tax. *These prices will be held to 3/1/83.
All sale items while supplies last.

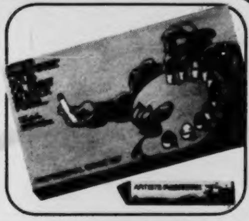
OTHER LOCATIONS
New York City, Long Island, Paramus and Woodbridge, New Jersey, Ft. Lauderdale and Miami, Fla.
We honor: Visa, Master Charge, Certified check or Money order

VOL
71
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

JERRY'S ARTARAMA INC.

SUPER-SAVERS





GRUMBACHER FRENCH SKETCH BOX-EASEL

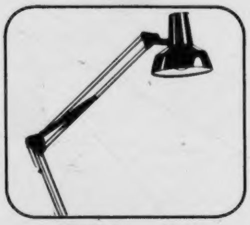
No. 286 $159.95 ppd.

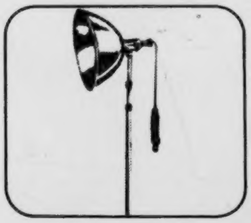
This is the original world famous combination sketch box/easel-/canvas carrier. It is made from seasoned hardwood and precision handcrafted. Will hold canvas up to 32" high and can be tilted. Comes complete with a finished palette. Measures only 6½x16x21" collapsed, and weighs only 13 pounds. Nationally advertised for $259.50, but now available to you delivered at this low Jerry's price.

SHIVA/MARKAL PAINT STIKS PROFESSIONAL 12-PC SET

No. MPS-12 $14.95 ppd.

A great new material for the artist combining portability and versatility in the form of sticks of oil paint. Paint anywhere, anytime with no fumes, no odor, and no brushes to clean. Paint on almost anything. This wonderful product is available for your trial in a 12-piece set of professional quality sticks at delivered to you savings.





COLORVIEW I NATURAL COLOR CLAMP LAMP

No. CV-I $25.95 ppd.

This special daylight type lamp provides truer color rendition and less glare supplied with a longlife 60 watt color-corrected bulb. It has a full 34" reach made of heavy gauge metal with a porcelain socket. With a spring suspension knob lock control. A great gift idea for any artist who works at a drawing table or desk. Available in enamel finish.

COLORVIEW II NATURAL COLOR STUDIO LAMP

No. CV-II $39.95 ppd.

A necessity for the studio artist who needs to light easel, pallette, or model. Supplies a clean crisp natural daylight type of light. Lightweight for easy mobility. Opens to over 7' with aluminum 10" diameter reflector, on-off switch, wood safety knob for cool handling.

The Jerry's Catalog #7A

An Art Store for $1.00 (free w/all orders). Discounts from 15-66% off manufacturers list.

SEND CHECK, MONEY ORDER, OR MASTERCARD & VISA NUMBER TO:

JERRY'S ARTARAMA, INC.
248-12 Union Turnpike, Bellerose, NY 11426

THE JERRY'S CATALOG

SHIP TO: ____________________

ADDRESS ____________________

CITY ____________ STATE ____________ ZIP ______

CARD NO. ____________________ EXP ______

NO.	QTY	DESCRIPTION	PR EA	AMOUNT
7A		Art Store (120 pg. catalog) free with order	1.00
286		Grumbacher French Easel Box	159.95
CV-1		Color-View I Lamp	25.95
CV-II		Color-View II Lamp	39.95
MPS-12		Shiva-Markal Paint Stick Set	14.95
			Sub-Total
			NY State Residents add Sales Tax
			Outside Continental USA add 15% for shipping
			Total

This sale expires Mar. 10, 1983. All items include Shipping and Handling within the Continental USA. Outside add 15% of order. Items are shipped UPS, allow 2 weeks for delivery, include street address.

TO ORDER BY PHONE ☎ Please have your MasterCard or Visa ready (sorry No CODs)

CALL TOLL-FREE 1-800-221-2323

In NY, Alaska, Hawaii, Canada call 212-343-0777

MARVIN KING

ORIGINAL PERFORMANCES OF NEW MUSIC, HARDWOOD CARVINGS AND VIDEO ILLUSTRATION ON VHS.
30 min/8 tunes/107 pieces
Signed Drawing and Cassette . . . $268.00

JANE-LEE VIDEO GALLERY

P.O. Box 50014
Austin, Texas 78763
512-476-2799

FINE ART CASTING IN BRONZE EXCLUSIVELY
CANADA'S MOST COMPLETE SERVICE FOR SCULPTORS

64D MERTON STREET
TORONTO ● ONTARIO
CANADA ● M4S 1A3
TELEPHONE (416) 488-1676

The Art Foundry

THE SOURCE

RC Gorman

AT

Now & Then Gallery Ltd.

797 Merrick Ave. East Meadow, L.I., N.Y. 11554
(516) 481-1447 (212) 895-1145

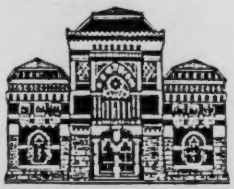
LITHOS—CERAMICS—SCULPTURE—SILKSCREENS

PENNSYLVANIA ACADEMY OF THE FINE ARTS

Oldest art school in America offers majors in Painting, Sculpture & Printmaking. Admission to Day school by Portfolio. Accredited by NASAD. Financial Aid available. Approved for Veterans.

Evening & Summer programs in Painting, Drawing and Sculpture.

Founded 1805



For catalog write:
PAFA, Room M,
Broad & Cherry Sts.,
Phila., PA 19102

NEW ART INSTRUCTION BOOKS

KEYS TO acrylics & watercolor

At last, an up-to-date, contemporary library of art instruction. These books represent the collective efforts of one of the largest, most talented professional art staffs in the country—over 250 artists and designers.

Written and illustrated for ease of understanding, this series not only covers the basics, but reveals professional secrets to ease the trial and error period experienced by the amateur and semi-professional. And each book is loaded with color.

Books included in this series are: Basic Drawing, Color, Perspective, Still Life, Animal Drawing, Portraits, Floral Painting, Seascapes, Landscapes, Oil Painting, Sketching, and Acrylic and Watercolor. Now there is a better way. High quality at a great price. Suggested retail—$2.99 each.

Prepared by The Skylight Division of

shiva®

4320 West 190th Street, Torrance, CA 90509 • (800) 421-1325/(213) 542-5583

---

theOctober
GALLERY

Specializing in Contemporary Works
on Paper by
American, Canadian and European Artists

1226 Spring St., St. Helena, CA 94574   707 963-7501

A FINE
SELECTION OF CONTEMPORARY AMERICAN ART

incorporated
gallery

1200 MADISON AVE. (87th ST.) NYC 10028 • (212) 831-4466

THE STRETCHER COMPANY 989 3939
153 WAVERLY PLACE, NEW YORK, NEW YORK 10014

attention
artists and gallery owners

we offer the finest custom artist stretchers
made to your size;
expandable or rigid.

our ball socket joints
are unique and create the ultimate in artists stretchers

we also have available:

stripping—applied or
in any length in:

cherry	maple
walnut	tenite
oak	gilded
ash	painted

with or without shadow line

unprimed cotton duck

and linens

FRAMEMASTERS INC

CUSTOM PICTURE FRAMERS

WHOLESALE/RETAIL (AT DISCOUNT)

natural wood frames
(oak, ash, maple, cherry and walnut)
gold and silver leaf
round corner frames
(natural wood, gilded or painted) painted frames shadow boxes
welded aluminum frames welded brass frames
plexiboxes
crating and shipping commercial prefinished moldings
nielsen metal sections
shrink wrapping
(to hang or for display)
stripping for paintings
matting (paperboard, acid free, all rag, fabric, hand wrapped, (etc.)
mounting (wet or dry)
linen backing
plexiglas (standard, UF 3, etc.)

pick up service in New York City (Manhattan)

153 WAVERLY PLACE, N.Y., N.Y. 10014

691-0486

VOL 71
ISS 2
FE 1983
UMI

JAMES BUCHMAN
STONE AND STEEL SCULPTURE
FEBRUARY 26 - MARCH 26
MAX HUTCHINSON GALLERY
138 GREENE STREET NEW YORK, NY 10012 212-966-3066

Walka Batash:
FEBRUARY 10-28, 1983
KOUROS GALLERY
831 Madison Avenue • New York, NY 10021 • (212) 879-5454

Emery Clark
drawings
PROJECT:
MIAMI
Feb. 5-Mar. 1, '83
Barbara
Gillman
Gallery
270 N.E. 39 ST./3886 Biscayne Blvd.
Miami, Fla. 33137/(305) 573-4898
also Art Cars

The Erté 90th Birthday Retrospective
The most comprehensive collection of gouaches, sculpture, graphics, tapestries, posters and silks ever assembled for the collector.
Exhibition Extended
Dyansen Gallery
122 Spring Street • New York 10012
212-226-3384 800-847-4234

EDITH NEWHALL
ERICSON GALLERY, 23 EAST 74TH STREET, NEW YORK

ALLAN HOUSER
Sculpture Exhibition/Scottsdale
February 17 - March 12
7051 FIFTH AVE.
SCOTTSDALE, AZ 85251
(602) 990-9110
104 OLD SANTA FE TRAIL
SANTA FE, NM 87501
(505) 988-4166
7122 N. 7TH ST.
PHOENIX, AZ 85020
(602) 943-8183
the gallery wall INC.
EXCLUSIVE REPRESENTATIVES FOR ALLAN HOUSER

KRAUSHAAR GALLERIES
724 Fifth Avenue, New York
(Bet. 57th & 56th Sts. • Tel. 307-5730)
WILLIAM KIENBUSCH
Memorial Exhibition • Jan. 12-Feb. 5
JERRY ATKINS
Sculpture • Feb. 16-Mar. 12

Editions Limited Galleries, Inc.
Artists: Altman, Alvar, Barnet, Block, Closson, Fannin, Faust, Kipniss, Kitchell, McMillan, Meyers, Peters, Puhalla, Price, Shorr, Sherri Smith, Summers, Weinberg, Williams and Wolters.
Dealer Inquiries Invited
8702 Keystone Crossing
Indianapolis, IN 46240
Tel. (317) 848-7878
1 Market Plaza
San Francisco, CA 94105
Tel. (415) 777-5711

WHITNEY MUSEUM OF AMERICAN ART INDEPENDENT STUDY PROGRAM

PAINTING, SCULPTURE, FILM, AND VIDEO: 15 students are accepted each semester. These students have unlimited access to individual studios. The Program's instructors David Diao, Yvonne Rainer, and Ron Clark, are present for discussion and criticism throughout the semester.

ART HISTORY AND MUSEUM STUDIES: 10 students are accepted each year as Helena Rubinstein Fellows. The Fellows develop and implement exhibitions for the Whitney's branch museums under the supervision of Richard Armstrong, the Program's art history instructor. Fellows also engage in individual research projects.

Both studio and art history students participate in weekly seminars with artists and critics.

Application deadline: Fall semester 1983, April 1, 1983

For information: Whitney Museum Independent Study Program, 384 Broadway, New York, New York 10013, (212) 431-1737

S. SWEET
FLATTENED PEOPLE
JANUARY 8 - JANUARY 27
P. JESSEE
MONUMENTAL MINIATURES
FEBRUARY 19 - MARCH 10
AARON•HASTINGS
GALLERY
1130 St. Charles Ave., New Orleans, La., 70130 (504)523-7202

Yoseido Gallery

Contemporary Japanese prints

5-5-15, Ginza, Chuo-ku, Tokyo,
Japan phone: 571-1312, 2471

100 page catalog upon request— $8.00

BARRY NEMETT
AGNES JACOBS
new works

February 3—27, 1983

C. GRIMALDIS GALLERY
928 n. charles, balto., md. 21201 301/539-1080

999 BOOKSHOP

Art Books

Unique Collection • In-Print • Out-of-Print • Foreign Monographs • Reference • Price Guides • Oriental Porcelain • Architecture • Furniture • Interiors
Rugs/Textiles • Clocks • Gardening • Silver/Gold
CATALOGUE AVAILABLE $2 POSTPAID
999 Bookshop • Dept. 01
999 Madison Avenue New York 10021
Telephone (212) 288-9439

J. MELÉ

OPENING
FEB.15 — 6-8 P.M.

FEB.15-MAR. 5 1983
TUES. - SAT. 1-6 P.M.

Arch
gallery
644 BROADWAY (cor.Bleecker)
NEW YORK, N.Y. 10012·260-5847

KIM RUSSEL
Functional Sculpture
February 2 - February 25

SL Art Gallery
2133 Cedar Springs
214/761-9912 • Dallas, Texas 75201

VOL
71
ISS
2
FE 1983
UMI

Art Books and Illustrated Books

Rare and scholarly books in all fields of the visual arts.

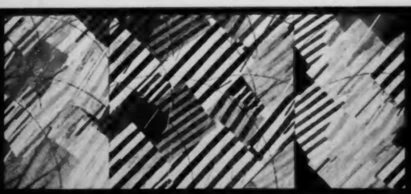
Important illustrated books from the fifteenth century to the present.

ars libri, ltd.
286 SUMMER STREET • BOSTON, MA 02210
(617) 357-5212
Mon.-Fri. 9 to 6 • Sat. 11 to 5

Moe Brooker
Garie Crawford
Jack Earl
Christopher Gustin
Henry Halem

Herb Jackson
Jay McCafferty
John Pearson
Judith Salomon
Audrey Skuodas

DBR GALLERY
13225 SHAKER SQUARE CLEVELAND OHIO 44120 216/491-8062



Wistar 1982 Oil Crayon Canvas 67x150

LINDA WHITE
RECENT PAINTINGS
FEBRUARY 18 - APRIL 3
NEW JERSEY STATE MUSEUM
205 W. STATE ST. TRENTON, N.J. 609/292-6308
Represented by: Princeton Gallery of Fine Art, Princeton, N.J.

We'll make you work hard so you'll have an easier time getting the job you want. For information about our programs in Graphic Design, Advertising, Illustration, Fine Arts and Photography, call (617) 262-2844.

THE ART INSTITUTE OF BOSTON
700 Beacon St., Boston, MA 02215
We'll put your creativity to work.

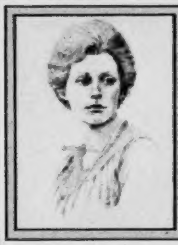
January 11 - February 26
TAPESTRY • FIBER

BAYER
MOTHERWELL
NOLAND
SCHOLDER
YOUNGERMAN
ZOX

AKERS
BOUSSARD
GROSSEN
KAO
MARTENS
SMITH

MODERN MASTER TAPESTRIES INC.
11 East 57th St., N.Y. 10022. (212) 838-0412. Tues.–Sat., 9:30–5:30.

Galería San Jerónimo
Condado Holiday Inn - 999 Ashford Ave. Condado, P.R. - Tel. 722-1808 / 721-1000



FEATURING ARTISTS OF PUERTO RICO
and
J. D'ESOPO, J. KRESMAN,
C. PFAHL, L. MARCOS,
M. LOVELAND MILLER,
T. SPINNER

MAUD Pencil portrait TERESA SPINNER

Galería San Juan
Blvd. del Valle 204-206 Old San Juan, P.R. - Tel. 722-1808 / 725-3829

STEVEN MOLASKY
BOXERS

Ziller and Associates
1095 East Twain Suite 2-Z
Las Vegas, Nevada 89109
(702) 737-2046

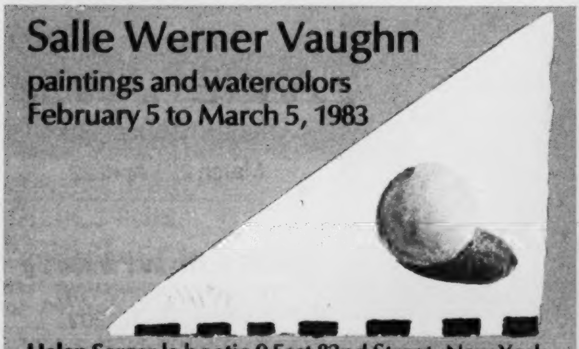
ROBERTO WHITE
and associates

Museum quality paintings and sculpture
16th to 20th century

by appointment only
225 Central Park West, New York, N.Y. 10024
(212) 580-2416

Salle Werner Vaughn

paintings and watercolors
February 5 to March 5, 1983



Helen Serger la boetie 9 East 82nd Street, New York
Telephone (212) 535-4865 Cable la boetie New York

GP

BROWN
CARBONI GREENWALD
ROSE SHAPIRO SOLIEN
SORMAN

GETLER/PALL
50 WEST 57 NY 212/581-2724

FEBRUARY

TOM CURRIE — Weavings
ROSELINE DELISLE — Porcelain

HADLER · RODRIGUEZ · GALLERIES
38 E 57 NYC 10022 212 752-7734

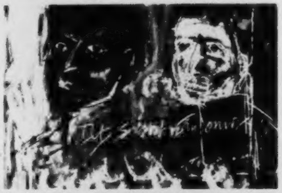
---

inter-american Art gallery
1000 madison avenue new york n.y. 10021 (212) 772-7760

Pierre Dunoyer

Ismael Frigerio

February 8 - March 6



Untitled, 1982, 50 x 38", Charcoal and acrylic on paper

Yvonne Séguy Gallery
61 West 62 Street • Harkness Plaza • New York, New York 10023
(212) 265-3314

LINDA FLEMING

New Sculpture

February 12 - March 12

ConStructSouth

12100 NE 16th Avenue
North Miami, Florida 33161
305 891 0183

101 N. Wacker Drive, Suite 235
Chicago, Illinois 60606
312 853 1125

Lynn Chadwick
Eduardo Chillida
Jose Luis Cuevas
Giacomo Manzù
Marino Marini
Roberto Matta
Henry Moore

Tasende
Gallery
820 Prospect Street, La Jolla, California 92037
(619) 454-3691

MORTON
RACHOFSKY
SCULPTURE

2300 Mercantile Bank Bldg.
Dallas, Texas 75201
214/748-1248

3 Three Sisters Gallery

Catalogue Available
$6.00

Untitled #126 Walnut H: 34.5"

VOL
7
1
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

Florence Putterman
Works on Paper

Soho South
Contemporary Gallery of Art

[illegible]

ANNE HARRIS
RECENT SCULPTURE
March 22 - April 22

Gallery at Turnberry
19707 Turnberry Way
Miami, FL 33180
305-931-5272

54" high

GALERÍA JUANA MORDÓ
Villanueva 7 · Madrid 1 • Tel. 435.84.42

MANUEL RIVERA

Arco 83 - 18-25 February-Madrid

KENNETH LYNCH & SONS
Art Gallery and Museum supplies

Picture hanging rods, mouldings, security devices, stanchions, vitrines, art storage racks, gallery carts, tablets, and plaques.
• Free Catalog •

KENNETH LYNCH & SONS
Box 488-AM, Wilton, CT 06897 (203) 762-8363

THE PROTECTORS.

Great to have, great to give . . . because they keep Art in America beautiful.

Art in America

Preserve and protect your copies of Art in America with custom designed library cases. They're an easy and convenient way to keep all the issues you'll want to refer to. Bound in elegant blue simulated leather, the spine is embossed with gold lettering. These cases are attractive additions to your library shelves and end tables, as well as a unique gift selection for friends who also enjoy Art in America. Sizes available to fit pre-July/August 1976 issues, post September/October 1976 six time issues, and new ten time issues.

ORDER YOURS TODAY
1 for $4.95, 2 for $9.75, 3 for $14.00, 6 for $24.00
— add $1 per case for postage and handling outside the U.S.A. Remittance of payment in U.S. currency only.

TO: JESSE JONES BOX CORPORATION
P.O. Box 5120, Dept. AIA, Philadelphia, Pa. 19141

Please send me _____ ART IN AMERICA library cases at $ _________.
I understand this price includes postage, packing, and handling.
My check for $ _______ is enclosed.

Please indicate binder size:
Pre-July/August 1976 ☐
Post September/October 1976 ☐
September 1979 to Present ☐

NAME ____________________
ADDRESS ____________________
CITY ____________ STATE ______ ZIP ________

Please allow five weeks for delivery. Satisfaction guaranteed.

EARTHENAIRE

Feb. 19-Mar. 25

Jeff Low — Paintings • Sculpture
Works on paper
Victor Verbalaitis — Two and Three Dimensional Works in Clay

GALLERY ONE INC

4935 Byers · Fort Worth, Texas 76107 (817) 737-9566

Clay Wood Photography Painting Printmaking

Summer
Workshops '83
Painting/Printmaking

Terry Allen
Susan Hall
James Havard
James Rosenquist
Dick Wray

Craig O'Brien - Styria Studios
Maurice Sanchez
Bud Shark
Bernie Vinzani &
Katie MacGregor

call or write for brochure

ANDERSON RANCH ARTS CENTER

ART SERVICES

ADVERTISING AGENCIES

AESTHETICS PLUS Circle No. 1
3040 N Street, NW #4
Washington, D.C. 20007 (202) 965-0956
Services offered in Public Relations, Advertising & Graphic Design. See our ad on Page 152.

WEBB DESIGN STUDIO/TAOS Circle No. 2
501 Ranchitos Road
Taos, NM 87571 (505) 758-3447
Graphic design to promote the arts: exhibition catalogues, brochures, advertisements, quality color postcards.

APPRAISERS

AUDREY REAL HELFAND Circle No. 3
945 Fifth Avenue Member: ISSAA
New York, NY 10021 (212) 535-5972
Appraiser of European and American Fine Arts
For Insurance
Gift-Tax, Property Division, and Estates.

KELVYN G. LILLEY AND ASSOCIATES, INC. 4
620 North Michigan Ave., Suite 520
Chicago, IL 60611 (312) 787-0985
Fine and Decorating Arts, Appraisals and Consultations.
Over 15 yrs Exp. Recognized by Major Insurance Companies.

JAMES F. MCDONALD FINE ARTS, INC. Circle No. 5
668 W. Irving Park Road
Chicago, IL 60613 (312) 477-9852
Appraisals for Insurance and Market Value.

PIERCE GALLERIES, INC. Circle No. 6
721 Main St. Route 228
Hingham, MA 02043 (617) 749-6023
19th and Early 20th Century American Art.
By Appointment Only.

TUCKER APPRAISAL ASSOCIATES Circle No. 7
River Oaks Shopping Center
Houston, TX 77019 (713) 529-8375
Independent Fee Appraisers of Fine Art Only. We do not Buy or Sell. Member of American Society of Appraisers.

ART BOOKS

WILLIAM AND VICTORIA DAILEY, LTD. Circle No. 8
8216 Melrose Avenue
Los Angeles, CA 90046 (213) 658-8515
Antiquarian Books and Fine Prints.

ART CONSULTANTS

EDWARD BANIA Circle No. 9
2712 Logan Blvd.
Chicago, IL 60647 (312) 276-3674
Established Resource for Architects, Designers, Collectors.
Acquisitions/Finishing & Framing/Corporate & Residential.

ANN H. BISSELL Circle No. 10
2844 Wisconsin Avenue, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20007 (202) 363-2867
Art Installation, Lighting Design and Framing on a Consulting Basis.

COLSON SCULPTURE SERVICE INT'L Circle No. 11
1375 5th Street
Sarasota, FL 33579 (813) 365-3818, 953-5892
Ceramics Shell Sculpture Casting Set-up and Related Information.

ART POSTERS

POSTER ORIGINALS LTD. Circle No. 12
924 Madison Ave. New York, NY 10021 (212) 861-0422
158 Spring Street New York, NY 10012 (212) 226-7720
Major Distributor of American and European Art Posters.

ART SUPPLIES

ARTISAN/SANTA FE, INC. Circle No. 13
717 Canyon Road
Santa Fe, NM 87501 (505) 988-2179
Materials for the Serious Artist. Blockx, LeFrank, Rowney, Winsor & Newton, Rembrandt, Holbein.

ARTHUR BROWN & BRO., INC Circle No. 14
2 West 46 Street
New York, NY 10036 (212) 575-5555
America's Largest Art Materials Distributor.
Home of the International Pen Shop.

EASTERN ARTISTS & DRAFTING MATERIALS 15
352 Park Avenue South
New York, NY 10010 (212) 725-5555
Everything for the Artist, Draftsman, Photo-Studio at 20% to 50% off list.

GRUMBACHER Circle No. 16
460 West 34th Street
New York, NY 10001 (212) 279-6400
Fine quality art materials since 1905.
See what our art can do for yours.

JERRY'S ARTARAMA, INC. Circle No. 17
248-12X Union Turnpike
Bellerose, NY 11426
Huge savings on art materials and picture frames.

KENNETH LYNCH & SONS Circle No. 18
Box 488, Wilton, CT 06897 (203) 762-8363
Picture hanging rods, mouldings, security devices, stanchions, vitrines, art storage racks, gallery carts, tablets, and plaques. FREE CATALOG.

PEARL PAINT CO. Circle No. 19
2411 Hempstead Turnpike
East Meadow, NY 11554 (516) 731-3726
Largest art supply discount center for the professional.

RISING PAPER COMPANY Circle No. 20
Dennis M. O'Connor
Housatonic, MA 01236 (413) 274-3345
Manufacturers of Mirage, Dansk, Stonehenge, and more. Now in pads.

Continued

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

ART SERVICES

THE SAINT ARMAND PAPER MILL, INC. Circle No. 21
110 Young
Montreal, Canada H3C 2E7 (514) 935-7526
Finest Linen watercolor papers.
22x30, 300 lbs., $7.50/sheet: samples.

SHIVA® INC. Circle No. 22
4320 West 190th Street
Torrance, CA 90509 (213) 542-5583
Artists PAINTSTIK®, solid oil paint in stick form.
Call (800) 421-1325

THE STRETCHER COMPANY Circle No. 23
153 Waverly Place
New York, NY 10014 (212) 989-3939
Custom artists stretchers. Canvas, stretching, stripping, etc.

UTRECHT Circle No. 24
33 Thirty-Fifth Street
Brooklyn, NY 11232 (212) 768-2525
Major Manufacturer & Distributor of Art & Drafting Supplies at Impressive Savings. Free Catalog.

WINSOR & NEWTON Circle No. 25
555 Winsor Drive
Secaucus, NJ 07094
Manufacturers of the world's finest artists' materials since 1832.

ARTS ATTORNEYS

KAUFMAN AND GARSHELL Circle No. 26
275 Madison Avenue, Suite 1501
New York, New York 10016 (212) 683-9330
Legal Representation in the Arts for Fine Artists, Galleries, Collectors, Publishers and Distributors.

EXHIBITION CATALOGUES

WORLDWIDE BOOKS Circle No. 27
Brian Gold 37 Antwerp Street
Boston, MA 02135 (617) 787-9100
The foremost specialist in Int'l Art Exhibition Catalogues since 1960.

FINE ART PHOTOGRAPHERS

THOMAS MOON PHOTOGRAPHY Circle No. 28
1 Holden Street
Brookline, MA 02146 (617) 232-8044
Photography Services for the Fine Arts. Black & White, Color, INFRARED. Print or Transparency. All formats.

LINDA M. WATSON PHOTOGRAPHY Circle No. 29
45 Lila Road
Boston, MA 02130 (617) 522-8469
Fine Art Photographer. Paintings and Sculptures in any size.
Transparency or Black & White. Studio or Location.

FINE ART PRINTERS

COLOR Q AFFORDABLE
FINE ART REPRODUCTIONS Circle No. 30
2835 Springboro Dayton OH 45439 (513) 294-0406 Get your FREE booklet: "How to gain wider recognition for your artistry, and make more money, too."

CINDI ETTINGER Circle No. 31
142 Vine Street
Philadelphia, PA 19106 (215) 928-9897
Printing Services, Instruction and Plate Restoration.
Will Collaborate with Artist.

FINE ART PUBLISHERS

GONDECK GALLERY AND PUBLISHER Circle No. 32
211 Old Santa Fe Trail
Santa Fe, NM 87501 (505) 988-3580
Original Graphics, Lithographs, Serigraphs, etchings of contemp. Indian artists. Specializing in Kevin Red Star.

FINE ART TRAVEL

ART EXPLORER'S TOURS Circle No. 33
P.O. Box 26689-P
San Francisco, CA 94126 (415) 921-7677
Egypt & Kenya Feb. '83, China May '83, Africa Aug '83
Sao Paulo Biennale Oct '83, Venice Biennale Sept '84

FOUNDRIES/FABRICATORS

MATTHEWS CLASSIC BRONZE DIVISION 34
2230 North Chico Avenue
South El Monte, CA 91733 (213) 444-0468
Our lost wax casting capabilities assure the quality and fidelity of your art. Contact Mel Schelbauer.

JOEL MEISNER FOUNDRY & GALLERY Circle No. 35
120 Fairchild Avenue
Plainview, NY 11803 (516) 349-0260, (212) 895-1472
THE COMPLETE CENTER FOR BRONZE SCULPTURE: for the Sculptor . . . for the Collector . . . for the Art Dealer & Publisher.

FRAMERS

AESTHETIC FRAME DESIGN Circle No. 36
800 Traction Avenue
Los Angeles, CA 90013 (213) 680-4710
Wholesale Custom Framing Specializing in Archival Presentation for Artists, Galleries, Museums, Consultants.

JACK BARNETT CUSTOM FRAMES Circle No. 37
144 North Second Street
Philadelphia, PA 19106 (215) 629-1766
Specializing in Molded Plexi Frames, U.F.3. Fully Rounded Leaf Frames, Complete Frame Restoration.

ART SERVICES

BRADIN CUSTOM FRAMING Circle No. 38
3646 South Westshore Blvd.
Tampa, FL 33609 (813) 837-5916
Archival Framing, Nielson Metal Molding for Artists, Designers. Wood Frames. Wholesale.

GREY GOOSE CUSTOM FRAMING Circle No. 39
5046 West Pico Blvd.
Los Angeles, CA 90019 (213) 938-6795
Art Framing to Museum Standards. Plexiglass, Aluminum, Brass, Hardwood. Wholesale.

MARK L.V. FRAMES Circle No. 40
330 Hudson Street
New York, NY 10013 (212) 620-0522
Museum Quality Custom Framing.
Poster Mountings. Plexiboxes.

TURNER FRAMING Circle No. 41
7508 Leesburg Pike, Falls Church, VA 22043
Serving Washington D.C. Metropolitan Area
Excellence in Quality Custom Framing. Private Individual and Commercial Accounts.

WALLNUTS FRAME DESIGN Circle No. 42
2018 Locust Street
Philadelphia, PA 19103 (215) 732-8850
Design Consultants to PROFESSIONAL PICTURE FRAMERS ASSOC.
Museum Matting, Exotic Woods, Acrylic Boxes, Pedestals.

HANGING & DISPLAY EQUIPMENT

WALKER SYSTEMS, INC. Circle No. 43
530 South 21 Avenue East
Duluth, MN 55812 (218) 728-4434
Picture Hanging Devices (Rails, Rods, Hooks, Holders)
Panel Hardware for freestanding displays & exhibits.

INSURANCE

FLATHER & HAYES COMPANY, INC. Circle No. 44
888 Seventeenth Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20006
(202) 466-8888
Fine arts insurance for collectors and dealers.

GREAT NORTHERN BROKERAGE CORP. 45
Norman Newman or Larry Morreale
950 Third Ave
New York, NY 10022 (212) 371-2800
Insurance Specialists to the Art World.

MOVERS AND PACKERS

AIR CARGO EXPRESS Circle No. 46
7851 Airpark Drive
Gaithersburg, MD 20879 (202) 258-0955
Door to Door by Air, Nation and Worldwide
Pick-up and Crating.

PRO-PAK PROFESSIONAL PACKERS, INC.® 47
527 Dundee Road
Northbrook, IL 60062 (312) 272-0408
Fine Arts Packing, Crating and Shipping Specialists.
Pick-up and Delivery Service. Full Insurance Coverage.

SCREEN PRINTING SUPPLIES

ADVANCE PROCESS SUPPLY COMPANY 48
400 North Noble Street
Chicago, Il 60622 (312) 942-8538
Manufacturer of everything for the screen printer: inks, Supplies, equipment. Offers seminars, technical assistance.

SCULPTURE SUPPLIES

CUYAMUNGUE STONE COMPANY Circle No. 49
Route 5, P.O. Box 360B
Santa Fe, New Mexico 87501 (505) 455-7915
Translucent Italian Alabaster, Oklahoma Alabaster.
All Types Marble. African Wonderstone and More . . .

PREMIER WAX CO., INC. Circle No. 50
3327 Hidden Valley Drive
Little Rock, Arkansas 72212
(501) 225-2925
Microcrystalline Waxes for Casting and Sculpture.

Art in America REPLY COUPON
Reader Service Dept., 850 Third Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10022

FEBRUARY 1983
THIS COUPON EXPIRES
April 30, 1983

NAME (PLEASE PRINT) ____________ TELEPHONE ____________
ADDRESS ____________
CITY ____________ STATE ______ ZIP ______

Art Services & Schools

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12
13 14 15 16 17 18 19 20 21 22 23 24
25 26 27 28 29 30 31 32 33 34 35 36
37 38 39 40 41 42 43 44 45 46 47 48 49 50

◁ Please send information circled.

ALLOW 6-8 WEEKS FOR DELIVERY

VOL
71
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION DIRECTORY

A guide to current exhibitions abroad

ARGENTINA	BUENOS AIRES	☎ 54 (1)
	RUTH BENZACAR Talcahuano 1216-1° • Tel. 41-8549, 42-5614/5566	Arnaiz, Aizenberg, Audivert, Benedit, Benguria, Cáceres, Castille, De Monte, Esteves, Kleiman, Puente, Robirosa, Smoje, Torroja, Vegezzi.
	DEL RETIRO Florida 943 • Tel. 32.5850	Gallery artists: Pablo Bobbi, Marcello Bonevardi, Sergio Camporalle, Dalla Cujat, Lea Lublin, Aldo Parella, Daniel Selaga.
AUSTRIA	INNSBRUCK	☎ 43 (5222)
	KRINZINGER Adolf Pichlerplatz 8 • Tel. 32.131	Until Feb. 12, Martin Walde; Feb. 14-March 5, group show of young Austrian artists: P. Kogler, C. Kaletsch, T. Stimm, E. Trawöger
	VIENNA	☎ 43 (222)
	ARIADNE Bäckerstrasse 6 • Tel. 52.94.79	Thomas Reinhold, paintings and drawings
	GALERIE HUMMEL Bäckerstrasse 14 • Tel. 52 12 96	Feb. 1-27, Franz West, paintings and objects
	GRITA INSAM + GALERIE H Köllnerhofg. 6 • Tel. 52.53.30	Jan. 29-Mar. 5, General Idea's Jorge Zontal curated by AA Bronson & Felix Partz Feb. 2-Mar. 5, "Neuschnee," Young and unknown artists from Austria & South Tyrol
	NÄCHST ST. STEPHAN Grunangergasse 1/11 II • Tel. 52.12.66	Feb. 2-27, young Austrian artists: Manfred Schuh, Erwin Wurn, Gewald Roggenschaub (Catalogue available)
	ULYSSES Opernring 21 • Tel. 57.12.26.	Peter Blaas
BELGIUM	ANTWERP	☎ 32 (2)
	AVANTGRADE Volkstraat 60 • Tel. 216.04.81	Jan. 11-Feb. 3, Roger Van Buick, installation Until Feb. 20, Urbain Mulkers
	MICHELE LACHOWSKY 27 Waalse Kaai • Tel. 237.23.93
	LENS FINE ART Mechelsesteenweg 146 • Tel. 237.68.57	Ger Lataster
	"121" Mechelsesteenweg 121 • Tel. 218.68.73	Luigi Ontani: "Masks"
	BRUSSELS	☎ 32 (2)
	ALBERT BARONIAN 89, Avenue Emile de Beco • Tel. 647.3414	Georg Baselitz, watercolors and drawings
	ISY BRACHOT 62a, Avenue Louise • Tel. 511.05.25	Until Feb. 19, Jacques Lennep (Belgian artist) Feb. 23-Mar. 26, Vasilije Jordan (Yugoslavian artist)
	CAMOMILLE 30, Rue Vilain XIV • Tel. 649.23.68	As of Feb. 12, Jan Voss

	BRUSSELS (CONT'D)	☎ 32 (2)
	FABIEN DE CUGNAC 55, Rue de Livourne • Tel. 537.14.15	Accrochage
	CHARLES KRIWIN 20, Rue de Belle-Vue • Tel. 647.3109	International Accrochage
	PALAIS DES BEAUX ARTS 10, Rue Royale • Tel. 512.04.03	Feb. 18-Mar. 6, Foire des Antiquaires
	POST-SCRIPTUM 37, Rue des Eperonniers • Tel. 511.96.43	Books and catalogues on contemporary art and photography, records.
	GHENT	☎ 32 (91)
	BARONIAN/LAMBERT Oudburg 22 • Tel. 254.057	Futura 2000
	RICHARD FONCKE 18 St. Janvest • Tel. 23.81.28
	GEWAD 23 Gewad • Tel. 25.56.16
	MUSEUM HEDENDAAGSE K'NST. Citadelpark • Tel. 21.17.03	Willi Baumeister (in collaboration with the Goethe Institute Brussels)
	KNOKKE	☎ 32 (50)
	ELISABETH FRANCK 124 Kustlaan • Tel. 606.881	The gallery is closed until the 1st of March.
COLOMBIA	BOGOTA	☎ 57
	QUINTANA Carrera 11 N° 85-62 • Tel. 236.8226	XIXth and XXth Century paintings: Botero, Degas, Gauguin, Hockney, Matisse, Moore, Picasso, Rodin, Vuillard
ENGLAND	CAMBRIDGE	☎ 44 (223)
	KETTLE'S YARD GALLERY Northampton Street • Tel. 352.124	Until Feb. 20, Victor Willing, paintings since 1978 Feb. 26-Apr. 10, Paper as image
	LONDON	☎ 44 (1)
	ANNE BERTHOUD GALLERY 1 Langley Court • Tel. 836.73.57	Until Feb. 16, Frank Auerbach, studies for paintings Feb. 24-Mar. 31 Alexandra Leadbeater "Music Room"
	ART HOUSE 213 South Lambeth Road • Tel. 735.2192	Contemporary British Artists represented. Also Outsider art. By appointment.
	IAN BIRKSTED 37 Great Russell Street • Tel. 637.2673	Feb. 8-Mar. 9, Nicholas Volley, paintings
	BLOND FINE ART 33 Sackville Street • Tel. 437.1230	British drawings 1900-1950, D. Bomberg, A. Gross, E. Gill, D. Jones, Meninsky, J. Nash, P. Nash, W. Roberts, C. Wood; Feb. 24-Mar. 19, C. Ardizzone
	CHRISTIE'S PRINT COLL'CTION 8 Dover Street • Tel. 499.6701	Graphics by British and international artists. Hockney, Moore, Sutherland, Miró, Chagall, others. Catalog (quote AIAIED).
	ANTHONY d'OFFAY 23 Dering Street • Tel. 499.4695	Until Feb. 15, Francesco Clemente, paintings and drawings As of end Feb, Mario Merz
	12 DUKE STREET GALLERY Duke Street, St. James • Tel. 930.52.47	19th and 20th century paintings, drawings and sculpture
	FISCHER FINE ART 30 King Street, SW1 • Tel. 839.3942	Until Feb. 19, Gerardo Pita, recent paintings and drawings Feb. 24-Mar. 25, Tim Storrier
	GIMPEL FILS 30 Davies Street • Tel. 493.2488	Until Feb. 19, Stroke, Line and Figure, paper works by 15 artists Feb. 22-Mar. 19, Rafael Mahdavi, paintings
	NIGEL GREENWOOD, INC. 41 Sloane Gardens • Tel. 730.8824	Portfolios by Baldessari, Borofsky, Chia, Clemente, Cucchi, Disler, Penck, Winnewisser, published by Peter Blum Editions, New York
	I.C.A. The Mall, SW1. • Tel. 930.3647	Until Feb. 20, Art and Architecture: Ten new buildings, Aldo Rossi: Projects and drawings.
	NICOLA JACOBS 9 Cork Street • Tel. 437.3868	Feb. 1-26, Georges Rousse, photographs
	BERNARD JACOBSON, LTD. 2A Cork Street • Tel. 439.8355	William Tillyer

VOL 71
ISS 2
FE 1983
UMI

LONDON (CONT'D)	☎ 44 (1)
LEWIS JOHNSTONE GALLERY 7 Bolton Gardens (Old Brompton Rd.) • Tel. 373.1192	Feb. 3-26, Peter Lloyd-Jones
ANNELY JUDA/JUDA ROWAN 11 Tottenham Mews • Tel. 637.5517/8	Until Mar. 5, Arp, Stazewski, Vantongerloo etc.; Juda Rowan Gallery's choice from the Tokyo gallery, Japan: Minoru Kawabata, Lee U. Fan, Yoshishige Saito
KNOEDLER GALLERY (Kasmin, Director) 22 Cork Street • Tel. 439.1096	Norbert Prangenberg, recent paintings and objects
LISSON GALLERY (Nicholas Logsdail) 66/68 Bell Street • Tel. 262.1539	Richard Deakon
MAYOR GALLERY 22A Cork Street • Tel. 734.3558	Ivor Abrahams, recent works
PETERSBURG PRESS 59A Portobello Road • Tel. 229.0105	Roy Lichtenstein, "7 Apple Woodcuts" Howard Hodgkin, 5 lithographs
PICCADILLY GALLERY 16 Cork Street • Tel. 499.4632	Mixed exhibition of gallery artists: Graham Arnold, Rosie Lee, Graham Ovendeu, David Tindle R.A., Peter Unsworth.
REDFERN GALLERY 20 Cork Street • Tel. 734.17.32 734.05.78	XXth Century paintings, drawings, sculpture and graphics
EDWARD TOTAH GALLERY 39 Floral Street • Tel. 379.6241	Until Feb. 12, Gavin Jantjes, recent paintings Feb. 17-Mar. 19, Picasso, 45 etchings from series: "Caisse à Remordre" (Catalogue available)
WADDINGTON GALLERIES 2, 4 & 34 Cork St. • Tel. 439.1866	"Groups"
OXFORD	☎ 44 (865)
MUSEUM OF MODERN ART 30 Pembroke Street • Tel. 722.733	Feb. 6-Mar. 13, painter as photographer; Feb. 6-Mar. 27, R. Mason, sculptures; bronzes & drawings 1952-82, Oxford Printmakers Co-operative, recent work
SOUTHAMPTON	☎ 44 (703)
JOHN HANSARD GALLERY The University, Southampton • Tel. 559.122	Feb. 7-Mar. 12, Objects and figures, recent development in British sculpture

FRANCE

BORDEAUX	☎ 33 (56)
C.A.P.C. ENTREPOT LAINE Rue Ferrère • Tel. 44.16.35	Until Mar. 5, Castelli, Fetting, Salomé, paintings David Hockney photographs
CANNES	☎ 33 (9)
GALERIE HERBAGE 17, Rue des Etats-Unis • Tel. 39.19.15	En permenence: Calder, Max Ernst, Matisse, Miró, Picasso, Chadwick, Hepworth, Moore, Nicholson, Sutherland
LYONS	☎ 33 (7)
E.L.A.C. Centre d'Echanges Lyon Perrache • Tel. 842.27.39
LE NOUVEAU MUSEE 11, r. Dr. Dolard-69100 Villeurbanne • Tel. 884.55.10	Until Mar. 7, Richard Prince and Marianne Eigenheer
NICE	☎ 33 (93)
GALERIE PAUL HERVIEU 26, Rue Pastorelli • Tel. 80.02.10	Paintings and gouaches by Atlan, Clavé, Coignard, Goetz, Hélénon, Marchand des Raux, Papart and Key Sato.
PARIS	☎ 33 (1)
BAMA 40, Rue Quincampoix • Tel. 277.38.67	Until Mar. 5, Paula Gabriel: "The State of Being Side by Side"
BAR DE L'AVENTURE (Caroline Corre) 53, Rue Berthe • Tel. 255.37.76	Artists of the gallery
BEAUBOURG 23, Rue du Renard • Tel. 271.20.50	Until Feb. 19, Matta a retrospective of his work in the 50's
CLAUDE BERNARD 5-7-9, Rue des Beaux-Arts • Tel. 326.9707	Leonardo Cremonini, paintings and watercolors
ISY BRACHOT 35, Rue Guénégaud • Tel. 354.22.40	Until Feb. 26, Jan van Riet
GALERIE JEANNE BUCHER 53, Rue de Seine • Tel: 326.22.32. 326.75.23	Gérard Singer: "Le Permutant, dispositif paysagé"

PARIS (CONT'D)	☎ 33 (1)
FARIDEH CADOT 77, Rue des Archives • Tel. 278.0836	Feb. 2-26, Salomé
LOUIS CARRE ET CIE. 10, Avenue de Messine • Tel. 562.57.07	Accrochage
JEAN CHAUVELIN 147, Rue St. Martin • Tel. 887.77.76	Russian and European Constructivists, gallery artists.
CREATIS ESPACE ALTERNATIF 50, Rue du Temple • Tel. 887.28.56	Until Feb. 10, Eric Fayol Feb. 10-Mar. 26, "l'Emprise du signe"
CHANTAL CROUSEL 80, Rue Quincampoix • Tel. 887.6081	Until Feb. 16, Walter Dahn Feb. 19-Mar. 22, Bruce McLean, recent paintings
JACQUES DAMASE Galerie de Varenne, 61 Rue de Varenne, • Tel. 705.55.04	Presentation of the new magazine: "Pictura" and its artists: Jean-Paul Heraud, Himmhoff, Satjé-Viallat etc . . .
DURAND-DESSERT 3, Rue des Haudriettes • Tel. 277.6360	Stanley Brouwn
LE DESSIN 27, Rue Guenegaud • Tel. 633.04.66	Artists of the Gallery
ERIC FABRE 6, Rue du Pont de Lodi • Tel. 325.42.63	Until Feb. 19, "Présence Panchounette"
PAUL FACCHETTI 20, Avenue de Friedland • Tel. 563.80.26	By Appointment
KARL FLINKER 25, Rue de Tournon • Tel. 325.18.73	Until Mar. 5, Moninot, new work
GALERIE FARIS 50, Rue de l'Université • Tel. 544.29.48	Nasiri (Iraki painter), paintings and etchings
JEAN FOURNIER 44, Rue Quincampoix • Tel. 277.3231
GALERIE DE FRANCE 50-52, Rue de la Verrerie • Tel. 274.38.00	Domela, réalisations 1922-82
LILIANE FRANCOIS 15, Rue de Seine • Tel. 326.94.32	Until Feb. 20, Zenenhaus, sculpture and watercolors Feb. 22-Mar. 24, Duran, paintings
MAURICE GARNIER 6, Avenue Matignon • Tel. 225.61.65.	Bernard Buffet, permanently.
DANIEL GERVIS GALLERY 34, Rue du Bac • Tel. 261.11.73	Benrath, Constant, Dubuffet, Eterovic, Gerzo, Ghertman, Maleval, Montyn, Mutal, Nevelson, Olson, Pan, Pasotti, Toledo, others.
GILLESPIE/LAAGE/SALOMON 24, Rue Beaubourg • Tel. 278.1171	Until Feb. 19, Per Kirkeby Feb. 26-Mar. 26, Georg Baselitz, paintings and recent drawings
GALERIE MARWAN HOSS 12, Rue D'Alger • Tel. 296.39.45	"Important works: Masters of the 19th and 20th century," drawings and sculpture
SAMY KINGE 54, Rue de Verneuil • Tel. 261.1907	Until Feb. 26, Farchid Mesghali, drawings and sculpture
LAHUMIERE 88, Bd de Courcelles • Tel. 763.03.95	Poliakoff, an exhibition of works on paper, gouaches and lithographs of the 50's
LA HUNE GALERIE 14, Rue de l'Abbaye • Tel. 325.54.06	As of Feb. 10, Hayter, recent paintings
LA HUNE-LIBRAIRIE 170, Boulevard St. Germain • Tel. 548.35.85	Books, catalogues and magazines: Fine arts, literature, architecture, graphics, photography and fashion.
YVON LAMBERT 5, Rue de Grenier St. Lazare • Tel. 271.09.33	Reiner Fetting
GALERIE JEAN-PIERRE LAVIGNES 15, Rue St. Louis en l'Isle Paris • Tel. 633.5602	Feb. 1-19, Frédérique Parent: Oil on paper Feb. 22-Mar. 12, John Kaucher: nudes
BAUDOIN LEBON 36, Rue des Archives • Tel. 272.09.10	Feb. 16-Mar. 19, Monique Frydman, recent paintings
ADRIEN MAEGHT 46, Rue du Bac • Tel. 222.12.59	Xavier Grau, paintings Until Mar. 15, Jan Voss, etchings

VOL 71 ISS 2 FE 1983 UMI

PARIS (CONT'D) ☎ 33 (1)

GALERIE MAEGHT 13 & 14, Rue de Téhéran • Tel. 563.13.19	Henry Moore, sculpture and drawings 1972-1982, etchings and illustrated books
MUSEE D'ART MODERNE de la Ville • 11 Ave. Prés. Wilson • Tel. 723.61.27	Until Feb. 20 COBRA 1948-1951; Until Feb. 27, Daniel Graffin, sculpture; Until Feb. 10, Duane Michals
DENISE RENE 196, Blvd. St. Germain • Tel. 222.77.57	Maria Simon
DARTHEA SPEYER 6, Rue Jacques Callot • Tel. 354.78.41	Feb. 15-Mar. 19, Sam Gilliam
STADLER 51, Rue de Seine • Tel. 326.91.10	Feb. 19, Lucebert, paintings and drawings Feb. 24-Mar. 19, Accrochage of the artists of the gallery
NANE STERN 25, Ave. de Tourville • Tel. 705.08.46	Feb. 8-Mar. 19, Jean-Paul Jappé, recent paintings The gallery is open from 3-8:30 p.m. Tues. Fri, Sat. 10-12 a.m. & 3-8:30 p.m.
DANIEL TEMPLON 30, Rue Beaubourg • Tel. 272.14.10	Feb. 12-Mar. 10, Jean Le Gac
TRANS/FORM 22, Ave de la Bourdonnais • Tel. 550.40.32	"Exercice de style" Vincent Corpet, Marc Desgrandschamps
GALERIE VALLOIS 41, Rue de Seine • Tel. 329.50.94	Csaky, Blegas, Rodin, Dunand, Ruhlman, Franck, Cheret. Fine furniture of the Thirties.
ZABRISKIE 37, Rue Quincampoix • Tel. 272.35.47	Until Mar. 5, French artists from the 50's, small sized works

LES SABLES D'OLONNE ☎ 33 (51)

MUSEE DE L'ABBAYE STE. CROIX Rue de Verdun • Tel. 32.01.16	Victor Brauner, 11 recent acquisitions of the museum

ST. PAUL DE VENCE ☎ 33 (93)

FONDATION MAEGHT Saint Paul de Vence • Tel. 32.81.63	Feb. 5-Mar. 13, Anne Madden, recent drawings
GALERIE CATHERINE ISSERT Saint Paul de Vence • Tel. 32.96.92	Artist of the gallery: Ben, Boisrond, Christo, Pagès, Romeda, group show

TOULON ☎ 33 (94)

MUSEE DE TOULON 20, Boulevard Leclerc • Tel. 93.15.54	Until Mar. 6, Hélène and Rachel Theret.Anne Française; Collections: Painters from Toulon 17th to 20th Century.

GERMANY

BERLIN ☎ 49 (30)

GALERIE LIETZOW Knesebeckstrasse 32 • Tel. 881.28.95	Feb. 12-Mar. 19, Accrochage: Amat, Caballero, Castelli, Santarossa, Salomé, Vogt
R. ONNASCH AUSTELLUNGEN Niebuhrstr. 5 • Tel. 882.77.18	Until Mar. 12, Dieter Roth, "Ladenhüter"
GALERIE POLL Lützowplatz 7 • Tel. 261.70.91	Until Feb. 13, Harald Duwe, paintings Feb. 14-Mar. 31, Lambert M. Wintersberger
GALERIE FOLKER SKULIMA Niebuhrstrasse 2 • Tel. 881.8280	Joan Miró, "The Childhood of Ubu," watercolors from 1953

BONN ☎ 49 (228)

GALERIE LINSSEN Prinz-Albert-Strasse 47 • Tel. 21.89.09	German Expressionists. Russian Avant Garde. International classics. Osvaldo Romberg and Jan Voss.

COLOGNE ☎ 49 (221)

ERVEN'S ART SERVICE Theodor-Heuss Ring 10 • Tel. 12.34.36	We hang the shows
GALERIE GMURZYNSKA Obenmarspforten 21 • Tel. 23.66.21/2	Accrochage
GALERIE KARSTEN GREVE Wallrafplatz 3 • Tel. 21.39.21	Detlef Orlop, photographs
GALERIE HOLTMANN Richartzstr. 10 • Tel. 21.51.50	Charly Banana
GALERIE JOLLENBECK Lindenstrasse 20 • Tel. 24.67.59	The gallery is closed until April

COLOGNE (CONT'D)	☎ 49 (221)
RUDOLF KICKEN Albertusstrasse 47/49 • Tel. 21.02.34
KÖLNISCHER KUNSTVEREIN Josef-Haubrich-Hof 1 • Tel. 21.70.21/221.3740	"9 in Cologne" (9 painters from Cologne)
PAUL MAENZ Schaafenstrasse 25 • Tel. 21. 81.02	Until Feb. 22, Walter Dahn As of Feb. 25, Giulio Paolini
GALERIE ORANGERIE REINZ Helenstrasse 2 • Tel. 23.46.84	Henning von Gierke, new works
GALERIE RECKERMANN Albertusstr. 16 • Tel. 21.20.64
GALERIE ROLF RICKE Volksgartenstrasse 10 • Tel. 31.57.17	Helmut Dorner, drawings and sculpture
GALERIE WENTZEL St. Apernstrasse 26 • Tel. 24.24.00	Claude Viallat; Paul Suter, sculpture
MICHAEL WERNER Gertrudenstrasse. 24/28 • Tel. 21.06.61	Höckelmann, sculpture and etchings
GALERIE RUDOLF ZWIRNER Albertusstrasse 18 • Tel. 23.58.37/8	Ed Paschke, Roger Brown, Jim Nutt

DUSSELDORF	☎ 49 (211)
KONRAD FISCHER Platanenstrasse 7 • Tel. 685.908	Bruce Norman
GALERIE GMYREK Mutter-Ey-Strasse 5. • Tel. 32.77.70	K. H. Hödicke, "Standbilder," 1980-82
DENISE RENE HANS MAYER Grabbeplatz 2 • Tel. 36.59.72	David Stoltz
KUNSTVEREIN RHEINLANDE/WESTFALEN Grabbeplatz 4 • Tel. 327.023	Konrad Klapheck, drawings, paintings and graphics 1971-1982

HAMBURG	☎ 49 (40)
THOMAS LEVY GALERIE Tesdorpfstrasse 18 • Tel. 45.91.88.	Wolff Buchholz, new works
GALERIE MUNRO Barmbeker Str. 138 • Tel. 48.45.52.	K. H. Hödicke, paintings and works on paper
GALERIE NEUENDORF Feldstrasse, Hochhaus 1 • Tel. 43.11.75	Emilio Vedova

MUNICH	☎ 49 (89)
GALERIE + EDITION A Amalienstrasse 81 & 87 • Tel: 28.13.64/28.84.45
GALERIE SIX FRIEDRICH Maximilianstrasse. 15 • Tel. 29.50.21 & 29.61.10
TANIT Maximilianstr. 36 • Tel. 29.22.33	Franco Dellerbe, Günther Thorn, Joel Fisher, Eric Snell, Marianne Eigenheer: "New Sculpture"

NUREMBERG	☎ 49 (911)
GALERIE JOHANNA RICARD Königstrasse 33/37 • Tel. 22.50.20	Russian Avant-Garde

STUTTGART	☎ 49 (711)
MAX-ULRICH HETZLER GmbH Schwabstrasse 2 • Tel. 62.15.38	Until Feb. 10, Andreas Schulze, paintings Feb. 13-Mar. 10, K.R.H. Sonderborg, paintings

GREECE

ATHENS	☎ 30 (1)
KAREN & JEAN BERNIER Marasli 51 • Tel. 723.5657	Jan Dibbets, new works

HOLLAND

AMSTERDAM	☎ 31 (20)
GALERIE KRIKHAAR Spuistraat 330 • Tel. 26.71.66	Appel, Brands, Constant, Corneille, Cottavoz, Henning-Pedersen, Lindstrom, Saura, Sonderlinque and others.
STEDELIJK MUSEUM Paulus Potterstraat 13 • Tel. 73 21 66	Until Feb. 13, Polish, French & German posters; Until Feb. 6, C. Sherman, photos Philip Guston, paintings 1969-1980; Feb. 18-Apr. 10, B. Akkerman, retrospective

VOL 7 1
ISS 2
FE 1983
UMI

EINDHOVEN ☎ 31 (40)

STEDELIJK VAN ABBEMUSEUM
Bilderdijklaan 10 • Tel. 44.85.55
Until Mar. 6, Markus Lüpertz

ITALY

BARI ☎ 39 (80)

MARILENA BONOMO
Via Nicolò dell' Arca 19 • Tel. 21.01.45

BOLOGNA ☎ 39 (51)

DE FOSCHERARI
Via Goidanich 1 • Tel. 27.52.26.
"Idea del Oro", Bartolini, Ceroli, Cotani, Jori, Manai, Melotti, Mattiacci, Nagasawa, Morales, Penone, Pozzati, Turcato, Sartelli

FABJBASAGLIA
Via Farini 26 • Tel. 23.49.22.
Feb. 18-25, ARCO stand 217, Benati, Benuzzi, Esposito, Landi, Maraniello, Pintori

GALLERIA FORNI
Via Farini 26 • Tel. 27.07.60
Allen Jones

STUDIO G7, G. GRIGOLO
Via Val d'Aposa 7C • Tel. 26.64.97.
Renato Boero

BRESCIA ☎ 39 (30)

MASSIMO MININI
Via Apollonio, 68 • Tel. 56.275
Group show, early works by Giovanni Anselmo, Alighiero Boetti, Luciano Fabro, Jannis Kounellis, Paolo Icaro, Giulio Paolini, Salvo

PIERO CAVELLINI
Via Fratelli Bandiera 18 • Tel. 57.401
Until Feb. 18, Furugor, sculpture
As of Feb. 18, Radu Dragumirescu, paintings

FLORENCE ☎ 39 (55)

GALLERIA SCHEMA
Via della vigna nuova 17. • Tel. 28.40.90.
By appointment

MILAN ☎ 39 (2)

SALVATORE ALA
Via Mameli 3 • Tel. 716-500
Giuseppe Penone

ARIETE GRAFICA
Via S. Andrea, 5 • Tel. 79.55.73
Michelangelo Pistoletto

ARTE BORGOGNA
Via Borgogna 7 • Tel. 709.330 704.826
Group show of 22 artists: Corneille, Dova, Hartung, Lam, Rotella, Schifano, Vasarely

ARTRA/STUDIO
Via Fiori Chiari 8 • Tel. 861.190
Buren, Erben, Gierke, Griffa, Cotani, Pinelli,
Verna, Viallat, Dezeuze, Gianfranco Notargiacomo

STUDIO CANNAVIELLO
Piazza Beccaria 10 • Tel. 837.6368
Martin Disler

DIAGRAMMA
(Luciano Inga Pin) Via Pontaccio 12a • Tel. 874.237
"Plum Cake" Gianni Cella, Romolo Pallotto, Claudio Regni, Luciano Palmieri

DISEGNI DI ARCHITETTURA
Antonia Jannone Via del Carmine 5 • Tel. 878.384
Architecture drawings, stage design, classical and modern

STUDIO CARLO GROSSETTI
Via dei Piatti 9 • Tel. 837.5594
Stanislas Kolibal

FRANCOISE LAMBERT
Bastioni di Porta Nuova 11 • Tel. 650.087
Roberto Caspani

LORENZELLI ARTE
Via Sant'Andrea 19 • Tel. 783.035
Feb. 15-Mar. 15, Alberto Magnelli

STUDIO MARCONI
Via Tadino 15 • Tel. 225.543
Pardi, Spoldi, Tadini

GALLERIA DEL MILIONE
Via Bigli 21 • Tel. 780.879
Chiappori
Saporiti

MASSIMO MININI
Via Cavalieri des S. Sepolcro • Tel. 86.71.30
Salvo, recent work

GALLERIA SENO
Via Ciovasso 11 • Tel. 805.80.64
Enrico Baj

GALLERIA STENDHAL
Via Santo Spirito 10 • Tel. 781.825
Sculpture and architecture; Andrea Cascella, Gio Pomodoro: Projects for Linate and Malpensa airports

MILAN (CONT'D) ☎ 39 (2)

GALLERIA 32 Via Brera 6 • Tel. 86 76 29	Gloxe de Micheli
FRANCO TOSELLI Via del Carmine 9 • Tel. 805.0434	Bill Woodrow

MODENA ☎ 39 (59)

GALLERIA EMILIO MAZZOLI Via Nazario Sauro 58a • Tel. 357.605/243.455	Agnetti, Boetti, Calzolari, Chia, Clemente, Cucchi, De Maria, Germanà, Paladino, Schifano, Turcato.

NAPLES ☎ 39 (81)

LUCIO AMELIO Piazza del Martiri 58. • Tel. 42.20.23/769.0521	Until Feb. 15, Three works by A.R. Penck, Gerhard Richter, Anselm Kiefer part of Terrae Motus Series, Feb. 15-28, James Brown, part of Terrae Motus Series

ROME ☎ 39 (6)

GALLERIA ANNA D'ASCANIO Via del Babuino, 29 • Tel. 678.5920	The gallery is present at ARCO in Madrid Feb. 18-25, Enzo Cucchi, Balla Burri, Tucato
GIULIANA DE CRESCENZO Via del Paradiso 41 • Tel. 656.9846
UGO FERRANTI Via di Tor Millina 26 • Tel. 654.2146	Collective show
L'ISOLA Via Gregoriana 5 • Tel. 679.00.29./678.54.77	Luisa Gardini, recent works Marco Gastini, new paintings
GALLERIA IL PONTE Via S. Ignazio 6 • Tel. 679.6114	As of Feb. 8, Alexander Liberman: retrospective: 20 years of paintings on paper
PRIMO PIANO Via Vittoria 32 • Tel. 678.00.39	Artists' Books
SPROVIERI 3 Piazzi del Popolo • Tel. 360.8918/361.0975	Futurism Dada Surrealism.
TONINELLI 86 Piazza di Spagna • Tel. 679.34.88	Important sculpture by: Bodini, Fontana, Marini, Arturo Martini, Melotti, Moore, Medardo Rosso, Schmettau, Vangi.

TURIN ☎ 39 (11)

GIORGIO PERSANO Via dei Mille 29 • Tel. 835.527	Until end Feb., Michelangelo Pistoletto
TUCCI RUSSO Corso Tassoni 56 • Tel. 779.304	Until Mar. 10, Luigi Mainolfi
CHRISTIAN STEIN Piazza San Carlo 206 • Tel. 535.574	Giulio Paolini
ALBERTO WEBER Via S. Francesco da Paola 4 • Tel. 839.7493	Salvatore Astore, La Centralita

VERONA ☎ 39 (45)

STUDIO LA CITTA Via Samaritana 10 • Tel. 25.728	30 gouaches and watercolors 1925-1935 by Sonia Delaunay Photographs by Enzo and Rafaello Bassotto

SPAIN

ALMAGRO ☎ 34 (926)

FUCARES San Francisco, 2 & 3 • Tel. 86 09 02	Vargas

BARCELONA ☎ 34 (3)

GALERIA CIENTO Consejo de Ciento 347 • Tel. 215.63 65	Until Feb. 12, Susana Solano, sculpture; Feb. 18-25, ARCO 1983 in Madrid: Luis Frangella, Xavier Franguesa, Ramon Herreros
SALA GASPAR Consejo de Ciento, 323 • Tel. 318.87.401.318.87.36	Alfaro, Arranz Bravo, Bartolozzi, Clavé, Fenosa, Gudiol, Ibars, Llové, Miró, Picasso, Riera, Rojas, Tarrats, Torralba, Vila-Casas, Viladecans, Villelia.
GALERIA MAEGHT Calle Montcada 25 • Tel. 310.42.45	Manolo Valdés, paintings and sculpture
RENE METRAS Consejo de Ciento 331 • Tel. 302.05 39	Genovart
LA CAIXA DE PENSIONS Passeig Sant Joan 108 • Tel. 258.89.07
GALERIA JOAN PRATS Rambla Catalunya 54 • Tel. 216.02.84	Fina Miralles, "Works in the space"

VOL 71
ISS 2
FE 1983
UMI

BARCELONA (CONT'D) ☎ 34 (3)

GALERIA TRECE
Rambla Catalunya, 49 • Tel. 318.08.73.
Argimon

BILBAO ☎ 34 (4)

GALERIA DE ARTE MUN
Gran Via 60 • Tel. 441. 24 00
Gallery Artists

IBIZA BALEARES ☎ 34 (71)

GALERIA ES MOLI
Carretera San Miguel Sta Gertrudis
Azocar, Bechtold, Calbet, Faber, Galbraith, Hedrich, Kugler, Monreal, Segui, Tomlin, Villanueva, Zush.

MADRID ☎ 34 (1)

OBRA CULTURAL "LA CAIXA"
Paseo Castellana 51 • Tel. 419.0440
"Italia: La Transvanguardia"
"German Expressionists," Collection Buchheim

GALERIA KREISLER DOS
Hermosilla 8 • Tel. 431.42.64

EGAM
Villanueva 29 • Tel. 435 3161
Francesco Soto Mesa

GALERIA HEINRICH EHRHARDT
Barquillo 44 • Tel. 276.17.28
Siegfried Anzinger, Hubert Schmalix

GALERIA JUANA MORDO
Villanueva 7 • Tel. 435.84.42
Feb. 8-Mar. 5, Leopoldo Novoa, recent works, mixed media

GALERIA DE ARTE MUN
Hermosilla 26 • Tel. 401.01.92
Alberdi, sculpture

RAYUELA
Claudio Coello 19 • Tel. 275 3146
Angel Orcajo

GALERIA SEN
Nunez de Balboa 37 • Tel. 435 52 02
José Morea, drawings and paintings

GALERIA THEO
Marqués de la Ensenada, 2 • Tel. 410.26.51
Until Feb. 15, Alfaro
As of Feb. 17, Cesar Manrique

TORCULO GRAPHICS & BOOKS
Claudio Coello 17 • Tel. 275 86 86
Mari Puri Herrero

GALERIA FERNANDO VIJANDE
Nuñez de Balboa 65 • Tel. 435 8025
Until Feb. 15, Andy Warhol
As of Feb. 17, Colectiva Mosaico

GALERIA YNGUANZO
Antonio Maura 12 • Tel. 231 54 10
Ricardo Cristobal

MURCIA ☎ 34 (68)

GALERIA YERBA
Vinadel 6 • Tel. 21 00 15
Ferrán García Sevilla

SEVILLE ☎ 34 (54)

GALERIA JUANA DE AIZPURU
Calle Canalejas. 10 • Tel. 22.85.01

SWEDEN

MALMO ☎ 46 (40)

GALERIE NORDENHAKE
Ostra Ronneholmsvagen 5 • Tel. 23.15.33
Curt Hillfor, paintings

STOCKHOLM ☎ 46 (8)

KONSTRUKTIV TENDENS
Nybrogatan 69 • Tel. 61.16.65/61.50.65
Hans Hinterreiter, gouaches from 1932-1982;
Klaus J. Schoen, systematic paintings, 1970-1982

SWITZERLAND

BASEL ☎ 41 (61)

KUNSTHALLE BASEL
Steinenberg 7 • Tel. 23.48.33
Malcolm Morley, retrospective,
David Hockney, photos

GALERIE BEYELER
Baumleingasse 9 • Tel. 23.54.12
Samuel Buri

FELIX HANDSCHIN GALERIE
Petersgraben 18 • Tel. 25.59.85
Until Feb. 28, Reminiscences from the 60's

BERNE	☎ 41 (31)
MARBACH Wasserwerkgasse 37 • Tel. 22.42.05/22.38.25	Contemporary art. By appointment only.

GENEVA	☎ 41 (22)
GALERIE BONNIER 4, Rue Saint-Laurent • Tel. 35.87.35	Paul Rotterdam, drawings and recent paintings
CENTRE D'ART CONTEMPORAIN 16, Rue d'Italie • Tel. 28.88.03	Group show
ECART/BOOKS & FLUXKIOSK 16, Rue d'Italie • Tel. 31.34.73, & 28.88.03	Artists Books, Catalogues and Magazines.
GALERIE ERIC FRANCK 15 Route de Florissant • Tel. 47.08.09	"Portraits" 1932-1982 by Henri Cartier Bresson
CLAUDE GIVAUDAN 3, Rue du Soleil-Levant • Tel. 29.91.61.	Kurt Seligmann, graphics, drawings & paintings. Just issued, Kurt Seligmann's graphic work.
MARIE-LOUISE JEANNERET 59, Avenue de Champel • Tel. 46.34.57	20th Century Masters—Picasso, Giacometti, Miró, Max Ernst, Léger, Tanguy, Klee, Kandinsky, Noland and Others
DANIEL VARENNE Galerie Clos de Sieme 15, Chemin de Sieme • 84.15.93	Impressionist and 20th Century masters. By appointment only
WEBER 13. Rue de Monthoux • Tel. 32.64.50	Patrick Llovera Loste, oil paintings André Bucher, Sculpture

ZURICH	☎ 41 (1)
THOMAS AMMANN FINE ART Restelbergstrasse 97 • Tel. 362.62.31	Impressionists & 20th Century Masters—by appointment only.
GALERIE BISCHOFBERGER Utoquai 29 • Tel. 910.43.62	Cucchi, Clemente, Chia, Schnabel, Salle, Basquiat, Salomé, Warhol, Tinguely
KONRAD FISCHER Ackerstrasse 44 • Tel. 42.71.61	Alan Charlton
GIMPEL • HANOVER • EMMERICH Tödistrasse 40 • Tel. 202.03.00	Louis Le Broquy, "Shakespeare"
M. KNOEDLER Kirchgasse 24 • Tel. 69 35 00	Feb. 12-Mar. 19, James Ensor
GALERIE MAEGHT Predigerplatz 10-12 • Tel. 251.11.20
MAURER Münstergasse 14-18 • Tel. 47.85.00	Alfred Klinkan
PETER NOSER St. Jakobstrasse 11 • Tel. 242.55.16	Mireille Wunderly Jean Pfaff
GALERIE SCHLEGL Minervastrasse 119 • Tel. 251.4963	Bernhard Lüthi, Brita Polzer
ANNEMARIE VERNA Mühlegasse 27 • Tel. 252.27.70	Emilio Vedova, works on paper
ANNEMARIE VERNA Röntgenstrasse 44 • Tel. 44.27.15	"Drawings-Disegni-Zeichnungen"
JAMILEH WEBER Schanzengasse 10 • Tel. 47.79.89	Aldo Rossi, paintings, drawings, graphics, models and projects Facsimile edition of illustrated manuscript of 100 pages
WORK GALLERY Trittligasse 24 • Tel. 482.39.58	Man Ray
RENÉE ZIEGLER Rämistrasse 34 • Tel. 251.23.22	Bernhard Luginbühl, drawings and etchings

VENEZUELA

CARACAS	☎ 58 (2)
DURBAN Calle Madrid-Urbanizacion Las Mercedes. • Tel. 92.42.31.	Spanish and American Contemporary Art.
GALERIA MINOTAURO Calle Madrid-Entre Mucuchies y Monterrey • Tel. 92 27 40	Corina Briceño, recent work.

VOL 71
ISS 2
FE 1983
UMI

Rosa Esman Gallery

29 West 57 Street
New York NY 10019

212
421 9490

New Work by Don Hazlitt February 15 to March 12, 1983

MIDTOWN

GALLERIES EST. 1932 11 East 57 St., N.Y. (212) 758-1900

ISABEL BISHOP

AN INTIMATE EXHIBITION

THROUGH FEBRUARY 26

---

new abstraction

Sidney Janis
110 West 57

HAFIF
MARIONI
MOSSET
RYMAN
SIMS
SMITH
THURSZ
ZENIUK

LOREN MUNK

NEW PAINTINGS
FEBRUARY 5-26

GABRIELLE BRYERS
111 GREENE STREET
NYC 10012 (212) 925-8058

Koenigstein

New Drawings
January 22-February 16

Robert Elkon
1063 Madison Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10028
Tel. 212/535.3940

TATISTCHEFF

THEOPHIL GROELL

PAINTINGS

FEBRUARY 1-26

TATISTCHEFF
38 EAST 57 • NEW YORK • 888-1599

Galerie St. Etienne

Klimt Schiele
Kokoschka Kollwitz
Eugène Mihaesco
Representing the Estate of Grandma Moses

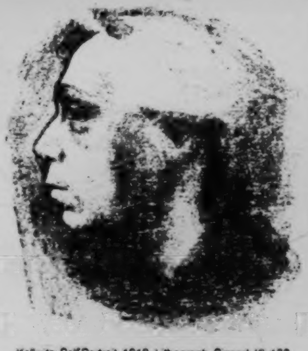
24 W. 57th St. NYC 10019
(212) 245-6734 Tues.-Sat. 11-5



Kollwitz: Self Portrait. 1919. Lithograph. Signed. Kl. 133.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS

Abrahams Heindorff Hodgkin Kossoff Moore
Ruscha Smith Tillyer Tucker Willing

JACOBSON/HOCHMAN GALLERY
24 West 57 Street, New York, NY 10019. Tel 212 581-8346

Index of Advertisers

Aaron-Hastings 149
Adler Gallery, Pam 54
Akira Ikeda Gallery 34
Alexander, Brooke 36
Allport Associates 46
Alpha Gallery 38
Amer. Indian Community House 142
Anderson & Anderson 55
Anderson Ranch Arts Center 152
Arch Gallery 149
Arco '83 60
Ars Libri 150
Arte Fiera '83 (Bologna) 128
Artexpo, N.Y. 73
Art Foundry 146
Art Gathering 45
Art Institute of Boston 150
Arts Focus 66

Batman Gallery, Donald 76
Berggruen, John 55
Biach Gallery 142
Blum/Helman Cov IV
Bonlow Gallery 70
Boone Gallery, Mary 42
Borgenicht Gallery 22
Bornstein, Karl 34
Boyd Gallery, Roy 70
Branchville SoHo Gallery 48
Brentwood Gallery 61
Brown & Bro., Inc., Arthur 144
Bryers, Gabrielle 166

Carone Gallery 31
Castelli, Feigen, Corcoran 38
Castelli Graphics 40
Castelli, Leo 8
Chicago Int'l Art Exposition 49
Cicero, Jan 61
Clark Gallery, Garth 53
Connoisseur Magazine 143
ConStruct 151
Cooper Gallery, Paula 40
Cowles Gallery, Charles 38
Cranbrook Academy of Art 72
Crown Point Press 7

Davidson Gallery, Maxwell 44
DBR 150
De Gooyer, Kirk 55
Del Re Gallery, Marisa 4
De Nagy, Tibor 37
Dintenfass Gallery, Terry 35
Dominion Gallery 50
Durham Gallery, Linda 34
Dyansen Gallery 148

Editions Ltd. 148
Elkon Gallery, Robert 166
Emmerich Gallery, Andre 10
Ericson Gallery 148
Esman Gallery, Rosa 166
Exhibit A 62

Findlay Galleries, David 37
Findlay Galleries, Wally 77
Fort Worth Gallery 50
49th Parallel 47
Fourcade, Xavier 28
Friedman, Marvin Ross 55
Frumkin Gallery, Allan 41

Gagosian Gallery, Larry 45
Galeria San Jeronimo 150
Galeria San Juan 150
Galeria Juana Mordo 152
Galeria Joan Prats 48
Galeria Fernando Vijande 47
Galerie Beyeler 61
Galerie Jeanne Bucher 31
Galerie de France 33
Galerie Eric Franck 44
Galerie Linssen 40
Galerie Maeght 14
Galerie Maeght, S.A. Paris 2
Galerie 99 68
Galerie St. Etienne 166
Galerie Michael Werner 39, 45
Galleri Bellman 9, 40
Gallery Paule Anglim 56
Gallery One, Inc. 152
Gallery Wall 148
G.E. Fine Arts 72
Getler/Pall 151
Gillman Gallery, Barbara 148
Goodman Gallery, Marian 50
Gray Gallery, Richard 20
Great Northern Brokerage 144
Grimaldis Gallery, C. 149
Grumbacher 134

Haber-Theodore 52
Hadler-Rodriguez 151
Hamilton Gallery 42
Harcourts Gallery 51
Harris, Anne 152
Heidenberg, Lillian 46
Hibel Gallery 74
Hillwood Art Gallery 69
Hirschl & Adler 32
Hoffman Gallery, Nancy 36
Hokin Gallery 6
Horwitch Gallery, Elaine Cov III
Hutchinson Gallery, Max 148

Iannetti, Pasquale 61
Impressions Gallery 50
Incorporated Gallery 147
Inter-American Art Gallery 151
Int'l Art Alliance 144
International Art Exposition, Inc. 73
Irving Gallery 41
Ivory/Kimpton 47

Jacobson-Hochman 166
Janis Gallery, Sidney 166
Jerry's Artarama 146

Kerr, Reynold C. 56
Kind Gallery, Phyllis 36
Klein Gallery 52
Knoedler & Co., M. 24
Knowlton Gallery, Monique 40
Koplin Gallery 56
Kornblee Gallery 68
Kouros Gallery 148
Kraushaar Galleries 148

La Boetie 151
Lee Video Gallery, Jane 146
Lewin Galleries, B. 76
Locks Gallery, Marian 43
Luria Gallery, Gloria 68
Lynch & Sons, Kenneth 152

Marino Gallery, Frank 62
Marlborough Gallery 35
Maroney & Co., James 12
Mathes Gallery, Barbara 20
Matisse Gallery, Pierre 5
Medici-Berenson 60
Metro Pictures 8
Midtown Galleries 166
Miller Gallery, Robert 22
Milliken, Alexander Cov II
Modern Master Tapestries 150
Molasky, Stephen 150
Moss, Toby 72
Muse Foundation Visual Arts 142

Nahan Art Galleries 71
999 Bookshop 149
Now & Then 146

October Gallery 147
Oscarsson-Hood 38
Ovsey Gallery, Neil 46

PA Academy of Fine Arts 146
Pace Gallery 1
Palm Beach Art Galleries 142
Parsons, Betty 46
Pearl Paint Co. 145
Perlman, Miriam 72
Princeton Gallery of Fine Art 150
Printworld Directory 70
Protetch Gallery, Max 62
Putterman, Florence 152

Rachofsky, Morton 151
Rauchback Gallery 68
Ricco-Johnson 52
Richebourg/McCoy 54
Ringling Museum of Art 30
Rizzo Fine Arts, Nick 48
Rosenfield Gallery, Betsy 39
Rutberg Gallery, Jack 42

Salander-O'Reilly 30
Sawyer Gallery, William 32
School of Visual Arts 144
Sculpture Placement 74
Segal Gallery, Thomas 47
Seguy Gallery, Yvonne 151
Semaphore Gallery 76
Shiva, Inc. 147
Skidmore College 145
Sklar Gallery, Ana 68
SL Art Gallery 149
Soho South 152
Sperone Westwater Fischer 8
Steinbaum Gallery, Bernice 69
Stoller & Co., John 24
Stone, Jeremy 52
Stretcher Co. 147
Sutton Gallery 70

Tara Gallery 76
Tasende Gallery 151
Tatistcheff & Co., Peter 166
Taylor Art, Carol 54
Texas Gallery 53
Thorp Gallery, Edward 36
Totah Gallery, Edward 33
Twining Gallery 44
Tyler Graphics 16

Vanderwoude Tananbaum 28

Weinberg Gallery, Daniel 44
Weiner Gallery, Jan 71
White & Assoc., Roberto 150
White Gallery, Martha 43
Whitney Museum Indep. Study 149
Winsor & Newton 136

Yares Gallery 51
Yoseido Gallery 149
Young/Hoffman 62

Zabriskie Gallery 42
Zolla Lieberman 54

VOL
7
1
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

Artworld

People

Instead of the four-year prison term which he might have served for his conviction in the Rothko case [see "Artworld," Jan. '83], Marlborough Gallery owner Frank Lloyd has been ordered to contribute to the art education of New York City high school students. Lloyd's enforced philanthropy will include providing lectures in conjunction with each of his New York gallery's exhibitions and setting up a scholarship fund, the details of which are to be worked out by Mar. 1. Acting New York State Supreme Court Justice Herbert I. Altman cited Lloyd's age, health and the ten years that have elapsed since his criminal activity as influential factors in determining the sentence.

John Wilmerding, curator of American paintings at the National Gallery, Washington, D.C., succeeds Charles Parkhurst as the gallery's assistant director. Parkhurst left in January to become co-director of the Williams College Museum.

Richard Vincent West, former head of Sacramento's Crocker Art Museum, has been appointed director of the Santa Barbara Museum.

Stephen Prokopoff, former head of Boston's Institute of Contemporary Art, now directs the Krannert Art Museum at the University of Illinois, Champaign/Urbana.

Robert McDonald, former chief curator of the La Jolla Museum is the new head of the Art Museum of Santa Cruz County.

NYSCA Establishes Fellowship Support Program

Legally prevented from funding individuals directly, the New York State Council on the Arts nonetheless channels substantial support to individuals through intermediaries such as CAPS and non-profit agencies which sponsor artists' projects. Unhappy with the large sums being spent by these organizations to administer "regrant" monies, NYSCA is setting up a Fellowship Support Program to improve the efficiency of directing funds to artists.

Beginning in '84-85, the program will grant an estimated $1,500,000 to qualifying organizations with established track records at NYSCA. The organizations will disburse the funds as individual fellowships in architecture, choreography, crafts, film, fiction, graphics, multi-media, music composition, painting, photography, playwriting, poetry, sculpture and video. Recipient organizations will be required to raise additional funds to subsidize the fellowships and to use no more than 20 percent of a fellowship support grant for administrative expenses. (Last year, CAPS spent 34 percent of its $1-million NYSCA award on administration.)

Organizations funded by NYSCA this year or last which are interested in participating in the Fellowship Support Program may write to the Council (80 Centre Street, New York, N.Y. 10013) by Mar. 1 to obtain detailed guidelines. Formal proposals are due six months from the issuance of guidelines. Applications will be reviewed by NYSCA's peer panels in each discipline.

Obituaries

Nancy Hanks, 55, highly esteemed chairman of the National Endowment for the Arts under the Nixon, Ford and Carter administrations, from 1969 to 1977. Hanks's energetic leadership and tactful powers of persuasion were largely responsible for the rapid burgeoning of the NEA. During her tenure (she had only one predecessor), the agency's annual budget increased from $11 million to $114 million. She was known as a populist, both fair-minded and politic.

Nancy Hanks.

Before heading the Arts Endowment, Hanks was vice-president, then president of the American Council for the Arts (1965-69). She was recently appointed to President Reagan's Committee on the Arts and Humanities, and in December received the NEA's first honorary Founders Award for Civic Leadership.

John Button, 52, painter celebrated for his New York cityscapes—intimate portrayals of Manhattan's light and sky, its neighborhood architecture and indigenous rooftop structures. Button's realist style was offset by his frequent use of raking sight lines and closeup views that fragment his unpeopled compositions. He showed regularly in New York after moving from his native California in the mid-'50s, and was an influential teacher—at Skowhegan and at Cornell's College of Art, Architecture and Planning in the '60s, and until his death at the School of Visual Arts and the Graduate School of the University of Pennsylvania.

John Button. Photo Bob Brooks.

Gary Wiley, 31, New York-based artist whose playful, painted wood, marble-studded wall reliefs embellished with feathers were featured in his first solo exhibition in 1980. His first public commission—a series of colorful, wrought-iron and steel butterfly forms affixed to the exterior of a building at MIT—was completed last year.

Alan Freedman, 59, businessman and president of New York City's Municipal Art Society and Public Art Fund, the latter founded by his late wife, Doris Channing Freedman.

Fearn Thurlow, 58, curator of painting and sculpture at the Newark Museum since 1973. Among the major exhibitions she curated were "Geometric Abstraction" and "Works of Joseph Stella," both in '78.

Museum Preview of the Month

"The 1983 Biennial," Mar. 24-May 22, the Whitney Museum's invitational survey of American art produced within the past two years. The slippery adjectives "important" and "provocative" are once again given as the selection criteria used by the Biennial's organizers—Whitney curators John Hanhardt (film and video), Barbara Haskell, Richard Marshall, and Patterson Sims. Works will not be classified stylistically, nor will photographs be shown apart from painting and sculpture. According to Richard Marshall, "distinct categories didn't crystallize" as they have in the recent past. Painting, particularly in the expressionist vein, will predominate, while "straight" photography receives barely a passing nod.

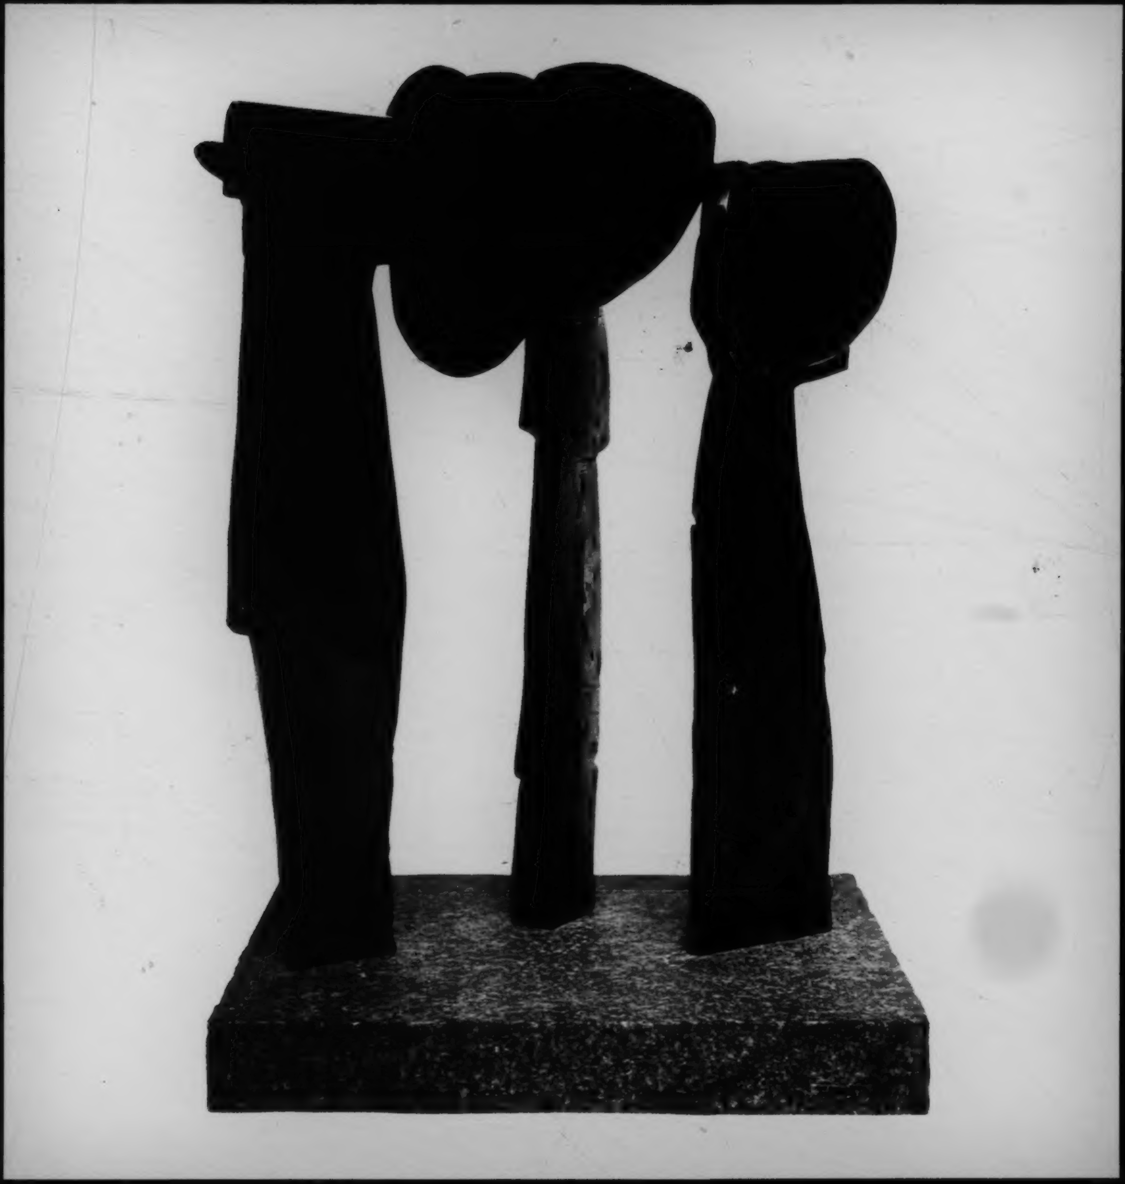
This Biennial will be substantially smaller than recent predecessors—76 artists, down from 106 in '81. The museum's third floor currently holds the permanent collection. The Biennial will fill the rest of the building and the sculpture garden. Most of the 42 painters, sculptors and photographers selected will show two or three pieces; 34 video, film and sound artists will show one work each.

Three-fourths of the artists are New York-based. Ten veterans from the '81 Biennial will be in the film/video section, but only two—Julian Schnabel and Jonathan Borofsky—among the painters, sculptors and photographers. Richard Artschwager, Philip Maberry and T.L. Solien will create room installations; Keith Haring and Mike Glier will execute works directly on the wall. There will be film and video installations by Bill Lundberg, Mary Lucier and Shigeko Kubota and a sound installation (in the sculpture garden, where it will be audible from the street) by Max Neuhaus.

Senior artists among painters, sculptors and photographers include Louise Bourgeois, John Baldessari, Robert Colescott, John Coplans, Leon Golub, Jasper Johns, Robert Mangold, Joan Mitchell, Frank Stella. Other sculptors include William Crozier, Nancy Graves, R.M. Fischer, Italo Scanga and Jackie Winsor. Mid-career painters Susan Rothenberg, Pat Steir and Joe Zucker will be joined by the more recently acclaimed Jean Michel Basquiat, Eric Fischl, Jenny Holzer, Judy Rifka, David Salle and Mark Tansey. Also included will be post-Pop media-based work by Barbara Kruger, Robert Longo and Cindy Sherman. Out-of-town photographers Ellen Brooks, Eileen Cowin, Nic Nicosia and painters Oliver Jackson, Lance Kiland, Melissa Miller, George Rodart and Kenneth Shorr may provide the only revelations for New York gallery habitués.

Abundant offerings in film and video will span diverse stylistic and technological concerns: animation (Robert Breer, Sandy Moore), found footage (Bruce Conner), optical printing (James Herbert), performance-based work (Doug Hall, Stuart Sherman), experimental narrative (James Benning), lyrical documentary (Bill Viola), mass-media imagery investigations (Howard Fried, Ken Feingold, Martha Rosler), and, for the first time in a Whitney Biennial, Super-8 film (Erica Beckman, Vivienne Dick). And much, much more.

DIMITRI HADZI



"untitled" height 21" bronze 1981-82

Scottsdale Exhibition: February 10-28, 1983

ELAINE HORWITCH GALLERIES

Scottsdale
4211 N. Marshall Way
Scottsdale, Arizona 85251
(602) 945-0791

Scottsdale
4222 N. Marshall Way
Scottsdale, Arizona 85251
(602) 941-5290

Sedona
Forest Rd. and Hwy. 89A
Sedona, Arizona 86336
(602) 282-6290

Santa Fe
129 W. Palace Avenue
Santa Fe, New Mexico 87501
(505) 988-8997

VOL
71
ISS
2
FE
1983
UMI

Robert Moskowitz

Paintings and Drawings
12 February–19 March 1983

Blum Helman

20 West 57 Street, New York

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR 1983
UMI

Art in America

MARCH 1983/$3.50
Outside North America/$5.00

Cover: William Wegman's "Greek Restaurant" (detail)
New Work: Robert Morris, Nancy Graves/Wegman at the Walker
Chicago in Retrospect/Morandi/Hammershøi/Broodthaers
NEA Update/Reports from Germany/Books/Review of Exhibitions

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR 1983
UMI

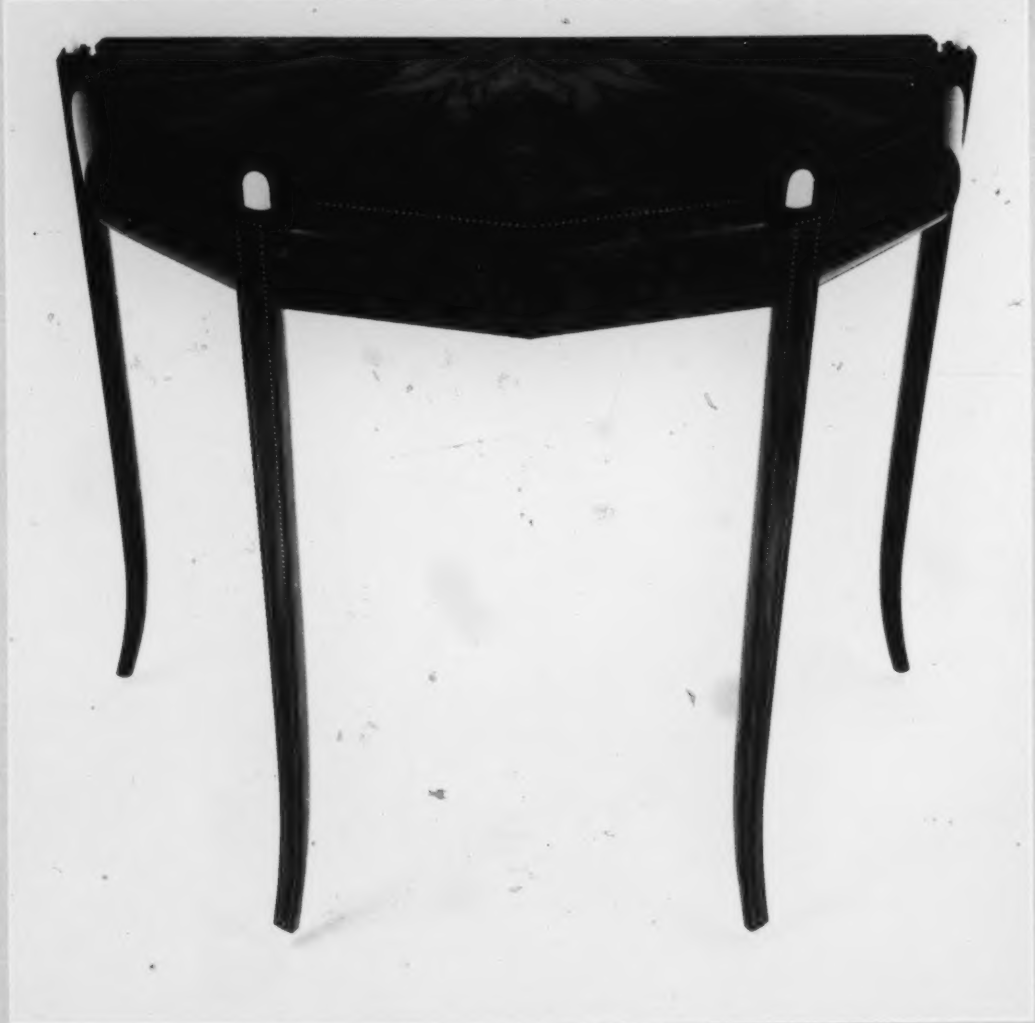
The extraordinary art of

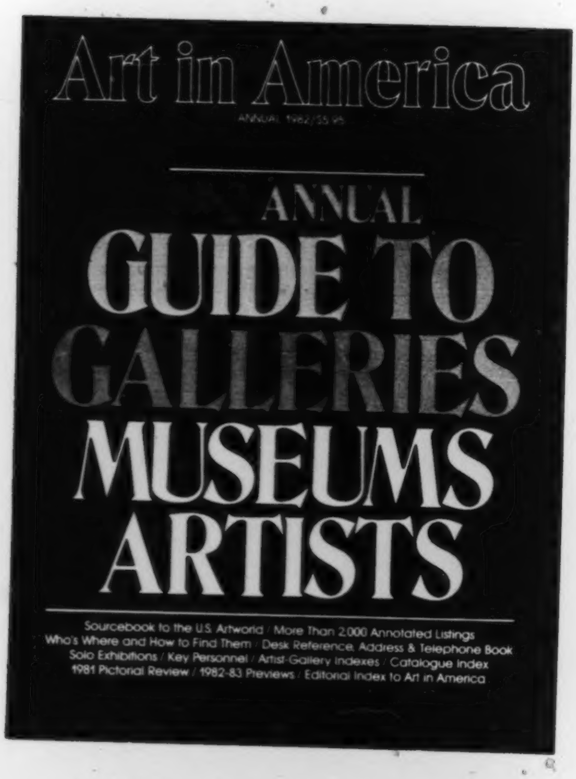
Wendell Castle

March 8 - April 20, 1983

Alexander F. Milliken Inc.
98 Prince Street, New York, NY 10012
Telephone: 212 966 - 7800

Demi-Lune Table, 1982
Brazilian rosewood, 34½"h x 38⅛"w x 20"d





Art in America
ANNUAL 1982/$5.95
ANNUAL GUIDE TO GALLERIES MUSEUMS
ARTISTS
Sourcebook to the U.S. Artworld / More Than 2,000 Annotated Listings
Who's Where and How to Find Them / Desk Reference, Address & Telephone Book Solo Exhibitions / Key Personnel / Artist-Gallery Indexes / Catalogue Index
1981 Pictorial Review / 1982-83 Previews / Editorial Index to Art in America

THE 1983 EDITION IS NOW IN PRODUCTION.

PLEASE BEAR TWO DEADLINES IN MIND:

APRIL 1ST is the date your completed Free Listings Information Form is due at Art in America. If you've already returned it, thanks for being prompt. If not, act soon, and should you have any questions, please call project director Amy Slaton at 212-715-2600.

MAY 20TH is the deadline for advertising space reservations in the new Guide. To place your reservation, call advertising director Susan B. Anthony at 212-715-2600.

Introduced less than a year ago, the ANNUAL GUIDE has proven to be an invaluable "first source" for 60,000 leaders and followers of the art world—collectors, connoisseurs, dealers, curators, librarians, researchers, and all of Art in America's subscribers (96% of whom regularly visit galleries, 24% of whom travel to buy art).

Be sure your free listings are part of it, readily accessible and referred to year-round by the art world's most active buyers and gallery-goers.

Consider, too, the extraordinary advertising opportunity you have in the Guide: 12 continuous months of advertising exposure for the same cost as an advertisement in any single issue of Art in America.

By planning a Guide ad which promotes the artists you handle (and if possible, the shows you have scheduled for the coming art season) you will attract even more readers to your listings, more visitors to your gallery, and more business from serious collectors across the country—not for just a month, remember, but over the course of a full year.

April 1st and May 20th.
Two of your biggest dates with opportunity.
Don't miss either one.

Art in America 1983 Annual Guide to Galleries, Museums and Artists
850 Third Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10022

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

CHUCK CLOSE

PAINTINGS, DRAWINGS, EDITIONS

THE PACE GALLERY 32 EAST 57 ST NYC

32 PAGE CATALOGUE, 4 COLOR PLATES, TEXT BY JOHN PERREAULT, $10 + TAX WHERE APPLICABLE

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

Galerie Maeght

Arnold Herstand, President
U.S. Office, 9 West 57th Street
New York, New York 10019
Telephone 212 371-9077
Telex 428931

Galerie Maeght: Paris, Zurich

Joan Miro

"Femme" 1976
Paint, wax crayon and chalk on paper
55½ x 30½ in. (141 x 78 cm)

By Appointment Only

Art in America

MARCH 1983

William Wegman's Psychoanalytic Vaudeville — Craig Owens 100
Wegman's video, drawings and photographs since 1969 are the subject of a current traveling retrospective.

Private Light: Hammershøi — Kirk Varnedoe 110
The idiosyncratic, protomodernist paintings of the Dane Vilhelm Hammershoi are seen for the first time in the U.S.

Natural Fictions — Robert Storr 118
Nancy Graves's richly patinaed bronzes show a new exuberance in their use of scientific sources.

Made in Chicago: A Revisionary View — Franz Schulze 122
Chicago's accomplished postwar figurative artists are seen as unjustly eclipsed by the city's younger Imagists.

Death in Black and White — Nancy Marmer 129
Robert Morris's new reliefs and drawings frame a problematic vision of apocalypse.

The Mold, the Mussel and Marcel Broodthaers — Carter Ratcliff 134
Wall-plaques and books of this Belgian Conceptual artist were recently seen in two New York shows.

The Liberation of the Object — Janet Abramowicz 138
Giorgio Morandi's paintings reveal a metaphysical commitment to daily observation.

DEPARTMENTS

Letters 5
Review of Books 17
Report from West Germany
A Season of Artistic Detente — David Galloway 25
Report from Berlin
"Zeitgeist": The Times & the Place — Joan Simon 33

ISSUES & COMMENTARY

The Arts Endowment in Transition — Gerald Marzorati 9

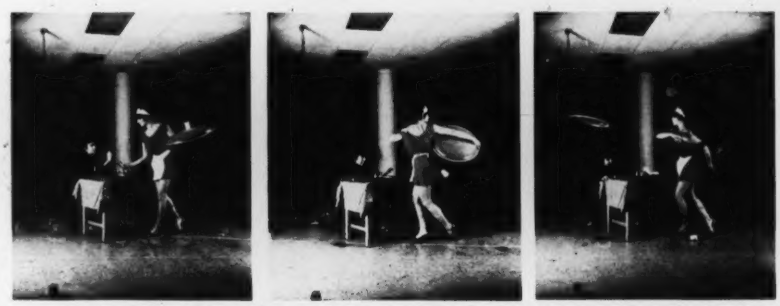
REVIEW OF EXHIBITIONS

New York, Chicago, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Seattle, Dallas, London 149
Artworld 200



Cover: William Wegman's Greek Restaurant [detail on cover, entire work above], three color Polaroid photographs, 24 by 20 inches each. Holly Solomon Gallery.

Editor: Elizabeth C. Baker

Managing Editor: Joan Simon / Executive Editor: Nancy Marmer / Senior Editors: Ted Mooney, Craig Owens / Associate Editors: Prudence Carlson, Hal Foster / Assistant Managing Editor: Kathryn Howarth / Assistant Editor: Robert Fisher / Designer: Alberto P. Gavasci / Associate Designer: Louis D'Esposito / Directory Manager: Amy Slaton / Consultant: John Peter / Contributing Editors: Donald B. Kuspit, Lucy Lippard, Sarah McFadden, Linda Nochlin, Carter Ratcliff, Bryan Robertson, Irving Sandler, Peter Schjeldahl, Roberta Smith, Charles F. Stuckey / Corresponding Editors: Chicago, Franz Schulze; San Francisco, Peter Selz; Washington D.C., David Tannous; London, Suzi Gablik; Rome, Milton Gendel

Publisher: Paul Shanley

Director of Advertising: Susan B. Anthony / Advertising Sales: Susan McCall, Karen Niedzielski, Ruth Rothseid / Advertising Services: Susanne Vorster, Mary Baez / Production: Mary Jontry / Production Assistant: Sarah King / Circulation Manager: Susan Blattman / Art in America, 850 Third Ave., N.Y.C., 10022, Tel. (212) 593-2100
Director for International Development: John H. Liesveld Jr., Art in America, 39 Quai des Grands Augustins, 75006 Paris, France. Tel. (1) 325.26.55.

WHITNEY COMMUNICATIONS CORPORATION MAGAZINE DIVISION
PRESIDENT John S. Prescott SENIOR VICE PRESIDENT, FINANCE/ADMINISTRATION Gordon H. Duncan
VICE PRESIDENT MARKETING William Hitzig VICE PRESIDENT PLANNING Dean Heine
VICE PRESIDENT PRODUCTION James Kearney VICE PRESIDENT PRODUCT DEVELOPMENT Virginia Evans PROMOTION DIRECTOR James Anderson

WHITNEY COMMUNICATIONS CORPORATION
CHAIRMAN Walter N. Thayer
PRESIDENT Charles H. G. Rees

Vol. 71, No. 3 (March) Art in America is published 11 times a year (monthly except July) by Art in America, Inc., 850 Third Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10022. Telephone (area code 212) 593-2100. Cable address: AMARTMAG. A member of the Magazine Division of Whitney Communications Corporation. Contents copyright © 1983 by Art in America, Inc., and may not be reproduced in any manner or form without permission. ISSN: 0004-3214. The opinions expressed in "Issues and Commentary," apart from the editor's comments, are those of the writers themselves and not necessarily those of this magazine. Not responsible for unsolicited manuscripts or photographs. Art in America is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature and the Art Index. Back volumes of Art in America are available in microfiche from Bell & Howell, Att. Periodical Department, Old Mansfield Road, Wooster, Ohio 44691. Microfilm copies are available through Xerox University Microfilm, Ann Arbor, Michigan 48106. Articles appearing in this magazine are abstracted and indexed in Historical Abstracts and/or America: History and Life and RILA. Circulation is verified by the Audit Bureau of Circulations. Controlled circulation postage paid at Concord, N.H. and New York, N.Y. BACK ISSUES AND COMPLETE VOLUMES: Lawrence McGilvery, P.O. Box 852, LaJolla, Calif., 92038. SUBSCRIPTIONS: U.S. 11 issues $34.95, 22 issues $59.95, 33 issues $79.95. Possessions & Canada add $8.00 per year. All others add $15.00 per year. Domestic single copy $3.50 prepaid. Outside North America $5.00. Single copy August/Annual $7.45 prepaid (includes $1.50 postage and handling). SUBSCRIPTION OFFICE: Art in America, 542 Pacific Ave., Marion, Ohio 43302. Telephone (area code 614) 383-3141. FOR CHANGE OF ADDRESS send old and new addresses and label from a recent issue. POSTMASTER: Send Form No. 3579 to Art in America, 542 Pacific Avenue, Marion, Ohio 43302

Member of the Audit Bureau of Circulations

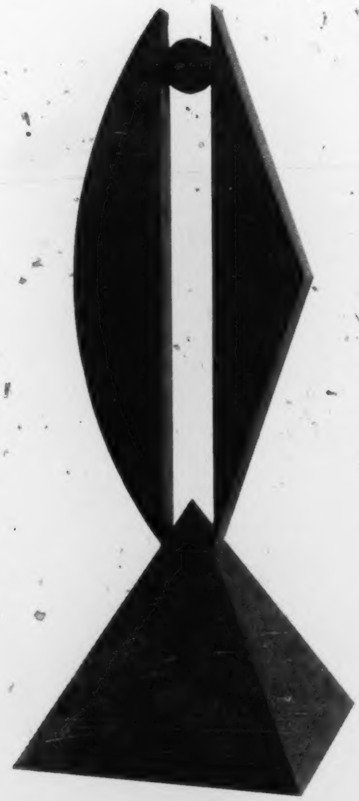
VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

Current exhibition

JEFFREY MARON

Sculpture,
Bronze and Steel

February 23–March 26



Seed, 1980.
17"x17"x17"
Bronze, dark green patina
Edition of 9

Next exhibition

PAUL KLEE

Paintings, Gouaches and Drawings
March 30–April 30

MARISA DEL RE GALLERY

41 East 57th Street, New York City 10022 212-688-1843

Letters

For the Defense: Bailey

Although Robert Storr offers some accurate criticism of William Bailey's work, his review [Nov. '82] is nothing less than a mean-spirited attack on an artist who deserves, at the very least, respect.

A whole dimension of Bailey's work seems to escape Storr entirely. To begin with, the assumption that painting from direct observation is inherently superior to conceptualized forms of figuration (which would include most naive painting) is the sort of arbitrary rule-making that gives academicism its bad name. Surely Storr would not say that the paintings of Rackstraw Downes don't involve conceptualization. Realism, after all, is a style, and like any other style has a fairly specific formal vocabulary. In the case of realism, this formal vocabulary evolved from the attempts of artists, over a long period of time, to create the illusion of objective reality on a flat surface. Some realists rely more than others on direct observation of their subjects, but that doesn't necessarily result in better painting—just different painting.

Because Bailey is a purist, he deliberately suppresses air, natural light and detail—the qualities that Storr seems to feel are indispensable to genuine painting. Although the paintings do not strongly evoke a sense of confrontation with a set-up, they do create a specific situation that refers to some sort of communion (even if that communion occurs in memory alone) with the "real" or observed world. The interplay between this specificity and the rigorous formal discipline to which it's subjected creates a tense, quiet, understated world—an imaginative construct which is the expression of a genuine artistic personality, not an exercise in pastiche.

Obviously Bailey has been influenced by Morandi, Balthus and Zurbarán. His allusions to these painters are so apparent and strong that the paintings do come dangerously close to pastiche. But there's more to the work than that. Bailey combines an American and an Italian sensibility. There is something almost naive in his tight, flattened conceptualizations—especially in the figure paintings. And there's a strong puritanical streak in his choice of still-life objects and in the weird "non-eroticism" of the figure paintings.

William Bailey's paintings might not be to Robert Storr's taste, and, when placed in a larger historical context, Bailey probably isn't a "contender." But he certainly is one of the most interesting figurative painters around today. That's no small accomplishment.

Nancy Grimes
Astoria, N.Y.

Re Graffiti

In response to Suzi Gablik's "The Graffiti Question" [Oct. '82]: Are these artists not so unlike the artists of the German Expressionist, Cobra and Pop Art movements? Haven't Warhol and Hockney capitalized on their own private behavior? The only difference between these struggling artists and their contemporaries is that the more "established" painters have been able, through big-name galleries and mass publicity, to persuade the art buying world into spending millions on their works.

I commend the NEA for funding Fashion Moda and the "Graffiti Above Ground" movement, thus encouraging these young artists to continue their work. As to whether they are being encouraged beyond any reasonable evaluation of their talents—if Pierre Alechinski lands a show at MOMA (June '81) and Jasper Johns commands a million for a painting . . . who's evaluating?

John N. Buckland
Wilmington, Del.

Amplification: Schinkel

I am always glad to see reviews of architecture books in Art in America. Franz Schulze's review of Karl Friedrich Schinkel's Collection of Architectural Designs [Nov. '82] was no exception. The publication of this English edition may indeed be the "most spectacular single step" in the reevaluation of Schinkel in English-speaking countries. One should add, however, that the two essays by Rand Carter and Hermann Pundt, called "highly informative" in Schulze's review, are really only brief appreciations of Schinkel. Both authors have published fuller and more informative discussions of Schinkel's work in English some time ago (Rand Carter, "Karl Friedrich Schinkel's Project for a Royal Palace on the Acropolis," Journal of the Society of Architectural Historians, March 1979; Hermann G. Pundt, Schinkel's Berlin. A Study in Environmental Planning, Cambridge, 1972).

Schulze's review was somewhat uncritical and dealt with Schinkel only in terms of the historicism and eclecticism (to say nothing of postmodernism) in current architecture. While Schinkel may be a "lately rising star" among those architects who in the past had not bothered much with history, for most of us Schinkel's star had never set.

It is a pity that Schulze sees Schinkel's work almost exclusively from the vantage point of contemporary architecture. This approach makes Schinkel's work seem rather one-dimensional—he is considered important because he has "prefigured" a number of features in recent architecture. But Schinkel's design for a Kaufhaus is hardly "akin to a 20th-century shopping mall." This design was inspired by the Palais Royal in Paris and by London shopping streets. Similarly, the Bauakademie's largest interior space did not function "as an early example of the open plan," unless we also call the early 19th-century English factory buildings, by whose construction Schinkel was greatly influenced, one-plan designs. To say that Schinkel "prefigures modern skeletal construction" is to ignore Schinkel's basically conservative approach to construction, nor does it do justice to his highly imaginative integration of the architecture of his own day (see Erik Forssman, Karl Friedrich Schinkel—Bauwerke und Baugedanken, Munich, 1981). Schulze's evaluation relies too heavily on the seminal, but by now outdated, methodology of Nikolaus Pevsner and Sigfried Giedion.

Rosemarie Haag Bletter
Associate Professor Columbia University
New York, N.Y.

P.S. Scandinavia

Several years ago I visited Scandinavia for a short period of time and kept an eye out for art. My reaction, however, was one of bewilderment as to why the culture of these countries existed in such isolation from the consciousness of America, because I found their art to be flourishing.

Although Peter Schjeldahl, in his article "Postcards from Scandinavia" [Sept. '82], admitted to "catching only glimpses of what the younger artists are up to," his tone was somewhat condescending and based upon a criterion of fashionable international recognition and convenient stylistic labels such as "New Figuration" and "pattern painting," without digging into the indigenous Scandinavian sensibility and relating their contemporary art to it.

Schjeldahl admits to missing any focus in Norwegian art, but a trip to the National Museum reveals a remarkably homogeneous tradition of painting characterized by rich, vibrant colors (Bonnard comes to mind); loose yet controlled abstract handling of paint; and a strong sense of solidity and compositional structure. There is a noticeable absence of allegory, history, and of jumping on trendy stylistic bandwagons to produce watered-down copies of French art. On the other hand, there is an abundance of landscapes, figurative art and portraiture. A strong sense of vitality emanates from the paint, which represents the land and the people, purely tempered and direct as a Norwegian folk song.

This tradition is firmly manifested in many of Norway's unknown yet compellingly significant artists. Jens Johannessen paints totally original, loosely structured gridlike canvases containing fleshy biomorphic images twisted through scarlet and earth-toned backgrounds influenced by Egyptian painting. Weidemann's vibrantly colorful expressionistic celebrations of human forms and cityscapes are also masterfully handled with great originality, as are the figures and landscapes of Rolf Nesch, which are treated in a free, linear manner reminiscent of Klee yet with the social overtones of Ensor or Beckmann. The majestic primitive landscapes of Johan Berner Jakobsen allow the people and their land to speak out through the medium, as his style is convincing enough to draw the viewer into its own universe.

But then again, that's an awful lot to fit on a postcard.

Mark N. Jones
Croton-on-Hudson, N.Y.

•

In my article "Postcards from Scandinavia," I briefly discussed some artists represented in "Art Now," an exhibition of Scandinavian contemporary art which was recently at the Guggenheim Museum. While writing I got my notes mixed up and characterized one of these artists—the Finn Olli Lyytikäinen, a young virtuoso of graphic and photographic mediums—in terms that apply strictly to Ernst Mether-Borgström, a Finnish painter not in the Guggenheim show. (Mether-Borgström's work was included in the 1982 Carnegie International in Pittsburgh.) This is the kind of error whose mere possibility gives journalists cold sweats, and I couldn't be sorrier.

Peter Schjeldahl
New York, N.Y.

Corrections

Sept. '82, pp. 51-55: Captions for the postcards of Oslo and Helsinki were reversed, as were the captions for the works by Kåks and Lyytikäinen; the Saarinen in question is Eero, not Eliel.

Nov. '82, p. 107: Mildred Friedman, the Walker Art Center's Design Director, should have been credited as organizer of "De Stijl: 1917-1931, Visions of Utopia."

Dec. '82, p. 129: Due to editorial mishap, two errors found their way into Judith Stein's review of the Red Grooms show at the Philadelphia ICA. First, though William Rush's parade float is no longer extant, a large body of his work still exists (and was recently surveyed at the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts). Second, the art class in which Thomas Eakins removed the male models' loincloth was composed of both women and men—as, for that matter, was the one Grooms recreated at the ICA. Apologies to the author.

VOL 71
ISS 3
MR 1983
UMI

PALM BEACH

Alex Katz

March 8 – March 26, 1983

BAY HARBOR ISLANDS

George Rickey

March 11 – March 31, 1983

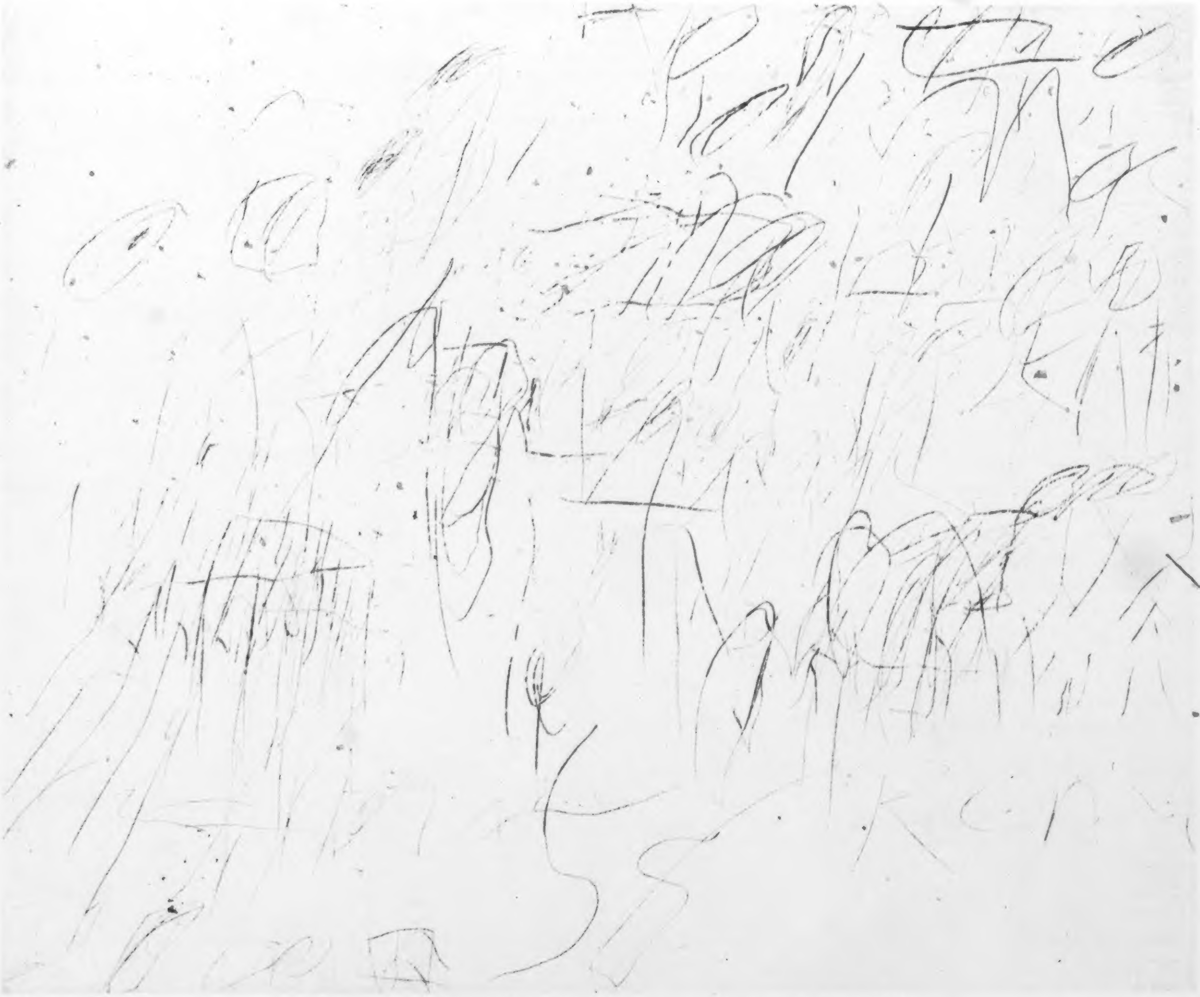
HOKIN GALLERY INC.

Member, Art Dealers
Association
of America, Inc.

Hokin/Kaufman Gallery
210 W. Superior, Chicago, Illinois 60610
Telephone 312/266-1211

245 Worth Avenue
Palm Beach, Florida 33480
Telephone 305/655-5177

1086 Kane Concourse
Bay Harbor Islands, Florida 33154
Telephone 305/861-5700



Cy Twombly, without title, oil and crayon on canvas, 1958, 55" x 64"

GALERIE RUDOLF ZWIRNER
ALBERTUSSTRASSE 18
5 COLOGNE 1
49 (221) 23 58 37

GALLERIA PAOLA SPROVIERI
3, PIAZZA DEL POPOLO
ROME
39 (6) 361 09 75

ARP BALLA BRAUNER DUBUFFET ERNST FONTANA FAUTRIER YVES KLEIN
LEGER MAGRITTE PICABIA PICASSO SCHWITTERS STELLA TWOMBLY

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

Adolph Gottlieb. Burst II, 1958. Oil on canvas, 5'9" x 3'4"

Important Works by Contemporary Masters

André Emmerich Gallery

41 East 57th Street · New York, NY 10022 · Tel (212) 752-0124

Issues & Commentary

The Arts Endowment in Transition

Although the White House has failed to win the massive budget cuts it sought, the visual arts policy of the NEA is shifting towards a new alliance with the commercial gallery system.

BY GERALD MARZORATI

All is not as it once was in the visual arts program of the National Endowment for the Arts. Raw figures tell part of the story. This year, the program will have a budget of about $5.9 million—$1.3 million less than in fiscal 1981, the final budget approved during the Carter administration. The $5.9-million figure also represents a $600,000 cut from last year's, the first budget under Ronald Reagan—this despite the fact that the budget for the NEA as a whole remained stable at about $143.9 million. (NEA programs that grew this year include dance and theater, among others.)

But less funding is only part of the change, perhaps a small part in the long run. The Reagan administration has failed to win the drastic cuts it sought from Congress for the NEA. The chances of such cuts gaining approval on the Hill in the last two years of Reagan's first term are slim. And Frank Hodsoll, chairman of the NEA, is said to have told the Office of Management and Budget not to seek cuts for next year. (As it is, the 1984 Reagan budget that went to Congress at the end of January proposes cuts of 13 percent for the NEA.)

The real change is one of outlook. Hodsoll has brought to his office a faith in the commercial gallery system. It is a faith shared as well by those he has called to the Endowment to shape policies and programs in the visual arts. Painter Benny Andrews, the new director of the visual arts program, is a believer. So is Ruth Berenson, the art critic of the National Review who was tapped by Hodsoll to confirm visual arts grant applications approved by NEA panels. ("Naturally, there is considerable hand-wringing in the art world about the Reagan budget cuts," Berenson wrote in the Review last April. She went on to say that "Young would-be artists . . . will have a rough time; no longer will they be able to 'find themselves' while living at taxpayers' expense.") Still more private-sector believers are on the way. The Visual Arts Overview panel makes policy recommendations for the program, and when it convenes next fall it will likely include for the first time an art dealer—Ronald Feldman is the name most frequently mentioned. Berenson has let it be known that a collector would make a fine addition, too. Currently the 12-member panel consists of artists (like Robert Irwin and Richard Artschwager), critics (Rosalind Krauss, Douglas Davis) and alternative space directors (Either/Or's Anne Focke, from Seattle, and Franklin Furnace's Martha Wilson, from New York City); however, to make room for the dealers and collectors being sought after, some of the present panelists are not being invited back.

"In film and theater," Hodsoll told me recently, "there is a relationship between the Endowment and the commercial area which is seen as a natural one. This hasn't been so with the visual arts.

"We need more input at the Endowment from the galleries," Hodsoll continued. "In my view, most artists would like to have a commercial gallery. We need to help artists get gallery representation. For younger artists, peer support—the judgment of other artists—remains the most important element. But in the end, over time, an artist's reputation is made in the market."

Earlier in the same interview, he expressed these sentiments still more succinctly: "Leo Castelli," he said. "Who has done more to further an artist's career?"

How will the gallery-system orientation of Hodsoll and his appointees translate into actual policies? It is too soon to tell. Neither Berenson nor Andrews has been at the Endowment long enough to make any real impact on specific programs. Hodsoll himself, a 45-year old lawyer and career government official, had his first formal introduction to the art world only last fall, at an NEA visual arts seminar held in Los Angeles. "The last year has been one of observing, taking notes, floating ideas," one former member of the policy panel told me. "In 1983, the Reagan era begins."

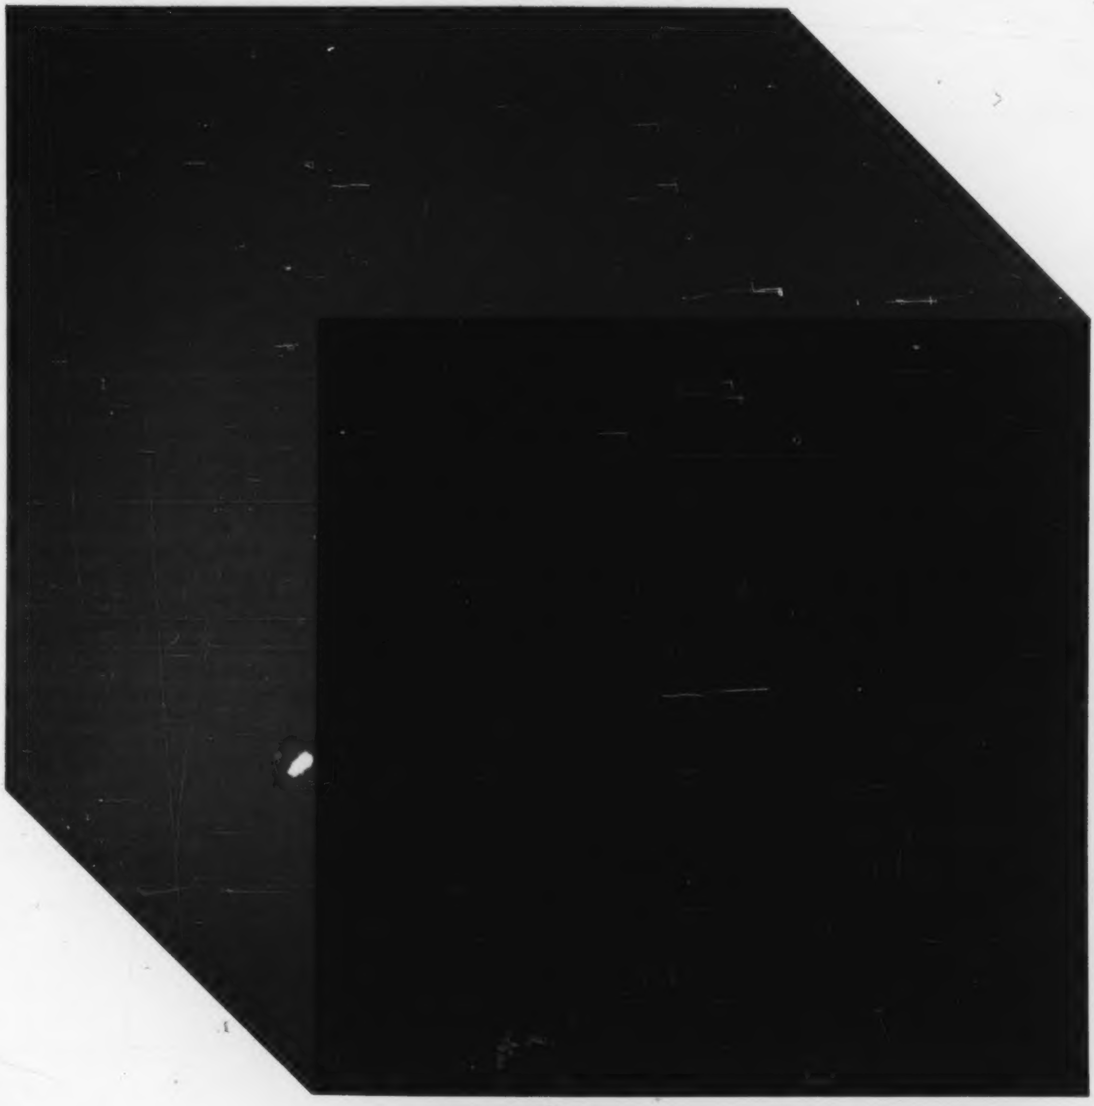
Predictably, the situation looks rather different from the other end of the funding pipeline. Artists involved in the group called Political Art Documentation/Distribution, for example, have concrete reason to think the Reagan era at NEA is already in full stride. PADD describes itself as a networking organization for radical New York artists. Last year, a visual arts grant panel recommended that the Endowment fund a series of panel discussions PADD planned to organize around the "role of the creative individual within changing social structures." The amount requested was less than $5,000. Hodsoll, as chairman, reserves the right to overrule a panel recommendation—and in this case, did. It was the first such veto in the history of the NEA visual arts program.

The visual arts program has never, until now, been bullish about the commercial gallery system. There are a number of explanations for this lack of enthusiasm. The arts Endowment was established during the Johnson years as a program of the Great Society, itself a prolongation of the New Deal, which, it should be remembered, was launched with the belief that the marketplace couldn't provide everything. When Henry Geldzahler, that good Democrat, was appointed the first director of the visual arts program in 1966, helping artists make their way into the gallery system was just about the furthest thing from his mind. He wanted to give money to artists, period; it was Geldzahler who saw to it that fellowships be awarded on a no-strings-attached basis. Artists, Geldzahler told a reporter some years ago, are "involved not in products but in process."

By the time Geldzahler left the Endowment in 1968, "process" was beginning to take on a new meaning. Not only artists but art itself was coming to exalt process as product, and new mediums and outlets were needed to show and distribute the new kinds of artworks that resulted. Commercial galleries couldn't deal with it, or indeed, couldn't deal it—not much of it, anyway. For that matter, many of the artists making what came to be called Conceptual art—and later, those doing performance, video and site works—chose their means specifically to avoid the gallery system: its pressures, its limitations, its marketplace ethos.

To pay for these experiments and to obtain the necessary laboratories, artists turned increasingly to Washington. And Washington was receptive. During the 1970s, there developed between avant-garde art practice and government support a relationship the likes of which modernism had never before witnessed. Millions of dollars in the form of grants and fellowships flowed from the capital of the most powerful nation on earth to the furthest fringes of the art

VIVIAN HORAN
40 EAST 62ND STREET NEW YORK NEW YORK 10021 TELEPHONE 212-935-1682
BY APPOINTMENT ONLY



ELLSWORTH KELLY
BLUE GREEN 1968
OIL ON CANVAS
TWO PANELS
7 FT. 7 IN. X 7 FT. 7 IN.

OTHER WORKS BY BALTHUS / A. MARTIN / OLDENBURG / F. STELLA / TWOMBLY

1983 NEA Update

The federal arts-funding battle between the President and Congress is becoming an annual event. As in 1982, the Reagan administration proposed substantial cuts in overall arts funding for 1983; and as in '82, the House and Senate drew up an appropriations bill calling for higher support than the Administration proposed. Again, the President signed the bill as written by Congress.

At $143.9 million, the NEA's 1983 budget is slightly higher than the '82 level of $143.5 million, but lower than in pre-Reagan days ($158.6 million in '81). Most of the 1983 increase is for administration and challenge grants. Administration funds rose to $12.6 million from $11.3 million. The challenge grant program is budgeted at $15.4 million (up from '82's $14.4 million)—a Congressional rebuff to the Administration's requested 50 percent reduction.

The budget for NEA's 18 programs (visual arts, museums, dance, media arts, etc.) has been cut to $101.7 million (from $103.3 million in '82). Treasury funds, used by programs for 3-to-1 matching grants, are down to $14.2 million (from '82's $14.4 million).

The challenge grant program, started in 1978 to supply 3-to-1 matching grants as seed money for fund-raising efforts, has changed its original policy of only allowing organizations to apply once. Now past recipients of challenge grants may reapply.

The visual arts program budget is $5.9 million, down from $6.5 million in '82. It offers grants in five categories. individual artists; alternative spaces and artists' organizations; artists' forums; Art-in-Public-Places; and "special projects," newly created to accommodate both applications that do not fit other categories, and model or pilot projects. Special project applications will be reviewed by whichever visual arts panel is in session at the time.

Artists' fellowship amounts are now $25,000, $15,000 and $5,000, with the middle level expected to be the largest. Only four of the eight disciplines within the artists' fellowship category will award grants in a single year. In '83 grants will be made in painting, video, printmaking/drawings/artists' books and Conceptual/performance/new genre. In '84 they will go to sculpture, crafts, photography and, after a hiatus in 1982, to critical writing. (The alternate year funding plan was initiated as a money-saving measure in 1982.)

The addition of a $15,000 tier (in '82, sums were either $25,000 or $5,000) for '83-84 was recommended by an NEA policy panel to relieve grant review panelists' difficulty in distributing such disparate awards.

Application deadlines pending: Art-in-Public-Places, June 1; artists' organizations, June 15; forums, Nov. 1; critical writing, Jan. 4, '84; photography, Jan. 26, '84; sculpture, Feb. 15, '84; crafts, March 15, '84. There is no deadline for special projects. For applications write: National Endowment for the Arts, 2401 E Street N.W., Washington, D.C. 20506.

—Kathryn Howarth

world. In fact, it could be argued that many of the most significant hallmarks of '70s "pluralism"—public art, regional art, the women's art movement, alternative spaces—could not have emerged as they did had it not been for the annual signature of Richard Nixon. By the late '70s, with Jimmy Carter in the White House, a high proportion of important new art was being made and shown outside the gallery system—and most nongallery art was government-funded art. "The '70s was the decade when artists began taking matters into their own hands," says Jim Melchert, who ran the NEA visual arts program from 1977 until the summer of 1981. "The Endowment merely took account of this."

That all this might change with the election of Ronald Reagan in 1980 was understood. Change how—that no one could tell for sure. During the presidential campaign, Reagan addressed many of the issues involved in government funding of the arts, and seemed to take more than one side on most of them. He would increase the budgets of the Endowments; he would cut back funding and develop private patronage. He would eliminate arts funding on the basis of geography—something of which the Carter Administration was frequently accused—and he would make sure New York stopped getting all the money. In his only formal statement of the campaign, published in a small bi-monthly called American Arts, Reagan likened the arts to sports, reasoning that if the latter could get by without government subsidies . . . .

Arts-minded Reagan supporters were, in truth, a little embarrassed by all this loose talk. Shortly after Reagan was elected, a committee was authorized by the President-elect's transition team to evaluate the arts Endowment and forge a Reagan cultural policy. Chaired by Robert S. Carter, a Washington publicity agent, the committee (it had no formal name) used as a sort of working paper a report critical of the Endowments issued by the Heritage Foundation, the conservative think-tank. The Foundation, among other things, believed that the NEA during the Carter years had come "to emphasize politically inspired social policies at the expense of the independence of the arts . . . ." There was, accordingly, little serious talk among the Reagan advisors of cutting overall funding for the arts. Like the Heritage report they so admired, the committee saw the main problem as, to quote from the report, "not financial but philosophical."

"Professional artist"—the term turns up frequently whenever the NEA's visual arts programs are discussed. A professional artist makes a living through art, that is, takes it to market.

The committee got its wake-up call in the first days of 1981. It came in the form of David Stockman's "little black book"—a loose-leaf binder, actually, which held his proposals for "getting the government off the backs of the people." It seemed that with regards to the arts, Stockman was not one to mull the bigger questions. He advised the President-elect to eliminate arts funding altogether. At the time, a House aide with friends at the Office of Management and the Budget assured me that Stockman had spent no more than a quarter-of-an-hour or so on the matter of arts funding before running his pencil through the NEA budget line. Under pressure from arts officials, and on the recommendation of political advisers in the White House, Reagan eventually settled on halving the Carter proposal of $175 million for fiscal '82. The transition-team committee remained philosophical. Reached at his home in Washington shortly after the Reagan administration released its budget proposals, Robert Carter had this to say: "There was so much activity around the White House in the last three weeks, that, well, I don't think the President had a real grasp on the issue."

Nor much of a grip on how Congress felt about the arts Endowment, as it turned out. Lawmakers of all stripes are comfortable now with the idea of funding the arts. They like being buttonholed on Capitol Hill by Beverly Sills; they like being on hand for the dedication of the arts center back in International Falls. And they don't like risking bad press in the big city papers—there were arts-cuts protests in several cities in the spring of 1981—over a budget cut amounting to a mere $87 million. Reagan finally settled for a 9 percent cut from Carter's fiscal '81 budget of $158.6 million—the $143.5 million figure—and moved on to other fronts, there to meet with roughly the same success. In the spring of 1981, some White House aides floated a plan to replace the Endowments with an independent corporation along the lines of the Public Broadcasting System. Fraught with legal complications, the plan sank. Later in the year, Reagan appointed a Task Force on the Arts, co-chaired by Charlton Heston; its purpose: to give the Endowments a thorough going-over. After numerous closed-door meetings—and months of the rumors such sessions can't help but trigger—the task force released a report that on the whole gave the Endowments a clean bill of health.

VOL 7 1 ISS 3 MR 1983 UMI

Untitled, 1982, Oil on canvas, 208 x 360 cm.

Jannis Kounellis

Galerie Karsten Greve Wallrafplatz 3 5 Köln 1 Telephone 221.213 921

About the only real development to come out of the task-force sessions was Hodsoll. Previously a member of the Reagan-Bush campaign staff, he was brought into the Reagan Administration in March 1981 as an aide to White House Chief of Staff James A. Baker III. At Baker's direction, Hodsoll helped set up the task force, and during the course of the meetings, let Baker know that he was placing himself in the running for the NEA chairmanship. "Hodsoll was the only Reagan man at the meetings who really knew what was going on," one task-force member says. "He was asking the sharp questions."

Hodsoll was appointed NEA chairman near the end of 1981. The Endowment had been without a visual arts program director since Jim Melchert's departure that summer, but Hodsoll took his time filling the post. It wasn't until last spring that he decided Benny Andrews was his man.

Hodsoll's choice was anything but likely. Andrews, who is 51, is the son of a Georgia sharecropper, a long-time New Yorker, and a black—a "militant" black in the days when that phrase was popular among newspaper editors. It is safe to say that there are few other Reagan administration appointees quite like him.

Moreover, Hodsoll met Andrews under circumstances that might have led him to do almost anything but appoint him. Hodsoll had questions about a grant recommended by a panel concerned with artists' books; he decided to take the matter up with the panelists. Essentially, Hodsoll asked the panel to defend their decision, and Andrews came to the defense—forcefully and at length. Hodsoll was impressed. He approved the grant and asked Andrews if he would like the director's job. Andrews said they should talk it over—at his loft in New York. Hodsoll made the trip, Andrews took the job.

"I wanted him to come to my loft because I wanted him to see how a professional artist lives and works," Andrews says. "He didn't ask me about my politics and I didn't ask him about his. I had been involved with panels and that sort of thing at the Endowment for 10 years, and that interested him. This is an arts post, and I took the job as a professional artist."

"Benny is a professional painter with gallery affiliation," Hodsoll says. "It's important that he is a working artist."

Professional artist. The term turns up frequently whenever Hodsoll or Andrews is talking about the NEA's programs in the visual arts. A professional artist makes art, and through it, a livelihood. To make a livelihood of art, it must be taken to market. To say that the new acceptance of the commercial gallery system at the NEA is part and parcel of the Reagan outlook is to state the obvious. Not since the 1920s has the nation been run by a man with such unwavering faith in the private sector. Proposals to deregulate industries, to cut back Federal spending on health and welfare programs, to trim taxes—all point to the belief that the marketplace, left to its own devices, can take care of itself and the country.

But to view the changes going on at the NEA as only a reflection of the Reagan philosophy—cut Federal spending, return matters to market—is to ignore the complexity of cultural politics, and ongoing, non-political cultural forces of all sorts. The fact is that even before America turned to Ronald Reagan, artists, particularly younger artists, were working in ways that began leading them back to the gallery system. The late 1970s found artists painting again, and often painting figuratively at that. These canvases are as comfortable on gallery walls as on those of alternative spaces. It is possible that the triumphs of Ronald Reagan and Julian Schnabel have some deeper connection: there are those who would argue, say, that the renewed interest in conventional painting modes reflects a general conservative cultural shift. (There are those, for that matter, who link Neo-Expressionism with the right-wing death squads of El Salvador.) Whatever the explanation, the gallery boomlet for this new painting exists, and those setting the agenda for visual arts at the NEA are watching it.

> Alternative spaces have emerged as a focus of NEA attention. No one is saying that they are slated en masse for some Endowment scrap heap, but no one is exactly defending them.

"Artists are going back to making things that are more collectable," Andrews said one afternoon last fall. There was a meeting of the National Arts Council, the NEA's governing body, being held in the Hotel Washington's Skyroom, and Andrews had agreed to meet me in the lobby to talk about the program he runs. "These artists don't see anything wrong with selling their work. They're not afraid of the galleries.

"And the galleries have come around too," he continued. "You have to give them credit. You can't lump all dealers together as ogres. There have always been bad ones. But there have been adventurous ones too. Remember, Pop came by way of the galleries, and so did Abstract Expressionism.

"The anti-gallery thing was really limited to a specific generation. It was a reaction to everything that was going on. The people who set up the alternative spaces, they kept a certain attitude, an anti-commercial attitude. It's built-in—they don't want to sell work. But most artists don't see anything wrong with selling. And it's the job of the Endowment to respond to artists' needs."

The new emphasis on the commercial gallery system might explain this year's cutback in the visual arts program—a cutback that will particularly affect the disbursement of artists' fellowships. Last year, $3.4 million was distributed to 337 artists in all categories: painters, sculptors, photographers, printers, craftpersons and so on. This year begins a new type of grant cycle; now, each discipline will come up for fellowships every other year. The fellowship pool for fiscal 1983 is down to $2.3 million, and there will be fewer grants made.

There have yet to emerge any specific new proposals or programs as to how the changing needs of artists, as perceived by the NEA, are to be met. But alternative spaces have emerged as a focus of attention. Scrutiny, perhaps, is a better word. No one at the NEA is saying that alternative spaces are slated en masse for some Endowment scrap heap. But no one is exactly defending them either. "Are they actually performing, or are they going through the motions? That's what we've got to find out," Andrews says.

"What does alternative mean. I think that some of these spaces are having an identity crisis," Hodsoll says. Some alternative-space directors would agree with Hodsoll's diagnosis. Whether they'd find a market injection therapeutic is another matter.

Last fall, Andrews began mapping out a pilot program aimed at providing alternative spaces with a mechanism for selling the work they show. The program, as Andrews explained it, would work as follows: the NEA would hire a few experts on art sales. These experts would be available to the spaces that wanted their services. But upon airing the plan with several directors of spaces, Andrews found few if any takers. After all, alternative spaces were founded in the first place to show work that for one reason or another might not be able, at a given moment, to pay its way in the commercial gallery world; sales under the proposed program would surely have been few. "He was asking us to undermine what we are," is how one such director put it.

The program is back on the drawing board; Andrews is now considering a broader plan to help alternative spaces achieve private-sector funding. Meanwhile, the 130-odd grant recommendations made by the artists' organizations' panel in November have been passed along to Ruth Berenson for review. There are sure to be questions, say NEA staffers; there may well be another Hodsoll veto or two.

"The artists' group panel was the most scrupulous panel I've ever seen," one staff member told me. "There was a time when panelists took notes to be able to explain their decisions to those who got turned down for grants. Now you take notes to defend your choices." Defending the choices to whom and from what—for the wary, such questions answer themselves. ☐

Author: Gerald Marzorati, former art editor of the* SoHo News, *reports frequently on art.

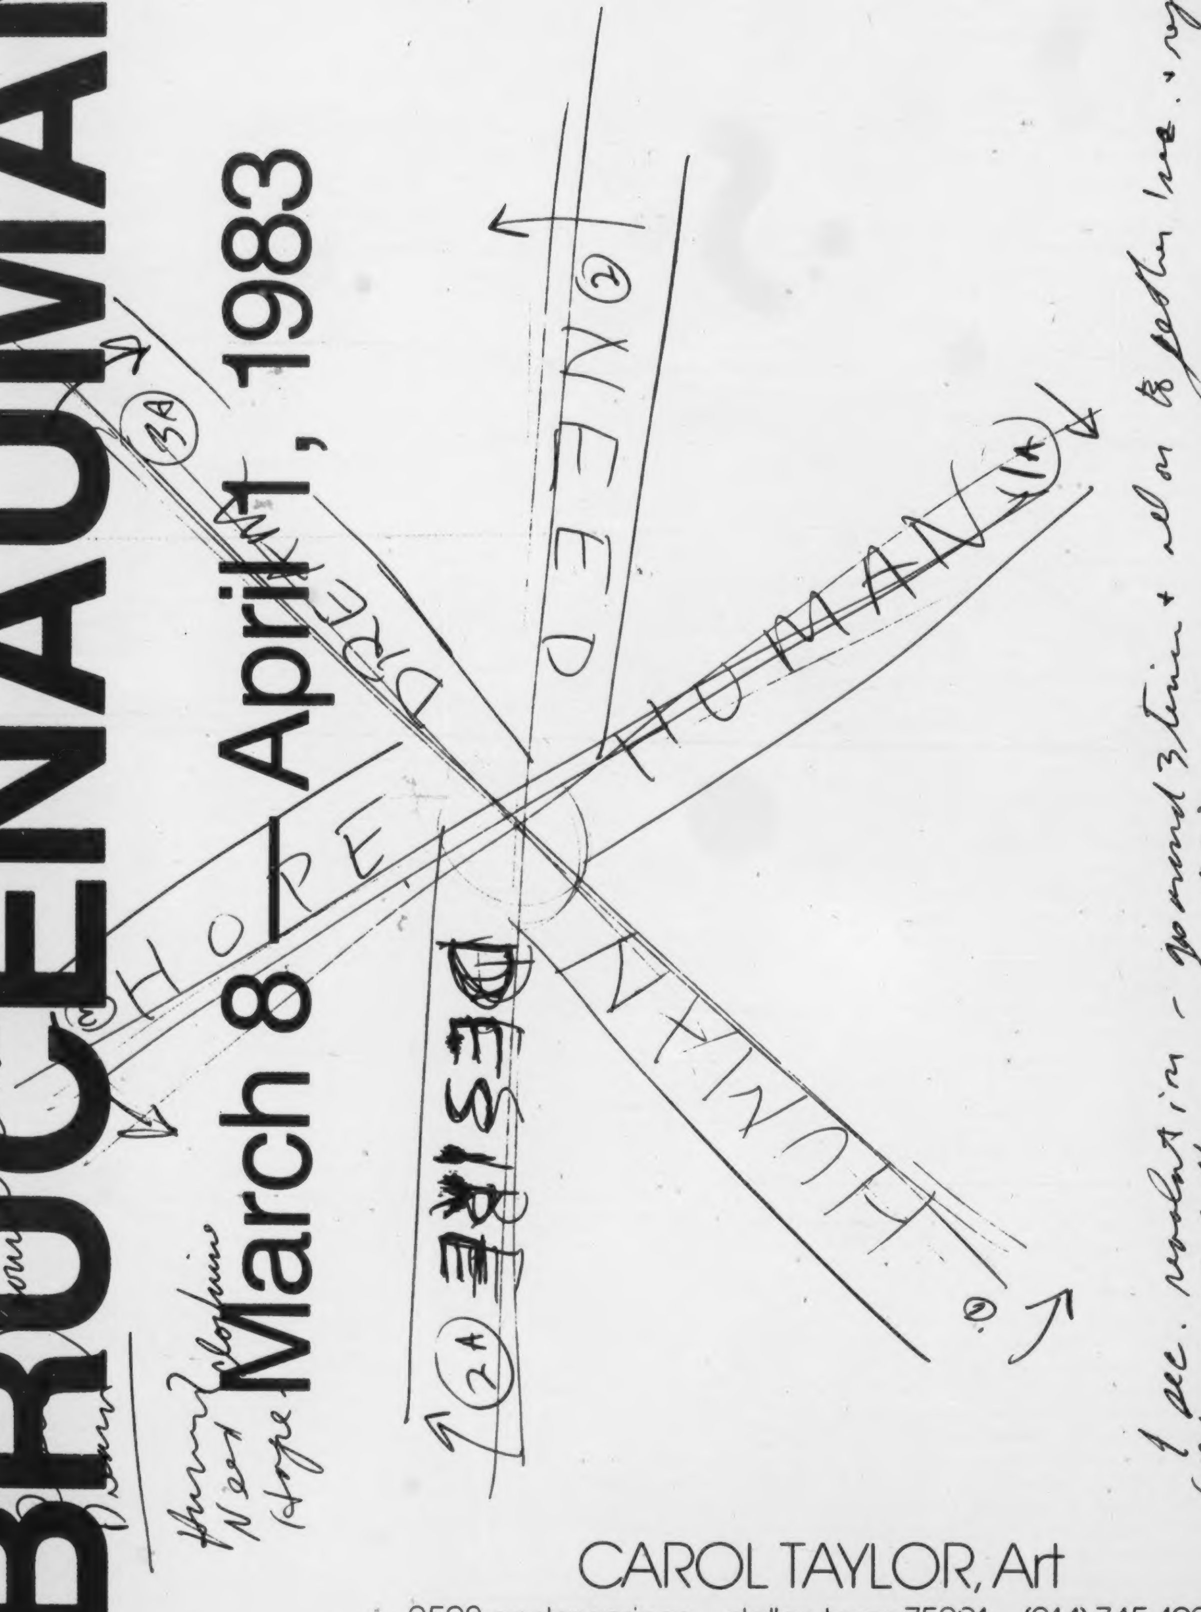
VOL 71 ISS 3 MR 1983 UMI

BRUCE NAUMAN

March 8 — April 1, 1983



HOPE
NEED
HUMAN DESIRE DREAM
1A
2
2A
3A
1 Human Need
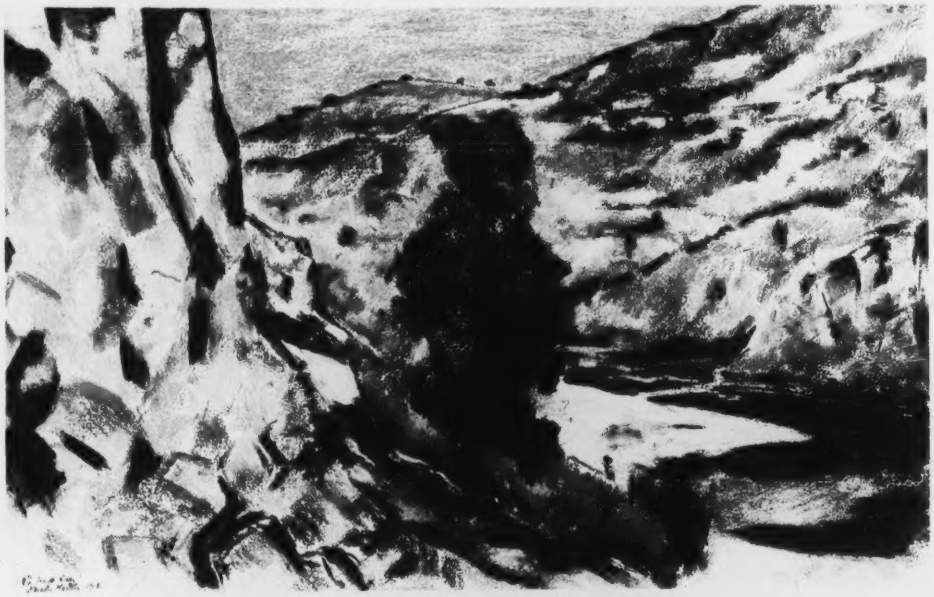
Hope
1 sec. revolution - go around 3 times + all on to flash 1 sec. + repeat.
(about 10" letters - or 8"?)

CAROL TAYLOR, Art
2508 cedar springs dallas, texas 75201 (214) 745-1923



MARSDEN HARTLEY
(1877-1943)
Rio Grande River
1918
Pastel on paper
17 x 27 inches
Signed, titled and dated lower left

Other works by

BLUEMNER
DEMUTH
DOVE
GUGLIELMI
HOFMANN
O'KEEFFE
SCHAMBERG
SHEELER

BARBARA MATHES GALLERY
19 East 71st Street New York NY 10021 212/249-3600

JULES OLITSKI

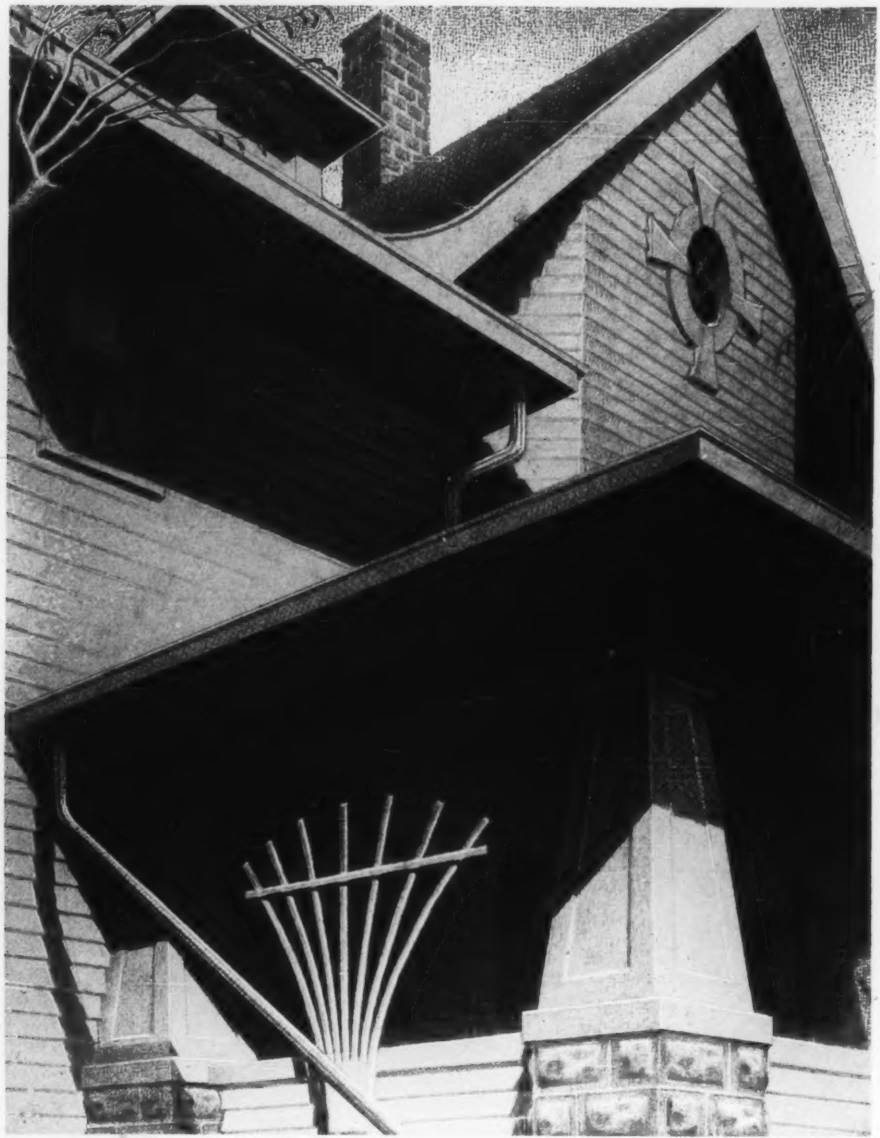
Recent Paintings / February 19 - March 10

HERBERT FERBER

New Paintings / March 12 - 31

M. Knoedler & Co.
19 East 70 Street. New York 10021. Telephone (212) 794-0550

VOL 71
ISS 3
MR
1983
UMI



Grant Wood (1892-1942)
Main Street Mansion
Crayon on buff paper, 20½ x 16 inches
Signed Grant Wood, lower left center

JAMES MARONEY incorporated

129a East 74th Street, New York, N.Y. 10021 (212) 879-2252
Church Street, Roxbury, CT 06783 (203) 354-6783

Review of Books

The Horse's Mouth

Artists' writings provide invaluable firsthand insights into the sensibilities that inform their works. Here, an appraisal of a recent selection.

BY ROBERT BERLIND

On Art, by Marsden Hartley, edited with an introduction and notes by Gail R. Scott, New York, Horizon Press, 1982; 327 pp., $19.95.

Cleophas and His Own, a North Atlantic Tragedy, by Marsden Hartley, Halifax, A Press, 1982; 41 pp., $15.

American Artists on Art From 1940 to 1980, edited by Ellen H. Johnson, New York, Harper & Row, 1982; 274 pp., $17.25 cloth, $9.95 paper.

Mobile Homes, by Rudy Burckhardt, Calais, Vermont, Z Press, 1979; 190 pp., $6.

Daybook, The Journal of an Artist, by Anne Truitt, New York, Pantheon, 1982; 225 pp., $14.95.

Every visual artist knows that trafficking in words has its perils, and yet there is a rich and diverse literature by artists that attracts increasing attention each year. It consists of manifestos, published lectures, autobiography, journals, letters to friends and publications, and various forms of writing as an independent artistic pursuit, sometimes parallel to studio involvements. Even the most reticent of artists often have their words preserved nowadays in published interviews or in solicited statements for catalogues and magazines. It is the exception to the rule that artists of significant stature such as Avery or Hopper leave virtually no comment on their esthetic thinking. There is also an important body of professional art criticism by artists as unlike as Fairfield Porter and Donald Judd. (Brian O'Doherty's American Masters, the Voice and the Myth in Modern Art, first published in 1974, has just been reissued in paperback. It is no secret that the author of this provocative and often brilliant study practices art under the name of Patrick Ireland.) The five books under review here give some sense of the diverseness of artists' writings, not to mention their substantial rewards.

Gail R. Scott has performed an evident labor of love in her preparation of On Art, the first of three proposed volumes of Marsden Hartley's writings. (The second will contain his memoirs and essays on literature, dance, music, and theater; the third, his poetry.) Easily half of Hartley's time and energy went into his writing, which reveals a voice and sensibility that is, as he might have put it, altogether original. Apart from his studio training he was self-taught, and his idiosyncratic prose is like oral speech, now archaic, now strikingly modernist, calling to mind, by turns, his background in 19th-century Maine and his later intimacy with Gertrude Stein. Hartley's rambling vernacular can accommodate mid-sentence shifts of focus, incidental asides, sudden recollections and extended, poetic metaphors. At his best, whether describing a place, a person, or a work of art, Hartley has a wonderful capacity to identify fully with his subject, and he can therefore take full responsibility for the experience he relates. When talking about work he loves, as in his pieces on Marin and O'Keeffe, he does not describe the art so much as recreate it from its own poetic depths. His "typically fervent style," as Scott puts it, is passionate and personal.

At his worst, in a number of heretofore unpublished pieces that were apparently never subject to revision, his writing is prolix, disjunctive, and willfully quirky in a way that often reveals the autodidact. I agree with Scott's decision to "preserve the freshness and spontaneity of his style" rather than editing anything—though the price of wading through 150-word run-on sentences can seem high at times. In any case the negative aspect of his writing is not simply a problem of syntax; it must be seen in the context of his largely tragic life and the related confusions of intention betrayed in some of the writing, problems to which I shall return.

Scott's introduction, which she uses to "trace the outlines of a spiritual biography," is invaluable in sorting out the philosophical issues within the writings, especially when read in conjunction with Barbara Haskell's excellent critical biography, the catalogue for the Whitney retrospective of 1980. Scott notes the "twin poles of his nature—imagination and intellect—between which he seems to have vacillated, relying on one, then on the other as his chief esthetic guidepost." She skillfully traces the enduring influence of Emerson's Transcendentalism, William James's Pragmatism and Henry James's thought in fiction and criticism, citing in them "a continuity of belief in the primacy of experience . . . . For all three, experience is conceived in terms of what can be immediately cognized or actualized." The conjunction of the spiritual and the empirical that these influences suggest was for Hartley the very locus of art. From his 1921 "Dissertation on Modern Painting": "Art is the exact personal appreciation of a thing seen, heard, or felt in terms of itself . . . . The special and peculiar office of modern art is to produce the newness or the 'nowness' of individual experience." Between his early pull toward the ministry and his late religious paintings (Fishermen's Last Supper, Christ Held by Half Naked Men, and by implication many others of his last decade) there are constant indications of his spiritual orientation: "full-blooded, large hearted, and deep souled," as he described the paintings of George Fuller. From his 1936 essay on O'Keeffe: "Artists and religionists are never very far apart, they go to the sources of revelation for what they choose to experience and what they report is the degree of their experiences." Art reveals life to be a spiritual adventure just as O'Keeffe's pictures "portray the journey of her own inner states of being."

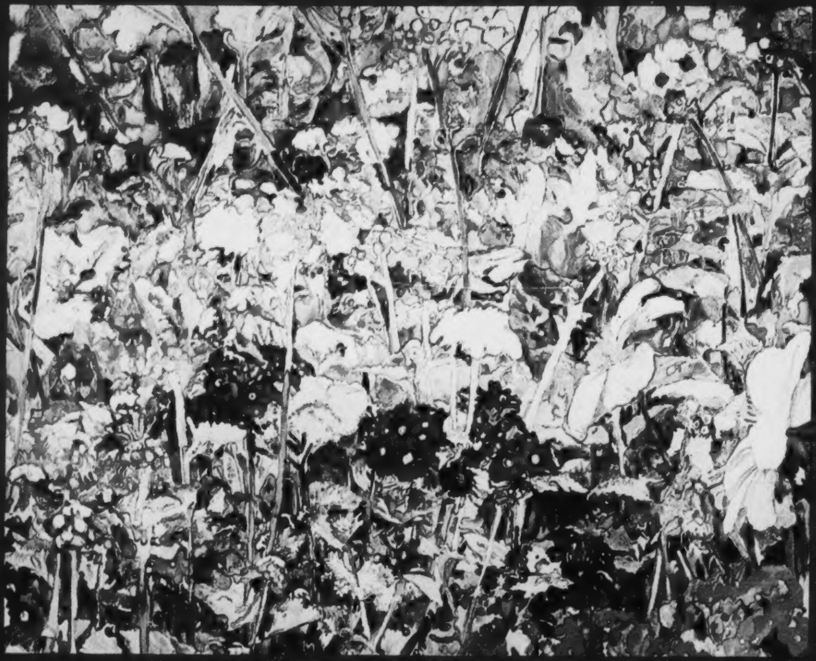
Hartley's own journey was a tortuous one, often resembling some ongoing emotional and spiritual debacle, especially after the disastrous critical response to the German Officer paintings in his 1916 show at "291." His writing must often have served as a consolation for loneliness as, rootless, beset with financial difficulty and protracted losses of inspiration, he shuttled between places in America and Europe, more often than not painting not where he was but where he had been. His acute sensitivity to specific locales and to what he saw as ethnic—he says "racial"—characteristics as artistic determinants must in part have grown out of his insecure childhood circumstances and deep desire for the security of roots. His concept of "American" was really of the New England Puritan tradition he identified with, with its mistrust of theoretical dogma and its "elegant shyness . . . you did not make loud noises, you did not speak above the true tone . . . you did not disturb life or nature by unseemly behaviors . . . ." The esthetic and the moral, comportment and character, coincide perfectly.

How, then, did Hartley reconcile the Puritan ethos with his own homosexuality and what seems to have been largely a life of unrequited desire? ("Gayness" will certainly not do here.) A passage that Haskell quotes from William Carlos Williams's Autobiography sympathetically and poignantly describes his sexual abjectness and life of "torment which painting alone assuaged." It's likely that a certain amount of Hartley's compulsive alternation between rural sites that had for him an archaic integrity and cities that offered sexual opportunity was emblematic of the contradictions his life embodied. At any rate, I cannot help but associate some of the strain in his writing with the discrepancy between his public and private selves. Most especially in much of the writing done in Europe during the twenties, a period for the most part of undistinguished painting, there is a negativity, crankiness and the sense of underlying disintegration. Although Scott does not raise the issue, Haskell demonstrates that there were contradictions between Hartley's intellectual posture and work he was doing at a given time. When he disclaimed any symbolic relevance in the German Officer paintings during World War I, we can recognize his duplicity as a necessary tactic, but how shall we estimate what it cost so content-focused an artist? It seems to me that the cantankerous tone of his attack on French art and some of his protestations that he is a Maine painter through and through, whatever the validity of his statements, are part of a

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

JOSEPH RAFFAEL

NANCY HOFFMAN GALLERY
429 WEST BROADWAY
NEW YORK 10012



SUMMER BREATHING 1982 OIL ON CANVAS 90 X 108 INCHES

Joan Mitchell
February 19 - March 26

Georg Baselitz
March 31 - May 7

XAVIER FOURCADE INC.
36 East 75th Street New York, New York 10021 212 535-3980

compromised identity.

During the winter of 1930–31, a period of rejection, hardship and severe illness, Hartley experienced a spiritual turning—rebirth does not seem too strong a word—that was to manifest itself in the Dogtown paintings of the following summer and later. This area of Cape Ann, he wrote, has "the air of being made for no one—for nothing but itself . . . . No triviality enters such places as these." There continues to be much confusion and pain in his life, but there is also a renewed poetic grandeur. See, for example, this forward to his 1935 essay, "Farewell, Charles," written after the death of Demuth:

> A number of deaths, following each other like so many birds in a triangle going south, lured to other skies and other waters with other air and nourishment in them, like so many birds, swimming into the sundown, hastening, ere the gate should close, leaving them at a foolish portal.

That same year took Hartley to Eastern Points Island, a fishing community in Nova Scotia. Here he stayed that fall and, returning the following summer, most of the remainder of 1936 with the Mason family. This stay with an "incredible family . . . was to prove the richest experience of my life, the richest in ways that I never would have asked or believe [sic], I shall not want ever again to live through another and pray the god of things it may never come to pass again." At 58 years Hartley had found a home, a community and, it appears, a lover in one of the strapping sons of the family. When both sons along with a cousin were drowned while braving a storm to return from the mainland, the idyll turned tragic. That fall Hartley began the manuscript, an extended prose poem with passages of verse that he called Cleophas and His Own, A North Atlantic Tragedy. This typed 25 page manuscript and a postlude of 14 pages were found after his death and are now reaching the public for the first time. Gerald Ferguson has published the material in its original form, reproducing it directly, and the result is an intimate document in which Hartley's presence seems immanent. People are given archaic Acadian names and presented in extraordinary word portraits of the same archetypal force that pervades the whole of Hartley's account: "When Cleophas the father said 'fine large morning,' it sounded as if a page of Blake had been blown open by the wind." As for the family: "never was domestic felicity more perfectly established, everybody loved everybody else—the english spoken was like their thoughts, archaic and elegant . . . . Strength, beauty, love, and rich energy governed this household." Life here—at least in his account—corresponded to and nourished Hartley's own richest energies. In his description of the 70-year-old father we get the enormous power of those figure paintings, the first of his career, that he made in response to the "North Atlantic tragedy." We find also the quasi-theosophical premise of his abstract German Officer "portraits," which also eulogized a lost loved one. "Cleophas is like an equi-distant quadrangle in all of his behaviors, squarish at all times . . . ."

The island—who can say how fictionalized?—is also a place of some sexual polymorphousness and untrammeled expression of love. The "giantesque" son Alphonse Adelard "lost no time in letting me know that he liked me and so we became friends at once." A day of sex play among the two of them and a third is spoken of, rather discreetly: "a great deal of pornographic talk, many awkward passes, much freedom of expression . . . intensely exciting and original." Hartley's Nova Scotia is a place where life is no longer at odds with itself. The temptation is to go on quoting at length from this eccentric, uneven, unfinished and wonderful document. Here is one more in which Hartley speaks of his relationship with Cleophas:

> . . . we two human beings together who have learned much from the university of the imagination, he from the sea—I from the little things on the edge of the sea, intricately unfolding, binding us together and I know it is a case of true unspoken love . . . .

We do not doubt the sincerity of his identifying his life's work in art as "the little things on the edge of the sea," so strong is the sense of spiritual surrender and resolve.

Ellen H. Johnson's American Artists on Art from 1940 to 1980 is an anthology of statements by some 60 artists that will be especially welcome to teachers who, believing in the value of primary sources, spend inordinate amounts of time photocopying and/or keeping track of magazines and catalogues loaned to students. Johnson's organization is based on conventional categories (A.E., Color Field, Pop, Earth & Process, etc.) and virtually all her selections have been culled from familiar sources so there will be little that is new for those who keep abreast of current art. By and large, the samplings represent the artists well, and the artists are well chosen, although the ostensibly value-free, even-handed, across-the-board inclusiveness will inevitably annoy everyone to some degree. There are some notable exclusions, however. We get "Photo-Realist Painting & Super-Realist Sculpture" but nothing concerning perceptually based representational painting though many of the practitioners have written articulately about their work. Somehow Guston, that most eloquent of artists, is missing. And the last category, "Decorative, Narrative, and Popular Image Painting and Installations," results from a desperate attempt to bring it all up to date but is hardly a coherent grouping. These reservations aside, American Artists is a treasure trove.

What is especially striking in many of the statements, in contrast to those of Hartley and some of the Abstract Expressionists, is the obvious evidence of university education. There are many references to disciplines outside artmaking and highly conscious esthetic and historical positions being taken, and not only among the Conceptualists. It is not that these artists are necessarily more intelligent than their forebears—good artists are always intelligent—but that, for better or worse, they reflect a new cultural condition of heightened self-consciousness.

In this context an entirely informal and intimate book like Rudy Burckhardt's Mobile Homes is very refreshing. Composed of generous sections of Burckhardt's marvelous photographs (many of them famous, others new, at least to me), autobiography, rambling recollections, diary entries, a play and travel notes with drawings by Red Grooms, it projects a casual self-confidence at once aristocratic and bohemian. Everything is presented entirely for its own sake, the genres mixed, the photographs mostly undated. Reminiscences of a very proper, upper class upbringing in Basel ("Pfui was a much used word to stop any unclean behavior"), early sexual experience, early years in New York and in the army are intermixed as they might pop into consciousness, always with total candor. Much of the writing concerns travels in the South, Trinidad, Haiti, Morocco and Peru, the focus not on "the sights" but on casual encounters, conversations and observations.

> A boy on top of a truck loaded with sacks is getting ready for the ride home. A woman squats in voluminous skirts as a little river trickles from under her. Two stocky men get into a fight. They take boxer poses and hit out at each other, missing. It ends when a passing soldier pushes one of them against a wall with the authority supplied by his uniform. A dead dog lies in the gutter, his feet in the air.

Mobile Homes was edited by poet Kenward Elmslie, and its style reflects the plain, downbeat manner of much of the New York School of poetry, enough so that one would be mistaken to take its informality for a lack of formal awareness. It is also a wonderful addition to the multifarious output of this photographer/filmmaker/painter, who in his unobtrusive way has been so central to the New York scene over the years. Here he is beginning the day with his wife and son, in perfect balance:

> Every morning, as I awake from the dark of night, a tiny speck in the void, I have to begin all over—there is little to continue from the day before. Then to my surprise, things fall into place: Yvonne gives me a hug. Thomas cracks a joke, there's a check in the mail, my health's good, I can work on a film or a painting or my memoirs; I'm a success if no one puts me down nor envy rears its ugly head.

At $6.00 this must be the best bargain in town.

Anne Truitt's Daybook: the Journal of an Artist is a beautifully produced volume that has the feel as well as the contents of an intimate journal. She began writing it in 1974 following her retrospectives at the Whitney and the Corcoran, which left her feeling that "the artist in me had ravished the rest of me and got away scot-free." Daybook, then, grew out of an intention to realign her artist-self with the rest of her life—that of a single mother, homemaker, citizen of the world. "I tried to be patient with the rhythmical unfolding of my writing . . . ." She kept her journal for a year, then resumed in 1978 when her first grandchild was born. A natural and graceful writer, her prose is limpid, direct and capable of conveying profound emotions without recourse to heated style. While chronicling her daily life her journal becomes also a sort of spiritual autobiography. Past situations arise spontaneously as though in response to the new space writing creates in her life. Truitt's self-examination is unflinching and, at every moment, possessed of the inevitable dignity that attends a genuine commitment to telling the truth about oneself. Themes of her "Boston blue-stocking" heritage, with its strengths and liabilities, her childhood, her earlier profession in psychology, her interactions with the art world, her artmaking, her day to day pleasures and tribulations—with never a moment of triviality—interweave to make an entirely credible fabric of life. One example:

> The newspaper this morning prominently displayed a photograph of a Cambodian man holding the naked, spraddled body of his just killed daughter. I place Sam's poached egg on toast, hot Ovaltine and honey in front of him.

There follows a passage in which she recounts her train of thought,

VOL
71
1
ISS
3
MR 1983
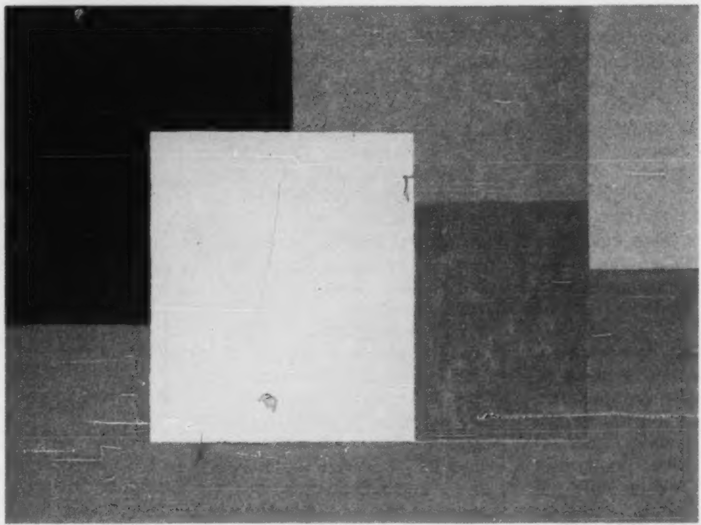
UMI



The Way XLIV 60" x 80" 1981

Jacob Kainen
March 3 - April 2, 1983

Martha White Gallery
330 West Main Street
Louisville, Kentucky 40202
502/589-3347

ENZO CUCCHI

5 - 30 March 1983

SPERONE WESTWATER
142 Greene Street New York 10012
212/431.3685

her refusal to draw the easy conclusion: "The whole world is a mad invention with no order, no sense, no hope of sanity." Instead she comes to her "accustomed position of paradox, with the responsibility for it," and she goes on to consider the implications of that complex moment in her life. It is precisely Truitt's deep philosophical sense of responsibility for her world that makes everything useful to her: financial distress, critical hostility to her work, illness, her past, a horrendous photo in the morning paper.

Everyone interested in the phenomenology of experiencing art should read the description of her response to her first Barnett Newman: "a universe of blue paint by which I was immediately ravished. My whole self lifted into it." Her account of the instantaneous and—I use the word deliberately—transforming effect of the painting upon her should give pause to everyone still stuck in a position about "formalist" vs. "content"-based art.

Hartley defined purity as "the quality of a thing or a thought when it has been released from all irrelevant influences." Truitt writes: "The most demanding part of living a lifetime as an artist is the strict discipline of forcing oneself to work steadfastly along the nerve of one's own most intimate sensitivity." I can imagine her living in complete harmony with Cleophas and his brood. ☐

Author: Robert Berlind is an artist who writes on art.

MONOGRAPHS

The World of Henri Rousseau, by Yann le Pichon, New York, Viking, 1982; 285 pp., $75.

This affectionate study of Henri Rousseau's art and life begins with an invitation and a statement of intentions. Yann le Pichon invites the "dear reader" to recognize that "the Douanier Rousseau lives within us"—an appealing idea—and then says that he wants to "unveil the mysteries" of Rousseau's painting. To help in this ambitious endeavor, the author spent 20 years studying Rousseau's collection of newspaper clippings, postcards, engravings and reproductions as well as letters, photographs and other family memorabilia to which he had exclusive access. His most important discovery was the source for much of Rousseau's imagery, the album Wild Beasts: Approximately 200 Amusing Illustrations Drawn from the Life of Animals, with an Instructive Text.

Yann le Pichon has also tried to create, through the testimony of the painter's friends and family, a picture of Rousseau's world—the walks he took, the places he painted, his relations with family, wives, children, loves and friends. Although the contours of the Douanier's personality remain as mysterious as the ambience of his paintings, we are provided with clues. In life, as in art, Rousseau was a fantasizer: full of grandiosity, he heard praise instead of jeering when he exhibited his work year after year in the Salon des Independants. For all his innocence, he was prone to self-promoting (and self-deluding) lies and even crimes; in 1907 he was jailed for embezzlement. He adored children in general, but was insensitive to the needs of his own offspring. He loved women, but his romanticism and sensuality combined with terrible attacks of unjustified jealousy.

So far so good; Yann le Pichon creates a life through a few evocative details. He runs into trouble, though, when he tries to understand Rousseau's creative process. This he sees in terms of a theory about the relationship of childhood experience to artistic inspiration. "The imagination," he says, "might be simply a mental reorganization of reminiscences of early determining impressions, restored by random images that are found or patiently sought after. And I arrived at the hypothesis that if the emotional origin and profound inspiration of artistic expression were investigated, they might turn out to be the idealized, heightened, and magnified transcription of childhood fantasies reconstituted in an effort to escape the harsh laws that reality inflicts on the adult, and from which he tries to take refuge in aesthetic attitude. Hence, might an artist's sublimation of his original psychic instincts not be just as much a determining factor as his genetically acquired characteristics?"

Passages like this—and there are many—slow almost to a halt our search for the Rousseau that "lives within us." Psychological inquiry, of course, is not off limits to art historians, but, being amateurs, we must start with empathy and information and then tread lightly, knowing that every step is only a conjecture. In such uncertain terrain, clarity of thought and language is essential, but Yann le Pichon tends more towards poetic evocation than to analytical lucidity. As if to rescue his reader from total befuddlement, he unfurls quotations—from Valéry, Oscar Wilde, Sartre, even the Bible—as if they were banners on the 14th of July. They flap and flourish in their bright colors, calling attention to themselves, not to Henri Rousseau's life and art.

There are organizational problems as well. The text, divided into chapters dealing with various themes in Rousseau's painting, attempts to weave together biography, psychology and iconography. Unfortunately, the result is more of a collage than a tapestry, and it is so difficult to follow the bits and pieces assembled here that the long, detailed chronology at the book's end comes as a relief. Another sort of problem stems from the author's effort to see Rousseau's works as Rousseau might have seen them, but too often, he goes too far. In discussing the still lifes, for example, he tells us the "messages" the individual flowers had for the painter: forget-me-nots say "remember me," poppies say "let's love one another," and so on. There are, however, moments of odd poetic insight, as when le Pichon tells us that Rousseau's painting "exudes a bitter fragrance that grabs your throat like the scent of wild flowers that feed on decaying compost. Rousseau's works have this effect because they cannot hide either the distress of their creator or the bliss to which he aspired."

The best part of this book is the illustrations and captions. The design and layout suit the subject, although even here, the use of details taken from Rousseau's paintings as ornaments for the chapter headings borders on the "cutesy." Turning the pages of pictures, one experiences a delicious, regressive thrill; our visual appetite is like that of a child opening a box of chocolates. There are lots and lots of pictures, big, small, black and white, colored, crunchy, creamy, suspicious-looking, wicked. There are photographs of Rousseau, of his childhood and adult homes, his wives, family, friends. We see the motifs he painted, and all kinds of visual sources for his imagery.

The juxtaposition of Rousseau's paintings and the source material has nothing to do with dreary source-mongering. It is more like a lotto game of matching images. What could be more fun than finding the elephant that inspired the elephant in The Dream (it came from Rousseau's album of wild beasts)? Or discovering that he took the ring of dancing children in The Representatives of Foreign Powers Coming to Salute the Republic as a Sign of Peace from a postcard? And what, one wonders, was Rousseau thinking about when he painted his pornographic Beauty and the Beast (in which a naked woman copulates with a wolf), basing it on an even more pornographic lithograph by Devéria showing a woman having sex with a donkey?

Perhaps the most arresting juxtaposition is Rousseau's Surprised! with Delacroix's A Tiger and Riou's Stormy Night. Rousseau's tiger keeps the outlines of Delacroix's, but he has been placed in the midst of deep jungle grasses. His eyes are as round as buttons, his teeth huge and white, his whiskers flying. The stripes of rain and lightning that surprised the tiger were taken from Riou's print, and for all the primitivism of their rendering, they do much to heighten the tiger's terribilitá. The prowling feline is both hilarious and horrible—horrible enough to make our laughter catch in our throats. Rousseau transformed life through his unshakable fantasy. We are told that he was frightened by the wild beasts he painted. While painting Surprised!, he had to run to his window to make sure that he was in Paris, not in some menacing jungle.

It is this primitive conviction of the reality of his intentions that makes Rousseau's tiger so alive. Indeed, this conviction gives all of his paintings their peculiar life. In the end, one is grateful to le Pichon for gathering so much material and presenting it without pedantry. By laying sources and paintings side by side, he makes Rousseau's transformations all the more astonishing. One can also be thankful that the author did not succeed in his aim to "unveil the mysteries" of Rousseau's paintings. That great sly naïf must keep his mysteries—they are what give his work its enduring power. —Hayden Herrera Canaletto, by J.G. Links, Ithaca, Cornell University Press, 1982; 240 pp., $48.50.

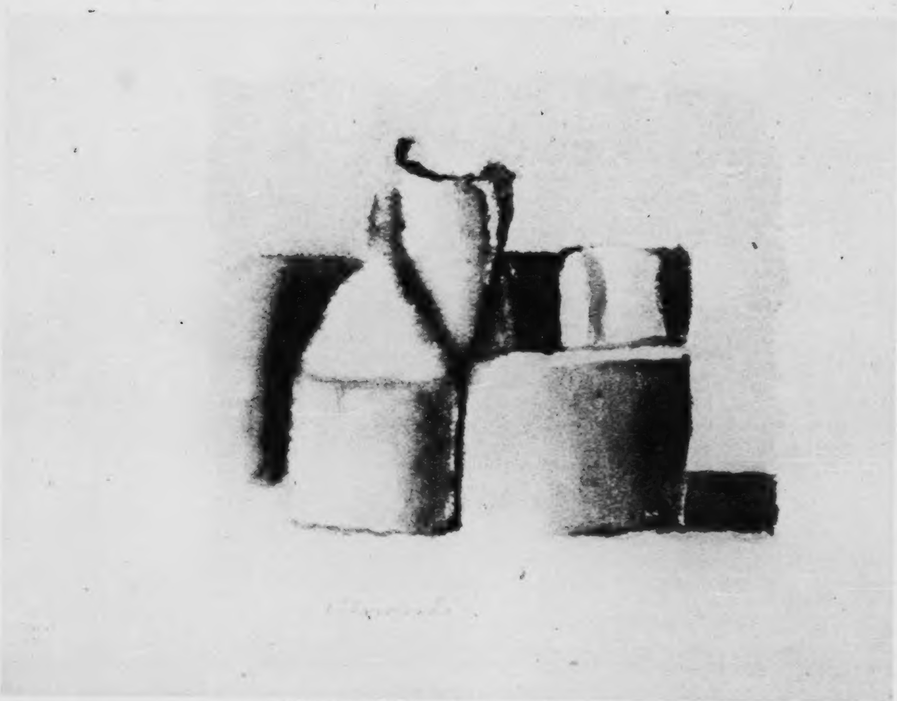
Canaletto has long been neglected by art historians. J. G. Links's new monograph serves to rectify this injustice, but Links is such a Canaletto enthusiast that he does not pause to ponder the reason for this neglect. Yet an ex-

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

ROBERT MOTHERWELL
"Green Stripe with Ocre"
1971, acrylic on canvas
60 x 40 inches

JOHN C. STOLLER & CO.
400 MARQUETTE AVE MINNEAPOLIS 55401 (612) 339-7060



Still Life, 1957. Watercolor on paper, 10 × 13 in.

Paintings, Drawings,
Etchings by GIORGIO
MORANDI

ODYSSIA
GALLERY
730 Fifth Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10019
Tel. (212) 541-7520

planation seems fairly close at hand: Canaletto's topographical views do not answer our modern demand for emotive subject matter and aggressively visible brushwork. Canaletto's successor, Francesco Guardi, for instance, has been easier to accept because of his proto-Impressionist, brushy facture. And yet Canaletto, despite his "photographic" technique, remains unquestionably the greater artist. (Some writers have seized on phrases in historical documents to portray Canaletto himself as a spontaneous, modern plein-air painter, but Links firmly quashes such speculations.)

Canaletto helped launch the tradition of topographical illustration which flourished in the 18th and 19th centuries, and which has only recently begun to be widely studied. Links's tight focus on Canaletto keeps him from considering the wider critical problems posed by the topographical tradition. Most of the works in this tradition cannot be said to rise above the level of mechanical competence; recent rediscoveries of Turner's landscape watercolors, and Atget's photographs of Paris have made it clear that some topographical pictures rise to the level of art. But these works, like the Canalettos studied by Links, are exceptions.

Links never addresses the general question of what qualified a topographical illustration as art, but a number of his individual points are quite relevant. He makes it clear, for instance, that the impression of photographic accuracy we get from Canaletto's masterpieces is quite misleading. Canaletto's most factual paintings are still works of the imagination. He frequently altered the placement or dimensions of buildings and monuments to suit his compositional purposes; similarly, he disposed light and shadow as it suited him; and he often combined multiple viewpoints in one picture. Links suggests that the impression of photographic veracity was something demanded by Canaletto's English buyers, and that his skill in satisfying this demand was a major reason for his success. (Guardi's failure, in his lifetime, to sell to the lucrative English market was due precisely to the non-photographic, "Impressionist" appearance of his views.) One only wishes that Links had further examined the esthetic ideas of Canaletto's buyers, and their influence on him.

Canaletto's Venice is not conventionally picturesque. True, Canaletto sometimes depicts a certain shabbiness and decay; in his pictures, as Links writes, "The sunblinds are falling apart; coarse sailcloth is used for shade. Washing is hanging out to dry—washing in the Piazza S. Marco!" But he hardly revels in such picturesque decrepitude; instead, his paintings radiate a cool, pristine elegance. This contradiction seems to be part of their power. Similarly, Canaletto in his mature work deliberately abandons the picturesque atmospheric effects of his precursors. He paradoxically builds drama out of clarity and stillness.

J. G. Links has previously written a volume on Canaletto and His Patrons, a guidebook to Venice, and the introduction and notes to an edition of engravings of Canaletto's paintings, in addition to revising the authoritative catalogue raisonné of the painter's work. Unfortunately, in this new volume Links continues to stick closely to the outline of biographical narrative; questions of attribution and date still preoccupy him. Instead of providing a starting point of criticism, these questions tend to become its conclusion. Links extracts every ounce of significance from the surviving historical evidence, while scrupulously separating fact from interpretation. From a scholarly point of view, Links's greatest contribution here seems to be the unearthing of a great deal of new information about the hitherto obscure nine years that Canaletto spent in England. In addition to the English period, he gives special attention to Canaletto's lesser-known early Roman views and his late capriccios, and also to his artistic precursors and descendants.

Though the quality of the reproductions could have been improved, the illustrations are copious (245 in black and white, 43 in color), well laid-out, and placed mercifully near the relevant paragraphs in the text. The "blow ups" of details—especially Canaletto's miniature genre scenes—are excellent. They make it easy for the reader to step into Canaletto's imaginary Venice, a place only seemingly identical to the marble and brick city floating on the Adriatic. —Pepe Karmel

PHOTOGRAPHY

Last of a Breed: Portraits of Working Cowboys, by Martin H. Schreiber, introduction by Louis L'Amour, Austin, Texas Monthly Press, 1982; unpaginated, $30.

Vanishing Breed: Photographs of the Cowboy and the West, by William Albert Allard, foreword by Thomas McGuane, Boston, Little Brown (a New York Graphic Society book), 1982; 144 pp., $34.95.

Cowboys are best approached with a measure of skepticism. Robert Frank, from the depths of his urban ironic despair, took some good photographs of cowboys trying their best to imitate John Wayne and Gary Cooper. More recently, New Yorker Garry Winogrand's pictures of the Fort Worth Stock Show and Rodeo, collected in his 1980 book, Stock Photographs, captured the bravado of this quintessentially honky-tonk event.

Unlike Frank or Winogrand, Martin H. Schreiber and William Albert Allard are interested only in "real" (e.g., old-fashioned) cowboying. They give no indication that the kind of ranching they depict, done with horses and ropes, rather than trucks and machines, is a rare luxury today, affordable only for the very rich who treat their ranches as amusements and tax shelters. Ranchers who are in it to make money cannot afford to be so picturesque.

In Last of a Breed: Portraits of Working Cowboys, Schreiber seems to have borrowed Winogrand's technical formulae: fast black-and-white film, a wide-angle lens, flash combined with natural light. Schreiber, too, is a New Yorker, but he unfortunately lacks Winogrand's insight into the complex relation between myth and reality. Schreiber knows how to use his wide-angle lens to set a horse or a face in the foreground against a vast plateau stretching into the distance; but once he has evoked the immense proscenium of the West, he just stages the old clichés. We see the (flash-lit) foreman rising at dusk with a mug of coffee, cowboys relaxing with guitars in a tent, distant herds of cattle moving through rolling sagebrush, a chuck wagon with a campfire blazing beneath the last flares of sunset.

A couple of pictures show the cowboys lounging against their pickup trucks or heading down the highway on a "beer run," but from these photographs one would never guess to what extent the pickup has replaced the horse as the cowboy's main form of transportation. In a few other pictures, Schreiber communicates a genuine, citybred sense of astonishment at the ungainly, beautiful cattle who are the raison d'être of the ranch business. I suspect that—instead of a handsome but unoriginal volume on cowboys—Schreiber could have done a really terrific book on cows.

In Vanishing Breed: Photographs of the Cowboy and the West, William Albert Allard gives a wider view of Western life than does Schreiber. In fact his selection of pictures is curiously diffuse—what the Hutterite farmers at the end of the book have to do with cowboys is a mystery to me (I always thought that farmers and cowboys were natural enemies). Many of Allard's color photographs have the slightly unreal, posed perfection of illustrations in National Geographic, for which he has indeed been a staff photographer. Too many of his portraits of cowboys with weatherbeaten, leathery faces (or, alternatively, innocent, young ones) look like real-life versions of Marlboro ads. Still others of Allard's photographs utilize the wide-angle, asymmetrical, exaggerated rhetoric of color "art" photographers like William Eggleston and Joel Meyerowitz.

Occasionally Allard's knowledge of cowboying overcomes his penchant for picturesqueness. His text doesn't mention the racism that keeps Mexicans in subordinate positions on American ranches today (and keeps blacks off them altogether), but he does include a number of pictures of Mexican vaqueros (in the 19th century, Mexican cowboys taught North Americans the ropes). Perhaps it is not a coincidence that the one Mexican photographed on a northern ranch, rather than in Mexico, is also the only scowling figure in the entire book.

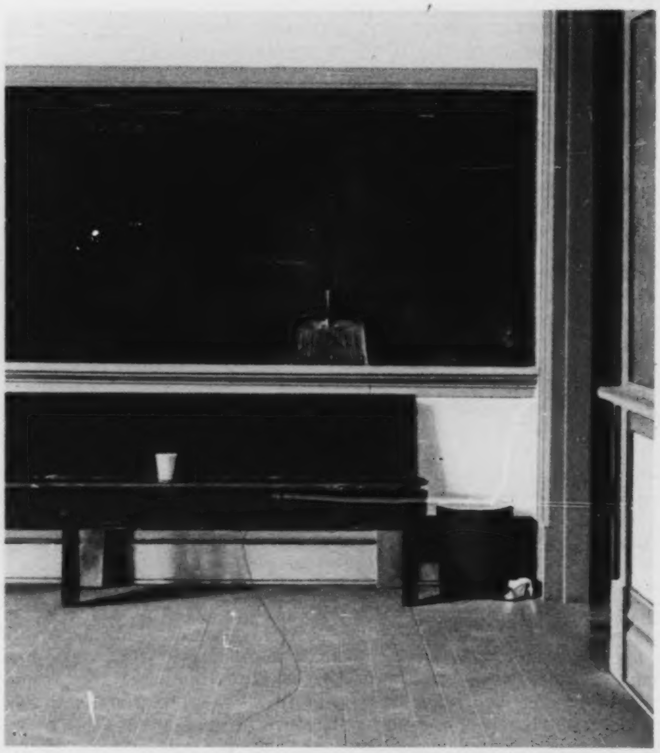
Allard and Schreiber both show calves being roped; they both avoid showing the mechanical chutes which have largely rendered roping unnecessary. And neither photographer wants to reveal the gory details of what happens next, when the calves are branded, dehorned, castrated (the leftover "prairie oysters" are a Western delicacy), and injected with drugs. But this inevitable brutality is an essential element in the cowboy ethos, and in a few pictures Allard does indirectly evoke it. One picture, of a downed calf surrounded by cowboys, is centered on a dully gleaming hypodermic gun dangling from a cowboy's hand. The details are lost in shadow and dust, but the camera is practically on the ground, at the calf's eye-level, and the viewer shares the animal's sense of terror. A couple of pages later, Allard offers a close-up of a cowboy's blood-stained hands, one holding a cigarette and the other an open penknife, poised in front of the crotch of his faded blue jeans. There is blood along the edge of the knife-blade. When part of your job is castrating steers, your own masculinity feels a little threatened. Unlike many of the other photographs in this book, this picture actually says something about the real cowboy.

—Pepe Karmel

Contributors

Hayden Herrera is author of the recent Frida, A Biography of Frida Kahlo (Harper & Row). Pepe Karmel is a free-lance critic living in Manhattan.

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI



ALLPORT ASSOCIATES GALLERY
1000 MAGNOLIA AVENUE, LARKSPUR, CALIFORNIA 94939 415/461-2522

Don Williams

March 4 to April 6, 1983

"Jessica", 1982, pastel 16½ x 14¾"

DOMELA
Réalisations 1922-82

February–March
GALERIE DE FRANCE
50–52 RUE DE LA VERRERIE 75004, PARIS
Tel. 274–38.00

Report from West Germany
A Season of Artistic Detente

BY DAVID GALLOWAY

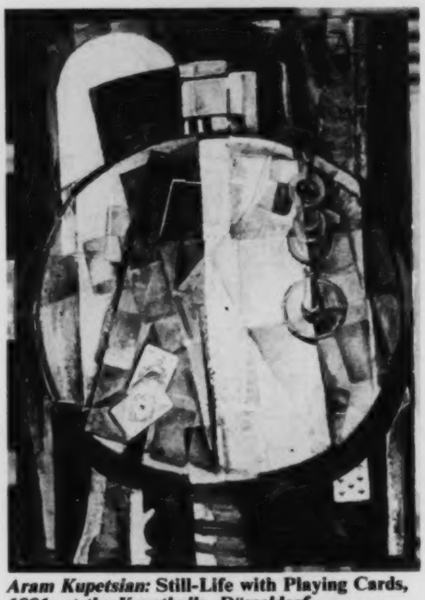
In addition to some large international shows, the salient exhibitions this past autumn either looked east of the Iron Curtain or addressed German art, past and present.

Despite a rare Indian summer, the current German season began with gloomy tidings: a new and colorless coalition in Bonn, massive cuts in cultural budgets, a drastic slump in the commercial art market. As antidote to that teutonic Weltschmerz, the news from Kassel was trumpeted through the national press. With 380,000 visitors and 33,000 catalogues sold, Documenta 7 had broken all previous records and firmly assured the future of Documenta 8. Rudi Fuchs's idiosyncratic "museum of 100 days" had attracted the youngest audience since 1955, and the backpacking pilgrims (as well as the unemployed) were admitted for half-price. They endorsed the mammoth show, with its heavy-handed stress on the new Expressionism, as a festival of "alternative" culture, for which Joseph Beuys obligingly played patron saint.

Such faith received further confirmation through major international exhibitions in Berlin and Munich. Nearly 50 artists were selected for "Zeitgeist," and many produced work especially for the imposing classical building by Martin Gropius which housed the show [see p. 33 for more on "Zeitgeist"]. In the shadow of the Berlin wall, it provided an ironic setting for the intensely personal, anti-authoritarian gestures of Rainer Fetting, Helmut Middendorf and A.R. Penck. Penck, who emigrated to West Germany from Dresden two years ago, created massive murals for the central staircase of the Gropius building; in red and grey, their aggressive hieroglyphic surfaces might have been notations from the garbled dialogue between East and West.

The exhibition's organizers, Christos Joachimides and Norman Rosenthal, were responsible for the controversial "New Spirit in Painting" presented at London's Royal Academy in 1981. In Berlin, they gave even more prominent emphasis to the subjective esthetic they see as a hallmark of the 1980s. At its best, "Zeitgeist" displayed an unchecked, primal energy that indeed seemed to confirm a new spirit in our time; too often, however, the paintings included were muddied in both content and technique. Joachimides is quick to admit his own affection for the "smudged" canvas as an alternative to what he terms "hospital-clean." But that preference hardly accounts for the decision to bring Stella and Beuys or Warhol and Sandro Chia together under the same Gropius roof.

Though Germans and Italians dominated "Zeitgeist," the American contribution to the show was more substantial than at Documenta 7. On the other hand, "Gefühl und Härte" (Feeling and Toughness) at the Munich Kunstverein was not only an all-German but an all-Berlin show, designed to demonstrate the pioneering role of the former capital in the new German art. The title referred to Berlin's ambivalent political situation, and to the intense contrasts that determine its unique atmosphere. Most of the 19 artists represented—including Fetting, Middendorf, Gerd Rohling, Thomas Lange—are unmistakably "wild," but their work demonstrates an authority rarely found among the "Neue Wilden" based in Frankfurt, Hamburg and Cologne. Few, however, approach the technical brilliance of Salomé, whose canvases are animated by a virtuoso sense of color and line.



Aram Kupetsian:* Still-Life with Playing Cards, *1981; at the Kunsthalle, Düsseldorf.

Art Marketing

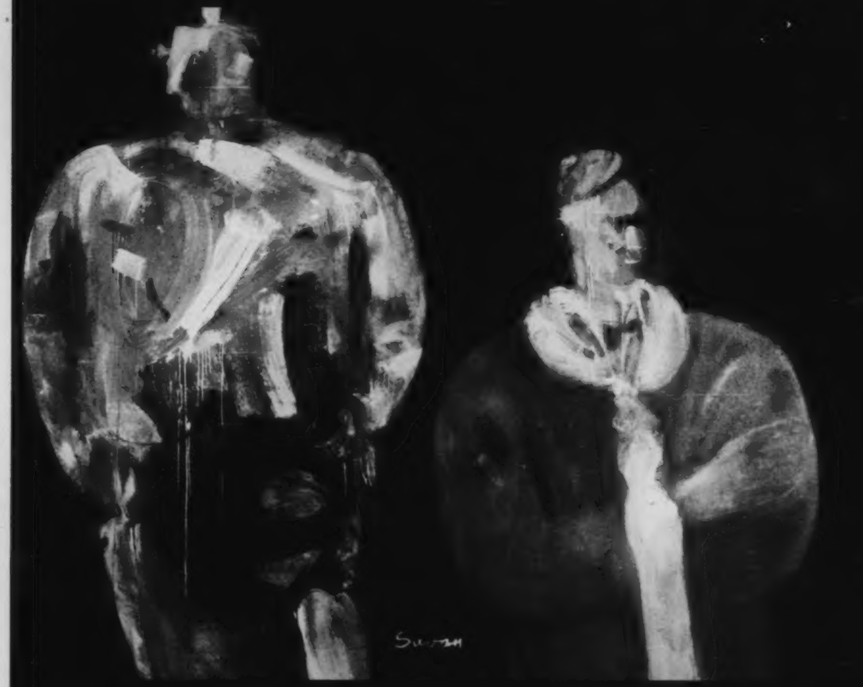
Many dealers have counted on the vogue for "Neue Wilden" to float them over the shoals of recession. The 16th International Art Fair, held this year in Düsseldorf, thus seemed especially conceived for the collector who buys with his ears. The Americans all cautiously stayed at home, and what once ranked as Europe's leading fair had the unhappy feel of do-it-yourself provincialism. The major alternative to a walk on the wild side was a stroll through the classic moderns; Beckmann, Marc, Kandinsky, Léger and Modigliani were available for the cautious, six-figure investor, and the quality was exceptionally high. Düsseldorf's Hans Mayer Gallery struck an elegant middle course with blue-chip contemporaries (Rauschenberg, Warhol, Bill) and accomplished younger artists (Suzan Pitt, Peter Reichenberger, Takashi Naraha). Mayer's phenomenal success at the fair made it clear that a recession audience is far more interested in quality than in fashion.

The German art fair, the first of its kind in Europe, originated in Cologne in 1967; that city has now hosted the first international photography fair, with 31 dealers and 50,000 visitors. Such a fair was the long-cherished dream of dealer Rudolf Kicken, who has almost single-handedly fought for public recognition of photography as a fine art. Only three museums in the country have separate photographic departments, and the student interested in the German avant-garde of the 1920s or '30s is better served by American collections. "The photo boom is just around the corner," Kicken cheerfully predicts, but then adds less cheerfully, "We only have to survive for the next five years." His own survival tactics include packaging shows for museums and presenting a broad range of historical and contemporary exhibitions in his Cologne gallery. The latest features a remarkable 23-year-old self-portraitist who identifies himself only with the name Simpfendoerfer. Using drapery and simple props to suggest a narrative context, the photographer produces unique, life-sized studies charged with emotional intensity. But despite a proven talent for picking gifted newcomers and ferreting out classic prints, Kicken reluctantly admits that he finds most of his customers abroad.

The Eastern Invasion

What seemed at first a promising sign of East-West détente now increasingly resembles the arrival of a sway-backed Trojan horse. The invasion began a year ago, when Peter Ludwig added 159 works by Soviet artists to his legendary collections. Though the artists all bore the Politburo's seal of approval, they were refreshingly free of Socialist-Realist stereo-

VOL 71 ISS 3 MR 1983 UMI



ERGABIX, 1963, OIL ON CANVAS, 69 x 87½ INCHES

MAURICE SIEVAN

(1898-1981)

PAINTINGS FROM THE 50's AND 60's

MARCH 1-APRIL 2

VANDERWOUDE TANANBAUM
24 E 81 STREET NEW YORK
212 879 8200

EXCLUSIVE REPRESENTATIVE
FOR THE ESTATE OF MAURICE SIEVAN

WOLF KAHN

paintings and pastels

MARCH 5 TO APRIL 2, 1983

An illustrated catalogue is available at $4 postpaid.

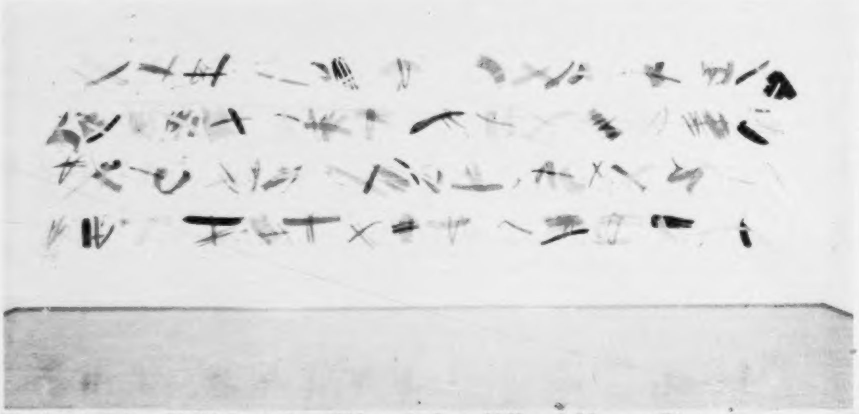
Grace Borgenicht Gallery
724 Fifth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10019
212/247-2111

types. There were no stout maidens enamored of tractors, no patriotic parades of banner-waving workers, no caricatures of decadent capitalists. There was, however, a good deal of third-rate painting—a fact temporarily obscured by Ludwig's euphoric reports on the new artistic freedom in the Soviet Union. When the works went on view last summer in Aachen and Cologne, few critics could share the collector's euphoria, though most endorsed his central premise: that Germans cannot afford to ignore what transpires east of the Iron Curtain. Ludwig and his curators, however, went far beyond the good-neighbor concept of cultural exchange to argue the excellence of the Soviet achievement and its role in the museum of the future. Nevertheless very few individual works supported their claims.

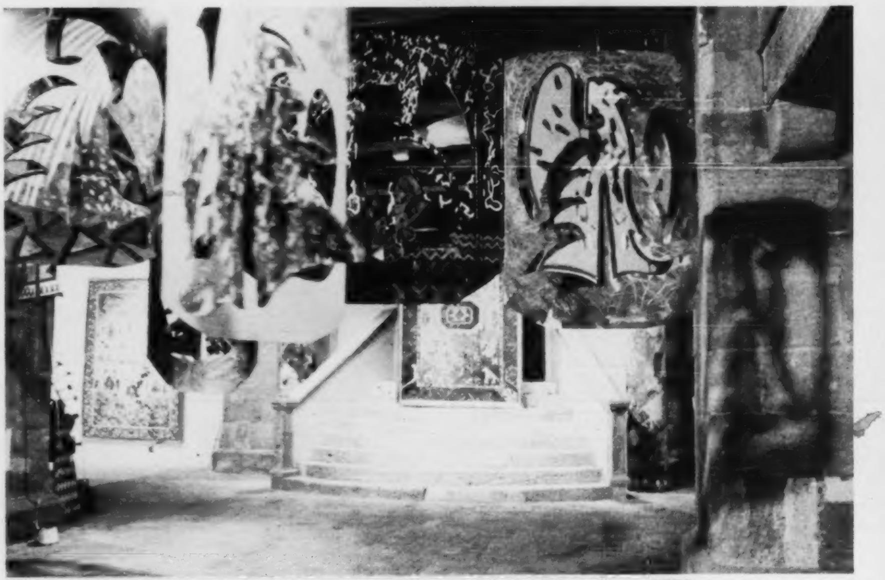
It did soon become clear, though, that Ludwig had skimmed the cream from the thousands of works viewed in ateliers and special exhibitions. The German publisher Henri Nannen, who accompanied Ludwig on some of his eastern jaunts, assembled his own collection, which is currently being marketed by the Levy Gallery in Hamburg. Meanwhile, the Soviet miracle has been rapturously touted by the powerful publishing conglomerate of Grüner and Jahr, of which Nannen is chairman. (The company's influential magazines include Art and Stern, where Nannen serves as editor-in-chief.) The Nannen investment, which made its way to the Düsseldorf Kunsthalle under the title "Russian Painting Today," is a panoply of neo-Impressionism, neo-Expressionism, neo-Surrealism, and neo-Blaue Reiter. There are individual artists of indisputable talent, including Aram Kupetsian, but the latter's achievements would be considerably more impressive had Braque and Picasso never lifted a brush.

That the party line is not always inimical to Soviet and East German artistic accomplishment was revealed in several shows of contemporary work—work that was surprisingly free of the Socialist-Realist stereotype.

As uneven and derivative as the works in the Nannen collection appear, they are sheer manna compared to those included in "Forty Artists from the Soviet Union," a special section of the annual exhibition of artists from Nordrhein-Westfalen. Selected by members of the artists' federation of the U.S.S.R., most of the works were somber in hue, crude in execution, and tireless in celebration of the revolutionary cause. That the party line is not always inimical to artistic accomplishment was revealed by yet another Soviet presentation at the Düsseldorf Kunsthalle—a retrospective of the paintings, drawings and posters of Alexander Deineke (1899–1969). Despite its Stalinist fervor, Deineke's work is executed with a masterly sense of composition; and the graphic realism of his paintings does not preclude a strong feeling for primary form, as though he seeks to convey an inner truth concealed beneath the figurative surface. Even his most doctrinaire productions contain unmistakable echoes of the creative ferment which carried Russian modernists from 19th-century academicism to pure abstraction. That brilliant, repressed heritage was recalled in a retrospective at Duisburg's Lehmbruck Museum which summarized the versatile careers of Alexander Rodchenko and his wife Varvara Stepanova. The most extensive show of its kind presented in the West, it drew heavily on the collections of Russian museums and of the Rodchenko heirs in Moscow.



Eva-Maria Schön: Untitled painting, 1982; at the Leopold Hoesch Museum, Düren.



Horst Gläsker paintings as installed at the Städtische Galerie, Regensburg, 1982.

Simpfendoerfer:* She followed slowly, and she needed time, *1982, photograph; at the Rudolf Kicken Gallery, Cologne.

VOL 71 ISS 3 MR 1983 UMI

The liberal breeze that wafts from the Kremlin has allegedly been felt as far west as Dresden, where the annual exhibition of East German art was opened with self-congratulatory tributes to a new individualism. In celebration of its own third birthday, Art magazine has selected the work of 13 East German artists and presented them under the title "Zeitvergleich" (Time Comparison)—a conscious confrontation of the two Germanys. Opened at the Hamburg Kunstverein, and with an imposing catalogue introduced by Günter Grass, the show will travel to museums throughout the country, ending in Hannover in 1984. "Zeitvergleich" makes abundantly clear that there are wild ones east of the border as well (e.g., Walter Libuda) and a far more subtle sense of historical antecedents than in works from the U.S.S.R. But distances are shorter, and information flows more regularly between the two Germanys. At the moment, such exchange is actively encouraged by both governments, and its crowning moment is a massive retrospective of works by Karl Friedrich Schinkel; originating at the Hamburg Kunsthalle, the show will travel to museums throughout Germany. Architect, painter, designer, sculptor and visionary, Schinkel has been termed "the Prussian Michelangelo." Popularly known for his imposing public buildings in the Gothic revival style, Schinkel also produced functionalist designs that directly influenced Mies van der Rohe. His remarkable versatility is matched by a nuanced feeling for draftsmanship which gives even his casual sketches a unique vibrancy.

Jürgen Goertz: Steer Souvenir, 1982, mixed mediums; at the Kunsthalle, Darmstadt.

Women Past and Present

For most museum-goers, the Neue Sachlichkeit—the critical, neorealist style that emerged in the 1920s—is synonymous with Otto Dix and Christian Schad. In the great realist exhibition held two years ago in Paris and Berlin, 30 German painters represented the various modes of the Neue Sachlichkeit, but there was not a woman among them. Margarethe Jochimsen, director of the Bonn Kunstverein, has made a policy of correcting such oversights. Her feminist bias often seems strained, but with her recent exhibition of Grethe Jürgens and Gerta Overbeck she inscribed an important footnote to art history. The two painters came from conventional bourgeois families, and met while studying industrial arts and design in Hannover. They shared strong proletarian sympathies, and when inflation prevented further study, both became commercial artists. Meanwhile, Jürgens and Overbeck were producing remarkable paintings of laborers and their milieus—always with engagement, never with sentimentality; and their portraits of friends and relatives easily hold their own against the work of Dix and Schad.

German galleries are generally more receptive to women artists than they were a decade ago, and though female participation at Documenta was scarcely more than tokenism, two of the most vital younger artists there were Elvira Bach and Isolde Wawrin. In one of the changing exhibitions that complemented the Documenta presentation, Hella Santarossa's "dance paintings"—vividly gestural canvases in luminously bright colors, inspired by disco, teenie-boppers and 1950s rock and roll—were on view; they were subsequently seen at the Gabriele von Loeper Gallery in Hamburg.

The paintings of Eva-Maria Schön, at the Leopold Hoesch Museum in Düren, share the Santarossa vitality, but their technique is more distilled. Large brush strokes are laid down in simple configurations repeated across broad bands of paper; these, in turn, often wrap entire rooms, or drape over scaffolding to form processional avenues through which the viewer experiences the total composition in constantly shifting perspectives. There is a frank theatricality in such pieces, as there is in the three-dimensional contructions of the American Suzan Pitt, whose works enter major German collections almost as rapidly as she can produce them. Asparagus Theater, her film/sculpture/environment, has a permanent place in the Ludwig Collection. The contagious sense of fantasy it reflects finds a new and monumental outlet in Pitt's sumptuous designs for the Wiesbaden production of The Magic Flute, in which sets, costumes and theater curtains are all transformed into the artist's characteristic dream-language.

Faits Divers

Partly because of the dollar's recovery on the international money market, partly because of the vogue for the European art, there are fewer Americans on view in Germany. The Kestner Gesellschaft in Hannover is a major exception: "New York Now" concluded an ambitious series of exhibitions examining American achievements since the 1960s. (The show is now at the Munich Kunstverein.) As a finale to eight major retrospectives, "New York Now" focused on works produced in the last two years—a Manhattan potpourri that began alphabetically with Nicholas Africano and concluded with Joe Zucker, and that was assembled with the meticulous curatorial expertise that has always distinguished the Hannover exhibitions. Frankfurt's Kunstinstitut made a very different New World presentation with works from Harvard's Busch-Reisinger collection of German art (an exhibition now at the Bauhaus Archive in Berlin). Few museums here can offer such a definitive, qualitative summary of the complex forces of modernism that were to be ruthlessly suppressed by the Third Reich. The Landesmuseum in Munster added an elegant comment on the early stages of that search for a new visual language; it brought together works by Paul Klee, August Macke and Louis Moilliet, all produced during a journey to Tunis in 1914, and all consciously employing the reductions of Cubism. (The show is currently at the Kunstverein in Bonn.)

Such exhibitions help to establish the historical dimension often lacking in discussions of the "new" painting, but they also underscore the fact that there is an energy and inventiveness in contemporary German art that have not existed for a full half-century. An instance is the work of Horst Gläsker, who builds Rube Goldberg-style musical instruments and who also overpaints wallpaper and machine-made oriental rugs, transforming commonplace materials into works of powerful lyric beauty. Recently, he has been inscribing mythological drawings into the wet paint surface, often using motifs derived from ancient Egyptian art. His frank eroticism was too strong for the city fathers of Regensburg, who threatened to close his exhibition at the local museum (and who had, in fact, cancelled a presentation of photographs by Helmut Newton shortly before).

An exhibition of the long-neglected work of two Neue Sachlichkeit women painters, G. Jürgens and G. Overbeck, inscribed an important footnote to art history.

Hella Santarossa: Teenie-Birthday-Happiness, 1981; at Gabriele von Loeper Gallery, Hamburg.

Suzan Pitt: silk-screen print based on 1982 curtain design for The Magic Flute at Wiesbaden.

There is more than a casual parallel between Gläsker's instinctive sense of irony and that of sculptor Jürgen Goertz—one of the few "foreigners" specially invited to participate in the recent exhibition of artists from Nordrhein-Westfalen. Goertz lives near Karlsruhe, and his numerous commissions there have left a stamp on every corner of the city. The irony of his work is one of form and material: naturalistic shapes wittily metamorphose into dream creatures, and banal materials fuse with bronze or marble, are plated in silver, or are heavily goldleafed. Goertz's recent show at the Darmstadt Kunsthalle revealed him as one of the few artists in our time entirely at ease with the tradition of monumental public sculpture. His painstaking sense of craftsmanship also belongs to the German tradition, and he frankly acknowledges his indebtedness to Dürer. Although there is reason enough to regret the isolationist and nationalistic tendencies that manifest themselves almost daily in Western Europe, the German artist's use of his own tradition is explicable. After decades of homage to American models, his need for rapprochement with a European past was obvious. That process has only begun, but it has already established the true zeitgeist of the 1980s. ☐

Author: David Galloway is a novelist, free-lance critic and holds the Chair of American Studies at Germany's Ruhr University.

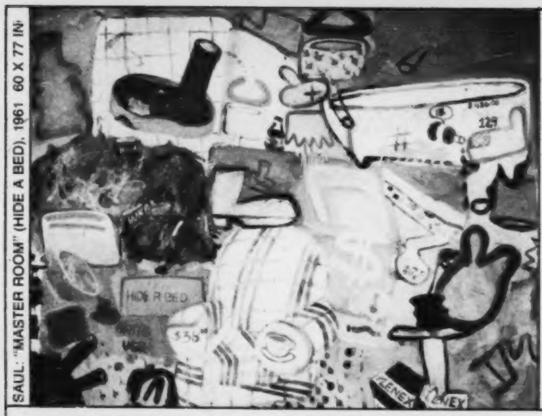
VOL 71
ISS 3
MR 1983
UMI

INAUGURAL EXHIBITION

ROBERT RYMAN

MARCH 1983

BONNIER GALLERY
420 WEST BROADWAY NYC 334-8414

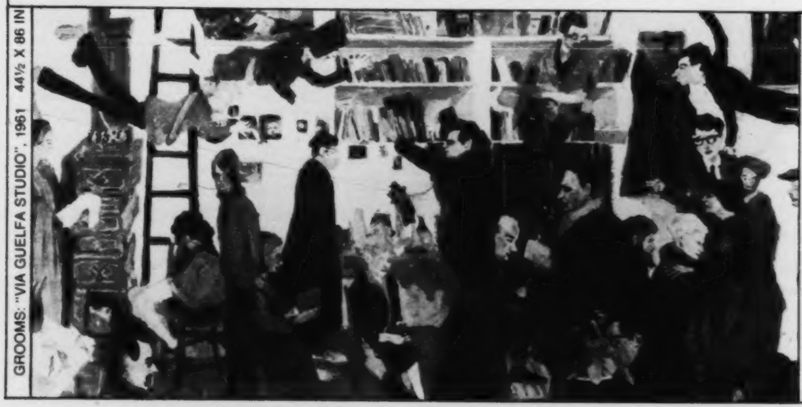


SAUL: "MASTER ROOM" (HIDE A BED), 1961 60 X 77 IN.

THE EARLY SIXTIES MARCH 1-25

PETER SAUL

ALLAN FRUMKIN GALLERY 50 WEST 57TH STREET NEW YORK

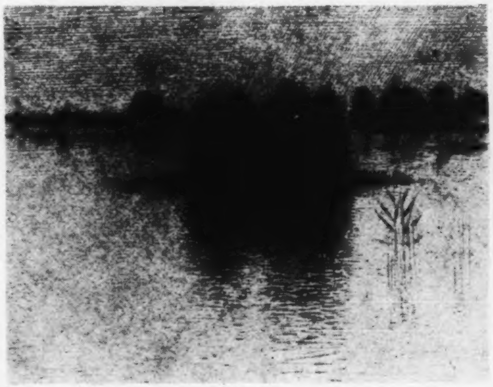


GROOMS: "VIA GUELFA STUDIO", 1961 44½ X 86 IN.

RED GROOMS

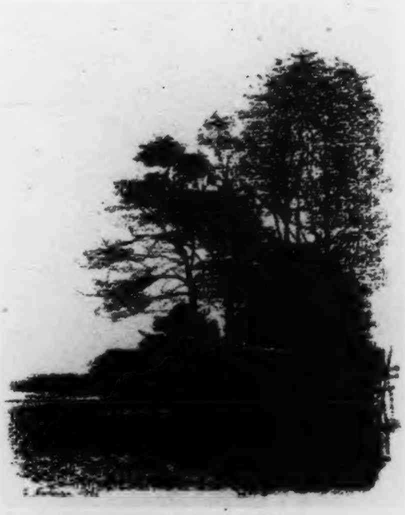
FITCH-FEBVREL
5 EAST 57 STREET, NEW YORK
(212) 688-8522

DRYPOINTS Mar. 15 to Apr. 30, 1983



Liten ö, 1982

GUNNAR
NORRMAN



Forest Edge, 1980, 6 1/4 x 4 3/4"

DRAWINGS Mar. 15 to Apr. 9, 1983

STAEMPFLI
47 EAST 77 STREET, NEW YORK
(212) 535-1919

LEON KOSSOFF

5 March-26 March, 1983

School Building, Willesden, Winter 1981 oil on board, 63½" x 65½"

HIRSCHL & ADLER Modern

851 Madison Avenue New York, N Y 10021 212 744-6700

catalogue available

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR 1983
UMI

HELEN FRANKENTHALER "Yellow Call" 1965 70 x 29"

IRVING GALLERIES
332 Worth Avenue
Palm Beach, FL 33480
(305) 659-6221

important works by butler chagall
dubuffet
giacometti lam mac iver mason millares miró riopelle rouan saura tanguy zao wou-ki

pierre matisse
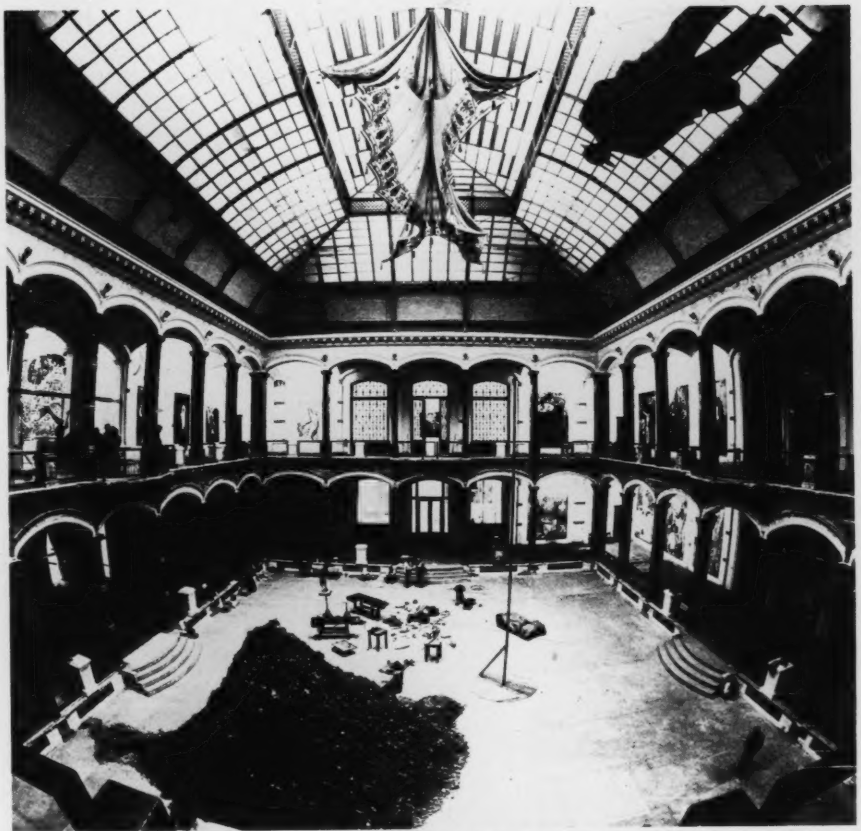
gallery
41 east 57th street
new york 10022

Report from Berlin
"Zeitgeist": The Times & The Place

BY JOAN SIMON

Displaying over 250 large-scale paintings, sculptures and installation pieces, "Zeitgeist" showed painting to be a very spirited medium—much of it, however, "Neo-Expressionist" and with a very bleak message.



"Zeigeist" installed at the Martin-Gropius-Bau: Joseph Beuys's Hirschdenkmäler (Monument to the Stag) in the central court; Jonathan Borofsky's 40-foot paper cut-out Man with a Briefcase, on the skylight; paintings commissioned for the exhibition can be seen around the double-storied colonnade. Photo J. Littkemann.

Zeitgeist" was a magnificently peculiar show. Organized by Christos M. Joachimides, of Berlin, and Norman Rosenthal, of London, it attempted "to investigate what in the field of painting and sculpture touches the nerve of our time"—an ambition they had jointly tackled before as two of the three curators behind 1981's "New Spirit in Painting" at the Royal Academy [see A.i.A., Summer '81]. That show declared the "emergence" of the new painting, traced its eclectic lineage, demonstrated an expressionist/figurative bias, and showcased the young Italian and German artists. "Zeitgeist," no less controversial, shows that painting is indeed the spirited medium of the time. (Sculpture was treated marginally, and looked weak.) Not quite so believably, "Zeitgeist" insists that Neo-Expressionism is exemplary of the most significant work being done right now.

Unlike "New Spirit," there was in "Zeitgeist" no Realist or Minimalist painting—or any abstraction whatsoever that could not be described as "expressionist." Joachimides and Rosenthal threw their net around an international roster of 45 artists; not surprisingly, they came up with a show that featured new German work in some depth. The show included 20 German artists, the largest national group, plus 10 Americans, 6 Italians, 5 Englishmen, a Frenchman, Dutchman and a Dane. There was a sole woman—one more than in "New Spirit."

The site was the palatial Martin-Gropius-Bau, former Prussian decorative arts museum, which adjoins a yard containing a sign that states in four languages, "You are standing on the grounds of the former torture chamber of the Gestapo." The building itself was badly damaged by Allied bombardment, then by subsequent neglect and plundering, until it was registered as a Berlin monument in 1966. It underwent a costly renovation from 1977 to 1981. The Berlin Wall appears to be the building's back fence; so arbitrarily was the Wall placed when it divided the city that the Neo-Classical structure's proper front entrance can't be used—admittance is from what was formerly the rear.

The Martin-Gropius-Bau is an unavoidably haunted place, and the contradictions it embodies are immediately visible. From within, it is decadently glamorous. Impeccable white-walled new construction can't but highlight wounded marble and masonry. Looking out from its upper stories, you see not only the rickety wooden staircases that serve as viewing stations over the Wall from the West, but the even more ominous because invisible (from ground level) series of concrete and barbed wire walls said to be punctuated by land mines on the Eastern side.

The organizers indeed aimed to take into account what they described as the building's "heavily loaded historical surroundings," and to use the building itself as part of their program. But their concept of "zeitgeist"—used to encompass either spirit of the time or spirit of the place—was only randomly relevant. It applied most obviously to the German work, and to the installation pieces which by their very nature deal with particularities of a site. But if the curators' priorities were blatantly revealed by the numbers, they were even more boldly stated by the way works were located in the building.

The Martin-Gropius-Bau divides into three distinct kinds of exhibition spaces: an enormous skylit center court is ringed by a double-storied colonnade, which itself is surrounded by a series of connecting salon-like rooms. The curators used these concentric zones hierarchically. Given the center ring, Joseph Beuys spent several weeks before the show opened, ceremonially (and photogenically) installing his Hirschdenkmäler (Monument to the Stag) in the court. A 20-foot-high slag of clay dominated the staged assemblage; also included were well-known fetishistic reminders of Beuys's survival during the war years—a cot, a felt blanket and

VOL 71
ISS 3
MR 1983
UMI

ROBERT MAPPLETHORPE
New Work

ETRUSCAN ANTIQUITIES
Faces from Etruria

March 1-26, 1983

ROBERT MILLER
724 FIFTH AVENUE NEW YORK
212-246-1625

RICHARD DE VORE

1980, 14 1/2" dia.

MILWAUKEE ART MUSEUM

CURRENTS 3:
RICHARD DE VORE: 1972-1982
February 17 - May 15, 1983

MUSEUM FÜR KUNST UND GEWERBE, Hamburg

Five Potters/Five Countries
April 13 - May 23

MUSEUM BOYMANS-VAN BEUNINGEN, Rotterdam

Five Potters/Five Countries
June 19 - August 7

Catalogs are available for these exhibitions

Exhibit A
233 E. Ontario St. Chicago, Ill. 60611
312-944-1748

various rustic tools. Monument to the Stag spoke visually of destruction, rebuilding and a kind of mythic personal reconciliation of the two. It was a massive gesture of paradoxical utility/futility whether it referred specifically to earth-moving or art-making. According to Beuys's own didactic catalogue entry, however, the piece was also a ritual meeting place intended to serve a variety of "natural spirits"—dead or alive (which also incidentally explained the invisibility of the eponymous stag.)

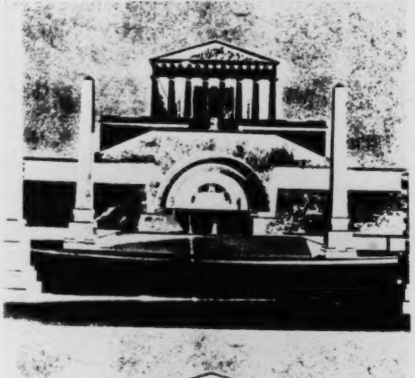
Clearly, the spirit of Beuys's utopian meeting place corresponded to that of "Zeitgeist's" curators. By structuring the show around Beuys, the curators not only offered his historical importance as an indisputable fact, but also put him forth as the emblematic national artist who could at the same time attain major international status.

Under the double-decker colonnades, which also served as both promenades around the show and as theatrical mezzanines from which to view the Beuys installation, the curators installed a show-within-a-show. Overtly recalling the building's previous function as a showplace for crafts and decorative arts, the curators commissioned eight artists to make four paintings each (each work a vertical rectangle of 4 by 3 meters) to fill a series of niches. It was never stated why Cucchi, Salomé, Fetting, McLean, Middendorf, Salle, Clemente and Paladino, rather than some of the other artists in the show, were selected. It is evident, however, that all of them make paintings which depend heavily on drawing, all work with imagery that is reportorially based and/or brashly apocalyptic, and all of them have been grouped recently under the Neo-Expressionist rubric, with consistent visibility in the galleries and the large international surveys.

Though potentially the most curatorially innovative part of the show, this section turned out to look the weakest. These freshly-minted works evidenced common denominators of fast drawing, fast painting and fast thinking. The McLeans looked quite like Salles (especially across the long vistas, which also made the total decorative scheme resemble fabric swatches or paint chips). Fetting's Harrisburger, with a swastika painted on the inner rim of a Three Mile Island tower, displayed a kind of simplistic politics in its conflation of fear-invoking symbols. (The painting triggered an equally simplistic reaction at the opening—it was slashed, then quietly removed the next day.) And Salomé's swimmers-as-paintstrokes were assembled on the canvas as if they had been issued by the yard. Hybrids that neither fully solved the problems of decoration (it would have been interesting to see Robert Kushner or Joyce Kozloff in this context) nor the problems of painting, they finally seemed like curiosities that substituted a curatorial idea for an individual artist's vision.

David Salle's paintings were especially problematic. Perhaps not content to be seen as merely one of the group, Salle seemed to have chosen a "what's wrong with this picture?" strategy to insure that his paintings would be noticed. In the drawn/scribbled upper panel of each of his four diptychs, he barely camouflaged one letter painting; once deciphered, they sequentially spelled out the word "cunt." His sheepish misogyny was not only offensive but a disturbing reminder of his more overtly exploitive dunce-cap photos of nude women. (Curiously, the catalogue reproduced the four diptychs in scrambled sequence).

It's possible Salle used the puzzle as a desperate grab to achieve the overall readability that has been an essential factor in the success of some of his other paintings, since his "Zeitgeist" diptychs didn't do too well individually. By stacking his panels vertically to suit the format of the commission, he lost the left-to-right, implicitly narrative sweep that is usually suggested by his side-by-side placement. His painterly quotations and image-fragments on the lower panels are now more isolated than superimposed. They include Abstract-Expressionist patches, some geometric elements, academic renderings of cropped nude women (one of them a huge spread shot), and, in two panels, self-portrait heads. There's an attitude buried in there somewhere. The question with Salle's work is always, who is the narrator? The simple answer is, Salle himself. But the subtitle of Zeitgeist Painting I—Was My Husband a Doctor or a Patient—makes the speaker a female, and adds "ambiguity" almost as a footnote. Yet Salle's use of the four-letter word device (written in much bolder type) to unite the works undercuts whatever complexity he may have had in mind.



Andy Warhol: Zeitgeist Painting, 1982, acrylic on canvas, 14 ½ feet high. Galerie Bruno Bischofberger. Photo J. Littkemann.

Some of the best works in the show were to be found among selected rather than commissioned works, and several of the rooms served as tightly focused mini-retrospectives. In the Julian Schnabel paintings, three-dimensional objects are truly integrated as linear and narrative elements. The antlers pushing you away from Pre-History: Glory, Honor, Privilege and Poverty (1981) also kept pulling you back in. They underscore the primitivism of his title, and anchor his spinning universe of paint textures and variously oriented images. At the same time the antlers act as multiple directional signals pointing to imagery as diverse in meaning as the artist's baby at the painting's center, Lenin's face taking up almost the entire left-hand side, and an anonymous upside-down man (skewered with another set of antlers) at the lower right.

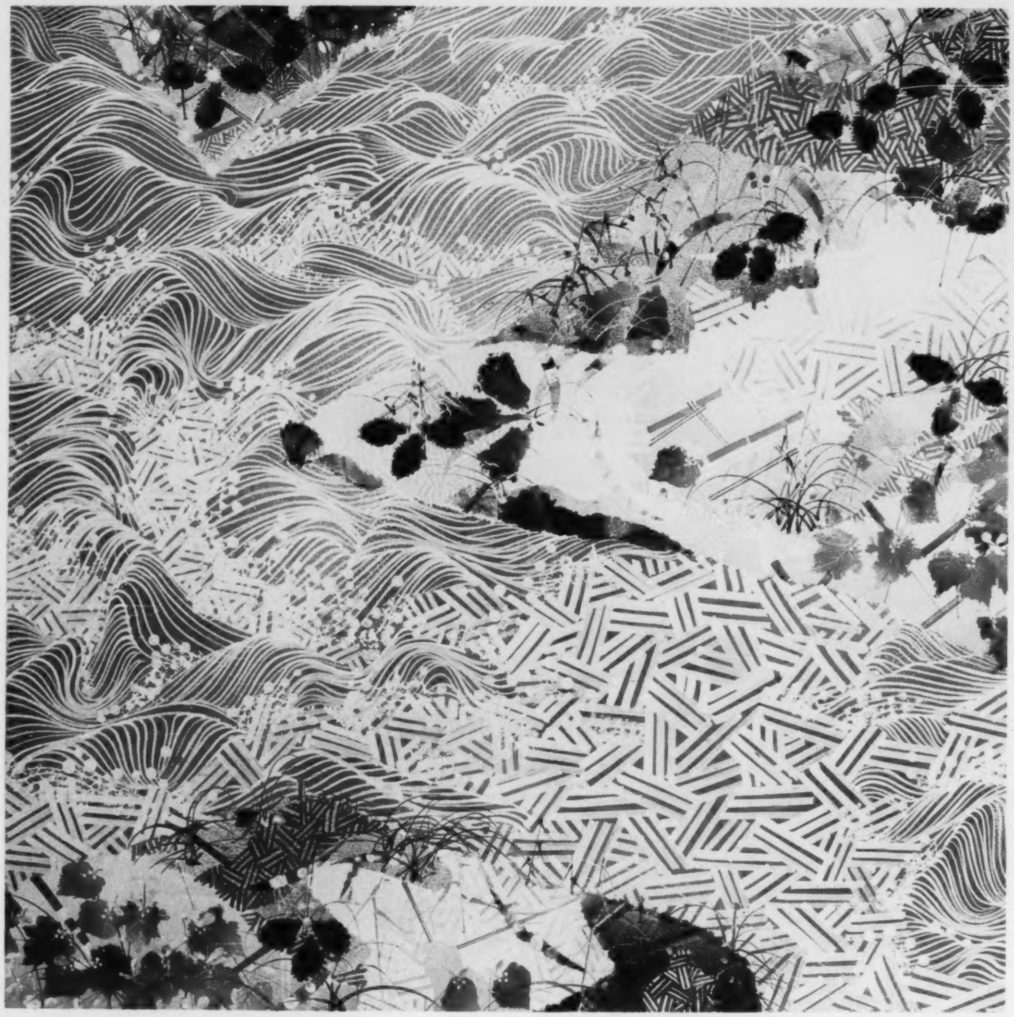
Malcolm Morley's recent landscapes (1980-81), without forgoing his "bad" painting technique of jamming all sorts of out-of-scale images into a tightly controlled space (it looks like Schnabel learned a lot from him in this context), now play with qualities of light and depth of field. A masterful mix of the comical and classical, his works register changes in perspective vertically, as in traditional Chinese landscape painting. Morley's paintings, rather small by the show's standards, were a refreshing reminder that good work need not necessarily be big or flamboyantly bold.

Cy Twombly's richly impastoed landscape abstractions grandly elicit the focused power of a whisper. He uses sketchy words doubled to echo themselves in Goethe in Italy (1978); in a selection of more recent works, a painterly sweep alone defines and recalls a place. And Susan Rothenberg's three large horse paintings (1974–'75), previously seen together only once, in 1975, at 112 Greene Street, now stand out, like the Twomblys, for their muted lushness and the powerful sense of a brain thinking with a hand.

How easy—in 1983 and at this show—it would have been to read only "nationalism" into a title like Rothenberg's United States (1975), and to ignore the multiple "states" conjoined in a bisected painting that obviously depicts a horse. The horse's front end appears on a sienna field, the rear on a black one. As in Johns's Maps, the complex fit of painterly and semantic references in United States is as abstract as building wholes from parts, as technically traditional

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

YASU
EGUCHI



"Spring Notes"/Watercolor/22 x 22

MAJOR EXHIBITION OF NEW WORKS
FEBRUARY 26-MARCH 11

Austin Gallery 7103 Main Street, Scottsdale, Arizona 85251, (602) 947-0686 in painting as meshing figure and ground, and as dumbly meaningful as the name given to a country made up of disparate localities.

Some of the work in "Zeitgeist" is personally symbolic with political overtones. Other works—German ones in particular—are overtly political in their symbolism, a few of them using historically-loaded words as part of their imagery. The degree to which all this content is merged visually into an accessible pictorial statement is quite different from artist to artist, breaking down the "united front" that has until recently served so effectively as a marketing tool.

Penck's colossal, brand-new Dis and Chi Tong (each 5 by 10 meters, both 1982), also called East and West, one black on white, one red on white, faced off from opposite east and west walls of the building's main staircase. (Some of the artists in the show were allowed to select a specific architectural framework for their installation; others knew only that "big" or "new" were the curators' criteria.) Penck's pair was not only metonymic of the situation of a divided Berlin, but also boldly scaled up the emotional intensity of his pictograms. While still employing a pattern-like organization of the overall canvas, Penck now includes figures of wildly different sizes and has them act out all sorts of dramas—from big isolated figures in postures denoting personal anguish to busy stick-figure groupings engaged in battle. The large figures now appear flesh-starved, rather than simply outlined. The installation of these works supplemented their internal resonance: viewers tended to gather on the staircase like an expectant audience in a hushed theater.

Kiefer's political content is explicit in his titles and in his relentlessly Germanic thematic material. However it merges with a pictorial theatricality of a different sort. His straw-encrusted Nürnberg (1982) with its burnt wood planks embedded in the painting and its title scrawled at the top, or the pair of 12-foot-high woodcuts called The Rhine (1982) or his recent images of neo-classical rooms that seem to echo an unspeakable past, are so spatially enveloping that the viewer can feel lost in them. But the immersion into these vast emotional spaces feels as much like falling into Kiefer's conscience as its does into his depicted war zones.

Baselitz's paintings were installed so theatrically that the arrangement itself was the most significant part of his display. He hung a group of his familiar upside-down images (all from '82) so close to the ceiling that the viewer was required to assume a reverent posture—if not attitude—toward them, all the while being denied the possibility of seeing them in detail. Lüpertz, too, played with dramatic staging. In a room sparely hung with his paintings, he stood his gargantuan, practically all-legs figure, Standbein-Spielbein (1982, bronze). Here the overall effect was melancholy, but the roughly "carved" looking figure, with one foot shyly about to leave the ground, was more humorous than monumental.

Among the Germans, Polke remains the most enigmatic. And seeing more of his paintings did little to ease the nagging puzzlement. They continue to employ Warholian image-transfers (the Pope in one work, a landscape in another) onto the printed fabric or canvas that he has used intermittently since the early '60s. And though he has been a major influence on younger German artists (and on Schnabel and Salle as well), he seems more convincing as a theoretician than as a painter. In the '82 paintings shown at "Zeitgeist," at least, his grab-bag of synthetic materials and ethereal ideas seems too heady, too light.

And while there were a number of familiar names—Koberling, Hödicke, Dokoupil, Dahn—and a number of less familiar ones—Dieter Hacker, Werner Büttner, Peter Bömmels, Siegfried Anziger, Erwin Bohatsch—their works were problematic for various reasons, most often because their imagery was unclear despite often being emblematically simplified, and their paint handling (in a palette tending to black and blue) did not in general augment their mysterious content.

Jörg Immendorff, though, is a forceful painter, and more of an illustrator than an expressionist. His large cafe scenes, like Nachtwache (Nightwatch), 1982, and smaller cartoon-frame panels in a series called Fragen eines lesenden Arbeiters (Questions of a Literate Worker) combine the serio-comic disproportions of Red Grooms with the socialist-realism of the Mexican muralists.

Of the Italian artists in the exhibition, Paladino, who showed both paintings and sculpture, still seems to trail Chia, Clemente and Cucchi in the resolution of his works. Chia's paintings here made it seem that he never bites off more than he can chew, or draws on more sources—Chagall, Boccioni, Léger—than he can handle with ease. But his bottom-heavy, life-size bronze sculptures, a recent departure for him, are not as well made or thought out. Messy stylistic mixes that include hints of late '20s Picasso and the runny surfaces of Medardo Rosso, they tend to look lumpen when they are not overtly maudlin. In addition to Chia's own bronzes, a sculptural collaboration by Chia and Cucchi was installed in the "Zeitgeist" cafe: called Scultura andata-Scultura storna (1982), it was a looming distraught figure which emitted copious tears from its eyes. (The ambitiousness of the endeavor was underscored by the publication of a lavish, separate catalogue which documented the drama of the fountain's fabrication and which could easily serve as a promotional brochure to solicit future commissions.)

Continuing the one-man shows: Barry Flanagan's pirouetting animal bronzes, Gilbert and George's photoworks, James Lee Byars' red silk tent and inscrutable objects, and Frank Stella's 1981-82 versions of his splashy cut-out painting/sculptures were of varying interest, and had little bearing on the "Zeitgeist" theme. By contrast, Warhol's silk-screened paintings of Nazi-architecture were clearly produced in response to the show's locale. They might have had an affinity with some of the German painting, but were, instead, impersonal and a-historical. (An exception to the "room of one's own" installation plan: the Warhols shared space with Beuys's black-lacquered grand piano standing on three copper plates, one of its feet in a pod of fat. The piece held its own against the slickness of the Warhol paintings, and revealed a high-style aspect of the Beuys persona.)

The individual Borofsky and Kounellis rooms, both full-fledged installation pieces, confronted some of the most difficult and emotional aspects of the site as a whole. Borofsky's work extended beyond the confines of his appointed gallery space: his life-size, carved and painted styrofoam self-portrait was suspended outside the building, as if flying out the window towards East Berlin. (Borofsky also installed a 40-foot-long paper cut-out, Man with a Briefcase, on the skylight above the Beuys courtyard.) He also drew his Running Man on the Berlin Wall which, after a few days, was matched by some pretty good drawings in his style by other artists.

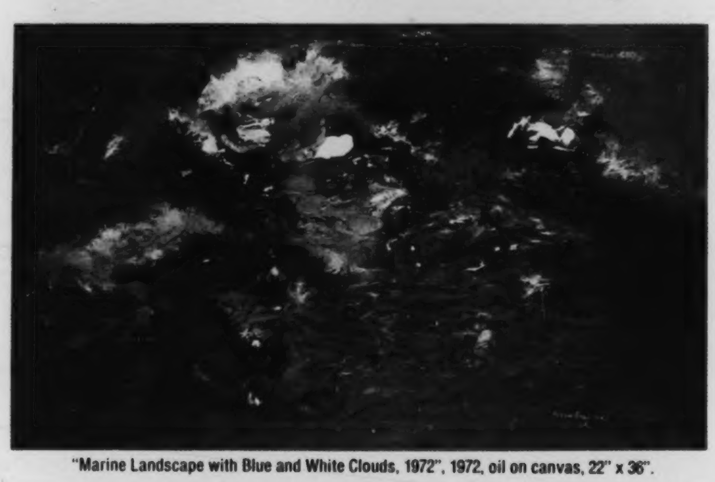
As to Borofsky's own gallery space, he selected from his familiar image-repertory the bird, the ruby, and one of his persistent dreams, an account of which he wrote on the wall: "I dreamed I was telling some person off. At first it was a 'Nazi-type' person and then it changed into a Chinese. I was saying You don't feel! You don't feel!' " The fascist reference was rather mild, given the swastikas (Fetting, Immendorff) and bombers (Dokoupil, Middendorf) elsewhere in the show; but the choice of this particular dream for Berlin was significant because Borofsky has self-censored such content from previous shows in Germany. To many visitors, the dream was reminiscent of their own ambivalent ideas of what is permissible to say in Germany. Borofsky's "You don't feel!" also seemed to give voice to a frequently heard reaction to much Neo-Expressionist work.

Kounellis's installation, like Borofsky's, focused on the window of his room, which also faced East Berlin. Using stones, bricks and other detritus gathered from the grounds behind the Martin-Gropius-Bau, he blocked up the window, save for a small opening which he screened with barbed wire. His entire Minimalist/Process barricade thus functioned as both "mirror" and "window." Explicitly reiterating the Wall, it spoke eloquently of both impasse and resignation. Unlike much of the painting in the show which used historical and mythical ballast to declare the dispirit of these times, Kounellis's piece stated a much grayer and more immediate kind of apocalypse. Moreover, his room was a meditative spot, a place to think for yourself without losing sight of the rest of the world. ☐

"Zeitgeist," which opened Oct. 15, 1982 and closed in January '83, was accompanied by a catalogue with essays in German by Christos M. Joachimides, Norman Rosenthal, Robert Rosenblum, Hilton Kramer, Walter Bachauer, Karl-Heinz Bohrer, Paul Feyerabend, Vittorio Magnago Lampugnani and Thomas Bernhard. An English translation is due to be published shortly.

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

RALPH ROSENBORG
Recent Oil and Watercolor Paintings



"Marine Landscape with Blue and White Clouds, 1972", 1972, oil on canvas, 22" x 36".

"a . . . modern Turner, a real painter's painter who's a master of the lyrical approach to landscape."
Louise Nevelson

March 12 – April 2, 1983

Princeton Gallery of Fine Art
8 Chambers Street Princeton, NJ 08540 609/921-8123

Douglas Huebler
Crocodile Tears II

5-26 March Leo Castelli 142 Greene Street, New York

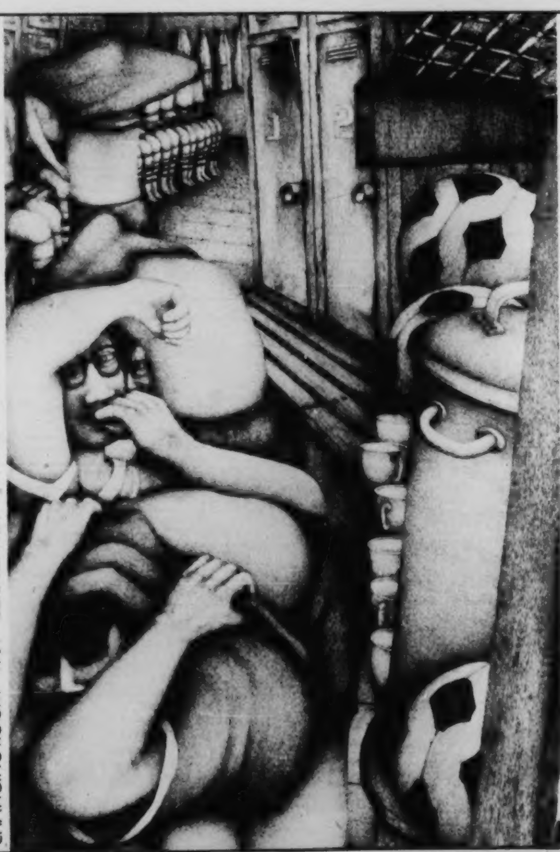
Siah Armajani

Max Protetch 37 West 57 Street NY 10019 (212) 838-7436

Christoph Kohlhofer

Protetch McNeil 214 Lafayette Street NY 10012 (212) 226-8957



CHANGING ROOM 1981 EGG TEMPERA 43" x 29"

PETER TURNBULL

RECENT PAINTINGS
MARCH 5-31, 1983

TERRY DINTENFASS 50 W 57
NEW YORK CITY 581-2268

VIJA CELMINS

Drawings and Painted Bronzes
March 11-April 9, 1983

DAVID MCKEE GALLERY
41 East 57th Street New York, NY 10022 (212) 688-5951

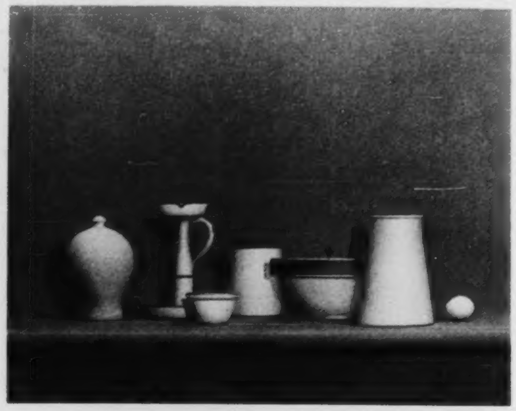
VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

Richard
Bosman

March 15-April 16

Brooke Alexander, Inc.
20 West 57th Street
New York, New York 10019
Telephone 212/757-3721

William Bailey



WORKS AVAILABLE BY:

William Bailey
Tony Berlant
Elmer Bischoff
Ron Davis
Sam Francis
Helen Frankenthaler
Manuel Neri
John Okulick
Nathan Oliveira
Joseph Raffael
Frank Stella
Wayne Thiebaud

JOHN BERGGRUEN GALLERY
228 Grant Avenue, San Francisco 94108 (415) 781-4629

The Painterly Figure:
Veteran Expressionist Figure Painters
Curated by Carter Ratcliff

Robert Beauchamp
Nicolas Carone
Peter Dean
Elaine de Kooning
Willem de Kooning
Red Grooms
June Leaf
George McNeil
Alice Neel

March 2-26, 1983

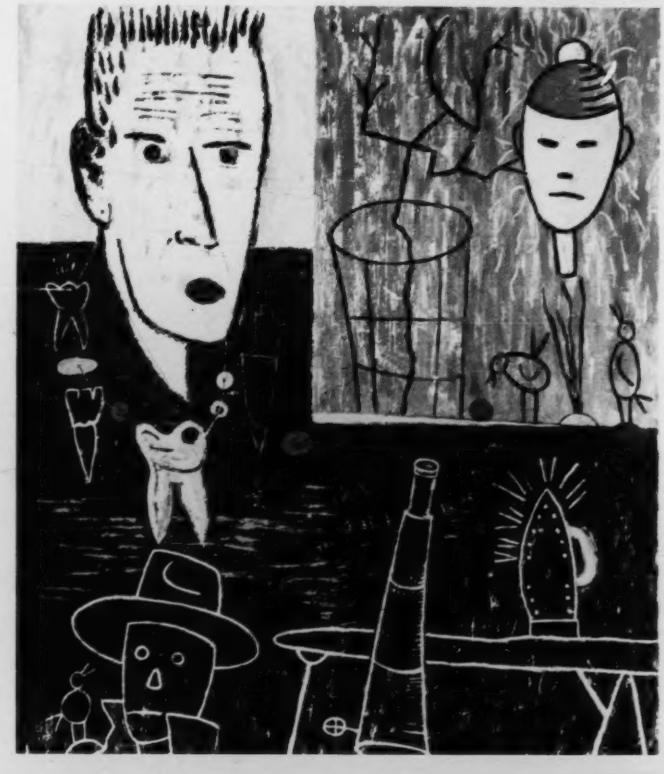
Monique Knowlton
19 E.71, New York 10021 · (212)794-9700

TIBOR DE NAGY GALLERY
29 W. 57, NY 10019 (212) 421-3780

CHUCK MAGISTRO
RECENT PAINTINGS
THIRD FLOOR

ON AN INTIMATE DIMENSION
A SELECTED EXHIBITION
FOURTH FLOOR

12 MARCH—6 APRIL 1983



T.L.
SOLIEN

PAINTINGS
8 MARCH-9 APRIL

GETLER/PALL
50 WEST 57TH STREET
NEW YORK, N.Y. 10019
212/581-2724

"HOW THE GARDEN GROWS" 1982 OIL/CANVAS 66 x 54

DAVID VON SCHLEGELL
THE PACE GALLERY 32 E 57

VOL 71
ISS 3
MR
1983
UMI

Charles Cowles Gallery

Michael Todd
Paintings and Sculpture

Patrick Ireland
A New Installation

March 5-26

420 West Broadway New York 10012
(212) 925-3500

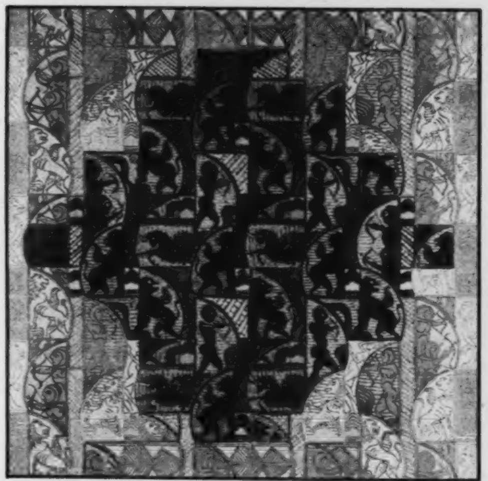
JODY PINTO

Installation/Paintings on Paper
12 March—2 April 1983

Recent Site Work Commissions:
Promenade Park, Toledo, Ohio
Fairmount Park, Philadelphia

HAL BROMM
90 WEST BROADWAY NEW YORK 10007 (212) 732-6196

Harry Koursaros



Bronze Age Hunt, 1982, acrylic on canvas, 54 x 54"

March

HABER THEODORE GALLERY
29 West 57th Street, New York 10019 (212) 752-3338

PETER PLAGENS
new work

OWEN McHUGH
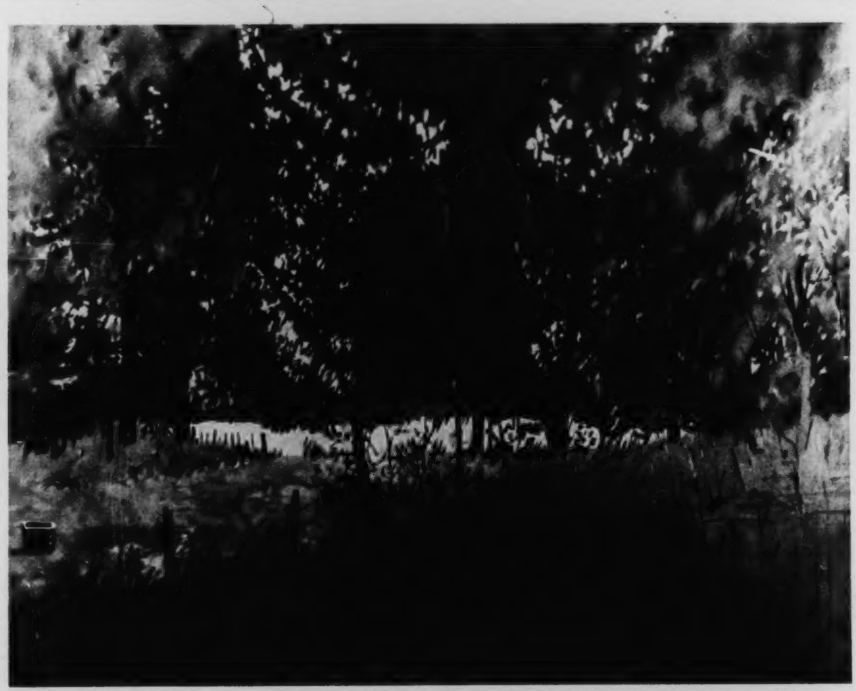
new work

march

JAN
CICERO
GALLERY
437 N CLARK CHICAGO, IL 60610 312 644 5374

DANIEL LANG

Recent Paintings
March 9–April 2



DAVID FINDLAY JR
CONTEMPORARY 41 East 57 Street New York 10022 212-486-7660

[illegible]

WEST

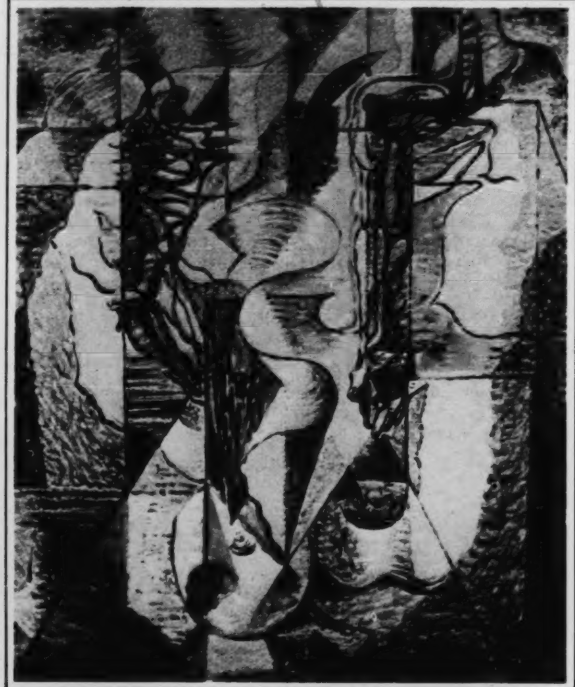
JACK LILLIS

GROUP EXHIBITION

EAST

BREAKING AND ENTERING
7 L.A. ARTISTS IN N.Y.C.

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI



"Les Écorchés", 1926, huile sur toile, 73 cm × 60 cm. Photo : Galerie Patrice Trigano rétrospective

ANDRÉ MASSON

8 mars - 30 avril

Galerie Patrice Trigano
4 bis, rue des Beaux-Arts - 75006 Paris tél.: 634.15.01 télex: 670939 F

Illustrated catalogue: 10 $

sermadiras

"Krewe of Poydras," 50 feet high, welded steel construction painted with catalyzed polyurethane enamel

Ida Kohlmeyer

New sculpture unveiled
January 14, 1983 in front of the Skidmore, Owings &
Merrill building at 1515 Poydras
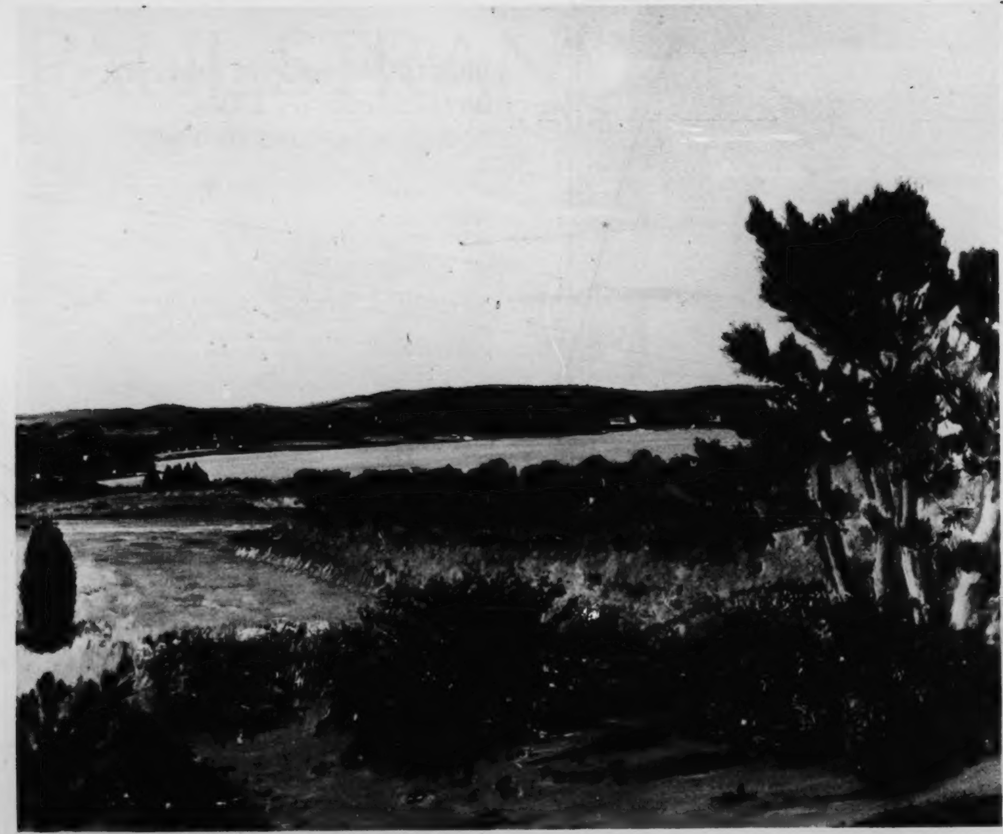
New Orleans, Louisiana



'The Clearing' 1982 Oil on canvas 50 x 60"

JANE FREILICHER
5 March through
6 April 1983

FISCHBACH
GALLERY
29 West 57 Street
New York
(212) PL9.2345

Paintings &
Sculpture Commissions
Represented by

Atlanta	Heath Gallery 416 East Paces Ferry Road 404-262-6407
Houston	Moody Gallery 2015-J West Gray 713-526-9911
New Orleans	Arthur Roger Gallery 3005 Magazine Street 504-895-5287
New York	Gimpel & Weitzenhoffer Ltd 1040 Madison Avenue 212-628-1897
San Francisco	William Sawyer Gallery 3045 Clay Street 415-921-1600
Santa Fe	Elaine Horwitch Galleries 129 West Palace Avenue 505-988-8997
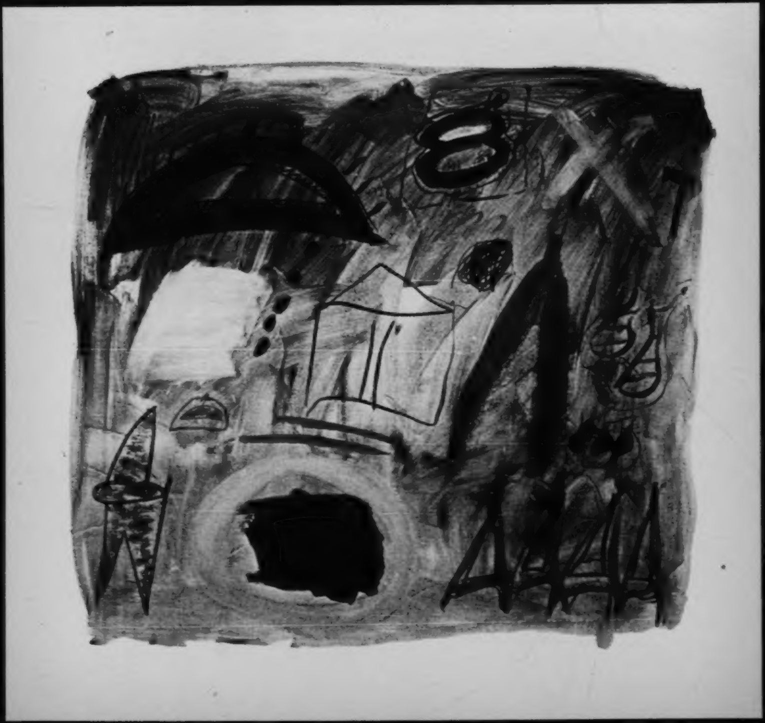
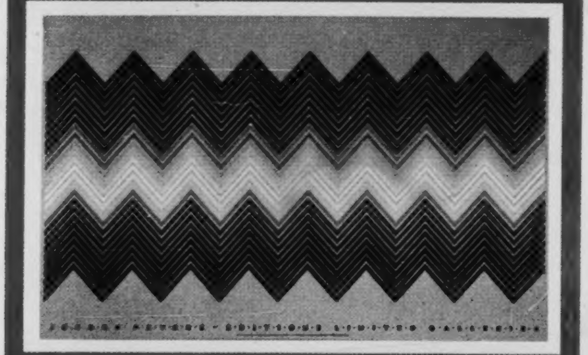
Scottsdale	4211 North Marshall Way 602-945-0791



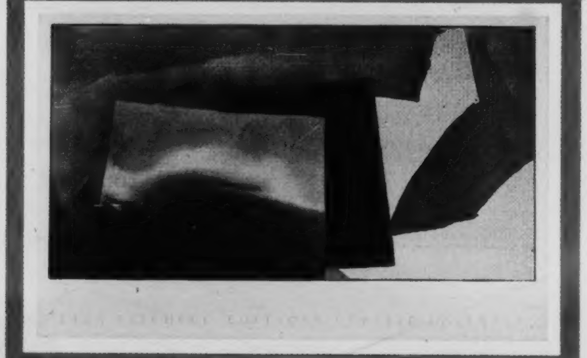
Synthesis #1 1981, mixed media, 66 x 74 inches

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

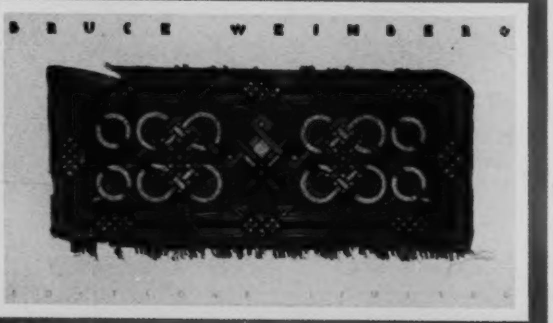
New Posters



Jurgen Peters
"Light Horizons", silkscreen, 38" by 24"



Peter Kitchell
"Solid Past", offset poster, 38½" by 24"



Bruce Weinberg
"Interlocking", offset poster, 39" x 22"

Distributorships for these and other fine pieces available. Call or write:

Editions Limited Gallery
919 E. Westfield Blvd.
Indianapolis, IN 46220 • Tel. (317) 251-7282

Impeccable works of reference on contemporary artists, photographers and architects...

CONTEMPORARY PHOTOGRAPHERS

First Edition
Edited by George Walsh, Michael Held and Colin Naylor

This brand new world reference book gives detailed information on more than 600 photographers of international reputation—each entrant selected by a distinguished advisory panel.

Similar in format to the two other volumes in the award-winning Contemporary Arts series, each entry is composed of a brief biography of the entrant; lists of exhibitions and collections; a bibliography of publications by or about the entrant; a signed critical essay by one of the 150 respected photography critics who served as contributors; in many cases, a comment by the photographer on his or her own work; and, in most cases, one or more excellent reproductions of representative photographs.

January 1983 ISBN 0-312-16791-1 1027 pps.
625 photographs, 15-pp. color section 9x12 $70.00
Revised every five years.

CONTEMPORARY ARTISTS

Second Edition
Editors: Muriel Emanuel, Sharon Harris, Michael Held, Christopher Lyon, Colin Naylor, Roland Turner, George Walsh

Completely revised and updated, this second edition has maintained the high quality achieved in the first edition, affirmed in the words of the ALA Reference and Subscription Books Reviews Committee in Booklist:

"There is nothing comparable to Contemporary Artists among art reference tools... Libraries should welcome this book to their shelves. Recommended."

March 1983 ISBN 0-312-16643-5 1078 pp.
1250 b & w photos 9x12 $70.00
Revised every five years.

CONTEMPORARY ARCHITECTS

First Edition
Edited by Muriel Emanuel
Architectural Consultant: Dennis Sharp

Given special mention by the International Committee of Architectural Critics at the 14th International Architectural Congress of Warsaw.

Named "Outstanding Reference Book of the Year" by the American Library Association.

1980 ISBN 0-312-16635-4 934 pp.
9x12 $70.00
Revised every five years.

DICTIONARY OF CONTEMPORARY AMERICAN ARTISTS

Fourth Edition
Edited by Paul Cummings

"An excellent contribution to American artists' biographies." Choice

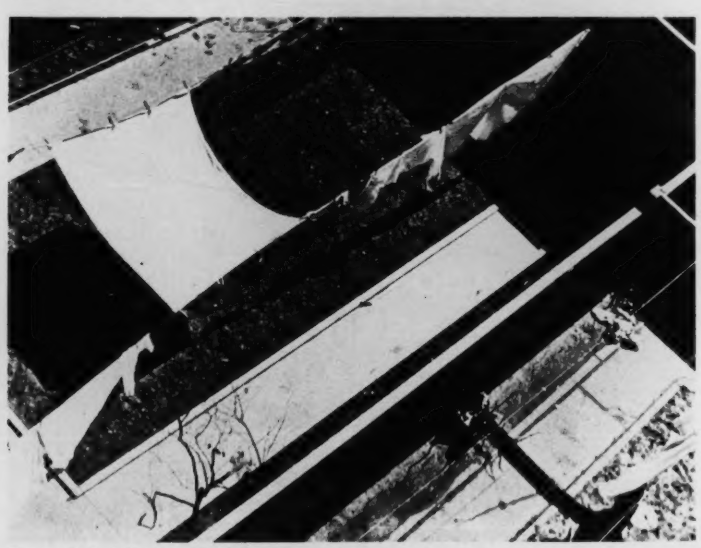
1982 ISBN 0-312-20097-8 653 pp.
6¼x9½ $50.00
Revised every five years.

Prices subject to change without notice.

St. Martin's Press

Reference & Scholarly Books Division, Dept. AH
175 Fifth Avenue, New York, NY 10010

PAUL STRAND



Geometric Back Yards, 1916. Platinum print, 10 x 13⅛ inches

THE STIEGLITZ YEARS AT '291' (1915-17)

MARCH 22-APRIL 23, NEW YORK

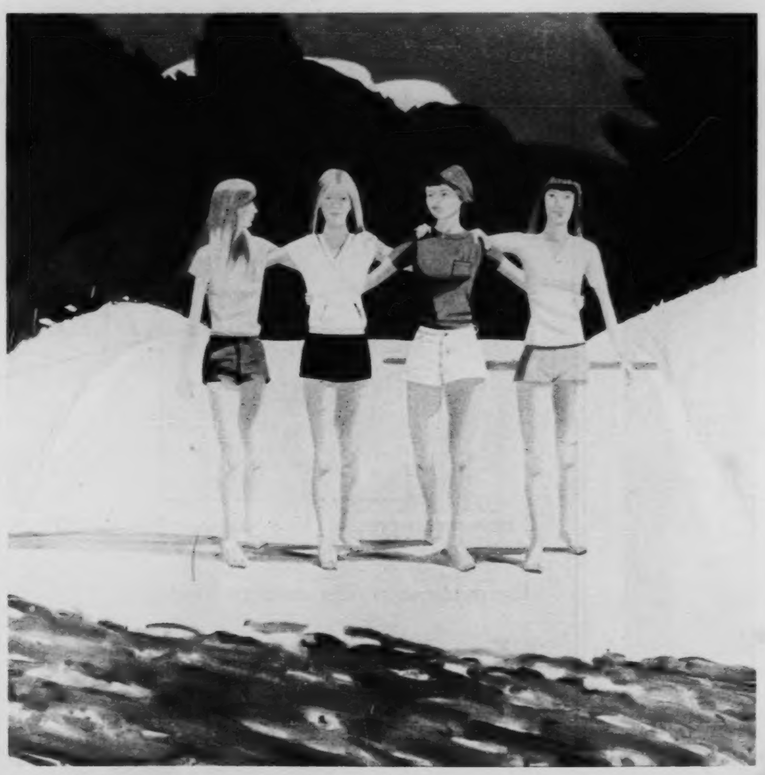
MEXICAN PHOTOGRAPHS (1932-34)

MARCH 1-APRIL 16, PARIS

EUGENE ATGET
ALFRED STIEGLITZ
TRAVELING EXHIBITIONS OF PHOTOGRAPHS ARE AVAILABLE FOR RENTAL TO QUALIFYING INSTITUTIONS

ZABRISKIE

724 FIFTH, NEW YORK   37 RUE QUINCAMPOIX, PARIS



The Ryan Sisters, 1982. Oil on canvas, 120 x 120 inches

ALEX KATZ

Recent Paintings

Fully illustrated catalogue available
$14 U.S. and Canada, postage included

March 5-April 2

Marlborough

40 West 57 New York 541-4900

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

JUD
FINE
Recent Works

WOLF
KAHN
Early Paintings

Thomas Segal Gallery
73 Newbury Street
Boston, MA 02116
Tel (617) 266-3500
Tues-Sat, 10 to 5:30 or by appt

Nassos Daphnis

Recent Work
5-26 March
Leo Castelli Gallery
420 West Broadway, New York

Paintings from the 50s
19 March-16 April
Andre Zarre Gallery
41 East 57th Street, New York

Matt Phillips
MONOTYPES, HAND-COLORED ETCHINGS AND PAINTINGS

marilyn pearl
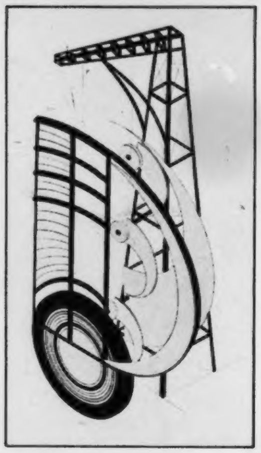
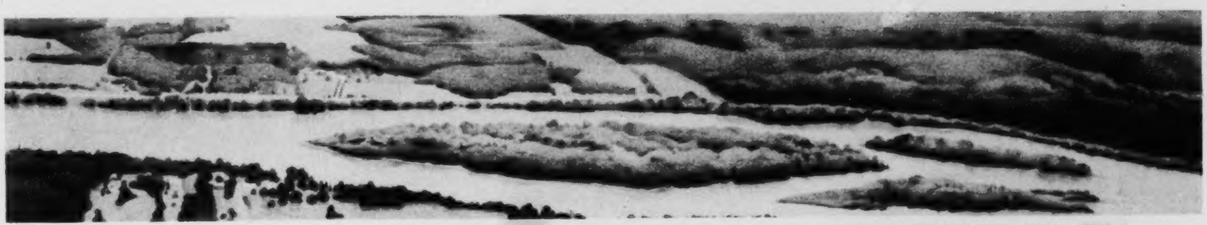
gallery 38 East 57th Street New York 212/838-6310

Alice Aycock



2 new screenprints 17 + colors 30'' × 20''
Edition of 35
Pre-publication offer through March 28, 1983

KLEIN GALLERY
356 WEST HURON, CHICAGO, IL 60610
312/787-0400



Delaware River #1- 20 in. x 115 in., 1982

Diane Burko:

Waterways of Pennsylvania:

Recent Work

Allentown Art Museum	March 6—April 17
Reading Public Museum	April 24—June 19
Museum of Art, Penn State University	June 26—September 18
Westmoreland County Museum of Art	September 25—October 23
Everhart Museum, Scranton	November 13—December 30

Traveling exhibit made possible by a grant from the Pennsylvania Council on the Arts.

Catalog upon request: Allentown Art Museum, P.O. Box 117, Allentown, PA 18105.

Ray K
Metzker

City Whispers photographs 1980-1982

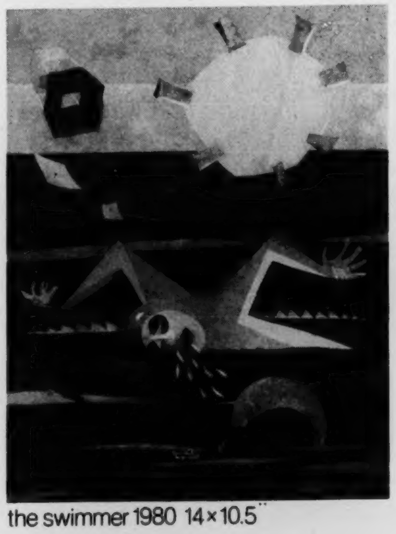
march 1-26,1983

Marian Locks Gallery
1524 Walnut Street
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania 19102
215 546-0322

Angelo Pinto reverse painting on glass.

march 1-26



the swimmer 1980 14×10.5"

Marian Locks Gallery
1524 Walnut Street
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania 19102
215 546-0322

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

JULIAN SCHNABEL
ETCHINGS / MARCH 5 THROUGH 26

CASTELLI GRAPHICS 4 EAST 77 STREET NEW YORK

HENRI CARTIER-BRESSON
PORTRAITS 1932-1982

GALERIE ERIC FRANCK
15 Route de Florissant • Geneva, Switzerland • Tel. (22) 47.08.09

Roy Boyd Chicago

Vera Klement
Paintings

215 W. Superior
Chicago 60610

312 642 1606

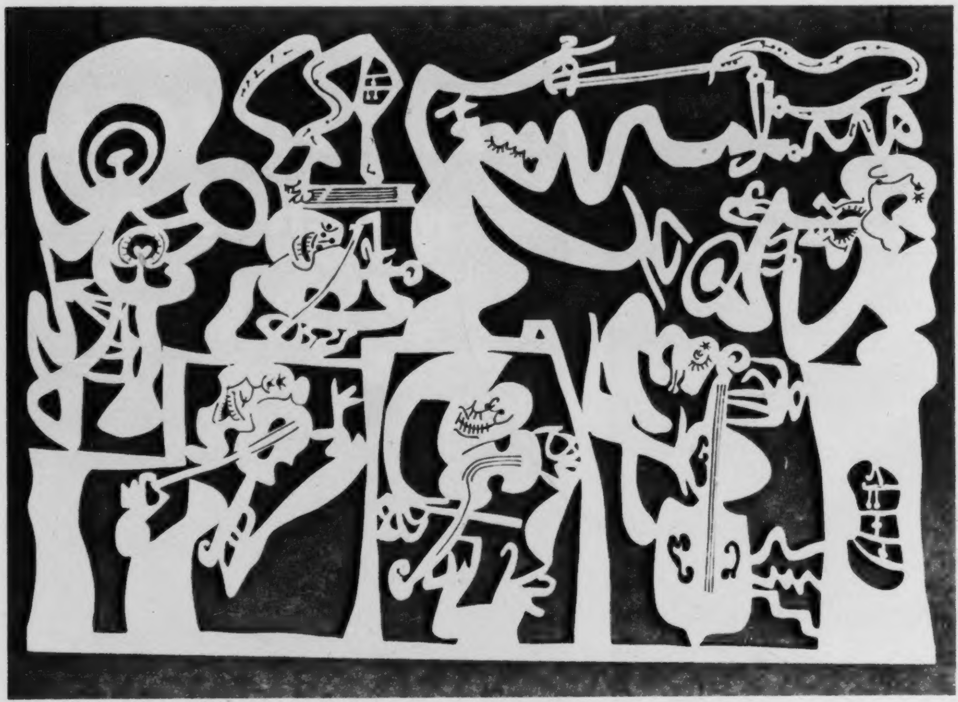
Roy Boyd Los Angeles

Sarah Krepp
Paintings

170 S. La Brea
Los Angeles 90036

213 938 2328

NEW ADDRESS
BARBARA GLADSTONE GALLERY
152 WOOSTER NYNY 10012
MID-MARCH
ALAN VEGA



"JAZZ-MINT" (WOOD BAS-RELIEF) 60½ X 88 inches

MATTA

12 WOOD
BAS-RELIEFS

CARONE
GALLERY
600 Southeast
Second Court,
Fort Lauderdale,
Florida 33301
(305) 463-8833

Eduardo

CHILLIDA

now represented by

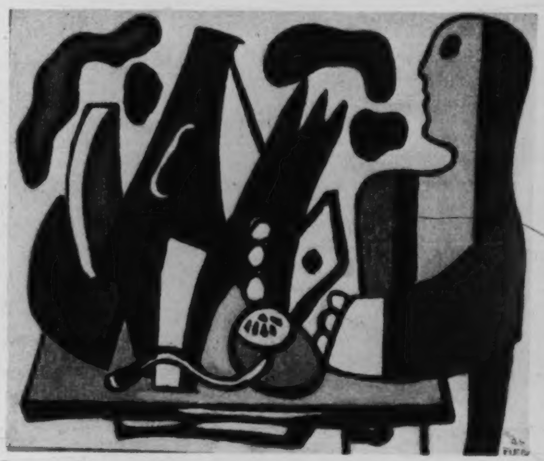
Tasende
Gallery

820 Prospect Street, La Jolla, California 92037 • (619) 454-3691

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI



Fernand Leger
Nature Morte au Fruits et L'enfant, 1938
Oil on canvas, signed & dated 1946
14¾ x 17¹⁵⁄₁₆ in., [37.5 x 45.5 cm.]

Galleri Bellman

41 East 57th Street, fifth floor, New York, New York 10022
(212) 486-7944
19th and 20th Century Paintings and Graphics
Tuesday through Saturday, 10 a.m.-6 p.m.

ON KAWARA
March 1983

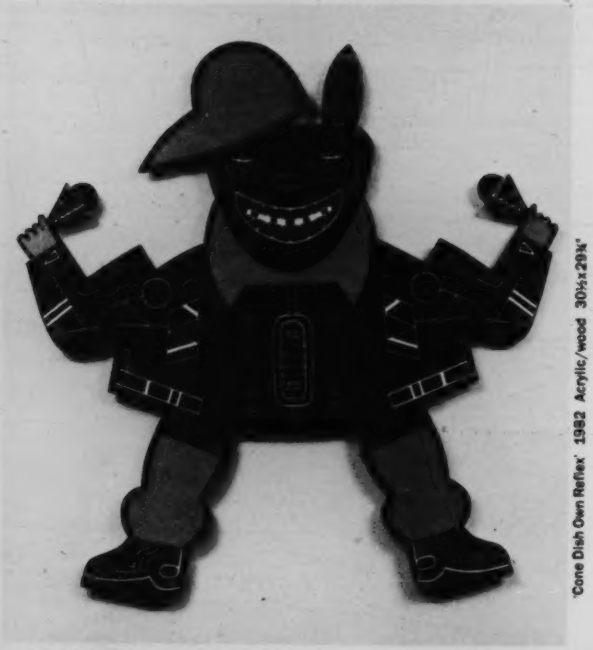
AKIRA IKEDA GALLERY
17-30, NISHIKI 2-CHOME, NAKA-KU, NAGOYA,
8-18, KYOBASHI 2-CHOME, CHUO-KU, TOKYO

5 MARCH TO 26 MARCH

RICHARD
ARTSCHWAGER

MARY BOONE
GALLERY, 420 WEST BROADWAY
GALLERY, 417 WEST BROADWAY
NEW YORK, NEW YORK 966-2114

KARL WIRSUM
2 THROUGH 26 MARCH 1983



'Cone Dish Own Reflex' 1982 Acrylic/wood 30½ x 29¾"

PHYLLIS KIND GALLERY
139 SPRING STREET NEW YORK

GALERIE MICHAEL WERNER

BASELITZ
BYARS
IMMENDORFF
KIRKEBY
LÜPERTZ
A.R.PENCK

D — 5000 KÖLN — 1 —
GERTRUDENSTR. 24/28 T.210661

Karla Klarin

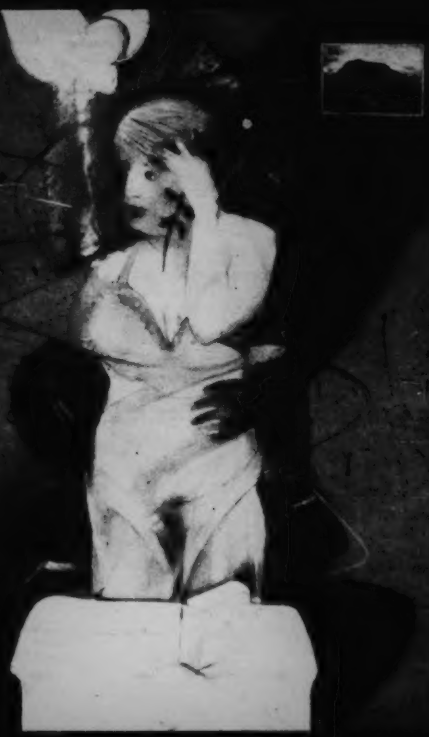
Johannes Lacher
(east gallery)

Kirk deGooyer Gallery

1308 Factory Place Los Angeles 90013
Tuesday-Saturday 10:30-5:30 213-623-8333

JAMES G. DAVIS

RECENT PAINTINGS



THE RED FLOWER 1982 Oil on canvas 77"x59"

MARCH 20-APRIL 14

CATALOGUE AVAILABLE

YARES GALLERY

3625 BISHOP LANE SCOTTSDALE, AZ 85251
(602) 947-3251

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

RIDUAN TOMKINS
PAINTINGS
February 26-March 16, 1983
BETTY PARSONS GALLERY
24 WEST 57 STREET NEW YORK N.Y. 10019

MARTIN
SILVERMAN
RECENT SCULPTURE
EDWARD THORP
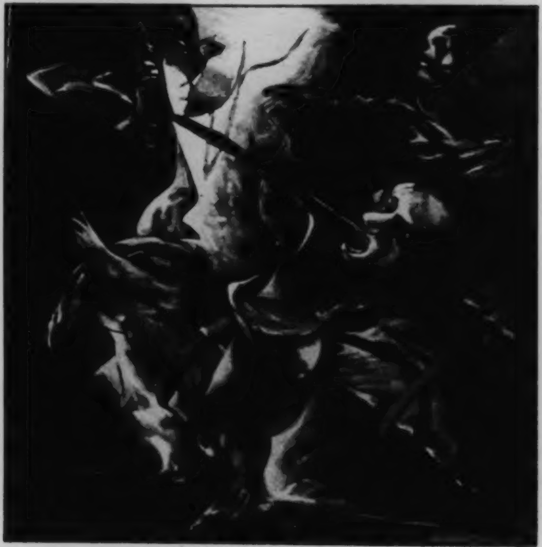
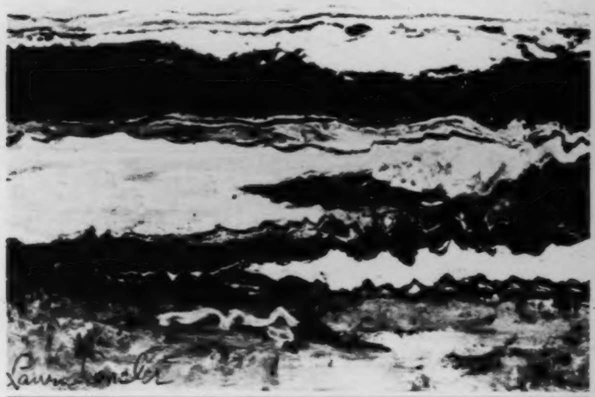
GALLERY
419 WEST BROADWAY, NEW YORK, NY 10012
TELEPHONE 212/431-6880



The Bride's Mother Stripped by Her Bachelor Sons 1982
Oil on canvas, 78"x83"
CHEMA COBO
NEW PAINTINGS AND DRAWINGS
March 22 through May 3, 1983
ZOLLA/LIEBERMAN GALLERY
356 W. Huron Chicago 60610 312/944-1990

Joseph
Glasco
Recent Paintings
March 1–March 26, 1983
Gimpel & Weitzenhoffer Gallery
1040 Madison Avenue
New York 10021 212-628-1897

LAURA CANSLER



"The Source" Enamel, 10" x 14"

March 4-30

db

DONALD BATMAN GALLERY
825 WESTPORT RD., KANSAS CITY, MO 64111, (816)531-2588

SIDNEY GEIST
February 22 - March 12

EDITH SCHLOSS
March 15 - April 9

Ingber Gallery
460 West Broadway
New York, New York 10012
(212) 674-0101

ROBERT BRADY
SCULPTURE

Braunstein Gallery

San Francisco, CA 94108

March 1983

254 Sutter Street

LOUISE STANLEY
PAINTINGS

Quay Gallery

PHOTO: LEE YOUNGBLOOD

William Sawyer Gallery
3045 CLAY STREET SAN FRANCISCO, CA 94115
TUESDAY-SATURDAY 11-6 (415) 921-1600

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

MARCEL BARDON
COLOR PHOTOGRAPHS / MARCH 10 THROUGH APRIL 2

WEST SIDE GALLERY
CASTELLI GRAPHICS 43 WEST 61 STREET NEW YORK

THE TWINING GALLERY INC.
33 BLEEKER ST., NYC 10021 (212) 674-2070

SAM MESSER

OPENS FEBRUARY 10
Formerly Alexander Carlson Gallery

SCULPTURE 1968-1983
HARRY ROSEMAN
MARCH 5 THROUGH APRIL 2, 1983

DANIEL WEINBERG GALLERY
619 North Almont Drive, Los Angeles, CA 90069 (213) 271-7101

Ben Shahn
Works from 1926 - 1969
February 26 - April 7, 1983
Illustrated Catalogue $10.00

HOOKS-EPSTEIN GALLERIES, INC.
1200 BISSONNET HOUSTON, TEXAS 77005 (713) 522-0718
HADA

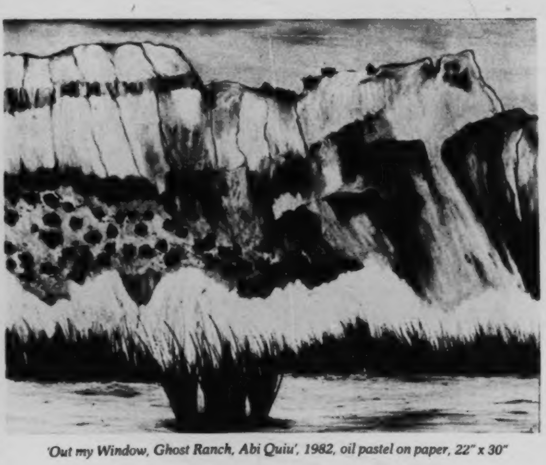
MALINDA BEEMAN
ANTON RUBEY
OTIS TAMASAUSKAS

INNOVATIVE LITHOGRAPHY

MIRIAM
PERLMAN

Lake Point Tower 505 N. Lake Shore Drive Suite 5410 Chicago

ANNE NEELY



'Out my Window, Ghost Ranch, Abi Quiu', 1982, oil pastel on paper, 22" x 30"

represented by

IMPRESSIONS GALLERY
275 Dartmouth, Boston MA 02116 (617) 262-0783
In New York, by appointment (212) 410-9179
Victoria Munroe, Director

BILTMORE TOWER 1983
Painted Steel

David Bottini

10 March - 9 April 1983

Gallery
Paule Anglim
14 Geary St. San Francisco
(415) 433-2710

MARCH, 1983

EDITH CARLSON
JOSHUA SCHREIER
Drawings

HADLER · RODRIGUEZ · GALLERIES
38 East 57th Street New York 10022 212 752-7734

VOL 71
ISS 3
MR 1983
UMI

Ken Ferguson

North Space

James Lawton

South Space

March 12 – April 2, 1983

GARTH CLARK GALLERY
5820 Wilshire Blvd Los Angeles 90036
(213) 939 2189

TEXAS GALLERY

January
Chuck Arnoldi

February
Matt Mullican

March
Alex Katz

April
Gary Stephan

May
Joe Zucker

2012 Peden • Houston • Texas • 77019

JACOB KAINEN

Recent Paintings
March 5–April 2

SID DEUTSCH GALLERY
20 West 57th Street, New York 10019

RICCO • JOHNSON GALLERY
SOHO • 475 BROOME • NEW YORK
212-966-0541

Wooden Deer Weathervane late nineteenth c.
27" long, 17" high

MEXICAN MASTERS

Felipe Castaneda
Jean Charlot
Rafael Coronel
Jose Luis Cuevas
Ricardo Martinez
Carlos Merida
Gustavo Montoya
Leonardo Nierman
Felipe Orlando
J.C. Orozco
Diego Rivera
D.A. Siqueiros
Rufino Tamayo
Francisco Zuniga, etc.

The B. Lewin Galleries

266 North Beverly Drive 213-278-5769
Beverly Hills, California 90210 213-550-1852

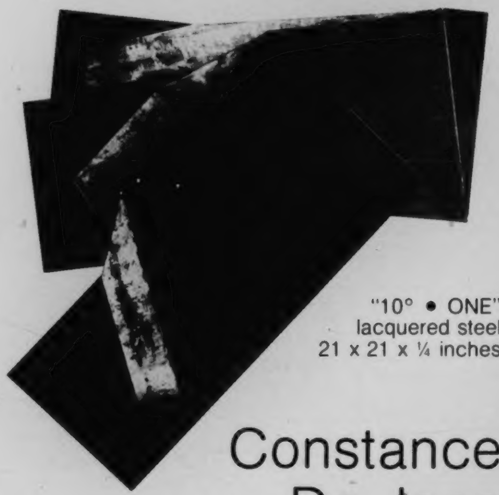
210 South Palm Canyon Drive
Palm Springs, California 92262 619-325-7611
World's Largest Gallery Collection of Mexican Art

RUDY AUTIO

New Figurative Vessels
March 3 through 31

"Jude, Julie and Sponge", 1982, ceramic, 28"h

IMPRESSIONS GALLERY
275 Dartmouth, Boston MA 02116 (617) 262-0783
In New York, by appointment (212) 410-9179



"10° • ONE"
lacquered steel
21 x 21 x ¼ inches

Constance
De Jong

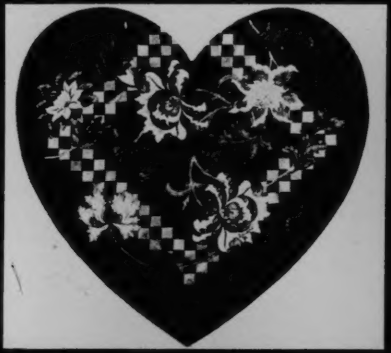
LINDA DURHAM GALLERY, SANTA FE
400 Canyon Road
Santa Fe, N.M. 87501
505-988-1313

SUSAN HALL

Night Made Her Paler
February 25–March 26

HAMILTON
20 West 57th Street, NYC 10019 (212) 765-5915

VOL 71 ISS 3 MR 1983 UMI



The Measured Heart
Acrylic, Fabric on Paper

Miriam Shapiro
RECENT WORKS

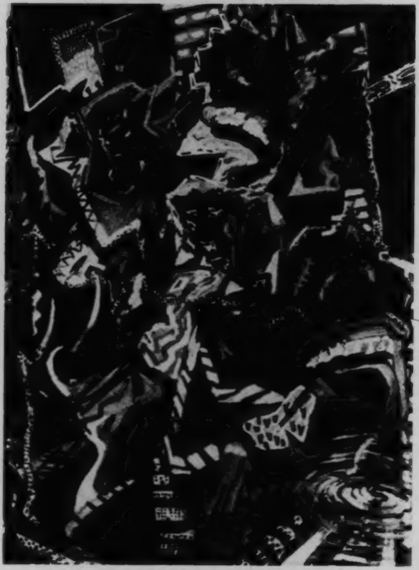
Joyce Kozloff
PRINTS AND PRINTS/COLLAGES

March 4 - April 5, 1983

Barbara Gillman Gallery

270 N.E. 39 Street / 3886 Biscayne Blvd.
Miami, Florida 33137 / (305) 573-4898

JEFF HULL



SAUCERS NEAR TIBET, 1980. Oil on canvas 64½h x 46½w.

MARCH 3-31, 1983

JEREMY STONE GALLERY
126 POST SAN FRANCISCO CA 94108 415/398 6535

The Adam L. Gimbel Gallery

Presents Recent Drawings and Painted Constructions by

CAROLEE THEA

GALLERY II:
Recent Etchings by

RICHARD DIEBENKORN

March 15—April 9

Saks Fifth Avenue

15 East 49th Street (212) 940-4176

---

march

ED VISSER

wood and steel cable, 1982 diameter: 5 feet

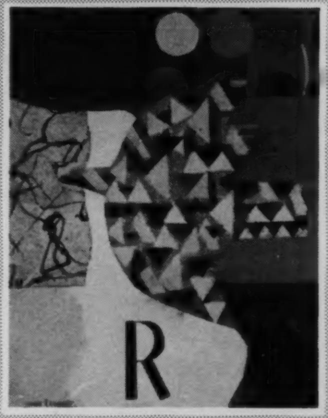
the eason gallery

338 east de vargas
santa fe, nm 87501
(505) 982-9573

MAX
PAPART
UNIQUE WORKS

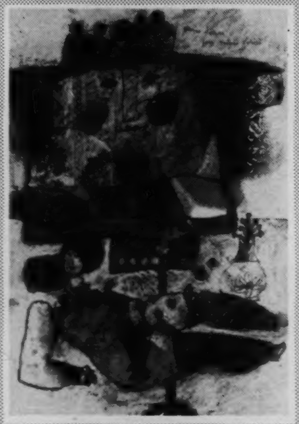


"Radiant Bird"
Gouache and Collage 52 x 70 cm

NAHAN
GALLERIES
540 ROYAL ST. • NEW ORLEANS, LA. 70130
(504) 524-8696 Open Everyday, including Sundays

World Agents for Max Papart - Inquire about Oils & Gouaches

THEO
TOBIASSE
UNIQUE WORKS



"Pomme D'Amour Pour Unique Folie"
Pastel with Collage & Embossing 70 x 102 cm

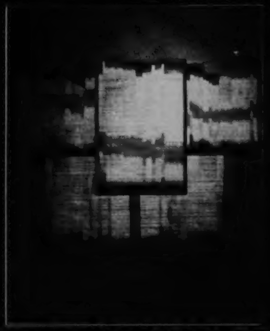
NAHAN
GALLERIES
540 ROYAL ST. • NEW ORLEANS, LA. 70130
(504) 524-8696 Open Everyday, including Sundays

World Agents for Theo Tobiasse - Inquire about Oils, Pastels & Gouaches

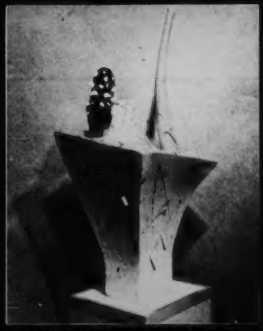
incorporated
gallery
PRESENTS RECENT WORKS BY:

HELEN BASKIN

REGIS BRODIE



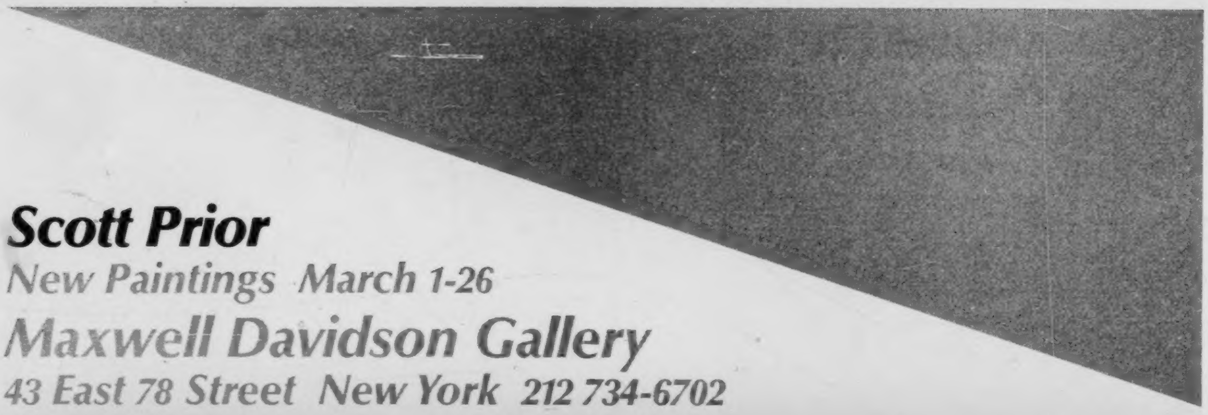
MORGAN CLIFFORD



CURTIS HOARD

SHOW DATE: APRIL 10 - MAY 7, 1983
1200 MADISON AVENUE (87th ST.) NYC 10028

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI



Scott Prior
New Paintings March 1-26
Maxwell Davidson Gallery
43 East 78 Street New York 212 734-6702

CURRENT PROJECTS
THOMAS BEEBY
LAWRENCE BOOTH
HELMUT JAHN
KRUECK & OLSEN
STANLEY TIGERMAN

YOUNG HOFFMAN GALLERY
215 WEST SUPERIOR
CHICAGO 60610
TEL 312.951.8828

Photo: © Douglas M. Parker 1982

"G.M.C., must see to appreciate" 54"x96"

JOE GOODE

PAINTINGS
LITHOGRAPHS
MARCH 26- MAY 2

GALLERY ONE INC
4935 Byers Fort Worth, Texas 76107 (817) 737-9566

HERB JACKSON

FEBRUARY 22 THROUGH MARCH 24, 1983

13225 SHAKER SQUARE CLEVELAND OHIO 44120 216/491-8062
DBR GALLERY

ZUÑIGA Retrospective

Sculpture, Drawings &
Graphics

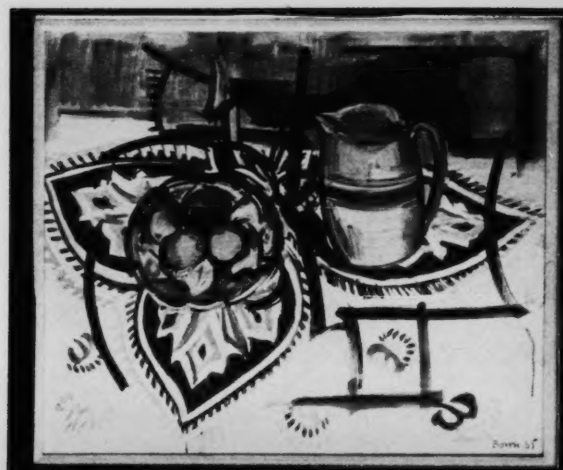
March 3-April 5

the art collector

4151 TAYLOR STREET
SAN DIEGO, CALIFORNIA 92110
(619) 299-3232

"Mother and Child," -1979, Bronze, III/IV, 71 inches high.

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI



BEN BENN

BRANCHVILLE SOHO GALLERY
Ridgefield, CT 06829

203-762-3145 or 544-8636 Tues.-Sat. 1-4 p.m.

Brentwood Gallery

The Pacific Northwest Today	January
Tom Rippon	February
Leon Anderson	March
The Southwest Now	April

1221 South Brentwood Boulevard
Saint Louis, Missouri 63117
(314) 863-0808

Art Books and Illustrated Books

Ars Libri, Ltd. specializes in rare and scholarly books in the fine arts and in illustrated books from the fifteenth to the twentieth century. Our stock of art reference material includes monographs, catalogues raisonné, periodicals and documents relevant to all periods and all fields of art history.

We issue catalogues regularly and provide quotations upon request. We make periodic offerings as well of scholarly libraries and collections, and of original prints and photographs.

Currently available:

Catalogue 32:	Monographs on Artists (Excluding Italian)
Catalogue 31:	Oriental Art
Catalogue 30:	Italian Art and Architecture

Special Bulletin 24: Drawings

ars libri, ltd.

286 Summer Street, Boston, MA 02210
tel. (617) 357-5212 / telex: 95 1075 (Ars Libri, BSN)
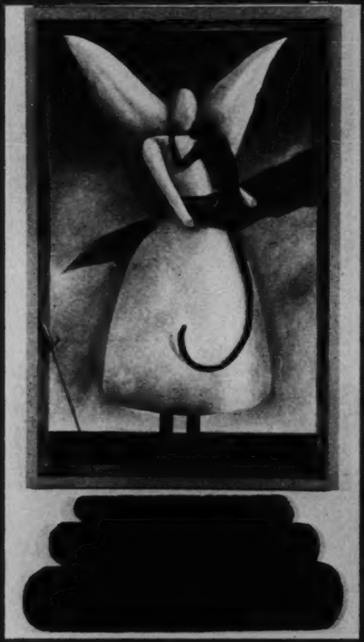
cable: Ars Libri, BSN

CHERYL LAEMMLE MARCH 5–26



BARBARA TOLL FINE ARTS

146 GREENE ST, NY, NY 10012
212 431-1788

NEW EDITIONS FOR 1983

A Special Advertising Section of Recently Published Prints

Art in America

Blum/Helman • Cirrus Editions • Condeso/Lawler
Crown Point Press • Ediciones Poligrafa/Galeria Joan Prats
Editions Press • Editions Schellmann & Klüser • Ronald Feldman Fine Arts
Galerie Eric Franck • Galerie Holtmann • Marian Goodman/Multiples • USF Graphicstudio II
Maximilian Verlag/Sabine Knust • Pace Editions • Petersburg Press • 724 Prints • Simca Print Artists
Styria Studio • Tamarind Institute • Universal Limited Art Editions • V & R Fine Arts Diane Villani Editions • Waddington Graphics

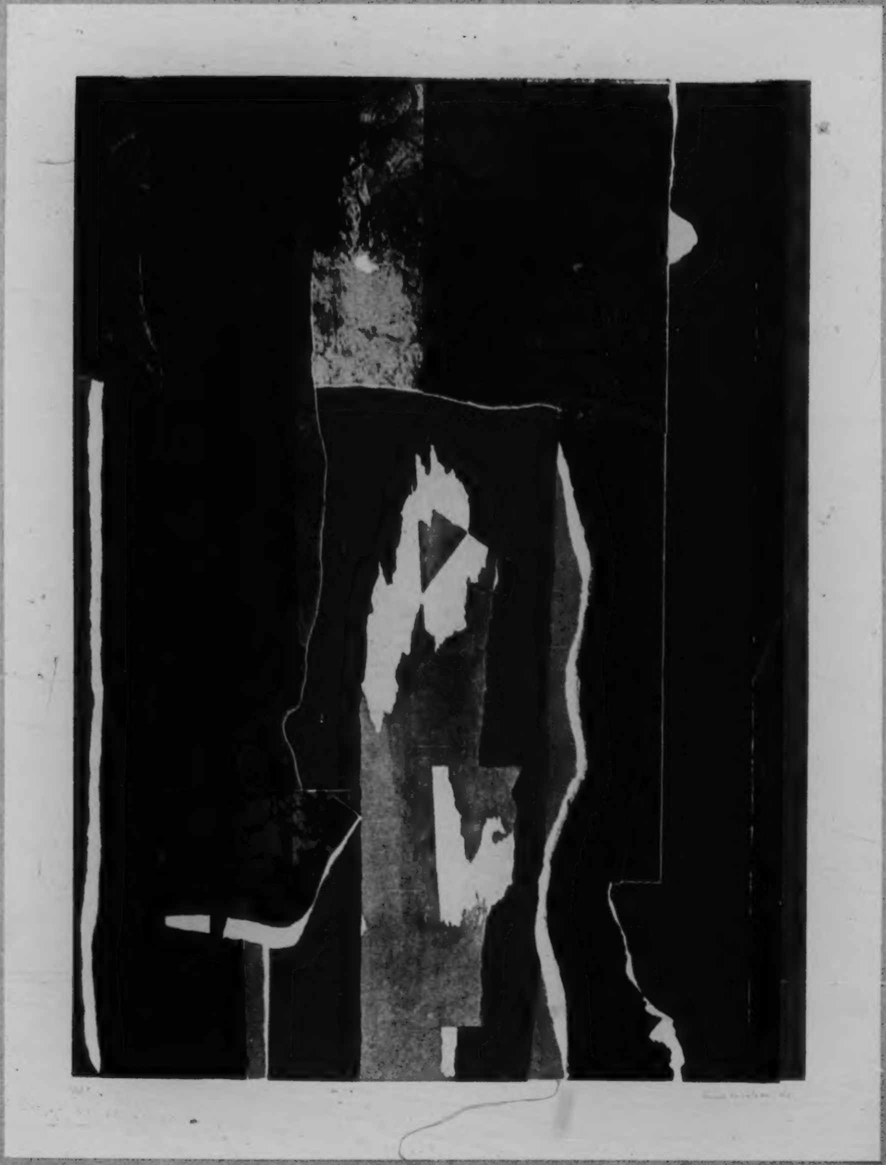
VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

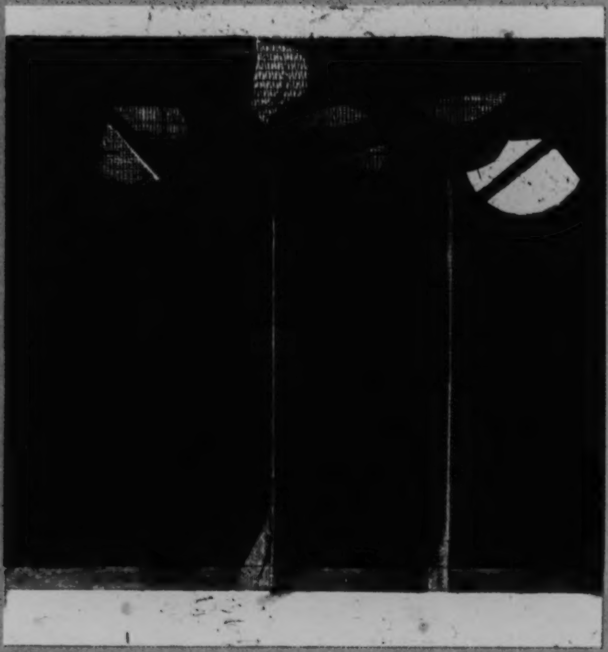


LOUISE NEVELSON

REFLECTIONS III One of a series of 5 etchings measuring 45 1/2 x 35 1/4. Published by Pace Editions Inc. 1983.
An edition of 50 with 10 artist proofs.

PACE EDITIONS INC.

32 EAST 57TH STREET/NEW YORK, NEW YORK 10022/TELEPHONE: (212) 421-3237



RICHARD DIEBENKORN

Clubs—Blue Ground, 1982, PAPER SIZE 33″ x 26½″ (height by width) EDITION of 35

CROWN POINT PRESS

1551 San Pablo Ave., Oakland, CA 94612, (415) 835-5121

545 Broadway, New York, NY 10012, (212) 226-5476

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

"In the Garden = 190" 1982
Edition of 52, with 7 A.P.
On two sheets of Japanese handmade paper
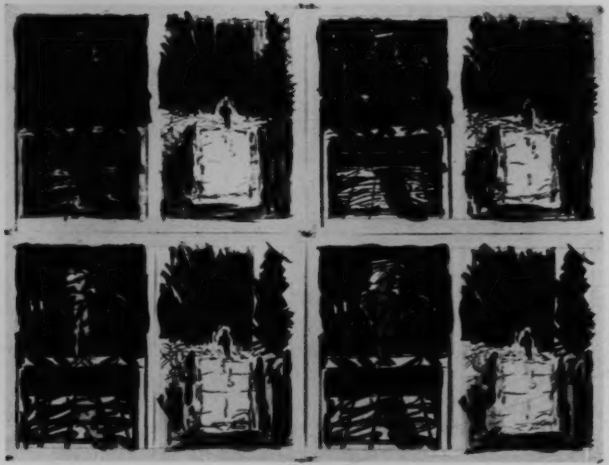
Each sheet: 17¼″ x 22¾″
12-color screenprint and
6-color woodblock

"In the Garden = 118" 1982
Edition of 50, with 5 A.P.
On Japanese handmade paper:
29″ x 38½″
42-color screenprint



"In the Garden = 40" 1983
(Scheduled publication in February)
On 4 sheets of Japanese handmade paper
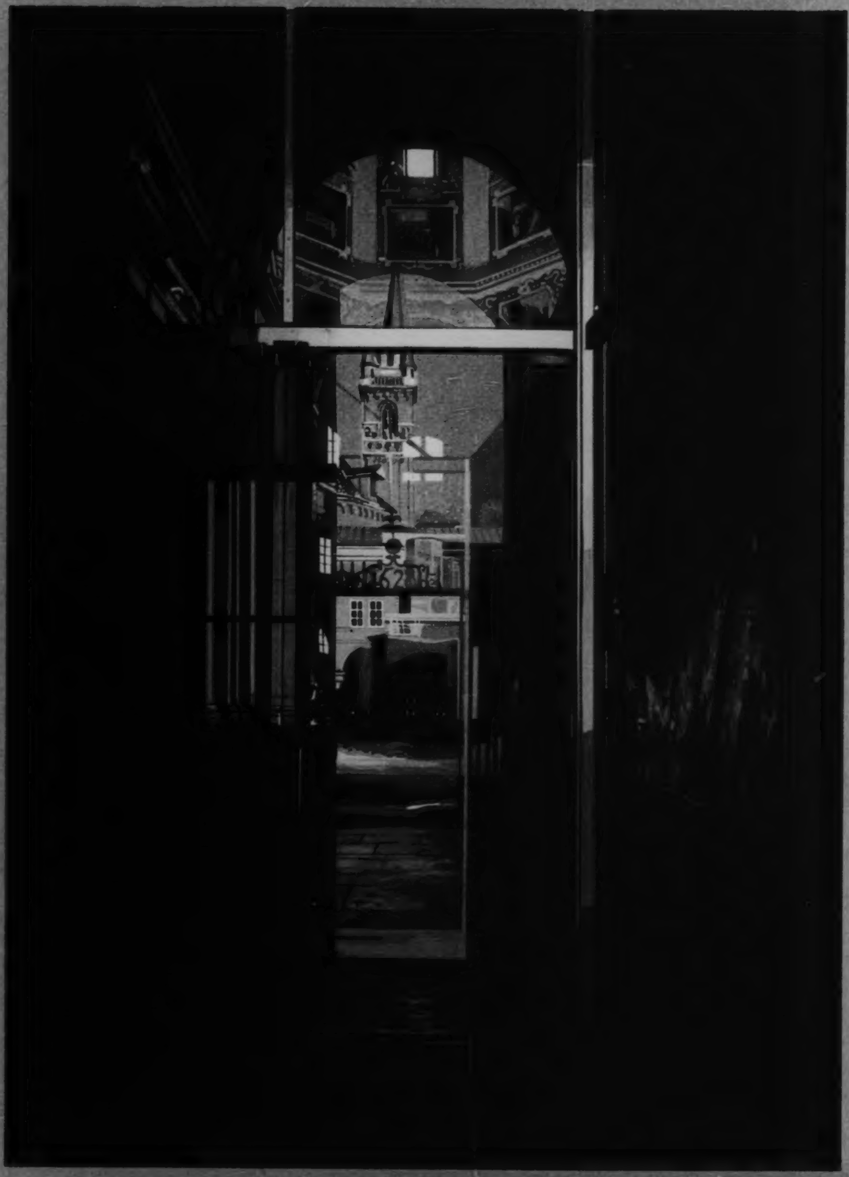
Each sheet: 28¼ x 21⅛
32-color screenprint and
17-color woodblock

JENNIFER BARTLETT

Co-published by the artist and Simca Print Artists, Inc.

SIMCA PRINT ARTISTS INC.

27 Howard Street, New York, N.Y. 10013 (212) 431-5848, 5-5-11 Ginza, Chuo-Ku, Tokyo, Japan (03) 571-3292



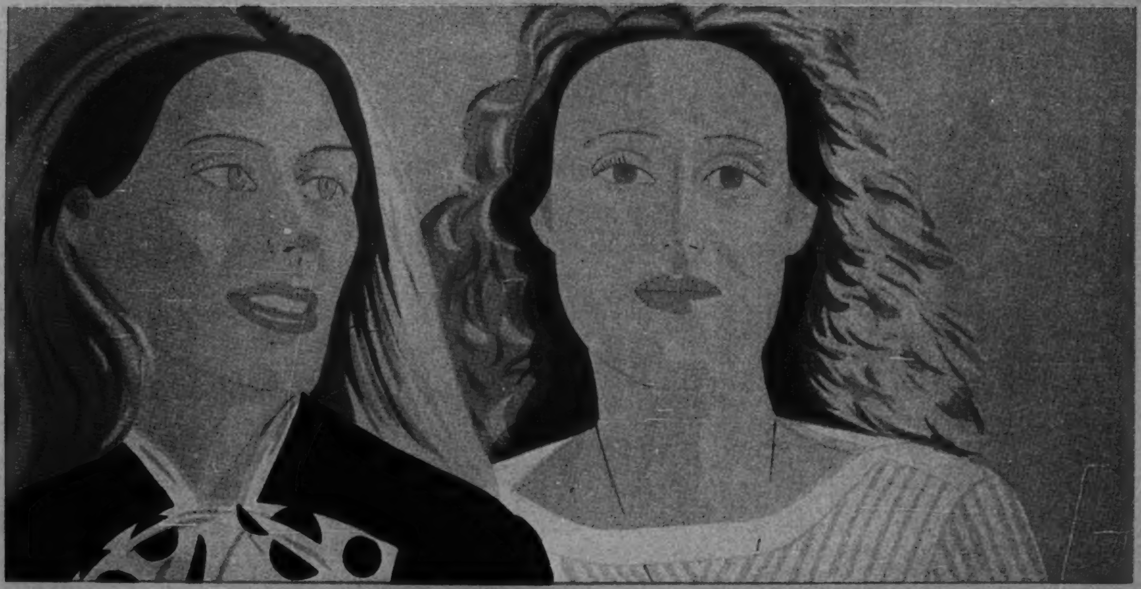
RICHARD ESTES

Salzburg Cathedral. Serigraph 20" x 14". Printed by Domberger. Copublished with Parasol Press. 1982
Edition: 250

V & R FINE ARTS INC.

169 MIDDLE NECK ROAD, GREAT NECK, N.Y. 11021, TELEPHONE (516) 466-4899

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

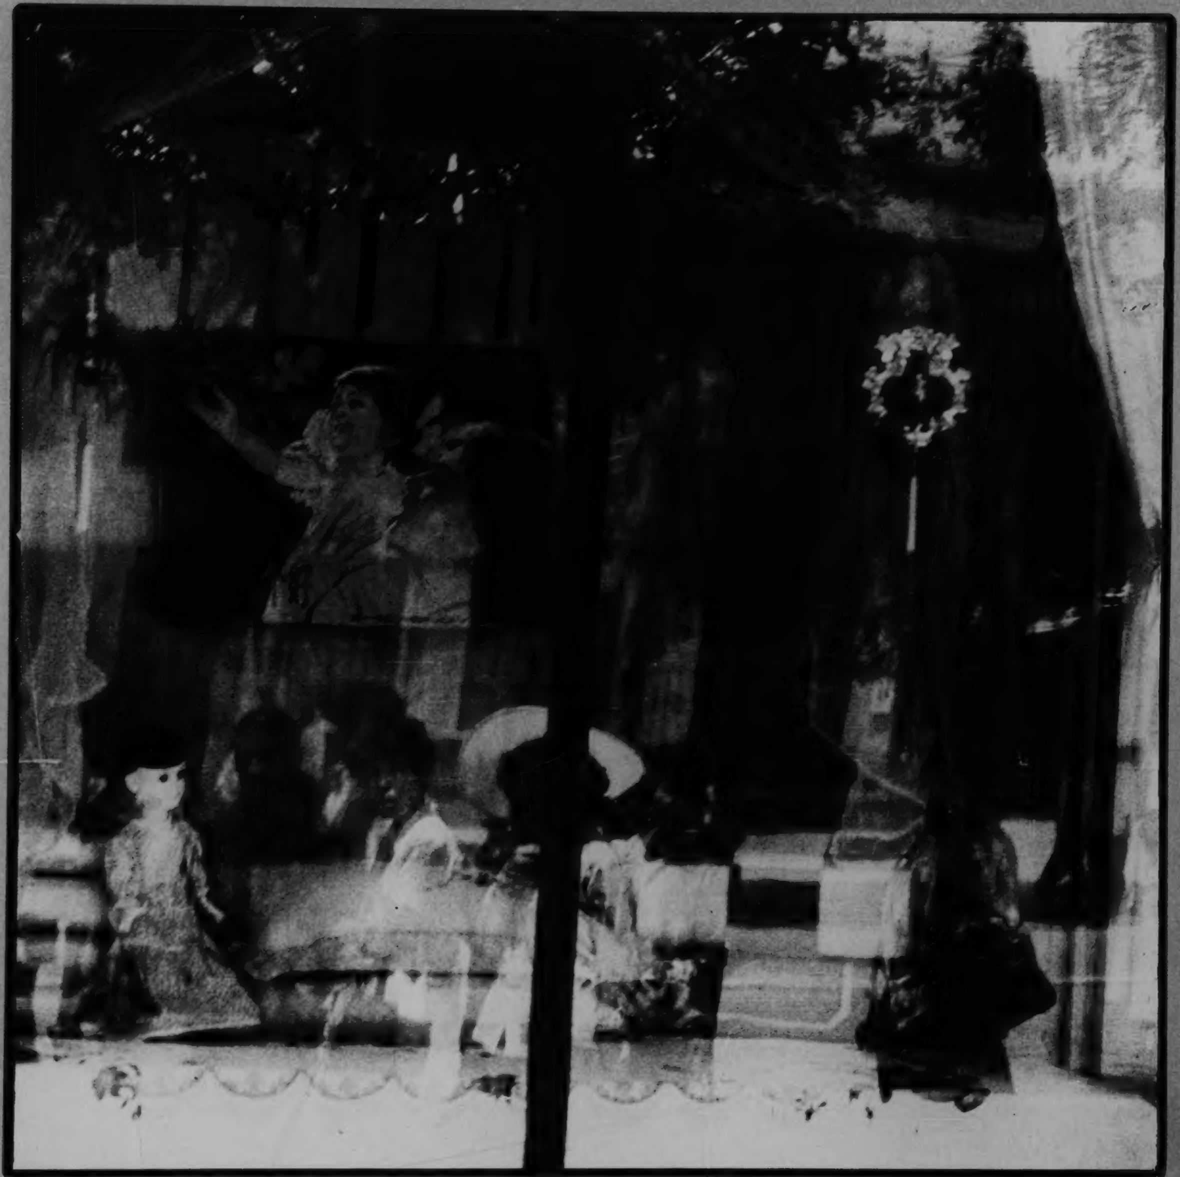


ALEX KATZ

"Julia and Alexandria" 1983. Silkscreen. 37 X 74 inches.
Edition: 75

STYRIA STUDIO INC.

426 BROOME STREET, NEW YORK, N.Y. 10013 • (212) 226-1373



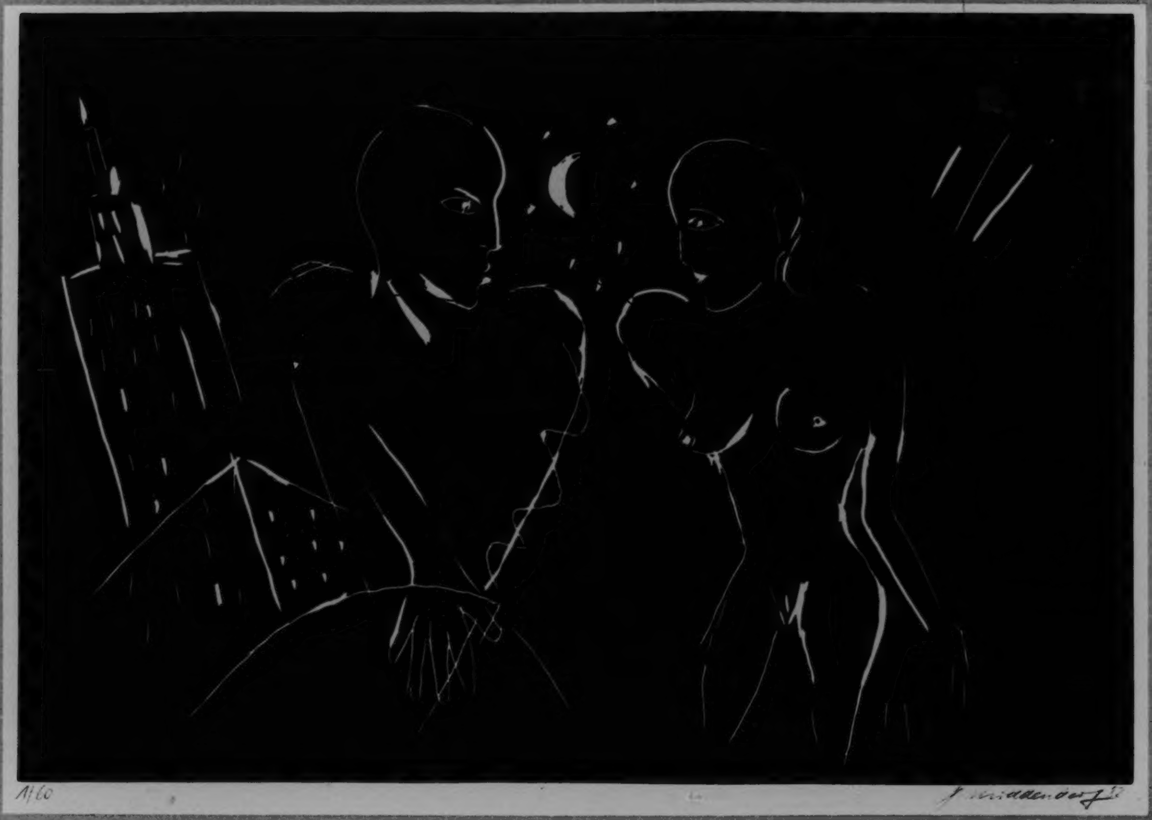
RAUSCHENBERG

Chinese Summerhall, 100 Ft. Photo,
28 individual photographic images from China

USF GRAPHICSTUDIO II

COLLEGE OF FINE ARTS/UNIVERSITY OF SOUTH FLORIDA/TAMPA, FLORIDA 33620/813-9742360

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI



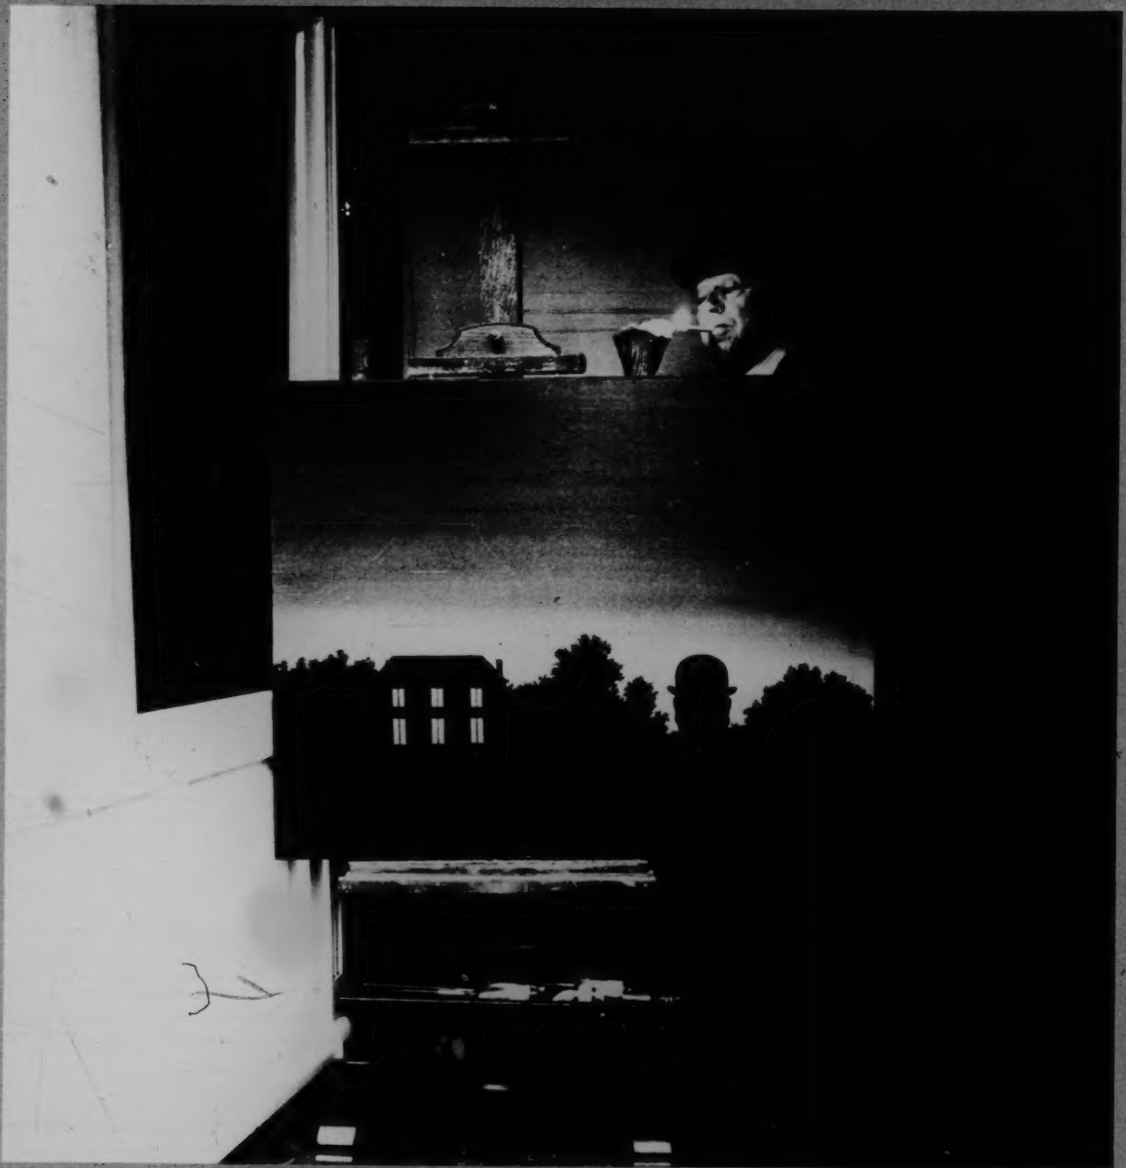
HELMUT MIDDENDORF

New York Night, 1982. Linoldruck, 70 x 100 cm. From a map with Peter Adamski, Peter Bömmels, Gerhard Naschberger (Muhlheimer Freiheit) and Helmut Middendorf. Map price: 1,600 DM

60 exemplare, numeriert und signiert

GALERIE HOLTMANN

RICHARTZSTRASSE 10, 5000 COLOGNE 1, TELEPHONE (221) 21 51 50



MARCEL BROODTHAERS

A portfolio of 17 photographs, 16 portraits and one self-portrait

Numbered edition of 50

MARIAN GOODMAN GALLERY & MULTIPLES, INC., NEW YORK

24 West 57th Street, New York, NY 10019, (212) 977-7160

in association with Sander Gallery, New York

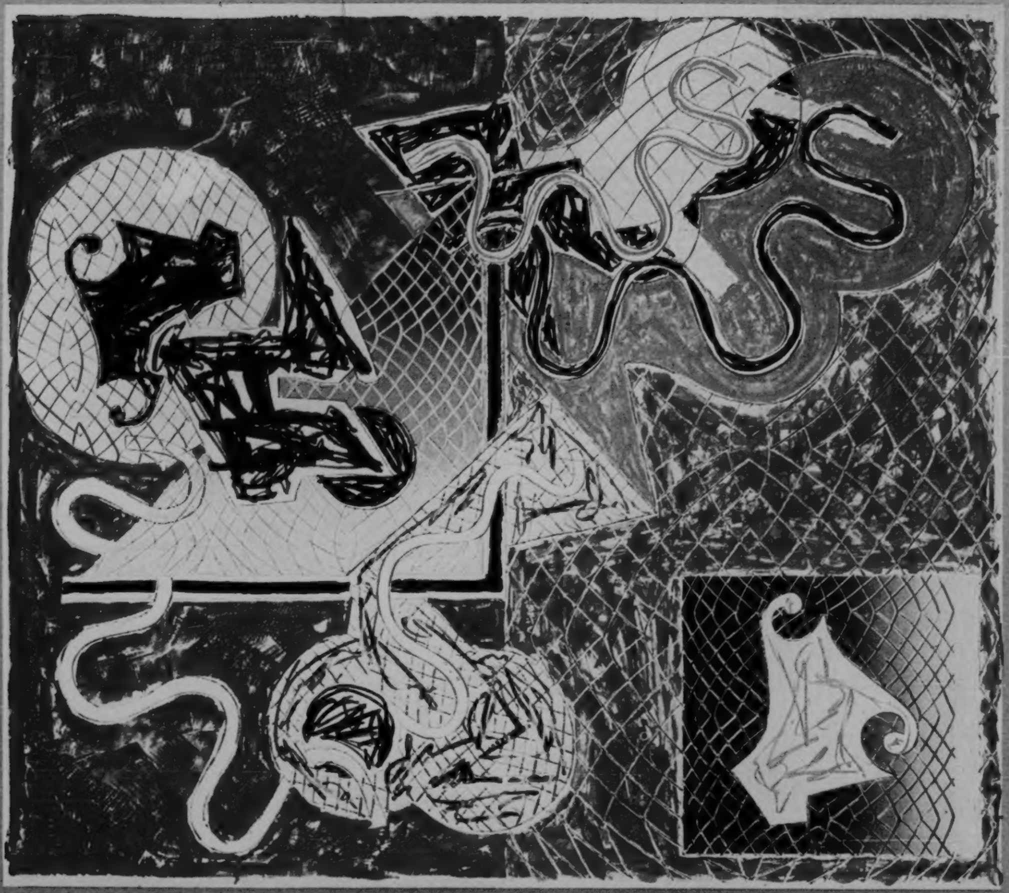
VOL
7
1

ISS
3

MR

1983

UMI



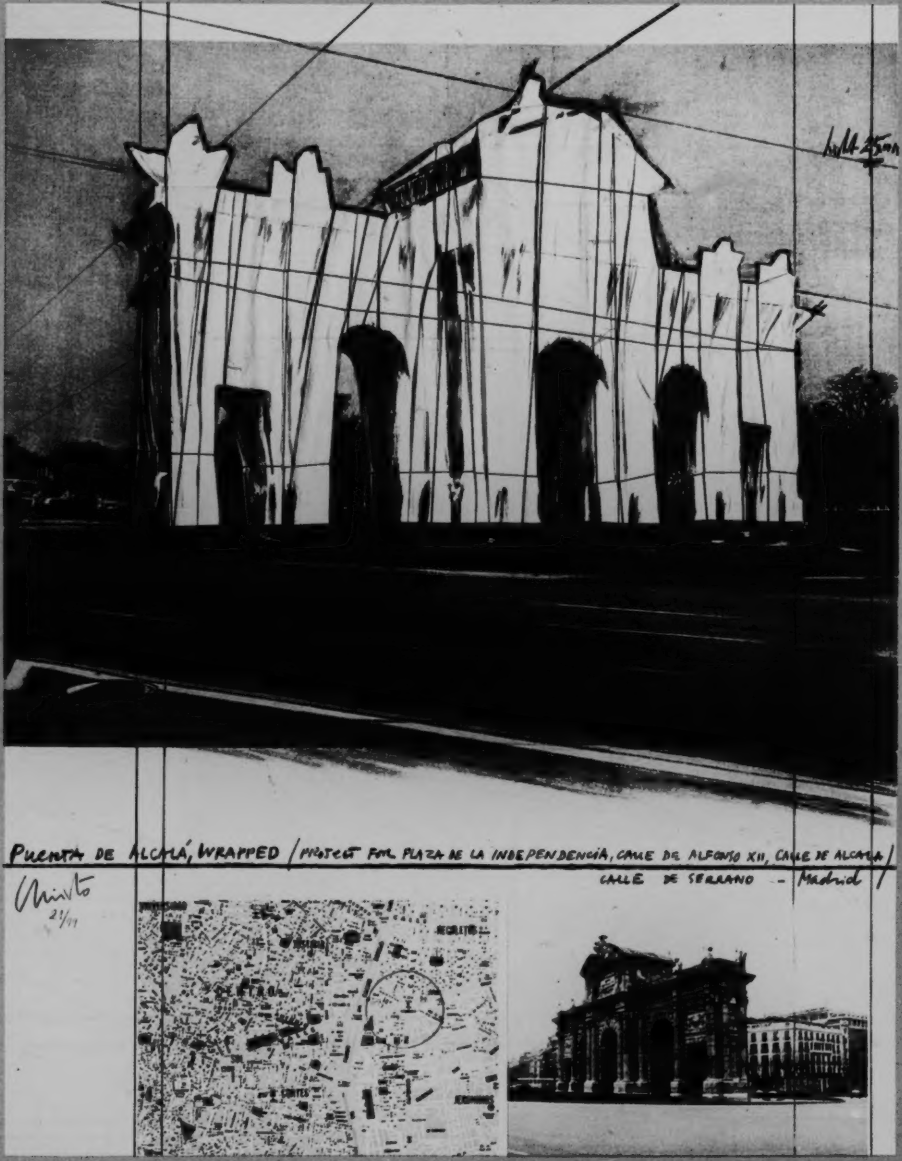
© 1982 Frank Stella

FRANK STELLA

Shards, Nine mixed-media prints. Full Color Catalogue Available with a text by Richard Meier

PETERSBURG PRESS

17 EAST 74TH STREET NEW YORK • 59A PORTOBELLO ROAD LONDON



PUERTA DE ALCALÁ, WRAPPED / PROJECT FOR PLAZA DE LA INDEPENDENCIA, CALLE DE ALFONSO XII, CALLE DE ALCALA / CALLE DE SERRANO – Madrid /
Christo
21/99

CHRISTO

"Puerto de Alcala Wrapped" Project for Madrid Litho-collage, with fabric, twine, map and photograph Size: 28" x 22"

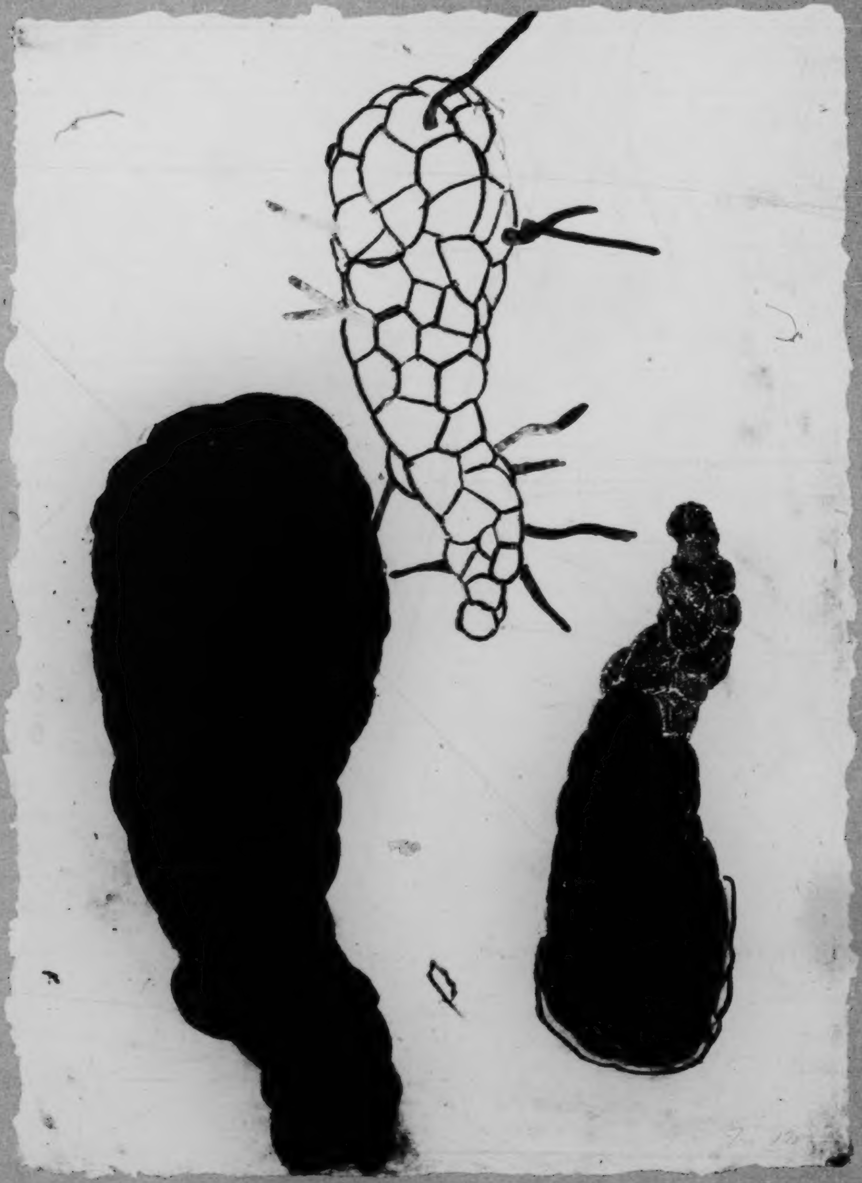
Price: USA $1500.00

Edition: 99 copies, 15 HC and 15 AP

EDICIONES POLIGRAFA • GALERIA JOAN PRATS

Balmes, 54. Barcelona -7 SPAIN, Tel.: 301.91.00 Telex 97041 29 West 57th Street, New York, NY 10019, Tel.: (212) 486-6770

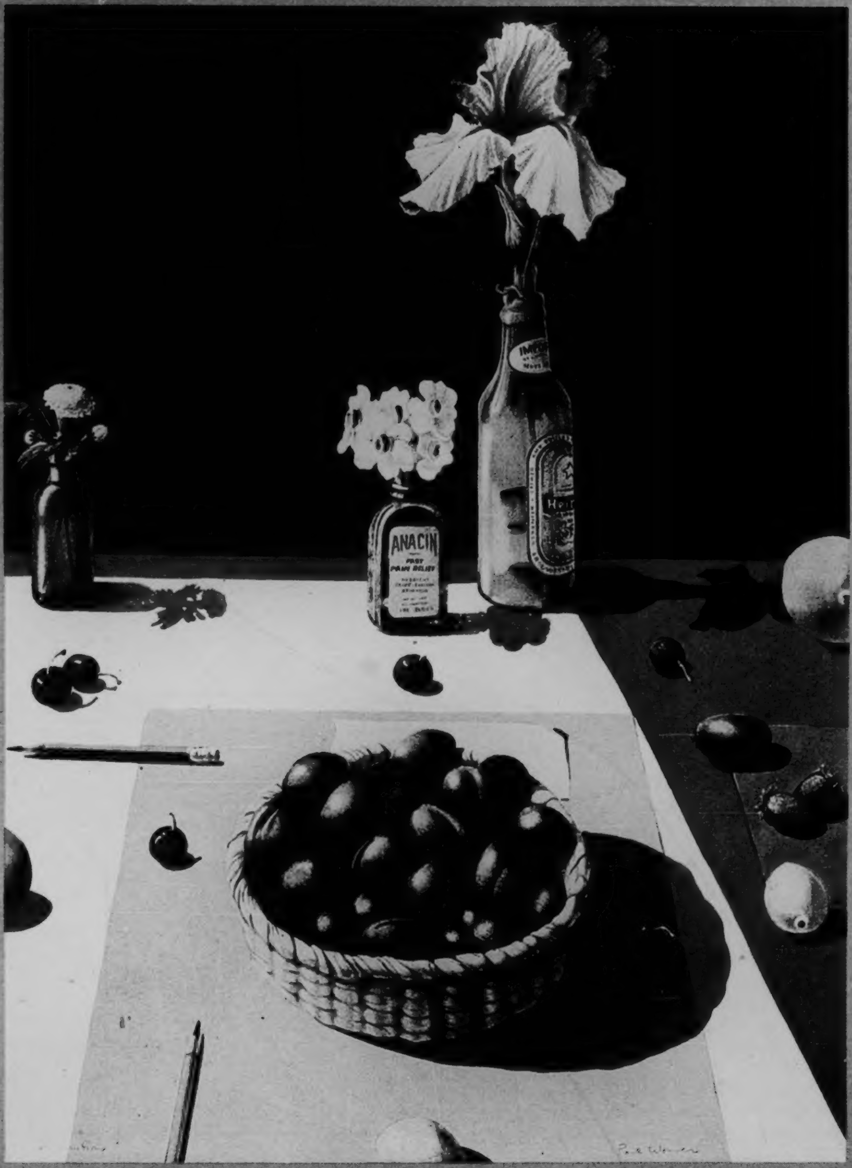
VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI



TERRY WINTERS

"Factors of Increase, A". A lithograph, 31 x 23"

UNIVERSAL LIMITED ART EDITIONS, INC.
5 SKIDMORE PLACE, WEST ISLIP, NY 11795



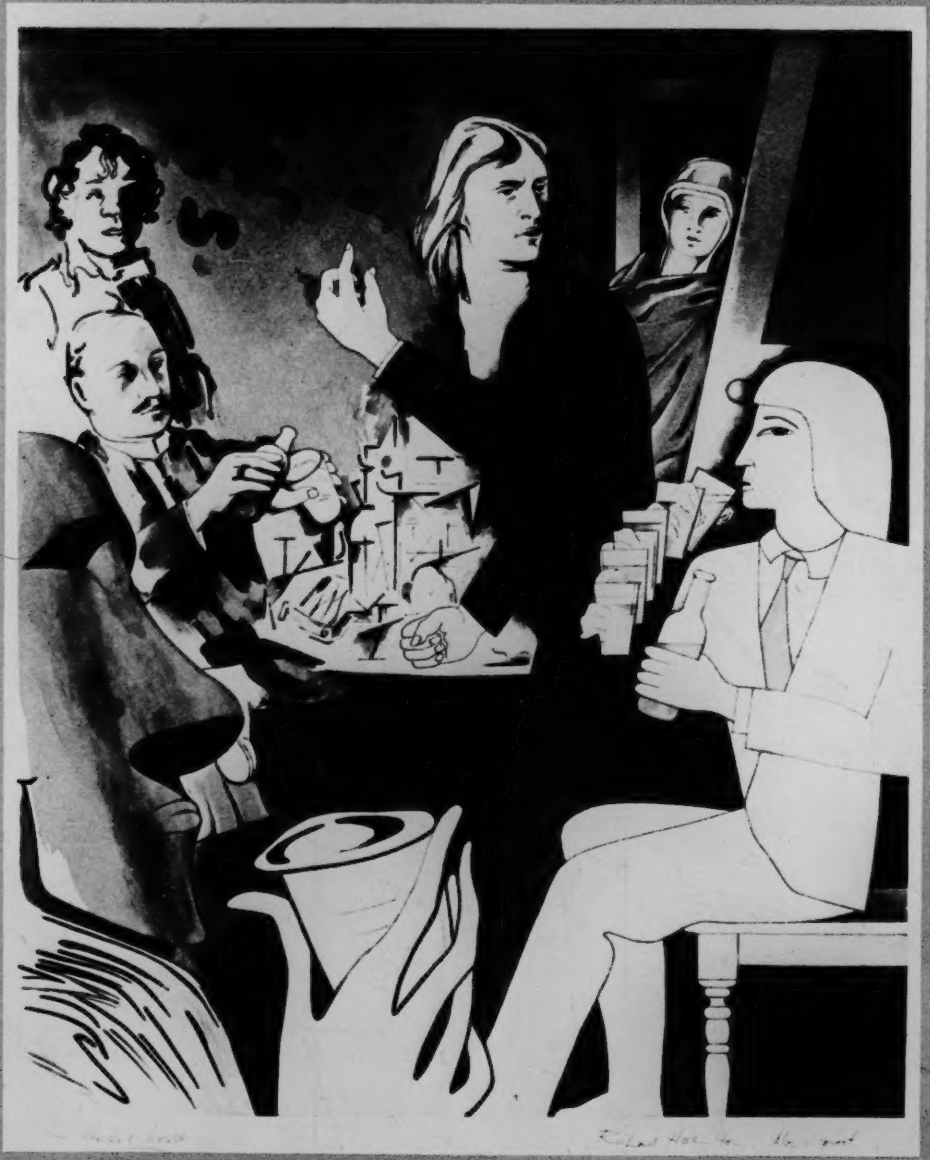
PAUL WONNER

Title: Basket of Plums, Lithograph, 17 color, hand printed on white Arches Cover paper, Summer of 1982
Size: 30" x 22½", Numbered edition of seventy-five

EDITIONS PRESS

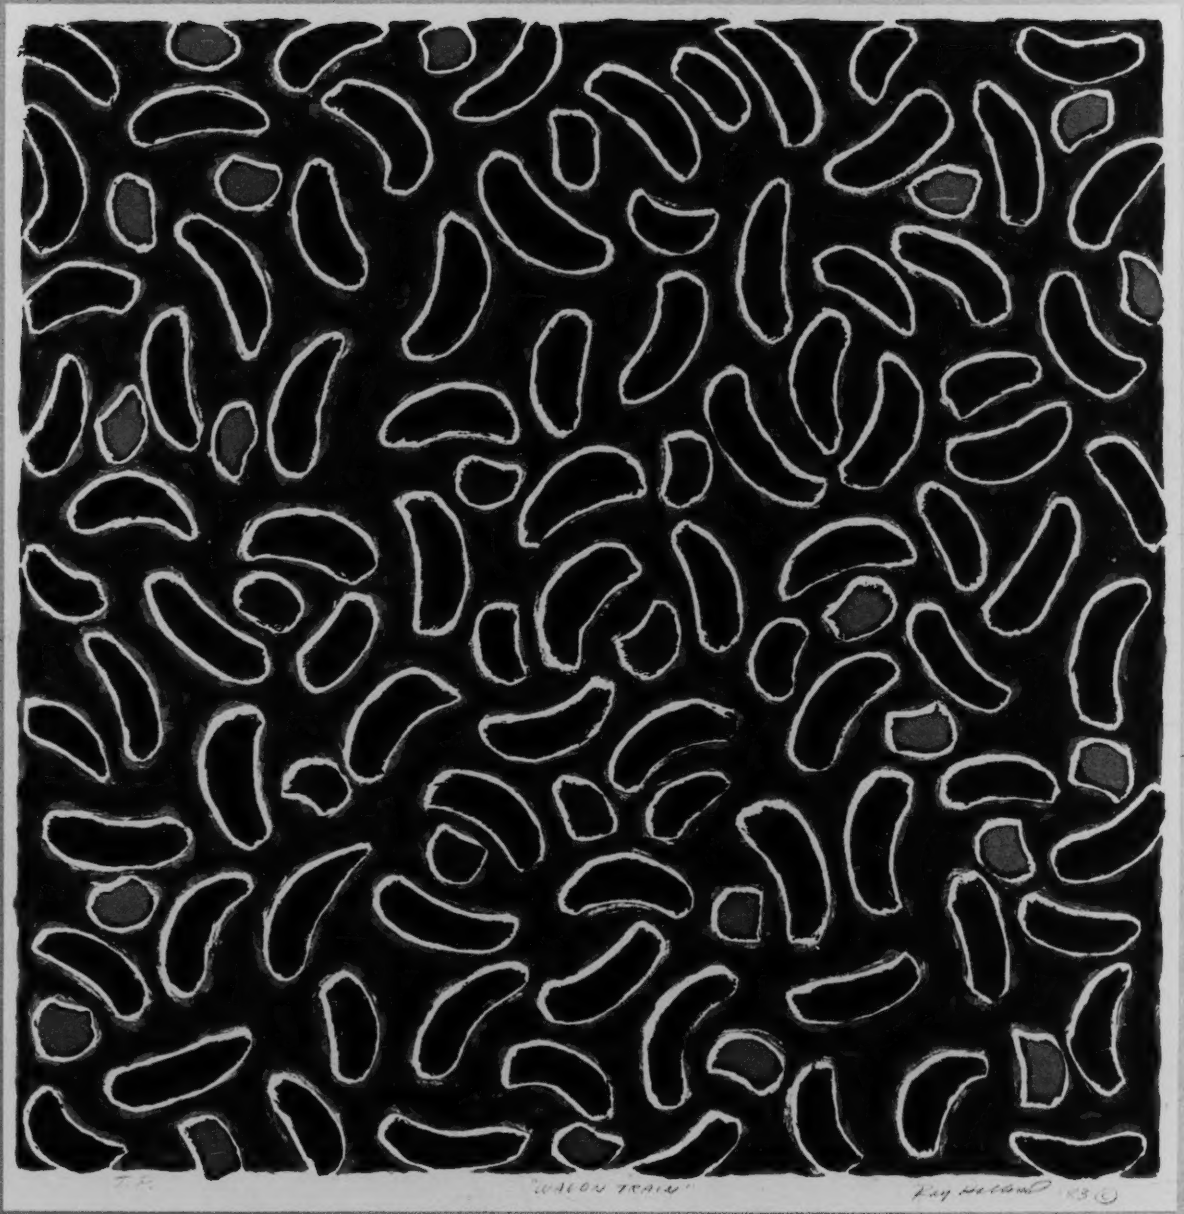
915 Bryant Street, San Francisco, California 94103 U.S.A., Telephone: (415) 626-1846

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI



RICHARD HAMILTON
IN HORNE'S HOUSE 1981-82, Soft Ground, Sugar-lift aquatint, line and stipple etching, engraving.
Printed by Atelier Crommelynck, Paris, on Rives paper
Paper size: 29½ X 22 in/ 75 x 56 cm. Plate size: 20½ x 17 in/ 52.5 x 43.5 cm. An edition of 120.

WADDINGTON GRAPHICS
31 Cork Street, London W.1.



T.P.
"WAGON TRAIN"
Ray Holland '83 ©

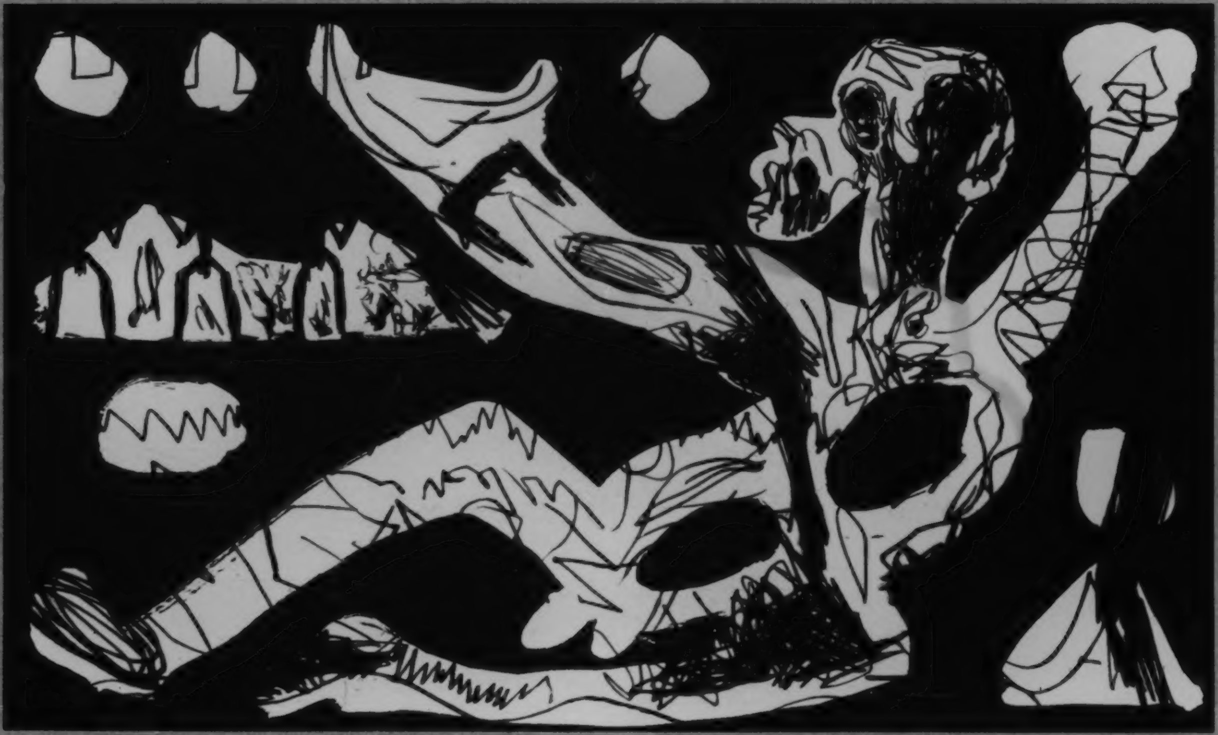
RAY HOLLAND

Wagontrain 1983, 8 color silkscreen on Lenox 100 paper, Size 30" x 30" (image size: 22" x 22")
Edition: 75

CONDESO LAWLER

119 WEST 25TH STREET, NEW YORK NY 10001, (212(741-2377

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI



A. R. PENCK

Drypoint and Aquatint from a Portfolio with eight etchings, 1983, 55 x 75 cm.
Edition of 35.

MAXIMILIAN VERLAG / SABINE KNUST
Maximilianstrasse 36, 8 Munich 22, Telephone (89) 292 113

T. P.
CHASM
Louisa Chase 1983

LOUISA CHASE

"Chasm", 1983 Colored woodcut, four blocks, Seichosen Kozo paper, Image size: 24 x 28 inches, Paper size: 26 x 30 inches,
Printed by Chip Elwell
Editions size: 30, 5 Artist's Proofs

DIANE VILLANI EDITIONS
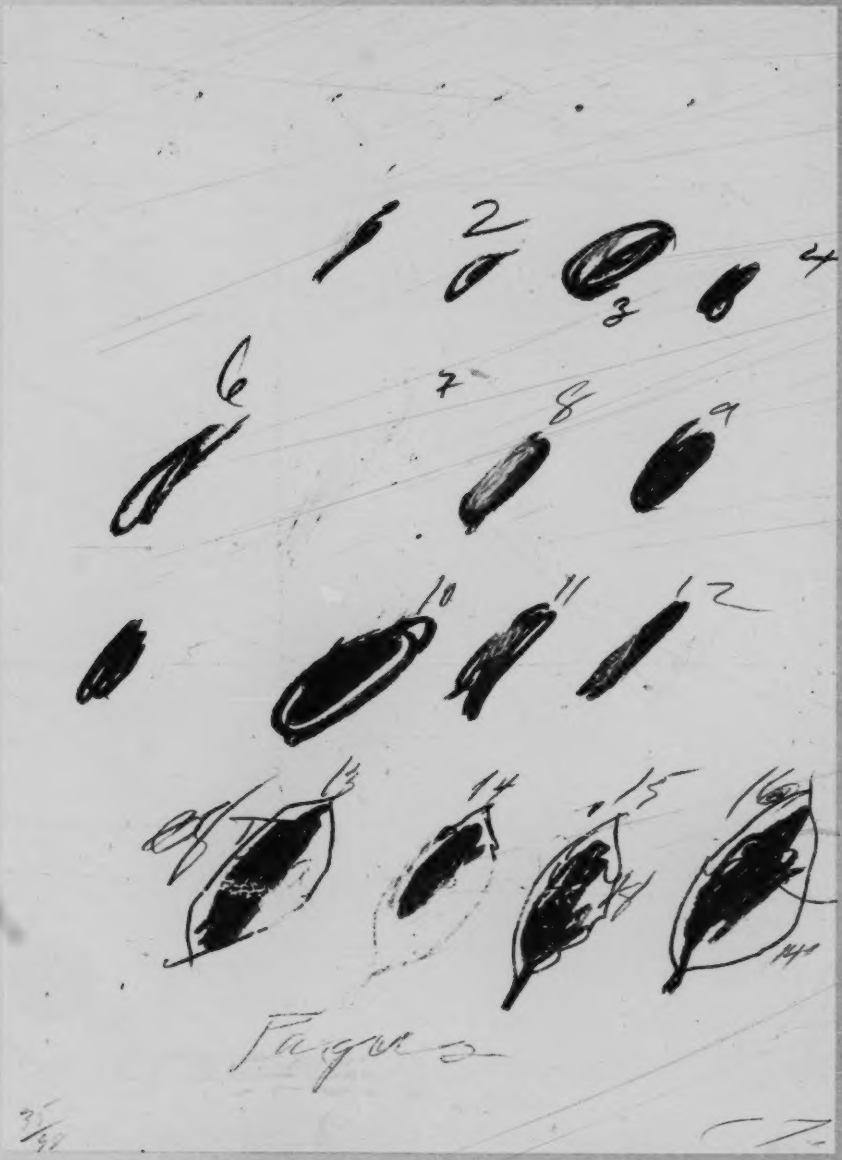
271 MULBERRY STREET, NEW YORK 10012, TELEPHONE: (212) 925-1075

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI



1
2
3
4
6
7
8 9 10 11 12 13 14
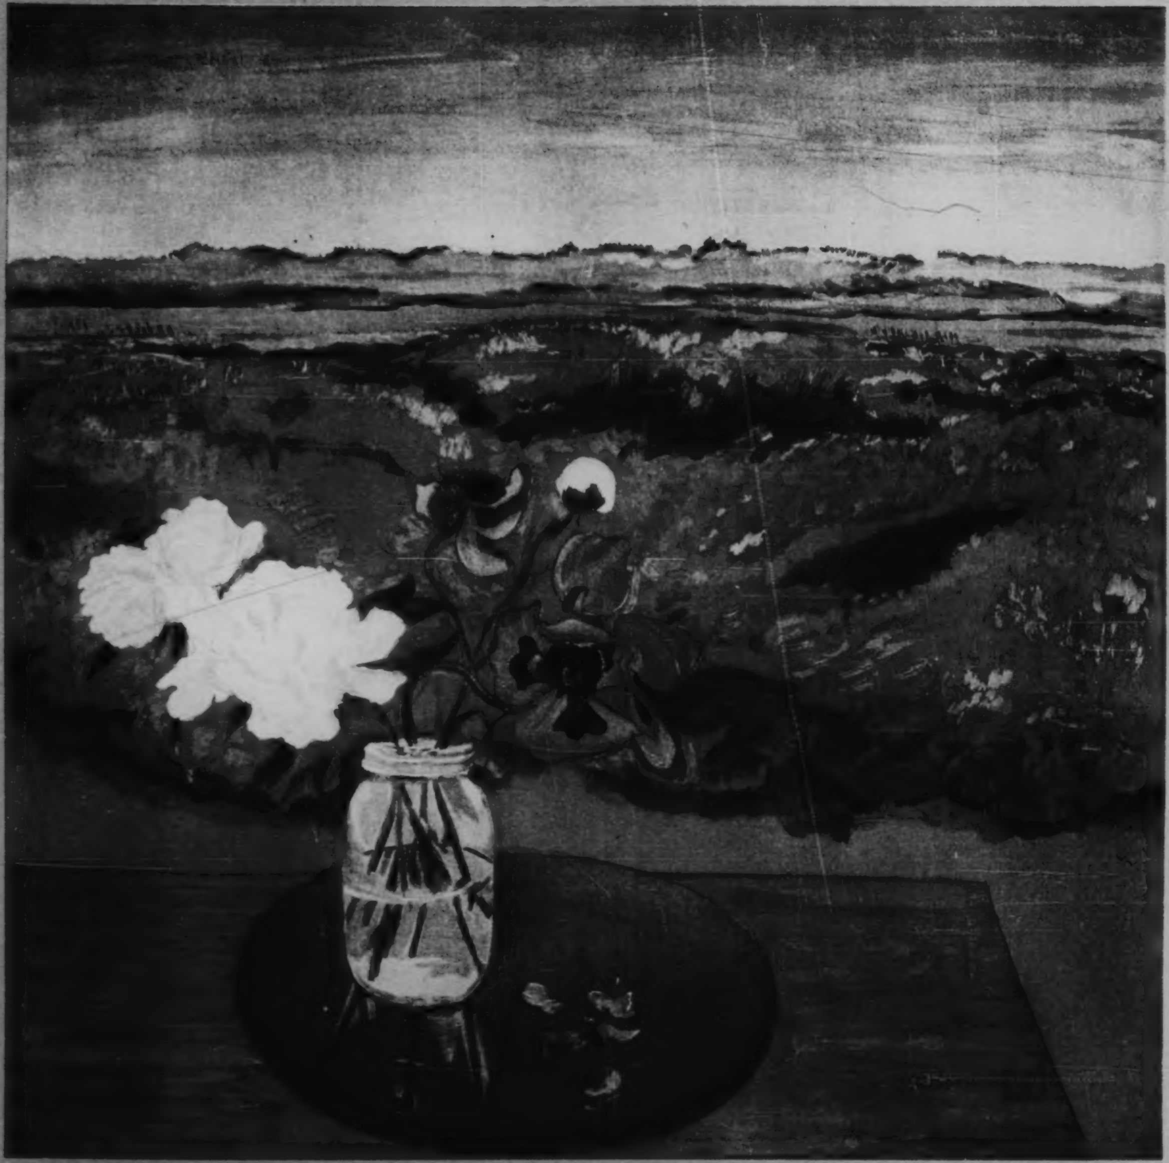
15
16
Fagus
35/98

CY TWOMBLY

Natural History, Part II (Some Trees of Italy)" 1976, Portfolio of 8 Lithographs, 76 X 56 cms.
Edition 98

EDITION SCHELLMANN & KLÜSER
Maximilianstrasse 12, 8000 München 22. Tel. (089) 29 2153



JANE FREILICHER

Poppies and Peonies, 1983 • Etching / Aquatint / Roulette work • Eight Colors • BFK unsized

Paper Size: 36 3/4" X 36 7/8" • Plate size: 30" X 30" • 2 Printer's Proofs • 2 Publisher's Proofs • 6 Artist's Proofs Edition of 50

724 PRINTS

93 MERCER STREET, NEW YORK 10012 • (212) 431-1890

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

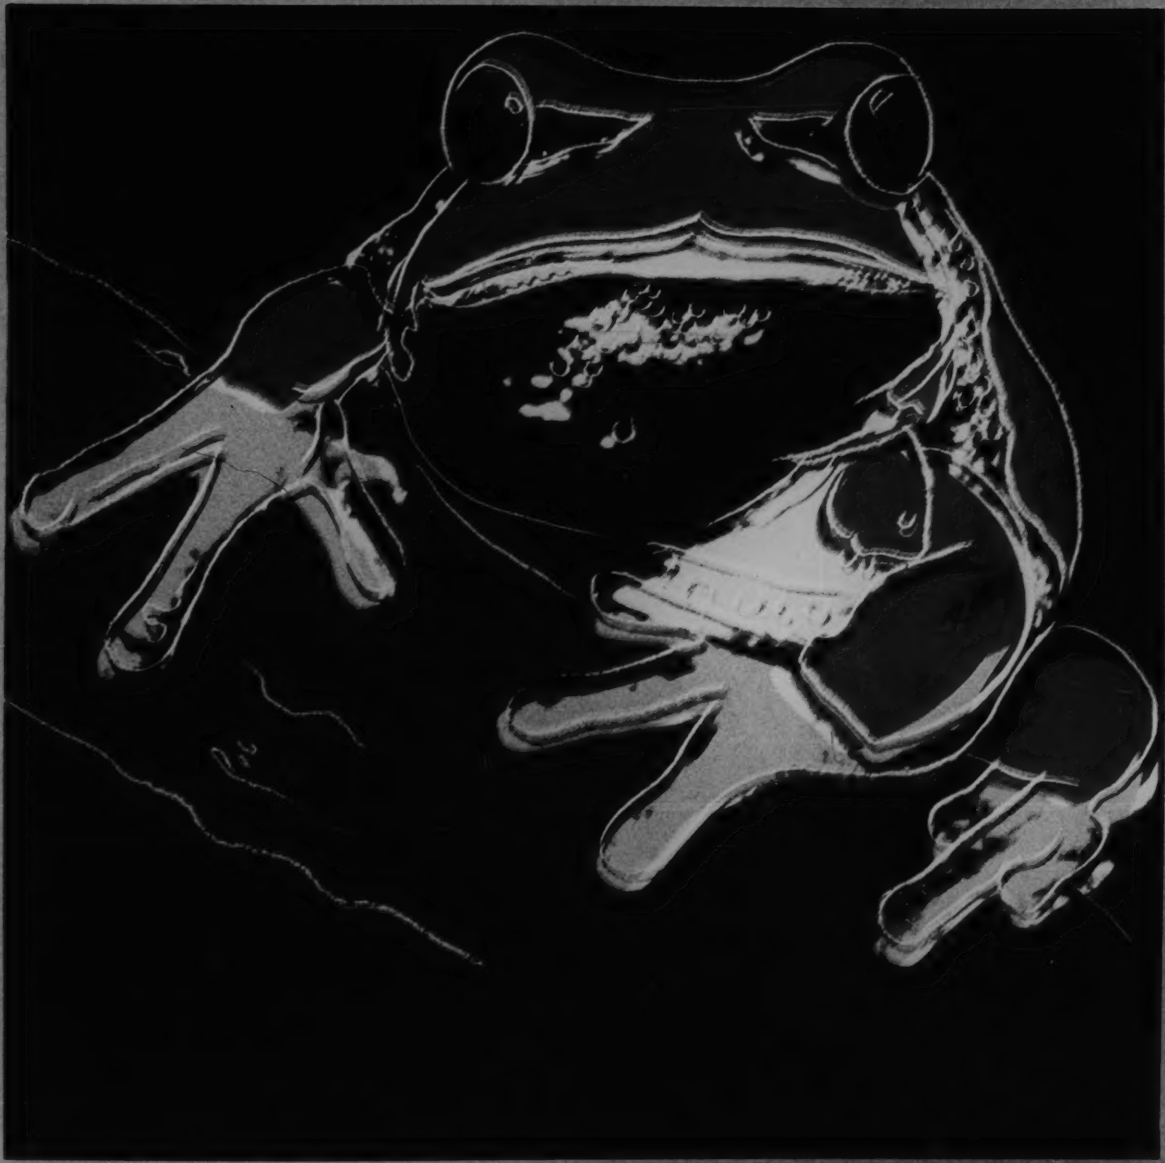
BILLY AL BENGSTON

Noche Corrida, 1983 A 4-run (11-color) lithograph printed on Arjomari Arches and black Arches papers by Master Printer Catherine Kuhn, 25" x 45½"

Editions: 25 numbered impressions

TAMARIND INSTITUTE

108 Cornell Avenue, S.E., Albuquerque, New Mexico 87106 (505) 277-3901



ANDY WARHOL

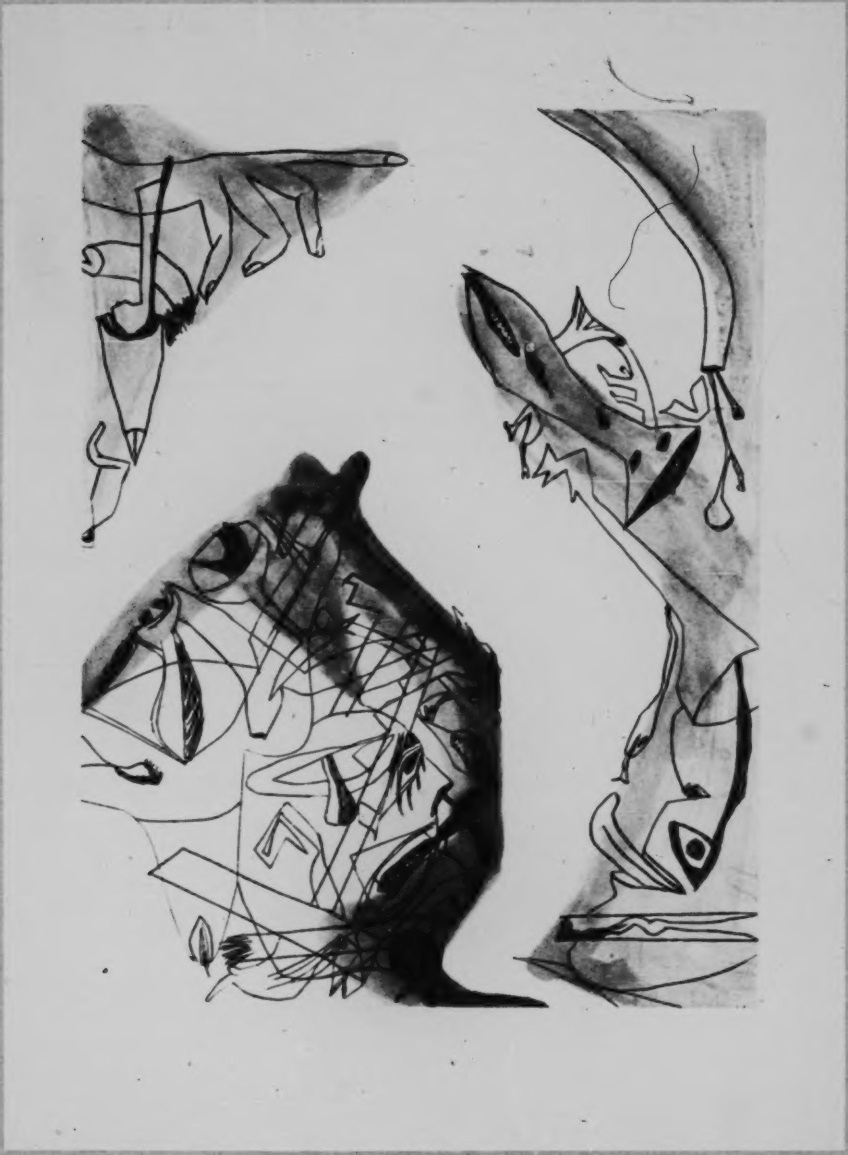
"Endangered Species". Ten silkscreens each 38" x 38". African Elephant, Bald Eagle, Bighorn Ram, Black Rhinoceros, Giant Panda, Grevy's Zebra, Orangutan, Pine Barrens Tree Frog (illustrated), San Francisco Silverspot Butterfly, Siberian Tiger. Catalog $6.00 ppd. N.Y. residents add sales Tax. Published March 1983. Edition: 150 Portfolios.

Exhibitions: American Museum of Natural History, N.Y., Opens April 12; Cleveland Museum of Natural History, Opens April 17.

RONALD FELDMAN FINE ARTS

31 Mercer Street, New York, New York 10013 (212) 226-3232

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI



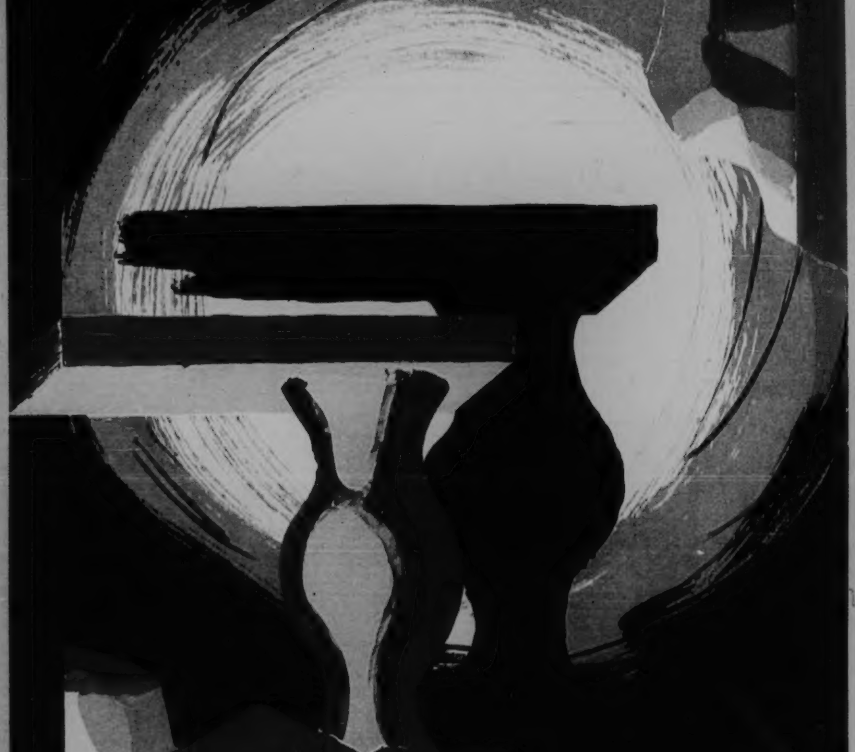
MARTIN DISLER

Dry point with aquatint, black and white. Rives paper, 105 x 75 cm, Image 78 x 58 cm. 1982.

Printer: Atelier Crommelynck, Paris. Edition: 50, signed and numbered, 10 e.a., 2 b.c. Fourteen other editions by Martin Disler available

GALERIE ERIC FRANCK

15 Route de Florissant, Geneva, Switzerland, Tel. 41 (22) 47 08 09



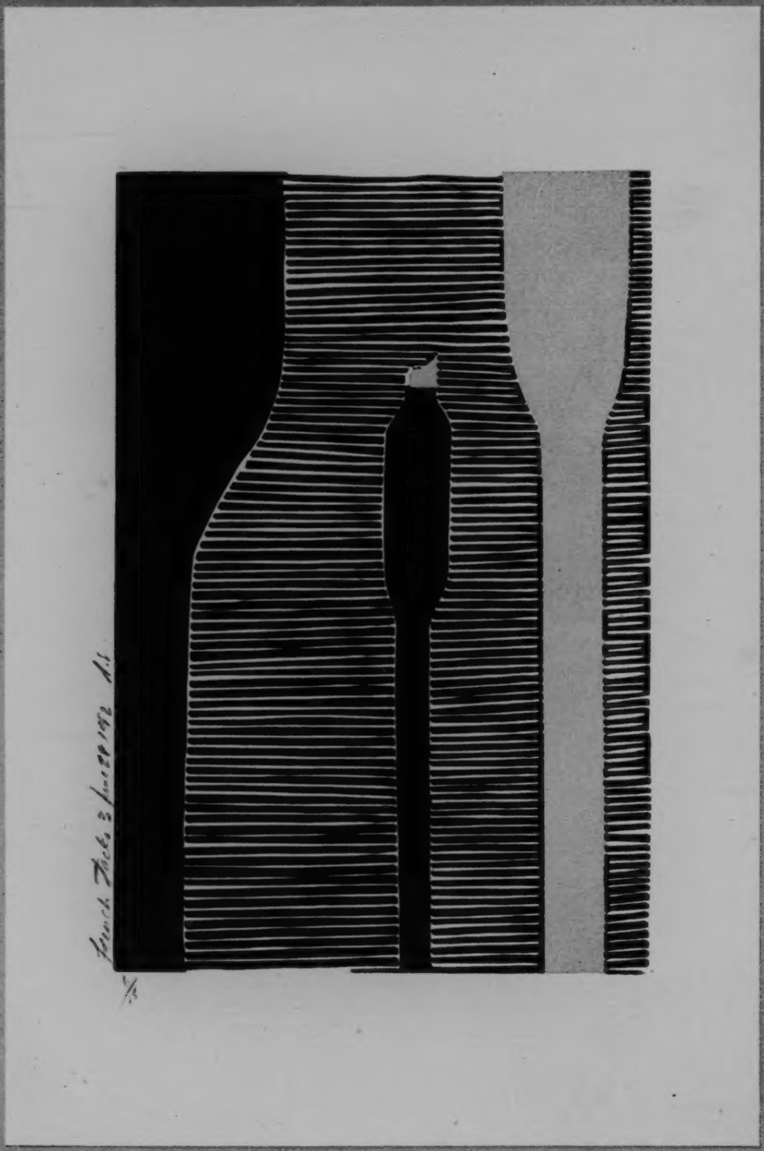
JEDD GARET

Orange Rocks, Lithograph, 40" x 29 3/4", 1983

CIRRUS EDITIONS

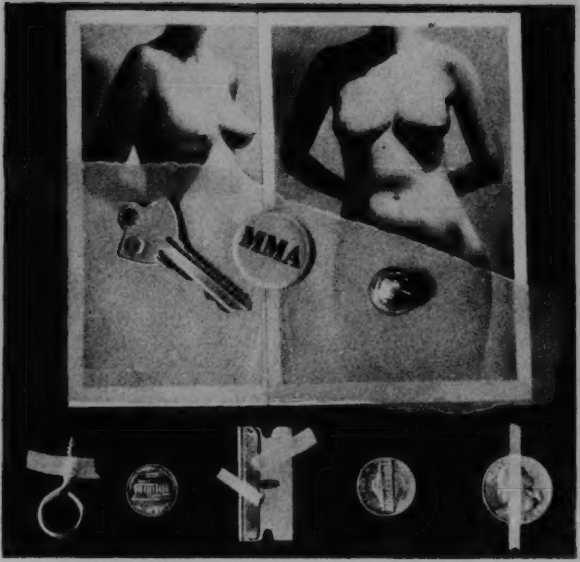
542 S. Alameda Street, Los Angeles, CA 90013

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI



French Stacks 3 June 28 1982 D.S.
1/15

DONALD SULTAN
French Stacks 3, June 28, 1982. Linoleum block print. 15½ X 10½ inches.
From a portfolio of five prints "Tramp Pictures-Cypresses and Stacks" published in collaboration with Carmen Gimenez.
Edition of 15.
BLUM HELMAN GALLERY
20 West 57th Street, New York 10019, (212) 245-2888



STILL LIFE WITH DOUBLE TORSO 1982 (7 7/8" x 7 7/8")

LOWELL TOLSTEDT
DRAWINGS
MARCH 12TH – APRIL 14TH
ANTON GALLERY
415 E CAPITOL ST/WASHINGTON DC 20003
(202) 546-7330

RICHEBOURG/McCOY
4 East 89 Street New York 10028
212/410.5588

Major Works by CORNELL
DALI
DE KOONING
FRANCIS
KRASNER
OLDENBURG
RAUSCHENBERG

By appointment
Elizabeth Richebourg · Jason McCoy

HELMUT
MIDDENDORF

MARCH 8 - APRIL 5

BONLOW GALLERY
JEANETTE BONNIER
150 GREENE STREET, NY, NY 10012
[212] 925-4482

William Morris
Tom Palmore
March 25-April 23

Dale Chihuly
Sarah Schwartz
April 29-June 11

Michael Stevens
Suzanne Adan
June 17-July 16

Betsy
Rosenfield Gallery, Inc.
212 West Superior, Chicago, Illinois 60610 Telephone 312.787.8020

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

HERB JACKSON
DRAWINGS

[illegible]

Mint Museum of Art, Charlotte, North Carolina
March [illegible] — May 8, 1983
Springfield Art Museum, Springfield, Missouri
May 22 — June 19, 1983
Asheville Art Museum, Asheville, North Carolina
July 3 — August 28, 1983
Columbia Museums of Art and Science, Columbia, South Carolina
January 8 — February 12, 1984
Huntsville Museum of Art, Huntsville, Alabama
March 1 — April 15, 1984

Reading Public Museum, Reading, Pennsylvania
May 1 — August 19, 1984
Fundação Calouste Gulbenkian, Lisbon, Portugal
September — November, 1984
Fayetteville Museum of Art, Fayetteville, North Carolina
January 13 — February 24, 1985
Edmonton Art Gallery, Edmonton, Alberta, Canada
March — April, 1985
Davidson College Art Gallery, Davidson, North Carolina
September 18 — October 23, 1985

ORGANIZED BY THE MINT MUSEUM, CHARLOTTE, NORTH CAROLINA

Herb Jackson is represented by Phyllis Weil & Company, 1065 Park Ave., New York, N.Y. 10028 (212) 369-0255
Full color catalogue and poster available from the Mint Museum, 501 Hempstead Place, Charlotte, N.C.

Cultural tours of art centers in Scandinavia, Holland and the U.S.S.R.

Finnair offers fine arts, crafts, architecture, design and culture tours. Trips operate year round and can be tailored for institutions sponsoring fund raising or study groups.

All tours include cultural visits, first-class centrally located hotels, sightseeing and airfare.

For free information, call Finnair's special interest department (212) 689-9300 or check the tour(s) that interests you, below, and mail us your request today.

FINNAIR ART TOURS, 10 E. 40th St., N.Y., N.Y. 10016*
YES, send me information on the tour(s) checked: AA 3/83*

☐Stockholm, Helsinki & Leningrad Art	10-15 days
☐Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev & Helsinki Art	15 days
☐Scandinavian Art Tour	11-15 days
☐Dutch Masters Tour	15 days
☐Finnish Architecture Tour	10-21 days
☐Connoisseur's Finland Gourmet & Culture Tour	15 days
☐Interior Design Tour of Scandinavia	11 days

NAME: .... PHONE: ....
ORGANIZATION: ....
ADDRESS: ....
CITY: .... STATE: .... ZIP: ....

FINNAIR
Simple elegance...by Finnish design

The Art Students League of New York Founded 1875

215 West Fifty-Seventh Street, N.Y.C. 10019 (212) CIrcle 7-4510
R.A. Florio, Executive Director

The 108th Regular session continues to May 28. Students may register at any time. Tuition is on a monthly basis. There are no entrance requirements. Part-time as well as full-time registration. All instruction is directed to the individual. Life models in most classes. 55 instructors with national reputations as professional artists. A.M., P.M., Late P.M. and Evening classes, Monday through Friday. One and two evening a week classes. Saturday classes for children and adults. The League accepts students of any race, color, religion or national or ethnic origin. Write or telephone for free, illustrated catalogue. Summer School begins in June.

Drawing, Painting, Sculpture, Fine Arts Illustration, Mural Painting, Portrait Painting, Landscape, Anatomy for Artists, Perspective, Watercolor, Graphics (Etching, Engraving, Silkscreen, Woodcut, Lithography), Abstract Art, etc.

CARL
ANDRE
1 through 26 March 1983

PETER CAMPUS
5 March through 2 April

PAULA COOPER GALLERY
155 Wooster Street New York 212 674.0766

PREMIERE EXHIBITION OF VICTOR PESCE / PAINTINGS / MARCH
JAY SWIFT / SCULPTURE / MARCH

OSCARSSON HOOD
GALLERY
41 WEST 57TH ST., NYC
(212) 750-8640

PRIME EVIDENCE:

Exhibit A
233 E. Ontario Street Chicago, Illinois 60611 312-944-1748

OPPORTUNITY FOR ARTISTS

The Tampa Museum is seeking for a major exhibition works of art in all styles and mediums on the subject of sports, game or recreation in America.

For information write or call:
Senior Curator

THE TAMPA
MUSEUM 601 Doyle Carlton Drive • Tampa, FL., 33602 •(813) 223-8130

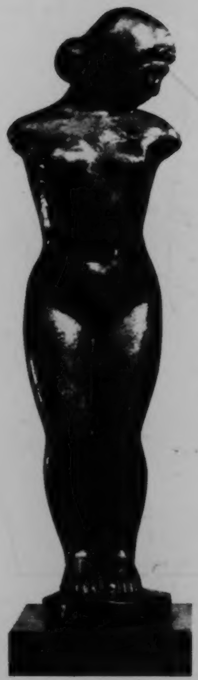
VOL
7
1

ISS
3

MR

1983

UMI



ARISTIDE MAILLOL, 1861 - 1944, "CATALANE", 1930 BRONZE, 2 OF 6, 11½ x 3¼ x 3¼ INCHES

DOMINION GALLERY
1438 Sherbrooke St. West, Montreal H3G 1K4
514-845-7471 and 7833

DUBINS GALLERY

JON CARSMAN

Watercolors

March 19 - April 15, 1983

DUBINS GALLERY
11948 San Vicente Blvd. Los Angeles, CA 90049 (213) 820-1409

THE B. Z. WAGMAN GALLERY
CELEBRATES ITS OPENING WITH AN EXHIBITION OF NEW GLASS SCULPTURE BY

JOEL PHILIP MYERS
WILLIAM CARLSON

MARCH 5-MARCH 26, 1983

B. Z. WAGMAN
GALLERY

34 NORTH BRENTWOOD
ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI 63105
314 721-0250

Joshua
Neustein
Joshua
Neustein

Paintings 81-83

Herbert F. Johnson
Museum of Art

Cornell University
Ithaca, New York
March 16 - April 17

Chicago International Art 1983 Exposition

2RC Showroom/Rome • 369 Gallery/Edinburgh • Alice Adam Ltd./Chicago • Pam Adler Gallery/New York • Agenzia d' Arte Moderna/Rome • Brooke Alexander Inc./New York • Gallery Paule Anglim/San Francisco • Gallery Yves Arman/New York • Barbara Balkin Gallery/Chicago • Jacques Baruch Gallery/Chicago • John Berggruen Gallery/San Francisco • Galerie Claude Bernard/Paris • Karen & Jean Bernier/Athens • Roy Boyd Gallery/Chicago Braunstein/Quay Gallery/San Francisco • Timothy Burns Gallery/St. Louis • Leo Castelli Gallery/New York Leo Castelli Graphics/New York • Jan Cicero Gallery/Chicago • Cirrus Gallery/Los Angeles • ConStruct/Chicago Paula Cooper Gallery/New York • James Corcoran Gallery/Los Angeles • Charles Cowles Gallery/New York Crown Point Press/Oakland, CA • Dart Gallery/Chicago • Maxwell Davidson Gallery/New York • Delahunty Gallery/Dallas • Marianne Deson Gallery/Chicago • Terry Dintenfass Gallery/New York • Dobrick Gallery/Chicago • Linda Durham Gallery/Santa Fe • Andre Emmerich Gallery/New York • Exhibit A/Chicago • Fairweather Hardin/Chicago Linda Farris Gallery/Seattle • Feigenson Gallery/Detroit • Fendrick Gallery/Washington DC • Robert Freidus Gallery/New York • Allan Frumkin Gallery/New York • Allan Frumkin Photographs/Chicago • Frumkin & Struve Gallery/Chicago • Fuller/Goldeen Gallery/San Francisco • Gemini GEL/Los Angeles • Getler/Pall/New York • Gimpel & Weitzenhoffer Gallery/New York • Barbara Gladstone Gallery/New York • Goldman's Art Gallery/Haifa, Israel James Goodman Gallery/New York • Richard Gray Gallery/Chicago • Greenberg Gallery/St. Louis • Galerie Karsten Greve/Cologne • Patricia Heesy Gallery/New York • Nancy Hoffman Gallery/New York • Hokin/Kaufman Gallery/Chicago • Vivian Horan/New York • Max Hutchinson Gallery/New York • Galerie Grita Insam/Vienna • Ivory/Kimpton Gallery/San Francisco • Jacobson/Hochman Gallery/New York • Sidney Janis Gallery/New York • Janus Gallery/Los Angeles • R.S. Johnson International/Chicago • Annely Juda Fine Art/London • Douglas Kenyon Inc./Chicago Galerie Rudolf Kicken/Cologne • Phyllis Kind Gallery/Chicago • Klein Gallery/Chicago • Monique Knowlton Gallery/New York • Galerie Sabine Knust/Munich • B.R. Kornblatt Gallery/Washington DC • Lakeside Studio/Lakeside, MI Lahumiere/Paris • R.M. Light & Co./Santa Barbara, CA • Galerie Linssen/Bonn • Galerie Maeght/Paris • Marisa del Re Gallery/New York • Kathryn Markel Fine Arts/New York • Barbara Mathes Gallery/New York • Galerie Denise Rene Hans Mayer/Düsseldorf • David McKee Gallery/New York • Moody Gallery/Houston • Donald F. Morris Gallery/Birmingham, MI • Multiples/Marian Goodman Gallery/New York • Pace Editions/New York • Galerie Alice Pauli/Lausanne, Switzerland • Judith L. Posner & Assoc. Inc./Milwaukee • Galeria Joan Prats/Barcelona • Galerie Redies/Herrischried, West Germany • Betsy Rosenfield Gallery/Chicago • Dorothy Rosenthal Gallery/Chicago • Schellmann + Kluser/Munich • Robert Schoelkopf Gallery/New York • Thomas Segal Gallery/Boston • Semaphore Gallery/New York • Galerie Seroussi/Paris • Siegel Contemporary Art/New York • Galerie Skulima/Berlin • Holly Solomon Gallery/New York • Carl Solway Gallery/Cincinnati • Samuel Stein Fine Arts, Ltd./Chicago • John C. Stoller & Co./Minneapolis • Tamarind Institute/Albuquerque • Tasende Gallery/La Jolla, CA • Carol Taylor Art/Dallas • Barbara Toll Fine Arts/New York • Tortue Gallery/Santa Monica, CA • Tyler Graphics Ltd./Bedford, NY • van Straaten Gallery/Chicago • Daniel Varenne/Geneva • Vermillion Editions Ltd./Minneapolis • Galeria Fernando Vijande/Madrid Waddington Graphics/London • Galerie Watari/Tokyo • John Weber Gallery/New York • Stephen Wirtz Gallery/San Francisco • Young/Hoffman Gallery/Chicago • Sonia Zaks Gallery/Chicago • Galerie Renee Ziegler/Zurich Zolla/Lieberman Gallery/Chicago

May 19-24, 1983
Navy Pier, Chicago USA

For further information:
Chicago International Art Exposition
Chicago International Art Exposition
600 North McClurg Court
Chicago, Illinois 60611 USA
Telephone 312.787.6858

CIAE

A Project of the Lakeside Group

VOL 7 1 ISS 3 M R 1983 UMI

GREAT NORTHERN

INSURANCE SPECIALISTS TO THE ART WORLD

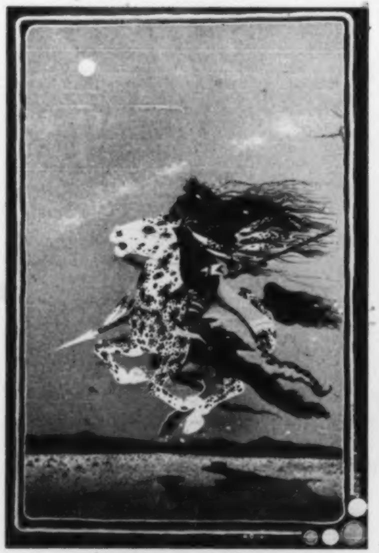
GALLERIES · COLLECTORS
MUSEUMS · PUBLISHERS
AUCTION HOUSES

INQUIRIES INVITED

950 THIRD AVENUE NEW YORK, N.Y. 10022 (212)371-2800

TRADITIONS & TRANSFORMATIONS
AMERICAN INDIAN ART

MARCH 6 - APRIL 17



"Basin Rider" - Robby McMurty

Somerstown Studios & Gallery
Route 100, Somers, NY 10589 • 914-277-3461 • Open 1-5:30 daily

Chautauqua '83
Summer
Scholarships, $125,000
available!

Be part of the Chautauqua experience this summer. Study and exhibit at the Chautauqua Art Center with the finest professionals. After studies enjoy exhibits, concerts, opera, popular entertainers, plays and all the fun a lakeside resort implies. Full term programs (June 27-August 19) in the art center facilities.

Robert Gilson, Coordinator.

Apply now! Portfolio reviews now in progress.
1983 Summer Scholarships awarded by application and portfolio.

Chautauqua V
Rush information about the Art Center.
Name ____
Address ____
City ____ State ____ Zip ____
Chautauqua Institution, Schools Office
1233 Colonnade Bldg., Chautauqua, NY 14722

MASTERPIECE

Artistic Oil and Watercolor Brushes

103 Central Ave.
P.O. Box 1467
Clifton, NJ 07015
(201) 546-1200

BLOSSOM FESTIVAL SCHOOL
KENT STATE UNIVERSITY

Intensive Four Week Program:June 20 - July 15

Visiting Artists: MIRIAM SCHAPIRO
RAY PARKER

Resident Faculty: MORTON GROSSMAN

Scholarships Available Undergraduate and Graduate Credit
Non-Credit Students and Professional Artists Welcome

Painting
SUMMER 1983

For Complete Information:

Contact Blossom Festival School
School of Art
Kent State University
Kent, Ohio 44242
(216) 672-2192

KAREN BRAUTIGAM

NEW PAINTINGS

DAVIDSON COLLEGE ART GALLERY MARCH

PRINTWORLD

☐ 10,000 print listings
☐ 800 top artists profiles
☐ 600 photos ☐ 600 pages

NEW WORK IN PROGRESS!!!!

PRINTWORLD DIRECTORY is unique! It is the only print/price catalog with complete documentation of limited edition prints.

PRINTWORLD DIRECTORY quotes the market price of current & sold out editions. It also lists awards, exhibits, publishers, etc.

Pre-publication offer ends April 30, 1983. Money-back guarantee if not completely satisfied.

1983-84 PRINTWORLD DIRECTORY

PRINTWORLD DIRECTORY is a "must" reference for anyone actively involved in the print marketplace . . . an invaluable guide for galleries, collectors, appraisers, collectors, libraries, etc. Send for your copy today! Save!

COVER PRICE $49.95
PRE-PUB PRICE $35.00
1982 EDITION $35.00

Postage/Handling: $5. USA—$10. Outside USA
NAME ____________
ADDRESS ____________
VISA/MC # ____________ EXP ______

P.O. Box 785 • Bala Cynwyd, PA 19004 (215) 649-5140

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
M R
1983
UMI

(Advertisement)

AESTHETICS AND BUSINESS...

a delicate balance.

Stalls, lights, people...

ART EXPO NY, THE world's largest and most successful fine art fair, believes that these expositions show how modern marketing techniques have achieved an important place in the art world today.

Art fairs not only make art news, whether in New York, Basel, Paris, Chicago or Venice—they often make art history. In 1912, Duchamp's "Nude Descending Staircase" was shown for the first time at an art fair in New York.

Art fairs represent the art of good business by supplying dealers and consumers with what they want—at a price they can afford—in a low-pressure atmosphere. At art fairs, learning and selecting from a wide variety—that rivals most museums—can add pleasure to business.

Art fairs are recognized by the trade as an unparalleled outlet for attracting and developing new art collectors. They give experienced art-lovers their chance to discover emerging talent—and art-newcomers to buy their first works.

On a dealer level, the tremendous volume and selection opportunities under one roof eliminate time and travel expenses otherwise required to view so much art.

> Art fairs...give experienced art-lovers their chance to discover emerging talent—and art-newcomers to buy their first works.

For the interior designer, the corporate art buyer, the gallery owner and the museum curator, art fairs provide a means to deal directly with sources.

For everyone, art fairs are a vehicle for broadening horizons.

Art expo NY '83, April 7–11 at the New York Coliseum, will mark its fifth consecutive year with some 300 exhibitors from more than 20 countries.

For the attendees there will be special programs, seminars and events not only introducing the newest ideas in art but also reporting on the business of art.

Special programs will reflect Art expo NY as the U.N. of Art, with examples as wide-ranging as Eskimo, African, Japanese and Indian art.

The 1983 seminars will discuss strategies for gallery directors, creative concepts in gallery marketing, corporate art buying in the 80s, art in public places, collecting contemporary art, print-buying and functional art.

There will be first-time exhibits of celebrity art, films on Alberto Giacometti, Alexander Calder, Jean Tinguely and Marcel Duchamp, plus workshops by the authorities of Pratt Institute, an intriguing exhibit of functional art as the newest highlight of interior design, and a separate Japanese culture exhibit.

New York City Mayor Edward I. Koch has proclaimed the week of Art expo "Art Week in New York" in recognition of the success of this fair (75,000 visitors in 1982) in attracting record numbers to the city.

Says Art expo director Gerald Leberfeld, "Art expo NY reflects the modern goals of the art world today—to bring art into the lives of more people and to instill successful business values into the art communities."

Art fairs are the state-of-the-art opportunities of the 80s. ■

Collectors pause to consider...to buy

Art expo NY will be held this year Thursday April 7, 11am-7pm (for the trade only), Friday April 8 & Saturday April 9, 11am-8pm, Sunday April 10, 11am-7pm, and Monday April 11, 10am-4pm, at the New York Coliseum.

Yale University School of Art
Summer Programs 1983

Yale Graphic Design Summer Program

18 June – 25 July* Brissago, Switzerland
Room, board, tuition, study trips
$2,500.00 Intensive graphic design program 3 credits

Admissions Deadline 1 April 1983

Obtain application from:
Registrar, Yale School of Art
180 York Street
New Haven Ct 06520
203–436–4380

Yale Summer Programs in Art

20 June – 12 August New Haven, Connecticut
Tuition and fees $575 per course
3 credits Sculpture*, Photography,
Drawing, Graphic Design, Printmaking
Campus residency available
For application and information on other Yale Summer courses please contact
Summer Programs Office
Box 2145 Yale Station
New Haven, Ct 06520
203–436–4217

2

2nd Edition!
Available March, 1983

Directory of Corporate Art Collections

An indispensable reference tool for arts councils, arts administrators, museums, libraries, art dealers, art consultants and artists.

Save hours of research time by using this up-to-date resource directory. Provides you with information on over 350 corporate art collections

- over 50 totally new corporations
- contact person, address and phone
- description of the collection
- size and location of the collections
- cross indexes by state and personnel
- and much more

Pre-publication price of $29⁰⁰ each plus shipping and handling until February 15, 1983. $35⁰⁰ thereafter.
postage paid on prepaid orders

International Art Alliance,
P.O. Box 1608, Largo, Florida 34294 813-581-7328

1983

SummerVail Workshop

for art and critical studies

June 20 - August 5
One-Week Workshops in:

Hot & Flat Glass
Enameling
Metalsmithing & Jewelry
Blacksmithing
Sculpture
Fibers & Surface Design
Drawing & Painting
Photography
Master Lithography Sessions
Children's Classes

For More Information Contact:
Director, Summervail Workshop
P.O. Box 117
Minturn, CO. 81645
(303) 827-5703

Landscape Painting Program in the Delaware Water Gap

Kittatinny Mountains of western New Jersey

3rd year in cooperation with Artists for Environment Foundation

Raoul Middleman, artist-in-residence plus visiting artists and guest faculty

2 sessions: June 7-July 1 and July 5-July 29; 6 bachelor or master's credits per session
Partial scholarships; spaces limited $1100 per session includes: tuition, room and board, NYC field trips

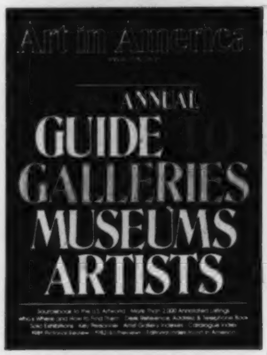
For more information:
Summer Programs
Maryland Institute, College of Art
1300 W. Mount Royal Avenue
Baltimore, Maryland 21217
(301) 669-9200, ext. 219

Summer 1983

Maryland Institute, College of Art

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

ESSENTIAL ACQUISITION.



This remarkable record of the what, who, when and where of a full year of Art in America has just become THE first source of the entire American art world. If you don't have it yet, we suggest you order two copies. One for yourself and one for your friends to borrow.

It's uniquely informative, comprehensive and easy to use. And much too useful to remain a secret long. That's why you'll want to keep an extra copy of Art In America's new ANNUAL GUIDE on hand.

Whether you are artist, exhibitor, critic or connoisseur, you'll find yourself referring to the GUIDE almost daily. Because it lists all the gallery and museum showings for the year, plus a complete index to Art in America itself, you'll count on it to refresh your memory on the past year's major and minor showings. . . to keep up with today's most important talents. . .even to plan your travel itinerary to make sure you don't miss a single exhibition or gallery you want to catch.

And because it's the only complete reference to every one-person showing in the country last year, you'll find the GUIDE to be the most popular resource on your shelf. . .for your friends and associates as well as yourself.

As a special edition of Art in America, the Guide is available to you by mail for only $5.95 per copy, plus postage. So why not do your friends—and yourself—a favor? Order additional copies now, while supplies are complete. It could be your most important art acquisition of the whole year!

Use the coupon below to order your copies.

Art in America

Mail to: Art in America Annual Guide 850 Third Avenue, New York, NY 10022

YES. Send me ______ copies of the ANNUAL GUIDE at the cover price of only $5.95 each, plus postage.* My check or money order for $____________ is enclosed.

Name (please print) ____________________

Address ____________________

City ________ State ________ Zip ________

*Postage cost for this 300-page edition—$1.50 per copy.

EC 306

"SMALLWORKS '83"
National Art Competition

University of Massachusetts
Amherst, Massachusetts

University of Massachusetts
Arts Council

16" × 16" in any direction

Nancy Hoffman

(Director, Nancy Hoffman Gallery,
New York City)

and

Vivien Raynor

(Staff Art Critic, New York Times)

$3,000—cash and merchandise awards

Deadline: MAY 27, 1983

For prospectus write to "Art Competition", c/o Central Mail Room, Goodell Building, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, MA 01003 or call (413) 545-2803/4

NEW ART INSTRUCTION BOOKS

KEYS TO acrylics & watercolor

At last, an up-to-date, contemporary library of art instruction. These books represent the collective efforts of one of the largest, most talented professional art staffs in the country—over 250 artists and designers.

Written and illustrated for ease of understanding, this series not only covers the basics, but reveals professional secrets to ease the trial and error period experienced by the amateur and semi-professional. And each book is loaded with color.

Books included in this series are: Basic Drawing, Color, Perspective, Still Life, Animal Drawing, Portraits, Floral Painting, Seascapes, Landscapes, Oil Painting, Sketching, and Acrylic and Watercolor. Now there is a better way. High quality at a great price. Suggested retail—$2.99 each.

Prepared by The Skylight Division of

shiva®

4320 West 190th Street, Torrance, CA 90509 • (800) 421-1325/(213) 542-5583

CONNOISSEUR

has moved to America with Thomas Hoving as its Editor-in-Chief

Mirror-c. 1765-Philadelphia ·
Bernard and S. Dean Levy, Inc.

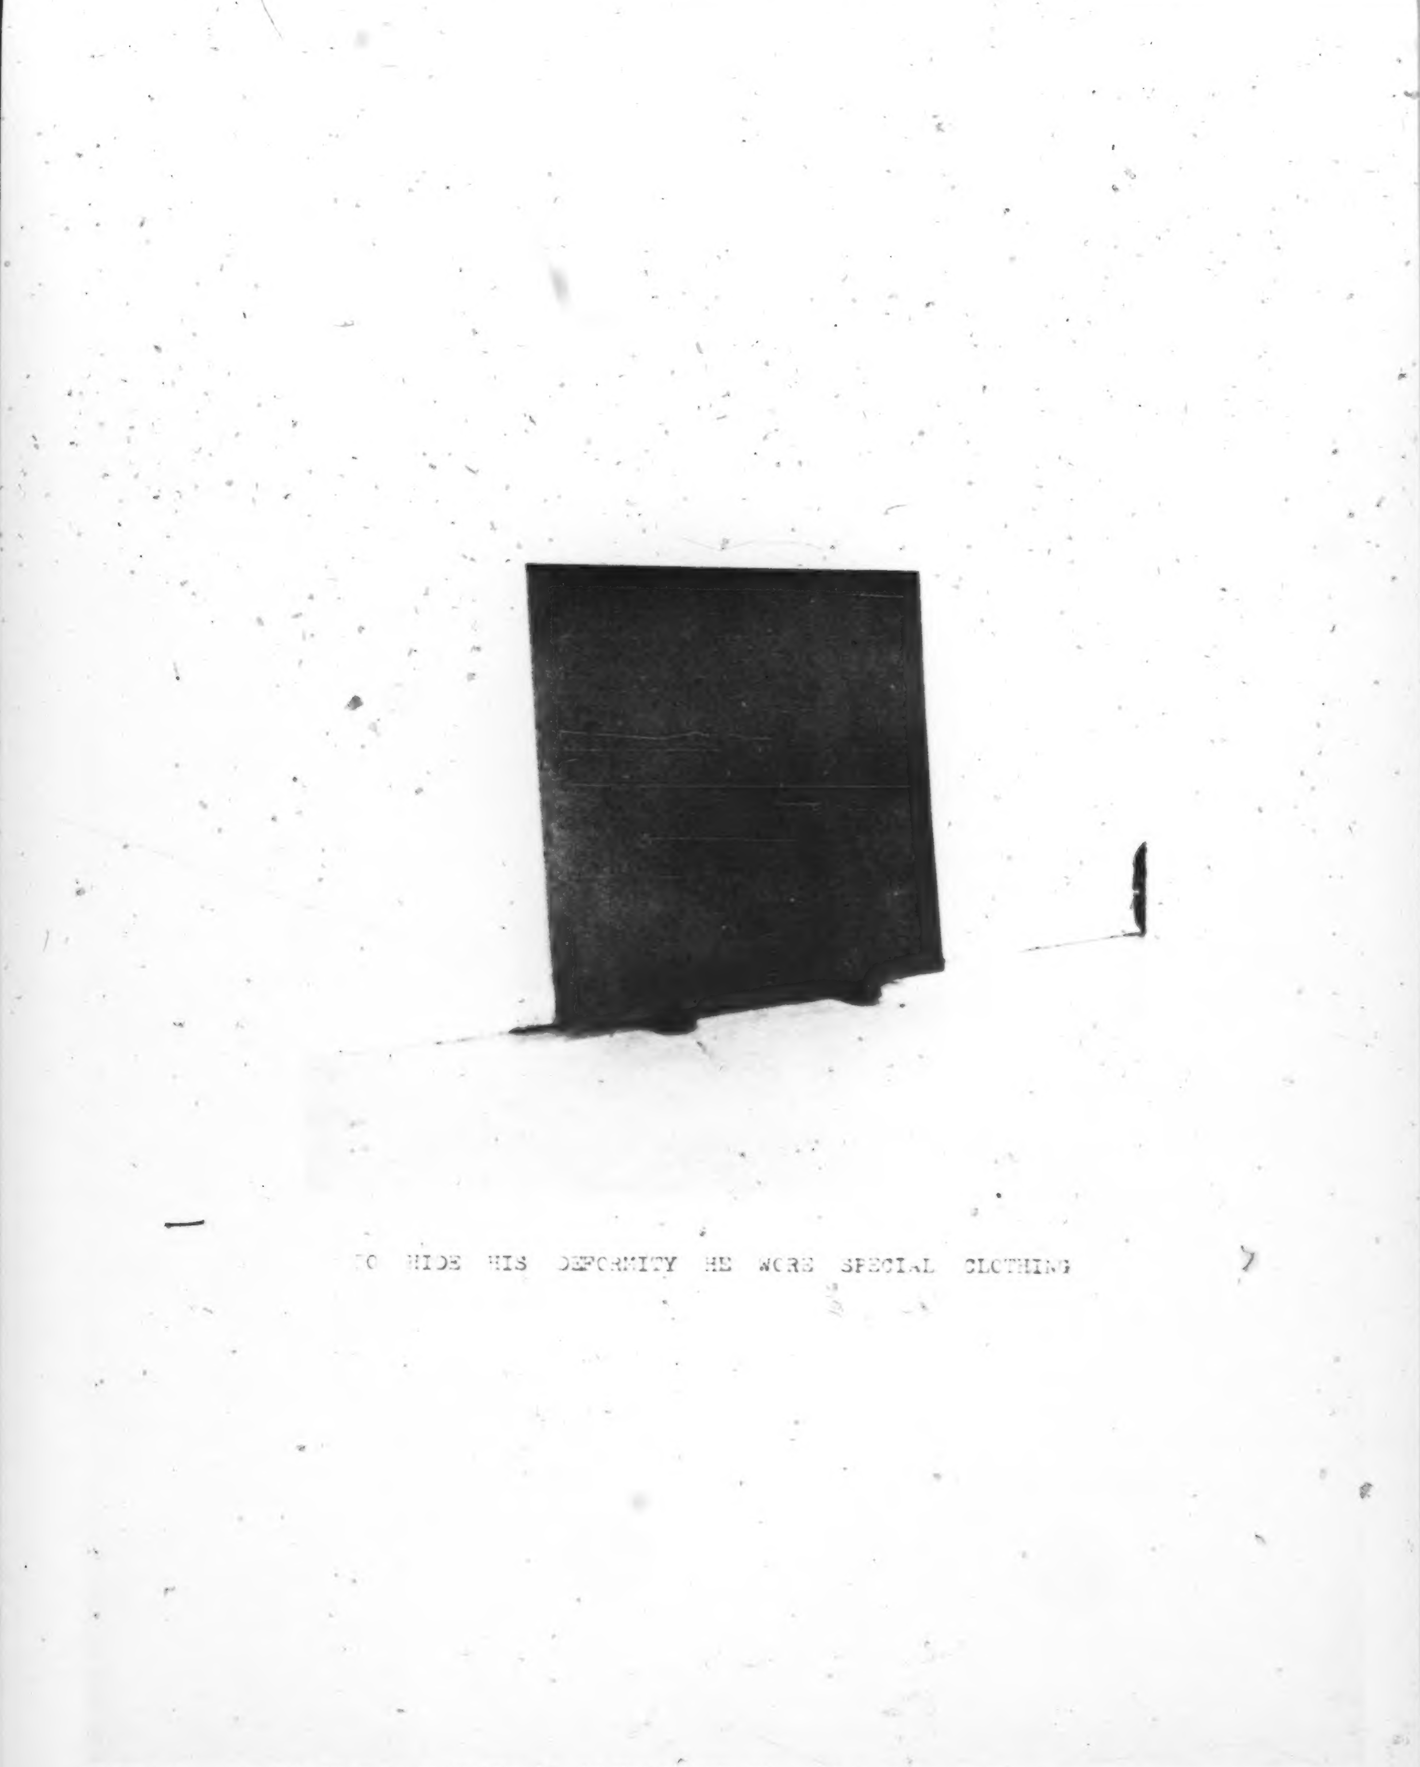
CONNOISSEUR

the magazine for people with a passion for the best

Pick up CONNOISSEUR at better newsstands or call (800) 247-5470. In Iowa call (800) 532-1272.

A publication of Hearst Magazines a division of The Hearst Corporation. © 1983 The Hearst Corporation

VOL 71 ISS 3 MR 1983 UMI



TO HIDE HIS DEFORMITY HE WORE SPECIAL CLOTHING

William Wegman: To Hide His Deformity He Wore Special Clothing, 1971, black-and-white photograph, 14 by 11 inches. Holly Solomon Gallery.

Art in America

William Wegman's Psychoanalytic Vaudeville

William Wegman's current traveling retrospective tends to present the artist as a contemporary master; yet Wegman's work has been marked from the very beginning by a deliberate refusal of mastery.

BY CRAIG OWENS

> Certain essential aspects of the world are accessible only to laughter. —Mikhail Bakhtin
> Rabelais and His World

A retrospective is an occasion to chart the itinerary of a career, to articulate the ends towards which it is directed and the purposes by which it is shaped—in short, to assess an artist's achievement. To speak of William Wegman's achievement, however, as his current mid-career retrospective mounted by the Walker Art Center in Minneapolis encourages us to do, is to ignore the ways in which Wegman has effectively jettisoned the whole ideology of achievement. In our culture, achievements are invariably teleological and always comport some more or less explicit idea of mastery; whereas Wegman's work—if the plurality of his works can indeed be reduced to the singularity of an oeuvre—has been characterized from the very beginning by a deliberate refusal of mastery.[1]

Until recently, Wegman worked almost exclusively in video, drawing and black-and-white photography; his works in these mediums are distinguished by their informality, artlessness, even vulnerability. Still, his refusal of mastery is not simply a matter of technique; rather it is often the explicit theme of his works, which speak of failure more often than success, of intention thwarted rather than realized, of falling short of rather than hitting the mark.[2] Three Mistakes, for example, an early black-and-white photograph (1971–72), depicts three puddles of milk next to three empty glasses, while a photo-diptych from the same period demonstrates the technique of X-Ray Photography: The first shot, captioned "How It's Done," explains the setup (Wegman attempting to photograph a female model through what appears to be a lead plate); the second, a photograph of the plate, is captioned "The Finished Product (Unsuccessful)."

In neither of these works does failure produce a melancholic sense of frustration or defeat, as it does in the work of so many of the younger artists whom Wegman clearly has influenced. Rather, if his work posits an essential powerlessness, it is one which can continually be traversed and enjoyed, and from which something can be carried away in the end. (Thus, from 1975 through '79 he executed a series of altered photographs, in which he capitalizes on his own mistakes, drawing directly onto overexposed or poorly developed prints, thereby salvaging what might otherwise have to be abandoned.)

This aspect of Wegman's activity is reminiscent of that of the late Roland Barthes; as Paul Smith writes in a recent essay on Barthes's last texts:

> Barthes was never a master, would never have wanted to be one. . . . In his project of decomposing the certainties and fixities of a kingly structure, our culture, Barthes acts almost as that most trifling value in the game, the pawn who makes relentless forays against the space of the king—classical, doxical, scientific, masculine space as that is in our inherited culture. And to the extent that this is a specifically disruptive gambit, it concerns us all.[3]

Barthes's weapon in this subversive activity was, of course, écriture, writing; Wegman's is laughter. He uses it to undermine all belief, to dislodge all certainty, to discredit all dogma.

> The serious aspects of class culture are official and authoritarian; they are combined with violence, prohibitions, limitations and always contain an element of fear and intimidation. . . . Laughter, on the contrary, overcomes fear, for it knows no inhibitions, no limitations. Its idiom is never used by violence and authority.
> —Bakhtin

Wegman himself acknowledges the link between laughter and nonmastery in his work: "As soon as I got funny," he is quoted in the Walker catalogue, "I killed any majestic intentions in my work." Still, the Walker retrospective tends to minimize this aspect of his activity. Perhaps any retrospective would have done the same, but here this problem is compounded by the unjustifiable omission of Wegman's videotapes, in which his refusal of mastery is most explicit. Neither the 20-minute compilation tape titled—debatably—The Best of Wegman, nor Kim

VOL 71 ISS 3 MR 1983 UMI

Toddler Holds Couple Hostage, 1975, ink on paper, 8 ½ by 11 inches. Collection Holly and Horace Solomon, New York.

Contemplating Art, Life and Photography, 1975–79, ink on black-and-white photo.

Fence, 1978, ink on black-and-white photograph, 18 ⅛ by 18 inches.

William James, n.d., ink on paper, 8 ½ by 11 inches. All photos this page courtesy Holly Solomon Gallery.

Levin's catalogue essay on Wegman's video are adequate substitutes for the tapes themselves, which often narrate the failure of his attempts to impose himself on, and at the expense of, his pet Weimaraner Man Ray.

What the Walker retrospective does include is a disproportionately large selection of the large-format (20-by-24-inch) color Polaroids that Wegman began making in 1979. The majority of these pictures are of Man Ray, either in distinctly human situations—Ray and Mrs. Lubner in Bed Watching TV, or wearing an Indian headdress, stranded in a canoe—or transformed into another breed, even species—wrapped in tinsel to become an Airedale, or photographed upside-down as Ray Bat. Abrams has recently published a collection of the Polaroids, titled Man's Best Friend. In the introduction, Lawrence Weider relates them to Wegman's videotapes—"In single photographs, Wegman and Man Ray manage to condense the extended conceits of the video performance into one elegantly composed and articulate image"—but he also observes a (highly significant) difference: "Unlike the grainy video image, the resulting glossy color prints have the presence and uniqueness of paintings."[4]

Elegant composition, presence, uniqueness—these are precisely the values that Wegman's earlier works repudiate.

Dog Cabin, 1979, from "A Man Ray Portfolio," 1982, black-and-white photograph, 14 by 11 inches.

Until recently, Wegman has worked in video, drawing and black-and-white photography; his works in these mediums are marked by informality, artlessness, vulnerability.

But it is not simply in their technical virtuosity that the Polaroids appear to reinstate the aura of mastery that Wegman once refused; in them, Man Ray is used in an entirely different manner. For while these "masterful" images deal with the domestication of the Other—our tendency to reduce its difference to a variation of identity—in them Man Ray behaves less, as in earlier works, as a foil that deflects Wegman's designs on him, and more like a passive and submissive model. (This development is pushed further in Wegman's recent parodies of fashion photographs, in which a woman is frequently substituted for the dog.)[5]

The Polaroids appear at the conclusion of the Walker retrospective; however, many are seen at its beginning as well, in a highly professional introductory slide show (accompanied by Wegman's voice-over commentary) about Man Ray, who died in March of 1982. Framed by—suspended between—these seductive images, the retrospective appears to be working at cross-purposes: on the one hand, to commemorate Man Ray; on the other, to certify Wegman as a contemporary master.

This contradiction can be resolved, however, if Man Ray is regarded as substitute for his master; and, in a lengthy wall label, prominently displayed in the galleries and reprinted in the catalogue, this is exactly what curator Lisa Lyons proposes:

> Did Wegman regard Man Ray as an alter ego of sorts? Not exactly forthcoming on this point, he simply says that by using Ray he was able to diffuse the narcissism that is so often an element of conceptually oriented video and photography. That may be so, yet it is undeniable that Ray often appears as a surrogate for human presence in Wegman's work.

"It is undeniable . . ."—such certainty seems very un-Wegman-like. Wegman's statement is as follows: "There's always the risk in video of putting yourself on TV, being narcissistic. I think Man Ray diverted all that." So Lyons attributes to Wegman precisely what he himself denies—the narcissistic identification with an other, through which the ego is constituted as a (libidinal) object:

> The ego takes its place by taking the place of the other, by replacing that other within itself and by seeking to deprive it of its alterity. One of the most powerful forms this process can take is precisely the desire to rediscover the same, to repeat, to recognize, and thus to transform a movement of difference into one of identity.[6]

The narcissistic ego attempts to assimilate, to appropriate, to master the other, treating it as a mere extension of itself. But this is precisely what Wegman refuses to do—at least prior to 1979.

> Laughter purifies from dogmatism, from the intolerant and the petrified; it liberates from fanaticism and pedantry, from fear and intimidation, from didacticism, naïveté and illusion, from the single meaning, the single level, from sentimentality. Laughter does not permit seriousness to atrophy and to be torn away from the one being, forever incomplete. It restores this ambivalent wholeness. Such is the function of laughter in the historical development of culture and literature.
> —Bakhtin

Wegman's refusal of mastery reveals his historical filiation with Minimalism—Minimalist performance in particular, with its assault on the exhibitionism of traditional performance modes. "The display of technical virtuosity," Yvonne Rainer wrote in 1966, "of the dancer's specialized body, no longer makes any sense." Significantly, Rainer rejected such display as introverted, self-congratulatory, narcissistic; in its place she advocated "a context wherein people are engaged in making a less spectacular demand on the body and in which skill is hard to locate."[7]

In works of the early '70s, Wegman constructs just such a context. This was, of course, a time when many site-specific and ephemeral art works were being reinserted into the circuit of commercial distribution and exchange via photography, and many of Wegman's early photographs and videotapes pose as documentation—even though Wegman's performances were executed only for the camera. Sometimes he deals

VOL 71 ISS 3 MR 1983 UMI

Slick Figure, 1978, ink on black-and-white photograph, 9 ¾ by 12 ¼ inches.

Ray-O-Vac, 1972, 6 black-and-white photographs, 10 ⅝ by 13 inches each. Sonnabend Gallery.

Untitled ("John Chamberlain Piece"), 1980, 2 color Polaroids, 24 by 20 inches each. Private collection.

with the photographic packaging of the artistic personality: in the brief video sequence "Stomach Song," as well as in a pair of black-and-white photographs Drinking Milk (1971) he parodies the narcissistic conceits of "body art" and its substitution of the artist's body for the esthetic object (Acconci in particular comes to mind). In both works Wegman presents his own bare torso, cropped at shoulders and waist, as a face—nipples becomes eyes, and the navel a mouth, through which he either sings or drinks milk with a straw.

Although Wegman "comes out" of Minimalism, many of his early works were conceived as parodies of specific Minimalist practices and, more generally, of their austerity, reductiveness, humorlessness. A 1971 photograph of a sheet of masonite propped against a wall (reminiscent of Richard Serra's prop pieces from the late '60s) includes a pair of shoes protruding from underneath, as well as the caption "To Hide His Deformity He Wore Special Clothing." Building a Box (also 1971), nine photographs displayed as a grid, parodies process-oriented sculpture (Robert Morris's Box with the Sound of Its Own Making comes to mind), as well as the systemic and/or serial concerns of artists like Andre, Bochner and LeWitt. (The last is also the target of several works involving Man Ray in serial poses: Stormy Night, Ray-O-Vac, Permutations: Before/On/After.)

The structure of these works seems at least as significant as the practices they parody. For a parody is a dialogue; as Bakhtin observes, "In parody, two languages [the one being parodied, and the one that parodies] are crossed with each other, as well as two styles, two linguistic points of view and, in the final analysis, two speaking subjects."[8] Structured as a conversation, parody is dialogical; it narrates an artist's encounter with another work, another text, another subject.

If, in the works mentioned above, Wegman encounters other artistic practices, in a number of other works from the same period he engages with the spectator. A 1970 photograph of a stuffed parrot, for example, is improbably captioned Crow. This picture is not about the incommensurability of words and images; Wegman is not Magritte. Rather, he presents what initially appears to be a seamless, entirely plausible image of reality that turns out, on closer inspection, to be fundamentally duplicitous. For the shadow cast by the stuffed bird is not the shadow of a parrot at all, but of a crow. What we witness, in this work, is not the (narcissistic) reduction of difference to identity, but rather the emergence of difference out of apparent sameness.

In other works—Madam I'm Adam, which Wegman describes as a visual palindrome, and Chairs (both 1970)—what appear to be two identical photographs are exhibited side by side; they are not the same at all, however, but opposites—because one of the prints has been flopped. Wegman frequently employs such reversals and inversions (Upside-Down Plywood, 1972)—Bakhtin described parody as "the world inside-out"[9]—to seduce the viewer, to lead him astray, and thus to force him to recognize his (narcissistic) desire to perceive analogies, similarities, resemblances.

Insofar as the position of the spectator is inscribed, in these works, within the scenario they seek to tell, Wegman's art retains certain affinities with Minimalism. A Minimalist installation also denies the spectator any transcendental viewpoint outside the work, from which it can be viewed as a meaningful, self-contained object against which he can situate himself as an equally meaningful, self-contained subject. What distinguishes Wegman's work is his (re)introduction of narrative—the

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

Elephant, 1981, color Polaroid, 24 by 20 inches. Fraenkel Gallery, San Francisco.

third person—into the intersubjective artist-viewer dyad. The appearance of this third term diverts both the artist's and the spectator's attempts reciprocally to constitute themselves as self-contained subjects, revealing instead their dependency upon an other they can never fully master or assimilate. And this third "person" was Man Ray.

> [Man Ray] takes a lot of pressure off me. It's like having a third person in a conversation; one of you doesn't have to talk all of the time.
> —Wegman

> A joke is the most social of all the mental functions that aim at a yield of pleasure. It often calls for three persons and its completion requires the participation of someone else in the mental process it starts. —Sigmund Freud
> Jokes and Their Relation to the Unconscious

In the Walker catalogue, Lisa Lyons writes that Wegman's art deals with such themes as "transference of identity" and "the realm of the irrational." Transference, irrationality—these are, of course, subjects investigated by psychoanalysis, and Wegman's involvement with them locates his works within a distinctly psychoanalytic (as opposed to psychological) space. The videotapes, in fact, are a psychoanalytic vaudeville played out within the classic scene of imaginary identification: although he faces the camera directly, Wegman never looks directly into it, but off to one side, at his own image in an off-screen monitor. Positioned as both subject and object of the look, he reenacts the narcissistic fantasy of simultaneously occupying two positions, of being in two places at the same time.

The identification of the subject with his image is incomplete, however (as Jacques Lacan demonstrates in his famous analysis of this same scenario in his commentaries on the mirror stage), without the intervention of a third person, who grants this image to the subject: "In Lacan's mirror stage the infant is fixed, constrained in a representation which the infant believes to be the Other's, the mother's, image of [him or] her."[10] In Wegman's videotapes, this function falls to the spectator, whom the artist solicits as an accomplice in his narcissistic attempt to consolidate himself as an autonomous, self-contained ego. (Significantly, the image Wegman contemplates in the off-screen monitor is identical to the spectator's image of him.)

Enter Man Ray, who, as Wegman remarks, "diverted all that."

Is it merely coincidental that the first photograph of Man Ray to appear in the exhibition depicts a Dog Dream? (Man Ray sleeps on a sofa, while a stuffed alligator preys upon a stuffed squirrel.) Freud, of course, identified the dream as the "royal road" to the unconscious; but he also designated another mode of access, one that is somewhat less regal—the joke. Jokes, too, depend upon the intervention of a third person. If, as Freud argues in his celebrated study of Jokes and Their Relation to the Unconscious, the distinguishing feature of a joke is the "explosive laughter" it produces; and, further, if we can never laugh at our own jokes (except, Freud adds, par ricochet); then the power to decide the fate of the joke resides not with the person who tells it, but with the person who listens.[11] Thus, Freud describes the joke as a scene with three protagonists: an exhibitionistically inclined first person, who tells the joke ("the motive force for the production of innocent jokes is not infrequently an ambitious urge to show one's cleverness, to display oneself—an instinct that may be equated with exhibitionism in the sexual field");[12] a second person, the object of the joke (who need not be a person at all, but an idea which is unacceptable to consciousness); and, finally, a voyeuristically inclined "third person," whose laughter completes the mental process initiated by the first.

This trio makes its first appearance in Freud's analysis of obscene jokes, which, Freud contends, originate in a failed attempt at seduction. The joke

With Dogs and Babies/Actor's Nightmare, 1981, color Polaroid, 24 by 20 inches. Dart Gallery Inc., Chicago.

Ray Bat, 1980, color Polaroid, 24 by 20 inches. Private collection.

Sitting Airedale with Tale, 1981, color Polaroid, 24 by 20 inches. Albright-Knox Art Gallery, Buffalo.

Heels, 1981, color Polaroid, 24 by 20 inches. Collection Gifford Myers.

VOL 71 ISS 3 MR 1983 UMI

Blue Head Diptych, 1982, 2 color Polaroids, 24 by 20 inches each. Holly Solomon Gallery.

begins as an obscene remark directed at a woman with the intention of arousing her sexually. Such remarks, however, frequently meet with the woman's resistance: "The ideal case of a resistance of this kind," Freud writes, "occurs if another man is present at the same time—a third person—, for in that case an immediate surrender by the woman is as good as out of the question."[13] The third person "soon acquires the greatest importance in the development of the smut" into a joke, however, for he gradually displaces the woman as its addressee. Thus, second and third persons change positions: the man becomes a second person, while the woman becomes the object of the joke. Thus, the positions of the two men are ultimately aligned with the grammatical positions assigned by the personal pronouns "I" and "you"; while the woman assumes the position of the non-person, the "it" or, in Freudian terms, the "id."[14]

When we laugh at Man Ray's foiling of Wegman's designs, we also acknowledge the possibility of another mode of relating to the Other—based not on a denial but on a recognition of difference.

This scenario is continually reenacted in Wegman's videotapes, with Wegman as seducer, Man Ray as the other (the woman), and the spectator as "third person." Wegman frequently attempts to impose the human upon the not-human; sometimes he attempts to teach Man Ray to spell, or to smoke cigarettes, addressing him as "you." ("P-A-R-K was spelled correctly. Wait a minute. And you spelled O-U-T right.") Wegman is not, of course, attempting literally to seduce the animal, but he is encouraging his submission, acquiescence. And, as "Wait a minute" indicates, Wegman's attempts usually meet with (a greater or lesser degree of) resistance. In the mock television commercial "New and Used Car Salesman," for example, Wegman attempts to hold Man Ray on his lap—"Just as this dog trusts me, I would like you all out there to trust me and come down to our new and used car lot and buy some of our quality cars"—while Man Ray struggles to get free.

Here, it is not (as Kim Levin suggests) the "failure of words to live up to images" that is exposed, but rather the ultimate failure of the ego's narcissistic attempts to appropriate the other as one of the modes of its consciousness, of itself. As such, Man Ray comes to occupy the position of the "it"—"this dog"; in Wegman's work, then, he represents that measure of alterity that can never be fully assimilated or mastered.

But if Man Ray has assumed the position of the third person, then the spectator is simultaneously promoted to the position of the second person, and it is through the spectator's laughter that Wegman's failure is redeemed, even celebrated. And when we laugh at Man Ray's foiling of Wegman's designs, we are also acknowledging the possibility, indeed the necessity, of another, non-narcissistic mode of relating to the Other—one based not on the denial of difference, but upon its recognition. Thus, inscribed within the social space in which both Bakhtin and Freud situate laughter, Wegman's refusal of mastery is ultimately political in its implications. □

Organized by Lisa Lyons for the Walker Art Center, "Wegman's World" is currently at the Fort Worth Art Museum (through Mar. 6). It will reopen Mar. 20 at the De Cordova Museum, Lincoln, Mass. (through May 1), and then travel to the Contemporary Arts Center, Cincinnati (May 12–June 25), the Corcoran, Washington, Dusted, 1982, color Polaroid, 24 by 20 inches. Collection Gifford Myers.

D.C. (July 10–August 21) and the Newport Harbor Art Museum, Newport Beach, Calif. (Sept. 29–Nov. 29).

1. For a similar discussion of the refusal of mastery, to which my own is indebted, see Paul Smith, "We Always Fail—Barthes' Last Writings," SubStance 36 (1982), pp. 34–39.
2. In the early '70s John Baldessari, with whom Wegman has been closely associated, also executed a series of works which deliberately court esthetic error—works in which he attempted to photograph a bouncing ball so that it appeared in the middle of the frame, or four balls thrown into the air to form a straight line.
3. Smith, p. 34.
4. Lawrence Weider in William Wegman, Man's Best Friend, New York, Abrams, 1982, p. 9.
5. In the catalogue for the Walker retrospective, Lisa Lyons detects a shift in Wegman's career. Writing of Wegman's recent "Man Ray Portfolio," she observes, "Technically and stylistically, the portfolio prints may well mark the beginning of a new direction in Wegman's photography. Clearly, he has fallen under the medium's spell and, in fact, he acknowledges that he has recently become interested in the work of such masters of photography as Weston and Strand."
6. Samuel Weber, The Legend of Freud, Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1982, p. 94.
7. Yvonne Rainer, Work 1961–73, Halifax, The Press of the Nova Scotia College of Art and Design, 1974, pp. 65–66.
8. Mikhail Bakhtin, The Dialogic Imagination, Austin, University of Texas Press, 1981, p. 76.
9. Bakhtin, Rabelais and His World, Cambridge, MIT Press, 1968, p. 11.
10. Jane Gallop, Feminism and Psychoanalysis, Ithaca, Cornell University Press, 1982, p. 121.
11. Sigmund Freud, Jokes and Their Relation to the Unconscious, trans. James Strachey, New York, Norton, 1960, p. 100. Significantly, in his discussion of the psychology of the artist in the Introductory Lectures on Psychoanalysis (Lecture XXIII), Freud attributes the power to decide the success or failure of the work of art to the spectator; see my "Honor, Power and the Love of Women," A.i.A., Jan. '83, pp. 7–8.
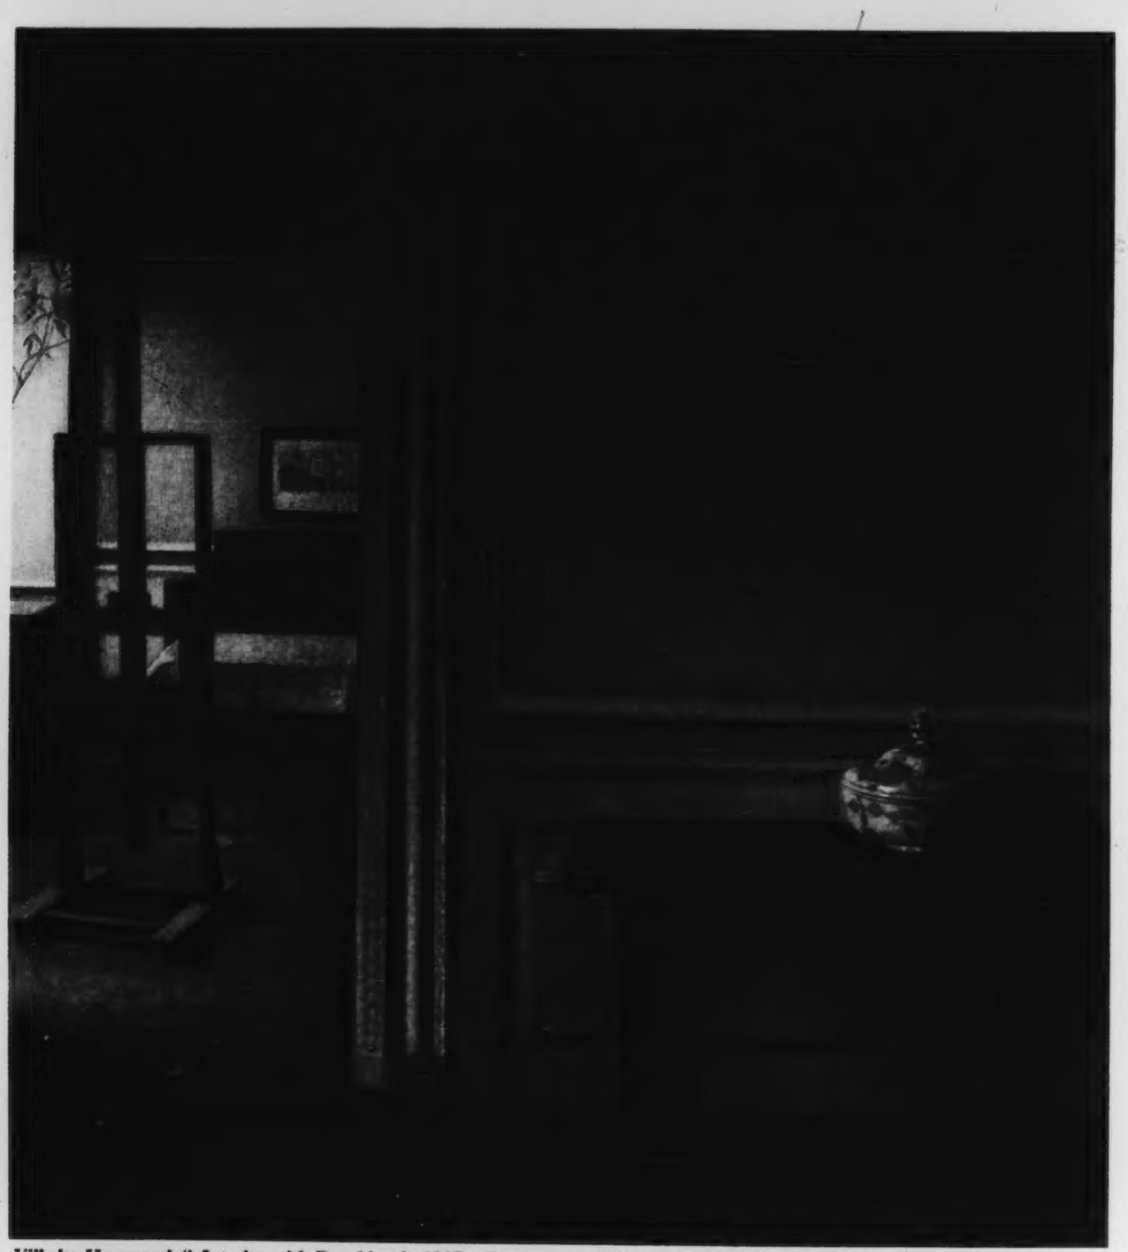
12. Ibid., p. 143.
13. Ibid., p. 99.
14. "The common definition of the personal pronouns as containing the three terms I, you and it abolishes the notion of 'person,' which belongs only to I/you, and disappears with it." Émile Benveniste, Problèmes de linguistique générale, Paris, Gallimard, 1966. Benveniste's distinction seems highly relevant to Wegman's work, which constantly stages the struggle between the personal and the nonpersonal, the self and the Other, the ego and the id.

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI



Vilhelm Hammershøi:* Interior with Punchbowl, *1907, oil on canvas, 25 by 23 inches. Private collection, Denmark.

Private Light: Hammershøi

Isolate in temperament and austere in his art, the turn-of-the-century Danish painter Vilhelm Hammershøi produced an idiosyncratic, protomodernist oeuvre largely devoted to nuanced depictions of a spare, uncluttered world.

BY KIRK VARNEDOE

Early modern art has been so encyclopedically scrutinized recently it would seem beyond hope that a turn-of-the-century painter of any substance could remain undisclosed. Yet this season brought at least one such discovery, the Dane Vilhelm Hammershøi (1864–1916). His small interior views, and one colossal group portrait, stood out in the survey exhibition "Northern Light: Realism and Symbolism in Scandinavian Painting 1880–1910" [to be reviewed in a forthcoming issue]; and a select monographic retrospective at Wildenstein, New York, of more than 70 paintings has subsequently presented a fuller picture of this singular artist. Almost without color and in apparent indifference to any trends of the avant garde, Hammershøi's paintings of 1890 to 1914 can seem presciently modern in ways that ask us to rethink our familiar models of stylistic progress—can there really have been any mileage left in naturalism in 1905?—and reexamine the possibilities of interlock and overlap between the ostensibly incommensurate domains of 19th-century Realism, fin-de-siècle Symbolism, and the spirit of 20th-century painting.

Even given Denmark's position off the high roads of art since 1880, the degree of neglect Hammershøi has suffered is surprising. His work has not been hidden in his homeland (though some of the best pictures are in private collections), but it has not been exactly trumpeted, either. The splendid comprehensive exhibition organized by Hanne Finsen at Ordrupgaard in 1981 was only the second Hammershøi show since the memorial retrospective following the artist's death. This private and rather aloof temperament seems never to have been clasped to the national heart, in the manner of Munch in Norway or numerous lesser artists in other smaller countries. In his lifetime as in recent years, foreigners have often insisted more forcefully than Danes on the quality of Hammershøi's achievement; contemporary admirers included Rainer Maria Rilke, Theodore Duret and Serge Diaghilev, but he never received the official patronage he hoped for from his countrymen.

The schema of Hammershøi's life is quickly drawn: born the son of a Copenhagen merchant in 1864, he married in 1890 and had no children. A relatively private, indeed semi-reclusive, life was punctuated by regular trips abroad, principally to England, France, the Netherlands, and Italy—all of which weighed more heavily for him in their monuments and museums than in their contemporary life and art. His development as an artist seems superficially without incident, as he arrived at a mature personal idiom quite early—indeed he could be said to have been practicing something like an old man's art by the age of 35—and stayed within a narrow range of subject, color and technique all his life. A closer acquaintance with the oeuvre, though (particularly at first hand, for much of the message of these "simple" pictures lies in subtleties that defy reproduction), suggests that while he could be quite uneven, he grew steadily in force, occasionally varied sharply in impulse, and never succumbed to routine.

An early influence of Whistler's tonalism is the most easily identified factor in Hammershøi's makeup, but it may be more fruitful to think of him as belonging to the generation of Seurat (b. 1859). There is a rough affinity in certain charcoal drawings, but more importantly there is a common appropriation of the slow dignity of archaic and early classic art as a disciplining counterweight in the representation of the transient. Hammershøi's attraction to the archaic is only truly explicit in a remarkable large homage to an early Greek bas-relief in the Louvre; but the lessons of a sober, stately pace and rigid structural restraint are all-pervasive. His "primitive" Italian parentage, a symptomatic manifestation found elsewhere in the 1880s and 1890s, lies not in the chillier mannequin mathematics of Piero della Francesca that so en-

A Baker's Shop, 1888, oil on canvas, 44 ¼ by 35 ⅛ inches. Vejen Kunstmuseum.

VOL 71 ISS 3 MR 1983 UMI

Interior with Seated Woman, 1908, oil on canvas, 27 5/8 by 22 3/8 inches. Aarhus Kunstmuseum.

A Farm at Refsnaes, 1900, oil on canvas, 20 5/8 by 24 1/8 inches. Davids collection, Copenhagen.

Greek Relief, 1891, oil on canvas, 37 3/16 by 37 3/8 inches. Private collection, Denmark.

Open Doors (White Doors), 1905, oil on canvas. Davids collection, Copenhagen.

tranced Seurat, but in the more ponderous material humanism of Masaccio and Giotto.

In Hammershøi's case, this fusion of Mediterranean admirations and Northern interests is decidedly Northern in spirit, and explicitly Danish in its underlying traditions. The spare rigor of his art derives important sustenance from an indigenous tradition that originated in C.W. Eckersberg's neoclassical training (in J.-L. David's studio) and flourished in the Danish "Golden Age" of naturalist painting, the 1830s and 1840s. In an idiosyncratic variant on the nationalism that gripped Scandinavian art in the 1890s, Hammershøi looked back not to the Vikings but to the intimate Biedermeier interiors and gentle landscapes of such "Golden Age" Danes as Kristen Købke, Wilhelm Bendz and Thomas Lundbye. Admiring them, he absorbed and transformed their vision. In his more wintry century's-end light, the springlike clarity of their bracingly uncluttered world is replaced by emptinesses now thick with memory, patiently conjured in a layered grisaille more like masonry or fresco than the washlike lucidity of their fresh hues.

The impress of 17th-century Holland on Hammershøi is equally clear, and similarly transmuted. The 19th century's Dutch revival is characteristically associated with the birth of Realism, and with the progressive populist liberalism of early advocates like Thoré-Bürger; but here the open doors of de Hooch and the absorbed women of Vermeer are seen through a Symbolist veil, in an art frankly private and reactionary. Pseudo-Dutch genre painting had become an absurdly corrupted cliché by the 1860s, but at least two artists—first Henri de Braekeleer in Antwerp in the 1870s and early 1880s, then Hammershøi in Copenhagen in the 1890s and early 1900s—subsequently elevated the Dutch interior formula into a vehicle for personal art of more than picturesque nostalgia. De Braekeleer's love of empty silence and the old city, as well as his use of Vermeer's organizing power, belongs somewhere close to Hammershøi's temperament, though his Antwerp is encrusted with the detritus of the aging Baroque in a way that mingles ennui with phlegmatic claustrophobia. Hammershøi's is by contrast a sentiment of the pristine. Neither in his ascetic home environments (many of the paintings show the 18th-century rooms he and his wife occupied in a landmark 1636 building) nor in his urban views does any burden of decoration, nor any graffito or patina of careless use, mar the implacable austerity of the surfaces.

Henri de Braekeleer: The Carillon, 1874, oil on canvas. Private collection, Belgium.

Kristen Købke: In the Cast Room, Charlottenborg, 1830. Hirschsprung collection, Copenhagen.

With Hammershøi, the open door of de Hooch and the absorbed women of Vermeer are seen through a Symbolist veil, in an art frankly private.

Wilhelm Bendz: The Blue Room, 1830, oil on canvas. Hirschsprung collection.

Hammershøi's attention to the blankest subjects, and his acute sensitivity to the most particular subtleties of certain visual experiences (such as fine dust suspended in cold sunlight) constitute a kind of realism that appears less often in Realism itself than on the margins of Symbolism, in aspects of Redon, in the early Balla, and in the Belgians that followed de Braekeleer, especially Mellery and Khnopff. The latter's spooky memories of Bruges, and the literary motif of the dead city to which they attach, seem particularly apt parallels for Hammershøi's urban vistas.

We cheat Hammershøi, however, if we only define him by such precedents and parallels, for a major part of his interest lies in those aspects of his work that point toward the future. The Whistlerian atmosphere, the neoclassic revival, and the historicizing moodiness are all counterbalanced by something far more authoritatively modern, both in the reductionist, methodical discipline of technique and in the square-on mettle of his compositional order. The combination of objectivity and self-consciousness, of nuanced, almost neurasthenic perception and hard-headed formalist construction (in his interiors and studio views especially) strikes a personal and prescient note for which we are hard pressed to find an equivalent in his time. We begin to think instead of later instances: Edward Hopper, Balthus, even the precisionism of Georgia O'Keeffe (as in the endlessly absorbing little picture of A Farm at Refsnaes) seem more satisfactory points of reference.

Hammershøi's modernity involves a spirituality of spareness, and undercutting of the cozy gemütlicheit associated with his domesticated subjects, in favor of something simultaneously more pure and more alienated. His ambivalent tension between deadpan documentary and saturated sentiment, between lov-

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

Five Portraits, 1901, oil on canvas, 74 ⅛ by 117 inches. Thiels Gallery, Stockholm.

4

VOL 71 ISS 3 MR 1983 UMI

East Asiatic Company, 1902, oil on canvas, 61 ⅝ by 64 ¹¹⁄₁₆ inches. Private collection, Denmark.

Fernand Khnopff: Notre Dame de Bruges, *ca. 1904. Private collection, Brussels.

ing antiquarianism and tabula rasa bareness, produces an art that is deeply bourgeois, in the most complex sense. He is a materialist epicure, spellbound by the glint of old brass, the cool white of fine porcelain and the glow of timid daylight in clean rooms, all sensual tokens of a contemplative life possessed in strictest privacy. But—as is especially clear when we look back to the Biedermeier naturalists he cherished—Hammershøi's is a post-positivist empiricism, a patient concentration on the things of the world that betrays a lack of confidence in their rewards and a heightened consciousness of transience. The probity, seriousness, and idealism of earlier burgher naturalism have been subsumed, in a noisier, polarized age of collective social conflict and doubts about progress, into a more private, fragile and somber retreat, where the central subject—emptiness—is a space not of anticipation but of mingled comfort and disappointment.

Given his loner stance and the faceless anonymity in so much of his work, it is odd that Hammershøi's masterpiece—his biggest picture, on which he worked longest and hardest—should be a group portrait of a collaborating circle of artists and critics. The roughly six- by ten-foot Five Portraits is wholly extraordinary, a rebel artistic cabal light years away from Renoir's Luncheon of the Boating Party or Fantin-Latour's studio groups of young bohemians, and a picture that refuses to conform to any of our previous notions of art around 1900. Possibly echoing Dutch 17th-century groups and candlelit scenes, even plausibly linked to Hammershøi's experience of Rembrandt's Julius Civilis in Stockholm, this is still a conception quite unlike any other. With the imposing physical and psychological weight of the figures offset by the attenuation of the crowded twin candles and the crystal delicacy of the (pointedly empty) glasses, and with the intense ritual solemnity jarringly disrupted by the near-comic protrusion of casually propped feet at the right, this enigmatic image, simultaneously awkward and commanding, refuses to settle down in the mind and continually challenges our fascination.

Hammershøi's central subject—emptiness—is a space of mingled comfort and disappointment.

If only for the Five Portraits alone, Hammershøi belongs in any new lexicon of his time. Happily there is much more in his work that merits our attention, and more to learn about him, about his interaction with the art of other countries in terms of give as well as take, about his progression toward the brooding blackness of his late work, and about his place within the eccentric Danish Symbolist circle in which he moved. Some American museum should now be sharp enough to spot that the time has arrived for Hammershøi to reach a far broader sphere of appreciation. ☐

Author: Kirk Varnedoe is associate professor of art history at the Institute of Fine Arts, New York. He recently curated the exhibition "Northern Light: Realism and Symbolism in Scandinavian Painting 1880–1910."

Dust Motes Dancing in the Sunlight, 1900, oil on canvas, 27 ¼ by 23 inches. J. Steen Kristensen collection, Copenhagen.

VOL
7
1

ISS
3

MR

1983

UMI

Nancy Graves: Colubra, 1982, bronze with polychrome patina, 35 ¾ by 28 by 22 ½ inches. Knoedler Gallery.

Natural Fictions

Nancy Graves's recent bronzes, with their richly patinaed accumulation of floral, marine and man-made forms, show her to be as interested as ever in her scientific sources—and far freer in her use of them.

BY ROBERT STORR

Decoration and scientific illustration are usually thought to be lesser genres in the fine-arts hierarchy. Often they are not considered fine art at all, but two quite distinct forms of applied art. The first utilizes the techniques of masters simply to titillate the eye, the second puts the tools of descriptive draftsmanship at the service of the practical mind. There is perhaps a formal distinction to be made as well; the strategies of decoration most often involve reducing the complexities of fine art to easily reproduced motifs and legible symmetries, whereas the scientific observer is bound, by the nature of his task, to be meticulously detailed in his representations.

But one must beware of speaking of either practice only in terms of its widespread debasement under the influence of mass market tastes or utilitarian motives. Moreover, it should be remembered that no clear dichotomy between visual inquiry and decoration existed before the 19th century, nor does it necessarily exist at all outside Western culture. To take one example, the court painters of the Moghul Empire were commissioned to document the rare species of the newly conquered Indian subcontinent, but the floral detail and carefully elaborated patterns of the borders of these drawings are of a piece with the subtle rendering of the central image. This strand of Moghul art is thus a union between the naturalism of narrative painting and the formal ornamentation of Islamic geometry.

In the Western tradition, a similar mixture of information and display can plainly be traced from the sketches of Leonardo, Dürer and Vesalius on down through the drawings of explorers and naturalists such as Audubon. Curiosity and the inventive faculty of the embellisher are in fact two aspects of the same sensibility, a sensibility which at its core merges sensuousness and rationality in an open fascination with the intricate and the marvelous.

It is this sort of obsessive and articulate attention to the relationship between general order and the singular discovery which informs Nancy Graves's best work. In her most recent bronzes, the open form and richly patinaed accumulations of floral, marine and man-made shapes is an unexpectedly baroque continuation of that concern, and it is the heightened tension between coherent structure and decorative flourish which accounts for their success.

Of course, Graves was never a straightforward empiricist who somehow strayed from the field into the studio. Working for the most part from secondary sources, what she has done is use her derived materials to feed the rational side of her fantasies and give substance to an imaginative recreation of the physical world. That recreation has been multiformed, ranging from sculptural studies of the anatomy of camels, to films which record the natural rhythms of birds and animals and the changing aspects of the moon, from multi-paneled paintings based directly on computer-enhanced NASA space photographs, to colorful reworkings of technical illustration, and a variety of installations and assemblages which emphasize their scientific derivation. Graves's choice of non-art information, the facts and theoretical constructs of zoology, botony, geology, behavioral research, astronomy and paleontology, reflected her early interest in those disciplines, but, more than that, it was an inspired and precisely art-determined tactic—a way of circumventing the stale analytic and representational fashions of contemporary art. By taking scientific data as a raw material, Graves could satisfy her instinctive inquisitiveness while at the same time leaving herself free to move in her own fashion from conceptual and systems-based issues to those of configuration and the handmade object.

However, even with a wide range of resources, techniques and reasoned transitions, and even with the professionalism and concentration she devoted to solving particular problems, there have long been signs that the "intellectualism" of Graves's approach had begun to prove a burden. This was most evident in her paintings. The methodically plotted map-pictures were consistent with the rigor of her extra-esthetic paradigms and with the austerities of early '70s period style, but since the mid-'70s her paintings have become increasingly free in execution and increasingly uncertain in their relation to their outside references, as well as to the art world around them. Having jettisoned the tense literalism of her earlier work, Graves allowed her images to drift back into the orbit of art-historically defined abstraction, in particular that of Pollock and Twombly. What seemed to be a desire to combine a gestural expressiveness with vestiges of the armature provided by her academic sources resulted in mark-making that appeared random and dilute, obscuring, ironically, the strongly synthesizing quality of her artistic approach.

In Graves's sculpture, the shift from intellect to aggressive whimsy has been gradual but far more sure. Beginning in the late '70s, her systematic manipulations of recognizable natural forms gave way to ever more eccentric graftings of unlike shapes from dissimilar sources. The work recently shown at Knoedler's makes that transition to frankly decorative concerns complete. It is a transition that will no doubt upset many previously committed to Graves's more obviously "serious" work, but however disconcerting the appearance of these pieces may be, in substance they are fully consonant with Graves's energy, ambition and basic sculptural sensibility. Rather than a deviation, they constitute a long-anticipated "letting go," and for all their excessive configurations and overrich color they are every bit as tough as they are pretty.

VOL 71 ISS 3 MR 1983 UMI

Fayum, 1982, bronze with polychrome patina, 77 ½ by 78 by 57 inches. Knoedler Gallery.

> Rather than a dereliction, Graves's new sculptures constitute a long anticipated "letting go." They remain, however, every bit as tough as they are pretty.

One clear link between the old Graves and the new is the importance technical challenge plays in the conception and fabrication of her work. In her camel reconstructions, every aspect of material and assembly was explored and played upon. Here, with the close collaboration of Toni Putnam and Richard Polich of Tallix Foundries, Graves has experimented with and enlarged upon the traditions of bronze casting, a medium in which she first began to work in the late '70s. The information bits incorporated into these elaborate structures are drawn once again from research and from the accidental encounters of daily life.

Dried cuttle fish, carob pods, fat coils and lotus plants dissected in a variety of ways are all the found objects of a Chinese market. From her sketchbooks Graves has rendered in three dimensions the cross section of a beaver dam which then forms the vertebrae-like central post of Columnouveau, while the monorail and salamander-like loops and wiggles of Fayum are taken from prehistorical mapping devices. To this reserve of exotic forms are added some purely invented shapes—manufactured items such as broken lamp shades and fans, and tools and process leftovers from the bronze pouring itself. Foundry tongs appear as the support and the winged crest of objects they were used to make; the gates used to channel the hot metal through the mold are retained as a linear reiteration of the primary forms they surround.

First employed by Picasso and Miró, the casting method used here is significant, since each of the sculptural elements was realized by a procedure which involved burning the postive shape out of the mold. By so doing Graves preserves the individual surface blemishes of each primary shape, its veins and twists, as well as the accidentals of the burning itself. At the same time, of course, by destroying the original, she effects a one-to-one reproduction. It is from this stock of similar but unique components that the sculptures are then assembled.

Equally remarkable is the patination of these pieces. Graves's penchant for high-contrast hues takes on a depth never realized in her paintings. Organized around saturated and slightly "off" primaries, with supplementary contrasts of secondary colors—purple, red-orange, cobalt green—her palette is Oriental, even Indian in cast. These pigments are applied in combination with heat and acid so that, although brushed freely onto the surface, they nonetheless fuse with the metal, never seeming, as polychrome so often does, like a fragile skin added to an already integrated whole.

Thus, much like Stella, Graves is working in the space between painting and sculpture, towards a synthesis of the two. It is, to be sure, a risky proposition. At times her decorative repetitions and symmetries can come dangerously close to pure kitsch, particularly when she uses fans and tropical detail as her primary modules. There are also times when the dazzle and briskness of her patinas attack the coherence of the solid forms. But when Graves breaks the balanced deadlock of formats—pillar-like and circular—to allow her assemblages to attentuate, creep horizontally or spin into a congested mass, the purely formal possibilities of her hedonistic approach become clear.

What is most interesting sculpturally is Graves's determination to join two formerly distinct traditions of craft and esthetic—the open-form properties and proletarian welder ethic of Constructivism and the refined, true-to-the-model qualities of bronze casting. Graves's new pieces are plainly luxury items, and though it seems likely that David Smith would have balked at their rococo profusions, it would not be surprising if he also recognized in them a passion for spatial drawing and heterogenous form not altogether unlike his own.

As to the comparison with Stella, it must be noted that there is an equally important dissimilarity. Though both artists are "high style" performers, Stella arrives at his forms less by invention than by a kind of deductive reasoning. He has an uncanny knack for figuring out "the next move," but then an equally unusual ability to take the surprise out of what he had done by schematically working out all the permuta-tions of his new format. By contrast, Graves seems, at least for the moment, determined to subject logical development to continual challenge by the forces of intuition and pure inventiveness. Her rational grasp of process and current art issues is thus thrown into a horse race with her eccentricity and the uneasy delights of self-indulgence, but the bizarre beauty of her best new work amply justifies the gamble.

Catepelouse, 1982, bronze with polychrome patina, 21 by 25 by 16 ½ inches. Knoedler Gallery.

Knowledge prepares such extravagance, but it does not contain it. If there is an art-historical comparison to be made at this point it is to be found not so much in the vegetable follies of mannerists such as Arcimboldo, nor in the professional glitter of Frank Stella, but in the rainbow Eden of Joseph Stella's late paintings. Graves has in effect abandoned the project of recapitulating the natural sciences in favor of the lush fictions of a nature all her own—and if one does not altogether know what to make of it, one must at least admit that it is an intriguing place to be. □

Author: Robert Storr is a painter and critic.

VOL 71
ISS 3
MR 1983
UMI

Made in Chicago: A Revisionary View

Challenging current art-world enthusiasm for the young Chicago Imagists, whom he sees as "bumptious but callow," the author argues instead for the experienced accomplishments of an older, less-acclaimed postwar group of artists, some of whom have recently shown impressive signs of vigor.

BY FRANZ SCHULZE

In the decade following World War II, the best of Chicago painting and sculpture tended toward expressionist and surrealist idioms in which the figural image played a central role. New York style abstraction never drew much of a lakefront crowd. Among the first writers to discern this collective Chicago identity were Peter Selz and Patrick T. Malone, who, in 1955, offered an explanation of its motives and named Leon Golub, Cosmo Campoli, George Cohen, Joseph Goto and Ray Fink among its principal representatives.[1] Abstract Expressionism, said Selz and Malone, dealt with "the recording of the artist's process of working [and his] ineffable sensations," whereas the Chicagoans preferred "to clarify and intensify . . . emotions about life and its meaning" and could find no better means to that end than the idiosyncratic image, variously mythic, solemn, brutal or fey, and not infrequently clumsy in its urgency. Thus, from another vantage point, as Irving Sandler wrote in his book The New York School, "The Chicagoans' approach was alien to most New Yorkers, and so was their indifference to aesthetic quality."[2]

There was surely no lack of "aesthetic quality"—which I take to mean something roughly akin to formal authority—in the lyrical surrealism of Irving Petlin and Robert Barnes or in the fantastic constructions of H. C. Westermann, all of whom matured in Chicago somewhat later, in the middle to late 1950s, and a few Chicago artists of that period (e.g., Golub, Westermann) did succeed in attracting national attention, though usually after leaving town. Nevertheless, Chicago art failed throughout the '60s to establish any substantial or widespread reputation for itself as a movement of consequence. New York, it would appear, maintained not only a devotion to the formal element in art, but a coolness toward the saturated imagery which appeared in the work of Chicago artists over several generations. Indeed, the Pop-influenced figurists whose raunchy vernacular captured Chicago's imagination in a series of group shows at the South Side Hyde Park Art Center in the late '60s—Jim Nutt, Ed Paschke, Karl Wirsum and Roger Brown best known among the individuals, the Hairy Who among the combos—at first made a conscious point of relishing the neglect they perceived as being emitted in waves from Manhattan.

Seymour Rosofsky: Housecake, 1975, oil on canvas, 40 by 30 inches. Richard Gray Gallery.

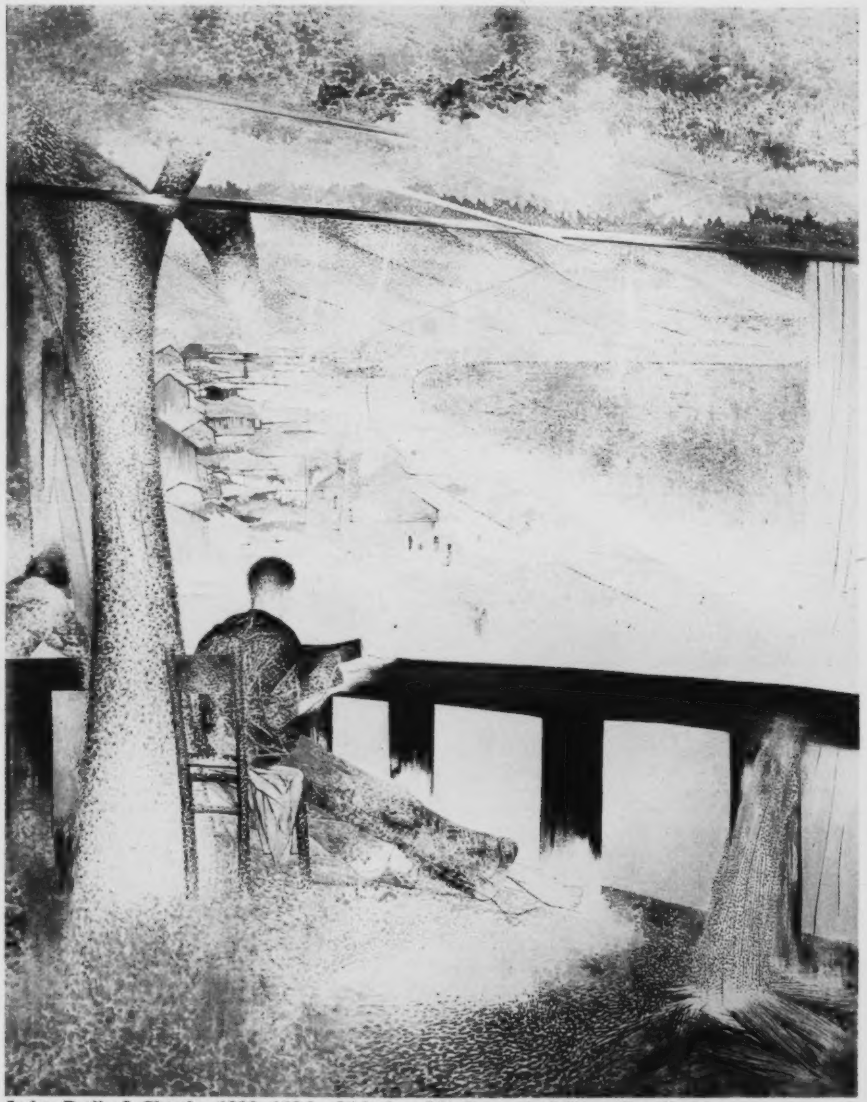
Repeat: at first. Autres temps, autres moeurs. Chicago has persisted in its figurative ways, even down to the present day with the recent emergence of a group of conscious primitivists and punksters (e.g., Hollis Sigler, Joseph Hilton, Will Northerner, Neraldo de la Paz). But the world in general and New York in particular have undergone a considerable change of heart and mind about Chicago. They are now unprecedentedly cognizant of Chicago as a place where art is made, and often sympathetic to its tilt of mind. "Aesthetic quality" evidently has been redefined. Peter Schjeldahl, writing early in 1981, coined the term "Chicagoization" to suggest the growth, even in Manhattan, of a taste that seemed most readily associated with Chicago.[3]

It is easy enough to trace some if not all of the reasons for this shift of national temper. Figurative art as a whole made a post-Abstract-Expressionist comeback with Pop Art, and it has managed to maintain a high profile through Realism, Photo Realism, Neo-Expressionism and successive smaller emanations in between. Some of these, like comic strip art, graffiti, "metro art" and "bad painting," are especially close to the flip, anti-intellectual mindset of the last Chicago generation. The Hairy Who and their followers are, after all, nothing if not given to hard urban imagery and the sly, disabused wit of the streets. It is enough to think of Ed Paschke's eyeball-rattling geeks, drag queens and tv ghosts, or the pimply little bacterial people in Jim Nutt's drawings who spend most of their time humping each other or thinking about it, or Roger Brown's billowy landscapes in which bungalows shaped like artgum erasers are juxtaposed with roller coasters and highways and cloud formations that undulate like hair in a Clairol ad.



Irving Petlin:* I, Shtetle, *1982, 118 by 84 inches. Marlborough Gallery, New York.

This is the stuff that has finally won over New York, or so we understand out here in Chicago, where, when we see four-color reproductions of Chicago art on the covers of major magazines, we blink, especially if we think back to the days when those journals tucked tout Chicago securely in the back of every issue, or every other issue, in the little corner reserved for the colonials and other inconsequential types.

But if New York likes latter-day Chicago art, you should see Chicago. The collectors here trip over each other to buy Paschke, Nutt, Brown and the other Imagists, as they are collectively called,[4] and the buyers, aspiring to become collectors, are only a half-step behind. For a time in the mid-'70s it appeared that a group of strong-minded abstractionists (including Vera Klement, Tony Giliberto, Andrea Blum and Roland Ginzel) was congealing in Chicago and ready to challenge the Imagists for local leadership. Inspired by the recollection that Laszlo Moholy-Nagy had revived the Bauhaus in Chicago in the late '30s, they claimed the existence of, and their own allegiance to, "The Other Tradition." Their effort apparently has failed, partly perhaps because the Moholy "tradition" in Chicago is historically more alive in photography and in industrial and graphic design than in painting and sculpture, partly because Chicago abstraction, re-

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

Ellen Lanyon: Allegorical Transition, 1982, acrylic on canvas, 68 by 118 inches. Richard Gray Gallery.

Leon Golub: Interrogation III, 1981, acrylic on canvas, 120 by 145 inches. Young Hoffman Gallery.

June Leaf: Maquette for the Head, 1980, painted wood and metal, 38 inches high.

June Leaf: Wind Machine, 1980, acrylic on canvas, 99 ½ by 52 ½ inches. Young Hoffman Gallery.

> Concerned with existentialism, high seriousness and myth, '40s and '50s Chicago art may have more in common with its ancient foe, Abstract Expressionism, than with the Chicago art of recent years.

garded collectively, has always somehow looked less persuasive than the Real Thing, namely what you see in New York.[5]

Since Imagism is riding such a crest among Chicago's artists, art students, collectors and feature journalists, the question naturally arises: how good is it, especially by comparison with all the previous Chicago art that languished so long in isolation?

Though questions of quality have been more or less suppressed in the currently sanguine atmosphere, there have been times, especially in the past five years, when the gradual change in manners among the latest and most highly publicized generation of Chicagoans, the Hairy Who and friends, has made such issues seem relevant to raise. Most of these painters, particularly Jim Nutt, Karl Wirsum and Suellen Rocca, looked crude when they first showed publicly in the '60s, but their work had a strident vigor about it and one felt no need to excuse it on grounds of the rough edge of their youth, since that seemed the very source of their vitality. Over the next few years Nutt advanced

VOL 7 1
ISS 3
MR
1983
UMI

Theodore Halkin: Garden Shed, 1982, oil on canvas, 54 by 48 inches. Jan Cicero Gallery.

beyond the others, until, by the early '70s, his drawing was as razor-sharp as his imagery and, in combination with his meanness and wit, marked him as the most promising of his circle. Ed Paschke and Roger Brown, who also needed time to grow up, took it, developing more compellingly personal styles as they gained in painterly facility.

During the later '70s and the early '80s, however, the scale of Nutt's work has diminished, along, evidently, with his ambition and the freshness of his humor. Distended genitals are funny only so long. Roger Brown, meanwhile, has arrived at a form of stylish, almost perfumed pattern painting, and remained there. Paschke today looks like the only painter identified with this group whose work has continued to progress in richness of handling, not to mention intensity of concept, without losing any of its strength. His retrospective at the Renaissance Society of the University of Chicago last season disclosed a purposeful evolution of style guided by a first-rate critical intelligence. The early works, swaggering and vulgar, had nonetheless been often garrulous, busy, circus-posterish. Paschke proceeded to edit them rigorously in the early '70s, casting out superfluities and ending up with the compacted, belligerently glitzy personnages that finally drew national attention to him. His latest paintings, reminiscent of television images, are more elegantly low-key, but no less serious, thoughtful, even powerful.

Meanwhile, his colleagues—Gladys Nilsson, Barbara Rossi, Ray Yoshida, Robert Lostutter, Christina Ramberg—have, along with Nutt and Brown, become more technically sophisticated, but their new refinement has also softened the impact of their imagery rather than concentrating its energy or adding to its affective force. Nutt, Brown and Yoshida, especially, have become markedly decorative in manner, tending toward the diagrammatic in drawing, toward a regularity of planar pattern and a meticulousness of line whether in the form of arabesque or zig-zag. These artists, then, are all in all a most graceful bunch. Their work hangs handsomely on the walls of North Shore mansions and Lake Shore Drive apartments, which fact makes their present popularity understandable. Their art is basically easy on the eyes, and they have retained just enough of their original tongue-in-cheek, occasionally coarse, funky vernacular to persuade most local collectors that the tough-guy look, so precious to the Chicago tradition in all things, endures among them.

In lieu of a grappling match with reality, younger Chicago artists have labored to define individual "looks" and have pursued formal polish, with the result that theirs is primarily a mannerist art.

But does it? The sinister lingerie, the leather jackets, all the intentionally snide little sexual innuendos have gained not so much in imagistic strength as in suavity, in demureness, as the artists have become more and more facile. It turns out, then, that the most accomplished of the latter-day Imagists are not so much like as unlike the best of the earlier Chicago generations. That spoils the theories of a number of critics, myself included, who for a long time believed in a lineal descent from the immediate postwar Chicago generation to that of the present day, and who perceived in both an identifiable strain of art based on the figure as powerful metaphor. The Hairy Who did seem to look like the sons of their fathers for a while. They no longer do.

If that change has gradually been growing apparent over the last few seasons, the situation was singularly clarified last fall when two solo exhibitions opened almost simultaneously in Chicago. One was a showing of Leon Golub, his first local appearance in years, at the Young-Hoffman Gallery. The second, at Jan Cicero, featured Theodore Halkin, Golub's contemporary, who never left Chicago but has also been seen here hardly at all lately. Golub offered some of the same works he had shown with such success at Susan Caldwell in SoHo in 1981: huge canvases of super-lifesize mercenary soldiers engaged in acts of brutality that were all the more numbing because of the implacably stoic mood of the narratives and the dry precision with which Golub executed them. Halkin was represented by a group of drawings and paintings, likewise realistic but temperamentally far more lyrical, of the commonest table still lifes and backyard garden scenes.

Different as they were, the two shows made a stunning impact in tandem. Halkin had never demonstrated such simple devotion to the seen world, or carried it off with such manifest authority. Golub's works were so grimly unremitting that some viewers admitted they could not, as one put it, "deal with them"—that they could not face images so withering. Notwithstanding, Golub's paintings were the most powerful he had shown here since the Gigantomachies of the turn of the '70s, perhaps even since the eroded colossi of the early '60s.

The Golub-Halkin exhibitions abruptly brought into focus, on Chicago ground, the work of two or three Chicago generations who had been part of the pre-Hairy Who scene. It was recalled that one of Young-Hoffman's best exhibitions of the 1981–82 season was that of June Leaf, another Chicagoan of the '50s, now living in Nova Scotia, whose gift for visionary images rendered in a jarring expressionist technique seemed to have only gained in force as it evolved over the years. In this context, one noted that the last two shows of Ellen Lanyon at Richard Gray had revealed a notably enriched palette and a surer command of drawing, both articulating more convincingly than ever the world of magical symbols that has preoccupied her over the past decade. Knowledge of Irving Petlin's impressive performance at the 1982 Venice Biennale was also fresh, and catalogues of his recent Marlborough shows on both sides of the Atlantic seemed to demonstrate that the hushed, surreal landscapes he has dwelled on in recent years were painted with as much sensitivity as ever, yet more muscle. Meantime, Seymour Rosofsky's death in 1981 had prompted his friends to rummage through his studio, where his last works also suggested a sustained vitality of paint and narrative invention.

While all of these artists have undergone marked shifts of style since their youthful years in the '40s and '50s, their fundamental attitudes toward the expressive act have remained intact. Each has always taken experience, whether personal or mythic, as the primary energizing factor of his art, and then sought to transform it metaphorically into painting or sculpture. Thus, while Leon Golub's concentration in his latest work on universal issues of morality and politics is virtually opposite from Ted Halkin's preference for specific encounters drawn from his prosaic daily life, both confront their individual realms of experience directly as they make their art.

This does not seem to be the case with the younger Chicago group, who intentionally maintain a distance from experience in fashioning their works, separating themselves from it by a layer, if not to say a shield, of irony. It is the ironic commentary on experience (not necessarily their own) that they

Cosmo Campoli: Jonah and the Whale, 1954, lead. Photos this page courtesy the artist.

Campoli: Bird on Egg, 1965, bronze.

Campoli: Model for a Place of Contemplation, 1966, shell-fired clay.

VOL 71 ISS 3 MR 1983 UMI

Seymour Rosofsky: Ballplayer, 1978, oil on canvas, 48 ⅛ by 67 ½ inches. Richard Gray Gallery.

Ellen Lanyon: Four Seasons/Winter, 1982, color pencil on paper, 19 ½ by 36 inches.

paint; hence the cool, detached mood of their work, the sense of an invulnerability of feeling. Moreover, in lieu of a grappling match with felt experience, they have labored to define and distinguish their individual "looks," their personas, a process which also accounts for their increasing pursuit of formal polish. Theirs is primarily a mannerist art; expressionism and surrealism are secondary, more like the cut of a suit than the material it is made of.

Both points of view, that of the new Chicago and that of the old, can be seen to stand for the values of the worlds the two generations grew up in. Golub, Halkin and their contemporaries matured during World War II, which means they knew Hiroshima and Auschwitz and felt, even if indirectly, the existential horror summoned up by those names. Nutt, Paschke, Brown et al. were products of the Vietnam years, when that horror was in no way diminished and was in fact complicated by a dense mesh of moral perplexities. But during the latter period collective psychic defenses were raised against both the burden of experience and the necessity to form a world view that might cope with it. One consequence was that irony assumed a major place in the artist's scheme of expressive values.

Pity the artist. At any rate, pity the Chicago Imagist artist of the last generation, whose early promise has, in too many cases, been thwarted by some inability to grow beyond a bumptious but callow first statement to something more existentially importunate than the run-on sniggering salon joke, the stylish, narcissistic pose, the impotent world view.

On the other hand, there is no need to overdo the sympathy. If the moral challenge of the post-Vietnam period is intricate and difficult, there is no less an imperative to meet it, and surely no reason to adore those who don't. In fact the very latest Imagists, the punksters who have followed the Hairy Who, are, if anything, more glittery-cute than ever, and their promoters are hustling them to the hilt. Meanwhile, one recalls several Chicago artists of previous generations whose gifts and accomplishments were more impressive than those of all but one—Paschke—of the Hairies and neo-Hairies, but who never finished their tasks. Westermann, though covered with laurel, is dead, all too soon. Ditto Rosofsky, minus much of the laurel. Cosmo Campoli, one of the most brilliant and naturally talented sculptors of his generation, has apparently stopped working altogether. A tragic loss, Campoli's career could have been as important to Chicago as the oeuvres of a number of Abstract-Expressionist sculptors—for example, Nakian and Lassaw—have been to New York, a comparison that suggests an irony in its own right, namely that the Chicagoans of the '40s and '50s, with their attitudes regarding existentialism, myth and high seriousness, may at last have had more in common with their ancient foes, the New York Abstract Expressionists, than with the Chicago artists of the past 15 years. ☐

---

1. Patrick T. Malone and Peter Selz, "Is There a New Chicago School?" Art News, Oct. 1955, p. 36.
2. Irving Sandler, The New York School: The Painters and Sculptors of the Fifties, New York, Harper and Row, 1978, p. 136.
3. Peter Schjeldahl, The Village Voice, Jan. 21, 1981.
4. The term "Imagist" was originally intended to refer to all post-World War II generations of Chicago expressionists and surrealists. Lately it has come to be popularly applied only to the artists of the Hairy Who, their contemporaries and their followers. For the sake of convenience the latter usage is followed in these remarks.
5. In spite of this common impression, Chicago has produced some excellent independent abstractionists, including, among recent generations and in addition to those already mentioned here, Martin Puryear, Richard Hunt, Kazys Varnelis, Kes Zapkus and the late Robert Nickle.

Author: Franz Schulze teaches art and architectural history at Lake Forest College.

Death in Black and White

Addressing some of the same horrific themes that have haunted his art during the past few years, Robert Morris's startling new reliefs and drawings now exploit traditional art-historical forms and conventional literary contexts to frame a problematical vision of apocalypse.

BY NANCY MARMER

Francesco Colonna's Hypnerotomachia Poliphili, the curious Renaissance prose romance that provided Robert Morris with the title for his remarkable new series of stark-white reliefs, has been described as "an extended experience of emptiness, a demonstration of how unconsoling art can be."[1] Morris's reliefs, on the other hand, are anything but empty; they seethe with flagrant images and baroque movement. And, despite their grim subject matter, neither they nor the two series of giant charcoal-and-graphite drawings he recently exhibited along with them are without comfort. Indeed, what may be most surprising (and problematical) about these ambitious new works is not the esthetic volte-face they represent—after all, turnabout is one of Morris's most familiar means of moving forward—but the nature of the large consolations they do in fact offer.

The subjects of Morris's latest (two-gallery) show—death, catastrophic destruction, nuclear apocalypse—are the nocturnal themes that have dominated his art for the past few years, but that until now he has treated with a certain degree of sardonic detachment, a quasi-kitschy playfulness and a raffish, contemporary vocabulary. In the spring of 1980, for example, Morris constructed a gaudy installation consisting of eight dramatically back-lit onyx cenotaphs, all topped by plastic skulls and each inscribed with a different "memorial" text caustically celebrating, among others, the insolent trashers of our planet. The following fall, Morris's Second Study for a View from a Corner of Orion (Day), a large-scale installation, contained silver-painted human skeletons suspended from the gallery ceiling and entangled in an open-form wilderness of decorative metal. In installations such as these, and most notably in last spring's elaborate, more pointedly political Jornado del Muerto (from "The Natural History of Los Alamos"), with its helmeted skeletons cavorting in an allegorical, Strangelovean scenario, Morris has demonstrated the ways in which a politicized, moralizing imagination can yet make use of what Geoffrey Hartman calls "convertible pathos"—i.e., macabre matter handled with, perhaps conceived of as, a prankish freedom of form.

Robert Morris: Untitled ("Hypnerotomachia" series), 1982, white Hydrocal, and black metal, 52 by 41 inches. The "Hypnerotomachia" reliefs and the "Firestorm" drawings were recently exhibited at the Sonnabend Gallery; the "Psychomachia" drawings appeared at Leo Castelli.

In striking contrast, the works of the "Hypnerotomachia" series, begun in the spring of 1982, are self-contained, highly traditional, representational wall reliefs of a conspicuously pre-Minimalist, even a pre-Modernist disposition. Soberly unified in material, surface organization and lack of color, and neatly framed in black metal, they are, first of all, egregious instances of that "static, portable, indoor art object" disdained by the Morris of the early '70s[2] (who had already, in 1966, emphatically rejected the relief itself as an illegitimate mode[3]). Given Morris's past history, there is always the temptation to read his practice as a conscious commentary on, as well as an exploitation of, the esthetic temper of the moment. In these new works, however, one looks in vain for any hint of critique, any subversive elements, in Morris's apparently unconditional assumption of the currently fashionable revivalist stance.

The reliefs are an expert, tour-de-force melding of cast and carved ingredients. Constructed in single panels, as well as in diptych, triptych and quadriptych form, they were first cast in plaster, subsequently hand-worked, and then finally recast in Hydrocal, a material with the same pallor and texture as plaster, but greater strength. (Appropriately enough, since the reliefs seem par excellence destined for the museum, Morris is reportedly investigating the possibility of casting them in bronze.)

That their imagery is fixed in Hydrocal and constrained by rectangular borders does not prevent these works from swarming surrealistically with an allover riot of figurative forms, as well as an astonishing variety of decorative motifs. Morris's method is fragmentary, collage-like, symbolic and art-historically allusive. There are resurrected neoclassical torsos, the whirlpools of Leonardo, cast-from-life body parts à la Johns, and repeating images in the manner of Rodin. The entire series displays a Jacobean gusto for the physical details of mortality, a necrotic enthusiasm not a little amplified by Morris's late-Freudian susceptibility to the libidinal charge of Thanatos. Throughout, symbols of death and decay mingle promiscuously with those of sexuality and human energy. Thus, skulls, skeletal fragments and death masks are linked by cascades of curls that evoke Donne's graveyard trope of "bright hair about the bone." Elsewhere, dismembered human parts—arms, legs, penises—thrust across rotting surfaces to jab at death's-heads and to nudge assorted internal organs. Morris's most brazen signs of life-in-death are clenched and clutching fists, fighting their way out of the carrion soup. And as if to underline the by-now weary (but here doubly ironic) paradox of death immortalized in undying art, there is a recurring image of the symbolic "hand of the artist"—in this case a fist holding a sculptor's tool.

Given Morris's past history, there is the temptation to read his practice as a commentary on, as well as an exploitation of, the esthetic temper of the moment.

As black as the reliefs are white, and more tumultuous because less frozen into form, the "Psychomachia" and "Firestorm" drawings also deal in cataclysm and the matter of Los Alamos. Though different from each other in mood and imagery, the two series of drawings may nevertheless be seen together as the dark underside of the sanitary death dream of "Hypnerotomachia." In style, they imaginatively extend the hand-smeared imagery of Morris's "Blind Time" drawings of the early '70s (though they eschew the formal symmetries of those works and discover a much wider range of draftsmanly techniques). The title and moralizing temperament of the "Psychomachia" sequence come from Prudentius's early-5th-century Latin poem of the same name, an allegory in which the personified forces of good and evil contend for the soul of man. Morris's drawings are monumental-scale battle scenes somewhat diminished, however, by the hovering flavor of Pop. Their repeating unit is a stenciled male cartoon figure—the type of a comic-strip super-hero furiously launched into action; cloned, flopped, variously tilted and trampled, this schematic image is multiplied into a roiling crowd, a symbolic vista of martial pandemonium on the brink of a non-specified apocalypse.

Whereas the "Psychomachia" visions are vaguely reminiscent of Renaissance embattled nudes (one thinks of Pollaiuolo and Michelangelo's lost Battle of Cascina) or dimly evocative of Last Judgmental mayhem, the large "Firestorm" drawings (and their appended texts) are overt and explicit in their art-historical quotations. Morris borrows especially freely from Leonardo's "Deluge" drawings and descriptions of raging storms, but he also remembers other traditional scenes of catastrophe, including Géricault's The Raft of the "Medusa." The "Firestorm" drawings are mostly abstract, their densely drawn and churning images richly inspired by Leonardo's obsessive swirling forms, though also exploiting Morris's own handprint image, which is used in virtually as complex a manner and as flexibly as an expressionist brushmark. Morris's art-historical allusions to earlier visions of natural destruction form the proscenium stage on which he presents the central subject of his series and against which he plays his own text—a fragmentary, poetic narrative based on the story of the Hiroshima and Nagasaki bombings, seen from the vantage point of the victims but primarily told by an unimpassioned, unidentified narrational voice located outside the events themselves.

The implied subject of all three series—the threat of nuclear annihilation—is obviously of the utmost political urgency. What is equally obvious is that Morris's treatment of that heated subject is no ardent activist's plea for a freeze on armaments, nor a gesture designed for immediate political effect. Instead, Morris's tactic, a dubious maneuver that seems to reverse the politicizing direction of his recent installations, is to *de*politicize, to *de*specify, to remove the subject from its present position of urgency, and to see it in the long, cool light of art-historical tradition and myth. Perhaps several remarks by Morris himself are useful for clarifying his position. In a recent article, he rather nihilistically observed that "a sense of doom has gathered on the horizon of our perceptions and grows larger every day . . . . credible political ideologies for the ideal future no longer exist."[4] Commenting in the same essay on the vast influence of Duchamp on contemporary art, Morris noted that the most powerful aspects of Duchamp's oeuvre had not yet been used, i.e., his "revival of the seminarrative mythic theme which allows his work to address concerns far beyond the formal, the imagistic, or the immediately symbolic."[5]

Untitled ("Hypnerotomachia" series), 1982, white Hydrocal and black metal, diptych, 60 by 84 inches overall.

It is precisely that "seminarrative," "mythic," timeless (and currently modish) region within which Morris now inscribes his own new reliefs and drawings. Indeed moving "far beyond the formal," if not beyond the imagistic and the symbolic, the new works make use of both fictionalized, historical narrative and traditional "seminarrative" allegory. They also join a long history in Western culture of dark depictions (and predictions) of catastrophe, a tradition whose primary texts are the Old Testament narratives of divine retribution (e.g., the deluge) and the New Testament's rewriting of the story of Last Days, and whose earliest pictorial examples are Romanesque manuscript illuminations as well as church tympana reliefs depicting apocalypse.

It has seemed to some writers, for example, Frank Kermode in The Sense of an Ending, that apocalyptic thinking is a persistent and apparently irrepressible part of our anxious culture, perhaps of the human condition itself.[6] Drawing on Focillon's notion of "centurial mysticism"—that mood of crisis that seems to attach itself to our arbitrary chronological divisions of time, such as the end of a century and especially the end of a millennium—Kermode notes the usefulness in our lives of "explanatory fictions," the comfort we take from knowing beforehand (even if the end is not happy) the shape of events to come.

What Kermode (who claims to believe that our time is not much worse, or more endangered, than any other) slights, however, is the highly conservative character of such comforting "explanatory fictions," their tendency to enforce an existing order, to suppress historical and social facts, to function as a means of deflecting critique, in short, to prevent political change. For if our current anxieties about the threat of nuclear annihilation are satisfactorily contained within the tradition of the apocalypse, we in effect do one of two things: we either relegate those anxieties to the realm of an "unreal," repeating fiction or, as in what Kermode calls "naive" apocalyptic thinking, we resign ourselves to the inevitable doom of apocalypse now. According to his own statements, Morris seems to have personally adopted the latter, fatalistic position; his recent art, however, elaborately endorses the first option, and unabashedly exploits its consolations. Framing echatological anxiety within a fiction (and tradition) of the apocalypse, Morris lends it a conventional order and closure, and effectively distances it from the viewer. From the safety of narrative, he (and we) become romantic tourists in the precincts of disaster, appreciators of the catastrophic sublime.

VOL 71 ISS 3 MR 1983 UMI

After the Raft of the Medusa, 1982, ink, charcoal, graphite, black pigment on paper, 38 by 50 inches.

Untitled ("Psychomachia" series), 1982, ink, charcoal, graphite, black pigment on paper, 8 panels, 100 by 152 inches overall.

Nor is Morris loath to explore the consoling frisson of the imagination of catastrophe, the despairing gesture that turns the anticipation of death into a thrill indistinguishable from a shudder. Freud speculated that all emotions of excess, destructive impulses and sensations of pain, like other unpleasurable sensations, had a tendency to spill over into sexuality and thus to produce a "pleasurable condition."[7] (Jameson explains that same frisson politically; he sees it as the defensive way in which human beings, living under the specific anxiety-producing conditions of late capitalism, have learned to transform destructive, negative stimuli into "thrill" in order to survive, and have even come to believe that those sensations constitute the "texture" of their private lives, their individuality.[8]) In a vivid "Firestorm" text, Morris presents the exhilaration of destructive impulses, the enacting of Freud's "unpleasure" made "pleasure." The bombings, his anonymous narrator says,

> . . . took things back to the edge of the void. Matter . . . gave up its secret energies. Life's fragile stability was obliterated. . . . But if rock melted and the rivers boiled and the ensuing firestorm filled the sky with a black whirlwind and a local society perished, the appetite was only whetted for a more total event, a greater repudiation, a deeper void, a more absolute annihilation.

The ease with which "absolute annihilation" is absorbed into the economy of Morris's art is at least partly explicable in terms of the temporal effect of narrative enclosure. As Paul Ricoeur has observed, narrative "brings us back from within-time-ness to historicality, from 'reckoning with' time to 'recollecting' it";[9] narrative deals, in other words, not in the urgent immediacy of events (or that "presentness" of space once admired by Morris and still respected by those who would close the gap between producer and consumer of art) but in a story already complete, already inserted into past time and now being *re*presented for a passive audience. "As soon as a story is well known," says Ricoeur, "retelling takes the place of telling."[10] And retelling is exactly what Morris does with the mythos of apocalypse, apparently questioning the esthetic implications of such a *re*presentation as little as he questions the political significance of depicting our culture as already hopelessly doomed.

From the safety of Morris's narrative of apocalypse, he (and we) become romantic tourists in the precincts of disaster, appreciators of the catastrophic sublime.

If the esthetic battle lines of the present moment seem to be drawn between those artists who critically investigate or challenge the manner in which visual representation functions as an arm of the hegemonic culture and those who continue (for whatever purpose) to unquestioningly use the culture's accredited forms, the known repertoire of the old, Morris clearly now falls into the latter camp, his Duchampian strategems and past schismatic positions notwithstanding. Nor does he pretend otherwise. "Art," he said in 1980, "has always been dependent upon and served one set of forces or another with little regard for the morality of those forces (pharaoh, pope, nobility, capitalism). It makes little difference what forces make use of art. Art is always propaganda—for someone."[11] And Morris (in spite of his heavy irony on the subject) apparently still sees no contemporary reason to question that age-old symbiotic relationship. One may speculate, however, about whether his cynical acceptance of the status quo is not unrelated to his growing "sense of doom."

Untitled ("Firestorm" series), 1982, ink, charcoal, graphite, 88 by 76 inches.

In the face of cataclysm, the pleasures and seemingly infinite resources of art history, the closure and mastery of conventional forms, the "thrill" of anxiety, and the resonant satisfactions of myth are not negligible consolations for an artist with a surprisingly brilliant flair for the traditional. And if apocalypse is not now? Well, there's always that other thanatoidal consolation—the museum. □

---

1. Robert Harbison, Eccentric Spaces, New York, Avon, 1980, p. 76.
2. Robert Morris, "The Art of Existence: Three Extra-Visual Artists," Artforum, Jan. 1971, p. 28.
3. Morris, "Notes on Sculpture," Artforum, Feb. 1966, p. 43.
4. Morris, "American Quartet," A.i.A., Dec. 1981, p. 104.
5. Ibid., p. 100.
6. Frank Kermode, The Sense of an Ending, New York, Oxford University Press, 1968, p. 96.
7. "Instincts and their Vicissitudes," as quoted by Leo Bersani, Baudelaire and Freud, Berkeley, University of California Press, 1977, p. 76. (See also Freud's "The Economic Problem in Masochism.")
8. Fredric Jameson, "Interview," Diacritics, Fall 1982, p. 86.
9. Paul Ricoeur, "Narrative Time," Critical Inquiry, Autumn 1980, p. 178.
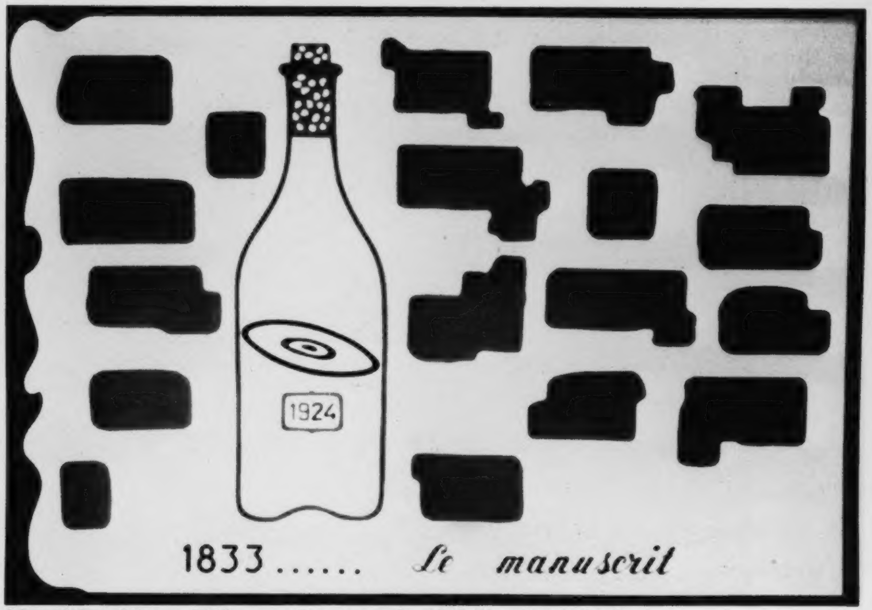
10. Ibid., p. 179.
11. Morris, "Notes on Art as/and Land Reclamation," October 12, Spring 1980, p. 102.

VOL 71 ISS 3 MR 1983 UMI

The Mold, the Mussel and Marcel Broodthaers

A decision, sincerely made and carried out, to "invent something insincere" led this poet-turned-artist to examine in his work the socio-economic forces that mold art's meaning—and the protective shell by which the artist survives.

BY CARTER RATCLIFF



Marcel Broodthaers:* 1833 ...... Le manuscrit, *1969-70, painted plastic.

Marcel Broodthaers, who died in 1976 at the age of 52, drew, painted and assembled assemblages. He shot films and photos, published small books, and gave performance-lectures. Above all, he designed installations. Most of the mediums in which he worked are long familiar, thanks to Duchampian and Surrealist experiment. An exception is the plastic panel—a smooth, flat, somewhat shiny object, neat but possessed of an ordinariness bordering on the tawdry—the sort of thing, with its embossed message, that one might see on the side of a truck or in the window of an unassuming shop in Broodthaers's Belgium. Last fall, two Manhattan galleries, Marian Goodman/Multiples and John Gibson, showed a large selection of his work. There was a wall-full of the panels at Goodman, along with books and a film by the artist; Gibson showed panels too, as well as other graphics and some drawings.

The panels are a numb white, usually. Some are black or red or a sharpish blue. In their banal serviceability, they are like standard-sized sheets of paper, though much larger (33½ by 47 inches). Like the typist's tabula rasa, too, they are willing to bear an infinite variety of messages. Broodthaers inscribed them with letters, words, punctuation marks, and various pictographs that suggest there are certain constraints on what we can say, despite language's boundless permutability. Or perhaps his point has to do with the limits on what it might mean to say anything at all.

One of the plastic panels has six compartments. The upper four of these contain two "a"s and two sets of emblematic shears. Running across the boundary between the two remaining compartments is a line of verse: NOUS N'IRONS PLUS AU BOIS LES LAURIERS SONT/NE SONT PAS COUPES. ("We'll no longer go to the woods. The laurels have/have not been cut down.") Broodthaers has crossed out an "a" and one pair of shears with a diagonal line of the kind that reads as a negative in Europe's public announcements (a line slanting through a pipe means "No Smoking" and so on). The meaning of this mark seems obvious at first, though it is not clear why the artist would want to interdict either the letter "a" or a schematic rendering of scissors. The diagonal line then switches context. It imposes no negative on the line of verse. In fact, it rescues this lyrical flourish from its melancholia by offering the hope that, after all, the laurels have not been cut down. We can still go to the woods, maybe. But if the slash mark is not a negative in the line of verse, then perhaps it does not deny the right-hand set of shears. That binary opposition (cut/not cut) vanishes, and the cutting proceeds, the laurels fall and we are back in our poetic swoon.

Or are we? Broodthaers's metonymic way with symbols and signs tempts one to read the "a" as the entire alphabet, and "alphabet" as "language" or perhaps "signification" itself. The slash through the "a" looks dire until we remember that its prescriptive weight has faded, taking with it another opposition—to mean/not to mean. At this point the project of conveying meaning comes to look like something that goes on in any case, a function of culture and our hapless immersion in it. The poet's will, that authority toward which we direct so many forms of respect, loses all force if there can be no refusal to speak (or to mean something, somehow). If language carries on independently of anyone's desires, the plaque's lyricism falls flat, along with its resonating emotions. There may or may not be a laurel grove to visit, but it doesn't much matter because the meaning of that enchanted place has dispersed like a fog under Broodthaers's exceedingly delicate prodding.

This is one way to read/not read this plaque. There are plenty more. Each of Broodthaers's small pieces permits exegeses similarly elaborate—and, let's face it, similarly tedious. A characteristic criticism on Broodthaers's work is that it very rarely spends much time on the details of the artist's tactics. He moves so fast through his subtleties that a close tracking can only feel awkward. In a catalogue introduction to the Tate Gallery's 1980 exhibition of Broodthaers's work, Michael Compton said: "The plastic panels contain a series of puzzles with no solution." Even an elegant job of detective work would be pointless, in a way, assuming that Compton is right. I think he is. Broodthaers's hope was to give enigma a certain weight, a presence it couldn't have so long as he confined it to the late-Symbolist poetry he practiced so brilliantly and with so little worldly success until 1964, when he was 40 years old. That year Broodthaers announced that he "too, wondered whether I could not sell something and succeed in life . . . ; the idea of inventing something insincere finally crossed my mind and I set to work straightaway."

Nous N'irons Plus au Bois . . ., 1969-70, painted plastic, 47 by 33 ½ inches.

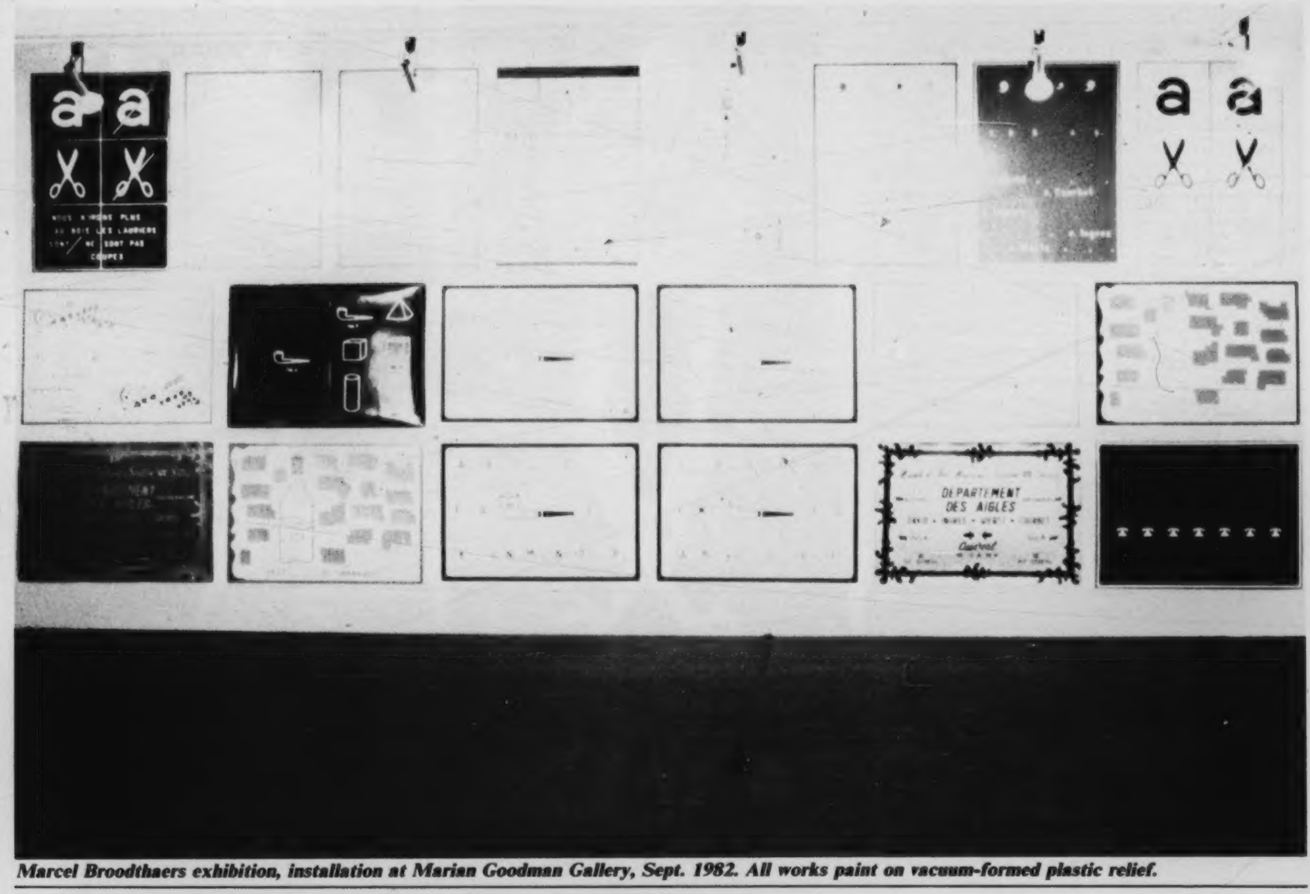
The "something" in question was art, in the form of vendable objects, forms filled with the gravity of the marketplace. Broodthaers's commitment to insincerity shows in his remarks on the plastic panels. "The language of these plaques? Let us say: rebuses. And the subject, a speculation on a difficulty of reading enforced by the employment of the material." What material? Plastic? Familiar vocabularies and visual repertoires? Broodthaers's "insincerity" is a consequence of his earnest desire to evoke for us the way meaning binds itself to physical objects, and thereby to the palpable structures of our society. Nowhere is this clearer than in the case of artworks, once they get caught up in institutional machinery. Among Broodthaers's major projects were installations which question the workings of museums—those central offices so to speak, where our culture officially approves the exchange that implicates art's transcendence in the tangible value of the market-worthy object.

Between 1968 and 1972, Broodthaers carried out a series of installations under the heading Musée d'Art Moderne, Departement des Aigles . . . (See Barbara M. Reise, "The Broodthaers Museum Gambit," A.i.A., May/June, 1975. "Aigles" equals "Eagles," a subject Broodthaers gave far too great a range for me to try to encompass it here.) The first of these room-sized works appeared in the artist's house in Brussels, where he displayed packing cases of the kind used to transport works of art. No paintings or sculptures were on view, though Broodthaers tacked up some postcard reproductions of works by Courbet, David, Delacroix and others. The apparatus that usually serves art in an unremarkable way (including the four-color reproductions whose job it is to remind us of artistic greatness) was induced to work overtime—to take the place of art itself. The organizing and certifying devices of the museum stood for the thing certified. Art let its meanings be absorbed, so to speak, in boxes stenciled with instructions to handle with care.

Once this happened, of course, the brute materiality of these wooden things, as well as the mechanical dullness of the postcards, took on the aura of esthetic intention. They became art

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI



Marcel Broodthaers exhibition, installation at Marian Goodman Gallery, Sept. 1982. All works paint on vacuum-formed plastic relief.

Département des Aigles . . ., 1968, painted plastic, 33 ½ by 47 inches.

objects, and turned just as problematic in their significance as the canvases and statues they had displaced. Broodthaers's "insincerity" begins by betraying the integrity of the poet for the sake of art-world success, then it betrays itself by inspiring installations that are not, after all, very marketable. Broodthaers is sincere about his insincerity, as if it is only by way of such ironic reversals that he can suggest intention's complicity with all that resists it in the external world, reality's labyrinth of shaping structures—linguistic, social, material . . . .

Not all of Broodthaers's installations belong to the Musée d'Art Moderne series. All, however, reflect on art's tendency to get lost in the corridors of the institutions designed to serve it. His installations are as rebuslike as his plaques, with the added advantage of deploying their insoluble puzzles in three dimensions. They give us a labyrinth of thought into which we can enter, thus forcing on our attention the charged palpability that Broodthaers gave his images when he left poetry for the art world—the art market—in 1964.

The two recent Broodthaers shows in New York offered strong selections of his objects, yet neither could prevent his art from retreating to the realm of esthetic privilege he questioned with his installations. It is now up to us to see that his critique, in all its tactfulness, applies to galleries, as well. Yet we must keep an eye on his tact, not simply see through it, for this quality of Broodthaers's sensibility is what insures that he is no reductivist claiming to reveal art as a function, merely, of production and exchange. Broodthaers was indeed drawn to such Marxian-sounding notions; he gives them oblique, elegant support; then, however, as I suggested, he undercuts them by giving the analytical objects of his "museums," these vehicles of a "materialistic" critique, the aura of individual intention traditional to artworks in the West since the time of the Renaissance. "Toute réussite d'image met en défaut la théorie," he said. "Every successful image shows theory to be wanting"—or puts theory in default, reveals its defects . . . A cluster of objectified things turns into the site, the fragmentary emblem, of an inward purpose. Broodthaers's will asserts itself amid his own doubts about the integrity of the singular self and the art work—his fears that both may be only delusions generated by a particular historical era.

Jardin d'Hiver (detail), 1974, two-gallery installation at the Palais des Beaux-Arts, Brussels. All other photos courtesy Marian Goodman Gallery.

The molds that produce his plastic plaques serve to suggest the pressures of "objective" social and economic forces, yet French insinuates some uncertainties here. A mold is "un moule." "Une moule," on the other hand, is a mussel, a creature who stands, in Broodthaers's rebus-view of the world, for a self-sustaining integrity. A mussel is molded by its own shell—yet it can also be seen as molding itself, finding its own shape in resistance to outward forces that would shape it. (Broodthaers's poem, "La Moule," written before he decided to "succeed"—i.e., become an artist—sets these complexities in exquisite balance.) Broodthaers's installations, those rooms that did and did not form annexes to the mansions of the official art world, gave three dimensions to the "mold-mussel" pun. They suggested how external pressures (which Broodthaers, with his delight in banality, calls "the mold of society") give shape to art and its meanings. At the same time, they marked off a region, an interior where Broodthaers's singularity could elaborate itself in safety.

Sometimes he made art of mussel shells, sometimes he used the shells of eggs. A creature is born into one, out of the other. Broodthaers's installations were themselves protective shells where both processes took place at once. What is left now—individual pieces—can only remind us how temperate an environment Broodthaers created for his own development; not warm, exactly, but deeply nourishing because open to the currents of the moment. Broodthaers asserted himself against—and by means of—the most powerfully depersonalizing ideologies he knew, those of the capitalist marketplace and of the Marxian critique of that marketplace. He proceeded not in the hope of razing these oppressive structures but in the knowledge that such victories are impossible. Ideology is endlessly resourceful in its resistance to individual desire. In that respect it serves as a metonymic emblem of the world. And the refusal of ideological imperatives, even if it is so delicate as hardly to register in official circles, emblematizes all of the individual's possibilities. Even in their most fragmentary forms, Broodthaers's ironic gestures at the border between world and self make ultimate claims for the integrity of the latter. ☐

Author: Carter Ratcliff's most recent book is John Singer Sargent (Abbeville).

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

The Liberation of the Object

A former associate of Giorgio Morandi demonstrates that the artist was far from the conventional figure represented in a recent American retrospective. Rather, the obsessive repetition and reflective persistence of Morandi's paintings reveal a break with academic traditions and a commitment to daily observation—"the ordeal of experience."

BY JANET ABRAMOWICZ

Although Giorgio Morandi has always had a devoted following in the United States, at times it has been so small that it resembled an esoteric cult. Since his death in 1964, his international reputation has grown, thanks to museum exhibitions in Europe, Australia, Canada, the Soviet Union and South America. It was with great anticipation, then, that Morandi's American admirers awaited his first major museum retrospective in this country, mounted in fall 1981 by the Des Moines Art Center.[1] In his preface to the exhibition catalogue, James T. Demetrion hoped that "the American art public will have an opportunity to begin a dialog" with Morandi, "a more serious discussion of the artist's work here than has been possible up to now."[2]

Yet the actual response to the exhibition, both critical and popular, was puzzlement and disappointment. Those who know Morandi's work found the selection lacking in depth and variety. Those for whom the exhibition was an introduction to Morandi were unable to account, on the basis of what they saw, for Morandi's enormous reputation in Europe. They sensed, in fact, that they were missing something. Hilton Kramer, for example, complained that the work is limited by "an almost niggling refusal to extend itself."[3] But the "curious blandness" that Kramer attributed to Morandi's work was largely due to this particular selection of works. Had he seen a different exhibition (such as the far more complete and complex show mounted in 1973 by Rome's Museum of Modern Art), Kramer might have found the artist's "conviction and consistency" to be only two of Morandi's many remarkable qualities.

Morandi painted in series; sometimes it took him as many as 17 paintings to realize a single visual idea, and yet not one of his paintings duplicates another. Had the exhibition attempted (as did the 1981 Munich retrospective) to show more than two or three paintings from a single series, it would have become apparent that obsessive repetition was crucial to Morandi's art, functioning very much like the reflective persistence of a Proust, a Mondrian, a Cézanne.[4]

For the Des Moines retrospective, 123 works out of some 1,500 paintings and 135 etchings were selected. The difficulty of reassembling a body of work, much of it scattered in European private collections, may explain some grave omissions. There were far too few of the early Cubist still lifes, no paintings of bathers. Missing entirely were any examples of the series of 17 Soutine-like paintings of shells—expressions of gloom and foreboding—that Morandi painted in 1943. Nor did the exhibition include any of the still lifes from the early '60s, in which Morandi's bottles writhe and squirm as if they too were suffering, for Morandi was probably already gravely ill with cancer when he painted them.

Whether intentionally or not, the pictures selected for this exhibition tended to be Morandi's most conservative and conventional. Little of his total sensibility was allowed to emerge—the better, it seemed, to force Morandi into a classical mold. In the exhibition catalogue, Joan M. Lukach states: "Morandi was an academic artist, by training and then vocation; he was a classicist both in his compositional methods and in his efforts to revive Renaissance traditions."[5] But in fact Morandi resolutely resisted every effort to force him to become either an "academic" or a "classicist"—a fact which would have been clear had the exhibition or its catalogue included visual documentation of the Bolognese ottocento academic Giorgio Morandi's studio in Via Fondazza, Bologna, as it was at his death in 1964. Photograph by the author in 1981.

Giorgio Morandi: Still Life, 1941, oil on canvas, 10 ½ by 16 ½ inches. Private collection.

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

tradition that Morandi utterly rejected. The exhibition seemed intent on portraying him as the archetypal realist, as though figurative painting could be safely locked up inside the bottles he endlessly painted.

Morandi is too often praised for the wrong reasons. He is applauded for preserving academic traditions when, in fact, he broke decisively with them. He is treated as a provincial recluse despite his great awareness of the contemporary world. Critics smile on his gentleness and modesty when they should be awed by his tremendous force and ambition. The Des Moines retrospective succeeded only in reinforcing these misconceptions: Morandi was presented as an academic provincial, a recluse living in an ivory tower.

The legend of Morandi's ivory tower was, however, created by his enemies, who were angered by his refusal to participate in either the art or the politics of the Fascist party. "An ivory tower," Morandi once remarked. "I would even have put barbed wire around it." Morandi's art never appealed to the "regime" or to the Italian masses, as did the "patriotic" monuments that surrounded him for most of his adult life. While political slogans and patriotic art works covered the walls of Italian cities, Morandi's art was barely tolerated. Riccardo Bacchelli remembers that, when he proposed to an acquaintance in the Italian diplomatic service that Morandi finally be given an exhibition abroad, the diplomat—a fervent nationalist—exploded: "That one with the bottles? Our country is facing a heroic moment, and he is still painting bottles! He should be hanged."[6]

Nor was Morandi ever able to adapt himself, at the Accademia delle Belle Arti in Bologna (where he studied from 1907 to 1913), to "the traditional use of various media" and "long-established 'correct' systems for composing a painting according to certain formulae," as Lukach asserts in the catalogue.[7] In fact, according to Pompilio Mandelli, Morandi spent most of his final school years painting at home, far away from the provincialism of his teachers. At a time when no one in Italy was interested in etching as a form of contemporary artistic expression, he taught himself etching techniques entirely from books and from looking at prints in the collection of the museum next door to the Accademia.[8]

Still Life, 1919, oil on canvas, 22 1/2 by 16 3/4 inches. Pinacoteca di Brera, Milan.

If Morandi seems to defy real space, it is because he shifted it: the tables in his studio were set at different levels so that he could observe his models from different points of view.

In 1913, while still a student, he presented a group of paintings to a faculty committee, which could not understand his crude, slashing brushstrokes and monochromatic tonalities. All but two of the committee members agreed that Morandi's work showed neither talent nor craftsmanship. He was rejected one by one by his teachers, who had little interest in either the modern European painters or the masters of the early Renaissance to whom Morandi was attracted. When he finally took his qualifying exams to teach in state schools—which he did for 42 years—he was almost failed because he expressed a preference for a "primitive" Uccello over an "elegant" Botticelli.

With his characteristically acute perception of the direction of contemporary culture, Morandi had by 1909 already chosen as models those avant-garde French artists who were beginning to be exhibited at the Venice Biennale. Morandi's first trips outside of Bologna were to Venice to see contemporary art. Cézanne's paintings demonstrated the importance of form and structure rather than the subject matter itself. The Douanier Rousseau indicated another way to work from nature: to take objects out of their natural environment and to create a new one for them that did not need to be realistic but which could nonetheless become a reality. In Seurat, Morandi found a contemporary expression of the majestic stillness he would later find in Piero della Francesca. Thus, when he looked for the first time at Giotto, Piero and Alberti, it was with eyes that had already understood Cézanne and Rousseau.

For Morandi, tradition did not imply repetition of the past, but the philosophical tradition of Galileo, what Giorgio de Santillana called the "ordeal of experience"[9]—a commitment to daily observation that has little in common with 19th-century Italian art and its repetition of descriptive, sentimental, provincial formulas. Morandi's paintings are about what de Chirico called the "enigma of the common object." (Indeed, Morandi participated from 1916 through 1918 with de Chirico and Carrá in the scuola metafisica.) His works were not conceived, as some critics have concluded, "according to a mathematically derived plan," so that "each element could be fitted into a pre-planned graph." Such statements freeze Morandi's paintings into prefabricated, rigid geometric diagrams, overlooking the poetry and mystery which are essential to his work; Morandi always insisted that "all art was pure mystery."

Morandi's approach to painting was direct, immediate and intuitive, as evidenced by the way he used his brushes and palette knife. On his easel was a mountainous lump, built up from dried paints scraped from canvases which he called his quadri sbagliati, his mistakes. Looking at the backs of Morandi's canvases one can see the signs of the many times he had attacked them with a palette knife in order to completely scrape away a day's work. His paintings were often the result of months of agonizing work and thought. When one takes into account how many of his early paintings Morandi burned and the number of etching plates he destroyed—or from which he only printed two or three impressions, even as late as 1942—one can begin to comprehend how isolated and uncertain Morandi must have felt.

In the late 1950s I was Morandi's teaching assistant at the Accademia in Bologna; I was often invited to his house in Via Fondazza to see his paintings. His studio was a simple, ordinary room, quite dark and small, which also served as his bedroom. The walls were always covered with his paintings, for he was rarely satisfied with them and would keep them in front of him for months, even though they had already been claimed by their prospective owners (whose names were penciled on the back).

Still Life, 1949, oil on canvas, 14 ½ by 18 ⅛ inches. Collection F.A. Morat.

Still Life, 1949, oil on canvas. Private collection, Rome.

Still Life, 1952, oil on canvas, 12 by 15 ¾ inches. Collection Edwin Janss.

After an absence of many years, I returned in 1981 to photograph Morandi's studio. Nothing had been touched after his death; the same dust—which he never allowed to be removed from the hundreds of objects the floor—was everywhere. Two easels, three tables, a small bookshelf with boxes of Windsor & Newton colors, a bed—these were but the accessories to the bottles, tea containers, oil lamps, cups, clocks and silk flowers that provided the subject matter of more than 50 years of painting. Here were Ovaltine tins covered with colored paper, tea containers painted a deep Venetian red with white ovals on their sides, transparent bottles filled with glowing pigments, olive-oil cans painted so that one side was dark green and the other a light ocher, a teapot that had belonged to Napoleon's sister.

If Morandi's paintings seem to deny any concrete space, it is because he physically shifted the "real" space before painting it. The tables in his studio were raised to different heights so that he could observe his patient, mute "models" from different points of view. The table tops were always covered with paper which was scarcely ever changed. Onto the paper he would mark with pencil the spaces between objects, draw in shadows and eliminate any distinction between background and foreground. By extending the paper from the table top up onto the wall behind, he eliminated the space of the background. Blocks under the paper raised the horizon so that, instead of receding, it came forward; often it would reach above the tops of the objects on the table.

Morandi's paintings show how he continually adjusted his focus, magnifying and reducing an image, determining what he wanted to see. There is a constant contrast between the actual appearance of his models and the mysterious world he created when these objects were translated into paintings. He often painted close-ups of objects, enlarging them three or four times; but sometimes they become quite small, as

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

Landscape, 1961, oil on canvas, 16 5/16 by 14 5/16 inches. Collection F.A. Morat.

if painted from a point miles away instead of simply from across the room. In his landscapes of Grizzana, Morandi was known to use binoculars in order to get as close as possible to houses far away in the mountains.

Analyzing Morandi's paintings is an exceedingly difficult task. There is little narrative, there are no anecdotal magnets to pull the viewer towards an understanding of what exists beneath the surface of his solemn, often melancholic images. The key to understanding Morandi as he really was is to compare the changes in his response to his subjects, the surprises and discoveries he made while painting them. If his subjects changed little from 1912 on, the paintings themselves changed radically. Seeing them in series, moving from work to work in the sequence in which they were painted, one sees that each painting is a variation on themes that remained constant over 50 years.

One way to approach Morandi's paintings is to trace how a single object was explored and transformed over the years. Some time early in his career he acquired a simple shelf clock with a round dial mounted on a board shaped like a Cycladic figurine. This clock became one of his favorite models; he seemed particularly fascinated by the ambiguities of the shape of its back, which could suggest a violin, a woman's form or a menacing shadow.

The clock first appears near the back of a Cézannesque still life of 1914, where its rounded top is seen next to a cheese grater. In the same year, Morandi painted a large Cubist still life in which the clock is shown with its back turned towards us at an angle, dominating the vase and bottle standing next to it. Four years later he returned to the clock in one of his "metaphysical" still lifes; here, the back of the clock is painted in sharp, crisp outline without distortion. Yet it is difficult to determine what this object is. The next year, the clock appears transformed into a square, dark, ominous outline. In 1928, Morandi's easel with paint scraped from his canvases—what he called his "quadri sbagliati," his mistakes. Studio photos this page by the author.

> Morandi painted in series—an obsessive repetition was crucial to his art—but though his subjects changed little from 1912 on, his paintings themselves varied widely.

it appears with an upturned pot and a cloth; rough brushwork blurs the transition between back and front. The clock hovers in the back of two still lifes of 1930 and '32, then moves to the front in another painting from 1932, in which it is partially concealed by a tall bottle; the face appears as empty space, not solid, and the clock becomes less substantial, more angular. It appears again in a series from 1936, then vanishes for more than 20 years, only to reappear in three compositions made in 1963.

Morandi also owned a pair of long-necked rectangular Persian vases; their shiny yellow glaze was decorated with black squiggles, which never appear in Morandi's paintings of them. One of the vases appears in a still life from 1929. A strange object, it is almost square at the base with a neck about half the length of the container itself. It stands out mainly because its lemon-yellow glaze contrasts with the earth tones of the objects that surround it.

The same vase appears in many paintings from 1930; usually it is isolated in the foreground, with no other objects in front of it. But the pair of vases will also be the major protagonists of an important series of paintings. In a pencil drawing of 1958 Morandi depicts the two vases together. They are lined up across the picture plane with their widest sides facing the viewer. Morandi obviously became fascinated by the balance of their identical shapes, and he concentrated on the smooth curves that define the empty space between their necks.

Morandi developed this theme in a series of five dramatic paintings made in 1963, one year before he died. At first glance these paintings appear to be simple repetitions of the 1958 drawing. But on closer inspection, they show themselves to be radically different variations on that simple theme. The first painting shows the two vases in almost the same position as in the 1958 drawing. But the vase on the left has been turned so that its right side is visible. In front of the two vases is a dark glass bottle which is placed so that it fits exactly in the small interval between the two vases and conceals all but the flared top of what we recognize from other paintings as another, striped vase. All that is visible of this object are two splashes of paint which peer like antennae over the low curve where the shoulders of the two Persian vases meet. The neck of the dark bottle is pulled up to the line that marks the transition between base and shoulder of the Persian vases, uniting all three objects in a single passage of light to dark.

If Morandi's were a traditional illusionistic space, the high horizon line would indicate that the horizon lies far behind the bottles; but by lining the objects up with the horizon which has been forced forward, Morandi unites it with the objects themselves, flattening them into an abstract pattern. The horizon line has been dropped slightly on the right to line up with the lower angle of the shoulder of the right hand vase, which faces us.

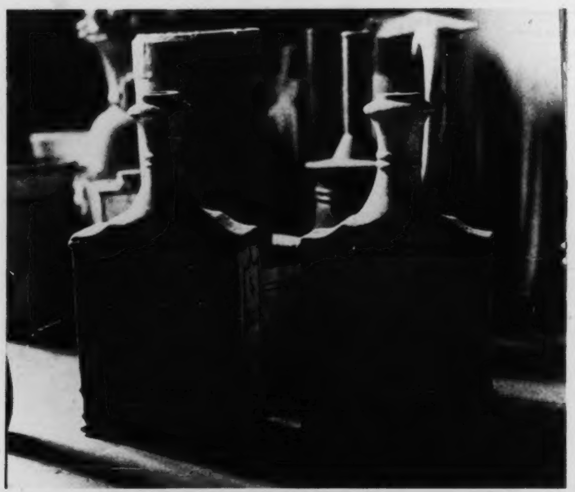
In the next painting the arrangement of objects appears to be the same. The tops of the necks of the vases now run off the canvas, so that their bodies dominate the surface rather than recede into space. Once again, the horizon line meets the shoulders of the vases, but the ground has become darker, more substantial. Part of the small dark bottle has become lighter, so that it bridges the two yellow vases and is itself separated into two abstract rectangles.

Morandi's bottles, cups, cans, silk flowers—"subject matter for 50 years of painting."

From the top rectangle the lip of the striped vase once again branches out.

In the third painting everything shifts radically. The horizon rises nearly to the top of the canvas, and the necks of the vases have disappeared. The vases themselves have grown so large they seem to have become houses. In fact, they closely resemble a pair of houses from a landscape Morandi often painted. The striped vase has disappeared and a different bottle has been placed in the foreground to accentuate the space between the vases.

VOL 71 ISS 3 MR 1983 UMI



The two yellow Persian vases seen in various Morandi still lifes. Photo Bruno Lamberti.

Still Life, 1958, pencil on paper, 6 ½ by 9 ½ inches. Private collection.

Still Life, 1963, oil on canvas, 8 by 12 inches. Private collection.

Still Life, 1963, oil on canvas, 8 by 14 inches. Private collection.

In the fourth variation the vases have expanded dramatically, filling the canvas, invading the remainder of the space, even bursting out of the frame. The necks vanish beyond the top of the painting, like chimneys over the expanded yellow forms of the square bases. The antennalike pattern of the striped vase reappears in the space between the Persian vases.

In the final version the yellow vases have moved into the central foreground. The horizon line now rises slightly above their shoulders and curves away from them on each side, as if they had been transformed into a low hill. The vases have been moved so that now the righthand vase touches and sits slightly behind its neighbor. The foreground bottle has shifted slightly to the right, so that it no longer fills the space between the vases. The necks of the vases rise with an exaggerated curve and end well before the top of the canvas. In place of the striped vase a dark, ambiguous form now fills the space between the necks.

The architecture of the city was as important to Morandi as the objects in his studio. Tacked up on the wall of his studio was an old picture postcard of the church of Sant'Antonio of Padova; it was difficult to tell, at first glance, whether it was a photograph of the church's facade or one of Morandi's architectonic still lifes. It is also difficult, at times, to decide whether Morandi's landscapes are really still lifes, or if his still lifes are not really architectural complexes—landscapes of the city—for they seem to record the atmosphere and buildings peculiar to Bologna.

Tall and thin, Morandi was a walker of remarkable endurance. He paced the city almost every day, observing the shapes and structures of its man-made forms. Like Morandi's paintings, Bologna's architecture is full of irrational surprises. Nothing has remained straight of its tre- and quattrocento buildings. The columns are twisted, the many towers bend and lean towards the earth. It is those forms—as well as the colors of the plaster, the texture of the stone walls, the cast shadows of the arches in the arcaded streets—that are repeated in Morandi's still lifes. Architectural forms appear as oil lamps, painted tins and long thin bottles which, as one Italian critic put it, "could as well have been cathedrals or spires."

The calm slow pace of the foot traveler also allows careful observation of light—how it changes with the seasons, becomes warm or cold, bright or subdued. This shifting light is reflected within Morandi's paintings; one knows in which season his still lifes or landscapes were painted. His colors—

Still Life, 1958, watercolor, 19 by 13 ½ inches. This object appears behind the vases in a few of the 1963 still lifes.

Still Life, 1963, oil on canvas, 8 by 14 inches. Private collection.

Still Life, 1963, oil on canvas, 10 by 12 inches. Private collection.

Still Life, 1963, oil on canvas, 12 by 14 inches. Private collection.

whether in his watercolors, where the pigment flows directly into the paper itself, or in his oils—represent as luminous a range of tonalities as any 20th-century painter achieved. But even the etchings (always in black and white, for Morandi never printed with color) show that he was unique among printmakers of this century in his ability to push a tone to its most subtle limits.

It was in his use of light that Morandi departed most surely from academic realism. Many of Morandi's drawings were done at night, but he always painted in the natural light of day. But the natural light he captured was not necessarily the light of that particular moment, on that particular object. If one looks carefully at the still lifes or the landscapes, one often sees that shadows are not at all those that were cast by the actual objects. Morandi plays with shadows and with them begins to invent new independent forms by radically changing one's perceptions of form and space. Morandi's light is the kind of light seen in the paintings of Caravaggio; it is always natural, but the source is never revealed.

In traditional still life, the light falls from one particular direction and is most often used to define the objects; the shadows and modeling, as in a photograph, reveal a logical structure of light and dark. Morandi's light is autonomous, whether in a still life or a landscape. Each object or specific area may receive light from a different source. Morandi's is a "remembered" light, distilled from years of observing it at different times, wrapped around forms of nature, and then transposed to record a particular moment.

Even in his early works Morandi

Morandi often performed many variations on a simple theme, as with the two vases seen in paintings from 1929 to 1963. In the five still lifes above from 1963 Morandi became fascinated with the balance of the shapes, posing them against the horizon, expanding and abstracting them into patterns.

Landscape, 1961, oil on canvas, 14 by 16 inches. Kunstmuseum Winterthur, Switzerland.

VOL 71 ISS 3 MR 1983 UMI

Landscape, 1961, oil on canvas, 20 ¼ by 12 ¼ inches. Private collection.

Still Life, 1943, oil on canvas, 10 ¾ by 12 inches. Whereabouts unknown.

gave light and shadow as much importance as his material objects. In a metaphysical still life of 1919, it is impossible to tell what is substance and what is shadow. The painting is filled with the rich glow in which the light seems to come from the painted objects themselves rather than from an outside source. Morandi's light is most complex, and much of its subtlety is lost in reproduction. It is only when we see a series of works containing the same objects that we discover the extraordinary range of tonal variations he made from painting to painting. The same white bottle, for example, in five or six different canvases, is never the same white.

Often deceptively calm and simple on the surface, Morandi's work also reveals the fears and uncertainties that he experienced daily in his work. During World War II he had his taste of prison; his choice of simple subjects was often taunted and ridiculed by both the right and the left, and by many who during his lifetime did not want to look at the deeper implications of his work. Morandi's last landscapes and still lifes, twisted and tormented, evoke a strange, desolate feeling. In the novel The Garden of the Finzi-Contini, one of Giorgio Bassani's characters explains that "even the poet, in the last analysis, has to fight against the hostility of Nature and Death. . . . That's what Morandi's famous paintings of bottles and those sweet little flowers are all about. . . . It's the fear of reality."

The austere simplicity, clarity and strength which is to be savored in Morandi's art recalls a European culture far deeper than that of classical Greece or Rome—the art of the Cyclades and Crete. To think of Morandi as being aloof from the mainstream of art, or to equate his reality with realism is to ignore those roots. In his work exists that quality essential to all great art, those elements which defy formal analysis and those traditions which do not exclude change but imply continuity as well. Proust could have been describing Morandi when he wrote, "This work of the artist is to seek, to discern something different underneath the material . . . for art will undo and make us retrace our steps and return to the depths of ourselves, where what really existed lies unknown to us."[10] □

Whether in a still life or a landscape, Morandi's light seems autonomous—it comes from many sources, as if remembered or distilled from years of observation.

---

[1] Organized by James T. Demetrion for the Des Moines Art Center, "Giorgio Morandi" was seen at the San Francisco Museum of Modern Art (Sept. 24–Nov. 1, '81), The Guggenheim Museum (Nov. 19, '81–Jan. 17, '82) and the Des Moines Art Center (Feb. 1–Mar. 14, '82). It was accompanied by an illustrated catalogue Giorgio Morandi (henceforth: G.M.) with essays by Luigi Magnani, Joan M. Lukach, Kenneth Baker and Amy Namowitz Worthen.

[2] J. T. Demetrion, "Preface," G.M., pp. 6–7.

[3] Hilton Kramer, New York Times, Dec. 6,

[4] In 1948 Alfred Barr and James Thrall Soby were sent to Italy by the Museum of Modern Art to assemble a show of 20th-century Italian art. Linking Morandi with Surrealism and Mondrian, they recognized Morandi's importance. Soby wrote: "Morandi's art was totally unlike his academic colleagues . . . and we were not unmindful that Mondrian's abstractions followed an equally restricted path." Giorgio Morandi, London, Arts Council of Great Britain, 1970.

[5] Joan M. Lukach, "Giorgio Morandi, 20th Century Modern," G.M., p. 19.

[6] Riccardo Bacchelli, Giorgio Morandi, Milano, Settimo Giorno, 1958, p. 32.

[7] Lukach, p. 20.

[8] For a detailed discussion of Morandi's etching techniques, see my "Vision and Technique: The Etchings of Giorgio Morandi," The Print Collector's Newsletter, Sept.–Oct. 1981.

[9] Giorgio de Santillana, Homage to Galileo, Cambridge, MIT Press, 1965.

[10] Marcel Proust, The Past Recaptured, trans. Andreas Mayor, New York, Vintage, p. 152.

Author: Janet Abramowicz, a painter, teaches at the Fogg Art Museum, Harvard.

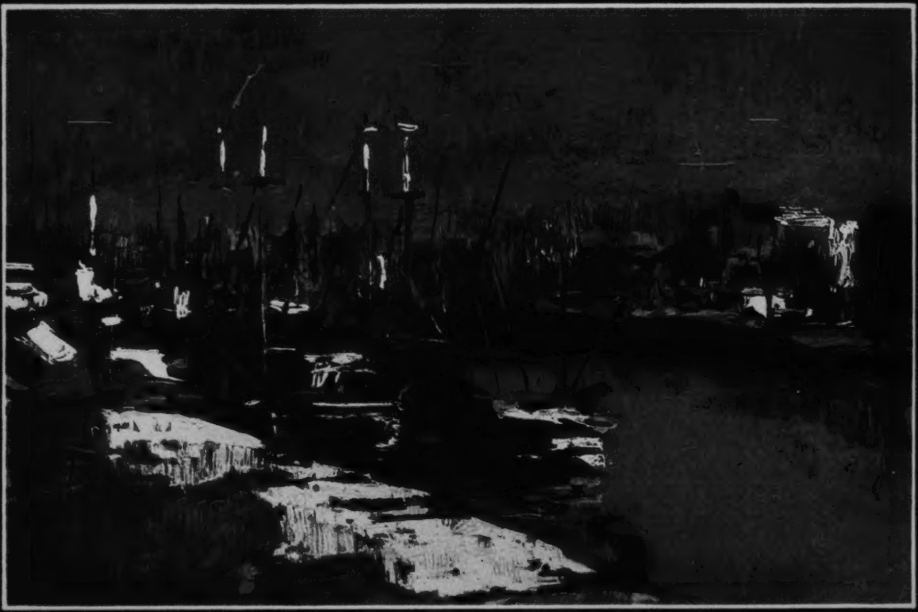
NETTUNO list price $800
© 1981 Nicola Simbari



TERRACINA list price $800
© 1981 Nicola Simbari

Retablos in silkscreen lithographs and etchings

Simbari

CURRENT CATALOGUE AVAILABLE—$5
For authorised Simbari Galleries in your area contact
U.S. DISTRIBUTOR

TamarArts LTD
60 EAST 54TH ST, SUITE 1201, NEW YORK,
N.Y. 10022 TEL. (212) 308-2161

PUBLISHER
SELENE™
P.O. Box 75, Normandy House, St. Helier, Jersey, Channel Islands

VOL 71
ISS 3
MR 1983
UMI

"Umbria" for printmaking.
"Esportazione" for watercolor.
"Roma" for drawing, charcoal, pastels.
100% RAG.
100% HANDMADE.
100% FABRIANO.

You are looking at the world's finest art papers. Still made today exactly as they were for Michelangelo and Dürer. By hand, one sheet at a time.

These are the incomparable papers of Fabriano. A product of 700 years of pride, tradition, and craftsmanship.

Today, the Fabriano mill in Italy is the only major mill in the world still producing exquisite handmade papers. And Grumbacher is proud to offer these papers in North America.

Fabriano handmade papers are distinguished by four deckled edges, 100% rag content, exceptional strength, and a richly textured surface that enhances the artist's spontaneity. And their neutral pH assures they will stand the test of time without yellowing.

Grumbacher also offers Fabriano mould-made papers for watercolor, drawing, printmaking, and etching; now available at better artists' materials stores.

When you cannot compromise with quality...when you need papers that will show your work at its best now and for generations to come...insist on Fabriano from Grumbacher.

Fabriano...artistry in paper.

G™

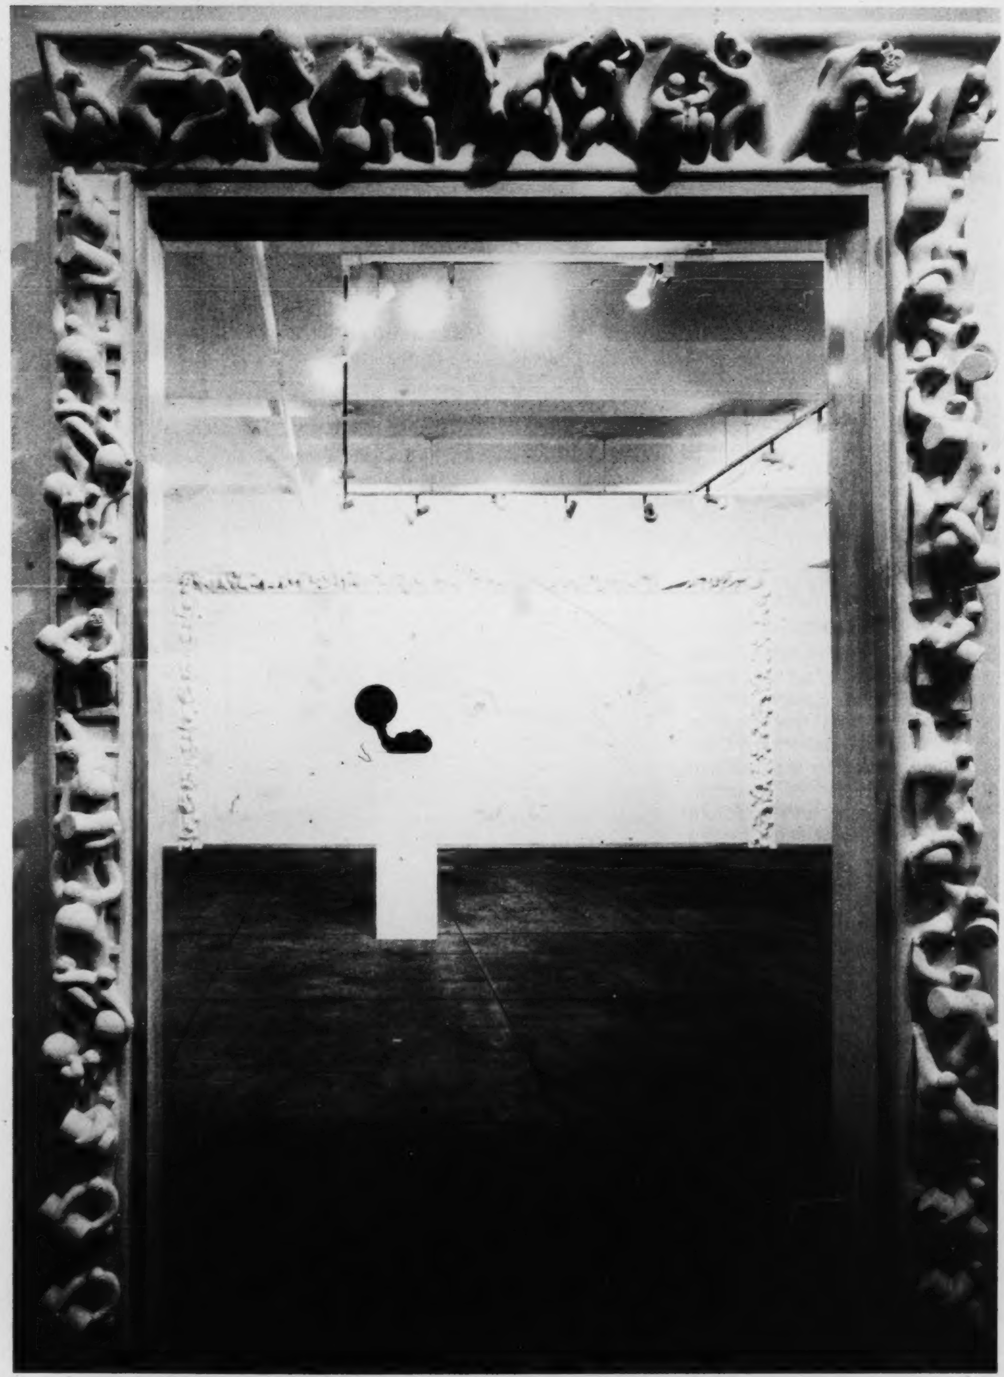
FABRIANO IMPORTED PAPERS FROM GRUMBACHER

Ask your local artists' material dealers for these products, or write:
M. GRUMBACHER, INC. 460 West 34th Street, New York, N.Y. 10001. In Canada: M. GRUMBACHER (CANADA) Inc. 460 Finchdene Square, Scarborough Ontario M1X 1C4

Review of Exhibitions

NEW YORK

Tom Otterness at Brooke Alexander



Tom Otterness: Detail of frieze installation, cast plaster, 1982; at Brooke Alexander.

Tom Otterness is known for his membership in Collaborative Projects, Inc., for a youthful super-8 in which he filmed a gun being emptied into a little dog, and for several series of cast Hydrocal figurines. His association with Colab (an artists' clan involved in "collective" projects and shows) tells us of his social concerns, while the home-movie informs us that Otterness is not unaffected by kitsch's twisted wit. In the film Otterness takes ideas too far, whereas in his statuettes he doesn't take them far enough.

These statuettes are mantelpiece-sized mementoes, odd humorous "mockettes." Seeing Father/Daughter in which a headless child sits atop a headless man's left knee, I remembered Daniel Chester French's Lincoln and imagined a ventriloquist's tomb as Charles Addams might have pictured it. Other pieces played off the idea of a totem pole or mocked the plaques and columns found in great European piazzas and squares. Although these miniature monuments encourage us to contemplate the notion of "commemorative veneration," they are not themselves significant variations on that standard cultural theme. They rarely rise above the status of cartoons, remaining satiric one-liners whose commentary on public sculpture is both limiting and noticeably incomplete.

Otterness's recent exhibition, his first solo show, provided him the opportunity to expand upon his motifs and themes. Here, the characters in his smaller works are granted roles in narrow narrative friezes that border a door and cap several walls of the gallery. (Otterness sells these plaster-cast, fully sculptural reliefs by the foot.) Filled with all manner of active citizens, his work now comments on the ways in which we commemorate our civil affairs—our mythic and historic pageantries.

Otterness's installation had the look of a mausoleum, the feel of a WPA-commissioned, state-supported reliquary. One entered through a relief-trimmed portal showing a production-line of ladder-climbing figures, each toting a solid geometric shape. Egyptian in their militaristic temperament, these characters belong to a race born of the coupling of Cycladic lyre-strummers and Pillsbury doughfolk. They are pudgy, smile-button-faced simpletons; hairless and empty-eyed, they possess no individualizing characteristics, seeming as uniform and ignorantly content as worker-bees. They are a community of gatherers—builders of some monumental, unspecified work.

Otterness's political sentiments are clearly revealed by friezes depicting the events of some glorious revolution that cap the inner walls of his sepulchral shrine. Here, we see lines of toiling workers, as well as the boating parties and motorcades of a royal family. We watch the uprising, the overturning of the monarch's guard

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR 1983
UMI

and limousine. The women rally and proclaim their freedom by jerking a phallus off its pedestal. Otterness, obviously fascinated by assassinations and not a little ironic about revolutions, focuses his attention on the desecration of male authority, providing a detailed depiction of the execution of the king.

In the midst of this social turmoil, carved out of a Polydam plaque set in the middle of a wall below the frenzy of the friezes, a small enigmatic figure crouches in the mouth of his cave. A skull-pondering, diagram-drawing soul, this Hermit Philosopher squatting in his niche is the room's centerpiece. Unlike the others of his race, he possesses a particularized personality and seems capable of independent thought. Alone and contemplative, he considers the individual's place within society. Was he the revolution's leader, the composer of its plan? Is this, then, his tomb—a glorification not of a nation's action but of the vision of a single man?

—Douglas Blau

Giorgio Cavallon at Gruenebaum

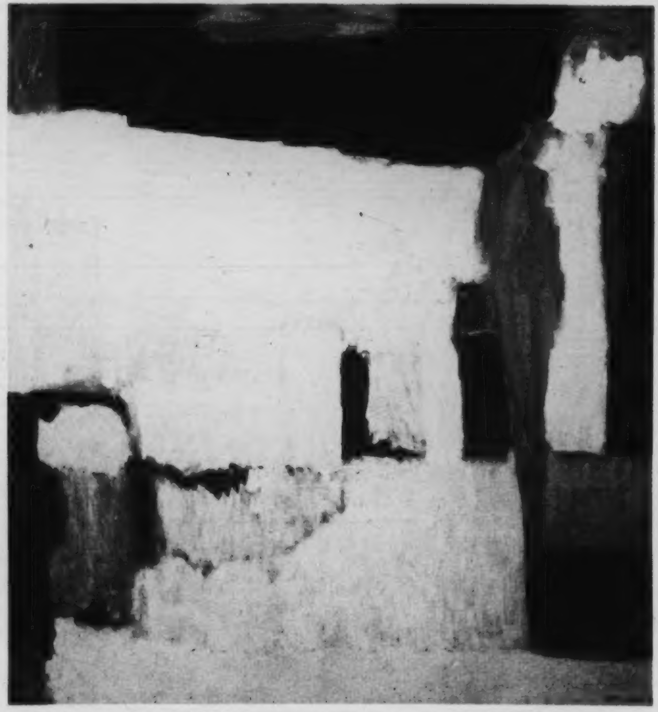
Good painters find what they need to say, and then go on saying it in infinite variations. Cavallon found his picture a long time ago. In 1950 an abstract painting by Cavallon was picked by the Museum of Modern Art for its exhibition "Abstract Painting and Sculpture in America." The museum placed Cavallon among what it called the "pure geometrics." There is a clear connection between that 1950 painting and those in Cavallon's most recent exhibition, although today the paintings are much larger, the planes of color more roughly painted, and white plays a more significant role in the picture as a whole. Today Cavallon would not be seen as a "pure geometric," although his attachment to Neoplasticism remains.

Cavallon compares his method of painting to a game of chess. The painting starts with various colors painted in oil on sized canvas without the customary coating of lead white. He moves these colors around or eliminates them altogether by adding a layer of white. As move succeeds move, the pieces of color begin to disappear, until at length only a few remain. Both picture and game conclude in a draw, which means a balance between forces, a dynamic equilibrium.

On looking—and marveling—at this latest and most handsome of shows, it suddenly came to me that, perhaps unconsciously, Cavallon is still loyal to certain ideas and methods absorbed when he was a student in Charles Webster Hawthorne's class in Provincetown. (This was before his exposure to Hans Hofmann.) Hawthorne must have been a remarkable teacher. He forced his students to concentrate on the mechanics of putting one spot of color next to another, of determining precisely what each color was, and not thinking of a painting as a drawing with color added to it. He presented his color problems in inescapably direct fashion. He would pose a model on the beach, and the students would work with putty knives so that they would not be tempted to show the details of the face in the shadow of a hat in the blazing sunlight. As a means of making his students concentrate on the fundamental relationships of the main spots of color, Hawthorne urged them again and again not to "finish," but to make as many studies as they could. Hawthorne said (as recorded in Hawthorne on Painting, published by Dover and still available) that "beauty in art is the delicious notes of color one against the other. It is just as fine as music and it is just the same thing, one tone in relation to another tone. . . . All we have to do is get the color notes in proper relation."

How's that for a description of a Cavallon painting today?

—Lawrence Campbell



Giorgio Cavallon: Untitled, 1982, oil on canvas, 72 by 68 inches; at Gruenebaum.

Lee Krasner: The Bull, 1959, oil on canvas, 76 ½ by 70 ½ inches; at Robert Miller.

Lee Krasner at Robert Miller

This show of Krasner's paintings from the late '50s takes up soon after her exhibition of collages at the Stable Gallery in 1955, which contained work heralded by Clement Greenberg as a major contribution to American art. It was in this period also that in collaboration with her nephew, Ronald Stein, Krasner made the mosaic designs for the facades of the Uris Building at No. 2 Broadway. (Although Krasner was prevented by union regulations from so much as laying a finger on the smallest morsel of smalti—Venetian glass mosaic—this work remains the best example of modern mosaic in a public place in the New York area.)

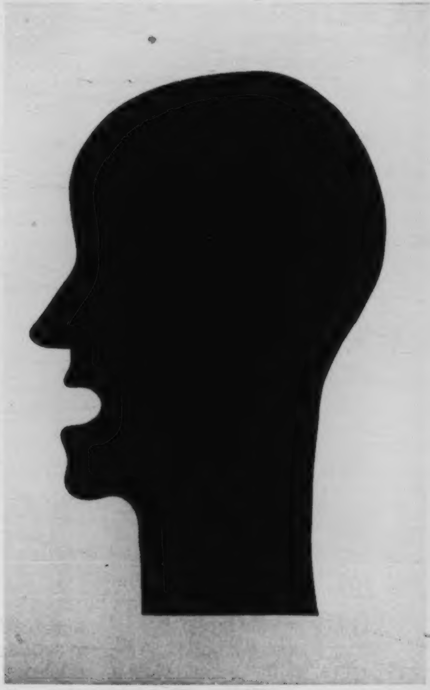
Krasner was highly regarded even before the period covered by this show. Mondrian, soon after his arrival in New York in 1940, said of her painting that it had a very strong "inner rhythm" which she ought never to lose. Already in the work of the late '50s and after, these inner rhythms have come to the surface of the paintings—indeed comprise the surfaces themselves. Examples of this type of rhythmic, almost frenzied painting are Three in Two (1956), where the surface is more divided than cut; Cornucopia (1957); and Butterfly Weed (1957–1981)—all superlative works.

Krasner was beginning to paint at night during this period, which may explain the shift away from the use of bright colors to a dark umber. She had always liked to paint by natural light, so that when there was none, a move to a different kind of contrast was inevitable. The colors in several of the paintings look scorched. One, dated 1959, has bare scrubby areas, drybrushed pinks and burnt umbers all combining to make its title, Breath, particular apt, since this word comes from a Teutonic root meaning "to burn." In another work, one of my favorites titled Visitation (1957–1973), the surface seems sliced into vertical and diagonal shards—as though to lay open a space underneath. Out of this space "eyes" glare, in a way like eyes of the moneylender in Gogol's novella, The Portrait.

Those "eyes" are a motif common to several of Krasner's paintings and they never fail to arouse. For underneath the sweeping cadences and clangorous color of this work, there is always something else—a mad, abstract darkness, a merging of our memories into one great memory, the memory of Nature herself. We might call this quality "barbaric"—a term which originally referred to people who were unable to speak Greek, in other words to cultures which existed prior to or outside Hellenic civilization. It's the best word I can think of to describe Lee Krasner's astonishing paintings of the late '50s.

—Lawrence Campbell

Ned Smyth: Judgement Standing, 1982, mosaic and terrazzo, 7 feet 6 inches by 50 inches; at Holly Solomon.



Gene Davis: Untitled Self Portrait, 1982, acrylic on canvas, 104 by 68 inches; at Charles Cowles.

Ned Smyth at Holly Solomon

We have come to look upon the art of Ned Smyth as an occasion for metahistorical musings and as a stage for a traveler's wanderings and drifts. It has always been difficult to sit before his ornate, architectural settings without slipping off into thoughts of foreign places and of our own culture's place in time. Gazing at his cement palm-arcades, at his columns studded with tiles of glass, we see a collage of cross-references, a medley of allusions to the architecture of older courtly societies. We picture contexts for leisured speculation, backdrops for meditation and impassioned play. In grottoes, we ponder nature's plots to hurry our demise; beside fountains, we dwell on the fluctuations of history's tides. Everywhere, we are reminded of man's transience and of the fragile splendor of the surroundings that we imagine and design.

Theaters curiously free of performers, Smyth's earlier work asked us to consider the notion of "place." In his recent pieces such concerns are pushed to the background. Characters have been introduced—active, full-bodied human figures who function as more than architectural ornaments or props. We are now urged to focus our attention on man's emotional/psychological/spiritual condition—to look for metaphors in the positions of limbs, in the expression of a hand, a face.

Jerry Kearns: Ground Zero, 1980–82, acrylic, photograph, 76 by 84 inches; at Gallery 345 (review on p. 152).

There were two types of figure in this exhibition—one sort fashioned of multicolored concrete, the other made of mosaics of terrazzo and stones. Smyth's concrete figures are personifications, idealized types. Only somewhat manlike—contorted bodies fused with lumpish classical columns—these limnetic grotesques are posed as atlantes, presenting the metaphor of "support" in both a literal and figurative fashion. On each of four columns, two solemn male figures interact and intertwine: one pair plays games of power; another set competes; a father influences his prodigal child; a twin saves his brother from defeat. We question the interrelation and interdependence of parts, we see transgressions, oppressions, turnings of cheek—a host of our moral conceits. Sitting before these works, it is as if The Old Testament were laid out at our feet.

Somewhat different stylistically from the concrete column-figures, a set of mosaics featured a naked actor posing as if before a mirror, or in a spotlight on an otherwise unlit stage. The actor has thrown himself into mannered postures; his body, contorted as if bending under a burden, strains to balance some inner weight. He looks at odds with himself; like most shadow-boxers, he appears simultaneously comic and grave. The mosaics' titles—Temptation and Judgement—inform us that these attitudes are meant to convey sensations of "soul-searching," of "guilt," and of other sentiments related to moral indecision and pain. But this actor's gestures are so artificial that his emotions seem feigned.

I am not sure whether it was the artist's intention to prove that soulless characters are ideally suited to a commentary on the soulful state. But whatever the case may be, the histrionic characteristics of these mosaics grant them an odd self-consciousness and allow them to seem to claim the allegorical qualities of tableaux.

—Douglas Blau

Gene Davis at Charles Cowles

Anyone who went to Gene Davis's recent exhibition expecting to see stripes—stripes precisionist (early work), stripes Impressionist (recent work), or just plain stripes—was in for a big surprise. People, said the gallery attendant, kept walking through the show and coming to the back office to inquire where the Gene Davis was.

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

The artist's name on the walls obviously didn't do the trick.

For the master painter, in his advancing years, has pulled a switch on us—for the moment, anyway. While there was a series of untitled felt-tip drawings in the back galleries, and they were, as always, at once charming and military, the bulk of the exhibition was made up of the artist's new "symbol" paintings, along with—self-portraits?!

We'll start with the symbol paintings, since they are closer in spirit, if not in content, to the striped works. Stripes persisted in these new pieces, but they were modestly drawn in pencil and laid out close to each other in horizontal formats, to make the big, unprimed canvases look somewhat like huge areas of music paper. Randomly dispersed on these fields of lines were the black (and red, and blue) "notes" of the "score"—in Paragraph, a little Star of David, a little cross, two little hearts, a skull, diamonds; in Infinity, more of the same, plus a cent sign, a dollar sign, a square root of 22 sign, a G-clef, two little Monopolylike houses, an Aries the Ram sign, a female sign, a British pound sign, and on and on ad infinitum, including some less easily read constructions of dots and dashes. If indeed the paintings each constituted a John Cagelike score, it was one which could only be played with the eye, and then with some difficulty. It was easier to think of the paintings as well-known hieroglyphs on a holiday from meaning, symbols loosed from their contexts and given new, mysteriously animated life around the canvas.

These symbol paintings aren't entirely new for Davis: they evolve out of his drawings of the past decade or so, which are alive with notations in repetition. Further, as noted, they are akin to the stripe paintings, at least in spirit: they reflect Davis's genius for orderliness, his passion for control in a world (and art world) gone mad with freedom.

The self-portraits, on the other hand, big, emblematic, black-on-white profile silhouettes, seem somehow inimical to everything Davis has ever done. These were arranged, in a first series, in a group of nine identical large-scale canvases, and, in a second series, as 38 small, almost postage-stamp size miniatures. All, large or small, bore the same image: silhouette, simplified cut-out style, of the artist's profile, open-mouthed and bald-pated as could be. Certainly the concern for serial repetition echoes Davis's earlier work, but the style—seemingly derived from cameo brooches or those "antique" silhouettes of George and Martha Washington one saw in suburban homes of the '50s—is post-precisionist, post-Impressionist, post-Pop, and even post-symbolic. Is the open-mouthed Davis speaking a truth, or is he having an infinitely multiplied laugh at the public? Or has he just taken his adventuring into a new format a little beyond his limits? It's hard to say. It is fairly clear that these works beggar their description as self-portraits—Rembrandt, no doubt, would weep. As might Davis fans, newly longing for the footloose martinet of the stripes rather than the local yokel of the silhouettes. Perhaps Davis should have kept this image of himself to himself. He's much more present in the sense and nonsense of the symbol-strewn fields.

—Gerrit Henry

Terry Winters: Star, 1982, oil on linen, 52 by 68 inches; at Sonnabend.

Jerry Kearns at Gallery 345

Jerry Kearns's background in art is decidedly different from many of his 30s-ish New York contemporaries. Instead of studying at Cooper Union or Pratt or the School of Visual Arts, Kearns spent his artistic formative years in such political organizations as the Anti-Imperialist Cultural Union, the Black United Front and the Artists' Meeting for Cultural Change. A graduate of the University of California at Santa Barbara, Kearns found political groups a much more potent inspiration than academia, and he is, to be sure, still politically involved.

And what kind of art should we expect from a man with such a background? Socially aware, politically involved art, and that is what we get. For his first exhibition in many years (he showed with Ivan Karp in long-ago days), the artist strived to somehow "connect the individual with the collective." Four wall-size works were in the show: Ground Zero, a howling man caught in the grip of a hooded figure in black; Stay the Course, a bulbous Uncle Samface falling, upside down, into a stars-and-stripes top hat; Nightrider, a blind man in shades and trenchcoat wearing a sign that says "C.I.A"; and Teach, Sister, Teach, four images of a black woman fervently gesturing with her arms as she exhorts.

Each figure is seen individually and symbolically, which may explain Kearns's statement about linking the individual with the "collective." But he has further ambitions: if all his images are electrically charged with emotion, as in most political art, Kearns says that he is nevertheless bent on making an artistic statement as well as a social one. The method behind each work is more than a little Pirandellian: three of Kearns's four subjects were taken from photographs of political street theater (the black woman is an activist in Brooklyn). Kearns cuts out his figures from black-and-white photographs, blows them up life-size or larger, and paints them with oils and old-fashioned photographic tints; he then mounts them against grounds and shadows painted on the gallery walls, thus giving us art-within-theater-within-art. Though their origin is in photographs of theater, the subjects take on a new life outside their photographic and theatrical contexts. Psychological, as well as social, meaning emerges from these four characters in search of a propaganda poster—each seems to be caught in the throes of some perhaps cosmic crisis.

Social and psychological enough—but is it art? The Pirandellian stuff is a little flimsy—and hoary. Kearns best succeeds when interpreted as a kind of Bernini of the left, creating characters excruciated by their ideals, and who leap out aggressively from their two dimensions toward the viewer's three. At base, his figures are so politically impassioned as to be religious; and if their ecstasies are agonies, this is, after all, Marxism and not the Catholic church. Either way, art does, for a time, have to play the martyr. In the century of purisme pour purisme, though, Kearns's earnest subjection of art to image is welcome, and, at its best, as exhilarating as a well-attended rally.

—Gerrit Henry

Matt Mullican at Mary Boone

A black-and-white photograph picturing a boy in his room was push-pinned onto a bulletin board, a bulletin board very much like the one in the photographed boy's room. The walls of this room are layered with shelves, which are lined with relics, books, bones and other objects known to excite an interest in archeology. Maps are tacked to these shelves, charts to the walls. Banners, pennants emblazoned with logos and emblems, hang above his bed. The boy is busying himself with a chemistry set, mixing potions, invoking fizzings and scents. Combining, realigning, he is brewing colors, cooking up ideas, dreams. Each night, he gathers his collections around him, dividing them and subdividing them into categories, armies, teams. He ranks and files his toys after his own grand design and comes to believe that all the pieces of his world have a place in some pantheistic scheme.

It does not surprise me that Matt Mullican chose to clip this photograph from a magazine, for he strikes me as someone who was—and perhaps at heart still is—this sort of child. His work bears the mark of one who delights in compiling and classifying information, of one who would like to paper walls with graphs and lists. Mullican has produced and collected countless objects. Whether displayed in the form of posters and banners carrying his insignias, trademarks and brands or of bulletin boards and folios overflowing with leaves, each work is but one piece in his puzzle, a single leaf in an ever-growing potpourri. In his exhibitions, we see installments in an ongoing process, a selection of choice threads from Penelope's weave. For Mullican's project, by its very nature, can never know its end: he hopes to catalogue the entire spectrum of knowledge, plans to index all that we might come to sense.

This sensibility is one which flourished in the 18th and 19th centuries, when philosophers (Johnson, D'Alembert, Diderot) designed compendiums that departmentalized all Learning, outlined all History. But unlike Diderot and his peers who sought that chimera, collective objectivity, Mullican plots like a poet, constructing a universal language that does not deny its subjective nature nor attempt to conceal its maker's personality. In this and other respects, Mullican's work is reminiscent of that of Blake, Yeats, Joseph Cornell—cosmological model-builders who envisioned worlds governed by an irrational but mappable scheme, realms bound together by an intricate network of material and spiritual sympathies.

Mullican has devised a diagrammatic grammar that is at once simplistic and hermetically complex. On huge banners of Indian fabric and in tiny studies on cardboard, he has assigned every color specific symbolic values (e.g., red equals "subjective meaning," blue "the world unframed"). Every shape in his vocabulary corresponds to a specific idea (e.g., a head is equated with "subjective meaning," while a camera represents a "concrete view of illusion"). Accordingly, we may need a dictionary to decipher his dictionary: an understanding of the intended meanings of this World Book seems to depend upon an annotated text.

The thought of decoding an artist's glossary is not one that has an appeal for me. But luckily, an enjoyment of Mullican's art is not dependent upon this sort of pedantry. For it is possible to push aside the letter of his laws and to ponder instead their spirit—the spirit of one obsessed with the act of denominating and by the notion of "category."

How have you arranged your books and file-cabinets, your record-and-tape library? By genre, by date or alphabetically? After what fashion do you section, type, caste, class? In how many ways do we break up our world so that its sense, its logic might be grasped? Mullican's art encourages us to question frameworks, to wonder about the nature of super-structures, master plans. Thinking about his work, we become, like Mullican himself, creators of chapter headings, assemblers of inventories, herders of flocks and schools. We come to think like structure-lovers and to think about the manners in which lovers of structure list.

—Douglas Blau

Matt Mullican: Untitled (Heaven), 1982, acrylic on canvas, 98 inches square; at Mary Boone.

Will Barnet: Homage to Leger with K.K., 1982, oil on canvas, 39 inches square; at Dintenfass (review on p. 154).

Terry Winters at Sonnabend

Terry Winters's first solo show provided an antidote—a sober and guardedly hopeful answer—to the latent defeatism and that brand of emptying parody at play in so much recent painting, both "media-derived" and so-called "neo-Expressionist." Winters's works, though loosely representational, provocatively tap Abstract-Expressionist tradition. They are, to begin with, terrifically adept demonstrations in the possible ways of simply laying down pigment. Delicate stippling, casual smudges, torrential background strokes, a thin white stain of milky translucency over a section of raw canvas, tarry black lines dragged by the brush into literal furrows, a pendulous "corolla" form given double gravity by paint heaped to heavy impasto—these, and more, Winters causes gracefully to coexist within the space of one small canvas. The virtuoso paint handling continually guides the eye back to surface, despite the counter-tendency of Winter's images—blow-ups of plant and mineral forms—to project a spatial domain all their own. These works are, in fact, highly complex meditations upon the very act of painting. Recollective in their intent not only of Twombly's recent epitomizations of Greek myth and Johns's latest cross-hatch paintings but also of Guston's late work, Winters's paintings address, quite subtly, the problematical—the intrinsically contradictory—nature of the endeavor of deploying paint for purposes of "imaging."

Winters's images—parts of dissected plants, assemblies of mushrooms and rootless flowers, structurally self-evident crystals—are all derived from small, or hand-sized, and commonplace natural things. These forms, through their displacement from "real" settings and through their being subject to an "abstracting" process superficially imitative of anatomical study, have been rendered here strikingly impersonal, vacant and even non-vital. In keeping with this quietness and inertness, Winters's palette is very restricted and subdued. He has chosen traditionally inexpressive "natural" pigments—earthen blacks and browns, calcium whites, slate blues—colors that serve to equivocally offset the artist's bold and sensational paintwork, and that register as mute, in-the-raw, unassuming.

Of the two types of paintings shown, the smaller and more successful are modelled on pages from a naturalist's notebook. These works both pretend to the naturalist's empiricism and patient objectivity, and adopt his habit of quick, impromptu depiction; they alternate between a precisionism that worries, that builds and curdles the paint, and a sketchiness that loosens it—between forms that are full-blown and ones that are nascent or rudimentary. In these studies, a flower-part, mushroom or crystal is presented not only from several angles and in various states of development and/or dissection, but also in differing degrees of pictorial completeness. A bulbous seedpod may unravel into mere line; a patch of paint may suddenly assume the vase-like contours of a stamen. The sketchbook convention thus licenses—seems even to necessitate—Winters's versatile use of paint. His guise here, too, of scientific neutrality further strips his subjects of all possible association, converting them into

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

Hunt Slonem: Hand, 1982, oil on canvas, 66 by 54 inches; at Alex Roseberg (review on p.156).

Joe Shannon: GQ Variation: The False Minotaur, 1982, oil on canvas, 59 by 41 inches; at Tibor de Nagy.

"transparent" vehicles of technique and of the artist's own idiosyncratic orientation. It is, finally, this curiously involuted "objectivity" that prevents Winters's images from acquiring independent life—from slipping into a symbolism of even the most measured, private or self-referential kind.

These small, diaristic works betray, at last, an acute self-consciousness along with an almost halting restraint. Each painting proceeds by a carefully monitored, dual process of evocation and cancellation—a process that suggestively parallels the "life history" of natural things, as well as the incessant and disquieting flux of thought itself. In working up a section of canvas, Winters may coat over, scrape back and partially efface some of his images, causing them to appear not only unfinished and emergent, but also worn, spectral, abraded. His paint-work, at its thickest and most sensorily urgent, teems with underlying forms; his surfaces often self-contradictorialy read as sums of manifold strata of revisions. Time here, as a consequence, is neither static nor strictly a measure of process, but evolutionary and strangely open-ended. Conflated within, say, a field of unevenly resolved mushrooms or within a single half-skeletal/half-solid crystal are myriad, mutually qualifying moments—any number of both past and potential, literal and figurative stages.

The surfaces of Winters's paintings fluctuate constantly between the "skin" of surface paint and an always complex, always precarious pictorial space. This spatial play is given a tellingly paradoxical, but also rather mechanical, twist in the five large "Theophrastus' Garden" paintings—odd, airless "landscapes" with wattle-fence lower borders, up-tilted grounds and irregular blithe "wall-paperings" of one recurrent and silhouettelike flower. Here, Winters's most turbulent and inchoate, or "immediate," brushwork is confined to a dissolving background terrain of uncertain depth, while his images float to the surface. These flowers, isolate instances of articulation, are like temporary landmarks in a darkling world threatened, from "below," with inundation—with the incoherence of sheer headlong process. Yet here, as never in his smaller works, Winters seems to doubt his images's holding strength: as unnecessary safeguard he has discovered for his "gardens" a compositional arrangement—a framed patterning of stiff little discrete forms—that is forced, overly programmatic, ornamental. When, though, Winters allows his paintwork to freely commingle with his subject matter, and both to generate their own design, his work is unimpeachable—for it compellingly enacts the phenomenological quandary at the heart of image-making.

—Prudence Carlson

Will Barnet at Dintenfass

Although it would be inaccurate to say that the 71-year-old Will Barnet's portraits are all style, there certainly is a great deal of style in these canvases. Culled for this exhibition from the work of 15 years, Barnet's portraits show an amazing homogeneity in their approach to sitters: he paints not as the eye sees, but as the hand and mind design, with consideration for likeness, certainly, but with even more of a penchant for the decorative within the real.

Thus three-dimensional subjects are flattened out into near two-dimensional visages; clothes are essentially flat planes of color, and Barnet takes great delight in painting in little decorative motifs that help to identify his sitters—e.g., the microscopelike instrument along the left edge of Portrait of Dr. Katzin, the Deco office surroundings for a Portrait of Roy Neuberger, the red-striped, elegant chaise in Portrait of Barbara Rabson. The overall effect is one of suave orientalism, but there is also a resemblance between Barnet's flattened figures and the portraits done by American limners in Colonial days.

Which is to say that Barnet is operating in these portraits as a very sophisticated primitive—one with an excellent color and formalist sense, it's true, but also one who seeks to subtly ennoble and heroize his sitters. These qualities are especially evident in Portrait of Professor Walter Gellhorn, in which the good professor, chalk and folded paper in hand, stands before a blackboard containing his inscription of a fairly corny motto from Justice Holmes. This portrait smacks not only of Colonial primitivism but even of Grant Wood in its willful simplicity and skilled idealizing of an American subject.

The portraits are somewhat different from Barnet's better-known paintings of comely young women in interiors and landscapes—figures who demurely go about their business, often in the company of some overstuffed cat. No matter how naive, the portraits are more solid and at times evidence a certain psychological insight that is hard-won in such a self-contained style. Hampton Bays, for instance, achieves psychological depth and even narrative overtones merely by picturing a couple—the woman staring out at us, the man viewed in profile, seated in a chair reading, and both set against a background of tall green grass and brooding purple skies. And a Woman with White Cat seems more substantial than other women, other cats.

Still, Barnet generally remains the consummate stylist, teasing us with interesting faces but really intent on showing up the fascinating patterns inherent in things. Critic Katharine Kuh may intrigue us with her marvelously coiffed gray hair and wise eyes, but Barnet has chosen to show her in front of her favorite painting by Léger, another great stylist. The French artist's smoking workman—little bubbles of smoke rise up around his fingers—pretty much steals the show in this art-within-art brand of tomfoolery. The feckless limner, complete with a down-home sense of humor, is there again in Kiesler and His Wife, the two of them on the sofa, the enormous woman sitting across from her relatively tiny husband, her hand proffered, of course, to a cat—this time a black one.

Good nature with a touch of malice, idealism tinged by primitivism—these are the qualities we come to expect from Barnet. So one is pleasantly surprised to come across a painting in this show called, simply, Memoir. In it, a woman, profile to us, sits in a brown chair at a long brown table; she is dressed in a kind of dressing gown, her hair is clipped short, and her hand rests on a book. A grayish brown wall is interrupted at the right by a window looking out at what seems to be a Renaissance European city. This is the only anonymous portrait in the show, yet it is the most distinctive—the troubled harmonies of its colors and the tense beauties of its competing geometric forms constituting a kind of masterpiece. According to the label, Barnet worked on this portrait from 1970 to 1979; it was well worth the time.

—Gerrit Henry

Joseph Shannon at Tibor de Nagy

Joe Shannon is back with more of his oddball realist paintings, this time more oddball—and riveting—than ever. In the '70s Shannon seemed to be taking some "no-comment" sociopolitical view of the world, making freaks out of normal people, and normals out of clowns and freaks—in general, painting the soft underbelly of American society with beer-drinking gusto. His latest show was more self-consciously arty; indeed, he repeatedly used Picasso's beloved symbol, the minotaur.

In fact, the show could have been titled "Further Adventures of the Beast." Although the works exhibited here were not painted in series, the show was hung so that it "began" with a canvas that might provide some orientation for the viewer. GQ Variation: The False Minotaur features a highly attractive nude man and woman striding down a paint-happy beach, her arm around his shoulder while he carries a minotaur's head. This is the last time we see the man with a human head. Further variations include a happy woman on bed, legs spread wide, the minotaur resting his hand alarmingly near her vagina, a black cat in the window. And in Pink Minotaur Monitor: Night Guests, a nude woman stands with the minotaur beneath a pink TV monitor that shows his head—pun evidently intended.

Picasso's Saltimbanques and the like are honored in a painting titled Barnyard Animals: Entertainers at Rest, which features the minotaur (what a show he must have put on); a black woman in Pierrot costume, her arm draped around the beast's shoulder; a fat man in Mafioso garb; a nude woman seen from the back to the left; a mule and, to the right, a duck. Things get even stranger with a blind minotaur in Miami—apparently about to make beastly love to the nude woman beside him on a bed, a Ryderesque moon in blue and brown night shining outside the window. A Mediterranean Minotaur with Dancer looks pretty much as titled, and, as a kind of climax to the whole thing, That Day in Pompeii depicts the nude woman on a purple couch, the minotaur beside her, a volcano erupting behind them. The Brute in Beirut, a glaring political commentary, ends our adventures through history and the world with the beast. A mythic creature has been revived, with no Theseus around to slay him, and the nude woman's attraction to him comes as no surprise in today's bizarrely sensationalist culture. To paraphrase Sylvia Plath, every woman loves a minotaur.

A few of the paintings in the show come sans beast. Joe's Tempesta pictures the nude artist—little horns sprouting from his head—in an Arcadian grove with the ubiquitous nude woman sprawled under a tree; here, Shannon apparently represents the beast in all of us. Of Cities, Fear of New York is more complex: a handsome male nude—with horns, of course—stands transfixed in a gray room; to his right a clothed man gesticulates wildly at the back of a female nude seen through a window, and, to his left, cameo scratchings of a knife and a gun appear. Behind the two men a path leads to a room at the back of the painting; from the red and black flames leaping from it, the room can be read only as Hell.

But the minotaur prevails, even when not present. Hell, horns, half-human beast—Shannon assuredly has a bead on what just might be disturbing the contemporary unconscious, which is to say, the things that have always disturbed it. His freaks have become monsters, and his normals their hierophants. The god for late-20th-century man, Shannon seems to be saying, is the sort of "rough beast" Yeats foresaw for the second coming. That Shannon is able to present so dark a vision of mankind with quirky hilarity is in itself an achievement. That such scenes entertain even as they chill is nothing if not downright perverse—and, for us moderns, to the point. Even Dionysus would have offered more hope.

—Gerrit Henry

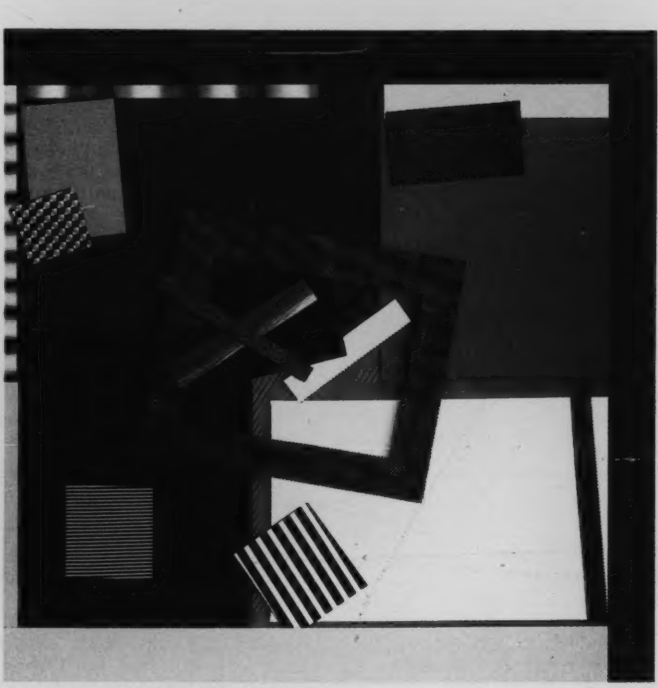
Ronnie Elliott: Collage #1, 1947, 28 by 20 inches; at Andre Zarre.



Paul Sarkisian: Untitled #4, 1982, acrylic and glitter on canvas, 96½ by 95½ inches; at Nancy Hoffman (review on p. 156).

Ronnie Elliott at Andre Zarre

While in Paris during May of this year, Ronnie Elliot died without any prior warning. This exhibition of collages, all from the 1940s, was a memorial to probably the first American to have specialized in the medium. More of her collages were on view at the same time at the Contemporary Arts Museum in Houston, in "The Americans: Collage, 1950–1982."

Usually Elliott selected pieces of Chinese fabric, which she then bleached and painted, and finally glued to a surface with a homemade glue. Yet perhaps the sequence was not like this. Did she first glue everything down, and only then paint the collage, as though the forms of the cloth elements corresponded to a kind of drawing? The creative process is not clear from the works. How did they come into existence—these mysterious, abstract, rather moody collages?

One thing is clear: their mystery does not lie in any relationship between image and ground. The forms sit athwart each other without any subtlety. If one form verges on another, it does so without any tension. It is strange that Elliott made such a point about the fabric being Chinese. Often it has a Merz-like quality; she could have found it on the

VOL 71
ISS 3
MR 1983
UMI

street in New York's garment district. And very frequently the paint is so thick it has covered up the texture of the fabric almost entirely. Sometimes there are lines in her compositions that start off as defining the edge of something, but soon they wander away or just hang around, unattached.

Yet despite the limpness of their structures, there is something exceedingly positive about these works. They are real unities. They sometimes made me think of reflections in a puddle—when the wind has picked up and tugged at the water, so that the image has begun to slip sideways. They are abrim with a quiet emotional intensity. Their colors are evening dark.

By a quirk of fate, and not because of any shortcomings in the quality of her work, Elliott is often overlooked in favor of Ann Ryan, who herself was originally inspired by Elliott's collages and absorbed her methods. Although similiar in technique, the two women's collages are very different. Ryan's configurations of cloth, usually high-keyed in color, allude to Neoplasticism, whereas Elliott's forms are much more diverse, and her colors much more somber. Her style is difficult to analyze whereas Ryan's is rather obvious.

—Lawrence Campbell

Sean Scully: Adoration, 1982, oil on canvas, 9 by 13 feet; at William Beadleston.

Paul Sarkisian at Nancy Hoffman

During the last decade, Paul Sarkisian has moved with certainty from a meticulous photographic realism to abstraction, slowly emptying his geometric forms of their realist detail. His trompe-l'oeil images of rectangular envelopes, newspapers and assorted paper scraps are arranged in the manner of Cubist collage, and it is tempting, given their place in time, to see them as a critique of two opposing schools—geometric abstraction and Photo-Realism. But that would be too simple. Something more is at stake here, something beyond matters of style.

In his nine new paintings Sarkisian presents the question of illusion in radical terms, turning the premise of trompe-l'oeil realism on its head, discarding most of his representational collage imagery. (By comparison, the three new canvases that still include images of newspapers and such seem disappointing leftovers from his earlier phase.) In place of this imagery Sarkisian has painted abstract geometric planes as if they were themselves floating objects in the world. He does this by laying down a brilliantly colored acrylic ground, occasionally patterned, upon which a variety of rectangles and squares is painted. They too are patterned with stripes, dots and even glitter, thus calling out their identities as palpable things. They are then "lifted" from the canvas by means of illusionistic shadows air-brushed beside each form.

Larry Zox: Crow Shoal II, 1982, acrylic on canvas, 81¾ by 31⅞ inches; at Salander O'Reilly (review on p. 158).

Pink, yellow, orange, gold, these homages to the square and rectangle look like Russian Suprematist canvases high on champagne. Yet their intoxicating effects are calculated. Sarkisian is not solely accomplished in illusion, but in allusion as well. Untitled #4, approximately eight feet square, is reminiscent of Max Weber's Chinese Restaurant of 1915, in which checkered grids and a patterned orange, oblong shape dance dizzily beneath and above a central frame. The frame motif also recalls William Harnett's Artist's Card Rack, 1897, and John Peto's Old Time Letter Rack of the same period—great trompe-l'oeil predecessors. Finally, Sarkisian refers to Cubist collage—as well as to the recent use of pattern and decoration in painting.

But Sarkisian's art is more than an exercise in reference. To do what he has done—to make abstract forms as real as the figures of everyday life—is an important advance for painting. And Sarkisian has accomplished it with great craft and wit.

—Steven Henry Madoff

Hunt Slonem at Alex Rosenberg

For all the painterly frivolousness of his work, Hunt Slonem seems dead serious in his decoration: every square inch of his canvas is covered with some object or motif, and in some instances—as in a Hand with stigmata surrounded by blue and white clouds, lilies, iris and hummingbird—the subject matter is sobering indeed.

More often, though, Slonem keeps it light; but he still seems more ambitious than many of his peers. If his genre is still life, it is epic still life: each of his arrangements of objects and designs encompasses deliberately meaningful elements, often historical in nature. While the elaborate Kingfisher is glutted with such exotica as toucans and macaws, butterflies and ferns, it also contains the head of an American Indian, a Japanese fan and mask, and, above all, a cameo portrait of Shakespeare (painted from a medallion in a Puerto Rican schoolhouse), lending the painting a historical resonance foreign to most painters of decoration.

Many of the items in Slonem's paintings are things he has picked up in his travels—to Guatemala, Nicaragua and Japan, among other places. Dogwood, for instance, features a slice of "a cheap Belgian tapestry" that Slonem was given as a present, showing Marie Antoinette and her court, offset by branches of imitation-silk dogwood, parrots, and powder-blue pom-poms. The "let 'em eat cake" lady is particularly appropriate to Slonem's sensibility—so royal, yet, in the end, so touchingly, harrowingly mortal.

Ancient and non-Western history is present, too—in Green Bill, in a Peruvian idol and an African mask (offset by a hilarious red and white polka dot motif), and in Skins, in a bust of a classical type Slonem takes to be Marc Antony (along with a bust of George Washington, all this decorated with cheap pink or white or orange leopard skin). Green Bill also alludes to religious history—a picture of a nun with a small wooden cross beside her—and to Oriental history—a Samurai warrior painted on a kite. Stigmata, Shakespeare, the classics—all are grist for Slonem's decor-happy mill.

But Slonem has depths other than those achieved by references to the past. There is an outspoken mystery to his best works—the mystery of creation, not just the artist's, but God's. For instance, in Parakeets there is the sheer, manic loveliness of four Parakeets amidst flowers on a branch, or in Hyacinth Macaws, of six gorgeous birds spreading their wings against an upper border of orange and blue hyacinths, all against an orange ground.

Siren strikes a deeper note, the deepest in the show. Here Slonem goes underwater, to our most primal "past": while the by-now familiar geisha, Indian maiden, Latin American idol and stuffed parrot form the surface of the painting, fish of every variety—pompano, shark, the goldfishlike koi, crayfish, even an octopus—swim in blue and purple waters. Robert Kushner has his cupids, and Brad Davis his dogs, but Slonem's creepy, stunning fish speak more loudly of the nature upon which all decorative art is patterned. In short, it's not all as superficial as one might think. This is Slonem's version of Genesis, the lower reaches brought up to the light—decorative, dark, delightful.

—Gerrit Henry

Sean Scully at William Beadleston

There is a great clarity in the paintings of Sean Scully. His vibrant bands of color arise from the Minimalist tradition, yet he invests Minimalist objectivity with brazen emotion. His oils seem to shine from within his layered, lushly brushed canvases, exploiting provocatively the paradox of paint as both material substance and light.

The two large canvases in this recent show, Heart of Darkness (three panels) and Adoration (10 panels), reestablish the monumental air of Rothko's work. The eye is drawn in by their ever-increasing depth and texture, creating an expansive world for the emotions. Scully repeats one band's underpainting in the surface color of its neighbor, thus building a musical rhythm. The horizontal movement of Heart of Darkness slows ominously, as the first panel's white stripes change, in the next, to great blocks of earthen brown alternating with black. In the third panel, the bands have narrowed and become vertical, with the brown now a savage yellow. This painting is charged with the same instinctual impulse found in the Conrad novella after which it was named.

Adoration, on the other hand, is filled with Mediterranean light, airy pinks and golds. With its complex variation of vertical and horizontal bands and edges, the work is extraordinarily fluent in the traditions of modern painting. The varying intensities of color and the shifting widths of the bands express spatial tension as adroitly as any Cubist work does. The panel on the far right is shorter than the others, and the panel on the far left actually protrudes—both effects call attention to the objectness of the painting. And a Matissean decorativeness, a brushy flatness and an expressive depth are exposed at the various edges of stripes and canvas. Yet while speaking to its material nature, Adoration still celebrates lightness and spirit.

Among these nine new works, ranging in size from nine by 13 feet to 10 by 11 inches, the smaller pieces wanted more exhibition space than they were given. With study they unfold. Their laden bands of oil on wood are delicate, a more jeweled affair than the large canvases. The surfaces of these paintings bring us inward through their textures to the mottled shading of their underpainting—a darkening passage suggestive of both mortality and the beyond. Indeed, such small works as Kussia and Warner call to mind Yeat's stanza that begins, "Once out of nature I shall never take/My bodily form from any natural thing." —Steven Henry Madoff

Richard Carboni: Sky, 1982, mixed mediums on canvas, 18¾ by 24½ by 2¼ inches; at Getler Pall (review on p. 158).

David True: Tacit Witness, 1982, oil on canvas, 85 by 92 inches; at Edward Thorp.

Ralph Rosenborg: American Landscape Forms, 1946, oil on canvas, 32 by 42 inches; at Schlesinger-Boisanté.

Ralph Rosenborg at Schlesinger-Boisanté

Although Ralph Rosenborg was an early member of the American Abstract Artists (founded 1936), his work is not strictly abstract. Rosenborg does not simplify or reduce particularities, or seek essential aspects. Instead he substitutes for experience magical evocations of an exceedingly tangible sort. His art has always been extraordinarily personal and inventive.

In Moonlight, 1938, Rosenborg composed a strange, surreal expanse, a kind of sea chockablock with small tumbling shapes which look like cubed hexagram forms from the I Ching. Beneath a moonless sky black lines (like licorice) parallel white lines (like nougat)—these the imagination readily recasts as the rooftops of a sleeping city. (The mention of licorice and nougat is no fantasy: Rosenborg's crusty surfaces seem almost edible.)

Village, 1940, is another remarkable work. Here Rosenborg seems to have attacked the painting, peeling back its surface in order to disclose a luna park at night with rollercoaster scaffoldings and a distant sea.

Perhaps the strongest of the 21 paintings in this show was American Landscape Forms, 1946. It looks as though Rosenborg used a trowel to build this plateau of green and yellow paint, into which he afterwards scratched a multiplicity of tribal, cross-cultural graffiti. This work elbows its way almost rudely into one's consciousness. The bulk of the show consisted of small watercolors in which networks of colored lines cover diaphanous and fugitive colors—in a way suggestive of primitive maps of uncharted regions.

Visitors to this exhibition might be overheard to murmur Klee, Charchoune and Poliakoff. An analogy with Klee is understandable; as for the latter two, Rosenborg anticipated by at least a decade similar works by them. Rosenborg should be a household name; yet, despite an extensive curriculum vitae, he is today little-known in New York except to old-timers. But perhaps this show is like the first sign of Halley's Comet: no more than a tiny point in the sky now, but in a few years a blazing light.

—Lawrence Campbell

David True at Edward Thorp

Alive in David True are two conflicting sensibilities: his metaphysical side, which speculates intensely and fearfully on the enigmatic condition of being; and the naturalistic side, in which direct observation is sufficient, and straight description the most natural and authentic approach to being. For nearly a decade, since producing his ship and stag images in paintings that pretty much segregated his two styles and attitudes, True has continually attempted to synthesize those sensibilities. In his recent exhibition several canvases display a quite successful fusion of modes, and show True progressing towards his ambition.

VOL 71 ISS 3 MR 1983 UMI

Among the most accessible of these is Imprisonment, in which a stag somersaulting in air and an emaciated satyr regard each other, each sharing aspects of the other's physical and mental nature, even as they are destined to remain foreign and incapable of full identity. In this work, equivalence of animal intelligence and human instinct is presented in a straightforward way, yet midair somersaulting indicates the event to be a frank improbability that only occurs in revelation, not in actual fact.

Tacit Recognition, more elusive in its speculative content, is forthright both in naturalistic description and design, the interlocking of figure and space creating a tense and enigmatic image. Presented here are the schematic pink facade of a house and an ocher stag whose hindquarters are all we see as he disappears from sight. This psychological event—perhaps the yoking of instinct to domestication—is taking place in the suburb of a gray, runelike metropolis hunched on the far, electric blue horizon. The somewhat portentous nature of this backdrop is redeemed by the juxtaposition of house and stag, an image at once unnerving and unforced. The strange inevitability that True strives for so painstakingly in his personal allegories is here palpable enough to carry the painting. For the most part, however, True achieves coherence more effectively through pattern than image. Patterns of rock and sky build to subjective geophantasms that express an irreality of time and space, an illusion employed to undermine the objective-seeming solidity of nature and natural history. Excepting its unconvincing central image, Time and Change successfully conflates different textures derived from nature for the purpose of deranging nature, shifting it towards metaphysical trauma. At the same time, following a Surrealist strategy, True allows the trauma to seem concrete for being minutely, materially described.

To some extent, however, True remains hampered by the fact that his mimetic talent and craft are more accomplished than his ability to develop a convincing symbology. Notably, the man who appears ritualistically from painting to painting bears vestigial illustrative tendencies; he is both too detailed and too naturalistic in scale relative to other images and to the field of the canvas. Free to take extensive formal liberties with ships, True is more symbolically and visually literal with the freighted human image. It remains to be seen just how this disparity will finally work itself out, but in the meantime True still offers us passages in which description yields both the metaphysical and the marvelous. —Marjorie Welish

Picasso Sculpture at Pace

Better take a look at Picasso's Baboon and Young before you try another bronze sculpture with offspring, Sandro Chia. Picasso's baboon embraces its young. Your new sculptures have baby sculptures at their feet like reject clones. You may be attempting a joke on the grand manner with your self-consciously pompous bronzes, but Picasso found simplicity through metaphor: his baboon's face is two toy cars. For Picasso it was a question of look-alikes. The old man saw a baboon's face in his children's toys. For you it is an issue of youthful ambition and pretence, of pretending to be someone you are not yet: the mythic painter-sculptor.

Reconsider Picasso's Glass of Absinthe (1914) before you make another small sculpture. It is a still life, which in French is nature morte. Metaphorically speaking, this sculpture, painted a bloody rusty red, could kill you. Picasso has camouflaged his bronze Molotov cocktail to look like a painted ceramic.

A painter once observed that Picasso's ceramics are a bid for immortality. "What lasts longer than canvas, metals and wood?" the painter asked. He answered his own question: "shards."

While it is still in one piece, I want to point out one of Picasso's ceramics in particular, a tall jug poised on three legs. Called Face Posed on Two Hands (1952), it transcends the status of pot to become a towering contemplative sculpture and painting—a figure whose arms are the ceramic's two front legs, and whose neck or body is the instrumental third leg of ceramic on which painting and sculpture stand. Hold on to your vases, and Venuses on the half-shell, Keith Haring; Picasso was ransacking the Mediterranean traditions before you were born.

Robert Hudson: Plum Bob, 1982, steel, paint, 103½ by 86 by 72 inches; at Fuller Goldeen (review on p. 165).

Picasso's small figurative sculptures are the parents of what's happening today. In this respect the timing of the Pace show was perfect. Picasso's bronze satyr harked back to Lucas Samaras' bronze creatures (seen at Pace last March) and paved the way for Brice Marden's Grecian marbles, not to mention Ernest Trova's bronze tchotchkes (seen at Pace in November). Further afield, Joel Shapiro's cast bronze wooden figures would not have been possible without figures like Picasso's Man with a Javelin (1958), likewise cast from flat planks of wood. Marcus Lüpertz's new painted plasters seem like attempts to synthesize heads from Picasso's various periods: the mass of Fernande (1909) with Harlequin's colors (1915) and the volumetric slice of Sylvette (1954).

Even more loosely, Picasso's Running Man of 1961—a development of his wall reliefs into one dominant, glopped-up, freestanding surface—can be seen as heading directly towards Jean Dubuffet, back then, and Jonathan Borofsky now.

In his monumental figurative work Picasso again seems to have anticipated all present concerns. Your cast bronze flora and fauna sculptures, Nancy Graves, grow directly out of Picasso's Woman in a Garden (1929-31). All you latter-day Pygmalions who, like Alain Kirili, long for Galatea's return to the pedestal have, no doubt, checked out Picasso's Woman in a Long Dress (1943). Exhibited at Pace on a slight base, she became another female allegory of Picasso's resistance to fascism. Secretly cast by Picasso's friends in bronze that might otherwise have been used for gun metal in Nazi-occupied Paris, the Woman in a Long Dress, with her archetypal chignon, one hand clenched in a fist, the other placed over her womb, emerges as the essence of a woman of the people.

Speaking of social realist sculpture, Martin Silverman, your playground-style bronzes bear an obvious debt to works like Picasso's Girl Jumping Rope (1950), with its strange mix of brutalism and panache. Less obvious may be the relation of Picasso's sculpture to Victorian bronzes or the pun implicit in the dangling pair of old ladies' shoes, another case of Picasso's gallows humor.

For ghoulishness, there is no adequate successor to Picasso's black-and-white painted skeleton Centaur made for Clouzot's 1955 film Mystère de Picasso. Although ephemeral, it has stayed fresh in its ability to summon up moments in Picasso's past as diverse as Parade, Guernica and La Joie de Vivre. Moving in either extreme, toward perishability and lasting quality, one found a Devil (1952) made of corrugated cardboard so fragile it had to be supported by plexiglass, and the great Death's Head (1943) in bronze and copper so irreducible that Arnold Glimcher, this exhibition's organizer, put it on the floor. One leans down to see it up close and imagines how heavy it would be to hold. There is the burden of sculpture after Picasso.

—Brooks Adams

Richard Carboni at Getler/Pall

At first glance, these 16 mixed-medium works on canvas or paper appear to be abstractions, with hints of the representational in color (a sky blue or a grass green, for example). In their use of painted, collaged sticks, they are sometimes almost totemic in feeling. The metaphorical aspect of the works is reinforced by the titles: Ascent, Well, Horizon, Sky, etc. Sky (19 by 24 inches) is fairly typical of the smaller pieces: in it a thin stick is suspended from string against a background of sky, a range of hills in taupe and a dark green squared "U" shape; the stick appears to be resting on the point of a black equilateral triangle. What little "reality" there is in this scene is further lessened by the whitish-gray brushstrokes that make up a sort of curtain covering the upper half of the sky, and the groups of blue triangular shapes (black at the upper edge) collaged above it.

On examination, each of these triangular shapes is seen to be a painted and collaged paper airplane. Carboni's most unusual device, these planes appear in most of these works, always in groups forming a larger pattern and in different colors. Perhaps they signify the man-made, but oddly enough, although Carboni's work is not without humor, the planes are not at all funny—they have none of the feeling of the grade-school prank that one usually associates with them.

Other materials that Carboni uses in these works (in addition to paint, string and sticks) are sand, wood shavings, sawdust and hair. Painted but not disguised, they add to the atmosphere of personal symbolism that pervades the work. However, except for the blue and green, Carboni's color does not appear to be symbolic; it is chosen rather for its harmonious effect.

Symbolic possibilities aside, these "mixed medium works" are basically paintings, and Carboni's handling of paint is assured. The other elements are so neatly blended in that (except for the sticks) they are not even immediately apparent. Even the strings appear, from a short distance, to be painted lines.

The size of the works varies from 10 by 13 inches (Cage) to 44 by 32 (Antigravity [for Houdini]), and although the latter is successful, Carboni seems more at home here in the smaller scale. The smaller works are finally not so much abstractions as metaphoric distillations. One has the feeling of looking into some other, but vaguely familiar world.

—Tony Towle

Will Northerner: March, 1982, acrylic, powdered paint mixed with gloss medium, 46 by 37½ inches; at Zolla/Lieberman (review on p. 165).

Jim Isermann: Motel Modern, installation at Richard Kuhlenschmidt Gallery, 1982 (review on p. 164).

Larry Zox at Salander-O'Reilly

Larry Zox's recent exhibition, his first in New York in five years, marked a shift in his artistic strategies. As recently as two years ago, Zox's pictures seemed to expand outward from dead center. The good ones could be read as softly inflected fields of carefully laid color. Shapes seemed tranquil if not altogether static within the comparatively charged expanses of color. Perhaps because the color grounds were dominant in the older pictures, Zox favored large canvases, to which he applied color in the form of long, looping lines made with oil sticks, brushes and other painting tools. Larger shapes were often poured on and spread into wet grounds.

The recent pictures make use of much narrower panels—Catawba's 7-by-1½-foot proportions are typical—and there is a very definite concentration on a crisp, deliberate color drawing that flows from top to bottom and side to side. In the painting Blanche de Merv, a thin gray ground containing yellow and green changes from left to right, lightening on the right and giving the appearance of sunlight about to break through a dense fog. By brushing a darker gray into the ground from right to left in thick, sure strokes, the artist draws attention to the changes in the ground.

Another strategy is used to bring forth the subtle color ground in Catawba, which was hung directly across from Blanche de Merv. Two shades of orange—one pale and pure, the other grayed slightly—meet halfway between top and bottom. Each orange has thin washes of gray traveling across the canvas from left to right, as in Blanche de Merv. Here the handwriting-like touches evident in the earlier pictures have been replaced by an impulsiveness of the sort found in Japanese flung-ink paintings. Quick muted blue and ocher lines thinly underscore the smoky gray shapes.

Grow Shoal II was situated in a place of honor. Zox treats gray in this picture with the kind of dramatic mastery that verges on rudeness. This intensity, achieved through abrupt color drawing, threatens at every moment to ride roughshod over the viewer's own presence. Withholding all color except the subtle yellow, blue and green tints within the gray ground, the artist virtually hacks across the top, middle and bottom of the painting, scrubbing out the black and gray strokes and replacing or adding others until the whole picture snaps alive. —James Monte

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR 1983
UMI

Series 7
Sables.
Created for the Queen's hand.
SERIES 7 FINEST SABLE WINSOR & NEWTON ENGLAND

The Series 7 tradition of excellence began in 1866 when Queen Victoria commanded Winsor & Newton to produce water colour brushes of the highest possible quality in her favorite size: number 7.

Even today, some say Series 7 Sables cost a King's Ransom. That's because they're still handcrafted as meticulously as they were in Queen Victoria's day; painstakingly made from the finest sable tails money can buy.

While rigorous selection of only the very best sable hair necessarily limits the number of larger sized brushes we can produce, this guarantees that the time honored Series 7 standard of excellence remains uncompromised.

Three fine alternatives.
For those who don't possess the Crown Jewels.

Series 707 sables are the best alternative to our Series 7 and receive the same handcrafting and attention to detail. Superior quality brushes, readily available in all sizes, they're more moderately priced which makes them the ideal choice for serious water colourists.

Series 239 brushes are a new and unique combination of synthetic filament mixed with a small quantity of natural hair. This blend allows the brushes to carry colour much like real sable and provides excellent spring and point making them command performers at a very economical price.

Series 233 brushes are our largest selling synthetics, used by students and professionals alike. They're truly an excellent choice for those who know their brushes, as well as their budget limitations!

Whatever your budget, you'll find unparalleled value for your money in Winsor & Newton brushes. Look for Series 7, 707, 239 and 233 at your favorite art materials store.

Winsor & Newton, 555 Winsor Drive, Secaucus, New Jersey 07094. Western Distr.: Pacific Stationery, 415 SW Second Avenue, Portland, OR 97204. Pacific Artists Materials, 2410 W. Third St., Santa Ana, CA 92703. Wyoming, No. & So. Dakota Distr.: The Mathison Co., 1213 North P Avenue, Fargo, ND 58102.

WINSOR & NEWTON
150 ANNIVERSARY
1832 1982

Time and expense aren't our main concern. Quality is.

Carol Kreeger Davidson at Terry Dintenfass

Dancing shadows of mannequins fill Carol Kreeger Davidson's new paintings. Her 12 dark images on paper on canvas intend to tell us what movement is, without laboring to imitate its kinetic thrust. In this reductive art, dynamism is replaced by schematic illustration, and we are left to wonder what became of the vibrant, physical world.

Given to Minimalist depictions of space, using aluminum sheet, black plastic and cord, Davidson's art in the mid-'70s was largely sculptural in kind and architectural in spirit. In her "Guardian" series of the late '70s, Davidson began to depict crosses and columns, themselves reductions of the human form, monumentalized, heavy, static. (The guardian's responsibility is to remain fixed at its post: apparently the term evokes for Davidson a marriage of ethical and architectural meanings.) In her new images, Davidson has turned specifically to the human form, but the figure is now merely a more flexible column producing a shadow-play of movement—something like Pinocchio when his wooden legs first stiffly walked.

Indeed, these figures seem like marionettes. Perhaps they aspire to the state of grace Heinrich von Kleist proposed in his essay, "The Puppet Theater": "Another advantage of puppets is that they are not subject to the law of gravity; for the force which lifts them into the air is greater than that which binds them to the earth . . . We shall find [grace] at its purest in a body which is entirely devoid of consciousness or which possesses it in an infinite degree; that is, in the marionette or the god."

Davidson's figures float before a muted background of black and gray. Created by a spray and stencil process with acrylic, pen and graphite, these vaguely Cubist forms have the dense transparency of an X-ray, of a body that has left behind its weighted sheath of flesh. But caught as they are without a puppeteer to inspire their dance, they yield us only the immobile presence of jointed parts.

Only in Davidson's hanging sculptures of fiberglass paper laminated to canvas, which seem to step from the paintings' surfaces, do we sense the unbounded airiness of the marionette. Reminiscent of Calder's circus figures, with that same quality of a lightened armature gaily tossed into the air, they possess a dynamism easily imagined because we move around them in space. Were it not for their 70-inch height, one could imagine oneself manipulating their godly dance. —Steven Henry Madoff

Carol Kreeger Davidson: installation view, 1982; at Terry Dintenfass.

Elaine Reichek: Temple of Heaven, 1982, mixed mediums, 36 by 82 inches; at Concord.

Richard Tuttle at Betty Parsons

Tuttle's 60 new watercolors are entirely consistent with the work he's shown for the past decade, but this exhibition of them will probably add credence to his reputation as one of the quirkier of the Minimalists. Each of the watercolors, collectively called Old Men and Their Garden, consists of a single small area of color centered in the top half of the blue-lined, red-margined notebook paper Tuttle used for the series. These sheets have all buckled from the wetness of the paint, producing tension lines that radiate from the areas of color like relief, with the paintings as focal points.

Several of the works are monochromes, but most employ few modest colors brushed into tight knots or other nonreferential shapes that nonetheless seem somehow organic. Each appears to be a meditation—upon the nature of brushstroke, perhaps, or of composition—that manipulates the wide open spaces of the pages in an Eastern contrast of solid and void.

Among the works in this series, there are a few that are more graceful and curvilinear than the others—distilled memories of floral forms, Oriental pictographs, figures and water reflections. But, in every case, the paintings attempt to marry form and color, as did Tuttle's cut fabric and painted wood pieces in the early '70s. Now, as then, the shapes and colors refer to little but each other, echoing and enhancing one another. The blue arc in #17 best exemplifies this process; the hue and shape were created simultaneously in a single gesture of Zen-like concentration and momentum, as were his wire and pencil-line wall pieces of ten years ago. In fact, if one compared those simple wall pieces with these watercolors, one would probably find many similarities of composition, since in both cases the materials (wire or brushstroke) are made to correspond directly to the artist's physical movements, with no later tampering or patching up. The concepts of his earlier works are merely being expressed here in a different medium.

It is Tuttle's manner of presentation that in this show seems most likely to stir some controversy. Though he has always used fairly modest materials, these paintings display a disdain for the kind of permanence for which many artists routinely strive. In addition to the notebook paper, the paintings are crudely matted with what looks like cut-out beige file folders, then double-framed: white painted inner frames encased by rough natural fir outer frames. The wood is so coarse it could have led a previous life as a packing crate. The matting and double frames seal those watercolors inside very securely, yet the nonarchival properties of the paper and mats signal instability and impermanence. Tuttle appears to set up a contrast between the implied preciosity of those few brushstrokes per composition, and the slapdash nature of their presentation. By why? We assume the rough framing is a deliberate act, perhaps a response to the high cost of custom framing or to the fetish of costly materials that often disguises a lack of merit in the works in which they are employed. Whatever the reason, Tuttle has once again provoked his viewers into thought and uncertainty. —Ellen Lubell

Elaine Reichek at Concord

A former student of Ad Reinhardt, Elaine Reichek uses a feminine craft, knitting, to analyze the visual and symbolic languages of architecture in a form of post-Conceptual art. When she began to use knitting as an analytical tool four years ago, it supplied a bridge between the concrete and the abstract, the personal and the public, the intimate and the grand; it also permitted her to introduce explicit content into her system-oriented art.

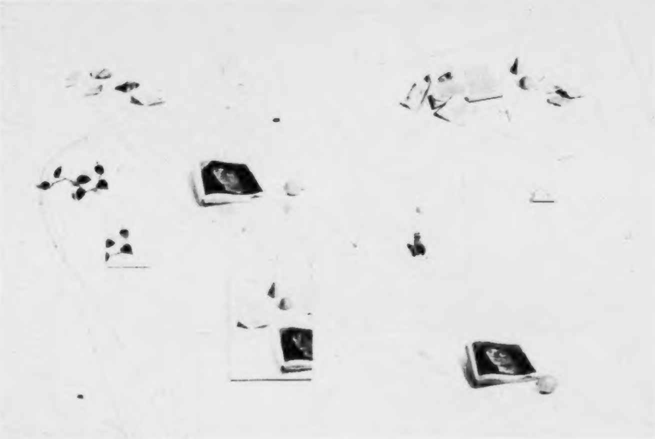
In her earlier work in this vein, Reichek matched an already knitted garment such as a baby's bonnet with an example of vernacular architecture that resembled it. Now, she starts with a well-known building and designs a piece of clothing in its shape—an actual hat, say, set under glass on the left, a hand-tinted, black and white photograph of the building on the right, and in-between a two-color drawing detailing the structure of both.

Superficially, such work resembles Joseph Kosuth's "still lifes" which juxtaposed an actual object, a life-sized photograph of it, and its dictionary definition—but where Kosuth explored difference within sameness, Reichek explores the similarities between different things. In effect, she practices what philosopher Gilbert Ryle calls "category mistake"—"The presentation of facts belonging to one category in the idioms appropriate to another."

The result is a humorous irreverence reminiscent of much post-modern architecture. For example, Reichek may place a photo of the White House with a baby bonnet, or an image of the World Trade Towers with a pair of hot pink pants. In a way, she also conceptualizes Claes Oldenburg's strategy of turning banal objects like baseball bats into oversize monuments.

But Reichek's pairing of famous buildings and everyday clothing is not only debunking. Her work also questions how we read structure, how we detect similar forms in very dissimilar objects. Rooted in the conventions of Conceptual art, Reichek is also heir to both the feminist art of the early '70s that focused on crafts and the humorous art of the late '70s based on visual puns. In fusing these genres, she has forged a new way of looking at the world.

—Ann-Sargent Wooster



Liliana Porter: Untitled, 1982, mixed mediums, 70 by 104 inches; at Barbara Toll.

Richard Tuttle: Old Men and their Garden #60, 1982, watercolor on paper, framed with fir wood, 9½ by 14 inches; at Betty Parsons.

Liliana Porter at Barbara Toll

For over a decade, Porter, an Argentina-born artist who has lived in New York since 1964, has created paintings and drawings concerned with the relationship of art, real objects and illusion—a project that has grown increasingly complex and specific through the years.

An accomplished printmaker, Porter is able to turn her skill in handling various printing and photographic techniques to emotive ends. She may silkscreen photographs of single or grouped objects directly onto her surfaces (paper, canvas or wall), varying the degree of specificity in order to fine-tune the psychological impact of each motif. Questions about process soon give way to speculations about intentions. Porter may use a faded image of a toy galleon, say, to suggest childhood and time lost, and next to it a crisp and colorful picture of a lemon to evoke the immediate present.

In her latest works Porter brings together a group of disparate, whimsical images culled from high art and popular sources alike. In her recent show the largest and most ambitious collage (Untitled, 70 by 104 inches) juxtaposes real objects like leaves and books with images of the same—drawn, painted, collaged or silkscreened onto the canvas. All of the elements are posed either singly or in discrete groupings, in irregular but horizontally disposed lines, and several appear repeatedly. Isolated against an airy, white background, the motifs are rich in narrative overtones, almost inviting a left-to-right reading. The main motif is a page reproduction of Botticelli's Portrait of a Young Woman from an Italian picture book. Altered by various under- and overpaintings, this image becomes a piece in a puzzle about memory and time that we cannot quite reconstruct. At the same time it focuses attention on today's debate between painting and photography—the issue of the original versus the reproduced.

Porter's interest in the multiple meanings of reality is signaled in Untitled by the presence of an open book—Alice in Wonderland. But Porter's keen use of illusionism is not a children's tale: her work involves not only how we regard our private pasts but how we see our everyday world.

—Ronny H. Cohen

Ella Bergmann-Michel at Zabriskie

During the 1930s and '40s, Theodore Roszak was producing sculptures based on machine forms painted with primary colors. For me these works were more pleasing than his later more organic, weirdly Surrealist work. Roszak's part of this recent show was familiar, but the small abstract collages and drawings by Ella Bergmann-Michel were not. At first glance they seemed as blank as envelopes without stamps, yet the more I looked at them, the more they came alive—the more I felt the passion that was behind them. I thought of the words of Malevich: "The square that I had exhibited was not an empty square—it was the sensibility of the absence of any object."

Ella Bergmann-Michel was not a Suprematist, although she came close to that style in feeling. Her vocabulary was derived from Constructivism and she was initially nurtured by Futurism. No doubt many of the Germans who saw her work in the 1920s thought of it as being a kind of laboratory art—blueprints of future space travel, perhaps. But it conveys something more: the mystery of human existence. A certain spirituality is felt in her penciled grids which are never exactly exact. Her quivering forms are like what happens when a stone falls into a pool, and the radiating circles encounter a small obstacle.

Ella Bergmann-Michel was born in 1896 in Paderborn, Westphalia. While an art student in Weimar she met and married a former pilot, Robert Michel, who was also a painter, collagist, draftsman and architect. Although they often exhibited together, her work was always more inward than his. Michel's works have the violence of machinery. Hers are dissections of feeling, fixed to paper like a rare butterfly. She and her husband were at first associated with the Bauhaus, but soon they moved to Frankfurt where, in the mid-'20s, she showed with El Lissitzky and Kurt Schwitters. In the 1930s she began to shift towards Surrealism and she exhibited with Hannah Hoch and Piet Zwart.

The Third Reich was proclaimed in 1933, and by the time of the burning of the Reichstag, Bergmann-Michel had retreated to a politically safe occupation—farm work and stock breeding. This lasted until the Third Reich itself went up in flames in 1945. The new German government then employed her as a lecturer, and she made film documentaries about an art scene which by this time was completely unknown to younger Germans. By 1972 she was dead.

Although I was fascinated by all her work in this show, the two pieces which left the strongest impression were the earliest dated work and the very last. Untitled, 1917, in ink and watercolor, had forms which seemed to hurtle towards the viewer in exaggerated perspective, out from a center and towards points marking positions on the imaginary surface of a space volume. This particular work is packed like a suitcase with jagged forms—like the SS insignia, propellers, circles, etc.—all as declamatory as a poem by Mayakovsky. The last work in the show, dated 1965, titled Ferncollage, Studie 2, is an incredibly secretive creation of etched parallel lines, white on black, with tiny color accents like combat ribbons and various other threadlike eccentricities wandering here and there. The work has a mysterious, shimmering existence you are unable to explain rationally.

—Lawrence Campbell

Teddy Millington-Drake at Stephen Mazoh

Millington-Drake's watercolors are hard on the Western observer, especially the American one. They are depictions of a terrifically alien land—central India—and without Millington-Drake's hastily inscribed "titles" at the bottom of each picture the viewer would be completely at a loss. Even so, there are problems, since somewhat familiar names are given to unfamiliar sites—to tombs of Altamish in Delhi, a temple to Shiva in Khajuraho, the river Ganges at Benares, the palace of the Maharajah at Dharbange. Unless (like the artist) you are a frequent traveler to India, the names stir up old geography-class pipe dreams more than living lands.

Yet Millington-Drake allows us no easy exoticism in his feathery limnings of Indians at worship, work, and play. In fact, these are casual, rather cavalier statements on the part of the artist—they look more like sketchbook leaves than paintings. And no matter how unfamiliar we may be with the culture, Millington-Drake takes it all of a piece—as an occasion for a decidedly Western, modernist and painterly sort of art.

Which is somewhat to the good, if not all: Millington-Drake is an excellent draftsman and colorist, and there is something royally appealing in his pictures of maroon-shaded Indian cities in the depths of a cream twilight, or of the sparkling Ganges virtually eating up reflections on the water made by the buildings of Benares. Travelers who have been to India, we are told, vouch for the authenticity of it all, the rightness of the colors and the sketchy precisionism of the figures. There is, in short, a nice balance of poetry and reportage in this artist's style.

But in the end, poetry and reportage are insufficient. Millington-Drake—Britisher that he is—takes the viewer on lyrical flights that may well look like the real thing, but lack its ethos, its character and finally its mythos. The religious realities of India keep intruding on the poetry—in shrines to Shiva and colonnaded temple porches—and nowhere more than in a temple interior with a lone worshipper and a giant lingam at his back.

The Hindu religion is a mystical, sensual, dynamic one; Millington-Drake, by painting like a European on holiday, a highly gifted sightseer, is doing himself and his subject wrong. The Hindi, to this day, are mostly dealing with God; Millington-Drake is dealing in art, even l'art pour l'art. Perhaps this is why his pictures of the Taj Mahal come off the best—the sumptuousness of the subject is equal to the deliciousness of the painting. Which is not to say that the artist should go in for a National Geographic-type naturalism—just perhaps another less foreign locale. Painterly loveliness in the service of a giant phallus somehow misses the mark.

—Gerrit Henry

Walter F. Isaacs: Interior with Mirror and Table, 1963, oil on canvas, 28 by 24 inches; at Francine Seders (review on p. 164).

Ella Bergmann-Michel: Von Plus nach Minus, 1925, pencil and ink on paper, 20¾ by 19 inches; at Zabriskie.

Erich Salomon at the International Center of Photography

Touted as the inventor of a subgenre of photojournalism known as candid photography, Erich Salomon has been enshrined—along with such "masters" of photography as Weston, Stieglitz and Strand—in the Aperture "History of Photography" series. Yet, as steeped in incense as it may have been, this exhibition did little to clear up the mystery of why Salomon—essentially a newspaper photographer—should have been so famous in his lifetime, and why he should be so highly thought of today. In fact, it posed this question with particular, if unintentional, urgency.

The show was divided neatly into two sections: one devoted to presumably vintage prints, the other a gigantic assemblage of press clippings and smaller shots, which often retained their captions. The first part of the show was full of the informal shots of diplomats having lunch and heads of state deep in conference over coffee—the "politicians with shirt-sleeves rolled up," as Salomon's editor was later to describe them—which were to become his trademark. Here were the earliest photos carried by the Berliner Illustrierte Zeitung from 1928 on, including the famous sequence of diplomats falling asleep as the 1930 Hague Conference dragged on into the wee hours.

It is hard to imagine that these photographs were ever intended to be exhibited. They were meant for reproduction, with the expectation that the fuzziness that resulted from the use of Ermanox and early Leica cameras, with their relatively long exposure time and shallow depth of field, would be corrected. In the exhibition catalogue and the beautifully printed Aperture monograph—to say nothing of the Berlin newspaper in which these pictures appeared—the retouching is invisible. But in the exhibition, without the intercession of the printing process, the retouching appeared grotesque. Entering this part of the exhibition was like opening a sarcophagus: we were confronted with photographs of important-looking people with faces garishly painted, as though for a retro Halloween party.

Some of these photographs were, in fact, exhibited during Salomon's lifetime, in London in 1935 and '37. By that time, Salomon had become a celebrity, and we must presume that celebrity covers a multitude of sins. In fact, it is an inextricable part of the meaning of Salomon's photographs. If the summit conferences, trials or diplomatic luncheons he photographed were hardly sensational in themselves, the act of gaining entry was, and this sensation made Salomon's career. He became for his public the very type of the uninvited guest, who nevertheless makes himself at home, charms his hosts, and succeeds in making everyone except possibly himself forget the social chasm that separates their world from his. If it was part of Salomon's achievement to have secured a modicum of respectability for the newspaper photographer, he was—as a photographer, and as a Jew—always an outsider, despite his old-boy acquaintances.

Salomon's earliest and most interesting published photographs should be considered in terms of the illicit access they provide to the precincts of political or judicial power. Salomon came as an intruder and acted as one, no matter what tricks he used or how quickly his presence was taken for granted. As a photojournalist, he was both witness to and mediator of the spectacle of otherness for a newly constituted urban mass audience able to achieve a new sense of identity around the notion "I do not belong here"—an identity based on exclusion from both the actions Salomon depicted and the scene in which they transpired.

In Salomon's photographs, then, the scene of action is the seat of power itself, and the photographs are replete with the visible signs of that power. If all photographs document our absence or separation from the scene represented, in Salomon's photographs this absence is thematic. Defining the photographic "moment" as one of transgression, they not only return us to primitivist misgivings about the nature of representation, but also always point to Salomon, their "author," of whose presence they provide the undifferentiated sign. But instead of always pointing to Salomon, we should see through the photographs at least to the daily and weekly editorships that paid for them, if not to the elite cast of characters whose pretext they are, and whose interests they everywhere reflect. —Scott Cook

VOL 71 ISS 3 MR 1983 UMI

SEATTLE

Walter F. Isaacs at Francine Seders

Walter F. Isaacs was one of the most important Seattle artists of the 1930-60 period. Born in Illinois, Isaacs came to Seattle in 1923, where he worked as a teacher and then became director at the University of Washington School of Art. Later, as the demands of teaching abated, Isaacs embarked on a long series of small, loosely worked paintings which have great verve—indeed, his best work was done in the last ten years of his life. This show was the first of two exhibitions to be held of paintings left by Isaacs at his death in 1964.

Coming to the Northwest after studying in both Paris and New York (at the Art Students League and Columbia), Isaacs was the region's first pedagogue of modernism. Much of his art in this uneven selection may look to us now like textbook illustrations of how to deal with certain problems in modern painting—with foreshortened space (Still Life with Sliced Squash, 1930), Cubist portraiture (Seated Figures, ca. 1950), Matissean composition (Still Life with Jug, 1961) or the type of mystical and mythical subject matter that Mark Tobey and Morris Graves made popular (Icarus; The Egyptian, 1962). In Interior with Mirror and Table, 1963, Isaacs met the Abstract Expressionists on their own ground by maintaining an appearance of process, even as he persisted in his efforts to refine his studio themes.

Only late works like Gypsy Camp and Blue Interior, 1963, truly distinguish Isaacs from the hordes of European-style American artists of the 1930s and '40s. But such paintings are reason enough for a more thorough assessment of this painter, who may yet make us rethink our sense of Pacific Northwest art in this century. —Matthew Kangas

LOS ANGELES

Jim Isermann at the Inn of Tomorrow and Richard Kuhlenschmidt

For one weekend last fall, Los Angeles-based artist Jim Isermann replaced the aging '50s/'60s futuristic kitsch decor of a motel room at the Inn of Tommorrow in Anaheim, Calif., with his own gaudily painted wall lamps, chairs, tables, bedboard and television cabinet—that is, with a (transformed) version of '50s/'60s kitsch designs. Isermann's installation, titled "Motel Modern," was located across the road from Disneyland and within view of the Disney version of the Swiss Matterhorn, a setting that seemed pointedly emblematic. Here was a territory of neon-lit hotels and motels, of fast food coffee shops such as Sambo's, and of a convention center shaped like a flying saucer from a grade-B, science-fiction film—all developed during the boom days of expanding aerospace contracts and a growing population of Easterners come West. But it is over a decade since Disneyland executives removed the Monsanto dream house of the future from Tomorrowland; its remaining esthetic kin, such as the Inn of Tomorrow, now survive as icons of a tarnished, perhaps discarded, vision of the American future of unlimited possibilities which Southern California once embodied.

Isermann's revival of the long rejected "look" of that optimistic era—of hourglass and bubble lamps, of tables that spread up and out like thriving amoebas, of adjoining spheres linked to comprise a bedboard—is both an esthetic and a socio-historical act. His predominantly wood constructions are as much an effort of cultural excavation as artistic creation; they evoke the buoyant America of Mercury space missions, Kennedy's New Frontier and the Jetsons. And by paying homage to the epoch's popular designs, Isermann implicitly rejects the standards of critical taste which labeled them trash.

But Isermann's subversion of such standards does not, by any means, imply a rejection of modernist taste. As Pop art has made explicit, so-called avant-garde art can subsume popular cultural representations and forms into its domain; in sculpture, for example, Oldenburg fashioned his own version of a contemporary motel —Bedroom Ensemble—in 1964. Isermann's similar confiscation of popular bedroom furnishings is, however, historical-minded, since he applies the Pop method to a version of mass-produced design that is two decades old.

Like Oldenburg, Isermann embraces forms that high modernist designers, such as Marcel Breuer and Joseph Albers, would have found repulsive. Unlike Bauhaus chairs, tables and lamps, Isermann's furniture/sculpture does not embody a progressive view of design or art history. His objects don't need a new architecture to match their aspirations; they look quite right in the type of vernacular setting in which Isermann placed them at Anaheim.

And yet, when these same objects were subsequently transplanted to the more conventional setting of the gallery, they still functioned effectively. Uprooted from the social theater of Disneyland's motel row, Isermann's constructions did, however, seem different; they were more emphatically esthetic and their art-historical affiliations became more apparent. The fluidly curving outlines of the bedside tables and wall panels, for example, could be seen as harking back to Arp's constructions in particular and to Dada assemblage in general, while the animated forms of the television cabinet appeared to adapt Calder's lessons to the bedroom.

Nevertheless, Isermann's surfaces are not entirely time- or source-specific. Though his segments of pegboard and surface patterns of rounded ridges seem reminiscent of the '50s and '60s (as do his "cheap" lime greens, candy pinks, aqua blues and loud reds), Isermann's use of both materials and colors is whimsically and eccentrically original. In his work, the whole is greater than the sum of his borrowings, and his furniture—both individual pieces and the installation in general—subtly transforms itself into sculpture.

This latest exhibition is Isermann's most assertive and focused to date. In his previous solo shows—"Modern Tempo" (in Los Angeles) and "Patio Tempo" (in New York)—Isermann's wall pieces and furniture revealed their sources too visibly. Now, however, an independent style has been firmly envisioned and realized, even as Isermann's use of kitsch design remains affectionate. —Robert L. Pincus

DALLAS

Vernon Fisher at Delahunty

Vernon Fisher's recent work retains his trademark format—mixed-medium wall works consisting of two or more juxtaposed panels, at least one of which offers written narrative superimposed over an airbrushed photographic image—but the interrelationship of the parts has now become more integrated and complex. The four major pieces and two drawings that comprised this show are immediately compelling on purely formal terms, even before their intricate iconography makes itself legible. Now, however, Fisher's use of multiple mediums increasingly reinforces the resonance of the iconography.

Snakes and Ladders best exemplifies the intricacy of the new work. Though the narrative is not linear and its meaning is not obvious, the combinations are far from random. In Fisher's work there is always a message implied behind both the imagery and the written text. This piece consists of two panels: on the left, a painting inscribed with a text; on the right, a purely visual offering in sculptured relief. The former narrates an anecdote that takes place at one A.M in a 7-11 convenience store in San Angelo, Tex. There are three passages to the story: in the first, a clerk is ignoring a customer who is describing an extraterrestrial phenomenon she claims to have just witnessed. The second passage presents a second clerk, a Vietnamese, whose accent ("Slow-pee" for "Slurpee") confuses his communication with a second customer, who is trying to order a Coke, not a Slurpee. In the third passage, the first clerk confronts the Vietnamese clerk by thrusting a piece of paper at him on which he has apparently written something. "What is this chickenshit here?" she screeches at him. The story thus dramatizes the frustrations inherent to the three basic forms of communication: visual, verbal and written.

Having read the story, we are inclined to interpret the image partially obscured by the superimposed text as the first customer's UFO, but only because of the juxtaposition of text and image. In fact, the image more closely resembles a World War II tank or the nose of an airplane than a futuristic UFO, and indeed if we hear in the Vietnamese's mispronunciation an ironic variant of the derogatory term "Slope," this reading, reinforced by the knowledge that the Vietnamese is most likely an "alien" himself, receives further credence. The juxtaposition of image with text thus constitutes a visual analogy to the literary content of the story. We are faced with the same problems of misinterpretation based upon preconceptions that are portrayed in the story.

Whereas the first panel on the left presents a flat image of a three-dimensional object, the panel on the right constitutes the opposite: a sculptural interpretation of a two-dimensional children's board game called "Snakes and Ladders" (also known as "Chutes and Ladders"). Fisher has created a 49-square lattice to which he has affixed extremely realistic fiberglass snakes. The lattice, as well as the superimposed snakes, makes obvious reference to a major painting by Jasper Johns, Untitled, 1972 (Ludwig collection, Cologne). However, the debt is purely formal; Fisher intends something radically different from John's Duchampian dissociation of form from content. Here, form is wholly bonded with its iconography; its source is a game of rewards and punishments—at the throw of dice, a player advances unless he falls upon a snake's square, from which he slides backwards to the animal's tail, or on a ladder's square, from which he gets to skip forward. The moral is clear: the outcome of all efforts can be determined by luck rather than by achievement. Nevertheless, goals exist and may be achieved with persistence and patience. This panel is thus a schematic representation of the same problematic nature of human endeavor which the left panel dramatized.

Fisher's open acknowledgement of his formal debt to Johns (a debt which is apparent throughout Fisher's work) might serve to distract us from the accumulative narrative weight that is clearly of at least equal importance to Fisher. For while he draws equally from both pop culture and high art, his subjects in the end share a common theme. By focusing on the problematic nature of communication and perception—indeed by exacerbating it productively—Fisher's investigations serve as a metaphor for the process of making art in an image-saturated world. —Susan Freudenheim

Barry Flanagan: bronze sculpture and stone carvings, installation view; Whitechapel Art Gallery (review on p. 167).

Vernon Fisher: Snakes and Ladders, 1982, mixed mediums, 135 by 59 by 6 inches; at Delahunty.

CHICAGO

Will Northerner at Zolla/Lieberman

Will Northerner's first one-person show in 1981 won him rave reviews in three of Chicago's major newspapers. That kind of sudden praise, with its concomitant pressures and expectations, can sometimes be the kiss of death to a budding career. Consequently, the 28-year-old artist took a long time preparing for the current exhibition, knowing that his audience would be returning primarily to see if the promise of his debut show would be fulfilled.

Northerner's growth as an artist has been phenomenally rapid. Two years ago, he was almost exclusively concerned with making slick, commercial illustrations in pencil and pastel for publications such as Playboy. He plunged into painting after his first full-scale canvas gained him recognition among the fine art crowd when it appeared in the Art Institute of Chicago's 1981 Vicinity Show. Primarily self-trained, he taught himself linoleum-cut printmaking in 1982, proceeded to turn out dozens of prints and then began to incorporate the printed images into his paintings.

The apparent ease and playfulness with which he dishes out his freely ranging imagery makes it tempting to classify him as a "natural," whose main artistic means are intuition, nerve and a knack for the arresting composition. And if the present show suggests he has pushed his luck too far this time, trying to tackle more than he can handle, there remains, even in his overenthusiasm, something irresistible.

The fluorescent-bright colors of his first body of work have darkened to dismal greens and shady plums, with highlights of metallic silver and gold. His single figures have been replaced by multiple images, either superimposed over one another to the point of abstraction or presented as diptychs. The diptychs contrast flat, crisp linoleum-cut figures in one panel with more painterly figures set against abstract depths in an adjoining panel. Other canvases feature figures surrounded by dribbles, blotches, patterns and clouds of color with an inset window containing a lino-cut image. The small, spiky lino-cuts must be seen up close, while many of the painted figures are rendered as mere outlines that can only be deciphered from a distance.

Of course, Northerner's current experimentation invites formalistic comparison with the work of New York Neo-Expressionists Julian Schnabel and David Salle, both of whom were working in similar modes well before he adopted them. Here are both Schnabel's superimpositions and Salle's stylistic juxtapositions, albeit with a funky, Midwestern twist. The use of outlined transparent figures, a technique also associated with the two S's, is termed by Northerner a "dissolve," from the cinematic usage.

As a matter of fact, the inspiration for a number of works in this exhibiton was the Coppola film Apocalypse Now, as well as its source, Joseph Conrad's "Heart of Darkness"—thus the constant references to soldiers, icons and water. Perhaps like Conrad's Marlow, Northerner, in his own way, is sailing upstream through the heroically complex and confusing myths of modernism. Perhaps once that jungle journey is behind him, his own direction will be clearer. —Michael Bonesteel

SAN FRANCISCO

Robert Hudson at Fuller Goldeen

In recent years Robert Hudson has mostly done paintings on loose matting hung on the wall, but this show was of sculpture largely made up of found objects. Several of the pieces contain antlers (of elk and moose as well as deer) which Hudson has used more as formal elements than as symbols of nature. Other elements in these works include steel floral ornaments and painted volumes like cones, often connected by chain.

The works are well constructed, not flimsy as found-object sculpture often is. And yet they have moving parts (like spiral clock-springs fastened to looping wires) that almost ask to be handled and swung. Here, Hudson plays with the old prohibition against touching works of art, clearly tempting people to violate this taboo. Which is to say that these sculptures are true to their Dadaist origins—they are anti-institutional in sentiment.

A figure emerges in a few of the works—perhaps a persona for the artist or a biographical presence. In the largest piece in the show, this figure is made of pipe parts, with universal joints for hands. From these hands are suspended geometric models, structural forms—which seem to represent the making of sculpture. But this "pipeman" is also sculpture: he devolves into abstract forms and natural ones too (like the antlers). Perhaps, then, he is a surrogate for the artist, trying to distinguish the natural from the man-made, working to make symbols out of things, wondering if and what it all means—for meaning is always an uncertain thing in sculpture that combines readymade objects and newly invented forms.

Hudson is an accomplished craftsman who could very easily be a more classical or formal sculptor, if he were not deviled by the imp of irony. But these works clearly show that irony remains the appropriate lens for looking at a mad world. —Knute Stiles

Johan Hagemeyer at the San Francisco Museum of Modern Art

The Californian photographer Johan Hagemeyer (1884–1962) is largely forgotten except as a footnote to the career of his friend Edward Weston. Hagemeyer introduced Weston, a man of simple background, to music, philosophy and literature. In the end, however, Weston needed to break free of Hagemeyer's turn-of-the-century attitudes before he could become a pioneer of sharp-focus photography.

The recent exhibition of Hagemeyer's work at the San Francisco Museum of Modern Art shows

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

JERRY'S ARTARAMA INC.
SUPER-SAVERS

GRUMBACHER
FRENCH SKETCH BOX-EASEL
No. 286 $159.95 ppd.
This is the original world famous combination sketch box/easel/canvas carrier. Made in France from seasoned hardwood and precision hand-crafted. Will hold canvas up to 32" high and can be tilted. Comes complete with a finished palette. Measures only 6½x16x21" collapsed. and weighs only 13 pounds. Nationally advertised for $259.50. but now available to you delivered at this low Jerry's Artarama price.

LEDU
COMBINATION LAMP
C-100 $69.95
Fluorescent and incandescent lighting both. in one big. beautiful shade. Turn them on individually or combine them for daylight effect and faithful reproduction of colors. Shade is double insulated with excellent reflector and has a new feature. a convenience outlet built into the shade. It has a 42" reach and a multi-purpose bracket is supplied for all tables including inclined drafting tables. Includes 60 watt bulb and 22 watt circuline fluorescent tube. Available in black or white.

VARITEC TABLE
TECNICS by STACOR
No. VT 3042 $119.95 ppd.
VariTec Table (30"-42"): The design is simplicity itself. Style plus a wide range of height and tilt choices at very attractive prices. Easily raised and lowered. White enamel finish with reversable white or black plastic laminated top. Another Jerry's Savings. Optional Foot Rest $17.95 ppd.

STILETTO ONE CHAIR
No. 91-0108 $108.95
Height adjustable 20-20". adjustable height through automatic air cylinder adjustable air cylinder adjustment. 5 prong safety base and hooded carpet caster. Black corduroy deluxe fabric. Adjustable back rest. Accented with chrome at delivered to you savings.

The Jerry's Catalog #7A

An Art Store for $1.00 (free w/all orders). Discounts from 15-66% all manufacturers list.

SEND CHECK. MONEY ORDER. OR MASTERCARD & VISA NUMBER TO:
JERRY'S ARTARAMA, INC.
248-12 Union Turnpike, Bellerose, NY 11426

SHIP TO: ____________
ADDRESS ____________
CITY ________ STATE ________ ZIP ____
CARD NO. ____________ EXP ____

NO.	QTY	DESCRIPTION	PR EA	AMOUNT
8A		Art Store (120 pg. catalog) free with order	1.00
286		Grumbacher French Easel Box	159.95
C-100		LEDU Combination Lamp	69.95
VT 3042		Varitec Table (Footrest add 17.95)	119.95
91-0108		Stiletto One Chair	108.95
			Sub-Total
			NY State Residents add Sales Tax
			Outside Continental USA add 15% for shipping
			Total

This sale expires Apr. 10. 1983. All items include Shipping and Handling within the Continental USA. Outside add 15% of order. Items are shipped UPS. allow 2 weeks for delivery. Include street address.

TO ORDER BY PHONE ☎
Please have your MasterCard or Visa ready (sorry No CODs)
CALL TOLL-FREE 1-800-221-2323
In NY. Alaska. Hawaii. Canada call 212-343-0777

Art in America's

1982 Full-Color Slide Survey of Contemporary Art

200 four-color slides of outstanding contemporary art works published in Art in America in 1982 . . . as selected by the editors.

At the request of slide librarians throughout the United States, Art in America will deliver in February 1983 this invaluable full-color survey of the state of contemporary art.

Shot from the original transparencies and filmed on the highest quality Kodak stock, this superb selection enables slide librarians to systematically update and strengthen their coverage and review of contemporary art, simplifying an increasingly complex, yet necessary task.

The cost is $295, slightly less than $1.50 per slide. The editors of Art in America have selected 200 slides in all, conveniently indexed for ready reference to the issues and pages in which they appeared.

Art in America
1982 Slide Survey of Contemporary Art
850 Third Avenue, New York, NY 10022

Yes, please send us the 1982 Full-Color Slide Survey of Contemporary Art—200 slides for just $295.00

☐ Please send invoice ☐ Purchase order enclosed ☐ Payment enclosed

Name ____________
Title ____________
Institution ____________
Address ____________
City ________ State ______ Zip ______
NB: Non-institutional orders must be prepaid 3/83AIA

Johan Hagemeyer: Elsa Naess (with cigarette), 1931, gelatin silver print, $3\frac{7}{8}$ by $2\frac{7}{8}$ inches; at S.F. Museum of Modern Art.

Erich Salomon: Hat checker, Amjema Restaurant, The Hague, 1928; at International Center of Photography (review on p. 163).

that Hagemeyer was something more than an influence to be wisely discarded. Hagemeyer himself denounced the stereotypes of pictorial photography, and was arguably the first West Coast photographer to make formalist art out of industrial subjects. But he kept the romantic vision; he said what Weston or Sheeler would never have said—that modern buildings are as beautiful as castles.

At a time when art was responding to what many saw as the end of Christian civilization, there were ideological reasons for photographers to show that such objects as light bulbs and seashells have a formal beauty in common. If so inward a thing as a conch shell is formed according to mathematical laws, then many other aspects of the universe can be known and perhaps changed, and in the absence of God we can hope that engineers, designers and artists will create a better world.

Hagemeyer, however, was not that kind of modern optimist. A fine sense of abstract design is evident in his pictures, but it is typical of the man that he gave a photograph of a factory the title Prison; other photographers would have sought to reduce connotations, not increase them. In his portraits the subject is often looking away from the camera; shadows are used to obscure the face as much as to model it; and all in all there is a sense that the human exterior conceals more than it reveals.

Until recently the dominant tendency among American photographers has been to emphasize what the lens can see. Hagemeyer reminded his viewers of the unknowable. Especially during the '20s and '30s, this sensibility went against the grain of American art, although Hagemeyer did exhibit and publish widely in his lifetime. He did portraits of Albert Einstein, Lincoln Steffens, Salvador Dali, and many other celebrities. But he never became a commanding presence; whatever he brought to photography, he lacked the Ahab-like singleness of mind that Americans expect of their artists.

Hagemeyer deserves to be better known than he is, and we owe a debt of gratitude to Richard Lorenz, who found a hitherto lost collection of Hagemeyer's work and organized this exhibition for the San Francisco Museum of Modern Art and the Center for Creative Photography at the University of Arizona. —Jerome Tarshis

LONDON

Barry Flanagan at the Whitechapel and at Waddington

Barry Flanagan feels that no great discontinuity exists between his work of the last nine years and that of the previous nine, although in appearance it has changed markedly. The early sculptures—informal, "process"-oriented installation pieces in various materials including sand, hessian and projected light—evolved out of a concern with issues which were then current internationally. By contrast, Flanagan's work of the past decade, made almost entirely from stone and bronze, seems to bespeak a more isolated position, and a more conservative one. Where once he sought to preclude or circumvent preconceptions as to the nature and limits (physical or conceptual) of sculpture, now traditional materials are handled in orthodox fashion; stone is carved, clay or wax is cast. Yet the canny strategy which previously informed Flanagan's approach operates still—and perhaps even more incisively. The outcome is far from the expected.

In this century, direct carving has been canonized as the proper technique for handling stone. When Flanagan carves, however, he shuns the requisite dialogue between artist and given block from which the final form should emerge. His blocks retain their original forms; carving is restricted to incising surfaces or faces. Elsewhere, he has revived the traditional practice which direct carving supplanted: skilled craftsmen translate into stone the maquettes which he has devised in a malleable material on a smaller scale. Qualities inherent in the material, like its sensual color and glossy sheen, are celebrated in these large stones squatting on the gallery floor. But such squashy pudgy shapes, which reflect the behavior of the original clay, have long been eschewed as "dishonest" in carved sculpture. The notion of "truth to materials" was an inevitable corollary of a concern with direct carving: Some of its ambiguities are exposed here.

If these works may be seen to undermine some of the central precepts currently governing the making of stone sculpture, Flanagan's bronzes similarly mock precepts dictating what is considered proper to cast sculpture. Since the use of bronze has often been believed to confer eternity on a work of art (a notion which Degas, among others found daunting), nonserious qualities, whether a playful mood or an insignificant subject, have generally been avoided. Long the dominant image in western sculpture, the human figure has functioned in this century mostly an an expressive form and only rarely as an expressive signifier: the body is viewed primarily as a structure rather than as an agent. Literary resonances and theatrical situations have been consequently taboo. Flanagan tackles such modernist precepts head-on with the hare which he finds an expressive stand-in for the human figure, one with great potential for direct statement. His debonaire creatures blithely saunter, strut and cavort through space supported on such unlikely bases as a set of cricket stumps, an anvil and a helmet. Disarmingly simple in appearance, they subtly indicate that prevailing assumptions about their very nature are those most in danger of becoming clichéd or moribund. Beneath its present beguiling directness, Flanagan's art is as trenchant as ever. —Lynne Cooke

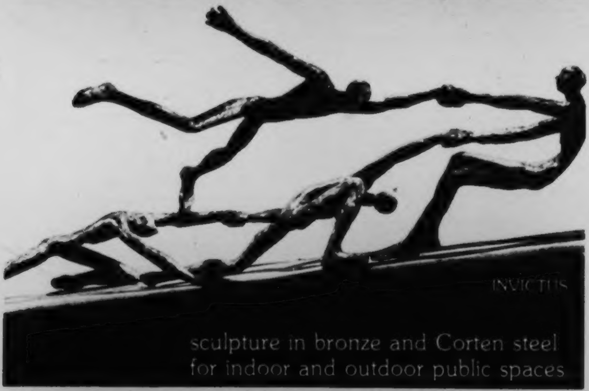
Review Contributors

Brooks Adams, Ellen Lubell and Steven Henry Madoff are free-lance critics living in New York . . . Douglas Blau is a travel writer . . . Michael Bonesteel is a Chicago free-lance writer . . . Lawrence Campbell, James Monte and Ann-Sargent Wooster are New York artists who also write on art . . . Ronny Cohen is a New York free-lance critic and curator . . . Lynne Cooke is a lecturer in history of art, University College, London . . . Scott Cook is a Ph.D. candidate in cinema studies at New York University . . . Susan Freudenheim is a free-lance critic writing on art from Fort Worth . . . Gerrit Henry and Tony Towle are New York poets . . . Matthew Kangas is a poet and critic writing on art from Seattle . . . Robert L. Pincus reviews art for the Los Angeles Times and teaches at the University of Southern California . . . Knute Stiles and Jerome Tarshis both write on art from San Francisco . . . Marjorie Welish is a New York poet, writer and painter.

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

3 MONTREAL ARTISTS

Wertheimer



INVICTUS

sculpture in bronze and Corten steel for indoor and outdoor public spaces

Caiserman-Roth

THRESHOLD acrylic on canvas 36" x 48" paintings. drawings. lithographs. etchings. publications paintings in oil and acrylic.

LACH

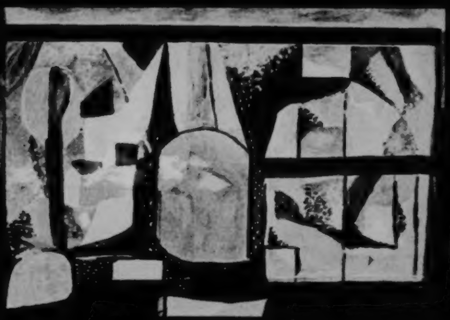
watercolours. lithographs.



AUTUMN

luxury editions with original lithographs

Wertheimer Sculptures Ltd.
6695 Somerled Ave. Montréal Québec H4W 1T5
tel (514) 487-7720 •Galleries and agents Inquiries invited
•Catalogues on request •Commissions (any size)
Art expo NY NEW YORK COLISEUM . . .
APRIL 7-11 1983

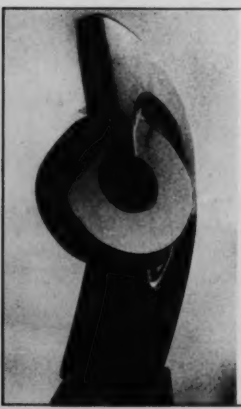
STAND.
2-626

YAMET ARTS INC.

CALDER • DELAUNAY • FOUJITA
MARKMAN • MASSON • SIQUIEROS
R. SOYER • STEINBERG • WARHOL

260 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK, NEW YORK 10001
(212) 685-3820

Art expo NY Booth 2-544



Anne Harris

Art expo NY
New York Coliseum
Booth no. 1-309
April 7-11

Representation:
Arts Focus, Inc.
401 Capitol St., Charleston, WV 25301
(304) 345-9059

54" high

FREE catalog with purchase of Stumpy or Great Crate.

- Unique 228p resource for artists
- Use for one-stop shopping
- Contains over 20,000 items

Just purchase
STUMPY™

$5.95
clutch sketching pencil
3 extra lead refills included

OR

Just purchase
GREAT CRATE™

$4.95 beautiful studio and desk top organizer

Enclosed find check for items checked below:

Stumpy ☐ plus catalog $5.95
Great Crate ☐ plus catalog $4.95
Art Brown ☐ catalog only $3.00

C183AIA

Name ____________________
Address ____________________
City/State/Zip ____________________

America's Largest Art Supply Distributor
ARTHUR BROWN & BRO., INC.
2 West 46th Street, New York, N.Y. 10036

5th Annual

Art expo NY

New York Coliseum • April 7–11, 1983

The world's most important art fair in the world's art capital. Over 300 exhibitors from around the world. Art lovers, artists, dealers, curators, collectors, publishers:—meet your colleagues. Seminars—Lectures—Workshops.

Dealer Day–Open to the trade only:
Thursday, April 7, 11-7pm

Open to the general public:
Friday, April 8, 11-8pm
Saturday, April 9, 11-8pm
Sunday, April 10, 11-7pm
Monday, April 11, 10-4pm

Save time & money–
Pre-register now!

Just fill out the coupon below and mail together with your check to Artexpo NY.

C3

TO: International Art Exposition, Inc.
509 Madison Ave.
Suite 702
New York, N.Y. 10022 (212) 935-7607

(Special pre-registration rates)
Please send ______ tickets at $5.50 Daily, or ______ 5-Day Passes at $22.
(pass includes official Artexpo catalogue, $10 value)

Check enclosed: Amount: $______

Please send information regarding
☐ seminars & cultural events programs
☐ hotel accommodations
☐ special airfares

Name ______

Title ______

Company or Organization ______

Business or Home Address ______

City ______ State ______ Zip Code ______

Country ______

Type of business
☐ Art Dealer
☐ Art Gallery
☐ Auction House
☐ Collector
☐ Corporate Art Buyer
☐ Interior Designer
☐ Print Publisher
☐ Other (describe) ______

Additional names and titles ______

Ticket orders received after March 25, 1983 will be held at the door.

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

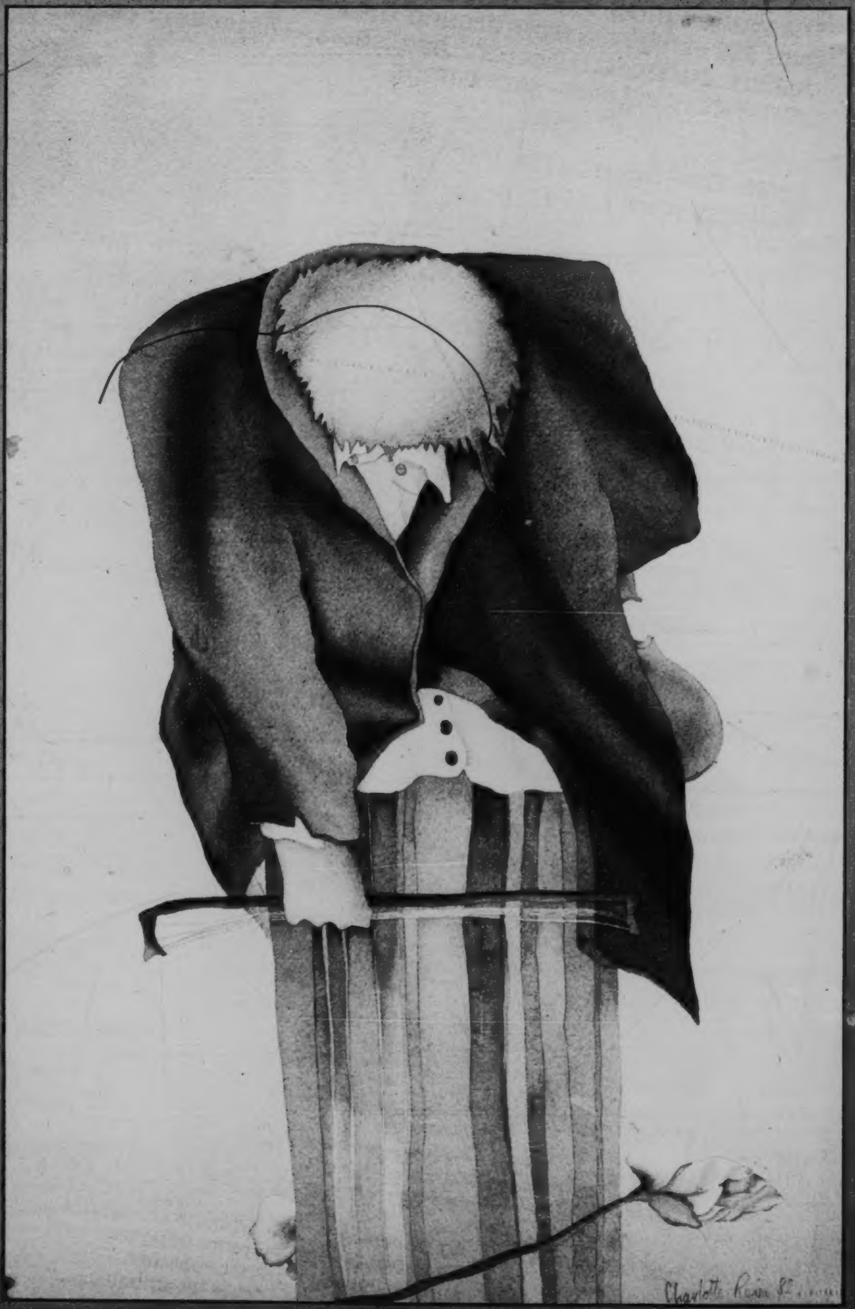
Charlotte Reine

Launching a three-city tour will be a preview of Charlotte Reine's new series of watercolors, created expressly for these American exhibitions.

Art Expo New York
New York, N.Y.
April 7-11, 1983

Utah Artist's Guild
Salt Lake City, Utah
April 16, 1983

Chummings Gallery
Edmond, Oklahoma
April 17, 1983



Finale

One of a series of new watercolors featured at these exhibitions. A special poster edition was created for this tour.

Lublin
Graphics Incorporated

95 east putnam avenue greenwich, conn. 06830
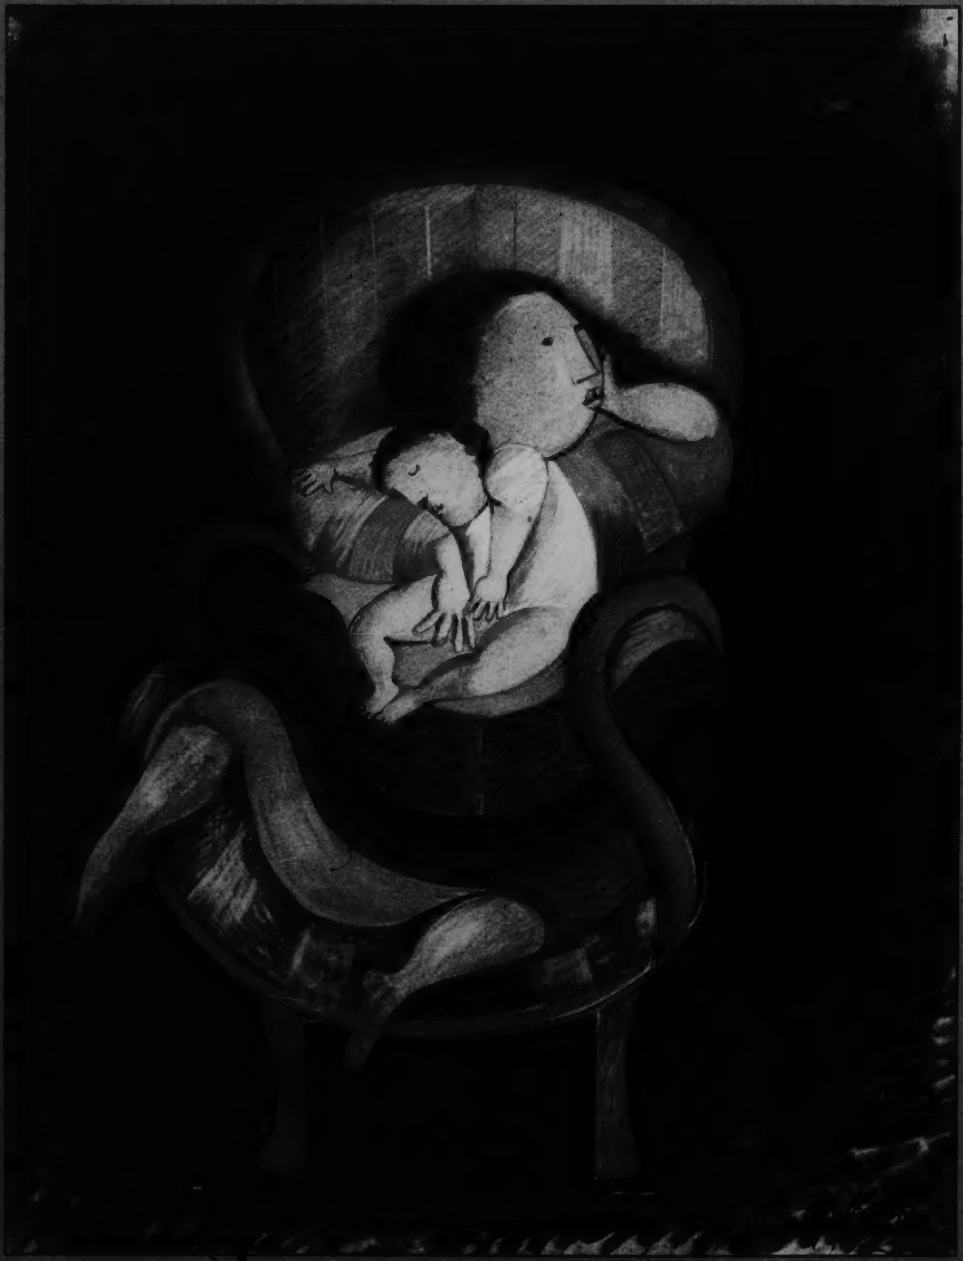
(203) 622-8777
call toll free (800) 243-4004

Graciela Rodo Boulanger



A selection of pastels, demonstrating Boulanger's success in a new medium, will be shown by Lublin Graphics at booth 2-433.

These works evidence her extraordinary scope and versatility as an artist and her mastery of all mediums.

The Babysitter

A new original lithograph, signed by the artist and numbered in an edition of 200 on Arches paper, 100 on Japan Nacre paper, plus Artist's proofs.

Artexpo NY

NEW YORK COLISEUM • APRIL 7-11, 1983

2-433

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

Announcing a new, hand-pulled lithograph on Rives paper, published by C.G. REIN GALLERIES

ANN TAYLOR

HOUSTON EXHIBITION
OPENING
March 24

C.G. REIN GALLERIES
MEMBER FINE ART PUBLISHERS OF AMERICA

DEALER INQUIRIES: COLOR BROCHURES OF OTHER ARTISTS AVAILABLE UPON REQUEST
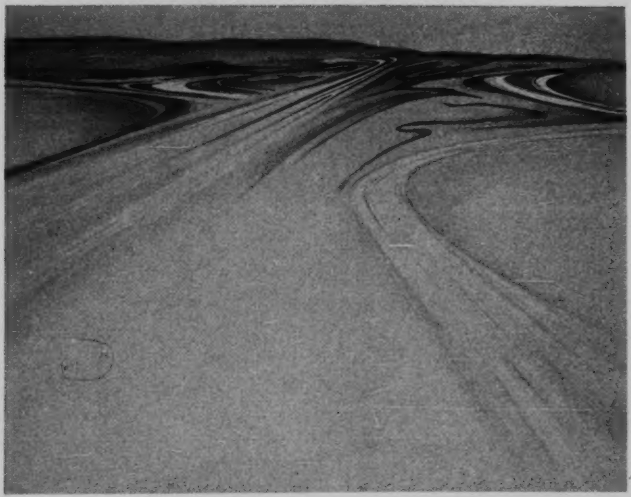
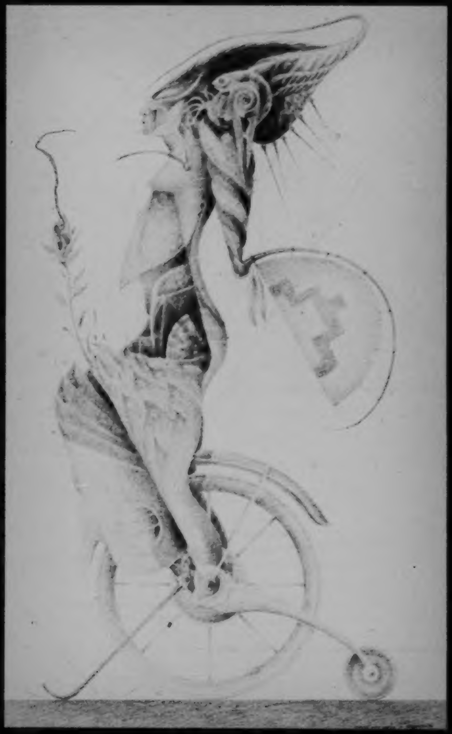
300 Commerce Building, St. Paul, MN 55101
(612) 222-0591



CELERITY, edition of 75

Visit our booth at Art Expo, N.Y. & Art-7, Wash. D.C.

Scottsdale • Santa Fe • Denver • Houston • Edina • Minneapolis



Tom Perkinson • Indian with Wheel • Drawing • 26" × 16"

Tom PERKINSON
Horst GOTTSCHALK
Edward PARDEE
Penelope CHAMPION
James CHRISTENSEN

FOR A FREE BROCHURE
VISIT OUR BOOTH NO. 2-110
AT THE NEW YORK ART EXPO

THE WILL STONE COLLECTION
560 Sutter St.
San Francisco, CA 94102

TOM PERKINSON ALSO REPRESENTED BY GENE MAKO, 430 BURNSIDE, LOS ANGELES

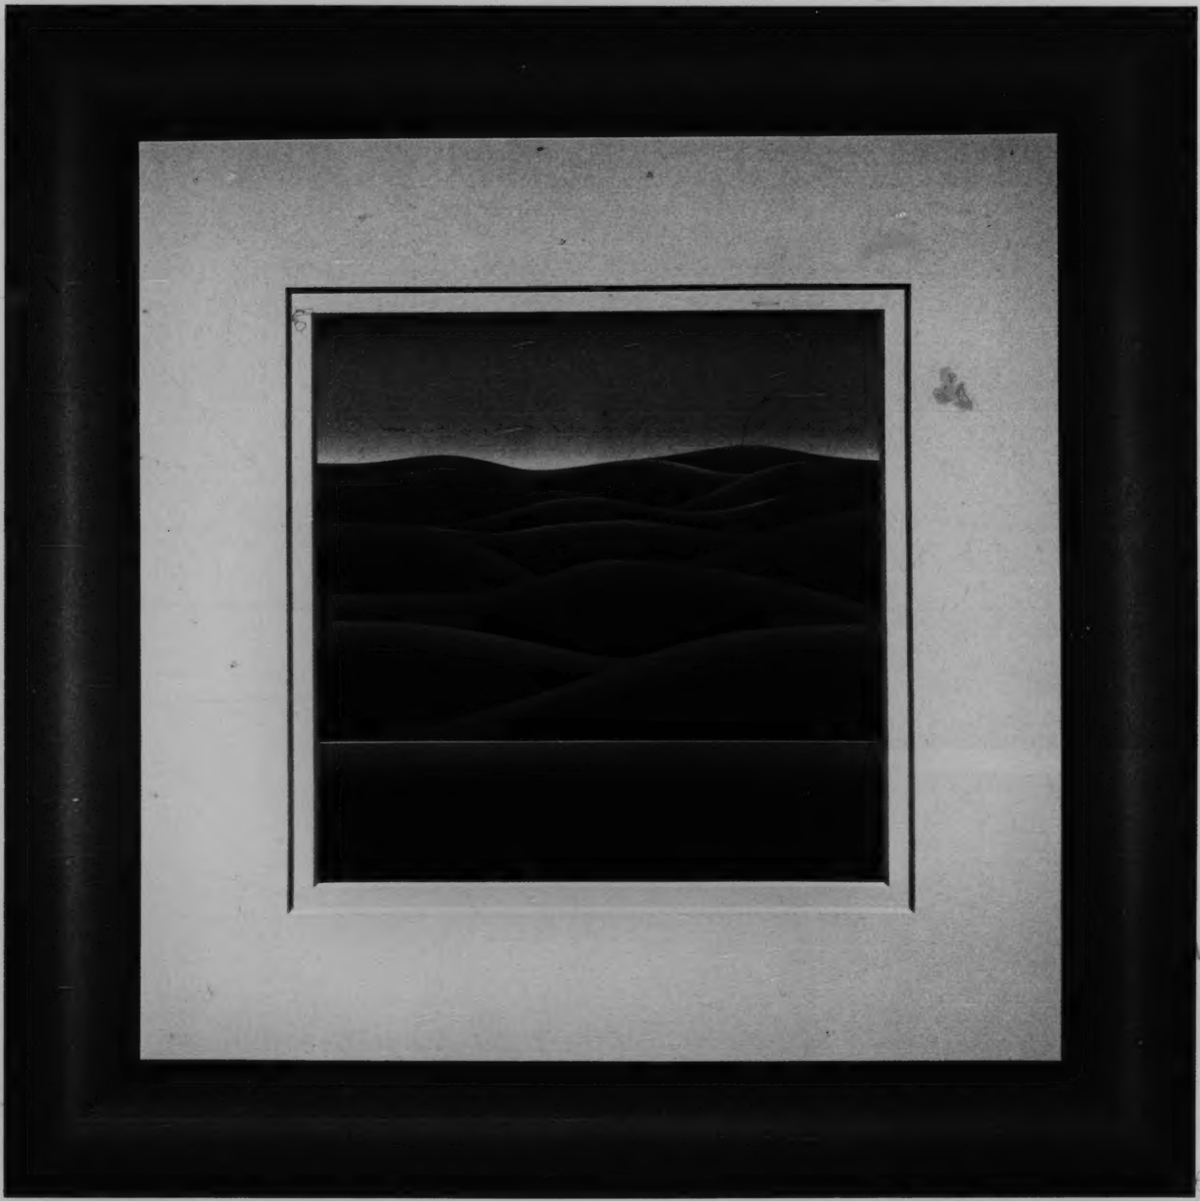
See you at Art expo (NY) New York Coliseum Booth no. 1-309 April 7-11



Soothe Me—Datum acrylic/canvas 60" square

George Snyder

Representation:

afi

Arts Focus, Inc.

401 Capitol St., Charleston, WV 25301 (304)345-9059

San Francisco Bay Area 3708 Mt. Diablo Blvd., Suite 210, Lafayette, CA 94549 (415)284-7703

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

ART
AND PEACE
JAMALI

Major Paintings from the Theme
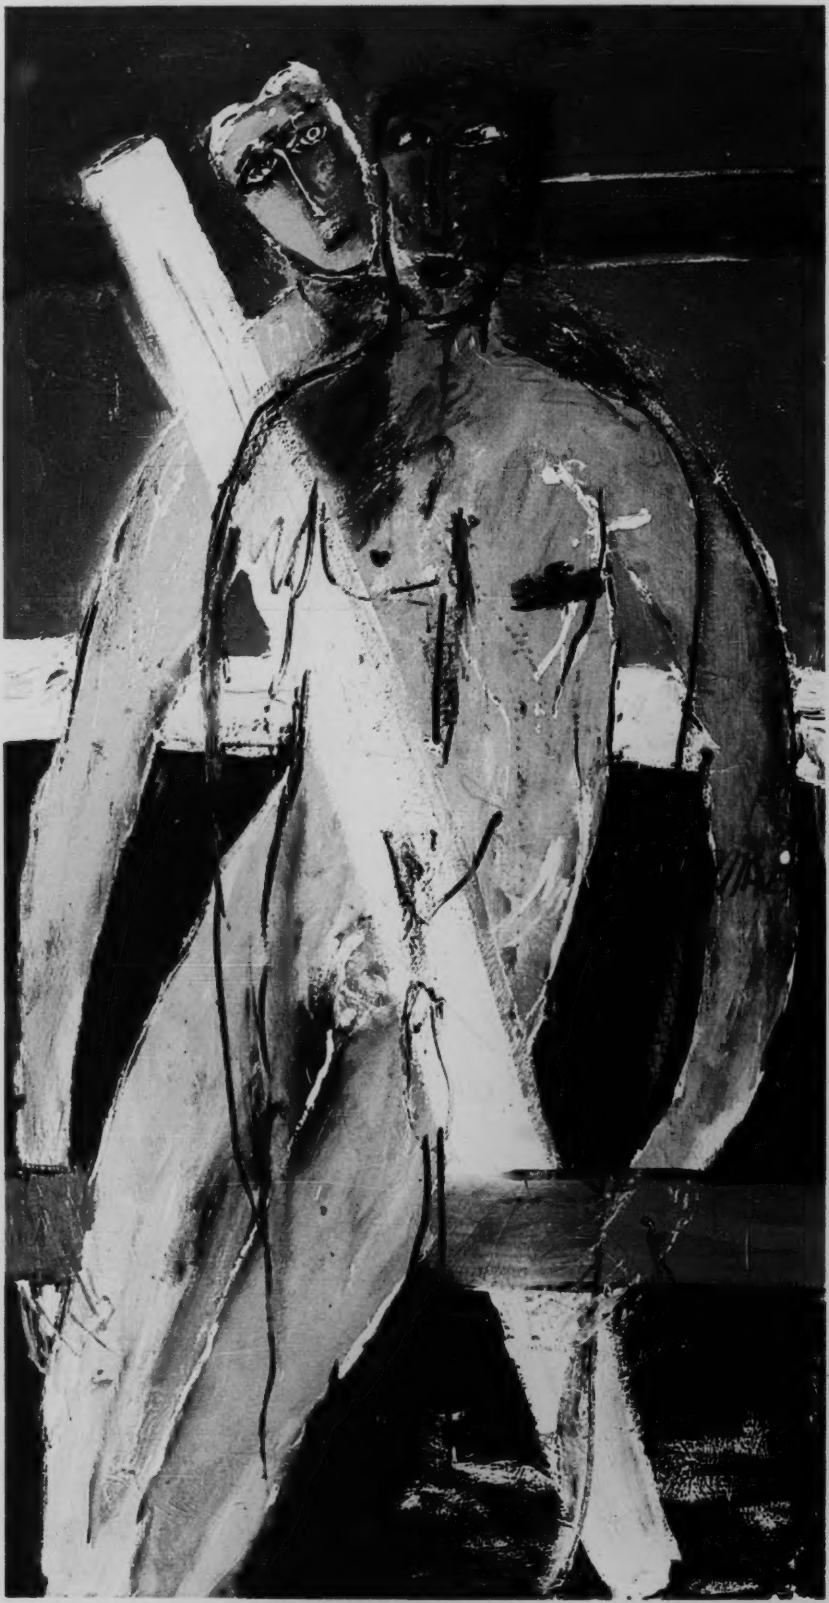
March 4–March 31

EDNA HIBEL GALLERY
1018 Madison Avenue
New York City 10021
212–734–4448



The Entombment and the Crucifixion 96″ × 50″

Photo by FAITH WEIL

Passing Time Bronze

J. Seward Johnson, Jr.

CURRENT EXHIBITIONS:

CITICORP CENTER
NEW YORK, NEW YORK

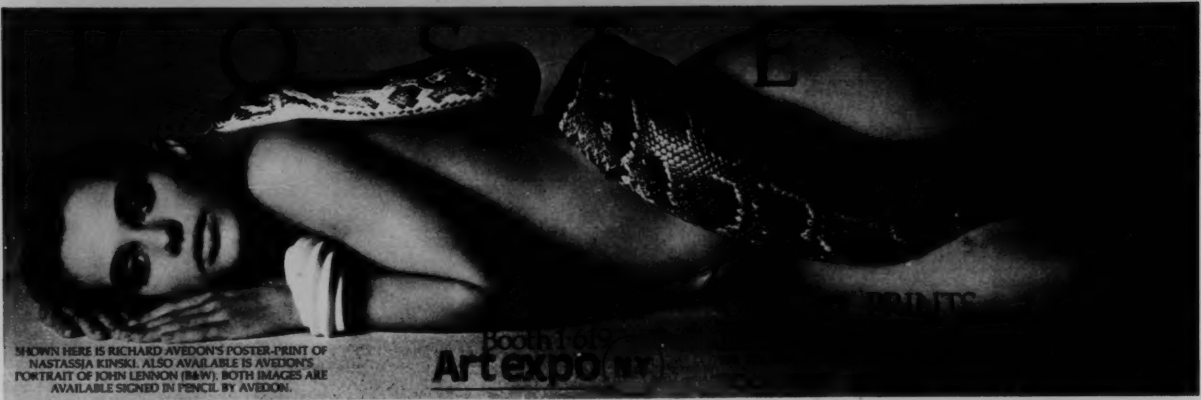
INN ON THE PARK
HOUSTON, TEXAS

YALE CAMPUS and
NEW HAVEN PARKLANDS
NEW HAVEN, CT

GEORGETOWN PARK
WASHINGTON, D.C.

BOCA RATON HOTEL
and CLUB
BOCA RATON, FLORIDA

For brochure and information contact:
Sculpture Placement • Suite 304, Dept. 8 • 2828 Pennsylvania Ave., NW • Washington, D.C. 20007 202-362-9310



SHOWN HERE IS RICHARD AVEDON'S POSTER-PRINT OF NASTASSJA KINSKI. ALSO AVAILABLE IS AVEDON'S PORTRAIT OF JOHN LENNON (B&W). BOTH IMAGES ARE AVAILABLE SIGNED IN PENCIL BY AVEDON.

Art in a liberal arts education

OTTERBEIN COLLEGE

Visual Arts Dept./Otterbein College
Westerville, Ohio 43081
(614) 890-0004

Hacker Art Books
announces

OUR SPRING ART BOOK SALE

Our 16-page illustrated catalogue is filled with hundreds of beautiful and important art books in all fields - out of print and rare books, antiques, painting, sculpture, ceramics, jewelry, limited editions, architecture. African art—many of them rare collectors' items available only from us at prices reduced as much as 70%. A unique opportunity to acquire these superb volumes, lavishly illustrated with color plates, gathered from the world over, at these incredible prices.

For your free copy of this catalogue, write or phone
Hacker Art Books, Inc.
54 West 57th Street, N.Y. 10019 (212) PL7-1450

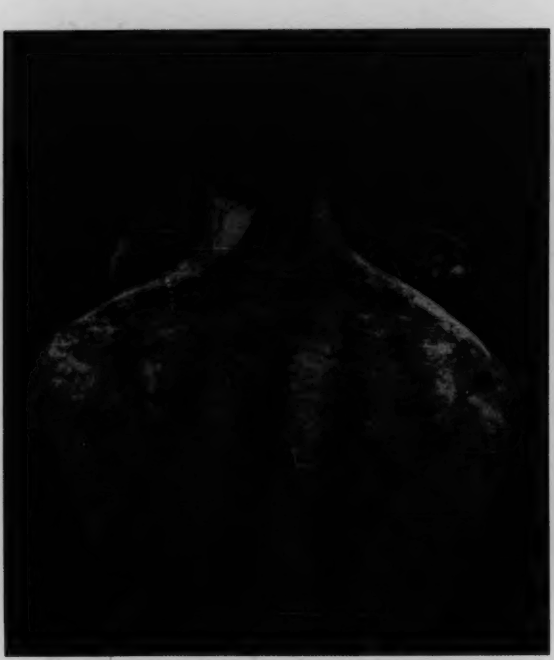
VOL
7
1

ISS
3

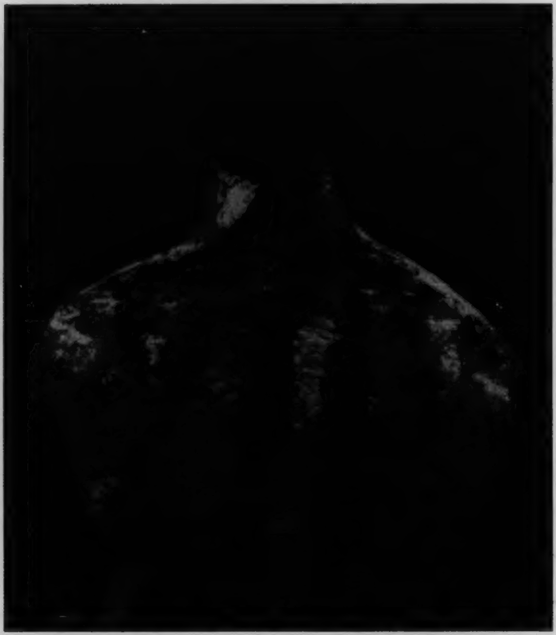
M R

1983

UMI

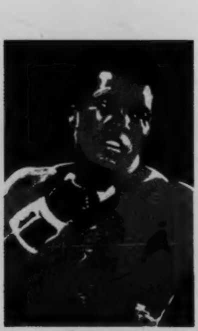


Holmes' Back I edition of 36 image size 49x43

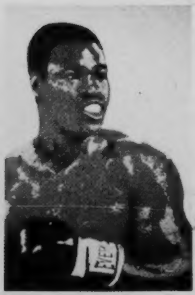


Holmes' Back II edition of 12 image size 49x43

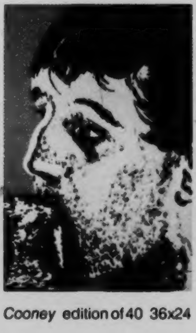
STEVEN MOLASKY
BOXERS



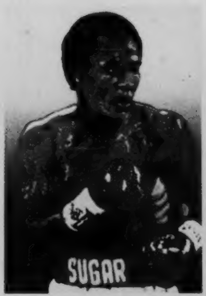
Ali edition of 40 36x24



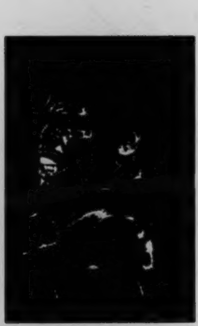
Holmes edition of 40 36x24



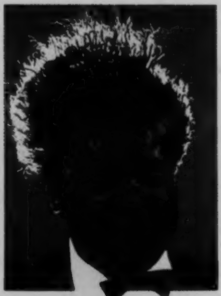
Cooney edition of 40 36x24



Leonard edition of 40 36x24

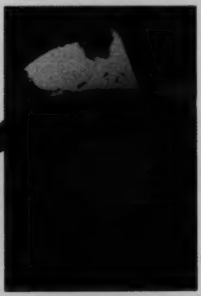


Spinks edition of 90 36x24



Don King edition of 40 36x27

A portfolio offering of Boxers by Steven Molasky. Original, limited edition, hand-pulled serigraphs on Arches, Rives BFK and Stonehenge papers. Signed and numbered. Portfolio also includes "Ali Suite" and "Everlast Gloves."



Joe Louis–Champ edition of 20 30x22

New York (212) 581-6470 ZILLER AND ASSOCIATES Las Vegas (702) 734-0650

ART SERVICES

ADVERTISING AGENCIES

AESTHETICS PLUS Circle No. 1
3040 N Street, NW #4
Washington, D.C. 20007 (202) 965-0956
Services offered in Public Relations, Advertising & Graphic Design.

WEBB DESIGN STUDIO/TAOS Circle No. 2
501 Ranchitos Road
Taos, NM 87571 (505) 758-3447
Graphic design to promote the arts: exhibition catalogues, brochures, advertisements, quality color postcards.

APPRAISERS

AUDREY REAL HELFAND Circle No. 3
945 Fifth Avenue Member: I.S.A.
New York, NY 10021 (212) 535-5972
Appraiser of European and American Fine Arts For Insurance, Gift-Tax, Property Division, and Estates.

KELVYN G. LILLEY AND ASSOCIATES, INC. 4
620 North Michigan Ave., Suite 520
Chicago, IL 60611 (312) 787-0985
Fine and Decorative Arts, Appraisals and Consultations. Over 15 yrs Exp. Recognized by Major Insurance Companies.

L. McADOO PROFESSIONAL APPRAISERS 5
503 Canyon Road
Santa Fe, NM 87501 (505) 984-0152
Fine Art and personal property appraisals. Member of Int'l Society of Appraisers.

PIERCE GALLERIES, INC. Circle No. 6
721 Main St. Route 228
Hingham, MA 02043 (617) 749-6023
19th and Early 20th Century American Art. By Appointment Only.

TUCKER APPRAISAL ASSOCIATES Circle No. 7
River Oaks Shopping Center
Houston, TX 77019 (713) 529-8375
Independent Fee Appraisers of Fine Art Only. We do not Buy or Sell. Member of American Society of Appraisers.

ART CONSULTANTS

ANN H. BISSELL Circle No. 8
2844 Wisconsin Avenue, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20007 (202) 363-2867
Art Installation, Lighting Design and Framing on a Consulting Basis.

COLSON SCULPTURE SERVICE INT'L Circle No. 9
1375 5th Street
Sarasota, FL 33579 (813) 365-3818, 953-5892
Ceramics Shell Sculpture Casting Set-up and Related Information.

DURHAM & ASSOCIATES Circle No. 10
Division of Linda Durham Gallery, 400 Canyon Rd. Ste. B
Santa Fe, NM 87501 (505) 988-1313
Specializing in Gallery formation/development. Professional Consultation on technical, promotional, artistic concerns.

ART POSTERS

POSTER ORIGINALS LTD. 11
924 Madison Ave. New York, NY 10021 (212) 861-0422
158 Spring Street New York, NY 10012 (212) 226-7720
Major Distributor of American and European Art Posters.

ART SUPPLIES

ARTISTIC BRUSH MANUFACTURING CORP. 12
Steven Reich
P.O. Box 1467, 103 Central Avenue
Clifton, NJ 07015 (201) 546-1200
Mfrs. of a Complete line of High Quality Artist Brushes

THE ART STORE Circle No. 13
7200 West Beverly Blvd.
Los Angeles, CA 90036 (213) 933-9284
Quality artist material; save 10% to 30% off manufacturer's list.

ARTHUR BROWN & BRO., INC Circle No. 14
2 West 46 Street
New York, NY 10036 (212) 575-5555
America's Largest Art Materials Distributor. Home of the International Pen Shop.

EASTERN ARTISTS & DRAFTING MATERIALS 15
352 Park Avenue South
New York, NY 10010 (212) 725-5555
Everything for the Artist, Draftsman, Photo-Studio at 20% to 50% off list.

GRUMBACHER Circle No. 16
460 West 34th Street
New York, NY 10001 (212) 279-6400
Fine quality art materials since 1905. See what our art can do for yours.

JERRY'S ARTARAMA, INC. Circle No. 17
248-12X Union Turnpike
Bellerose, NY 11426
Huge savings on art materials and picture frames.

KENNETH LYNCH & SONS Circle No. 18
Box 488, Wilton, CT 06897 (203) 762-8363
Picture hanging rods, mouldings, security devices, stanchions, vitrines, art storage racks, gallery carts, tablets, and plaques. FREE CATALOG.

RISING PAPER COMPANY Circle No. 19
Dennis M. O'Connor
Housatonic, MA 01236 (413) 274-3345
Manufacturers of Mirage, Dansk, Stonehenge, and more. Now in pads.

THE SAINT ARMAND PAPER MILL, INC. Circle No. 20
110 Young
Montreal, Canada H3C 2E7 (514) 935-7526
Finest Linen watercolor papers. 22x30, 300 lbs., $7.50/sheet: samples.

SELWYN TEXTILE COMPANY INC. Circle No. 21
15 West 38th Street
New York, NY 10018 (212) 921-9355
Direct source linen and cotton unprimed artist's canvas. No minimum yardage requirements. Send for free samples.

SHIVA® INC. Circle No. 22
4320 West 190th Street
Torrance, CA 90509 (213) 542-5583
Artists PAINTSTIK®, solid oil paint in stick form. Call (800) 421-1325

UTRECHT Circle No. 23
33 Thirty-Fifth Street
Brooklyn, NY 11232 (212) 768-2525
Major Manufacturer & Distributor of Art & Drafting Supplies at Impressive Savings. Free Catalog.

Continued

VOL 71 ISS 3 MR 1983 UMI

ART SERVICES

WINSOR & NEWTON Circle No. 24
555 Winsor Drive
Secaucus, NJ 07094
Manufacturers of the world's finest artists' materials since 1832.

ARTS ATTORNEYS

KAUFMAN AND GARSHELL Circle No. 25
275 Madison Avenue, Suite 1501
New York, New York 10016 (212) 683-9330
Legal Representation in the Arts for Fine Artists, Galleries, Collectors, Publishers and Distributors.

AUCTION HOUSES

CHASE GILMORE GALLERIES Circle No. 26
724 West Washington Blvd.
Chicago, IL 60606 (312) 648-1690
Auction Gallery, Fine Art and Household Appraisers.

SELKIRK GALLERY Circle No. 27
4166 Olive Street
St. Louis, MO 63108 (314) 533-1700
Fine Art Auctioneering and Appraising.

EXHIBITION CATALOGUES

WORLDWIDE BOOKS Circle No. 28
Brian Gold 37 Antwerp Street
Boston, MA 02135 (617) 787-9100
The foremost specialist in Int'l Art Exhibition Catalogues since 1960.

FINE ART PHOTOGRAPHERS

THOMAS MOON PHOTOGRAPHY Circle No. 29
1 Holden Street
Brookline, MA 02146 (617) 232-8044
Photography Services for the Fine Arts. Black & White, Color, INFRARED. Print or Transparency. All formats.

FINE ART PRINTERS

COLOR Q AFFORDABLE FINE ART REPRODUCTIONS Circle No. 30
2835 Springboro Dayton OH 45439 (513) 294-0406
Get your FREE booklet: "How to gain wider recognition for your artistry, and make more money, too."

CINDI ETTINGER Circle No. 31
142 Vine Street
Philadelphia, PA 19106 (215) 928-9897
Printing Services, Instruction and Plate Restoration. Will Collaborate with Artist.

FINE ART PUBLISHERS

GONDECK GALLERY AND PUBLISHER Circle No. 32
211 Old Santa Fe Trail
Santa Fe, NM 87501 (505) 988-3580
Original Graphics, Lithographs, Serlographs, etchings of contemp. Indian artists. Specializing in Kevin Red Star.

FINE ART TRAVEL

ART EXPLORER'S TOURS Circle No. 33
P.O. Box 26689-P, San Francisco, CA 94126 (415) 921-7677
1983: China-May/Africa-Aug./Sao Paulo Biennale-Oct.
1984: New Guinea-March/Scandinavia-June/Venice Biennale-Sept.

FINNAIR ART TOURS Circle No. 34
George Garber, 10 East 40th St.
New York, NY 10016 (212) 689-9300
Send for free brochure "Fine Art Tours". Tours operate year-round & can be tailored for fund raising/study groups.

FOUNDRIES/FABRICATORS

JOHNSON ATELIER TECH. INSTITUTE 35
Jim Barton, 743 Alexander Road
Princeton, NJ 08540 (609) 452-2661
Bronze, Aluminum, Stainless Steel, Ductile Iron: Sand Molding-Ceramic Shell, Rubber Molds. Bronze Repair & Repatina

MATTHEWS CLASSIC BRONZE DIVISION 36
2230 North Chico Avenue
South El Monte, CA 91733 (213) 444-0468
Our lost wax casting capabilities assure the quality and fidelity of your art. Contact Mel Schelbauer.

JOEL MEISNER FOUNDRY & GALLERY Circle No. 37
120 Fairchild Avenue
Plainview, NY 11803 (516) 349-0260, (212) 895-1472
THE COMPLETE CENTER FOR BRONZE SCULPTURE: for the Sculptor . . . for the Collector . . . for the Art Dealer & Publisher.

FRAMERS

AESTHETIC FRAME DESIGN Circle No. 38
800 Traction Avenue
Los Angeles, CA 90013 (213) 680-4710
Wholesale Custom Framing Specializing in Archival Presentation for Artists, Galleries, Museums, Consultants.

ARTISTS' FRAME SERVICE INC. Circle No. 39
1919 North Clybourn
Chicago, IL 60614 (312) 248-7713
Wholesale custom framing and supply. 80 metal, 200 wood styles, mat board, museum board. Fast professional service.

JACK BARNETT CUSTOM FRAMES Circle No. 40
144 North Second Street
Philadelphia, PA 19106 (215) 629-1766
Specializing in Molded Plexi Frames, U.F.3. Fully Rounded Leaf Frames, Complete Frame Restoration.

BRADIN CUSTOM FRAMING Circle No. 41
3646 South Westshore Blvd.
Tampa, FL 33609 (813) 837-5916
Archival Framing, Nielson Metal Molding for Artists, Designers. Wood Frames. Wholesale.

GREY GOOSE CUSTOM FRAMING Circle No. 42
5046 West Pico Blvd.
Los Angeles, CA 90019 (213) 938-6795
Art Framing to Museum Standards. Plexiglass, Aluminum, Brass, Hardwood. Wholesale.

MARK L.V. FRAMES Circle No. 43
330 Hudson Street
New York, NY 10013 (212) 620-0522
Museum Quality Custom Framing. Poster Mountings. Plexiboxes.

TURNER FRAMING Circle No. 44
7508 Leesburg Pike, Falls Church, VA 22043
Serving Washington D.C. Metropolitan Area
Excellence in Quality Custom Framing. Private Individual and Commercial Accounts.

WALLNUTS FRAME DESIGN Circle No. 45
2018 Locust Street
Philadelphia, PA 19103 (215) 732-8850
Design Consultants to PROFESSIONAL PICTURE FRAMERS ASSOC. Museum Matting, Exotic Woods, Acrylic Boxes, Pedestals.

ART SERVICES

HANGING & DISPLAY EQUIPMENT

WALKER SYSTEMS, INC. Circle No. 46
530 South 21 Avenue East
Duluth, MN 55812 (218) 728-4434
Picture Hanging Devices (Rails, Rods, Hooks, Holders)
Panel Hardware for freestanding displays & exhibits.

INSURANCE

FLATHER & HAYES COMPANY, INC. Circle No. 47
888 Seventeenth Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20006
(202) 466-8888
Fine arts insurance for collectors and dealers.

GREAT NORTHERN BROKERAGE CORP. 48
Norman Newman or Larry Morreale
950 Third Ave
New York, NY 10022 (212) 371-2800
Insurance Specialists to the Art World.

MOVERS AND PACKERS

AIR CARGO EXPRESS Circle No. 49
7851 Airpark Drive
Gaithersburg, MD 20879 (202) 258-0955
Door to Door by Air, Nation and Worldwide
Pick-up and Crating.

L.A. PACKING AND CRATING 50
5852 West Adams Blvd.
Culver City, CA 90230 (213) 933-5602
Specialist in Packing, Crating, Installing, Warehousing, Shipping Fine Art and Antiques. Jim Isenson.

PRO-PAK PROFESSIONAL PACKERS, INC.® 51
527 Dundee Road
Northbrook, IL 60062 (312) 272-0408
Fine Arts Packing, Crating and Shipping Specialists.
Pick-up and Delivery Service. Full Insurance Coverage.

RESTORERS

THE TOMSICH ART GALLERIES LTD. 52
11916 Manchester Road
St. Louis, MO 63131 (314) 966-6777
Conservation of Oil Paintings, Art on Paper, Framing conservation. Appraisals.

SCULPTURE SUPPLIES

CUYAMUNGUE STONE COMPANY Circle No. 53
Route 5, P.O. Box 360B
Santa Fe, New Mexico 87501 (505) 455-7915
Translucent Italian Alabaster, Oklahoma Alabaster.
All Types Marble. African Wonderstone and More . . .

ART SCHOOLS

ALFRED UNIVERSITY Circle No. 54
Tony Hepburn, Division Head
NY State College of Ceramics at Alfred University
Alfred, NY 14802 (607) 871-2442
Complete Fine Arts Program including Art Education.

AMERICAN ACADEMY IN ROME Circle No. 55
41 East 65th Street
New York, N.Y. 10021
Rome Prize 1984/85. Awards in the fields of fine arts and humanistic studies. Application deadline November 15, 1983.

ART SCHOOLS

ART INSTITUTE OF BOSTON Circle No. 56
Cynthia Close, 700 Beacon Street
Boston, MA 02215 (617) 262-2844
Graphic Design, Advertising, Illustration, Fine Arts, Photography, Day and Evening, Saturday and Summer Programs.

ART STUDENTS LEAGUE OF NEW YORK Circle No. 57
R.A. Florio, Director, 215 West 57th Street
New York, NY 10019 (212) CI7-4510
Drawing, Painting, Sculpture,
Watercolor, Graphic Portraiture, Landscape.

BENNINGTON COLLEGE Circle No. 58
John Nissen
Bennington, VT 05201 (802) 442-5401
BA, MFA, Painting, Sculpture, Ceramics, Graphics, Photog.
BA, Drawing, Arch. 9 week off campus work term-Jan. & Feb.

BISCUIT RUN STUDIOS Circle No. 59
David Breeden, Rt. 1 Box 24
Charlottesville, VA 22901 (804) 977-5411
Sculpture Retreat: Soapstone sculpture technique taught. Everything included: Soapstone/tools/room/food & drink/$30 night.

BLOSSOM FESTIVAL SCHOOL Circle No. 60
Art Program, Kent State University
Kent, Ohio 44242 (216) 672-2192
BA, BFA, MFA, Painting, Sculpture, Printmaking, Crafts, Cinema
BA, MA Art Hist., Art Ed., BA/MFA Industrial & Graphic Design.

BOSTON MUSEUM SCHOOL Circle No. 61
Eugene C. Ward, Dean of Admissions
Dept. of the Museum of Fine Arts/Affl. with Tufts Univ.
230 The Fenway, Boston, MA 02115/(617) 267-9300/BA BFA BSed
MFA 5 yr double degree program with Tufts, Studio Arts

BRADLEY UNIVERSITY Circle No. 62
Walter Thompson, Director, 1501 West Bradley Avenue
Peoria, IL 61625 (309) 676-7611
MA, MFA Painting, Sculpture, Printmaking, Metals,
Jewelry, Ceramics.

BUNTING FELLOWSHIP PROGRAM Circle No. 63
Radcliffe College, 10 Garden Street
Cambridge, MA 02138 (617) 495-8212
Fellowship for professional women in the Arts.
Deadline: Autumn 1983.

CALIF COLLEGE OF ARTS & CRAFTS Circle No. 64
5212 Broadway
Oakland, CA 94618 (415) 653-8118
BFA, MFA, MAEd, 3 year Certificate, Teaching Credentials,
Fine Arts, Crafts, Design. 3 five week summer sessions.

CALIFORNIA INSTITUTE OF THE ARTS Circle No. 65
Kenneth Young, Director of Admissions
24700 McBean Parkway
Valencia, CA 91355 (805) 255-1050
BFA, MFA, Art & Design, Film & Video, Dance, Music, Theater.

CHAMBERLAYNE JUNIOR COLLEGE Circle No. 66
128 Commonwealth Avenue
Boston, MA 02116 (617) 536-4500 ext. 56
Advertising Design, Commercial Art; Interior and Fashion Design. Fashion Illustration.

CHAUTAUQUA INSTITUTION Circle No. 67
Jean Quinette Art Center, Box 1098
Chautauqua, NY 14722 (716) 357-6200
Summer Program Painting & Drawing, Ceramics, Sculp., Fiber, Jewelry & Metals, Photog. College Credit Recommendation.

COLUMBUS COLLEGE OF ART & DESIGN 68
Laurie Clements & Pat Marion
47 North Washington Avenue
Columbus, OH 43215 (614) 224-9101
BFA, Studio Arts. Non-profit Professional College of Art.

Continued

VOL 71 ISS 3 MR 1983 UMI

ART SCHOOLS

COOPER UNION SCHOOL OF ART & SCHOOL OF ARCHITECTURE Circle No. 69
Director of Admissions, 41 Cooper Square
New York, NY 10003 (212) 254-6300
BFA in all areas of Visual Arts & Design. B. Architecture.

CORCORAN SCHOOL OF ART Circle No. 70
Heidi Ehrman Donner 17th and New York Avenue, NW
Washington, D.C. 20006 (202) 628-9484 ext. 71
BFA. Fine Arts, Graphic Design, and Photography
Washington's only accredited Studio school.

CORNELL UNIVERSITY Circle No. 71
Jason Seley, Dean of College
College of Architecture, Art and Planning
Ithaca, NY 14853 (607) 256-4912
BFA, MFA, Painting, Sculpture, Printmaking, Graphics, Photo.

CRANBROOK ACADEMY OF ART Circle No. 72
Registrar CAA, 500 Lone Pine Rd., P.O. Box 801
Bloomfield Hills, MI 48013 (313) 645-3303
Graduate Program: Architecture, Ceramics, Design, Fiber, Metals, Painting, Photography, Printmaking, Sculpture.

HOPE COLLEGE Circle No. 73
Delbert Michel, Art Department Chairman
Holland, MI 49423 (616) 392-5111
Liberal arts institution with strong Art program. BA, major in Art. Excellent new teaching facilities.

IDYLLWILD SCHOOL OF MUSIC & ARTS 74
Suzanne Sawyer, P.O. Box 38
Idyllwild, CA 92349 (714) 659-2171
Summer Programs in: Visual Arts, Music, Dance, Theatre, Studio Arts, Photography, American Indian Art Workshops

JOHNSON ATELIER TECH. INSTITUTE Circle No. 75
Brooke Barrie, Academic Director
743 Alexander Road, Princeton, NJ 08540 (609) 452-2661
Sculpture: modeling-enlarging, resins, mold, wax, shell, foundry, metal chasing, structures, patination, sand foundry.

KUTZTOWN STATE COLLEGE Circle No. 76
George E. McKinley
Kutztown, PA 19530 (215) 683-4060
BFA, Communication Design, General Fine Arts, Related Arts, Crafts. BS in Art Education.

MARYLAND INSTITUTE COLLEGE OF ART 77
Barbara Miller, 1300 W. Mt. Royal Avenue
Baltimore, MD 21217 (301) 669-9200
BFA, MFA, Fine Arts, Interior Design, Photography, Graphic Design, Crafts.

MASSACHUSETTS COLLEGE OF ART Circle No. 78
Kay Ransdell 346 Brookline Avenue,
Boston, MA 02215 (617) 731-2340
BFA, Painting, Sculpture, Crafts, Film, Photo, Arch., Industrial, Graphic, Fashion Design, Art Ed., MSEd.

MEADOWS SCHOOL OF THE ARTS Circle No. 79
William H. Lively
Southern Methodist University
Dallas, TX 75275 (214) 692-3217
BA, BFA, MA Art History, MFA in Studio Art.

MEMPHIS ACADEMY OF ART Circle No. 80
Director of Admissions, (901) 726-4085
Overton Park, Memphis, TN 38112
BFA, Painting, Sculpture, Photog., Advertising Design/ Illustration, Printmaking, Metals, Fiber/Papermaking, Clay.

MILTON AVERY GRADUATE SCHOOL OF THE ARTS - BARD COLLEGE Circle No. 81
Annandale-on-Hudson, NY 12504 (914) 758-4105
An interdisciplinary program; MFA granted in: Poetry, Sculp., Intermedia, Music, Film, Photog., Fiction, Painting.

MOORE COLLEGE OF ART Circle No. 82
Dolores Lewis, 20th and the Parkway,
Philadelphia, PA 19103 (215) 568-4515
Advtg., Fashion, Interior Design. Fashion Illustration. Textile, Ceramics, Jewelry, Paintg, Printmakg, Sculp, Photog.

NEW YORK ACADEMY OF ART Circle No. 83
13-15 Laight Street (Canal and 6th Avenue)
New York, NY 10013 (212) 966-9970
Academic Curriculum: Cast Drawing, Life Drawing, Anatomy, Figure Painting, Sculpture, Pictorial Composition.

OTTERBEIN COLLEGE Circle No. 84
Westerville, Ohio 43081
(614) 890-0004
4 year private Liberal Arts. BA in all major areas of Visual Arts, BFA in Theatre, BMus Ed.

OXBOW Circle No. 85
Saugatuck, MI 49453
(312) 787-0986
Intensive Paper-Making, Painting, Ceramics, and Architecture.

PACIFIC NORTHWEST COLLEGE OF ART 86
Bonnie Malcolmson, Admissions 1219 Southwest Park
Portland, OR 97205 (503) 226-4391
BFA, Ceramics, Printmaking, Drawing, Painting, Sculpture, Graphic Design, Illustration, Photography.

PARSONS SCHOOL OF DESIGN Circle No. 87
Vieri Salvadori, Dean
66 Fifth Avenue, New York, NY 10011 (212) 741-8953
MFA, Studio Workshops with Senior Faculty. New Sculpture program available. Leland Bell, John Heliker, Paul Resika.

PENNSYLVANIA ACADEMY OF FINE ARTS 88
Erika Flory, Room M, Broad & Cherry Streets
Philadelphia, PA 19102 (215) 972-7625
Painting, Sculpture, Printmaking, Drawing, 4 Year Certificate.

PHILADELPHIA COLLEGE OF ART Circle No. 89
Caroline Kelsey, Director, Broad & Spruce Streets
Philadelphia, PA 19102 (215) 893-3174
Crafts, Fine Arts, Design, Liberal Arts, Concentration in Art Therapy, BFA, BS, MA in Art Education.

THE PLUM TREE SUMMER WORKSHOP Circle No. 90
Dick Thibodeau or John Lamkin, Directors
Pilar, NM 87571 (505) 758-4696
Summer workshops in the Fine Arts, Solar Building Arts Theatre, Dance and more.

PORTLAND SCHOOL OF ART Circle No. 91
97 Spring Street
Portland, ME 04101 (207) 772-5137
BFA, Ceramics, Graphics, Jewelry & Silversmithing, Photog., Painting, Printmaking & Sculp. Summer pre-college program.

PRATT INSTITUTE Circle No. 92
Linda Berk, Director, 200 Willoughby Avenue
Brooklyn, NY 11205 (212) 636-3670
17 Majors, Graduate and Undergraduate in Art and Design MFA, BFA, AOS, BID, MID, BA and MA in Architecture.

RHODE ISLAND SCHOOL OF DESIGN Circle No. 93
Edward Newhall, Director
2 College Street, Box 1A
Providence, RI 02903 (401) 331-3511
18 Majors in Architecture, Fine Arts and Design.

RINGLING SCHOOL OF ART AND DESIGN 94
1191 27th Street
Sarasota, FL 33580 (813) 351-4614
BFA and 3 year Certification in Fine Arts, Graphic Design, Illustration, Interior Design and Space Planning.

ART SCHOOLS

SAN FRANCISCO ART INSTITUTE Circle No. 95
800 Chestnut St., San Francisco, CA 94133 (415) 771-7020
Filmmaking, Painting, Performance/Video, Photography, Printmaking, Sculpture/Ceramic Sculpture, MFA, BFA, Humanities Program.

THE SAVANNAH COLLEGE OF ART/DESIGN 96
Paula Rowen, Director 342 Bull Street
Savannah, Georgia 31401 (912) 236-7458
BFA Painting, Graphics Design, Illustration, Interior Design Photography, Historic Preservation.

SCHOOL OF THE ART INST. OF CHICAGO 97
Jana Wright, Jackson and Columbus Drive
Chicago, IL 60603 (312) 443-3717
BFA, MFA, Professional Certificates in Art History and in Art Therapy.

SCHOOL OF VISUAL ARTS Circle No. 98
Stephen Pite, Director of Admissions
209 East 23rd Street
New York, NY 10010 (212) 679-7350
BFA degree and non-degree programs. MFA degree in Fine Arts.

SILVERMINE GUILD SCHOOL OF THE ARTS 99
Margo Bonthuis (Registrar), Michael Costello (Director)
1037 Silvermine Road
New Canaan, CT 06840 (203) 866-0411
Major disciplines of visual arts. Adult/Children/Day/Eve.

SKIDMORE COLLEGE: SUMMER SIX ART 100
Regis Brodie, Director
Saratoga Springs, NY 12866 (518) 584-5000, x372
Two 6 week sessions: 5/25-7/1 & 7/6-8/12
Studio Art & Art History—BA or Grad. Credit.

SKOWHEGAN SCHOOL OF PAINTING AND SCULPTURE 101
JoAnn Chuba, 329 East 68, NY, NY 10021 (212) 861-9270
9 week residency program in Maine of painters & sculptors. Applications due February 28.

SOUTHAMPTON COLLEGE Circle No. 102
Kevin Coveney,
Southampton, NY 11968 (516) 283-4000, ext. 120
BFA, Graphic Design BS, ArtEd., BA Liberal Arts/Fine Arts Summer workshops in Studio Arts.

SUMMERVAIL WORKSHOP Circle No. 103
P.O. Box 117
Minturn, Colorado 81645 (303) 827-5703
June 20-August 5, 1-week workshops in hot and flat glass ceramics, metalsmithing, sculpture, fibers, photography etc.

SUNY AT PURCHASE Circle No. 104
Edward Colker, Dean
Purchase, NY 10577 (914) 253-5014,5
BFA, Painting, Drawing, 111-D Media, Printmaking, Paper Making, Arts of the Book, Graphic Design, Photography.

SWAIN SCHOOL OF DESIGN Circle No. 105
A.D. Tinkham, Director of Admissions
19 Hawthorn Street
New Bedford, MA 02740 (617) 997-7831
BFA, Painting, Printmaking, Sculpture, Graphic Design.

TEXAS CHRISTIAN UNIVERSITY Circle No. 106
Ronald Watson, Chairman, Dept. of Art and Art History
Fort Worth, Texas 76129 (817) 921-7643
BFA, Complete visual arts program including graphic design. MFA, painting, printmaking, ceramics, sculp., metals.

TRURO CENTER FOR THE ARTS Circle No. 107
Castle Hill, Truro, MA 02666 (617) 349-3714
Summer workshops in beautiful surroundings: Painting, Drawing, Sculpture, Ceramics, Photography, Weaving, Art History. Graduate & Undergraduate accreditation available.

TYLER SCHOOL OF ART Circle No. 108
Margaret Heuges, Beech and Penrose
Elkins Park, PA 19126
(215) 224-7575
BFA, MFA, MEd, Design, Fine and Applied Arts

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS AT URBANA Circle No. 109
Eugene Wicks
School of Art and Design, 408 East Peabody Drive
Champaign, IL 61820 (217) 333-0855
NASAD Accreditation. BFA, MFA, MA, PHD, DED.

UTAH STATE UNIVERSITY Circle No. 110
R.T. Clark, Head, Art Department, Logan, UT 84322 (801) 750-3460
BA/BFA/MA/MFA/Advtg./Art Ed./Ceramics/Drawing/ Illustration/ Painting/Photog./Printmaking/Sculp./ Textile Design.

VIRGINIA COMMONWEALTH UNIVERSITY 111
Thomas DeSmidt, Assistant Dean, School of Arts
325 North Harrison Street
Richmond, VA 23284 (804) 257-1700
BFA, MFA in all Visual Arts Disciplines.

YALE UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF ART Circle No. 112
Patricia DeChiara Lubar, Admissions Officer, 180 York St.
New Haven, CT 06520 (203) 436-4380
Graphic Design Summer Program in Brissago, Switzerland. Deadline April 1, 1983. Summer Art Programs in New Haven, CT.

To receive information from the companies listed, circle the corresponding number on the REPLY COUPON below, and drop it in an envelope. You will receive information directly from them.

Art in America REPLY COUPON
Reader Service Dept., 850 Third Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10022

MARCH 1983
THIS COUPON EXPIRES
June 30, 1983

NAME (PLEASE PRINT) TELEPHONE
ADDRESS
CITY STATE ZIP

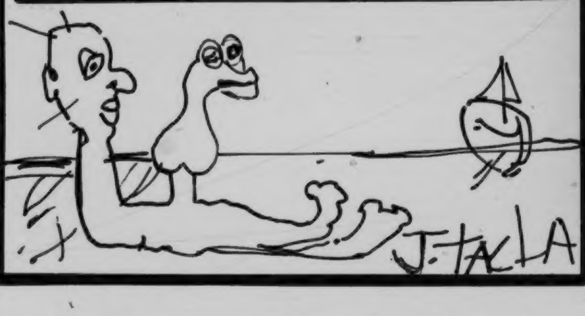
Art Services & Schools ▽ Please send information circled.

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13	14	15	16	17	18	19	20	21	22	23	24	25	26	27	28	29	30
31	32	33	34	35	36	37	38	39	40	41	42	43	44	45	46	47	48	49	50	51	52	53	54	55	56	57	58	59	60
61	62	63	64	65	66	67	68	69	70	71	72	73	74	75	76	77	78	79	80	81	82	83	84	85	86	87	88	89	90
91	92	93	94	95	96	97	98	99	100	101	102	103	104	105	106	107	108	109	110	111	112	113	114	115	116	117	118	119	120

ALLOW 6-8 WEEKS FOR DELIVERY

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

inter-american Art gallery
1000 madison avenue new york n.y. 10021 (212) 772-7760



SHEILA KRYNSKI
NEW WORK

MARCH 26 - APRIL 14
ALTERNATE SPACE GALLERY
AT WESTBROADWAY
431 WEST BROADWAY, NEW YORK, NY 10012
GALLERY HOURS: TUESDAY-FRIDAY 11-5, SATURDAY 11-6
TELEPHONE: (212) 966-2520

TATISTCHEFF

JOHN STUART INGLE

STILL LIFE

MARCH 1-31

TATISTCHEFF
38 EAST 57 • NEW YORK • 888-1599

JON LEON GALLERY

Works by John Chamberlain
Nathan Slate Joseph
Steve Miller
Richard Mock
Alf Young

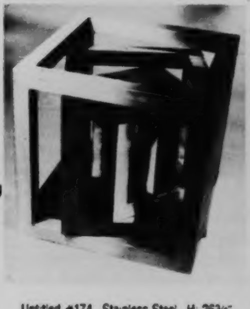
March 9-April 9

31 Desbrosses Street New York City 226-7789
Open Saturday 12 to 6 pm. Other Days by Appointment Only

MORTON
RACHOFSKY
SCULPTURE

3 Three Sisters Gallery
2300 Mercantile Bank Bldg
Dallas, Texas 75201
214/748-1248

Catalogue Available
$6.00



Untitled #174 Stainless Steel H: 26¾"

THE SOURCE
RC Gorman
AT
Now & Then Gallery Ltd.
797 Merrick Ave. East Meadow, L.I., N.Y. 11554
(516) 481-1447 (212) 895-1145
LITHOS—CERAMICS—SCULPTURE—SILKSCREENS

Florence Putterman
Prints and Monotypes

Erikson Gallery

---

theOctober
GALLERY

Specializing in Contemporary Works
on Paper by
American, Canadian and European Artists

1226 Spring St., St. Helena, CA 94574 707 963-7501

MOUNTAIN LAKE SYMPOSIUM IV
Sponsored by Virginia Tech Department of Art* at Mountain Lake Resort Hotel, Virginia
ENVIRONMENTAL VARIATIONS April 29, 30, May 1, 1983
MARY BETH EDELSON ● NANCY HOLT ● MARY MISS ● CARRIE RICKEY

REGISTRATION INFORMATION. There is a $25.00 registration fee for the conference. Accommodations charges must be paid directly to Mountain Lake Hotel upon departure from the conference: $40/day double occupancy, $50/day single occupancy & $3.00/day room charge and 4% tax. Three meals each day are included in the daily charge. To register, send fee to Victor Huggins, Head, Department of Art, Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University, Blacksburg, Virginia 24061, or call (703) 961-5548.

*IN CONSORTIUM WITH DEPT. OF ART, OLD DOMINION UNIV.

MARVIN KING
ORIGINAL PERFORMANCES OF NEW MUSIC, HARDWOOD CARVINGS AND VIDEO ILLUSTRATION ON VHS.
30 min/8 tunes/107 pieces
Signed Drawing and Cassette $268.00

JANE-LEE VIDEO GALLERY
P.O. Box 50014
Austin, Texas 78763
512 476-2799

ROBERTO WHITE
and associates

Museum quality paintings and sculpture
16th to 20th century

by appointment only
225 Central Park West, New York, N.Y. 10024
(212) 580-2416

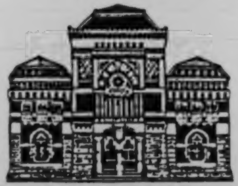
PENNSYLVANIA ACADEMY OF THE FINE ARTS

Oldest art school in America offers majors in Painting, Sculpture & Printmaking. Admission to Day school by Portfolio. Accredited by NASAD. Financial Aid available. Approved for Veterans.

Evening & Summer programs in Painting, Drawing and Sculpture.

Founded 1805

For catalog write:
PAFA, Room M,
Broad & Cherry Sts.,
Phila., PA 19102



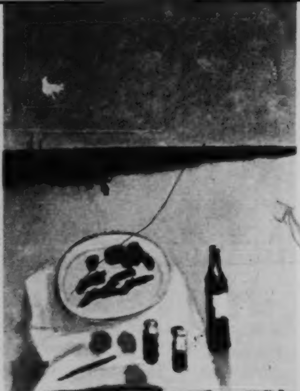
Alex Katz

[illegible]

McINTOSH/DRYSDALE GALLERY
2008 PEDEN HOUSTON, TEXAS 77019 713/520-1888

GROUP SHOW
With Antiquities
March 1 - April 28th

SL Art Gallery
2133 Cedar Springs
214/761-9912 • Dallas, Texas 75201



"Beach Picnic," 1982, oil, 40 x 30"

HERMAN MARIL
RECENT PAINTINGS

March 5-26

FORUM GALLERY
1018 Madison Avenue

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
M R
1983
UMI

MIDTOWN
GALLERIES EST. 1932 11 East 57 St., N.Y. (212) 758-1900

BRUCE CURRIE
RECENT PAINTINGS
THROUGH
MARCH 26

REPRESENTING
IMPORTANT AMERICAN ARTISTS

REPOSE, 32" x 44"

PABLO PICASSO

Paintings and Graphic Works
March 15 - April 30

HARCOURTS GALLERY
535 Powell Street. San Francisco.CA 94108.(415) 421-3428

Yoseido Gallery

Contemporary Japanese prints

5-5-15, Ginza, Chuo-ku, Tokyo,
Japan phone: 571-1312, 2471

100 page catalog upon request — $8.00

Galería San Jerónimo
Condado Holiday Inn - 999 Ashford Ave. Condado, P.R. - Tel. 722-1808 / 721-1000

FEATURING ARTISTS OF PUERTO RICO
and

J. D'ESOPO, J. KRESMAN,
C. PFAHL, L. MARCOS,
M. LOVELAND MILLER,
T. SPINNER

MAUD Pencil portrait TERESA SPINNER

Galería San Juan
Blvd. del Valle 204-206 Old San Juan, P.R. - Tel. 722-1808 / 725-3829

KRAUSHAAR GALLERIES
724 Fifth Ave (Bet. 57th & 56th Sts New York
Tues. thru Sat., 9:30 to 5:30

JERRY ATKINS
Sculpture • to Mar. 12

JOHN HARTELL
Paintings • Mar. 23 to Apr. 16

L.A. Packing And Crating

Fine Art Specialists
Packing, Crating, Installation
Storage, Transportation

(213) 933-5602

5852 W. Adams Boulevard Culver City, CA 90230

AMERICAN MASTER PRINTS EXHIBITION

Stuart Davis, Barber Shop Chord, 1931

Works by George Bellows, Rockwell Kent, Grant Wood, John Steuart Curry, Lyonel Feininger, Reginald Marsh, Isabel Bishop, Thomas Hart Benton, Raphael Soyer, Childe Hassam, Louis Lozowick, John Taylor Arms, Milton Avery, Stuart Davis, John Marin, Edward Hopper, Charles Sheeler, and others. Illustrated catalogue available on request from the New York gallery. On view at AAA/Philadelphia in March. On view at AAA/New York in April.

Associated American Artists
663 Fifth Avenue (52-53 Sts.) New York 10022 (212) 755-4211
1614 Latimer Street, Philadelphia 19103 (215) 545-7374

We'll make you work hard so you'll have an easier time getting the job you want. For information about our programs in Graphic Design, Advertising, Illustration, Fine Arts and Photography, call (617) 262-2844.

THE ART INSTITUTE OF BOSTON
700 Beacon St., Boston, MA 02215
We'll put your creativity to work.

Emma Alvarez Piñeiro

Estévez Vilas Gallery
Cincinnati, Ohio

Arch
new york gallery

ROBERT
BEAUCHAMP

Represented by Monique Knowlton Gallery, New York

CINDY SHERMAN

February 18 through March

FAY GOLD GALLERY
3221 CAINS HILL PLACE ATLANTA
404-233-3843

ZUPAN
BRUNO
CHRISTENSEN
HENRY
DOREN
J

Biach
Galleries

Cleveland Plaza suite 108
123 North Union Ave.
Cranford, New Jersey 07016
(201) 272-7070

Gudrun Frady
Sculptures — March 8 - April 3

Untitled, 1982, Copper, wood and aluminum on canvas, 36" x 36"

Yvonne Séguy Gallery
61 West 62 Street • Harkness Plaza • New York, New York 10023
(212) 265-3314

ART EXPO N.Y., April 7-11, 1983. Stand # I-123 One Person Show by EUGENIA ERES, Oils and Lithographs. Painter Landscapes is Academician the Int. Accademia Italia, and member The International Platform Assc.. Eres won a Oscar, Diploma Master of Painting Honoris Causa, two Gold Medals, Golden Centaur, and more than fifty juried top awards. Her name is included in numerous Nat. and International biographical references.

Studio: (212) 849-1677

"GIRL BRAIDING HER HAIR"
Original Lithograph by RAPHAEL SOYER from an Edition of 125, Hand-Signed Pieces Measuring 11" x 15" 200.

Galerie Coté
302 SUNRISE HIGHWAY
ROCKVILLE CENTRE, NEW YORK 11570
(516) 678-2659

E.A.T. BIBLIOGRAPHY 1965-1980
by BILLY KLUVER

Lists 969 publications documenting the evolution of art and technology since 1965

$7.50 plus $1 postage and handling

EXPERIMENTS IN ART AND TECHNOLOGY
49 East 68th Street New York, N.Y. 10021
(212) 285-1690

March 1 - March 31
TAPESTRY • FIBER

Bolotowsky
Goodnough
Lichtenstein
Marca-Relli
Stamos
Vicente
Al Hilali
Farmer
Guay
O'Hara
Stein
Schreiber

MODERN MASTER TAPESTRIES INC.
11 East 57th St., N.Y. 10022. (212) 838-0412. Tues.–Sat., 9:30–5:30.

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR
1983
UMI

expo arte

Fiera Internazionale di Arte Contemporanea
Bari 22/27 Marzo 1983
Fiera del Levante

Art 14'83
Basel 15.-20.6.1983

THE PLACE TO STAY

HOTEL RÖMERBAD
BADENWEILER

Vogue called it "One of Europe's last Dream Hotels". Just 25 miles from the Basle Art Fair.

Ask for the Special Art Fair Package: Single DM 150, double DM 240 including breakfast, taxes and bus transfer from and to fair.

Hotel Römerbad
one of The Leading Hotels of the World
Represented Worldwide by HRI
D-7847 Badenweiler
Phone 07632-700
Telex 772933

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION DIRECTORY

A guide to current exhibitions abroad

ARGENTINA	BUENOS AIRES	☎ 54 (1)
	RUTH BENZACAR Talcahuano 1216-1° • Tel. 41-8549, 42-5614/5568	Arnaiz, Aizenberg, Audivert, Benedit, Benguria, Cáceres, Castilla, De Monte, Esteves, Kleiman, Puente, Robirosa, Smoje, Torroja, Vegezzi.
	DEL RETIRO Florida 943 • Tel. 32.5850	Gallery artists: Pablo Bobbi, Marcello Bonevardi, Sergio Camporalle, Dalla Cujat, Lea Lublin, Aldo Parella, Daniel Selaga.
AUSTRIA	INNSBRUCK	☎ 43 (5222)
	KRINZINGER Adolf Pichlerplatz 8 • Tel. 32,131	Lois Weinberger, sculpture
	VIENNA	☎ 43 (222)
	ARIADNE Bäckerstrasse 6 • Tel. 52.94.79	Axel Mötkel, oil paintings and works on paper
	GALERIE HUMMEL Bäckerstrasse 14 • Tel. 52 12 96	Mar. 2-26, Evelyn Egerer, "Works in Space"
	GRITA INSAM Köllnerhofg. 6 • Tel. 52.53.30	Guiseppe Chiari, photos and scores; light concert
	NÄCHST ST. STEPHAN Grunangergasse 1/11 II • Tel. 52.12.66	Feb. 28-Mar. 19, Young Austrian artists: Clemens Kaletsch, Peter Kogler, Ernst Trawöger, Martin Walde
	ULYSSES Opernring 21 • Tel. 57.12.26.	Barbara Pflaum, photographs. Catalogue Available.
BELGIUM	ANTWERP	☎ 32 (2)
	AVANTGRADE Volkstraat 60 • Tel. 216.04.81	Panamarenko
	MICHELE LACHOWSKY 27 Waalse Kaai • Tel. 237.23.93	Video in collaboration with the Palais des Beaux Arts of Charleroi
	LENS FINE ART Mechelsesteenweg 146 • Tel. 237.68.57	Ger Lataster and Pol Bury
	"121" Mechelsesteenweg 121 • Tel. 218.68.73
	BRUSSELS	☎ 32 (2)
	ALBERT BARONIAN 89, Avenue Emile de Beco • Tel. 647.3414	Antonio Dias
	ISY BRACHOT 62a, Avenue Louise • Tel. 511.05.25	Until Mar. 26, Vasilije Jordan
	CAMOMILLE 30, Rue Vilain XIV • Tel. 649.23.68	Until Mar. 31, Markus Raetz and Zush
	FABIEN DE CUGNAC 55, Rue de Livourne • Tel. 537.14.15	Mar. 18-27, 8th Fair Art Actuel in Brussels: Bram Bogart, Jacques Charlier, Mark Luyten, Walter Swennen

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR 1983
UMI

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION DIRECTORY

	BRUSSELS (CONT'D)	☎ 32 (2)
	CHARLES KRIWIN 20, Rue de Belle-Vue • Tel. 647.3109	International Accrochage
	PALAIS DES BEAUX ARTS 10, Rue Royale • Tel. 512.04.03	8th Fair: Art Actuel
	POST-SCRIPTUM 37, Rue des Eperonniers • Tel. 511.96.43	Books and catalogues on contemporary art and photography, records.
	GHENT	☎ 32 (91)
	BARONIAN/LAMBERT Oudburg 22 • Tel. 254.057	Futura 2000
	RICHARD FONCKE 18 St. Janvest • Tel. 23.81.28	Furniture by Rietveld and Roger Raveel
	GEWAD 23 Gewad • Tel. 25.56.16	Until April 19, Marthe Wéry, Cindy Sherman and Marleen Dumas
	MUSEUM HEDENDAAGSE K'NST. Citadelpark • Tel. 21.17.03	"Museum Zoekt Museum" in Collaboration with V.M.H.K.
	KNOKKE	☎ 32 (50)
	ELISABETH FRANCK 124 Kustlaan • Tel. 606.881	The Gallery is closed through March.
COLOMBIA	BOGOTA	☎ 57
	QUINTANA Carrera 11 N° 85-62 • Tel. 236.8226	XIXth and XXth Century paintings: Botero, Degas, Gauguin, Hockney, Matisse, Moore, Picasso, Rodin, Vuillard
ENGLAND	CAMBRIDGE	☎ 44 (223)
	KETTLE'S YARD GALLERY Northampton Street • Tel. 352.124	Mar. 5-Apr. 10, Paper as Image: An ACGB Touring Exhibition
	LONDON	☎ 44 (1)
	ANNE BERTHOUD GALLERY 1 Langley Court • Tel. 836.73.57	Until Mar. 31, Alexandra Leadbeater: "Music Room"
	ART HOUSE 213 South Lambeth Road • Tel. 735.2192	Representing Contemporary British Artists, including John Bellany By Appointment
	IAN BIRKSTED 37 Great Russell Street • Tel. 637.2673	Until Mar. 9, Nicholas Volley, new paintings; Mar. 16-Apr. 16, Michael Porter, paintings and drawings.
	BLOND FINE ART 33 Sackville Street • Tel. 437.1230	Until Mar. 19, Charlotte Ardizzone, recent paintings; Mar. 24-Apr. 24, David Bomberg, works on paper
	CHRISTIE'S PRINT COLL'CTION 8 Dover Street • Tel. 499.6701	Graphics by British and international artists. Hockney, Moore, Sutherland, Miró, Chagall, others. Catalog (quote AIAIED).
	ANTHONY d'OFFAY 23 Dering Street • Tel. 499.4695	Feb. 23-Mar. 25, Mario Merz, important works 1966-1983 As of Mar. 30, Richard Long
	12 DUKE STREET GALLERY Duke Street, St. James • Tel. 930.52.47	Until Mar. 11, Graham Snow, recent work Mar. 14-25, 19th and 20th century drawings and paintings
	FISCHER FINE ART 30 King Street, SW1 • Tel. 839.3942	Until Mar. 25, Tim Storrier, first London exhibition
	GIMPEL FILS 30 Davies Street • Tel. 493.2488	Until Mar. 19, Rafael Mahdavi, paintings Mar. 22-Apr. 16, Susan Hiller, recent work
	NIGEL GREENWOOD, INC. 41 Sloane Gardens • Tel. 730.8824	Portfolios by Baldessari, Borofsky, Chia, Clemente, Cucchi, Disler, Penck, Winnewisser, published by Peter Blum Editions, New York
	I.C.A. The Mall, SW1. • Tel. 930.3647	Until Apr. 4, Drawings by architects; Mar. 2-Apr. 2, Artists' Architecture: Scenes and conventions; Until Mar. 27, Houses and Homes
	NICOLA JACOBS 9 Cork Street • Tel. 437.3868	Mar. 1-26, Jon Groom, paintings; Mar. 29-May 7, The Figurative Exhibition II, including Simon Edmondson, Ken Kiff & others
	BERNARD JACOBSON, LTD. 2A Cork Street • Tel. 439.8355	Mar. 5-Apr. 7, mixed painting show
	LEWIS JOHNSTONE GALLERY 7 Bolton Gardens (Old Brompton Rd.) • Tel. 373.1192	Mar. 2-26, Rose Garrard Mar. 31-Apr. 23, Stuart Brisley
	ANNELY JUDA/JUDA ROWAN 11 Tottenham Mews • Tel. 637.5517/8	Until Mar. 12, M. Kawabata, paintings, Lee U. Fan, paintings & watercolors Y. Saito, sculpture, reliefs & works on paper; Mar. 17-Apr. 16, Peter Kalkhof
	KNOEDLER GALLERY (Kasmin, Director) 22 Cork Street • Tel. 439.1096	March, Anthony Caro, recent sculpture (with Waddington Galleries) April, Bhupen Khakhar, recent paintings

LONDON (CONT'D)	☎ 44 (1)
LISSON GALLERY (Nicholas Logsdail) 66/68 Bell Street • Tel. 262.1539	Through March: Art and Language
MAYOR GALLERY 22A Cork Street • Tel. 734.3558	Until Mar. 18, Ivor Abrahams, recent sculpture Mar. 22-Apr. 30, Picasso, paintings
PETERSBURG PRESS 59A Portobello Road • Tel. 229.0105	Through March, Roy Lichtenstein, "7 apple woodcuts"; Jim Dine, graphics Other works by: Hockney, Hodjkin, Johns, Stella
PICCADILLY GALLERY 16 Cork Street • Tel. 499.4632	Mar. 15-Apr. 16, Graham Arnold, recent paintings and drawings
REDFERN GALLERY 20 Cork Street • Tel. 734.17.32 734.05.78	Through March, Keith Vaughan, paintings and gouaches of the 50's
EDWARD TOTAH GALLERY 39 Floral Street • Tel. 379.6241	Until Mar. 19, Picasso, "Caisse à Remords" a series of 45 etchings 1920-1955 (Catalogue available)
WADDINGTON GALLERIES 2, 4 & 34 Cork St. • Tel. 439.1866	Mar. 2-26, Anthony Caro (with the Knoedler Gallery), recent sculpture in steel and bronze
OXFORD	☎ 44 (865)
MUSEUM OF MODERN ART 30 Pembroke Street • Tel. 722.733	Until Mar. 13, painter as photographer; Until Mar. 27, R. Mason, 1952-82, color sculptures, drawings & bronzes; Mar. 16-27, recent works by Ruskin students
SOUTHAMPTON	☎ 44 (703)
JOHN HANSARD GALLERY The University, Southampton • Tel. 559.122	"New painting from the South" As of Mar. 22, mixed exhibition

FRANCE

BORDEAUX	☎ 33 (56)
C.A.P.C. ENTREPOT LAINE Rue Ferrère • Tel. 44.16.35	Until Mar. 5, Castelli, Fetting, Salome, paintings; David Hockney, photos; Mar. 18-Apr. 23, Georg Baselitz, sculpture; Georges Rousse, photos
CANNES	☎ 33 (9)
GALERIE HERBAGE 17. Rue des Etats-Unis • Tel. 39.19.15	En permanence: Calder, Max Ernst, Matisse, Miró, Picasso, Chadwick, Hepworth, Moore, Nicholson, Sutherland
LYONS	☎ 33 (7)
E.L.A.C. Centre d'Echanges Lyon Perrache • Tel. 842.27.39	Until Mar. 15, "Figures imposées" Mar. 30-May 29, "New York et Lyon, Soieries et nouveaux Textils"
LE NOUVEAU MUSEE 11, r. Dr. Dolard-69100 Villeurbanne • Tel. 884.55.10	Until Mar. 7, Richard Prince, Marianne Eigenheer Mar. 17-May 15, Markus Raetz, drawings and sculpture
NICE	☎ 33 (93)
GALERIE PAUL HERVIEU 26, Rue Pastorelli • Tel. 80.02.10	Paintings and gouaches by Atlan, Clavé, Coignard, Goetz, Hélénon, Marchand des Raux, Papart and Key Sato.
PARIS	☎ 33 (1)
BAMA 40, Rue Quincampoix • Tel. 277.38.87	Until Mar. 5, Paula Gabriel: "The State of Being Side by Side" Mar. 12-Apr. 16, Georg Brecht, boxes
BAR DE L'AVENTURE (Caroline Corre) 53, Rue Berthe • Tel. 255.37.76	American books of artists: Bacon, Baron, Benes, Broadus, Brody-Lederman, Cornell, Christo, Fife, Giersbach, Gystin, Greenbaum, Hammond, May & others
BEAUBOURG 23, Rue du Renard • Tel. 271.20.50	Mar. 15-Apr. 31, Ben, portraits
CLAUDE BERNARD 5-7-9, Rue des Beaux-Arts • Tel. 326.9707	Leonardo Cremonini, paintings and watercolors
ISY BRACHOT 35, Rue Guénégaud • Tel. 354.22.40	Mar. 2-Apr. 16, Roland Cat, drawings
GALERIE JEANNE BUCHER 53, Rue de Seine • Tel: 326.22.32. 326.75.23	Accrochage of gallery artists
FARIDEH CADOT 77, Rue des Archives • Tel. 278.0836	Mar. 5-Apr. 5, Jean Clareboudt, sculpture
LOUIS CARRE ET CIE. 10, Avenue de Messine • Tel. 562.57.07	Accrochage
JEAN CHAUVELIN 147, Rue St. Martin • Tel. 887.77.76	Russian and European Constructivists, gallery artists.
CREATIS ESPACE ALTERNATIF 50, Rue du Temple • Tel. 887.28.56	Feb. 15-Mar. 12, Burattoni and Renée Fouque: "Parcs les bassins opus 2" Charles van Hoorick, photos; Mar. 15-26, Ben; Mar. 29-Apr. 29, "Scriptural"

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR 1983
UMI

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION DIRECTORY

PARIS (CONT'D) ☎ 33 (1)

CHANTAL CROUSEL 80, Rue Quincampoix • Tel. 887.6081	Until Mar. 22, Bruce McLean, recent paintings As of Mar. 26, Gilbert and George, recent photos pieces
JACQUES DAMASE Galerie de Varenne, 61 Rue de Varenne, • Tel. 705.55.04	Caligraphies et contre écritures du XVIe à Matisse, Roland Barthes, Lautréamont, Twombly à l'occasion de la publication d'un livre
DURAND-DESSERT 3, Rue des Haudriettes • Tel. 277.6360	Through Mar. Stanley Brouwn As of Mar. 12, Ben "Trous et eaux sales"
LE DESSIN 27, Rue Guenegaud • Tel. 633.04.66	Feb. 24-Mar. 31, Olivier Agid, "Dessins sur la Ville"
ERIC FABRE 6, Rue du Pont de Lodi • Tel. 325.42.63	Feb. 26-Mar. 19, Didier Vermeiren, sculpture
PAUL FACCHETTI 20, Avenue de Friedland • Tel. 563.80.26	By Appointment
KARL FLINKER 25, Rue de Tournon • Tel. 325.18.73	Moninot, new work
GALERIE FARIS 50, Rue de l'Université • Tel. 544.29.48	Nasiri (Iraki painter), paintings and etchings
JEAN FOURNIER 44, Rue Quincampoix • Tel. 277.3231	Until Mar. 9, Hantaï at the A.R.C.A. fair in Marseille. 65 cours Julien, Marseille
GALERIE DE FRANCE 50-52, Rue de la Verrerie • Tel. 274.38.00	Domela, réalisations 1922-1982
LILIANE FRANCOIS 15, Rue de Seine • Tel. 326.94.32	Until Mar. 24, Duran, paintings
MAURICE GARNIER 6, Avenue Matignon • Tel. 225.61.65.	Bernard Buffet, permanently.
DANIEL GERVIS GALLERY 34, Rue du Bac • Tel. 261.11.73	Benrath, Constant, Dubuffet, Eterovic, Gerzo, Ghertman, Malaval, Montyn, Mutal, Nevelson, Olson, Pan, Pasotti, Toledo, others.
GILLESPIE/LAAGE/SALOMON 24, Rue Beaubourg • Tel. 278.1171	Until Apr. 2, Georg Baselitz, recent paintings, drawings and linocuts
GALERIE MARWAN HOSS 12, Rue D'Alger • Tel. 296.39.45	"Important works: Masters of the 19th and 20th century," drawings and sculpture
SAMY KINGE 54, Rue de Verneuil • Tel. 261.1907	Until Mar. 9, Matta, Victor Brauner, St. Phalle, Marcel Raysse Mar. 10-Apr. 9, Watchi: "Images d'ailleurs," recent paintings
LAHUMIERE 88, Bd de Courcelles • Tel. 763.03.95	Mar.-Apr., André Masson, pastels and etchings
LA HUNE GALERIE EDITIONS 14, Rue de l'Abbaye • Tel. 325.54.06	Fred Deux, recent drawings, and etchings. Dorni, Fassianos, Folon, Hayter, Coz and Piza
LA HUNE-LIBRAIRIE 170, Boulevard St. Germain • Tel. 548.35.85	Books, catalogues and magazines: Fine arts, literature, architecture, graphics, photography and fashion.
YVON LAMBERT 5, Rue de Grenier St. Lazare • Tel. 271.09.33	As of Mar. 5, Niele Toroni
GALERIE JEAN-PIERRE LAVIGNES 15, Rue St. Louis en l'Isle Paris • Tel. 633.5602	Until Mar. 12, John Kaucher: nudes Mar. 22-Apr. 9, Massimo Polini: "Détournement"
BAUDOIN LEBON 36, Rue des Archives • Tel. 272.09.10	Until Mar. 19, Monique Frydman, recent paintings Antoine Bootz, photos
ADRIEN MAEGHT 46, Rue du Bac • Tel. 222.12.59	Xavier Grau, paintings Jan Voss, prints
GALERIE MAEGHT 13 & 14, Rue de Téhéran • Tel. 563.13.19	Until Mar. 15, Henry Moore, sculpture and drawings 1972-1982, etchings and illustrated books; Ed and Nancy Kienholz: "Women"
MUSEE D'ART MODERNE de la Ville • 11 Ave. Prés. Wilson • Tel. 723.61.27
DENISE RENE 196, Blvd. St. Germain • Tel. 222.77.57	Sempere
DARTHEA SPÉYER 6, Rue Jacques Callot • Tel. 354.78.41	Until Mar. 19, Sam Gilliam Until Apr. 15, artists of the gallery
STADLER 51, Rue de Seine • Tel. 326.91.10	Until Mar. 19, group show of gallery artists As of Mar. 24, Tremeur, recent work

PARIS (CONT D)	☎ 33 (1)
NANE STERN 25, Ave. de Tourville • Tel. 705.08.46	Until Mar. 19, Jean-Paul Jappé, paintings Mar. 22-27, the gallery is at the International Art Fair in Stockholm, Sweden
DANIEL TEMPLON 30, Rue Beaubourg • Tel. 272.14.10	Mar. 12-Apr. 14, Carl Andre
TRANS/FORM 22, Ave de la Bourdonnais • Tel. 550.40.32	As of Mar. 7, Gianmarco Montesano "Io, daró loro . . .", presentation by Philippe Sollers
GALERIE VALLOIS 41, Rue de Seine • Tel. 329.50.94	Csaky, Biegas, Rodin, Dunand, Ruhlman, Franck, Cheret. Fine furniture of the Thirties.
ZABRISKIE 37, Rue Quincampoix • Tel. 272.35.47	Mar. 8-Apr. 23, Paul Strand, Mexican photographs
LES SABLES D'OLONNE	☎ 33 (51)
MUSEE DE L'ABBAYE STE. CROIX Rue de Verdun • Tel. 32.01.16	Victor Brauner, 11 recent acquisitions of the museum
ST. PAUL DE VENCE	☎ 33 (93)
FONDATION MAEGHT Saint Paul de Vence • Tel. 32.81.63	Until Mar. 13, Anne Madden Mar. 19-May. 5, Sam Francis, paintings and monotypes
GALERIE CATHERINE ISSERT Saint Paul de Vence • Tel. 32.96.92	Artist of the gallery: Ben, Boisrond, Christo, Pagès, Romeda, group show
TOULON	☎ 33 (94)
MUSEE DE TOULON 20, Boulevard Leclerc • Tel. 93.15.54	Until Mar. 7, Anne Français, Jean Marie Poumeyrol, Hélène et Rachel Theret; Mar. 17-Apr. 17, Swiss Contemporary drawings

GERMANY

BERLIN	☎ 49 (30)
GALERIE LIETZOW Knesebeckstrasse 32 • Tel. 881.28.95	Until Mar. 19, Accrochage: Amat, Caballero, Castelli, Santarossa, Salome, Vogt
R. ONNASCH AUSTELLUNGEN Niebuhrstr. 5 • Tel. 882.77.18	Until Mar. 12, Dieter Roth, "Ladenhüter" Mar. 15-Apr. 30, Erwin Heerich, Works with plastic
GALERIE POLL Lützowplatz 7 • Tel. 261.70.91	Until Mar. 31, Lambert M. Wintersberger
GALERIE FOLKER SKULIMA Niebuhrstrasse 2 • Tel. 881.8280	Until Apr. 15, Joan Miró, "The Childhood of Ubu," watercolors from 1953
BONN	☎ 49 (228)
GALERIE LINSSEN Prinz-Albert-Strasse 47 • Tel. 21.89.09	German Expressionists. Russian Avant Garde. International classics. Osvaldo Romberg and Jan Voss.
COLOGNE	☎ 49 (221)
ERVEN'S ART SERVICE Machaerstrasse 1 • Te.12.34.36	We hang the shows
GALERIE GMURZYNSKA Obenmarspforten 21 • Tel. 23.66.21/2	Accrochage Small sizes 1915-1930
GALERIE KARSTEN GREVE Wallrafplatz 3 • Tel. 21.39.21	Detlef Orlop, photographs
GALERIE HOLTMANN Richartzstr. 10 • Tel. 21.51.50	Charly Banana Michael Heckert
GALERIE JOLLENBECK Lindenstrasse 20 • Tel. 24.67.59	The gallery is closed until April
RUDOLF KICKEN Albertusstrasse 47/49 • Tel. 21.02.34	Photographs from the 20's and 30's
KÖLNISCHER KUNSTVEREIN Josef-Haubrich-Hof 1 • Tel. 21.70.21/221.3740	"8 in Cologne" (8 painters from Cologne)
PAUL MAENZ Schaafenstrasse 25 • Tel. 21. 81.02	Until Mar. 22, Giulio Paolini As of Mar. 25, Georg Jiri Dokoupil
GALERIE ORANGERIE REINZ Helenstrasse 2 • Tel. 23.46.84	Henning von Gierke, new works
GALERIE RECKERMANN Albertusstr. 16 • Tel. 21.20.64	Until Mar. 5, Bodo Baumgarten May. 12-Jun. 30, Alf Lechner
GALERIE ROLF RICKE Volksgartenstrasse 10 • Tel. 31.57.17	Until mid. Mar. Helmut Dorner, drawings Mid. Mar.-mid. Apr., Axel Kasseböhmer, paintings

VOL 7 1
ISS 3
MR 1983
UMI

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION DIRECTORY

	COLOGNE (CONT'D)	☎ 49 (221)
	GALERIE WENTZEL St. Apernstrasse 26 • Tel. 24.24.00	As of Mar. 4, Rolf Rose, new paintings Paul Suter, sculpture
	MICHAEL WERNER Gertrudenstrasse. 24/28 • Tel. 21.06.61	Georg Baselitz, sculpture
	GALERIE RUDOLF ZWIRNER Albertusstrasse 18 • Tel. 23.58.37/8	Bruce Robins, new works
	DUSSELDORF	☎ 49 (211)
	KONRAD FISCHER Platanenstrasse 7 • Tel. 685.908	Marisa Merz
	GALERIE GMYREK Mutter-Ey-Strasse 5. • Tel. 32.77.70	Until mid. Mar. K. H. Hödicke, "Standbilder," As of Mar. 16, Alfred Klinkan, paintings
	DENISE RENE HANS MAYER Grabbeplatz 2 • Tel. 36.59.72	Until Apr. 2, David Stoltz
	KUNSTVEREIN RHEINLANDE/WESTFALEN Grabbeplatz 4 • Tel. 327.023	Helmut Middendorf, paintings
	HAMBURG	☎ 49 (40)
	THOMAS LEVY GALERIE Tesdorpfstrasse 18 • Tel. 45.91.88.	Until Mar. 9, Wolff Buchholz, new works Mar. 14-Apr. 23, Dania Yacoume, paintings and drawings
	GALERIE MUNRO Barmbeker Str. 138 • Tel. 48.45.52.	K. H. Hödicke, paintings and works on paper
	MUNICH	☎ 49 (89)
	GALERIE + EDITION A Amalienstrasse 81 & 87 • Tel: 28.13.64/28.84.45	James Collins, pastels
	GALERIE SIX FRIEDRICH Maximilianstrasse. 15 • Tel. 29.50.21 & 29.61.10	Mar. 3-Apr. 16, Georg J. Dokoupil, oil paintings and drawings
	TANIT Maximilianstr. 36 • Tel. 29.22.33	Mar. 10-Apr. 31, Paula Mann, new work 1980-1982
	NUREMBERG	☎ 49 (911)
	GALERIE JOHANNA RICARD Königstrasse 33/37 • Tel. 22.50.20	Russian Avant-Garde
	STUTTGART	☎ 49 (711)
	MAX·ULRICH HETZLER GmbH Schwabstrasse 2 • Tel. 62.15.38	Group Show: Werner Büttner, Mattin Kippenberger, Albert Oehlen and Markus Oehlen, recent paintings
GREECE	ATHENS	☎ 30 (1)
	KAREN & JEAN BERNIER Marasli 51 • Tel. 723.5657	Martin Silverman, scultpure; Jack Barth, paintings
HOLLAND	AMSTERDAM	☎ 31 (20)
	GALERIE KRIKHAAR Spuistraat 330 • Tel. 26.71.66	Appel, Brands, Constant, Corneille, Cottavoz, Henning-Pedersen, Lindstrom, Saura, Sonderlinque and others.
	STEDELIJK MUSEUM Paulus Potterstraat 13 • Tel. 73 21 66	Until Apr. 10, B. Akkerman, retrospective
	EINDHOVEN	☎ 31 (40)
	STEDELIJK VAN ABBEMUSEUM Bilderdiiklaan 10 • Tel. 44.85.55	Until Mar. 6, Markus Lüpertz and the permanent collection Mar. 11-Apr. 24, James Lee Byars and the permament collection
ITALY	BARI	☎ 39 (80)
	MARILENA BONOMO Via Nicolò dell' Arca 19 • Tel. 21.01.45	Tony Cragg
	BOLOGNA	☎ 39 (51)
	DE FOSCHERARI Via Goidanich 1 • Tel. 27.52.26.	"Idea del Oro", Bartolini, Ceroli, Cotani, Jori, Manai, Melotti, Mattiacci, Nagasawa, Morales, Penone, Pozzati, Turcato, Sartelli
	FABJBASAGLIA Via Farini 26 • Tel. 23.49.22.	Mar. 5-8, The Gallery is present at the Bologna Art Fair: Bruno Benuzzi, works on paper of various artists
	GALLERIA FORNI Via Farini 26 • Tel. 27.07.60	Karl Plattner, paintings
	STUDIO G7, G. GRIGOLO Via Val d'Aposa 7C • Tel. 26.64.97.	Omar Galliani

BRESCIA	☎ 39 (30)
MASSIMO MININI Via Apollonio, 68 • Tel. 56.275	Group show, early works by Giovanni Anselmo, Alighiero Boetti, Luciano Fabro, Jannis Kounellis, Paolo Icaro, Giulio Paolini, Salvo
PIERO CAVELLINI Via Fratelli Bandiera 18 • Tel. 57 401	Radu Dragumirescu, paintings
FLORENCE	☎ 39 (55)
GALLERIA SCHEMA Via della vigna nuova 17. • Tel. 28.40.90.	By appointment
MILAN	☎ 39 (2)
SALVATORE ALA Via Mameli 3 • Tel. 716-500	Domenico Gnoli; Kounellis
ARIETE GRAFICA Via S. Andrea, 5 • Tel. 79.55.73	Borofsky, drawings
ARTE BORGOGNA Via Borgogna 7 • Tel. 709.330 704.826	Dova
ARTRA/STUDIO Via Fiori Chiari 8 • Tel. 861.190	Buren, Cotani, Dezeuze, Erben, Gierke, Griffa, Gianfranco Notargiacomo, Pinelli, Verna, Viallat
STUDIO CANNAVIELLO Piazza Beccaria 10 • Tel. 837.6368	Martin Disler
DIAGRAMMA (Luciano Inga Pin) Via Pontaccio 12a • Tel. 874.237	Luciano Palmieri Gianantonio Abate
DISEGNI DI ARCHITETTURA Antonia Jannone Via del Carmine 5 • Tel. 878.384	Pierluigi Pizzi, drawings and scenographics
STUDIO CARLO GROSSETTI Via dei Piatti 9 • Tel. 837.5594	Giuseppe Spagnulo, Auto-portrait
FRANCOISE LAMBERT Bastioni di Porta Nuova 11 • Tel. 650.087	Dennis Oppenheim
LORENZELLI ARTE Via Sant'Andrea 19 • Tel. 783.035	Until Mar. 15, Alberto Magnelli
STUDIO MARCONI Via Tadino 15 • Tel. 225.543	Three artists of the Stephen Wirtz Gallery in San Francisco, five artists of the Lens Gallery in Antwerp; Claudio Verna, one man show
GALLERIA DEL MILIONE Via Bigli 21 • Tel. 780.879	Saporiti, Marino Marini
MASSIMO MININI Via Cavalieri des S. Sepolcro • Tel. 86.71.30	Bertrand Lavier, new sculpture
GALLERIA SENO Via Ciovasso 11 • Tel. 805.80.64	Attilio Forgioli
GALLERIA STENDHAL Via Santo Spirito 10 • Tel. 781.825	Mario Negri, sculpture
GALLERIA 32 Via Brera 6 • Tel. 86 76 29	Lino Mandelli
FRANCO TOSELLI Via del Carmine 9 • Tel. 805.0434	Nicola de Maria
MODENA	☎ 39 (59)
GALLERIA EMILIO MAZZOLI Via Nazario Sauro 58a • Tel. 357.605/243.455	Agnetti, Boetti, Calzolari, Chia, Clemente, Cucchi, de Maria, Germanà, Paladino, Schifano, Turcato.
NAPLES	☎ 39 (81)
LUCIO AMELIO Piazza dei Martiri 58. • Tel. 42.20.23/769.0521	Until mid. March James Brown; as of mid. March Gerhard Richter, part of the Terrae Motus Series
ROME	☎ 39 (6)
GALLERIA ANNA D'ASCANIO Via del Babuino, 29 • Tel. 678.6920	Balla, Broodthaers, Burri, Carrà, Cucchi, Guttuso, Manzu, Melotti, Turcato
GIULIANA DE CRESCENZO Via del Paradiso 41 • Tel. 656.9546

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR 1983
UMI

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION DIRECTORY

	ROME (CONT'D)	☎ 39 (6)
	UGO FERRANTI Via di Tor Millina 26 • Tel. 654.2146	Mar. 25-Apr. 25. Sol LeWitt, wall drawings
	L'ISOLA Via Gregoriana 5 • Tel. 679.00.29. / 678.54.77	Marco Gastini, new paintings
	GALLERIA IL PONTE Via S. Ignazio 6 • Tel. 679.6114	As of Mar. 10, Constance La Palombarca: works on paper, oils and monotypes
	PRIMO PIANO Via Panisperna 203. • Tel. 460.309	Opening of the new gallery
	SPROVIERI 3 Piazzi del Popolo • Tel. 360.8918/361.0975	Futurism Dada Surrealism.
	TONINELLI 86 Piazza di Spagna • Tel. 679.34.88	Important sculpture by: Bodini, Fontana, Marini, Arturo Martini, Melotti, Moore, Medardo Rosso, Schmettau, Vangi.
	TURIN	☎ 39 (11)
	GIORGIO PERSANO Via dei Mille 29 • Tel. 835.527	Nicola de Maria, Mimmo Paladino, Michelangelo Pistoletto
	TUCCI RUSSO Corso Tassoni 56 • Tel. 779.304	Until Mar. 10, Luigi Mainolfi Richard Long
	CHRISTIAN STEIN Piazza San Carlo 206 • Tel. 535.574	Giuseppe Penone
	ALBERTO WEBER Via S. Francesco da Paola 4 • Tel. 839.7493
	VERONA	☎ 39 (45)
	STUDIO LA CITTA Via Samaritana 10 • Tel. 25.728	Until end March, group show: "Without a theme": Barucchello, Boero, Camoni, de Maria, Galliani, Jori, Novelli, Patelli, Pistoletto, Pozzati, Schifano, Twombly
SPAIN	ALMAGRO	☎ 34 (926)
	FUCARES San Francisco, 2 & 3 • Tel. 86 09 02	Francisco Molina
	BARCELONA	☎ 34 (3)
	GALERIA CIENTO Consejo de Ciento 347 • Tel. 215.63 65	Juan Navarro Baldeweg, paintings
	SALA GASPAR Consejo de Ciento, 323 • Tel. 318.87.401.318.87.36	Alfaro, Arranz Bravo, Bartolozzi, Clavé, Fenosa, Gudiol, Ibars, Llové, Miró, Picasso, Riera, Rojas, Tarrats, Torrajba, Vila-Casas, Viladecans, Villella.
	GALERIA MAEGHT Calle Montcada 25 • Tel. 310.42.45	Xavier Franquesa Peter Klasen
	RENE METRAS Consejo de Ciento 331 • Tel. 302.05 39	Román Vallés: Permanently: Bechtold, Cuixart, Font Diaz, Hartung, Lleixa, Miró, Pascual and others.
	LA CAIXA DE PENSIONS Passeig Sant Joan 108 • Tel. 258.89.07
	GALERIA JOAN PRATS Rambla Catalunya 54 • Tel. 216.02.84	Christo
	GALERIA TRECE Rambla Catalunya, 49 • Tel. 318.08.73.	Senén Ubiña
	BILBAO	☎ 34 (4)
	GALERIA DE ARTE MUN Gran Via 60 • Tel. 441. 24 00	Celia Canal
	IBIZA BALEARES	☎ 34 (71)
	GALERIA ES MOLI Carretera San Miguel Sta Gertrudis	Azocar, Bechtold, Calbet, Faber, Galbraith, Hedrich, Kugler, Monreal, Segui, Tomlin, Villanueva, Zush.
	MADRID	☎ 34 (1)
	OBRA CULTURAL "LA CAIXA" Paseo Castellana 51 • Tel. 419.0440	An Antology by Aureliano de Beruete "German Expressionists" in the National Library Hall. Porta de Recoletos 20
	GALERIA KREISLER DOS Hermosilla 8 • Tel. 431.42.64	Until Mar. 12, Juan Romero Mar. 5-Apr. 12, Fernando Sanchez Calderón
	EGAM Villanueva 29 • Tel. 435 3161	José Mario Lillo

	MADRID (CONT'D)	☎ 34 (1)
	GALERIA HEINRICH EHRHARDT Barquillo 44 • Tel. 419.52.86	Siegfried Anzinger, Hubert Schmalix
	GALERIA JUANA MORDO Villanueva 7 • Tel. 435.84.42	Mar. 9-Apr. 16, Sophia Vari
	GALERIA DE ARTE MUN Hermosilla 26 • Tel. 401.01.92	Gallery Artists
	RAYUELA Claudio Coello 19 • Tel. 275 3146	Chillida, Ferreras, Genovés, Guinovart, Antonio López, Miró, Mompo, Palazuelo, Orlando Pelayo, Saura, Valls
	GALERIA SEN Nunez de Balboa 37 • Tel. 435 52 02	Mar. 3-Apr. 9, Garayo, paintings
	GALERIA THEO Marqués de la Ensenada, 2 • Tel. 410.26.51	Cesar Manrique
	TORCULO GRAPHICS & BOOKS Claudio Coello 17 • Tel. 275 86 86	Mar. 1-19, Marco Irizarry, recent etchings As of Mar. 22, Francisco San José, a retrospective of his graphics
	GALERIA FERNANDO VIJANDE Nuñez de Balboa 65 • Tel. 435 8025	"Mosaico" collective show
	GALERIA YNGUANZO Antonio Maura 12 • Tel. 231 54 10	Ernesto Fontecilla
	MURCIA	☎ 34 (68)
	GALERIA YERBA Vinadel 6 • Tel. 21 00 15	Amalia Avia
	SEVILLE	☎ 34 (54)
	GALERIA JUANA DE AIZPURU Calle Canalejaz, 10 • Tel. 22.85.01	Juan Antonio Aguirre
SWEDEN	MALMO	☎ 46 (40)
	GALERIE NORDENHAKE Ostra Ronneholmsvagen 5 • Tel. 23.15.33	Marcia Hafif, paintings
	STOCKHOLM	☎ 46 (8)
	KONSTRUKTIV TENDENS Nybrogatan 69 • Tel. 61.16.65/61.50.65	Klaus J. Schoen, systematic paintings, 1970-1982 Peter Freudenthal, new paintings and serigraphs
SWITZERLAND	BASEL	☎ 41 (61)
	KUNSTHALLE BASEL Steinenberg 7 • Tel. 23.48.33	Mar. 3-Apr. 17, Miriam Cahn George Platt Lynes, photos 1907-1955
	GALERIE BEYELER Baumleingasse 9 • Tel. 23.54.12	Fernando Botero, paintings and watercolors
	FELIX HANDSCHIN GALERIE Petersgraben 18 • Tel. 25.59.65	New Contemporary Art
	BERNE	☎ 41 (31)
	MARBACH Wasserwerkgasse 37 • Tel. 22.42.05/22.38.25	Contemporary art. By appointment only.
	GENEVA	☎ 41 (22)
	GALERIE BONNIER 4, Rue Saint-Laurent • Tel. 35.87.35	Paul Rotterdam, drawings and recent paintings Accrochage of 20th century masters
	CENTRE D'ART CONTEMPORAIN 16, Rue d'Italie • Tel. 28.88.03	Group show
	ECART/BOOKS & FLUXKIOSK 16, Rue d'Italie • Tel. 31.34.73, & 28.88.03	Artists Books, Catalogues and Magazines.
	GALERIE ERIC FRANCK 15 Route de Florissant • Tel. 47.08.09	"A few portraits 1932-1982" by Henri-Cartier Bresson
	CLAUDE GIVAUDAN 3, Rue du Soleil-Levant • Tel. 29.91.61.	Until Mar. 31, Franz Roh, collage and photomontage
	MARIE-LOUISE JEANNERET 59, Avenue de Champel • Tel. 46.34.57
	DANIEL VARENNE Galerie Clos de Sierne 15, Chemin de Sierne • 84.15.93	Impressionist and 20th Century masters. By appointment only
	WEBER 13, Rue de Monthoux • Tel. 32.64.50	Francis Mean, gouaches, collages and etchings

VOL
7
1
ISS
3
MR 1983
UMI

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION DIRECTORY

ZURICH ☎ 41 (1)

THOMAS AMMANN FINE ART Restelbergstrasse 97 • Tel. 362.62.31	Impressionists & 20th Century Masters—by appointment only.
GALERIE BISCHOFBERGER Utoquai 29 • Tel. 910.43.62	Cucchi, Clemente, Chia, Schnabel, Salle, Basquiat, Salome, Warhol, Tinguely
KONRAD FISCHER Ackerstrasse 44 • Tel. 42.71.61	Gerhard Merz and Lothar Baumgarten
GIMPEL • HANOVER • EMMERICH Tödistrasse 40 • Tel. 202.03.00	Mar. 22-Apr. 30, Gottfried Honegger, new works New Gallery: Vincenzo Baviera
M. KNOEDLER Kirchgasse 24 • Tel. 69 35 00	James Ensor
GALERIE MAEGHT Predigerplatz 10-12 • Tel. 251.11.20	Paintings, sculpture and graphics of the 20th century
MAURER Münstergasse 14-18 • Tel. 47.85.00	Alfred Klinkan
PETER NOSER St. Jakobstrasse 11 • Tel. 242.55.16	Mireille Wunderly Jean Pfaff
GALERIE SCHLEGL Minervastrasse 119 • Tel. 251.4963	Konok, new paintings Hetey, sculpture
ANNEMARIE VERNA Mühlegasse 27 • Tel. 252.27.70	"When Art Becomes Books/When Books Become Art"
ANNEMARIE VERNA Röntgenstrasse 44 • Tel. 44.27.15	Fred Sandback
JAMILEH WEBER Schanzengasse 10 • Tel. 47.79.89	Through Apr. Aldo Rossi, paintings, drawings, and models Facsimile Edition: "The Blue Book"
WORK GALLERY Trittligasse 24 • Tel. 482.39.58	Contemporary photographs
RENÉE ZIEGLER Rämistrasse 34 • Tel. 251.23.22	Until Mar. 19, Bernhard Luginbuehl Mar. 26-Apr. 27, Daniel Spoerri, new objects

VENEZUELA

CARACAS ☎ 58 (2)

DURBAN Calle Madrid-Urbanizacion Las Mercedes. • Tel. 92.42.31.	Spanish and American Contemporary Art.
GALERIA MINOTAURO Calle Madrid-Entre Mucuchies y Monterrey • Tel. 92 27 40	Corina Bricento, recent work.

ART IN AMERICA IS AVAILABLE IN EUROPE AT:

Amsterdam
Athenaeum Boekhandel, B.V.
Spui 14-16
Art Something Co.
Herengracht 259
Robert Premsela Boekhandel
van Baerlestrasse 78

Antwerp
Boekhandel Ban Den Bosch
St. Jacobsmarkt 1-B

Basel
Stampa
Spalenberg 2

Berlin
Galerie 2000
Knesebeckstrasse 56

Bern
Hans Huber
Länggasstrasse 76 und
Marktgasse 9

Brussels
Librairie Post Scriptum
Rue des Eperonniers, 37

Cologne
Walther König
Breite Str. 93

Eslangen
Buchhandling Redmann
Bohlemplatz 6/12

Florence
Centro Di
l/r Piazza de' Mozzi

Geneva
Ecart
16 rue d'Italie

Hamburg
Sautter & Lackmann
Klosterstern 8

London
Arts Bibliographic
37 Great Russell Street
Arts Council Shop
8 Long Acre
Covent Gardens, WC2E 9LG

Lyon
L'Ollave
58, rue Tramassac

Madrid
Torculo Graphics & Books
Claudio Coello 17

Milan
PAC - La Libreria
via Palestro 14
Idea Books Bookstore
Via Cappuccio, 21

Paris
Artcurial
9 Avenue Matignon
Flammarion 4
Librairie du Centre Georges Pompidou
Plateau Beaubourg
Galerie Jean Fournier
44 rue Quincampoix
Librairie La Hune
170, boulevard Saint-Germain
Librairie Musee d'Art Moderne
de la Ville de Paris
11, Avenue du President Wilson

Rome
Galleria Nazionale d'Arte Moderna
Viale delle Belle Arti, 131

Strasbourg
Librairie Les Idees et Les Arts
Place Brant

The Hague
Artline
Toussaintkade 67-68

Toulouse
Ombres Blanches
Librairie/48
rue Gambetta

Turin
OOLP
Via Principe Amedeo

Vienna
Buchhandlung am Hafnersteig
Hafnersteig 10

Dyansen Gallery
of SoHo
is proud to announce the opening of our new uptown gallery

Dyansen 57

Dyansen Soho
122 Spring Street New York NY 10012
(212) 226 3384

Dyansen 57
2nd Floor
11 East 57th Street New York NY 10022
(212) 489 7830

Catalog available upon request · Toll free: (800) 847-4254

JAN WEINER GALLERY
3014 eveningside dr topeka, ks 66614
by appt. 913 272-5535

"Hyatt Aftermath" 52x45 A/C

LOUIS MARAK

PHILOMENE BENNETT
march 5 - april 30

MADELAINE SHELLABY
MANIPULATED COLOR PHOTOGRAPHS
APRIL 9 · APRIL 28
RANDY ASPRODITES
NEW WORK
APRIL 30 · MAY 19
AARON·HASTINGS
GALLERY
1130 St. Charles Ave., New Orleans, La., 70130 (504)523-7202

ESPILIT

ERICSON GALLERY, 23 EAST 74TH STREET, NEW YORK

RECENT PUBLICATIONS

Abrahams Heindorff Hodgkin Kossoff Moore
Ruscha Smith Tillyer Tucker Willing

JACOBSON/HOCHMAN GALLERY
24 West 57 Street, New York, NY 10019. Tel 212 581-8346

ZUÑIGA
EARLY DRAWINGS
WATERCOLORS FEBRUARY 19 - MARCH 19

GLAUDER
BRONZE SCULPTURE FEBRUARY 19 - MARCH 19

HANS BURKHARDT
RECENT WORK APRIL 2 - MAY 7

JACK RUTBERG FINE ARTS, INC.
357 N. La Brea Avenue, Los Angeles, California 90036 (213) 938-5222

TREASURY OF AMERICAN PEN-AND-INK ILLUSTRATION: 1881 to 1938; 236 Drawings by 103 Artists, edited by Fridolf Johnson.

NEW FROM DOVER

Just published, this original Dover book is the most extensive collection of American drawings from the period. Parrish, Remington, Williams, Gibson, Kent, more. (158pp., 8⅜ x 11¼, 24280-3 Pa. $6.75)

Order this volume postpaid, or send for our complete Dover Fine Art Catalog—over 150 fine books, most $3.50 to $6.00.

Write to Dover, Dept. A97, 180 Varick St., New York, NY 10014.

Kenny Schneider
Animated Sculpture
March 1983

99

Galerie Ninety-Nine
1088 Kane Concourse
Bay Harbor Islands, Florida 33154 305/865-5823

VOL
71
ISS
3
MR 1983
UMI

Rosa Esman
Gallery

29 West 57
Street
New York NY
10019

212
421 9490

Pat Johanson
March 15
to April 9

REX STEVENS works on canvas & paper

MARIA CROWDER paintings & constructions

March 1983

C. GRIMALDIS GALLERY
928 n. charles, balto., md. 21201 301/539-1080

JOHN HENRY

New Sculpture

March 14 - April 14

ConStructSouth

12100 NE 16th Avenue
North Miami, Florida 33161
305 891 0183

101 N. Wacker Drive, Suite 235
Chicago, Illinois 60606
312 853 1125

CHARLES
CLOUGH

25 February–26 March

Pam Adler Gallery 37 West 57th Street
New York City

Retrospective Exhibition
gandy brodie
Sidney Janis 110 W. 57 St.

Jean-Pierre
Pericaud
New Paintings
19 February–16 March

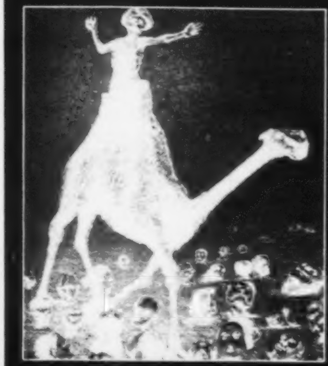
Robert Elkon
1063 Madison Ave New York
Telephone: 212/535.3940

ROBERT STACKHOUSE

SCULPTURE AND DRAWINGS

APRIL

MAX HUTCHINSON GALLERY
138 GREENE STREET NEW YORK, NY 10012 212-966-3066



March 22–May 7, 1983

Alfred Kubin

A major retrospective with loans from Lehnbachhaus, Munich and the Museum of Modern Art, N.Y.

Illustrated catalogue $10

Galerie
St. Etienne

24 W. 57th St. NYC 10019
(212) 245-6734 Tues.-Sat. 11-5

Index of Advertisers

Aaron-Hastings 197
Adler Gallery, Pam 198
Aesthetics Plus 182
Akira Ikeda Gallery 52
Alexander, Brooke 40
Allport Associates 24
Alternate Space 182
Anton Gallery 89
Arch Gallery 185
Ars Libri 64
Art Collector 63
Artexpo, N.Y. 96, 169
Art Institute of Boston 184
Artistic Brush Manufacturing Corp. 94
Art Students League 90
Arts Focus 173
Associated American Artists 184
Austin Gallery 36
Batman Gallery, Donald 55
Berggruen, John 40
Biach Gallery 185
Blum/Helman Cov IV
Blum Helman-Carmen Gimenez 88
Bonlow Gallery 89
Bonnier Gallery 30
Boone Gallery, Mary 52
Borgenicht Gallery 26
Bornstein, Karl 43
Boyd Gallery, Roy 50
Branchville SoHo Gallery 64
Braunstein Gallery 55
Brentwood Gallery 64
Bromm, Hal 42
Brown & Bro., Inc., Arthur 168
Carone Gallery 51
Castelli Graphics 50, 56
Castelli, Leo 38, 48
Chautauqua Institution 94
Chicago Int'l Art Exposition 93
Cicero, Jan 42
Cirrus Gallery 87
Clark Gallery, Garth 58
Condeso Lawler 79
Connoisseur Magazine 99
ConStruct 198
Cooper Gallery, Paula 91
Cowles Gallery, Charles 42
Crown Point Press 67
Davidson College Art Gallery 95
Davidson Gallery, Maxwell 62
DBR 62
De Gooyer, Kirk 53
Del Re Gallery, Marisa 4
De Nagy, Tibor 40
Deutsch Gallery, Sid 58
Dintenfass Gallery, Terry 39
Dominion Gallery 92
Dover Fine Art Catalog 197
Dubins Gallery 92
Durham Gallery, Linda 59
Dyansen Gallery 197
Eason Gallery 60
Ediciones Poligrafa 75
Edition Schellman & Klüser 82
Editions Ltd. 46
Editions Press 77
Elkon Gallery, Robert 198
Emmerich Gallery, Andre 8
Eres, Eugenia 185
Ericson Gallery 197
Esman Gallery, Rosa 198
Exhibit A 34, 91
Feldman, Ronald 85
Fiera Internazionale (Bari) 186
Findlay Galleries, David 43
Finnair 90
Fischbach Gallery 45
Fitch-Febvrel 31
Forum Gallery 183
Fourcade, Xavier 18
Frumkin Gallery, Allan 30
Galería San Jerónimo 184
Galería San Juan 184
Galeria Joan Prats 75
Galerie Coté 185
Galerie de France 24
Galerie Eric Franck 50, 86
Galerie Karsten Greve 12
Galerie Holtmann 72
Galerie Maeght 2
Galerie 99 197
Galerie St. Etienne 198
Galerie Patrice Trigano 44
Galerie Michael Werner 53
Galerie Rudolf Zwirner 7
Galleri Bellman 52
Gallery Paule Anglim 57
Gallery One, Inc. 62
G.E. Fine Arts 175
Getler/Pall 41
Gillman Gallery, Barbara 60
Gimbel Gallery, Adam L. 60
Gimpel & Weitzenhoffer 54
Gladstone Gallery, Barbara 50
Gold Gallery, Fay 185
Graphic Studio 71
Great Northern Brokerage 94
Grimaldis Gallery, C. 198
Grumbacher 148
Haber-Theodore 42
Hacker Art Books 175
Hadler-Rodriguez 57
Hamilton Gallery 59
Harcourts Gallery 184
Harris, Anne 168
Hibel Gallery 174
Hirschl & Adler 31
Hoffman Gallery, Nancy 18
Hokin Gallery 6
Hooks-Epstein 56
Horan Gallery, Vivian 10
Horwitch Gallery, Elaine Cov III
Hotel Romerbad 186
Hutchinson Gallery, Max 198
Impressions Gallery 57, 59
Incorporated Gallery 61
Ingber Gallery 55
Inter-American Art Gallery 182
Int'l Art Alliance 97
International Art Exposition, Inc. 96, 169
Irving Gallery 32
Jacobson-Hochman 197
Janis Gallery, Sidney 198
Jerry's Artarama 166
Johnson Museum, Herbert F. 92
Kent State University 95
Kind Gallery, Phyllis 52
Klein Gallery 48
Knoedler & Co., M. 15
Knowlton Gallery, Monique 40
Kraushaar Galleries 184
L.A. Packing and Crating 184
Lee Video Gallery, Jane 183
Leon Gallery, Jon 182
Lewin Galleries, B. 59
Locks Gallery, Marian 49
Lublin Gallery 170, 171
Marlborough Gallery 47
Maroney & Co., James 16
Maryland Institute of Art 97
Mathes Gallery, Barbara 15
Matisse Gallery, Pierre 32
Maximilian Verlag-Sabine Knust 80
Midtown Galleries 184
Miller Gallery, Robert 34
Milliken Inc., Alexander Cov II
Mint Museum of Art 90
Modern Master Tapestries 185
Molasky, Stephen 176
Mountain Lake Symposium IV 183
Multiples/Marian Goodman 73
McIntosh/Drysdale 183
McKee Gallery, David 39
Nahan Art Galleries 61
Now & Then 182
October Gallery 182
Odyssia Gallery 20
Oscarsson-Hood 91
Otterbein College 175
PA Academy of Fine Arts 183
Pace Editions 66
Pace Gallery 1, 41
Parasol Press 69
Parsons, Betty 54
Pearl, Marilyn 48
Perlman, Miriam 57
Petersburg Press 74
Princeton Gallery of Fine Art 38
Printworld Directory 95
Protetch Gallery, Max 38
Quay Gallery 55
Rachofsky, Morton 182
Rein Galleries, C.R. 172
Ricco-Johnson 58
Richebourg/McCoy 89
Rosenfield Gallery, Betsy 89
Rutberg Gallery, Jack 197
Sawyer Gallery, William 44, 45, 55
Sculpture Placement 175
Segal Gallery, Thomas 48
Seguy Gallery, Yvonne 185
724 Prints 83
Shiva, Inc. 98
Simca 68
SL Art Gallery 183
Somertown Studio & Gallery 94
Sperone Westwater Fischer 20
Staempfli 31
St. Martin's Press 46
Stoller & Co., John 22
Stone Collections, William 172
Stone Gallery, Jeremy 60
Styria Studio 70
Summervail Workshop 97
Tamar Arts 147
Tamarind Institute 84
Tampa Museum 91
Tasende Gallery 51
Tatistcheff & Co., Peter 182
Taylor Art, Carol 14
Texas Gallery 58
Thorp Gallery, Edward 54
Toll Gallery, Barbara 64
Twining Gallery 56
Universal Limited Art Editions 76
University of MA at Amherst 98
Vanderwoude Tananbaum 26
Villani Editions 81
V&R Graphics 69
Waddington Gall./London 78
Wagman Gallery, Barbara 92
Weinberg Gallery, Daniel 56
Weiner Gallery, Jan 197
Wertheimer Sculptures 168
White & Assoc., Roberto 183
White Gallery, Martha 20
Winsor & Newton 160
Yale University 97
Yamet Gallery 168
Yares Gallery 53
Yoseido Gallery 184
Young/Hoffman 62
Zabriskie Gallery 47
Zolla Lieberman 54

VOL 7 1
ISS 3
MR 1983
UMI

Artworld

1983 Federal Arts Appropriations

The 1983 budgets are established for federal arts agencies.

The Institute of Museum Services, which the Reagan administration attempted to phase out two years in a row, is funded at $10.8 million. With its unused '82 funds which will be carried over, the IMS will have an '83 budget of $11.5 million.

The National Trust for Historic Preservation, for which the Administration also requested zero-level funding, will receive $26 million. The Commission of Fine Arts, Washington, D.C. is up to $319,000 from last year's $303,000. Two groups funded by a 1982 continuing resolution: Arts in Education remains at the '82 level of $2.02 million; the USICA will spend about $1.5 million on its visual arts activities in 1983, almost double last year's funding level.

The National Endowment for the Humanities is budgeted at $130 million for '83, down $600,000 from '82 but considerably higher than Reagan's request of $96 million. [See details of the NEA '83 budget on p. 11.]

Federal Vacancies Filled

President Reagan's four, final appointments to the National Council on the Arts and Humanities, the National Endowments' 26-member advisory board, have been confirmed: Douglas Dillon, Metropolitan Museum of Art trustee and lawyer; Raymond Learsy, trustee of the Whitney Museum and president of Agricultural and Industrial Corporation; George Schaefer, TV, film and theater director and producer; architect William Van Allen, American Institute of Architects fellow and partner of Carroll, Grisdale and Van Allen.

The Senate also confirmed Reagan's seven new appointments to the National Museum Services Board, the 15-member policy-making body of the Institute of Museum Services. With the exception of Craig Black, director of the Los Angeles County Natural History Museum (also the sole Democrat among the President's choices), the new members have limited, if any professional museum experience: Elizabeth Helms Adams, Alice Wright Algood, Ann Duncan Haffner, Carolyn Hume, F. Richard Hsu, Dorothy Tyson. (Four of the seven are from California.) In response to the recent seven-month period when nine vacancies on the National Museum Services Board created administrative difficulty for the IMS, Congress has required that presidentially appointed members of the board and the National Council continue to serve after their terms have expired until their replacements are confirmed.

Chairman Frank Hodsoll has filled the last vacancy at the NEA: Andrew Oliver Jr., former head of the Textile Museum in Washington, D.C. has been named museum program director, replacing Tom Freudenheim who left in Oct. '82 to become director of the Worcester (Mass.) Museum.

New posts created at the NEA's partnership office: Anthony Turney, who will continue to serve as director of state programs, is deputy to the chairman for public partnership in charge of state and local art support. Cynthia Grassby is deputy to the chairman for private partnership with responsibility for NEA's challenge grant and advancement programs. Ann Van Devanter is director of special partnership projects to encourage private-sector arts funding.

Museumorama

The principal museums of Baltimore, Boston and Washington, D.C. have completed major overhauls in recent months. Most conspicuous is the Baltimore Museum's, which included the addition of yet another wing to the multiple extensions of its 1929 building, designed by John Russell Pope. The new east wing facade combines a two-story glass-curtain wall, a taller piano-curve wall covered in ceramic tile, and a flat end wall of the same Tennessee limestone as the original Pope structure. The $4.5-million extension, designed by Philadelphia architects Bower Lewis Thrower, contains four temporary exhibition galleries, with a total of 6,000 square feet, plus a 400-seat auditorium, cafe, sales and rental gallery, classroom and lecture hall.

Last month, the National Gallery unveiled the entirely remodeled ground floor interior of its "old" West building, also designed by Pope. The 10-year project cost $16.7 million, of which the Federal government provided $3.7 million. The exhibition area—40,000 square feet divided between 45 galleries—is nearly twice its former size due to the transfer of offices to the museum's I.M. Pei-designed East building, which opened in '78. With the reopening of the ground floor, the number of objects on view from the permanent collection doubles.

The Boston Museum of Fine Art's Asiastic wing, closed for renovations since 1978, reopened in November. Repository of what is said to be the world's largest Asiatic art collection, the redesigned wing features 26 newly climate-controlled galleries in which 3,500 objects spanning 20 centuries are on view. An increase in exhibition area (it now totals 38,000 square feet) provides room for separate galleries of Korean and Southeast Asian art. Other galleries are devoted to Chinese, Japanese, Indian, Islamic and Himalayan art.

People

At the Guggenheim Museum: curator of special exhibitions, Margit Rowell goes to Paris's Centre Georges Pompidou as curator, with responsibility for the historic portion of an international survey exhibition of 20th-century sculpture to be held in fall '86. Louise Averill Svendsen retires after 30 years as curator; research curator Vivian Endicott Barnett is named curator; exhibitions coordinator Susan B. Hirschfield becomes assistant curator.

At the Walker Art Center: chief curator Graham Beale leaves to become keeper of the Sainsbury Center for the Visual Arts at England's University of East Anglia. Marge Goldwater leaves the Fort Worth Art Museum to replace the outgoing Walker curator Lisa Lyons.

Obituaries

Ben Benn, 98, Russian-born painter of exuberantly brushed, intensely colored still lifes, landscapes and portraits, especially of women wearing huge, extravagantly bedecked hats. During a very long career, Benn's painting never coincided squarely with major 20th-century movements, nor did his reputation attain major proportions. Nevertheless, he had a solid following over the years as a "painter's painter," in love with the perceptual world and its translation into paint. He was admired by such critics as Hilton Kramer and Sidney Geist. The former especially, wrote about Benn warmly and repeatedly. After studying at the National Academy, Benn was associated with those pioneer American artists who shared a concern for the structural innovations of European modernism. He exhibited with Dove, Hartley, Marin and Walkowitz (among others) in the famous Forum Exhibition of Modern American Painters of 1916 (which will be recreated in New York this spring). Benn had many solo gallery shows; he was given one-man museum exhibitions by the Walker Art Center (1953), the Jewish Museum (1965) and the Hirshhorn (1974).

William Dole, 65, artist who switched in the mid-'50s from realist painting to the collages on which his reputation is based. From 1949 until his death, Dole taught studio art at the University of California at Santa Barbara. Since '74 he had shown regularly at New York's Staempfli Gallery, where recent works were on view when he died in January.

Jane Sabersky, 71, retired curator of art properties at Columbia University, where she organized numerous exhibitions, including the 1973 Florine Stettheimer retrospective.

Joseph Trovato, 70, visiting professor of art at Hamilton College and 46-year staff member of Utica's Munson-Williams-Proctor Institute.

Chris Millon, 31, Chicago artist who made video, composed electronic music and taught sculpture at the School of the Art Institute.

Museum Preview of the Month

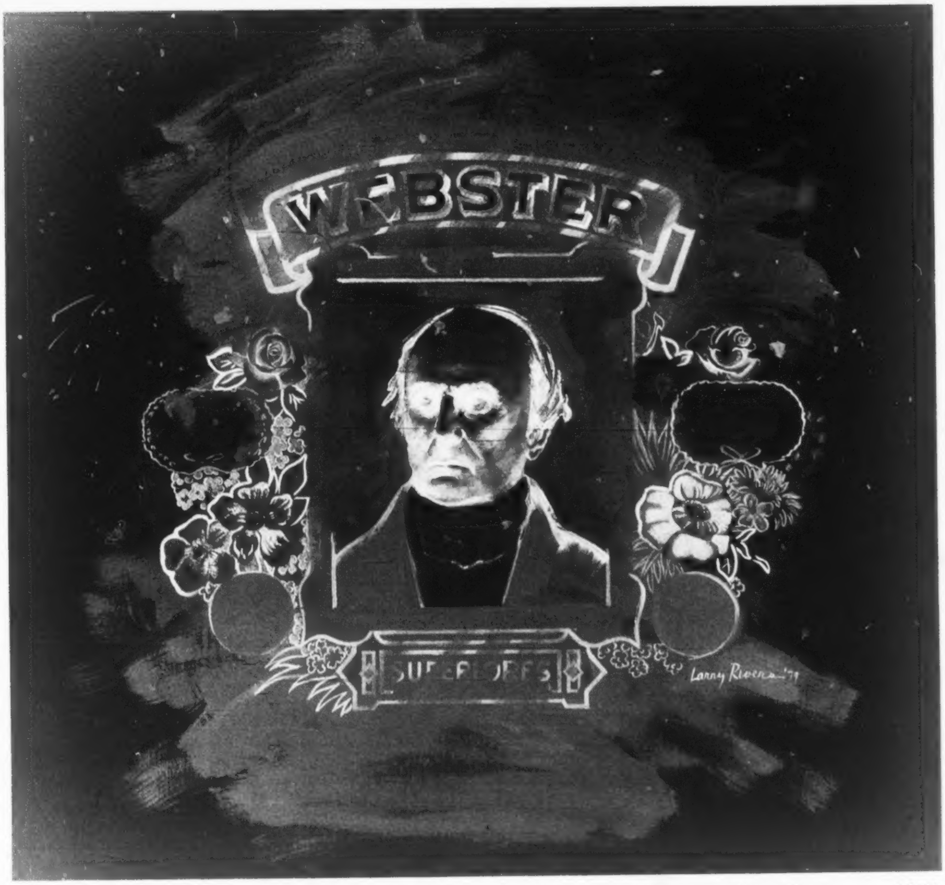
"Julio González: A Retrospective" at the Guggenheim Museum [Mar. 11-May 8] will provide a rare comprehensive view of González's work. Among its 254 objects are early works—decorative metalwork, jewelry, turn-of-the-century drawings, salon paintings—never before seen in the U.S. With 85 of the estimated 120 mature sculptures González made during the '30s and '40s, the show should strengthen his well-established reputation as an early master of abstract welded-metal sculpture. This is the first major González retrospective in the U.S. since the one the Museum of Modern Art organized in 1956.

"Without González, David Smith wouldn't have had the courage to use welding as a fine art, and González wouldn't have had the idea if he hadn't met Picasso," said Margit Rowell, the Guggenheim's curator of special exhibitions and the show's organizer. González's small body of constructed metal sculpture was made within a 12-year period, between his first collaboration with Picasso and his death in 1942. In addition to his innovative works in iron, there are a few pieces in the show made of forged bronze to which González applied similar techniques.

Though Rowell's show "emphasizes the original pieces forged and soldered by his own hand," it also includes a number of posthumous bronze casts. All but one of these are made from plasters or terra cottas González himself intended to cast in bronze. The exception is one of the controversial posthumous bronzes cast from an original welded-iron piece (Madame Cactus, 1939-40) which was not available for the show.

The show travels to the Museo Español de Arte Contemporaneo, Madrid [June 15-Aug. 3] and Berlin's Akademie der Kunste [Sept. 11-Oct. 30].

LARRY RIVERS



"Portrait of Daniel Webster on a Flesh Field" acrylic on canvas 67"x78" 1979

SCOTTSDALE EXHIBITION:
MARCH 24-APRIL 12, 1983

ELAINE HORWITCH GALLERIES

4211 Marshall Way
Scottsdale, Arizona 85251
(602) 945-0791

4222 N. Marshall Way
Scottsdale, Arizona 85251
(602) 941-5290

129 W. Palace Avenue
Sante Fe, New Mexico 87501
(505) 988-8997

Forest Rd. and Hwy. 89A
Sedona, Arizona 86336
(602) 282-6290

VOL

7
1

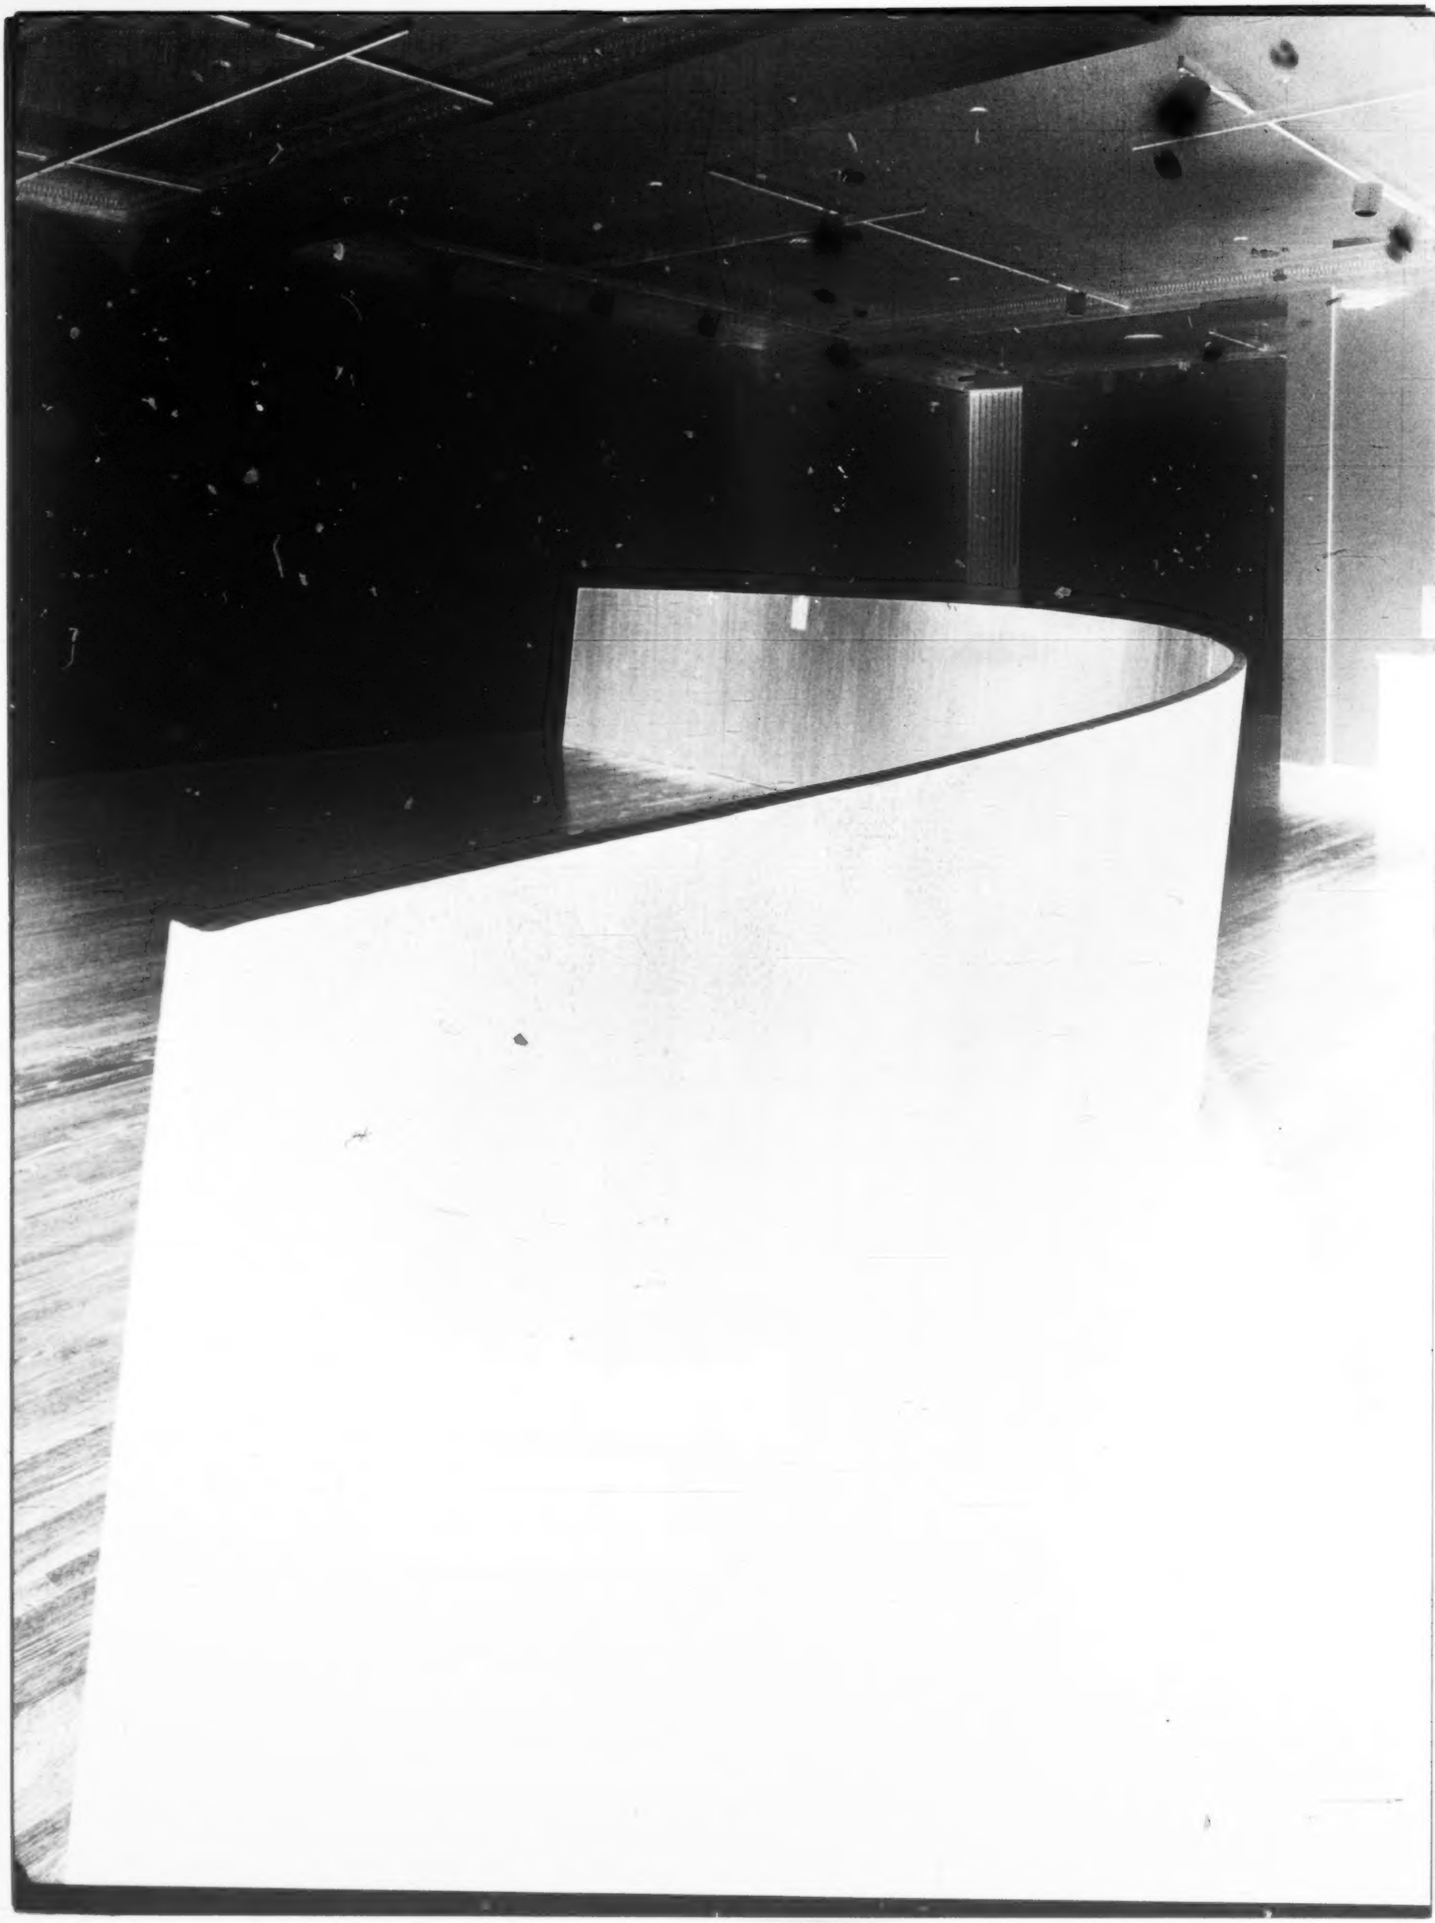
ISS

3

MR

1983

UMI



VOL
7
1
ISS
4
A P 1983
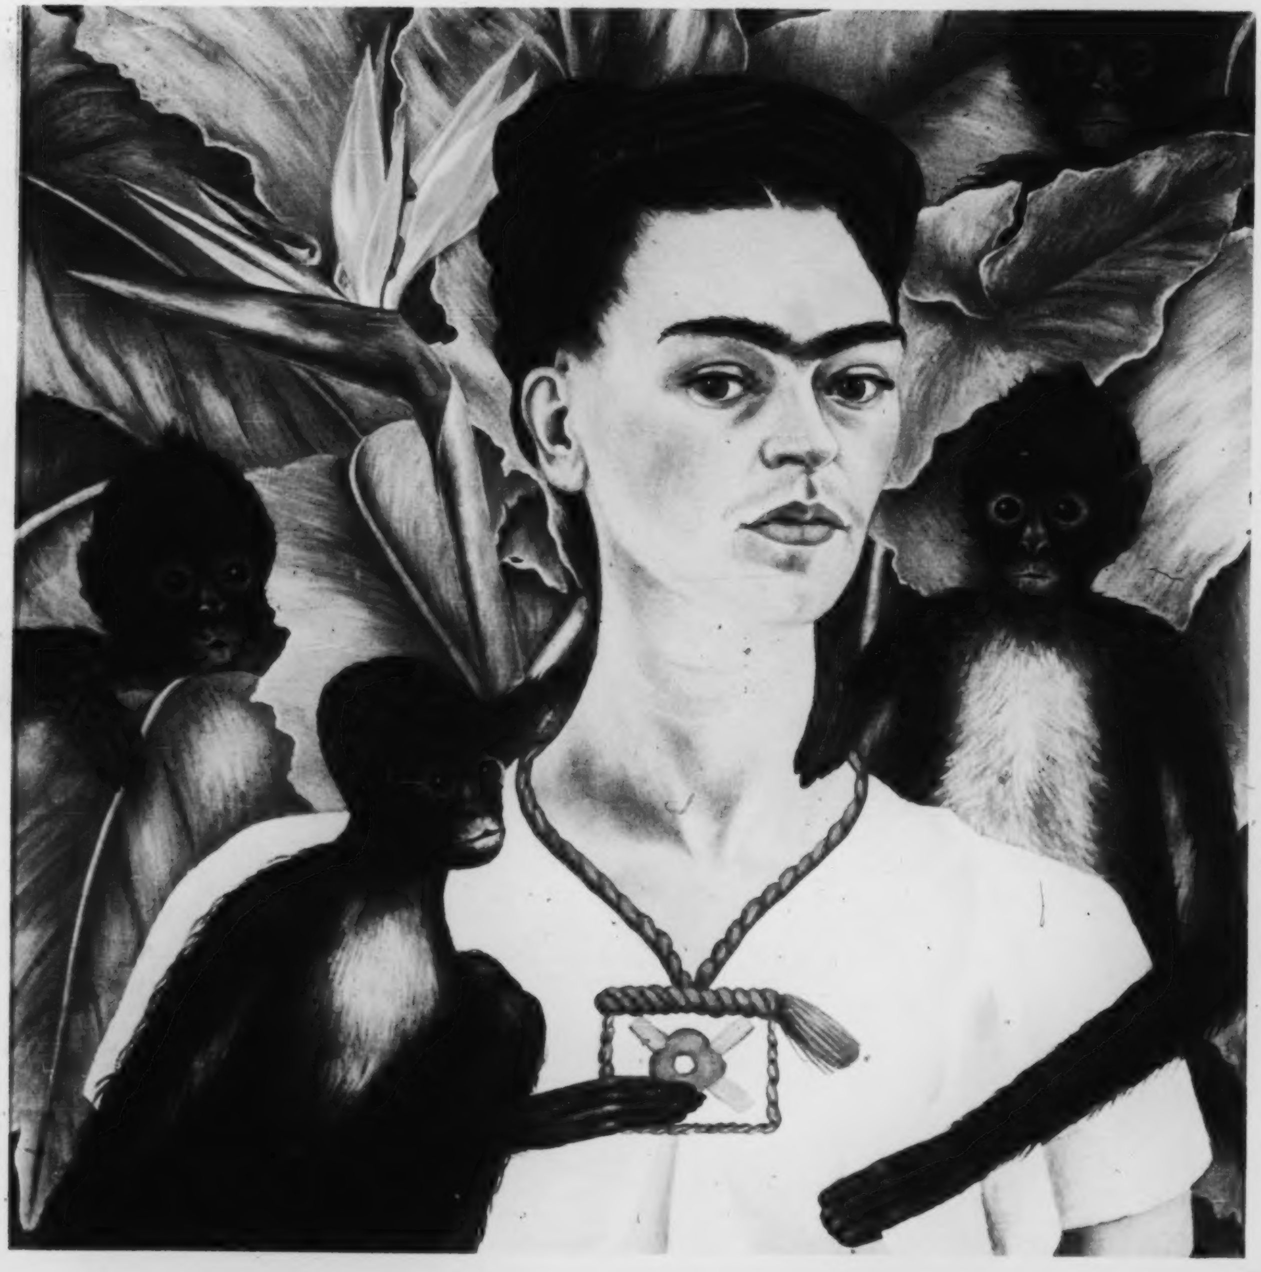
UMI

Art in America

APRIL 1983/$3.50
Outside North America/$5.00

Cover: Frida Kahlo's "Self-Portrait with Monkeys," 1943

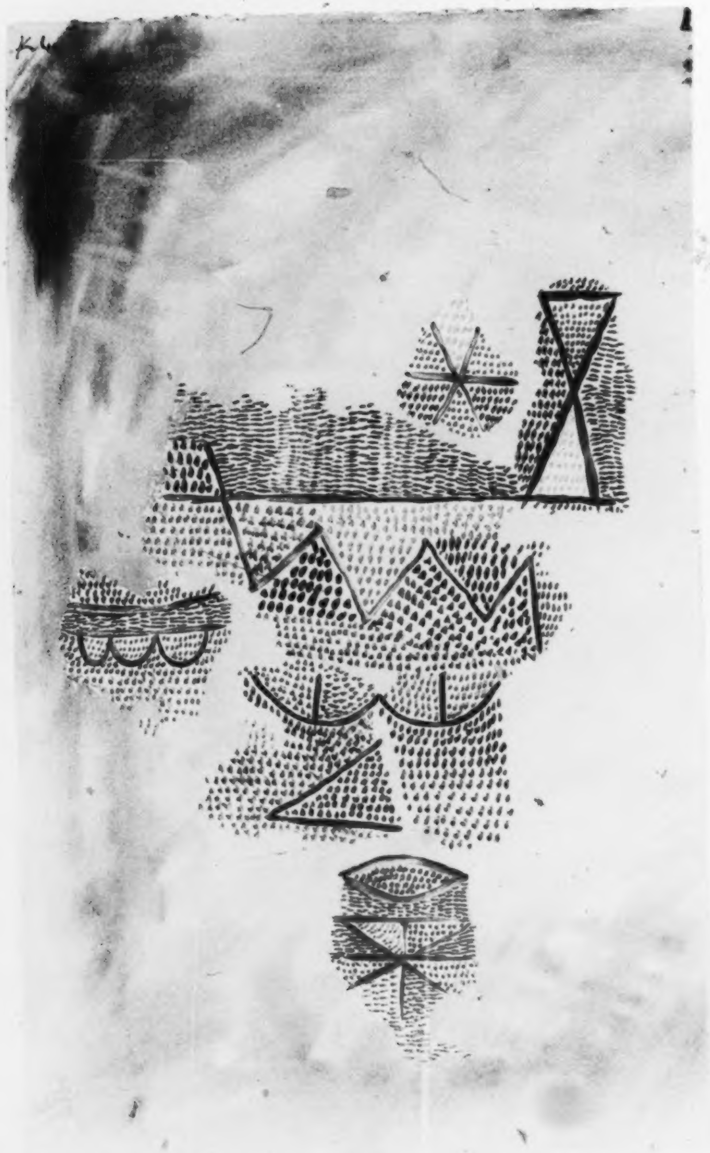
Vietnam War Memorial/Louise Bourgeois/Neil Welliver/Morton Schamberg
Tina Modotti & Frida Kahlo/Robert Longo/Larry Bell in Santa Fe/Josef Hoffmann
Report from Paris: Photography Month/Books/Review of Exhibitions



VOL
7
1
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

PAUL KLEE

Through April 30



Physiognomie aus Fragmenten. Gouache and watercolor, 11⅝ x 6⅞ inches

MARISA DEL RE GALLERY

41 East 57th St NYC 10022 (212) 688-1843

An art magazine's credibility...

. . . is not just the reader's perception of editorial content—but of everything in the magazine that informs, enlightens, stimulates, provokes. Including your advertising.

Thanks to the high quality and reliability of Art in America's advertisers, this magazine has established a total reading environment of credibility—from feature articles, to departments, to exhibition reviews, to advertisements.

They're all taken seriously, by the art world's most loyal, active audience of serious art collectors.

For a prime example of advertising that contributes to—and profits from—Art in America's climate of credibility, please turn to the special advertising section on sculpture, which begins on page 65.

> Thirty-two galleries have participated in this impressive portfolio of forty-seven sculptures by major artists.

They know they're in good company—advertising company and editorial company—not only throughout the section but throughout the magazine.

They know, too, that they're being seen and read by their very best artworld business prospects. As leading gallery advertisers have said before:

> "I don't know a major collector, or anyone seriously involved in this field, who doesn't read Art in America."
>
> "Art in America is read by serious collectors, the people who buy, as opposed to those who browse."
>
> "Art in America has the broadest-based serious readership, going from avant-garde to classical."
>
> "It's hard to find a serious collector who doesn't read Art in America."

In Art in America, you're taken seriously. . . because you have a compelling message, a deeply interested, receptive concentration of artworld buyers . . . and credibility.

Paul Shanley

— Publisher

VOL
71

ISS
4

AP
1983

UMI

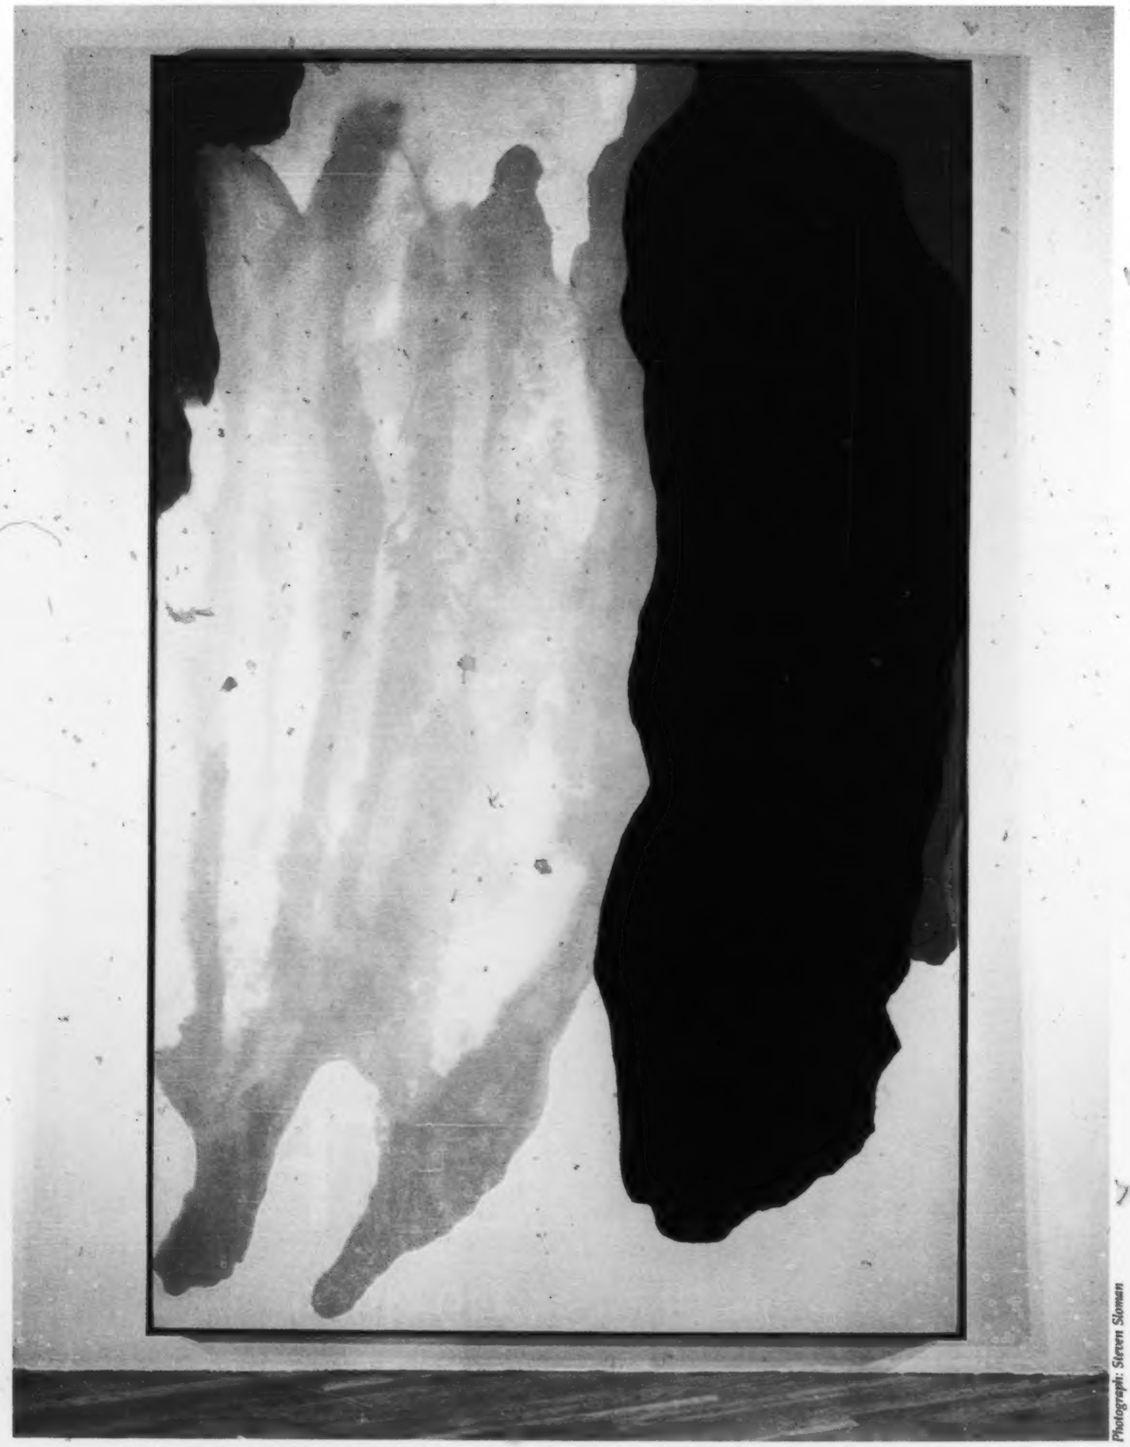
MARK ROTHKO

PAINTINGS 1949–1969

THE PACE GALLERY 32 EAST 57 NY

FULLY ILLUSTRATED 42 P CATALOG, 17 COLOR PLATES, TEXT BY IRVING SANDLER, $18.50 + TAX WHERE APPLICABLE

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI



Photograph: Steven Sloman

Helen Frankenthaler. Harvest, 1967. Acrylic on canvas, 11'8" x 7'6" (355 x 288 cm.)

Important Works by Contemporary Masters

André Emmerich Gallery

41 East 57th Street · New York, NY 10022 · Tel (212) 752-0124

Art in America

APRIL 1983

A Tale of Two Memorials Elizabeth Hess 120
The history of the newly unveiled Vietnam Veterans Memorial is chronicled in the context of the intense controversy it has generated.

Louise Bourgeois: Gender & Possession Robert Storr 128
A traveling retrospective surveys Bourgeois's long career as avant-gardist and iconoclast.

Terrestrial Truth: Neil Welliver Donald B. Kuspit 138
Welliver's special brand of painterly literalism presents a nature that outdoes art.

The Art of Spectacle Hal Foster 144
Robert Longo deploys public images and slick surfaces in seductive simulations of reality.

Six-Sided Constructions Carrie Rickey 150
Larry Bell's '60s work, permutations on the theme of the cube, are given a then-and-now reading.

Venus and the Stocking Machines Julia Ballerini 154
The first Morton Schamberg show in 20 years suggests a fresh interpretation of the early 20th-century "machinist esthetic."

The Ribbon around the Bomb Michael Newman 160
The politically sensitive and strongly feminist works of Frida Kahlo and Tina Modotti are juxtaposed in a current exhibition.

Rethinking Josef Hoffmann Marcia E. Vetrocq 170
A recent museum show emphasized the formal beauty of Hoffmann's designs.

DEPARTMENTS

Rejoinder: Tired Criticism, Tired "Radicalism" Donald B. Kuspit 11

Review of Books 19

Report from Paris: Photo-Fever on the Seine Allen Ellenzweig 35

REVIEW OF EXHIBITIONS

New York, Seattle, Los Angeles, Baltimore, Fort Worth 177

Artworld 224

Cover: Detail of Frida Kahlo's Self-Portrait with Monkeys (entire work at left), 1943, oil on canvas, 32 by 24¾ inches (collection Mr. and Mrs. Jacques Gelman, Mexico City). The painting appears in the exhibition "Frida Kahlo and Tina Modotti" at New York University's Grey Art Gallery, through April 16. Photo Robert E. Mates.

Editor: Elizabeth C. Baker

Managing Editor: Joan Simon / Executive Editor: Nancy Marmer / Senior Editors: Ted Mooney, Craig Owens / Associate Editors: Prudence Carlson, Hal Foster / Assistant Managing Editor: Kathryn Howarth / Assistant Editor: Robert Fisher / Designer: Alberto P. Gavasci / Associate Designer: Louis D'Esposito / Directory Manager: Amy Slaton / Consultant: John Peter / Contributing Editors: Donald B. Kuspit, Lucy Lippard, Sarah McFadden, Linda Nochlin, Carter Ratcliff, Bryan Robertson, Irving Sandler, Peter Schjeldahl, Roberta Smith, Charles F. Stuckey / Corresponding Editors: Chicago, Franz Schulze; San Francisco, Peter Selz; Washington D.C., David Tannous; London, Suzi Gablik; Rome, Milton

Publisher: Paul Shanley

Director of Advertising: Susan B. Anthony / Advertising Sales: Susan McCall, Karen Niedzielski, Ruth Rothseid / Advertising Services: Susanne Vorster, Mary Baez / Production: Mary Jontry / Production Assistant: Sarah King / Promotion Director: Valerie Green / Circulation Director: Barbara Gutman / Circulation Manager: Susan Blattman / Marketing Services Director: Karen Tubridy / Art in America, 850 Third Ave., N.Y.C., 10022, Tel. (212) 715-2600

Director for International Development: John H. Liesveld Jr., Art in America, 39 Quai des Grands Augustins, 75006 Paris, France. Tel. (1) 325.26.55.

WHITNEY COMMUNICATIONS CORPORATION MAGAZINE DIVISION
PRESIDENT: John S. Prescott SENIOR VICE PRESIDENT, FINANCE/ADMINISTRATION: Gordon H. Duncan
VICE PRESIDENT MARKETING: William Hitzig VICE PRESIDENT PLANNING: Dean Heine
VICE PRESIDENT PRODUCTION: James Kearney VICE PRESIDENT PRODUCT DEVELOPMENT: Virginia Evans PROMOTION DIRECTOR: James Anderson

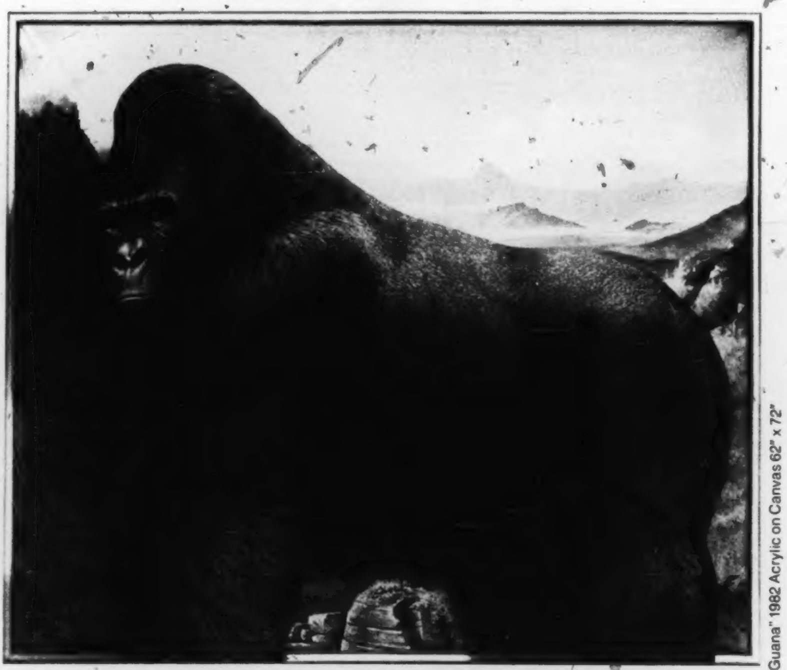
WHITNEY COMMUNICATIONS CORPORATION
CHAIRMAN: Walter N. Thayer
PRESIDENT: Charles H. G. Rees

Vol. 71, No. 4 (April) Art in America is published 11 times a year (monthly except July) by Art in America, Inc., 850 Third Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10022. Telephone (area code 212) 715-2600. Cable address: AMARTMAG. A member of the Magazine Division of Whitney Communications Corporation. Contents copyright © 1983 by Art in America, Inc., and may not be reproduced in any manner or form without permission. ISSN: 0004-3214. The opinions expressed in "Issues and Commentary," apart from the editor's comments, are those of the writers themselves and not necessarily those of this magazine. Not responsible for unsolicited manuscripts or photographs. Art in America is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature and the Art Index. Back volumes of Art in America are available in microfiche from Bell & Howell, Att. Periodical Department, Old Mansfield Road, Wooster, Ohio 44691. Microfilm copies are available through Xerox University Microfilm, Ann Arbor, Michigan 48106. Articles appearing in this magazine are abstracted and indexed in Historical Abstracts and/or America: History and Life and RILA. Circulation is verified by the Audit Bureau of Circulations. Controlled circulation postage paid at Concord, N.H. and New York, N.Y. BACK ISSUES AND COMPLETE VOLUMES: Lawrence McGilvery, P.O. Box 852, LaJolla, Calif., 92038. SUBSCRIPTIONS: U.S. 11 issues $34.95, 22 issues $59.95, 33 issues $79.95. Possessions & Canada add $8.00 per year. All others add $15.00 per year. Domestic single copy $3.50 prepaid. Outside North America $5.00. Single copy August/Annual $7.45 prepaid (includes $1.50 postage and handling). SUBSCRIPTION OFFICE: Art in America, 542 Pacific Ave., Marion, Ohio 43302. Telephone (area code 614) 383-3141. FOR CHANGE OF ADDRESS send old and new addresses and label from a recent issue. POSTMASTER Send Form No. 3579 to Art in America, 542 Pacific Avenue, Marion, Ohio 43302.

Member of the Audit Bureau of Circulations

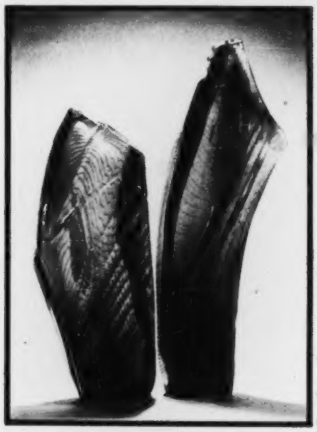
VOL 71
ISS 4
AP 1983
UMI

TOM PALMORE



"Guana" 1982 Acrylic on Canvas 62" x 72"

WILLIAM MORRIS

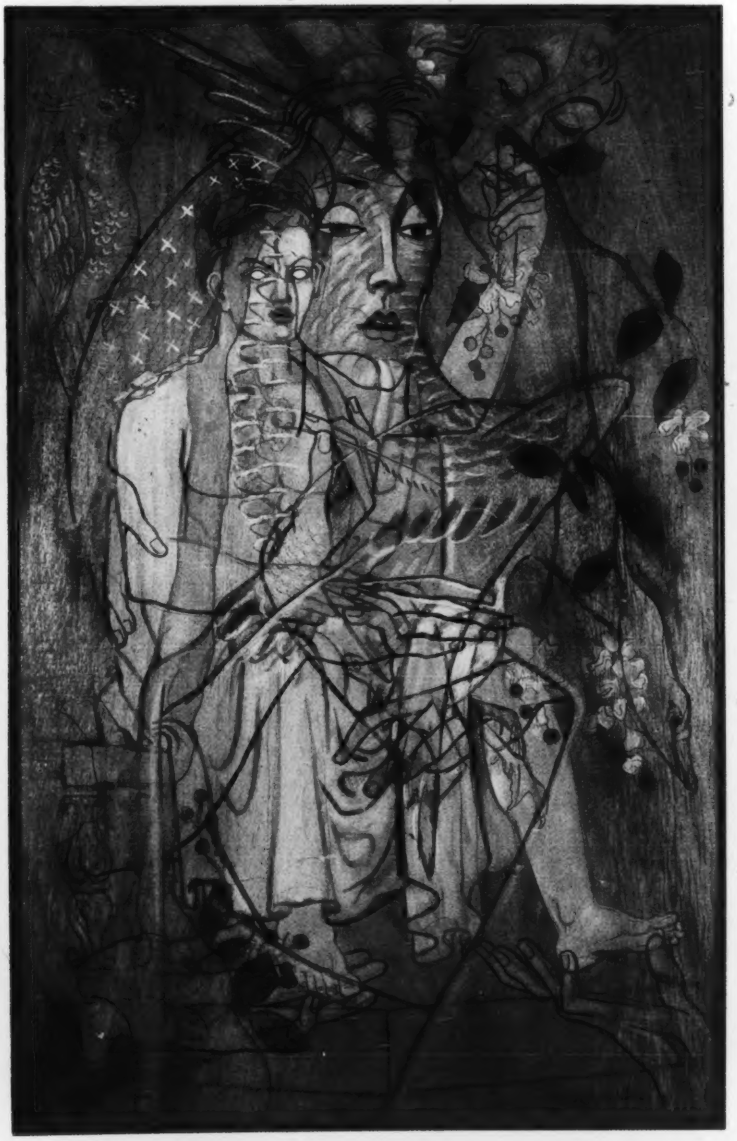


"Standing Stones" 1983 Blown Glass Tallest Piece 36"

MARCH 26-APRIL 23

Betsy Rosenfield Gallery, Inc.

212 West Superior, Chicago, Illinois 60610 Telephone 312.787.8020



Francis Picabia "Minos" 1929 Pastell auf Holz 150 x 95 cm

GALERIE RUDOLF ZWIRNER
ALBERTUSSTRASSE 18
5 COLOGNE 1
49 (221) 23 58 37

GALLERIA PAOLA SPROVIERI
3, PIAZZA DEL POPOLO
ROME
39 (6) 361 09 75

ARP BALLA BRAUNER DUBUFFET ERNST FONTANA FAUTRIER YVES KLEIN
LEGER MAGRITTE PICABIA PICASSO SCHWITTERS STELLA TWOMBLY

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

JEAN PIERRE BERTRAND

Z A R
E N E
D D D

GALERIE DE FRANCE

50-52, RUE DE LA VERRERIE
75004 PARIS
TEL: 274•38•00
APRIL-MAY 1983

PALAZZO GRASSI

VENICE
APRIL 16-24

MORTON LIVINGSTON
SCHAMBERG

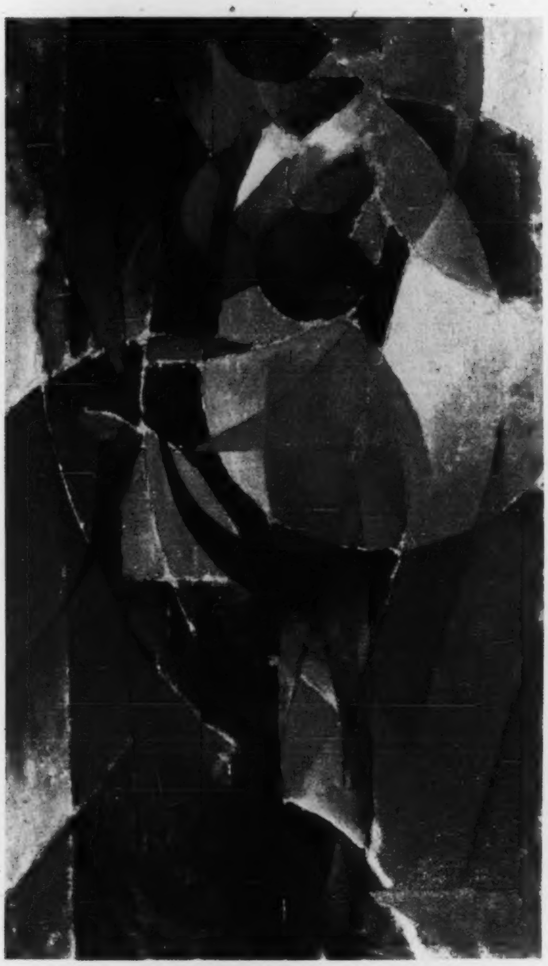


Figure C (Geometrical Patterns), 1914. Oil on canvas, 28 x 16 inches

The artist's estate is represented by Salander-O'Reilly Galleries, Inc.

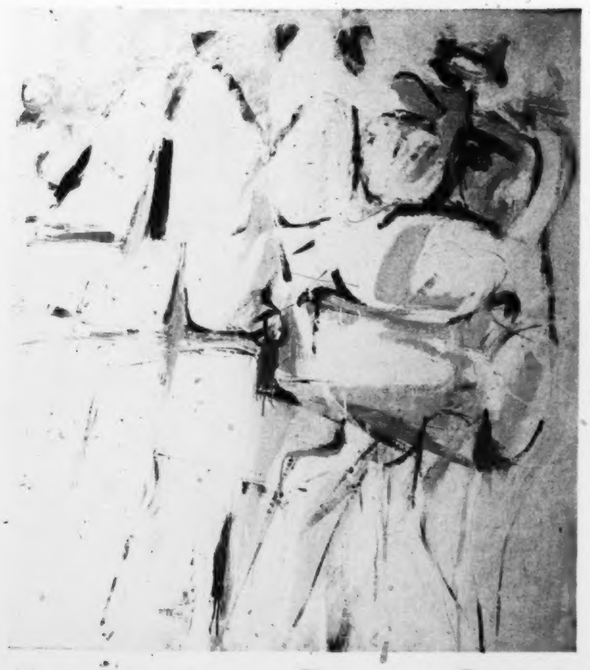
22 East 80 Street New York, NY 10021
Telephone: (212) 879-6606
Gallery hours: Tuesday-Saturday, 10 to 5:30

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI



JACK TWORKOV

House of the Sun Variation 1952 oil on canvas
50 x 45 inches
signed and titled on verso

JOHN C. STOLLER & CO.

400 MARQUETTE AVE MINNEAPOLIS 55401 (612) 339-7060

Georg Baselitz

Paintings

March 31 - May 7

Willem de Kooning

The Complete Sculpture

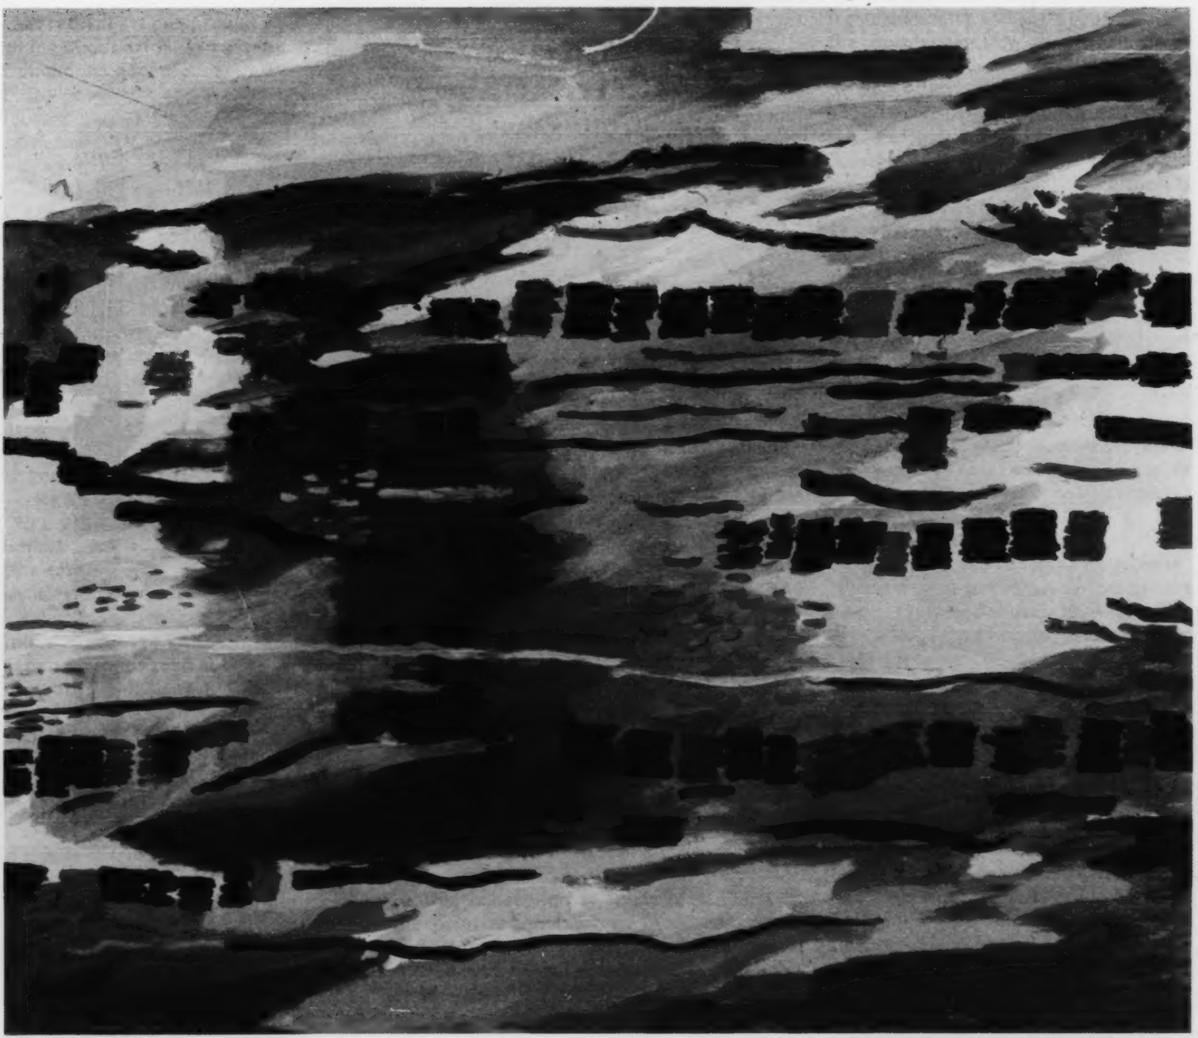
May 14 - June 25

XAVIER FOURCADE INC.

36 East 75 Street New York, NY 10021 212 535-3980

Osvaldo Romberg

NEW PAINTINGS



Collioure, 1982 Acrylic on canvas, 54½ x 62½ inches

Exhibition April 12-30, 1983

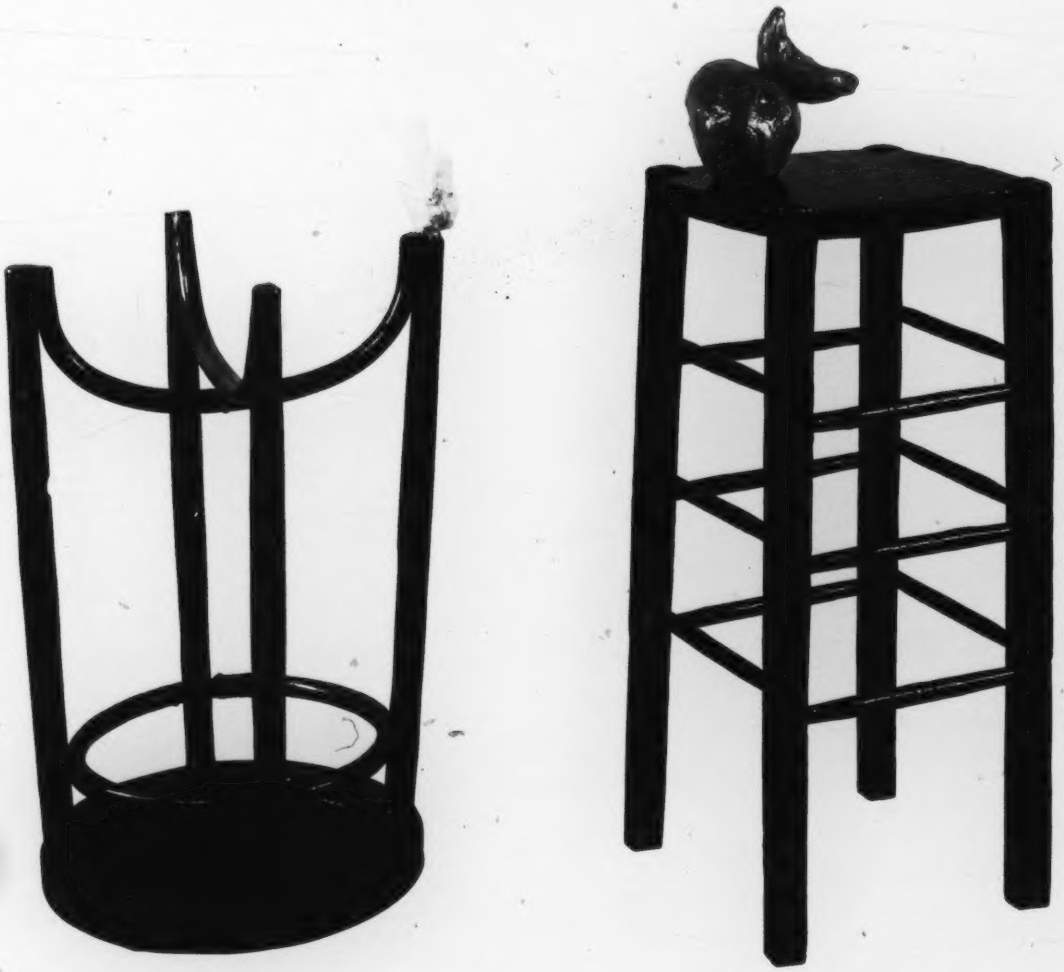
Illustrated catalogue $7.

Galleri Bellman

19th and 20th Century Paintings and Graphics

41 East 57th Street, fifth floor, New York, New York 10022 • (212) 486-7944 • Tuesday through Saturday, 10 a.m.-6 p.m.

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI



Man and Woman in the Night, 1969. 30¾ x 17¾ x 17¾ and 34 x 12½ x 12½ inches miró painted sculpture from the collection of the pierre matisse gallery 41 east 57 nyc

Rejoinder
Tired Criticism, Tired "Radicalism"

BY DONALD B. KUSPIT

Defending expressionism against critiques recently published in these pages, the author attributes the opposition's resistance to what he identifies as a "puritanical," "hackneyed," "narrow" view of modernism.

There is loose in the art world now a cliché of radicalism—a stereotype of what radical art means, and what radical thinking about art is. Three perpetrators of the cliché of advanced art, one might almost say masters of it, inadvertently joined forces in the January 1983 issue of Art in America. Using a rather blunt instrument—a narrow, puritanical view of enlightened modernism—Hal Foster, Craig Owens and Carter Ratcliff attempted, in their different styles, to bludgeon to death the new Expressionism. I contend that their conception of modernism is hackneyed and unenlightened, and hides the real issues in the struggle between the new Expressionists and other kinds of artists. The polarization involved is real, but not for the reasons stated by our indefatigable critics, with their tired ideas.

First, the supercilious use of the smear, and the generally superior tone, of the "radical" critics must be noted. Craig Owens calls "the institutions—and the critics—that support this kind of work" its "collaborators," a term fraught with Second World War associations of treason. This is overkill, and betrays the kind of resistance to a new art reminiscent of the kind of resistance to psychoanalysis that Freud noted, and for the same reasons. In a little essay on that resistance, Freud noted, among the reasons for it, the belief that psychoanalysis was " 'inimical to culture' and . . . a 'social danger' "[1] because it advocated the "unfettering of instincts that would injure our community."[2] The new Expressionism—and perhaps only in this is it truly like the old—is similarly regarded. Ratcliff makes this clear in his assumption that expressionism in general involves a "dumb and blind devotion to the hope of absolute sincerity"[3]; and Foster implies as much in the defense he constructs against the "psychosocial" interests of expressionism by regarding it as another kind of "rhetoric."[4] (This is a typical misuse of deconstruction, reducing all art to linguistic interests, thus neutralizing art's relevance to experience.)

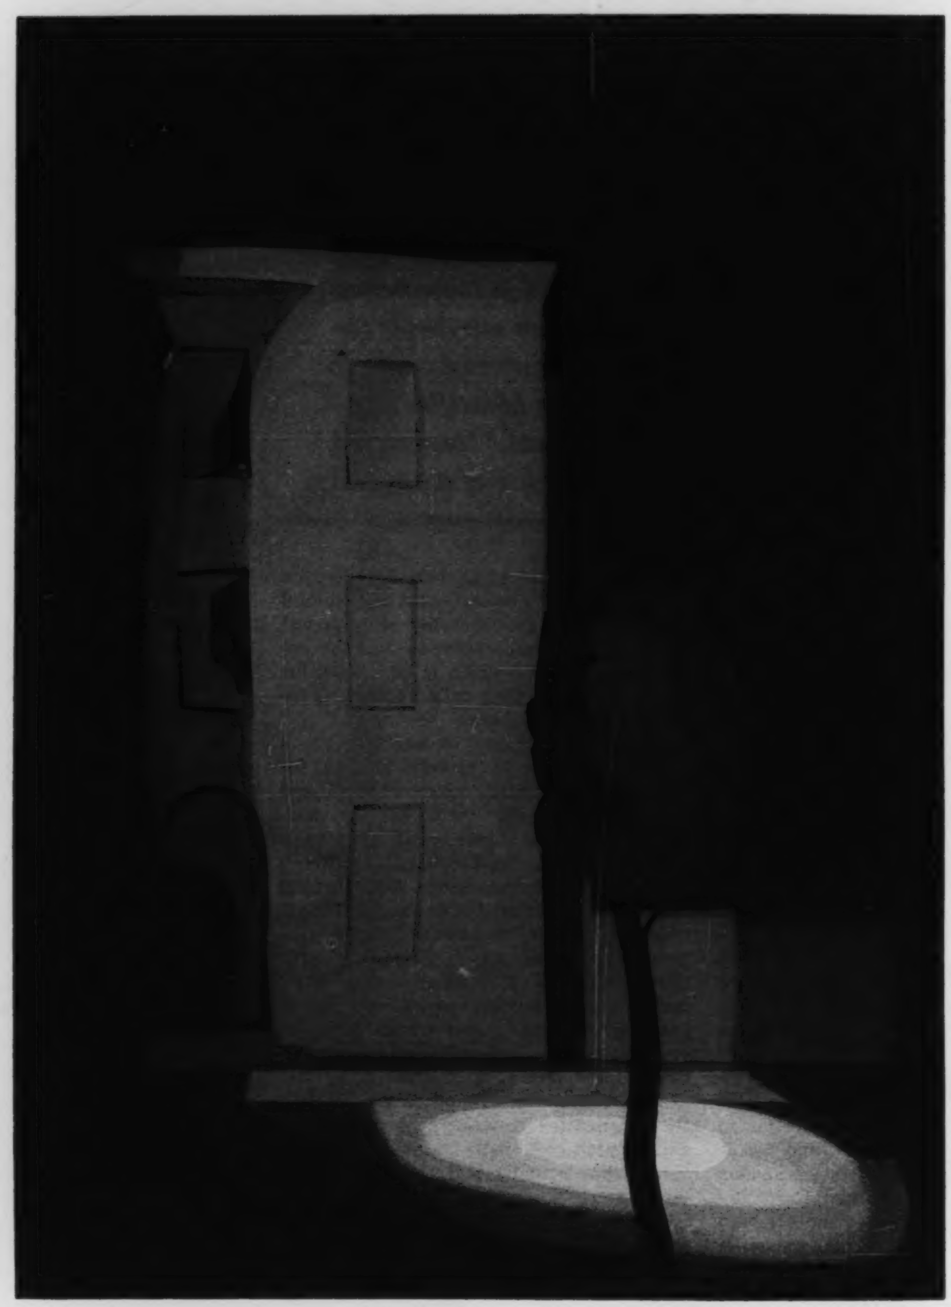
Freud noted that "psychoanalysis has never said a word in favor of unfettering instincts."[5] However, he does think that "society has gone too far" in the "suppression" of "certain instinctual impulses," which "should be permitted a greater amount of satisfaction." "The inefficient method of suppressing" certain other instincts "by means of repression should by replaced by a better and securer procedure."[6] But "society maintains a condition of cultural hypocrisy"; it is not "given to truthfulness."[7] "It has set up a high ideal of morality—morality being restriction of the instincts—and insists that all the members shall fulfill that ideal without troubling itself with the possibility that obedience may bear heavily upon the individual."[8] Foster, Owens and Ratcliff represent the higher morality of modernist art. They are as suppressive in their conception of other art—which is not modernist only according to their definition—as, in his day, Michael Fried was.

What the attempt "to establish . . . a theatrical relation to the beholder" was for Fried,[9] expressionist "awkwardness" and "insistence on the truth of the feelings"(Ratcliff[10]), "therapeutic programs" (Owens[11]), and "authenticity" (Foster[12]) are for our neo-radical critics. And what the attempt to create art "in essence anti-theatrical" because it "treated the beholder as if he were not there" was for Fried,[13] "sophistication" achieved through irony (Ratcliff[14]), the "modernist imperative to transgression" (Owens[15]), and art of "a deconstructive order" (Foster[16]) are for our latter-day saintly critics, with their somewhat exalted conception of modernism. That is, the polarization between modernist purity and "much seemingly difficult and advanced but actually ingratiating and mediocre work"[17] remains what it was in the '60s. Our three "advanced" critics reaffirm the old logic or paradigm of modernism by reformulating the distinction central to it in terms of currently standard yet somewhat shopworn radical clichés. The sides have become more vehement, more firmed up, but the underlying structure of the dispute remains the same. And so do the smear tactics—the falsification of the opposition, putting it, by the self-styled modernists, in what Freud called the Jewish "position of solitary opposition."[18] Fried, and his unwitting followers Foster, Owens, and Ratcliff—followers by reason of blindly assimilating his basic distinction (one that, derived from Clement Greenberg, has pervaded American though not European thinking about modernism)—monopolize, by their unconscious harping on the distinction, a false consciousness of modernism. For expressionism, with its presumed awkwardness and naive insistence on feeling (the former the result of the latter), as well as concern for authenticity and therapeutic intention, is the quintessentially theatrical art in the terms of the dichotomy. And a sophisticated, ironical, transgressive, deconstructive art is necessarily anti-theatrical. And in fact the neo-reductivist art that Foster endorses—what I would call an art of photographic Minimalism, involving the Conceptual use of quotations—is another kind of anti-theatrical formalism, just as many so-called realists were disguised formalists (they left the experience out of the reality, or at least all of it that was not matter-of-factly perceptual).

The entire dichotomy begins to explode—along with the one-dimensional conception of modernism by the "neo-critical," deconstructive formalists—the moment one realizes that the famous irony (revelation through irony) that is endorsed and demanded by our critics is somewhat hollow. Roy Lichtenstein remains a modernist hero for Ratcliff because of the "great deal of irony" his art has generated,[19] and in fact the January 1983 issue of Art in America has an article, by David Deitcher, on "Lichtenstein's Expressionist Takes." Yet when one looks at Lichtenstein's so-called irony, his use of what Benjamin Buchloh has called "appropriation and parody,"[20] one realizes that it is no more than the standard way popular culture relates to high culture: to parasitically appropriate and stereotype it—the parody comes in the stereotyping. As Shoshana Falman observes, to appropriate is to silence, as man has done to woman. There is an attempt to hollow out the meaning high culture has uncovered—to keep a certain "smart" surface on which there will be no trace of any depths. There is an attempt to neutralize the intensity of certain kinds of experience and understanding, and to instrumentalize and at the same time use decoratively—reduce to the logic of a style—the methods used to communicate these experiences and understandings. The point is that Lichtenstein's supposedly sophisticated irony, a sign of his superior artistic morality—like that our critics cloak themselves in—plays directly into the hands of all the forces for conventionalization, banalization and trivialization that pervade our society. This is why Lichtenstein is so successful and satisfying to so many: he most completely realizes the cliché of advanced art, and society's tendency to turn all living truth into dead clichés. That is, Lichtenstein is not as sophisticated, ironical, transgressive, deconstructive—critical, modernist, radical—as one would like to believe. He is "moderne," not modern.

While I feel that Lichtenstein's original

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI



OSCAR BLUEMNER
(1867-1938)
Summer Night
c. 1933-36
Casein on board
37¾ x 28½ inches
Signed lower left:
Florianus

BARBARA MATHES GALLERY ANNOUNCES ITS NEW LOCATION

BARBARA MATHES GALLERY
851 Madison Avenue New York NY 10021 212/249-3600

use of parody and appropriation made important sense in his early work, and, more recently, as an extension of Surrealist ideology [see A.I.A., May-June '79], I believe that his current use of it, particularly as applicable to his recent "Expressionist" works, becomes a reductio ad absurdum, a formula wedded to a look. Moreover, his efforts do not succeed at their critical task of demystification—as if high culture attempted to mystify (and popular culture to enlighten). Rather, they show an obscurantist intention to poke fun and make light of something Lichtenstein appears not to understand, except as a look, a surface—a social appearance. Lichtenstein now projects what used to be a typical American contempt for high culture, the pioneer's indifference to and need to escape from "civilization." Lichtenstein is making European and European-type art into good clean American fun; but he is really playing dirty. He is like the Marx brothers with the opera singer, at best a shallow, clever American Dadaist. He twists the Emersonian-chauvinist point of view, asking us to look to our own "popular" culture. But high culture is not sham and pretentious, in need of a needle for its over-inflated balloon. (Popular culture has an inflated sense of itself these days.) Does Lichtenstein let the hot air out of it? David Deitcher writes that, in some paintings "based on de Kooning's 'Women'," Lichtenstein "neutralized" the "savagery of the originals," rendered them "rather comic" by the use of " 'depicted' brushwork."[21]

Does that really happen? Are the de Koonings neutralized, made comic? Not in the least. No more than Rauschenberg's erased de Kooning tells us the truth about it, or Lichtenstein's own stereotypical "expressive" brush stroke tells us the truth about Pollock. (Both Lichtenstein and Rauschenberg can be said to show a fear of expression—a need for coolness—not unrelated to Wolfgang Lederer's idea of "fear of woman.") The Lichtensteins look like a joke next to them, not a joke on them. He has not managed to give them a hotfoot, even if he has vulgarized what we think about them. He represents the decorative debasing of—the use of the decorative to debase—their truth. Lichtenstein aspires to be the clown at King Lear's court, but he is far from tragic. (Nor is high modern art in King Lear's situation, blindly demanding that it be loved.)

The artists Foster endorses as "radical" are in the same situation as Lichtenstein—one of parasitic dependence upon their betters, upon those more inventive or more probing than themselves. (Lichtenstein in fact is an expressionist manqué, an inadequate expressionist, as his pre-Pop works show.) What the original artists stood for has become lost through the mindless, however witty, and exploitive quotation and resentful appropriation of them by their inferiors. The quoter's art—from Lichtenstein to Sherrie Levine—is a spoiler's art, forced in its naiveté yet indeed truly naive for all its technical finesse, truly vulgar for all its "refinements" and "expertness." There is nothing critical in such quotation, and really nothing sophisticated even in its techniques, which have become overfamiliar mechanical reflexes. This is especially so when one compares them to expressionist techniques—an expressionism which, according to Ratcliff, means the abandonment of, perhaps the inability to rise to, artistic "sophistication." Victor Miesel has pointed out that "styles within the [expressionist] movement ranged from representational to the non-objective,"[22] and that the "Expressionists refused to limit themselves to only one means of expression."[23] The same can be said of contemporary Expressionism. The assumption that expressionism means unselfconscious, methodless artistry is another consequence of what Paul Fussell has called "gross dichotomizing," to preclude all dialectical subtlety and make a sensationalist splash. It is the disease of our time. The repeated attempt to read expressionism as artistically innocent is also another form of resistance to it—a refusal to see what it attempts to communicate, the issues that motivate it.

All three critics assume there is some appropriately "progressive" contemporary mode of art, particularly revelatory of the present and pointing to the future. This is patently absurd.

What, then, are these issues, for expressionism today? Why the intensity of opposition to it? What are the vested interests it threatens? The issues are: 1. the conflict between photography and painting; 2. the concept of art as language (what I would call the linguistic fallacy); 3. the belief that modern art has little or nothing to do with content, everything or almost everything to do with the invention of style—especially next to nothing to do with psychosocial content; and 4. the assumption that art develops "progressively" rather than through regressions in the service of its ego. This includes those who trust it as a critical reflection of reality, perhaps even a seismograph registering the social state of desire (so-called shocks to sensibility). As one might expect, these four issues are interconnected.

1. Photography vs. Painting

In a letter to Alfred Stieglitz, Marcel Duchamp wrote: "You know exactly what I think of photography. I would like to see it make people despise painting until something else will make photography unbearable."[24] Almost all the artists Foster endorses are involved in photographic quotation; one can, indeed, regard photography as a means of quoting the world without understanding it—mechanically reproducing it. (Other artists, like Jenny Holzer and Gretchen Bender, are involved in parody without appropriation, or rather, parody without the superficial displacement achieved by appropriation, only with its veneer. Still others use the drastic displacement of the pun, which only superficially involves appropriation.) Photography, which was once regarded as something less than art, now seems to dominate art, as both method and end. A good deal of art is based upon photographic means. Has the time come to despise photography? This is I think one of the questions implicit in the new Expressionism, which tends, when it uses photography or photographic-like material (as in Kiefer), to subsume and subvert it, rather than allow it free play—rather than trust in the appearances it mediates. The new Expressionism in part is a response to the fact that photography has made itself unbearable.

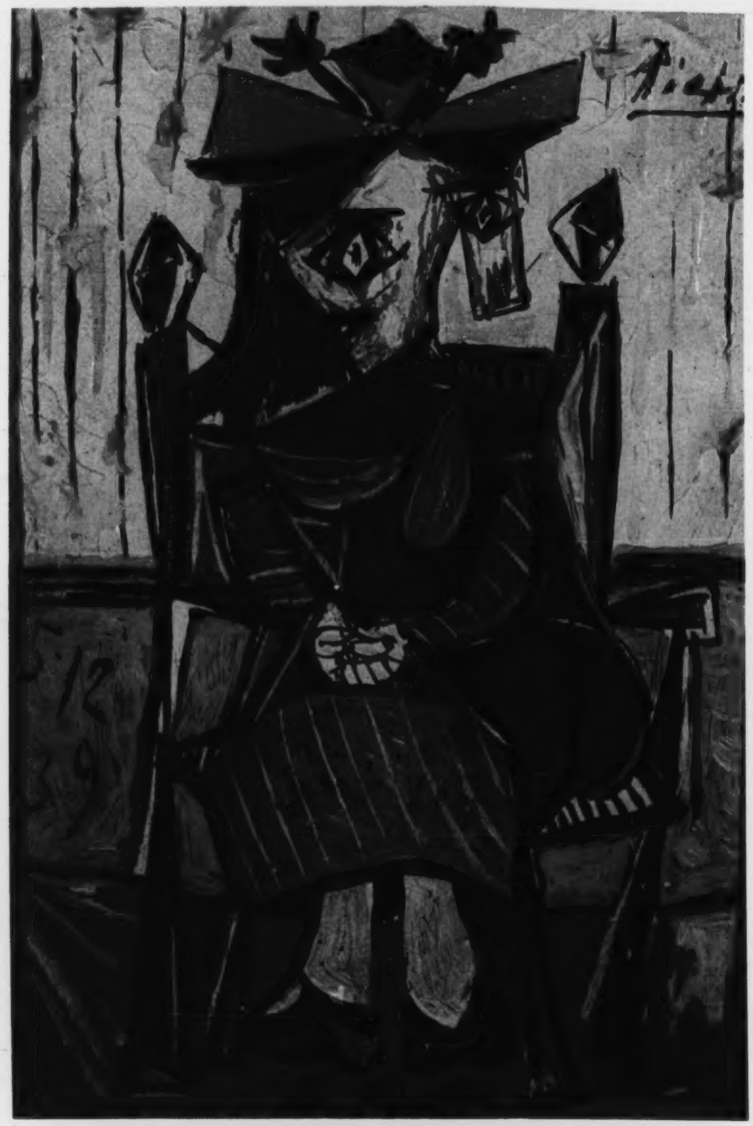
But it is not just because photography has strong physical presence in art that it may be despicable—the enemy of the imagination Baudelaire thought was central to art (and the discussion of which in the Salon of 1859 he prefaced by an attack on photography). Rather, it is the symbol of our paranoia—our overexposure to and sense of being victimized by the world. It is as though we live in a society half of whose members are busy photographing every move of the other half (until all moves are reduced to typicality), much as in totalitarian societies half the members are said to spy on the other half (with all roles reversible). (The experience of paranoia re-asserts the dialectic between individual and society which Foster thinks is dead, conveys the alienation which he thinks does not exist, because we have all become "rationalized"—socially instrumental. This is a good example of the way "moderne" theory denies experience.)

It reminds us that we are all watched by Big Brother, overly visible or easily made visible, "exposed" for what we are through photographic reproduction—which makes limitless claims over all appearances, is a limitless source of "true" appearance. Duchamp originally praised photography as a way of dismissing, or rather transcending, the physical side of painting. Photography became a source of "freedom" from the physical, generated the possibility of a "philosophical outlook"—of an art "at the service of the mind."[25] Photography is no longer intellectually liberating, a means of philosophical revelation. Its pervasiveness—popularity—masks the paranoid impasse to which it has brought the mind, in the service of a "totalizing" society. It is social criticism, not only Baudelairean esthetic criticism, that may lead us to reject photography—for the kind of "significance" (and insignificance) it creates.

VOL
71
1
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

VIVIAN HORAN

40 EAST 62ND STREET NEW YORK NEW YORK 10021 TELEPHONE 212-935-1682
BY APPOINTMENT ONLY



PABLO PICASSO
FEMME DANS UN FAUTEUIL
OIL ON BOARD
SIGNED AND DATED
8 3/4 X 6 IN. (22 X 15.5 CM.)
ZERVOS IX, #372

OTHER WORKS BY BALTHUS / A. MARTIN / OLDENBURG / F. STELLA / TWOMBLY

Expressionism on one level is the effort to transcend the photographic state of mind, and achieve a new philosophical outlook, a new freedom of understanding. It is resistance against everything that photography stands for, including the mechanistic society. This resistance has been called escapist by Foster,[26] and therapeutic by Owens,[27] but it is the art of quotation, photographic Minimalism, that is escapist and soothing, with its parasitic reliance on an "enemy" intelligence. It uses other art like an ostrich hole, to flee the problems of its own experience. The freedom and philosophicality one can scratch out of quotation is severely limited; one cannot make either an emotional or intellectual living out of it. Freud spoke of us living beyond our emotional means; the quoters have little or none, intellectually as well as emotionally. They turn to their artistic superiors for their means, and for therapy. By beating the quotation drum until they—and we—are deaf, they avoid facing what the Expressionists have at last recognized: that imaginative transformation is the source of freedom, and of a critical, philosophical outlook in art—not physicality, not quotation which reduces to and stays on a physical level.

The Expressionists have made painting once again restless, the sign of unsettled, disturbed desire, in a way that photography—which has taught the voyeur and the paranoid to endure one another, and realize they are shadow and substance—cannot. Photography in fact gives appearances a stability which completely belies our situation, and our critical resistance to it. The new Expressionism may exist to get us out of the frozen state of photography, the deep freeze it has put us all into. Appropriation and parody are not critical freedom; they are the signs of our paralysis, or at best a tic within our catatonia. Expressionist restlessness—which is not the same as insistence on the unmediated (and it is stupid to think it is)—may be familiar to us from earlier painting, but it has re-arisen under new conditions, and to a critical end which, however familiar, remains viable. For it serves the task of art, which is not to encourage revolution but endurance. Even modern art's supposed subversiveness exists to remind us of what Freud called "the first duty of all living beings": "to endure life." It is the new Expressionism, not the officially radical—ironical, transgressive, deconstructive, sophisticated—art that is critical, a powerful resistance to art's and our own somnambulist attitude of "abstraction."

2. Art as Language

The article by Hal Foster is an extreme example of the linguistic fallacy in art—the assumption that all art is language about language, the best of it a self-deconstructing language. The by now overworked idea that language determines thought, including art-thought, leads to the idea that language is not simply "second nature," but primordial nature. For Freud, art had a natural experiential function, as a substitute gratification. Whether one agrees with this interpretation is secondary; the key point is that art is part of natural experience. For the "modernes" it is part of socio-linguistic experience, a circling in of the linguistic upon its socially determined self. Owens's (misused) notion of " 'compulsion to repeat' " in our decade[28] is the result of this idea of a linguistic "soul" to art, its lack of "naturalness." Modernist art is constantly looking for ways to transgress its own language, to at once renew its language and prove its validity as modernist. Its forced transgressions become more and more futile, as one realizes that language becomes used up—goes only as far as experience.

Expressionist restlessness has re-arisen under new conditions, and to a critical end which remains viable. For it serves the task of art, which is not to encourage revolution, but endurance.

The escape from this linguistic trap is the recognition that there is an unconscious component in art, that it is not all a matter of conscious language. Certainly the unconscious is socialized and is social in origin—we didn't need Lacan to tell us that (Sartre's existential psychoanalysis and various Marxist psychoanalysts have long since told us that)—but it still has "natural effect," by which I mean that it works organically (viscerally, emotionally). (Owens's silly, supercilious parroting of Lacan, turning him into an oracle, is another example of Owens's fashionable "radicalism." Radicalism must become oracular—authoritarian—these days to hold its own; it becomes (pseudo) pre-Socratic to avoid Socratic discourse.) Expressionism reminds us that this is one way art works, one of the things that gives it power over us. The expressive fallacy may not be the full answer to the linguistic fallacy, but it reminds us that art is natural to us, part of our developement and self-articulation. Foster tells us that the "self is a fiction,"[29] as if this was a revelation the expressionists could not begin to comprehend. (And as if it was not a useful fiction-construct.) But they have gone him one step better: they have shown us nature and expression as fictions, myths, in order to recover them. This is a dialectical demonstration, not a shallow strategy of negation. It is Foster's linguistic artists, with their specious intricacies of quotation, with their slight changes in the syntax of display, that show a " 'frustrated, defeated consciousness' " trying "to cover up its own negativity'."[30] For they have the "entranced, distracted naiveté"[31] of believing that art is all language, a socio-linguistic game. They suffer from linguistic solipsism.

3. Style vs. Content

We have already discussed the issue of psychosocial content, in conjunction with the linguistic fallacy used to repress it, and the idea of art as "natural expression"—mythical natural expression. It is enough here to point out Owens's distorted reading and misuse of Freud to understand what Owens imagines to be today's Expressionist mentality. (For example, the artist's "kingliness" has to do with the "poetry" of the Oedipal complex—a symbolic living of it—not social delusions of grandeur. Also, Owens's argument about the schizophrenic symptoms in the new Expressionism has the same lack of cogency—as arguments about El Greco's diseased eyes and van Gogh's insanity. It is part of the same fraudulent demystifying and intolerance of expressionism, which is repeatedly the victim of this kind of thinking. Why not call the reductivists repressed neurotics, even psychotics out of touch with reality?)

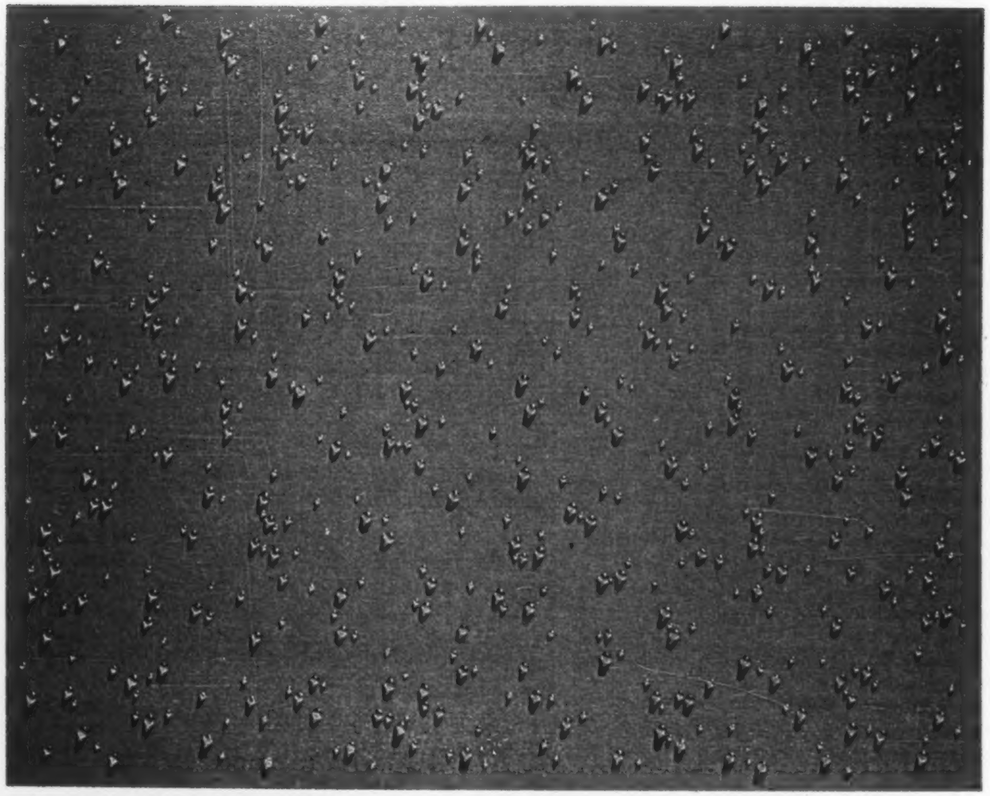
In Civilization and Its Discontents Freud regards art as, psychologically, an "auxiliary construction," a "palliative remedy" in a life which always has "too much pain, too many disappointments, impossible tasks." Art is a way of "guarding against pain" by "sublimation of the instincts," rather than their repression.[32] When Freud collapses the distance between artist and spectator by asserting, as Owens quotes, that "the precondition of enjoyment is that the spectator should himself be neurotic,"[33] he is continuing his psychoanalytic demonstration of the way "the supposed gulf between normal and pathological . . . was narrowed."[34] What Owens does is take the neurotic frustration that can result from socialization through repression as the frustration that results from social dominance and read it as the core of the new Expressionism: it articulates a general social frustration, "frustration as a permanent state."[35] This is all done in the name of Lacan, who supposedly alone has taught us that desire is lack, and a social product. Today's Expressionist artist articulates permanent social frustration—permanent suffering—in a world with a capitalist power structure. This has the theoretical advantage of evoking primordial lack or passion, the practical disadvantage of paralyzing our capacity to act to change the power structure.

This seems to give the new Expressionism a profound if unlovely content, but it does just the opposite. Owens reads new Expressionism as a stylization—hypostatization—of frustration. That means the neutralization of Expressionism's disruptive ("expressive") character—which is its way of thrusting content at us. An abstract feeling is used to replace a concrete handling and content, including a handling which is content. Expressionism's "aggression" consists in its

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

TSCHANG-YEUL KIM

NEW PAINTINGS
APRIL 12 TO MAY 7, 1983



Waterdrop Series 1982, 71 x 90½"

STAEMPFLI

47 EAST 77 STREET NEW YORK, N.Y. 10021
Tel. 212/535-1919

insistence upon content, not in its stylish manipulation or formalization of an idealized attitude or feeling. This content is particular, but Owens refuses this particularity in his eagerness to make it symptomatic, and view it in terms of a set understanding of the world. It is thus necessarily stylized, to make it more readily symptomatic. It is read as a package rather than a content, a pure container rather than an impure content, for that makes it more uniform, more ideologically assimilable.

That the Expressionist artist might actually be struggling with a content, and that this content might not be easily grasped or manipulated, never occurs to Owens. He must see the content "formally," as an easily legible surface. He cannot imagine that the Expressionist "style" is really not that, but the sign of a struggle with content. It is not imposed from the past, nor is it entirely symptomatic of an ideology; it is the form of uncertainty of content, of the difficult existence of and difficult, problematic relation to content. It is that difficult content, not its ideological predestination, that is the source of the truly radical otherness, outsiderness, of Expressionism. Owens cannot acknowledge the unassimilable nature of Expressionist content because he has an old-fashioned epistemological approach, which insists that the work come to us as reducible to its objectness—all that we can "objectively" or literally know about it. The expressionist image provides a (psychological) surplus beyond the object which the epistemological attitude cannot even begin to fathom, denying as it does the object's unconscious effect.

By reading the new Expressionism strictly as an updated, borrowed style, as well as an ideological symptom—the two conveniently fit together in the same system—all three critics negate it as a content. Neither its gestural method nor themes are seen as particular content but as general, mechanically given forms to be inhabited by ideological ghosts—puppets with ideological strings attached. The psychodynamic character of the art and its content is replaced by a commissar's concern for its correct thinking. All three critics grill it, cross-examine it, expecting it to confess to its crimes, to criticize itself. They have put the new Expressionism in a show trial, using everything that it says about itself as proof of their original negative, ideologically-grounded judgment of it, which precludes any content analysis.

Owens's allegorical-ideological reading of Sandro Chia's The Idleness of Sisyphus is predetermined. Among the notions that are pre-read into the picture are Buchloh's Marxian understanding of the clown.[36] All kinds of content are ignored, above all the rich surface of the work, as precarious as the figure and the picture's sharp contrast of shapes. The tragicomic aspect of the picture is frowned upon, as an unenlightened attitude, an inappropriate response to power, domination. Thus the content is foreshortened by fixed expectations from it—on the basis of "moderne" theory.

4. The Progress Problem

The last point can be quickly dealt with. Just as our "radical" critics ignore the fact that the new Expressionism is an aggressive presentation of content—neutralizing both presentation and content by reading them as style and ideology (the language of false freedom)—so they expect art to progress rather than regress. This is because they do not realize that the issue is neither its progression or regression, but its serviceability. When T. S. Eliot calls our attention away from the Romantic to the Metaphysical poets (Foster probably thinks he is doing something similar), the key point is that they are now more serviceable to us than the Romantics. But the situation can reverse. Nothing is immune from re-evaluation, in terms of serviceability, and neither the present nor the future are guaranteed any modes of art uniquely appropriate to them. All three critics assume there is some appropriately "progressive" contemporary mode of art, suitable to the "progressive" aspect of the present—particularly revelatory of the present and pointing to the future. This is necessarily, by modernist assumptions, a self-enlightened as well as enlightening art.

Has the time come to despise photography? The new expressionism in part is a response to the fact that photography has made itself unbearable.

This is patently absurd, manifestly nonsense. The assumptions do not help us understand why all the arts do not flourish powerfully at all times, i.e., are not always "contemporary." They do not help us understand why at a certain time a certain mode of art seems more contemporary if less progressive or "radical" than another. Modernism assumes a certain inevitability about the development of art that seems to imply that art is the most appropriate mode of social articulation, and has some privileged articulateness. There is a whole baggage of empty ideas accompanying the search for a "progressive" ("advanced") art as well as the belief in the progress of art. All three critics have a certain idea of a "forward-looking" art; Expressionism is set up as the necessarily "backward-looking" art against which forward-looking art can rebound—which it can despise, and so encourage itself. When one looks at the content of this forward-lookingness, this current art of piercing contemporaneity and startling revelation and relevance, one finds at best an old wit whose nastiness has worn out and a kind of Lumpen-revelation of a limited truth. One finds, in other words, the breakdown into traditional ideas and ideologies, cliché images and mythologies, shopworn styles and attitudes, that the new Expressionism is supposed to show. But this traditionally radical moderne art has less urgency than the new Expressionism brings to its content, and therefore with less truth in its revelation and relevance. It is clearly the "radical" critics who are conservative in attitude and expectations, not the new Expressionists. ☐

---

1. Sigmund Freud, "The Resistances to Psychoanalysis" (1927), Character and Culture, ed. Philip Rieff, New York, Collier Books, 1963, p. 260.
2. Freud, p. 259.
3. Carter Ratcliff, "The Short Life of the Sincere Stroke," Art in America, Jan. 1983, p. 76.
4. Hal Foster, "The Expressive Fallacy," Art in America, Jan. 1983, p. 82.
5. Freud, p. 259.
6. Freud, p. 260.
7. Freud, pp. 259, 260.
8. Freud, p. 259.
9. Michael Fried, Absorption and Theatricality, Painting and Beholder in the Age of Diderot, Berkeley, University of California Press, 1980, p. 5.
10. Ratcliff, pp. 79, 73.
11. Craig Owens, "Honor, Power and the Love of Women," Art in America, Jan. 1983, p. 13.
12. Foster, p. 83.
13. Fried, p. 5.
14. Ratcliff, p. 76.
15. Owens, p. 11.
16. Foster, p. 83.
17. Fried, p. 5.
18. Freud, p. 262.
19. Ratcliff, p. 76.
20. Benjamin H. D. Buchloh, "Parody and Appropriation in Francis Picabia, Pop, and Sigmar Polke," Artforum, March 1982 pp. 28–34.
21. David Deitcher, "Lichtenstein's Expressionist Takes," Art in America, Jan. 1983, p. 84.
22. Victor H. Miesel, "Introduction," Voices of German Expressionism, Englewood Cliffs, N. J., Prentice-Hall, 1970, p. 1.
23. Miesel, p. 3.
24. Quoted in Douglas Crimp, "The End of Painting," October, Spring 1981, p. 75.
25. Marcel Duchamp, "Painting. . .at the Service of the Mind" (1946), Theories of Modern Art, ed. Herschel B. Chipp, Berkeley, University of California Press, 1968, p. 394.
26. Foster, p. 80.
27. Owens, p. 13.
28. Ibid.
29. Foster, p. 82.
30. Foster, p. 137.
31. Ratcliff, p. 137.
32. Sigmund Freud, Civilization and Its Discontents, London, Hogarth Press, 1930, pp. 25, 33.
33. Owens, p. 7.
34. Sigmund Freud, "Psychoanalysis" (1922), Character and Culture, ed. Philip Rieff, New York, Collier Books, 1983, p. 236.
35. Owens, p. 9.
36. Benjamin H. D. Buchloh, "Figures of Authority, Ciphers of Regression: Notes on the Return of Representation in European Painting," October, Spring 1981, p. 53.

[Hal Foster, Craig Owens and Carter Ratcliff will reply in the May issue. —Ed.]

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
A P 1983
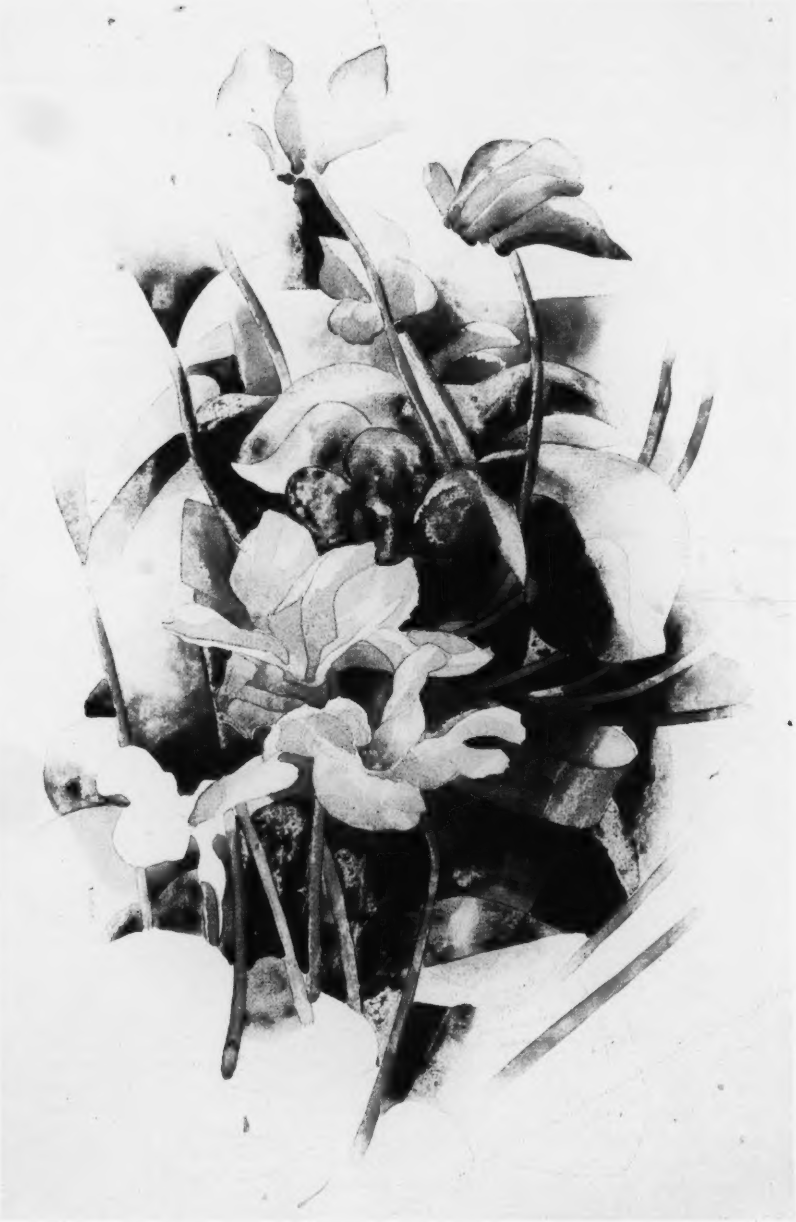
UMI



Charles Demuth
Red Cyclamen
Watercolor, 18½ x 12½ inches Signed, dated and inscribed C. Demuth 1928
Lancaster, Pa., lower right center

JAMES MARONEY incorporated

129a East 74th Street, New York, N.Y. 10021 (212) 879-2252
Church Street, Roxbury, CT 06783 (203) 354-6783

Review of Books

MONOGRAPHS

Frida: A Biography of Frida Kahlo, by Hayden Herrera, New York, Harper & Row, 1983; 507 pp;$21.95.

Frida Kahlo is one of the most complex and compelling of the major artists brought back to light by recent feminist scholarship, and much of the credit for her rediscovery is due Hayden Herrera, who has now written the first full-length study of this radical Imagist.

The odds against any woman painter in the predominantly "macho" societies of Latin America are obvious and seemingly overwhelming. For an artist of Kahlo's aggressively erotic and political sensibility, they were even more one-sided. And though the "Mexican Renaissance," in which she had a special place, offered her some freedoms unheard of elsewhere, the public ethic at the heart of that revival now compounds the problems of interpreting her work as much as it then informed and enriched its creation.

Muralism and the grand-manner formulas created by Orozco, Siqueiros and Diego Rivera (Kahlo's husband, mentor and betrayer) drew upon colonial realism, indigenous Indian influences, Marxism and European modernism for their strengths; the resulting style garnered the steadfast support of both the international left and Mexico's postrevolutionary bourgeoisie. However skeptical we may now be of the mural movement's rhetorical devices and party-line expediencies, we must not underestimate its mass appeal, its ideological force or even the occasional heroism of its inventors—to appreciate it all one must still go to Mexico to see these paintings in context and in scale, or to the barrios of North America, where a vernacular mural movement demonstrates the lasting nationalist and polemical significance of the Mexican model. But intrinsic to muralism's programmatic aims was a critique of easel painting and of the individualistic preoccupations and market dependency of traditional studio art. With characteristic inconsistency, all three founding muralists produced a flood of small pictures, but, except for cameo appearances by comrades and lovers, little of their private worlds entered into any of their efforts, and the very idea of the personal retained its stigma.

By contrast, Kahlo's work seems at first to be almost exclusively personal in content. Crippled by a traffic accident early in life, and later tormented both by Rivera's infidelities and her own sexual ambivalence, Kahlo was a fiercely sensual person obsessed by her own physical and emotional sufferings. Her imagery is explicitly biological and indeed autobiographical to the point of total self-absorption. But if the subject of these paintings was nearly always Frida or Frida and Diego, the artist never ceased to see her private struggles in relation to a world at least as large as that of the muralists. She drew, as they did, upon a symbolic vocabulary that incorporated the native grotesques of the fiesta, the cosmic emblems of the Aztecs, a pantheon of socialist leaders, and a whole range of ironic observations of the industrial capitals of North America. But where the muralists tended to rationalize the contradictions of their experience and mask their political promiscuity or doubts by grandstanding (Orozco being the sole exception), Kahlo combined the disparate elements of her life into a raw but artful surrealism—a surrealism not motivated by the need to jar a stultifying normalcy, as was often the case with her art-world allies, but the peculiarly Hispanic surrealism which simply tries to take stock of an irrational world in a continuum of precise images.

As both straight narrative biography and critical account of Kahlo's work, Hayden Hererra's book is an example of exhaustive documentation and clear, generous, unaffected writing. Quoting frequently from Kahlo's letters and diaries, as well as from material gathered in extensive interviews with collectors, fellow artists and confidantes, Hererra is able to tell much of her story from first-hand sources. In the course of discussing the central struggles of Kahlo's life—her battle against the disintegration of both her body and her bond to Rivera, and her simultaneous emergence from the shadow of her patron/lover—Hererra reports and examines details that in some respects demystify the elaborate persona Kahlo created in her own defense.

Thus, though Kahlo's pain was real and her flamboyance natural, she subjected both to a willfully theatrical presentation. From the beginning of her marriage, Kahlo seems to have felt that she could only keep Rivera by commanding his attention, and her costumes and outspoken public manner were often chosen to that end, as were the dramatic modes in which she cast her own suffering. Hererra's attempts to distinguish artifice from reality, like her discussion of Kahlo's political conviction and protestations of naiveté, are always based on respect and informed by an underlying sympathy for the human predicament which made her manipulations necessary. Hererra is equally fair with Rivera's mythomania, and throughout she takes care to remind us of his profound attachment to Kahlo and his even greater admiration for her paintings, which he judged superior to his own. Thus the specific connections Hererra draws between Kahlo's motivations and her work in no way diminish the power of those images; if anything they make them more remarkable. Moreover, she supplements her close psychological analysis of the pictures with what amounts to a concise guide to the iconography of popular Mexican art, and in combination these two readings testify to Kahlo's natural affinity for her folk sources even as it becomes clear that her use of them was critically self-conscious—indeed, she often disguised the sophistication of her inventions.

Hererra's book offers a fully realized portrait of the artist and her world, and unlike many writers who have written biographies of artists for a general readership, Hererra never allows picturesque events or settings to distract from her true subject, which is the importance and originality of the Kahlo achievement.

At the same time, it must be said that Hererra steers clear of some polemical issues suggested by the information she presents. She makes no attempt to gauge Kahlo's success in transcending that schema of sexually linked polarities which opposes interior to exterior, and biological to cultural or social—an important omission, it would seem, since Kahlo's work would be less subject to dismissal as "personal" and therefore "marginal" if it were agreed she succeeded in even a partial synthesis of these dichotomies. Such questions are raised directly in the catalogue essays by Laura Mulvey and Peter Wollen for the Whitechapel/Grey Gallery exhibition "Frida Kahlo and Tina Modotti" [see pp. 160-169], and in a sense those texts serve as a bridge between Hererra's in-depth study of Kahlo as an individual and the wider debate over the direction of feminist art—indeed, of political art in general. Such cavils aside, however, Hererra deserves credit not only for establishing Kahlo's independent position in art history, but also for providing the factual grounds on which the ensuing political debate may reliably be carried out. Kahlo clearly belongs at its center. —Robert Storr

PHOTOGRAPHY

The Rare Art Traditions: The History of Art Collecting and Its Linked Phenomena, by Joseph Alsop, New York, Harper & Row, 1982; 691 pp., $59.95.

Collecting and Care of Fine Art, by Carl David, New York, Crown, 1981; 148 pp., $10.

The Complete Guide to Collecting Art, by Lee Rosenbaum, New York, Alfred A. Knopf, 1982; 264 pp., $17.50.

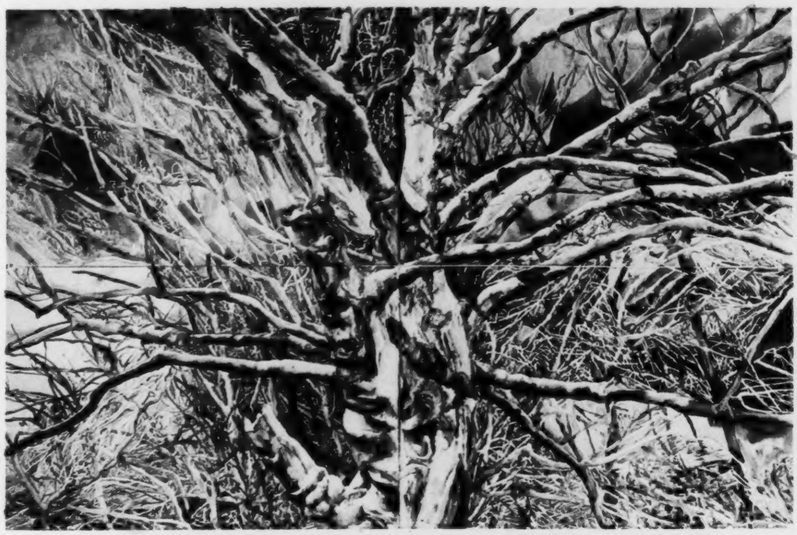
It took Joseph Alsop 18 years to complete The Rare Art Traditions, a scholarly feat that would seem daring in these distracting times if he hadn't so clearly enjoyed himself. This "essay," as Alsop rather elegantly describes his book, is the first scholarly history of art collecting (and related phenomena) ever published, containing almost 700 pages of text, over 2,500 footnotes and 1,500 bibliographical entries. Lacking any real predecessors or "best authorities to consult," Alsop simply followed wherever his passion for art and his journalist's instinct led him; in the process he has assembled an impressive collection of stories about art and attitudes towards it.

Somewhat less impressive is the theory he has constructed to house that collection. Alsop proposes that only five cultures—the ancient Classical world, Islam, China, Japan and the post-Renaissance West—have developed an analytic sense of history, which in turn has given rise to a historical view of art. The resulting cultural behavior pattern, according to Alsop, has certain "by-products" which distinguish the rare art tradition, principally: art collecting (as opposed to art patronage and treasure gathering); analytic art documentation (as represented by art magazines, art historical studies and art criticism, for instance); and an art market. (Alsop warns gloomily that today's "super prices," though not a "uniquely modern or Western phenomenon," are "morbid symptoms.")

It must be said that some of the cultural assumptions on which Al-

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

PATRICIA TOBACCO FORRESTER
Watercolors

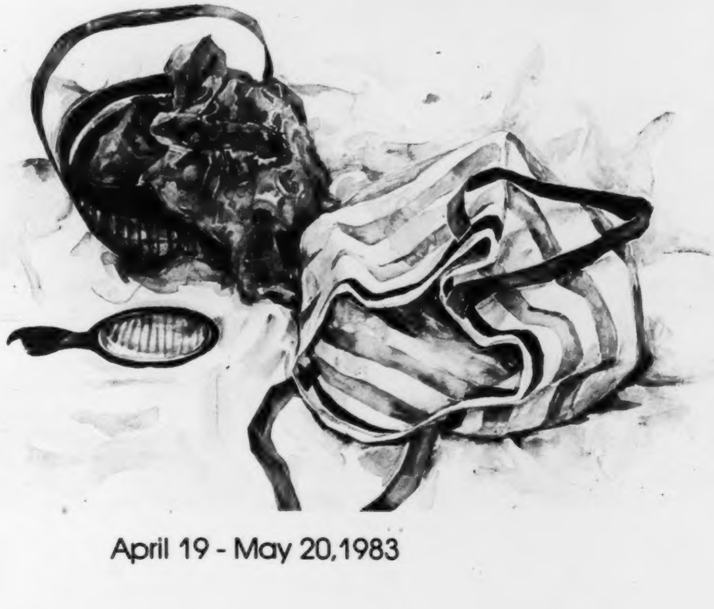


"Winter Beech" 52" x 80½"

April 19 - May 20, 1983

William
Sawyer
Gallery 3045 Clay Street • San Francisco, CA 94115 • (415) 921-1600 • Tues-Sat 11-6

POLLY KRAFT
Watercolors



"Mexican Bag with Hand Mirror" 25" x 40"

April 19 - May 20, 1983

William
Sawyer
Gallery 3045 Clay Street • San Francisco, CA 94115 • (415) 921-1600 • Tues-Sat 11-6

sop's proposition rests are questionable at best. If, to pick but one example, a tomb known to be crammed with valuable objects is left intact by locals for hundreds of years, does such restraint indicate, as Alsop maintains, a lack of interest in the objects as works of art, or, perhaps more plausibly, a system of values in which respect for the dead still outweighs cupidity? In spite of such weaknesses, his theory is a useful device for organizing an otherwise overwhelming mass of material, and it succeeds in prodiving valuable insights into our various relationships to art.

Alsop's style is endearingly academic—or maddeningly archaic, depending on the mood in which you approach it. Both earnest workmanship and deadpan humor can be read into his announcement that "The next chapter will attempt to provide something that does not now exist in the literature: the first precise yet comprehensive definition of art collecting." His pace is curiously uneven, slowing to offer lumbering definitions, then speeding forward, on the assumption that his readers are with him all the way. "The medieval European handbooks, like Villard de Honnecourt's famous Sketchbook, are too well known to need enumeration at this juncture," he remarks, and, later, " . . . any person with much pretence to education can recite on Cimabue and Giotto." Certainly.

In spite of my niggling objections to Alsop's grand theory and my occasional stumbles over his style, I was always absorbed, often amused and occasionally inspired by his tales of past collectors, dealers, critics, curators and artists. Anyone who has been around the contemporary art world for any time at all is likely to be acquainted, for example, with a present equivalent of Isabella d'Este. In his profile of her, Alsop quotes from her letter of January 1504 to Perugino regarding the size of a picture she wanted from him: " 'The enclosed paper with the thread wound around it gives the length of the biggest figure on M. Andrea Mantegna's pictures, close to which your own will hang. The other figure behind can be of any size that you like.' "

On the other hand, collectors who sometimes feel they are considered the unworthies of the art world, all ears and checkbooks, will be heartened by the moving tale of Fra Carlo Lodoli, a Venetian priest. Early in the 18th century he formed "our art tradition's single greatest innovating collection," buying the works of Catena, Giorgione, Cimabue and Giotto from junk dealers because he couldn't afford the great masters of his day. When his chambers were robbed he reportedly said he couldn't bear to go through his stacks of pictures—it would give him too much pain to learn what was missing.

In 1964, as Alsop began work on his book, the handful of super-rich American collectors who had for years dominated the art market were finding that they had to compete for both contemporary works and less important older ones against growing numbers of newly affluent individuals with a newly developed interest in the visual arts. Collecting was soon to become a widespread mania.

Yet, surprisingly, since the 17th century, when a manual by Giulio Mancini offered advice on how collectors could distinguish the works of masters from copies, fakes and studio exercises, there have been few specific guides to successful collecting. Then, in 1981, came Carl David's Collecting and Care of Fine Art and, last year, The Complete Guide to Collecting Art, by Lee Rosenbaum. David opens his short, easy-to-read book with "How to Learn About Art," citing art journals as well as suggesting libraries, local university courses and auctions. Much of the other information he offers is similarly basic, apparently aimed at the most inexperienced collector. A dealer himself, he is most interesting when offering tips on "Deals To Avoid" or when discussing money and financing; he even makes a point of giving examples of prices, though admittedly such information is quickly out of date in a volatile market. He is no less specific in his investment suggestions, recommending such works by lesser known artists of the American Barbizon School as Hugh Bolton Jones, Homer Martin and Alexander Wyant—though again, a "good buy" in 1981 may now be an overpriced fashion. There is also a helpful list of recommended galleries and museums across the U.S.

Having advised his readers to collect art for "sensual and intellectual enjoyment" before all else, David then opts out of discussing contemporary art, as he believes "it is simply too soon to predict accurately future trends regarding long-term investment." Somewhat hollowly, he promises collectors who do their homework a "rare and fulfilling enrichment" in their lives.

Like David, Lee Rosenbaum cautions that "only love of art and devotion to its study" can make a brilliant art collector out of an art buyer, and she claims to offer the "nuts and bolts information needed." In workmanlike fashion she covers all the details, from choosing a "category," approaching a dealer for the first time and negotiating a lower price for a painting, to getting rid of a "mistake," bidding at auction, choosing a restorer and dealing with the IRS. Unlike David, she has special knowledge of contemporary art, having served variously as an associate editor of Art News, editor of Art Letter and managing editor of the ARTnewsletter, and accordingly, she has written a whole chapter on the subject.

Whenever possible, and often unnecessarily, Rosenbaum quotes from relevant "authorities," collectors such as Dorothy and Herb Vogel, Richard Brown Baker, Paul Singer, Ben Heller, Eugene and Barbara Schwartz, as well as dealers, museum curators, auction house directors and critics galore. Occasionally the material comes to life, as when she gossips about Joseph Hirshhorn's bargaining habits or makes a specific suggestion. "An admirer of van Gogh might never obtain that artist's work, but might easily afford a painting by Adolphe Monticelli, the French colorist of whom van Gogh once wrote, 'Altogether I am obliged to lay the colors on thick in Monticelli's way. Sometimes I think I really am a continuation of that man.' "

If you can pick your way through all the superfluous quotes, there is much useful information and good advice here. Even experienced collectors may need to be reminded that the "trick of art collecting is to get people to offer you their best," just as they may not know how to beat the crowd when an artist they like has a show coming up, or whether they can pay for more expensive work in installments, or what a "global reserve" is.

Amazingly enough, considering that she is a journalist, Rosenbaum fails to mention in her list of material she considers useful to collectors any of the art magazines and journals currently available. Nor does she offer even a short list of galleries or museums, let alone give any indication of what one could expect to see in them. One problem with Rosenbaum's Complete Guide to Collecting Art is that it isn't complete. But, more importantly, like David's Collecting and Care of Fine Art, her book makes the formation of a good art collection seem easy, a matter of knowing the right moves. Those who read Alsop will know that isn't true. —Doris Saatchi

Contributors

Robert Storr is a painter and critic.

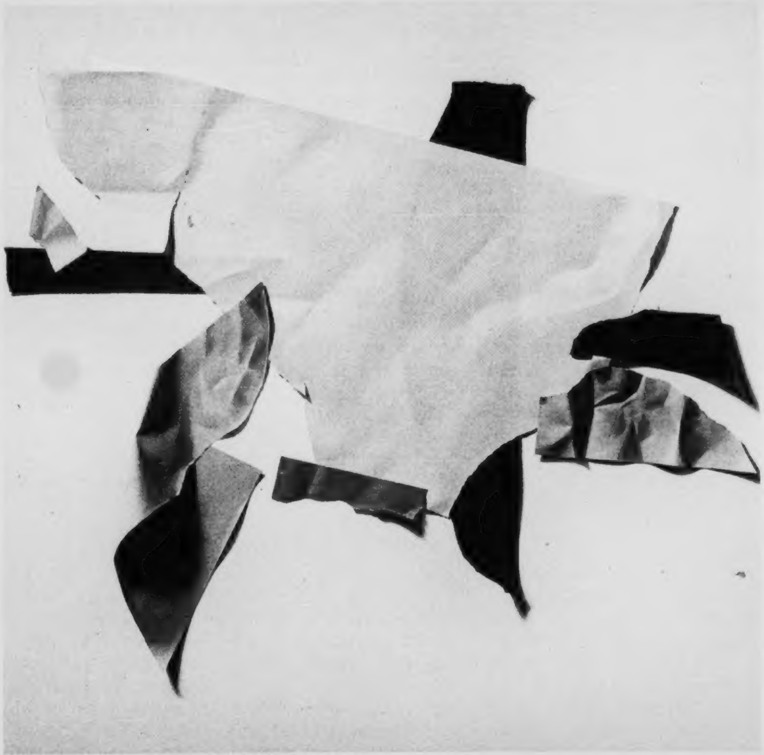
Doris Saatchi is a collector who writes on art.

PRIME EVIDENCE:

Exhibit A

233 E. Ontario Street Chicago, Illinois 60611 312-944-1748

VOL 71
ISS 4
AP 1983
UMI



"Artificial Papers," 1982, 39 x 39 inches

Yrjö Edelmann

Trompe L'oeil Paintings and Graphics

March 30
through April 23

LILLIAN HEIDENBERG GALLERY
50 WEST 57 STREET
NEW YORK CITY 10019
(212)586-3808

valerie jaudon
new paintings • april 7-30

sidney janis
110 W. 57th St., N.Y.

New Caledonia 1982 oil/canvas 36 x 36"

SCULPTURE
OF THE 40'S AND 50'S

APRIL 26-MAY 23

JOHN CHAMBERLAIN
HERBERT FERBER
PETER GRIPPE
DAVID HARE
IBRAM LASSAW
SEYMOUR LIPTON
THEODORE ROSZAK
DAVID SMITH
RICHARD STANKIEWICZ

724 FIFTH AVENUE
MONDAY-SATURDAY 10-5:30

LARGE-SCALE WORKS:
521 WEST 57 STREET
TUESDAY-SATURDAY 1-5

ZABRISKIE

724 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK
521 WEST 57 STREET, NEW YORK
37 RUE QUINCAMPOIX, PARIS

American Indian
African and Oceanic Art

Classic Navajo pictorial child's blanket, circa 1870-75, ravelled, recarded and handspun yarn, cochineal red, indigo blue and green, 49½ x 28½ inches.

Auction:
Friday, April 29 at 10:15 am and 2 pm and Saturday, April 30 at 10:15 am.

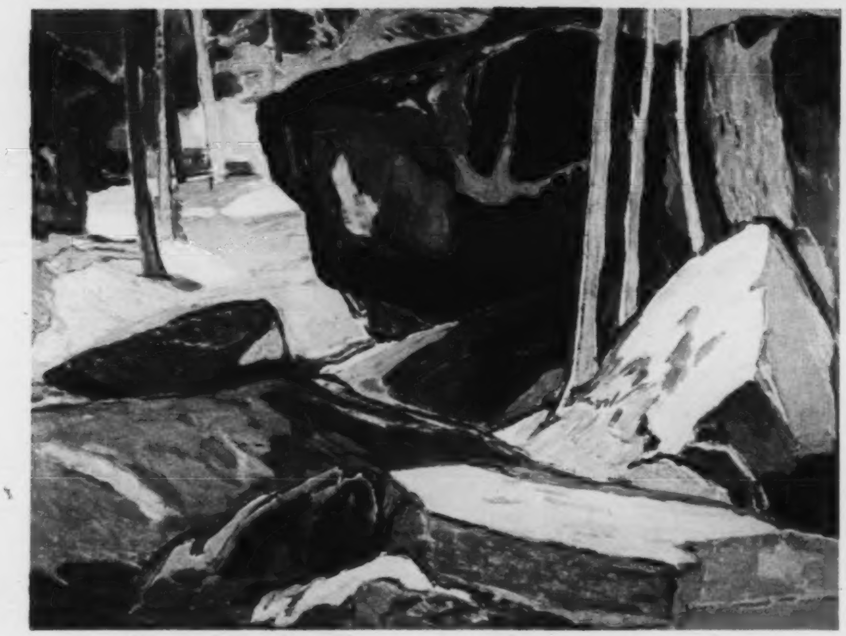
Exhibition opens Saturday, April 23.
Illustrated catalogue available for $12 at our galleries, $14 by mail. To order, send your check to Sotheby's Subscriptions, Dept. A036ME, P.O. Box 4020, Woburn, MA 01801. For further information about this sale, or for a confidential appointment to discuss selling at upcoming auctions, please call Ellen Napiura at (212) 472-3521. Sotheby Parke Bernet Inc., 1334 York Avenue at 72nd Street, New York, N.Y. 10021

SOTHEBY'S
Founded 1744

VOL 71
ISS 4
AP 1983
UMI



Stoneforest, Oil, 44" x 58"

DAVID LUND

Paintings, Pastels
April 1983

University of Alaska, Fairbanks

represented by
Grace Borgenicht Gallery
724 Fifth Ave. New York, N.Y. 10019 (212) 247-2111

STEPHEN ANTONAKOS

April 15-May 28

BONNIER GALLERY
420 WEST BROADWAY NYC 334-8414

INDIAN RED SERIES #4, 1979. OIL ON CANVAS: 72 X 72 INCHES.

JACK TWORKOV
PAINTINGS
AND WORKS ON PAPER
1978-1982

NANCY HOFFMAN GALLERY
429 WEST BROADWAY
NEW YORK 10012

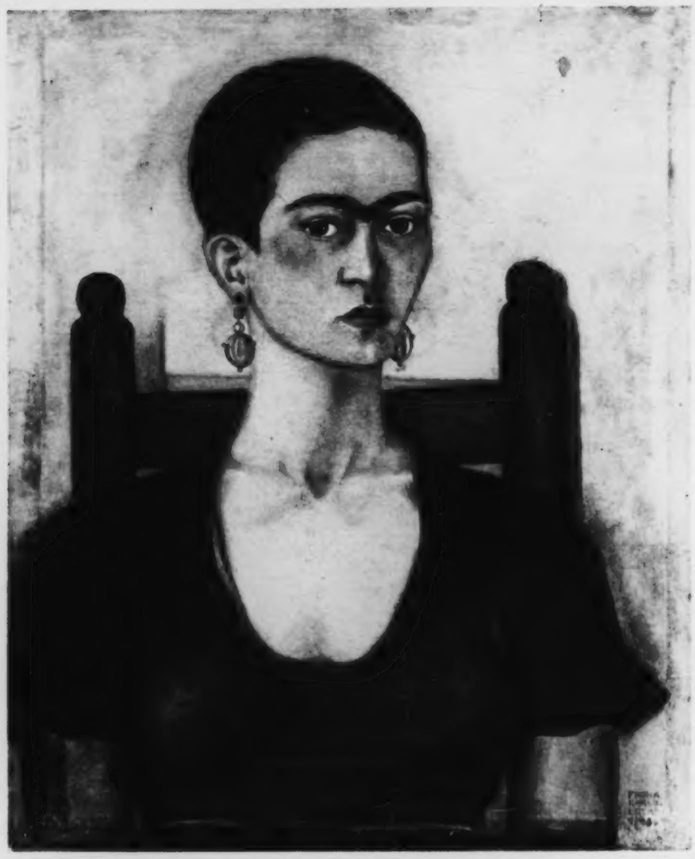
April 2 - May 7, 1983

JOSEPH RAFFAEL
Watercolors and Monotypes

HENRY MOORE
Maquettes and Drawings

RICHARD GRAY GALLERY
620 North Michigan Avenue · Chicago, Illinois 60611 · Telephone 312/642-8877

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI



FRIDA KAHLO

1907–1954

Self-Portrait, 1930
oil on canvas
26 x 22 inches (66 x 54 cm.)

Roberto White & Associates
225 Central Park West
New York City 10024
212/580·2416
Telex: 226000 ETLX-UR

by appointment only

BARBARA KRAKOW GALLERY

10 Newbury Street
5th Floor

Boston.
Massachusetts 02116

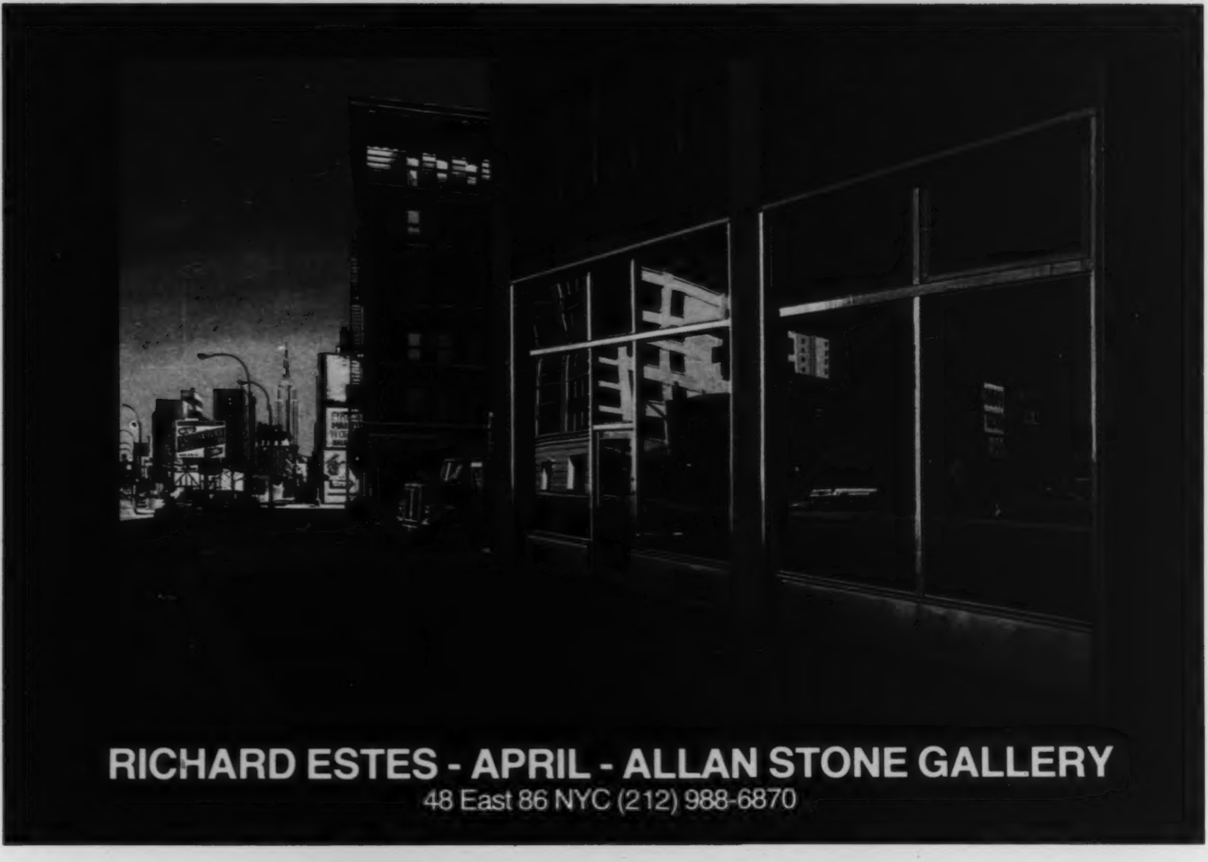
Telephone
617 262 4490

Victoria Faust Scott Hadfield

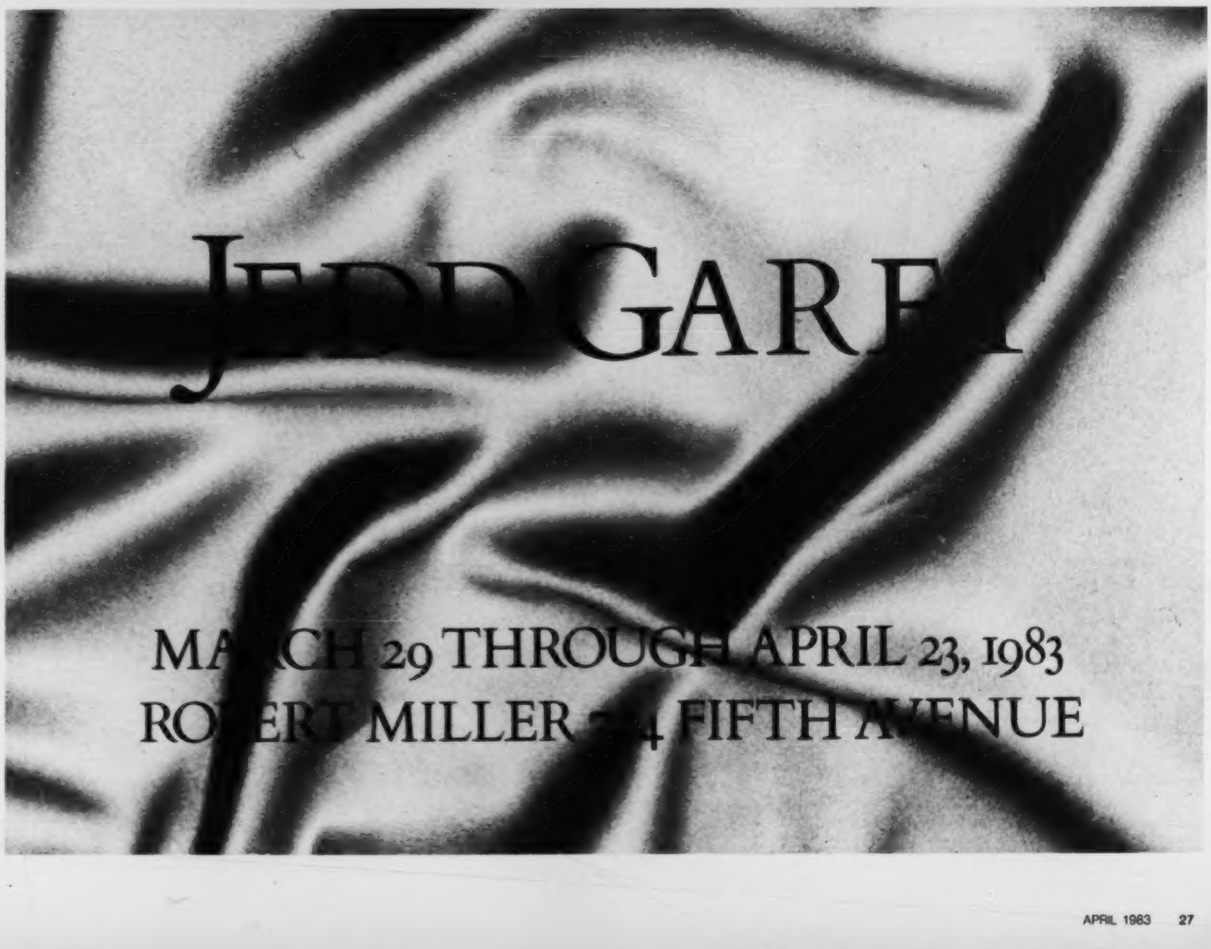
Joel Janowitz Michael Mazur Todd McKie

Flora Natapoff

Inaugural Exhibition April 1983



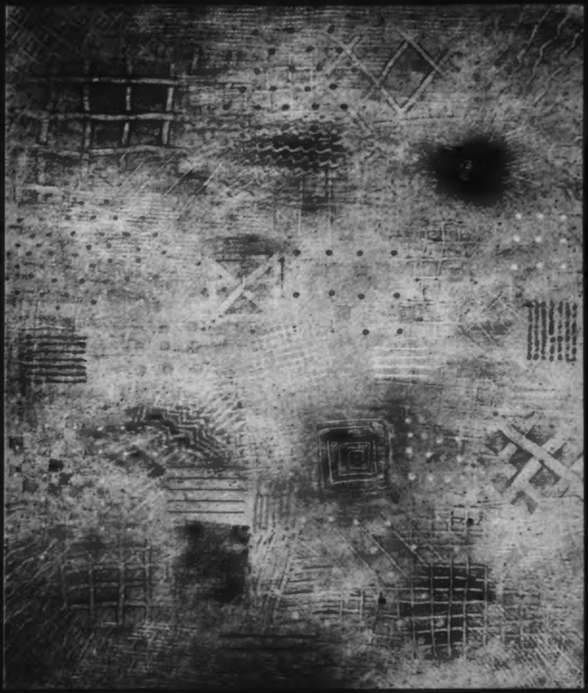
RICHARD ESTES - APRIL - ALLAN STONE GALLERY
48 East 86 NYC (212) 988-6870



JEDD GARET

MARCH 29 THROUGH APRIL 23, 1983
ROBERT MILLER 724 FIFTH AVENUE

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI



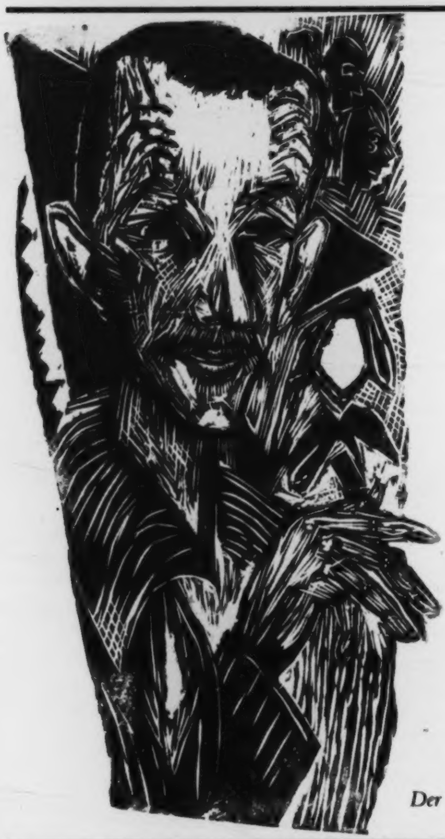
"SUBTLE BODY (50)," 1982, ACRYLIC ON CANVAS, 54 × 46 INCHES

DAVID SHAPIRO

RECENT PAINTINGS:
SUBTLE BODY SERIES

APRIL 5–30

VANDERWOUDE TANANBAUM
24 E 81 STREET/NEW YORK
212.879.8200



Der Theosoph, 1917-18, woodcut, 20¼ x 10¼ inches.

E.L. Kirchner

paintings and works on paper

APRIL 5-30

Illustrated catalogue available at $7 ppd.

Grace Borgenicht Gallery
724 Fifth Avenue New York 10019
TELEPHONE: 212/247-2111

John Moore

paintings

30 March - 20 April

HIRSCHL & ADLER Modern

851 Madison Avenue NY, NY 10021 212 744-6700

Nancy Mitchnick

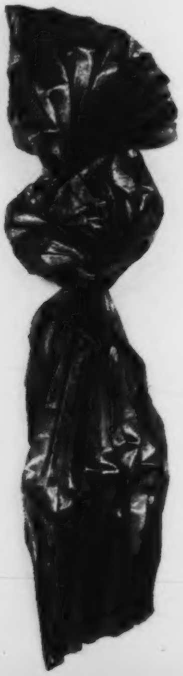
paintings

30 March - 20 April

HIRSCHL & ADLER Modern

851 Madison Avenue NY, NY 10021 212 744-6700

LYNDA BENGLIS



Alioth 1983
Bronze mesh, zinc, copper
82x23x13½"

23 MARCH - 16 APRIL 1983

MARGO LEAVIN GALLERY

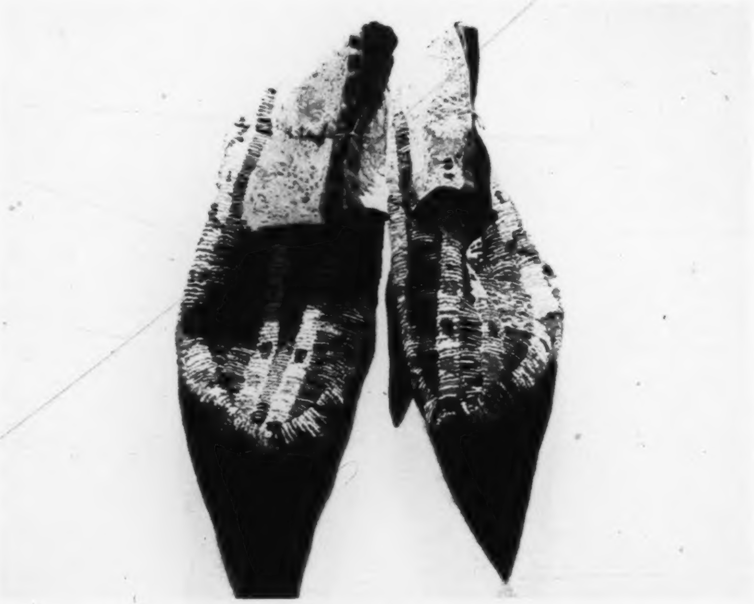
812 N ROBERTSON L.A. (213) 273-0603

Copper Shift 1982
Painted fiberglass
72x10x14½"

JOHN DUFF

VOL 7 1 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

"Moccasin Drawing #2," 1982, pastel, 32" x 40"



Charles Greer

Pastels
April 16 to May 6, 1983

ALLPORT ASSOCIATES GALLERY
1000 MAGNOLIA AVENUE, LARKSPUR, CALIFORNIA 94939 415/461-2522

INTOXICATION
Nicolas A. Moufarrege, Curator

April 9-May 7, 1983

including Kathy Acker
Nicholas Africano
Jean Michel Basquiat
Mike Bidlo
Francois Boisrond
Jonathan Borofsky
Richard Bosman
Phyllis Bramson
Tom Butter
Michael Byron
Christo
Francesco Clemente
Enzo Cucchi
Ronnie Cutrone
Victor Faccinto
Frank Faulkner
Futura 2000
Keith Haring
Peter Hujar
Alain Jacquet
Luis Jimenez
Roberto Juarez
Komar & Melamid
Robert Kushner
Justen Ladda
Thomas Lanigan Schmidt
Robert Longo
Michael McLard
Jim Nutt
Helen Oji
Ed Paschke
Jody Pinto
Rene Ricard
Judy Rifka
Don Rodan
David Salle
Lucas Samaras
David Saunders
Kenny Scharf
Alexis Smith
Duncan Smith
Jim Sullivan
Mark Tansey
Michael Tracy
Tseng Kwong Chi
Philip Tsiaras
Shari Urquhart
Alan Vega
Russ Warren
Dondi White
David Wojnarowicz and others

Monique Knowlton Gallery
▸ New Address: 153 Mercer Street, New York 10012 · Telephone (212)794-9700

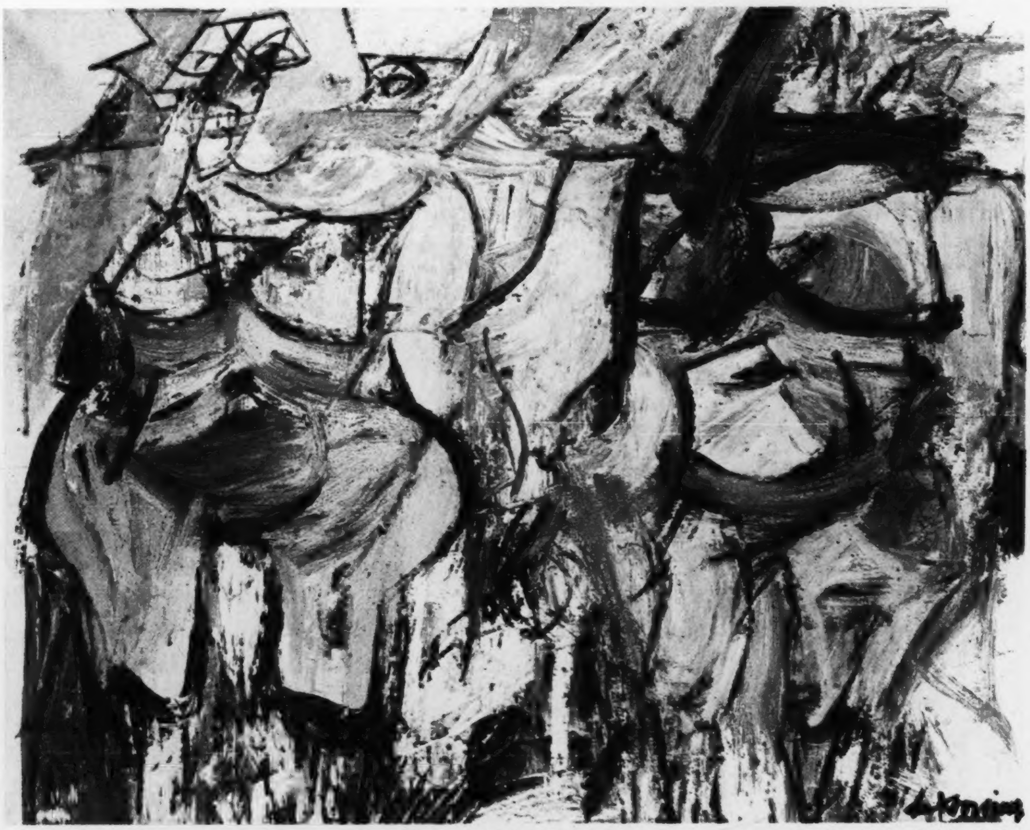
Contemporary Art from the Collection of Harriet Mnuchin Weiner
Tuesday, May 10 at 7:00 p.m.

Contemporary Art
Tuesday, May 10 at 7:45 p.m.

Contemporary Paintings, Sculpture and Jewelry
Wednesday, May 11 at 10:00 a.m.

Contemporary Drawings and Watercolors
Wednesday, May 11 at 2:00 p.m.

Viewing will be from May 6 through May 10.
For further inquiries, please contact
Martha Baer at 212/546-1168.
Admission to evening sales by ticket only.
For reservation, please contact
Lorraine Schwartz at 212/546-1128.



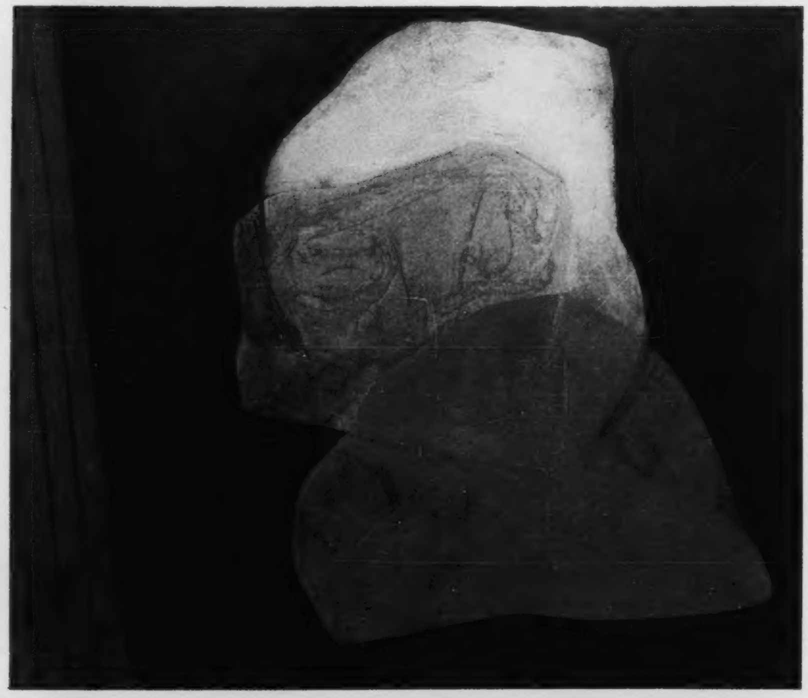
Willem de Kooning, Two women, signed—inscribed with title and dated 1955 on the stretcher—oil on canvas, 40 x 50 in. (101.5 x 127 cm.)
To be sold on May 10 at 7:00 p.m.

Christie's

502 Park Avenue, New York, New York 10022 212/546-1000

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

CLEVE GRAY
"Zen Gardens, #62" 1983
Acrylic on Canvas
60 x 70 inches



IRVING GALLERIES
332 Worth Avenue
Palm Beach, FL 33480
(305) 659-6221

JOHN WALKER

Recent Paintings / April 2 - 21

DAVID SMITH

Sculpture, Painting, Drawing / April 23 - May 12

M. Knoedler & Co.

19 East 70 Street. New York 10021. Telephone (212) 794-0550

APRIL

TUESDAY 12	Magnificent Jewels
WEDNESDAY 20	U.S. and Foreign Stamps
THUR. 21 & FRI. 22	The Troy Collection United States and Possessions, British Empire and Worldwide
FRIDAY 22	Printed and Manuscript Americana including The Declaration of Independence
SATURDAY 30	Fine French and Continental Furniture, Objects of Art, Sculpture and Tapestries

MAY

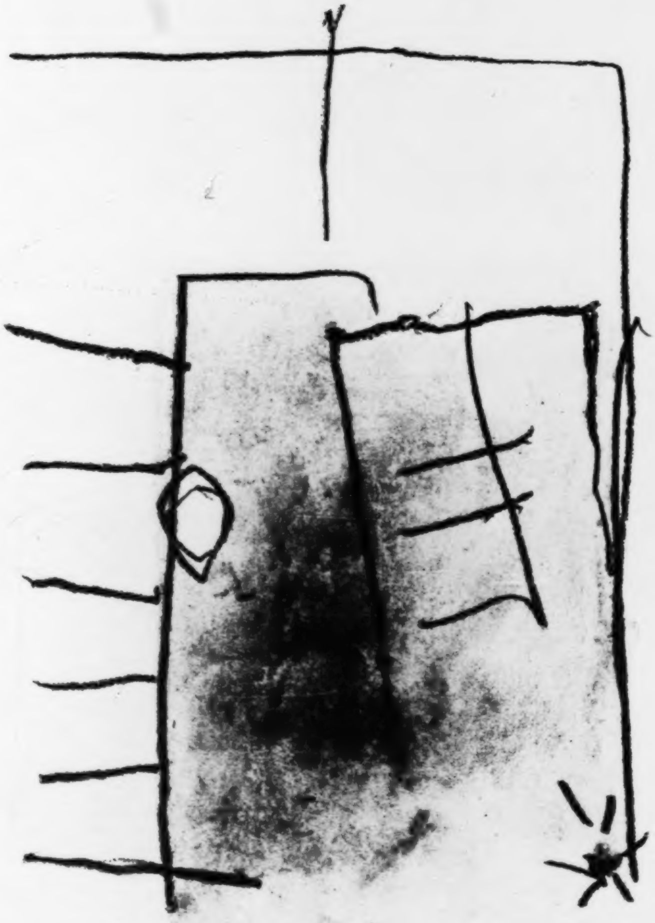
MON. 2 & TUES. 3	Old Master, Contemporary and Modern Prints
TUESDAY 10	Contemporary Art from the Collection of Harriet Mnuchin Weiner
TUESDAY 10	Contemporary Art
WEDNESDAY 11	Contemporary Paintings, Sculpture and Jewelry
WEDNESDAY 11	Contemporary Drawings and Watercolors
THURSDAY 12	18th, 19th and 20th Century Latin American Paintings, Drawings and Watercolors
TUESDAY 17	Impressionist and Modern Paintings and Sculpture
WEDNESDAY 18	Impressionist and Modern Paintings, Drawings and Sculpture
WEDNESDAY 18	Impressionist and Modern Drawings and Watercolors
THURSDAY 26	Arts and Crafts, Art Nouveau and Art Deco
THURSDAY 26	A Private Collection of Art Deco
FRIDAY 27	19th Century European Paintings

Christie's

502 Park Avenue, New York, NY 10022 212/546-1000

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

Museum Haus Lange Krefeld February 27 – April 24, 1983



Nicola De Maria is represented by Galleria Giorgio Persano, Torino

Report from Paris
Photo-Fever on the Seine

BY ALLEN ELLENZWEIG

Organized by the city of Paris, the recent "Mois de la Photo" presented a daunting variety of exhibitions: in all, about 12,000 photos were shown within six weeks.

Whether Niepce or Daguerre is credited as the father, photography is traditionally considered to have been born in France. So it might appear logical that the city of Paris has instituted a "Mois de la Photo" (Month of Photography) to be held every two years in November. In fact, the second "Mois" has just taken place. Statistics readily suggest the scope of the undertaking: 80 exhibitions, historical and contemporary, presented in 65 places and comprising about 12,000 photographs—all opening within roughly the same six weeks. Participating institutions included nearly half the municipal museums—the Petit Palais and the Musee d'Art Moderne among them—and even the estimable Grand Palais made room for an "Hommage à Alexey Brodovitch."

The rest of the festival led the viewer on what amounted to a tour of the city, from department stores to tourist sites to Paris's dozen or so photography galleries. A similar event in New York would require the participation of about a third of the city's museums, including ones in all of the five boroughs, as well as exhibition spaces booked in the World Trade Center and Macy's. But beyond the monumental scale of the undertaking, and in spite of France's reputation as the cradle of the medium, what is striking about the "Mois de la Photo" is that such a festival has been able to catch fire in the French capital at all.

The eminent Gérard Lévy, one of the most important photography collectors in France, describes the Gallic perspective neatly: "Photography, because of its material substance, because of the paper, which is a perishable thing, has always been scorned a little." He continues, "There is something else that bothers the French a lot—the number of edition copies." And it is in this context that Sherry Barbier of the Paris Zabriskie Gallery makes her rather dramatic assessment of the festival's importance: "Barriers are being broken. When I say barriers, I mean barriers to photography as an art form."

André Ostier: Balthus with Cassandre, Paris, *1953, included in "André Ostier, Photographies de Peintres et de Sculpteurs, 1941-1982" at the Musée Antoine Bourdelle, Paris.

Félix Nadar: Self-Portrait in the catacombs, *1861, included in "Le Paris Souterrain de Félix Nadar, 1861" at the Caisse Nationale des Monuments Historiques et des Sites, Paris.

The two men most responsible for this photo extravaganza are Jacques Chirac, Paris's mayor and himself a photography enthusiast, and Jean-Luc Monterosso, a Corsican by birth, who carries the official title "Le Délégué Général" of Paris Audiovisuel, a municipal organization funded by the city. Created five years ago under Chirac's benevolent hand, and falling within Paris's Department of Cultural Affairs, Paris Audiovisuel has been charged with a number of functions: the archival care of the city's rich body of photography collections; the disbursement of grants to young photographers and photographic historians; the systematic documentation of city-owned monuments and statues; the organization of large historical exhibitions; and now, since 1980, the "Mois de la Photo." Speaking with an authority that belies his youthful appearance, Monterosso states unequivocally, "When Chirac arrived as mayor, there was nothing for photography in the city of Paris. Nothing. Zero . . . . Paris had been one of the first to order photographs. They placed orders from Atget, from a hundred other photographers, they even had large photographic gatherings at the turn of the century. Then, for fifty years, nothing more."

This Rip Van Winkle time warp is evident in the present market situation. William Burke, formerly of the Ileana Sonnabend and La Remise du Parc Galleries in Paris, assesses the contemporary art and photography public in France: "There's never been a tradition of collecting among young people here, or even among the rather well-off middle-class set. . . . They have very little curiosity about the work that's being done today."

In fact, the great French photography collectors, themselves numbering barely a handful, all specialize in 19th-century material. This group includes Yvan Christ, André Jammes, Gérard Lévy, Georges Sirot and Roger Théron. Hughes Auxtexier, who with his partner François Braunschweig has a formidable 19th-century collection, also runs one of the most modern of photography galleries in Paris, Galerie Texbraun, representing such provocative contemporary talents as Robert Mapplethorpe. Auxtexier, appreciating both historical and experimental achievements, asserts with irony, "In France, they'll buy something old, almost anything, before they'll buy something contemporary." He ascribes this predisposition to the "tradition of the antique" so prevalent in Europe. And Gérard Lévy recounts the story of a museum curator who told him, " 'It's easier at the present time to create a collection of Rembrandts or Dürers than of French primitive photography.' " Meanwhile, the contemporary photography market in France is supported by a handful of Americans, Germans, even Japanese—but not the French themselves.

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

François-Xavier Bouchart:* The "Hôtel Splendide" in Evian *from the series "Marcel Proust: la figure des pays," 1971-74, at the Maison de Victor Hugo, Paris.

Without doubt, there has been increased general interest in photography in France, but a good deal of it is simply curiosity about the New, and the New of a particularly American stripe. American photographers, according to William Burke, "are always warmly received." And Jean-Luc Monterosso goes further. "It's true that you're ahead in America," he says. "You're ahead first in the market for photography, and also in the museums." By way of illustration, he observes that the photography department of the Musée d'Art Moderne was created "only six months ago"; Sherry Barbier goes a bit further, claiming that "up until now, there were no curators of photography . . . the head of the department of photography of the 19th-century museum, which [although under construction at the old Quai d'Orsay] isn't in existence yet, was sent to Princeton to study."

The extent to which American photography is "ahead" is suggested by the career professionals accorded gallery exhibitions during this second "Mois": the by-now established figures Les Krims, Harry Callahan and Lee Friedlander; the exciting newcomers Scott Macleay and Joel-Peter Witkin; and the very up-to-the-minute Deborah Turbeville. Of seven large thematic exhibitions, three revolved around American perspectives: the eccentric and catholic collection of Sam Wagstaff; the group homage by those many American and international professionals—Avedon, Irving Penn, Hiro, Brassaï, Hoynigen Huene—who contributed to Harper's Bazaar under the directing guidance of the brilliant Russian emigré and adoptive New Yorker, Alexey Brodovitch; and the first career retrospective (catalogue text by Michel Foucault!) of Duane Michals, America's Surrealist-inspired, storytelling romantic. In addition, special workshops were given by Garry Winogrand and Les Krims, and choreographer Lucinda Childs and Deborah Turbeville lent their talents to a photo-performance piece by Simone Benmussa.

As if to confirm the lack of official interference, erotic and politically sensitive pictures of all kinds were given prominence.

To be sure, the Americans did not overrun the "Mois." Perhaps in response to charges of favoritism leveled at the first festival in 1980, this second one—more than double its predecessor's size—provided nothing if not variety. Just as Chirac gave Monterosso carte blanche for his festival ideas, so Monterosso and Paris Audiovisuel allowed a free hand to the participating museums and galleries. Thus, it is for organizational, not prescriptive, reasons that the resulting exhibitions were divided into six categories: "Historical Selections," "Large Thematic Retrospectives," "International Selections," "French Selections," "Present Tendencies," and "Confrontations." As though to confirm the lack of official interference, erotic and politically sensitive pictures of all kinds were given prominence in many shows. In addition, workshops, lectures, performances and radio broadcasts—of which there were many—were grouped separately under the heading "Manifestations."

The festival's variety was daunting. French historical material was particularly well represented, in large, elegantly appointed exhibitions. There were Nadar's masterful photographs, taken under artificial light, of Paris's catacombs and sewers; Constantin Puyo's subtle and sensual Pictorialist portraits of women and the French countryside; the revelatory "pointillist" autochromes of Paris, 1910–1930, taken by the crew of documentarians hired by millionaire-savant Albert Kahn (along with important silent movies, also shown, of the same period); portraits by Étienne Carjat and Paris interiors by Atget; calotypes from the French Society of Photography and documentary prints of "Paris and the Parisians Under the Second Empire."

The historical material was not exclusively nationalist. There were shows of German avant-garde photography from the two decades following World War I, and a separate presentation of photographs taken during the Weimar Republic. There were Surrealist images from Spanish Catalonia of the '30s. And the extraordinary collection of the Empress Elisabeth ("Sissi"), the wife of Franz-Joseph I of Austria, amounted to a photographic account of 19th-century royal life and fashions, of theater personalities and international opera stars, writers, scientists, military men and politicians.

In the "Confrontations" category were included such of-the-moment presentations as "Women On the Move," a feminist group show jointly organized by the Galerie des Femmes, Paris Audiovisuel, and the Vidéothèque de Paris; and the amusing "Paris–New York/Marathon," which examined by juxtaposition the different "look" of marathon races in both cities. (The City of Paris, in collaboration with a sports publication, underwrote the commissioning of four Parisian photographers and two French photographers living in New York to cover these parallel events.)

Of course, no quick rundown of the festival's offerings can do justice to the range of experiences offered by such a mammoth event. Certain moments remain especially vivid—the discovery, for instance, of Scott Macleay's black and Jeanloup Sieff:* Death Valley, *1977, included in "Jeanloup Sieff: 30 ans de photographie" at FNAC Montparnasse, Paris.

Constantin Puyo (1857-1933): Untitled photograph included in "Puyo et la 'révolte' pictorialiste" at the Bibliothèque Forney, Paris.

white pictures of dancers in motion, which were to be found behind a black curtain near the information desk of the busy American Center, accompanied by alternately eerie and soothing piano music of Satie-like delicacy. Slowly, the spots lighting the exhibition began to fade, while in the next gallery, the lights went up to reveal the photographer's elegant Fresson color prints. "Fragments, Cycles, Sounds," as Macleay titled the overall exhibition, created an environment of such poetry that one could forget the scurrying students beyond the black curtain.

Other memories: Smack in the middle of Paris, at the FNAC center in the gargantuan Forum des Halles shopping mall, various photo-journalists' pictures of war-stricken peoples were sheltered in a small gallery off the busy audio department. While shoppers browsed through stereo equipment, cassette cartridges and tape decks, gallery-goers were confronted with the cruel suffering of peoples in the Middle East, Southeast Asia and Latin America. At the Maison Victor Hugo, wide-angle photographs of tranquil hotels and parks, of Venetian canals and Chartres Cathedral, comprised Francois-Xavier Bouchart's visual equivalents of texts from Proust's A la recherche du temps perdu. Excerpts from the magnum opus accompanied these calming images, even as the shouts of children from a nearby schoolyard, and from the large playground of the Place des Vosges, mixed the spirited present with Bouchart's and Proust's haunted past.

Paris Audiovisuel did everything possible to make both reviewer and interested observer track the scene with ease and logic. Yet there was no accounting for the rambler's logistical problems, which were inevitable. Four or five exhibitions may all have been located in the same neighborhood, but half of them opened later in the day of the morning you were there. One or two exhibitions changed their opening dates well after the schedule had been printed, so that you arrived to meet only with disappointment, and the prospect of still more lost time. Nevertheless, the organizers went to great pains. A free exhibition guide was widely distributed, providing a numbered listing of all exhibitions, their locations, nearest subway stop and daily hours of display. A numbered foldout map of Paris was also included. What's more, the organizers compiled an extensive catalogue in which every exhibition is described by its organizer, its photographer, or by a supporting critic or photography figure. These accounts are accompanied by at least one photo, and in the case of major shows, by several. These photographs, sometimes in color, supplement the verbal material and allowed the reader to judge the exhibition's individual interest in advance.

By its diversity of locations, the "Mois" invoked the Parisian tradition of the flâneur, one who takes pleasure in leisurely rambles or strolls. As Joël Brard, Paris Audiovisuel's head of publicity, pointed out, "The city becomes integrated with photography . . . with this explosion of exhibits throughout Paris, it becomes for the public a personal walking tour. . . ."

Others take exception. William Burke believes it to be "another one of those bread-and-circus affairs . . . too much, too fast; it's sort of overkill in a way." Samia Samou, of La Remise du Parc, agrees: "There are too many exhibitions." She would prefer to see the fair last during a whole season, "like the Festival d'Automne."

The ultimate effects of the "Mois de la Photo" are hard to gauge. Agathe Gaillard, a photography dealer who has been on the Paris scene longer than most—seven and a half years now—dismisses the event altogether: "I don't think anything of it: it doesn't concern the gallery. We have an exhibition every month . . . for us, it doesn't change anything." Everyone agrees there is more traffic; but few believe there is more buying. Gaillard adds that this year she focused her gallery's efforts on the

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

La revue blanche bi-mensuelle le nº 60 cent.
12 francs par An
1 rue Laffitte
Paris

"La Revue Blanche" original Lautrec poster 50"x36½"

ORIGINAL FRENCH POSTERS AND OTHERS

ELAINE HORWITCH GALLERIES

4211 N. Marshall Way
Scottsdale, Arizona 85251
(602) 945-0791

4222 N. Marshall Way
Scottsdale, Arizona 85251
(602) 941-5290

129 W. Palace Avenue
Sante Fe, New Mexico 87501
(505) 988-8997

Forest Rd. and Hwy. 89A
Sedona, Arizona 86336
(602) 282-6290

group stand that she and other photography dealers shared at FIAC '82, the annual October international art fair, clearly commercial in aim and also set in Paris. But it is perhaps not without significance that this is the first time Paris's photography dealers joined together as a group. "It worked better than we hoped," says Gaillard. In fact, all eight photography galleries from FIAC have formed an Association for the Defense and Promotion of Original Photography (APO), a group which intends to regulate and protect the sale of photographs by defining the operative terms of the medium (negative, artist's proof, press print, unique print, vintage print, limited edition, etc.) and by educating a still small but growing public.

According to Gaillard, who represents such masters as Manuel Alvarez Bravo, Gisèle Freund and the young color fantasist Bernard Faucon, the market has been through an "ebbing" period. Yet, she has "the impression we're at the start of a new wave." This assessment echoes Samia Samou's belief that "there are a certain number of collectors being created," and Sherry Barbier's recollection that with the inaugural "Mois de la Photo" in 1980, "For the first time, I saw young people considering a purchase of a photograph. Every once in a while, someone would buy."

> Though there has undoubtedly been an increased general interest in photography in France, much of it is simple curiosity about the New, and about the New of a particularly American stripe.

Joël Brard speaks nobly of photographers finding "esteem" through the festival. But several observers confirm that there is still a lack of professionalism among young French photographers. Hughes Auxtexier laments that they are burdened by the l'art pour l'art attitude which translates into an "exchange between amateurs." He rejects their "disdain for money," as well as their naive view of dealers as "horrible merchants" out to cheat them. He believes they are subject to a Marxist philosophy which prevents them from entering the marketplace and from taking their photography seriously. This attitude creates a "vicious cycle where the artist doesn't earn his living from selling his art, and thus hasn't the means to reinvest in his materials, and thereby create at the highest level, continuously, a more advanced and developed art from which to earn his living." Auxtexier sees his own as a more authentically Marxist perspective: "Everyone has the right to Kazeni:* A Kurdish-Iranian soldier at the front mourns the death of his comrade, Iran-Iraq war, *1981, included in "Gamma-Scopie" at the FNAC Forum, Paris.

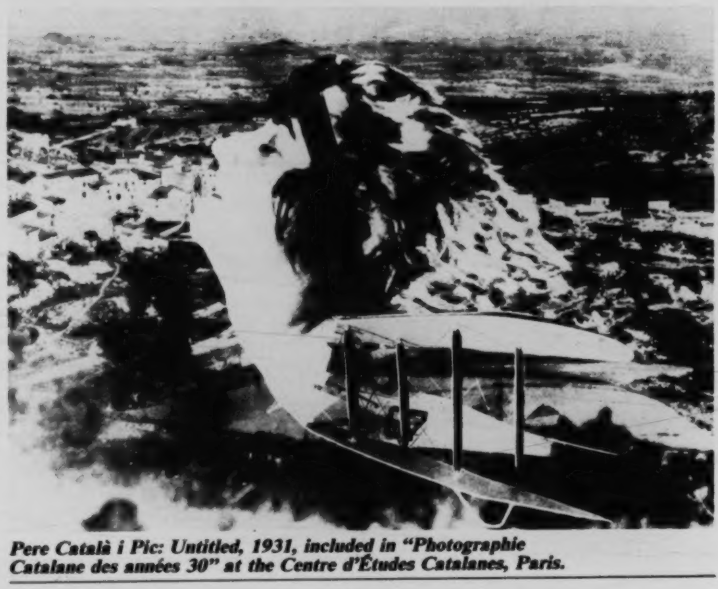
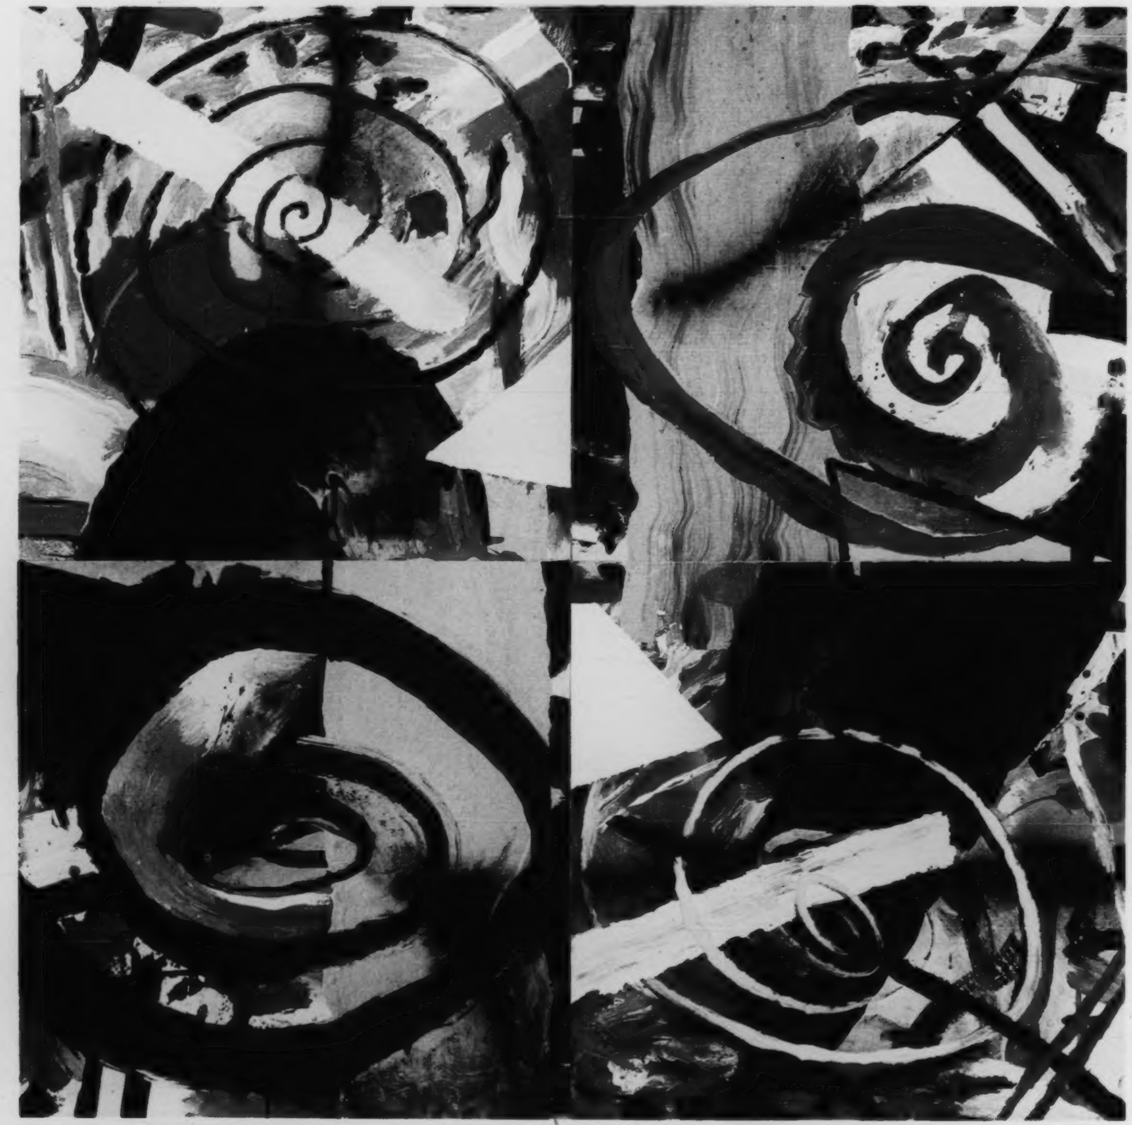
J.C. Larrieu:* Le Mistral, portrait of B. Faucon, *1977, included in "Photographie/ France/Aujourd'hui" at the Musée d'Art Moderne de la Ville de Paris (ARC).



Pere Català i Pic: Untitled, 1931, included in "Photographie Catalane des années 30" at the Centre d'Études Catalanes, Paris.

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

LUCINDA PARKER



60 × 60

CHARIVARI

SUELLEN HABER GALLERY
OPENS AT
133 GREENE STREET, NEW YORK CITY 10012
WITH AN EXHIBITION OF PAINTINGS BY LUCINDA PARKER
APRIL 2, 1983

Jean-Luc Monterosso, consul general of Paris Audiovisuel.

Jacques Chirac, mayor of Paris.

earn a living at what he does."

Gérard Lévy scorns what he sees as the peculiarly American habit of buying art as investment. "When you don't collect with love, it's very just that you get taken in." In the same spirit, Jean-Luc Monterosso complains of some American photographers for whom everything is "business, business." But what may be at stake in this duel between practical and philosophical impulses is whether young French photographers can move out from under the shadow of American accomplishments to the sunshine of their own best efforts. To do so, they will need a morally and financially supportive public. At present, there are no government incentives. There are no tax benefits, for example, since photography does not fall into the category of art. "That has to change," says Monterosso. Likewise, mixed public/private sector underwriting—grants, prizes, art collecting by industry—is only just beginning to be seen in France, largely through the participation of Air France and Kodak (in travel subsidies and prize ventures). For this crucial shift, Paris Audiovisuel deserves much of the credit. Furthermore, Sherry Barbier believes the French persist in the Romantic notion that "artists must suffer . . . [they] have until now, and still are today considered leeches of society." She has concluded through hard experience that you cannot appeal in France to the idea of a commercially "self-sufficient system; you must conceive of a system that's based on national pride."

Surely, there are no panaceas. But if the biennial "Mois de la Photo" seeks to put Paris, and France, back on the photography map, it would be nice if native photographers, and the dealers who represent them, were thereby treated as professionals not only in theory, but in fact. If the "Mois de la Photo" proves not only to educate a new generation of French photographers to the glories of a common past, but to provide them with professional standards and practical avenues for the present, its effects on the French cultural landscape may be profound. ☐ Author: Allen Ellenzweig is a New York critic who has recently completed a history of homoerotic themes in photography.

The Bull and the Tower, 1982-83. Oil on canvas, 48 × 70 in.

PAUL RESIKA Recent
Paintings

April 13-May 14
Third Floor

GRAHAM
1014 Madison (78 St.)
New York 10021
Tel. (212) 535-5767

Tues.-Sat., 10 a.m.-5 p.m.

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
A P 1983
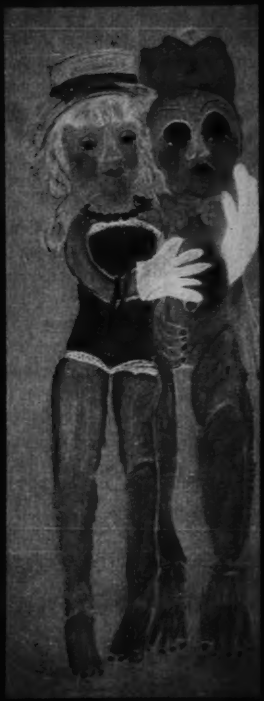
UMI



Ginny & Baby Doll, 1982.
Pastel on paper, 96" × 36".

ANNE BOURASSA

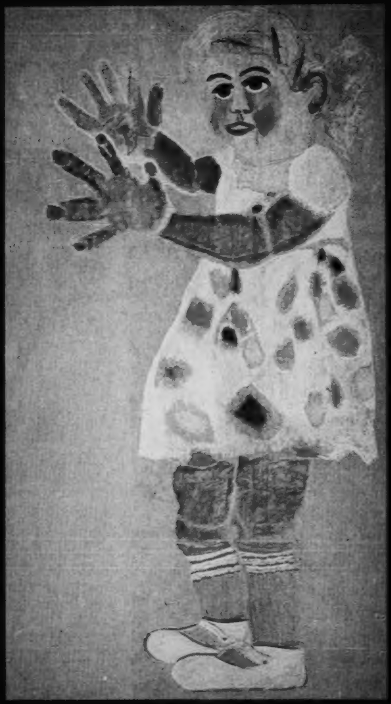
Philadelphia
215 842-2034



Saucy Walker III, 1982.
Pastel on paper, 108" × 48".

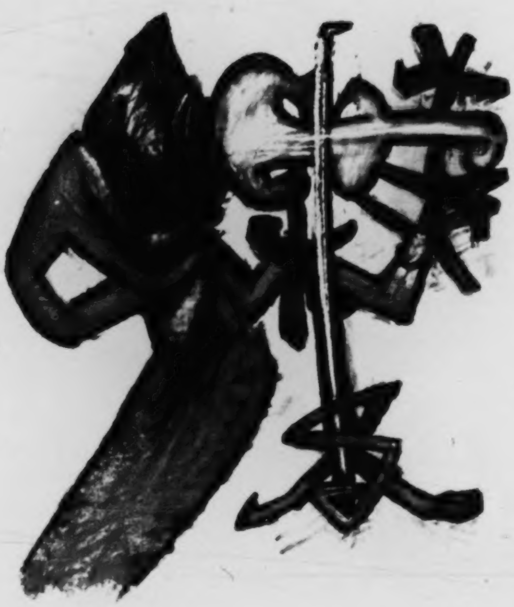
Crown Point Press

Vito Acconci
Robert Barry
Iain Baxter
Robert Bechtle
Günter Brus
Chris Burden
Daniel Buren
John Cage
Francesco Clemente
Richard Diebenkorn
Joel Fisher
Dan Flavin
Terry Fox
Hamish Fulton
Hans Haacke
Joan Jonas
Jannis Kounellis
Joyce Kozloff
Robert Kushner
Sol LeWitt
Robert Mangold
Brice Marden
Tom Marioni
Steve Reich
Edward Ruscha
Italo Scanga
Pat Steir
Wayne Thiebaud
David True
William T. Wiley

Etchings

1555 San Pablo
Oakland CA 94612
415-835-5104

545 Broadway
New York NY 10012
212-226-5476



MATTA

"le Viol à D Mineur"

Original Lithograph
in color

Edition 100 $600

Printed by Calcografica Studio
Florence, Italy

Published and distributed by

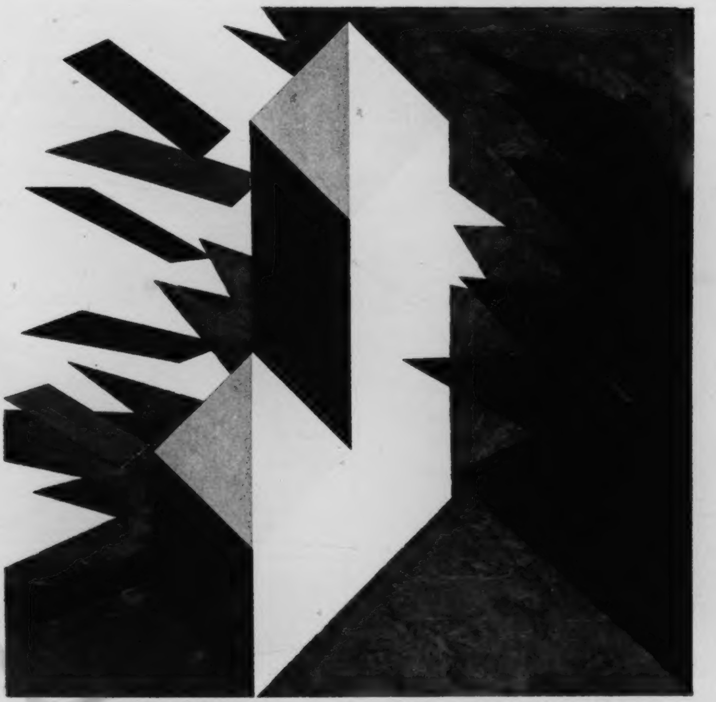
Carone Gallery
600 Southeast Second Court
Ft. Lauderdale, Florida 33301
Telephone: 305-463-8833

Dealer inquiries welcome.



Tower (F & S), 1982, Acrylic on canvas, 42" x 42"

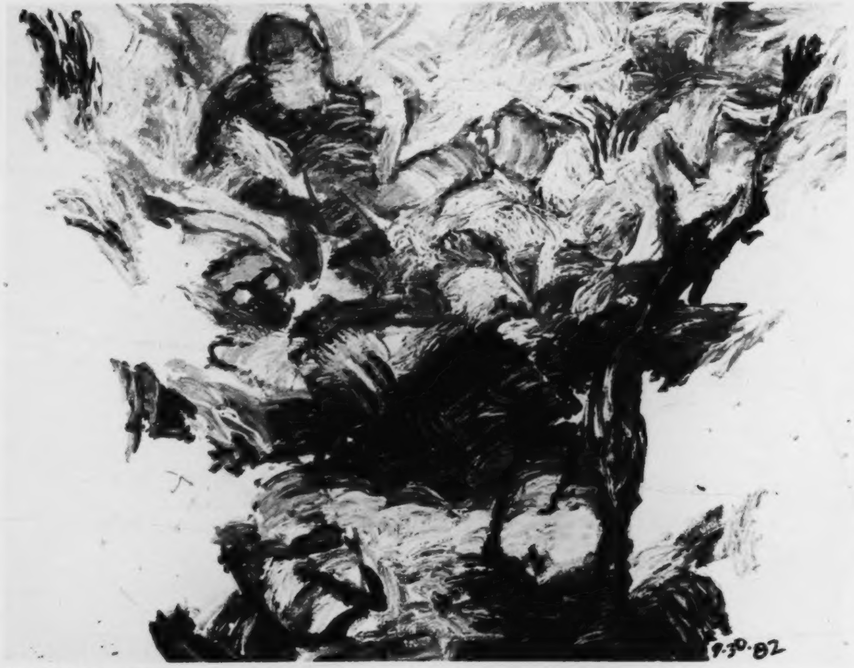
JAMES DeWOODY

PAINTINGS & SCULPTURE

APRIL 30-MAY 18

ARTHUR ROGER GALLERY
3005 MAGAZINE STREET
NEW ORLEANS

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI



UNTITLED. 1982.
oil on canvas, 84½" x 108¾"
M. Lee Fatherree photo

OLIVER
JACKSON

ALLAN STONE GALLERY
48 EAST 86TH STREET
NEW YORK 10028

QUAY GALLERY
254 SUTTER STREET
SAN FRANCISCO 94108

Nancy Hagin, Optimo, acrylic on canvas, 48 x 48", 1982.

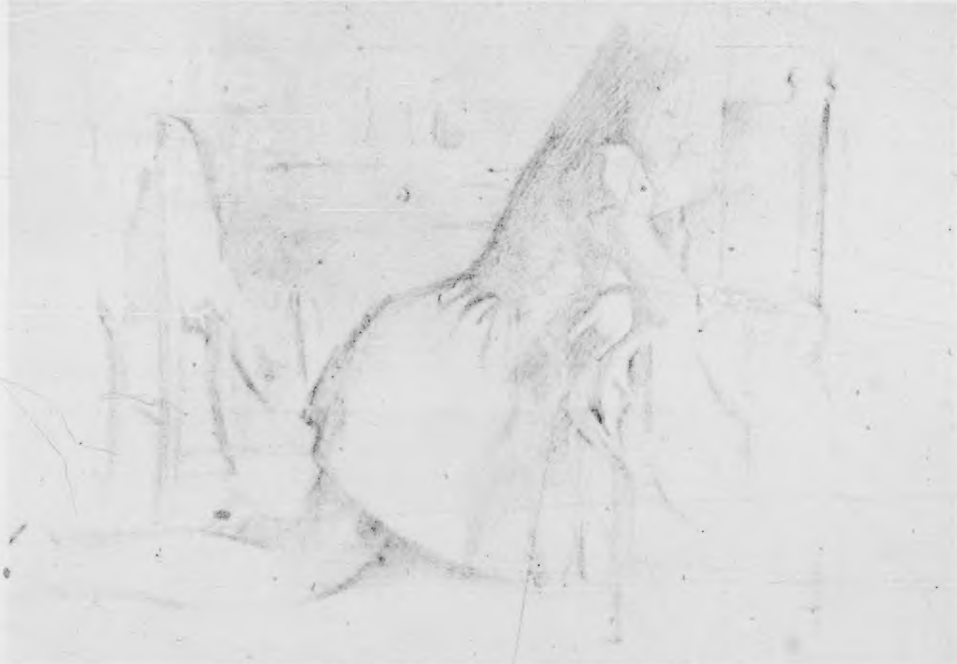
Painterly Realist
Landscapes and Still Lifes

BLAINE · BRANDT · CADY
CARANICAS · DIXON
FREILICHER · HAGIN
HORNAK · OSBORNE

Firebird Gallery
in cooperation with
Roberto White & Associates
3844 S. Alameda
Lamar Park Center
Corpus Christi, Texas 78411
512/851-2841



Kneeling Girl, c. 1976. Pencil on paper, 25⅝ × 37 in.

Drawings by

BALTHUS

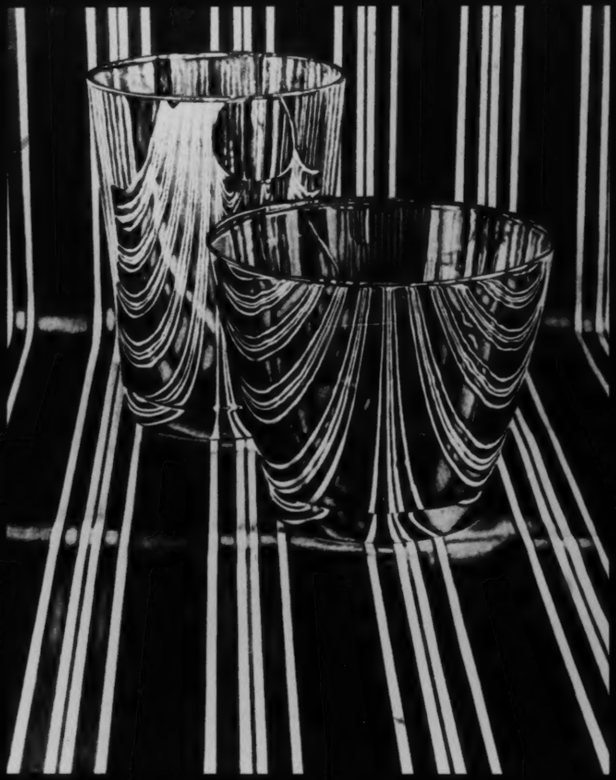
ODYSSIA
GALLERY
730 Fifth Ave.
New York, N.Y. 10019
Tel. (212) 541-7520

FRANCESCO
CLEMENTE

2-30 April 1983

SPERONE WESTWATER
142 Greene Street New York 10012
212/431.3685

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI



Jeanette
Pasin Sloan

New Work

April 5-May 7, 1983

G.W. Einstein

243 East 82 Street New York 10028
(212) 628-8782

#122, 1983. Colored pencil and acrylic on board, 18 x 14 inches

JOHN HARTELL

Paintings

Mar. 23 to Apr. 16

JOHN HELIKER

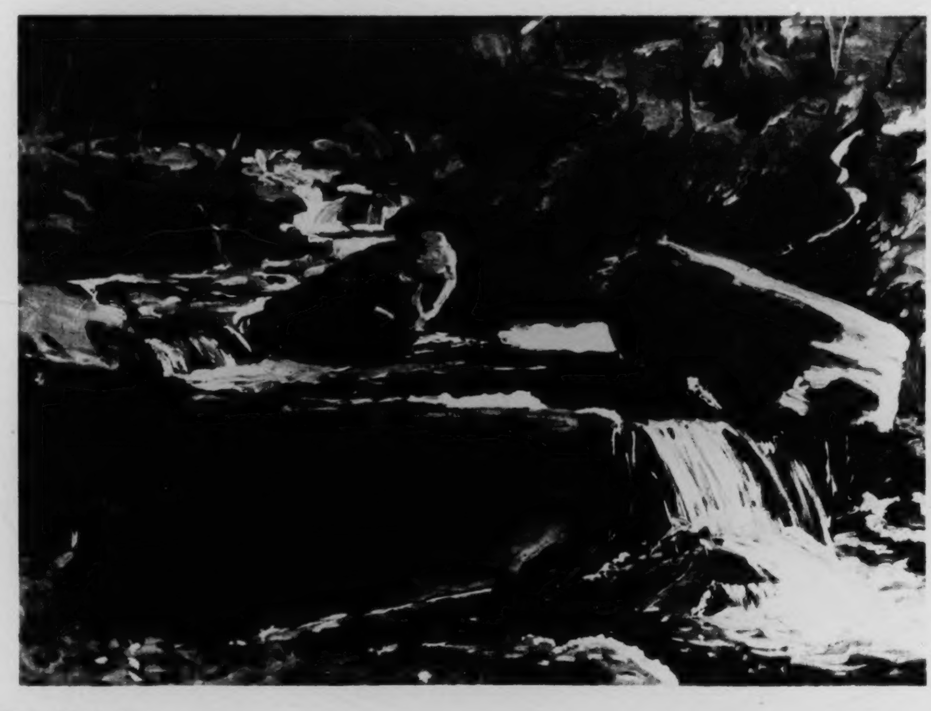
Paintings & Drawings

Apr. 20 to May 14

KRAUSHAAR GALLERIES
724 Fifth Ave (Bet.) 57th & 56th Sts New York
Tues. thru Sat., 9:30 to 5:30

ADELE ALSOP

Recent Paintings
April 13–May 7



DAVID FINDLAY JR
CONTEMPORARY 41 East 57 Street New York 10022 212-486-7660

We are pleased to announce the exclusive representation of the estate of the American artist

William S. Horton
(1865–1936)

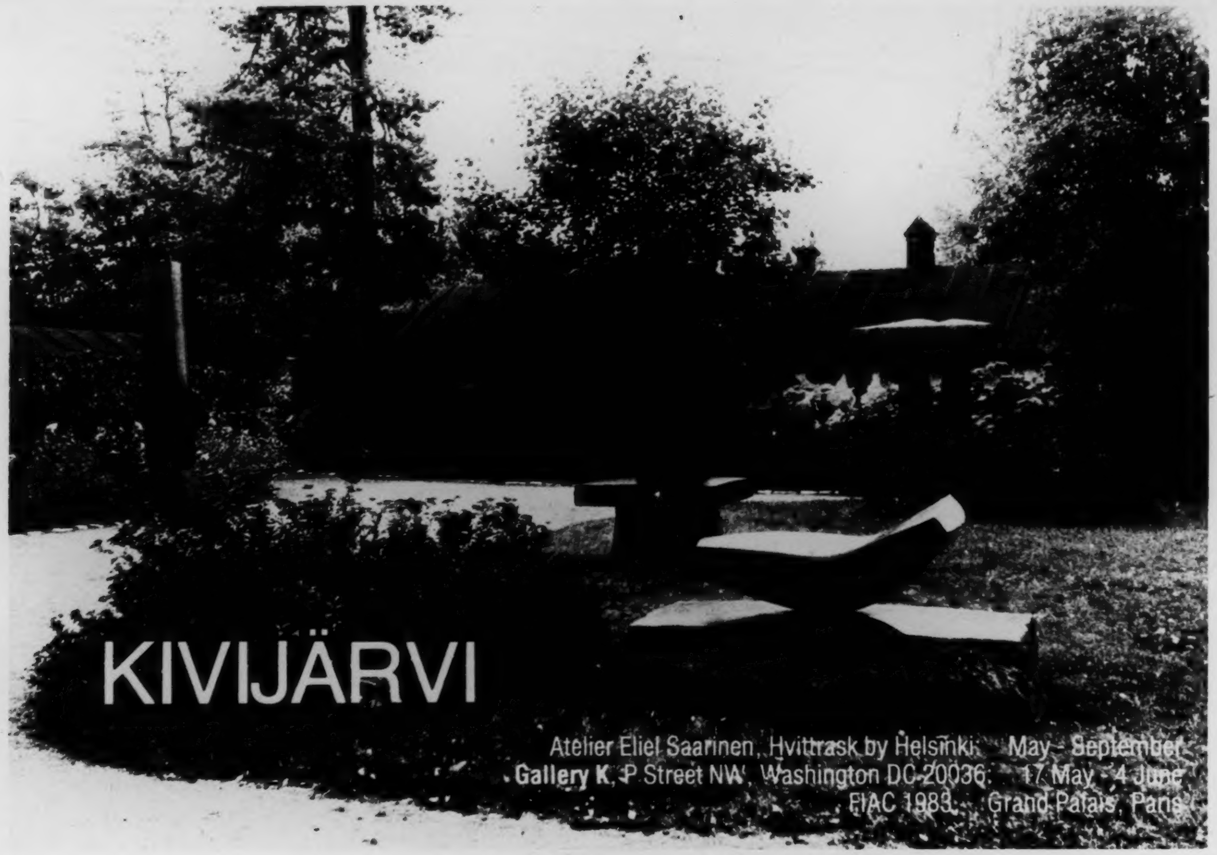
Paintings • Drawings • Pastels

Exhibition: April 22 Thru May 7

Hammer Galleries
SINCE 1928

33 West 57th Street, N.Y.C. 10019 (212) 644-4400

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI



KIVIJÄRVI

Atelier Eliel Saarinen, Hvittrask by Helsinki: May - September
Gallery K, P Street NW, Washington DC 20036: 17 May - 4 June
FIAC 1983: Grand Palais, Paris

LARRY RIVERS

Paintings and Drawings
March 24 to April 23

Forthcoming Exhibition June, July
FERNAND LEGER

EDWARD TOTAH GALLERY
39 Floral Street, London WC2 01-379 6241
illustrated catalogue available

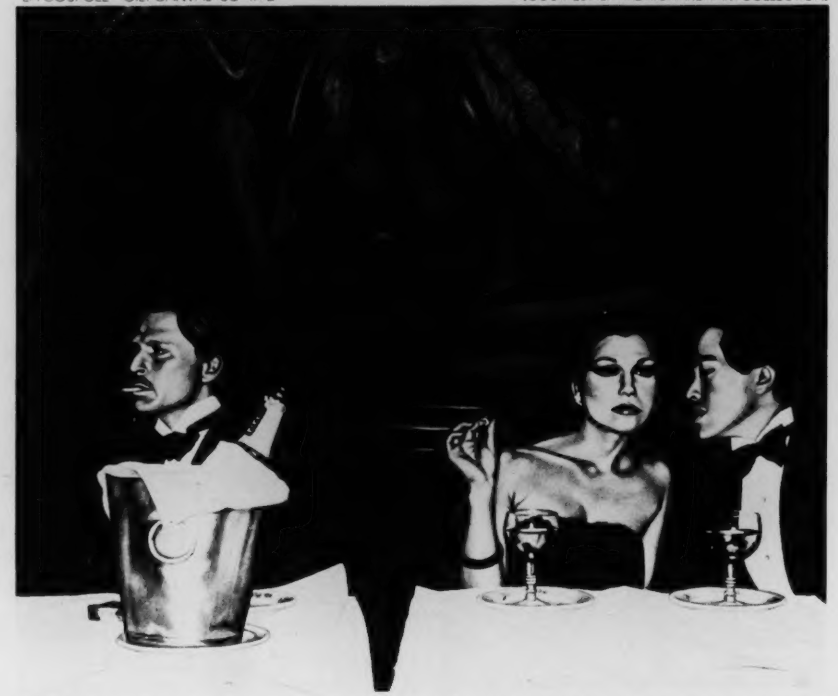
Important Paintings and Drawings by

Amat, Botero, Bravo, Castañeda, Cuevas, Gerzso, Kahlo, Rivera, Siqueiros, Tamayo, Toledo

Mary-Anne Martin / Fine Art
213 East 49th Street New York, NY 10017
Tel: (212) 980-8104 by appointment

Appraisals, Consulting, Corporate and Auction Advisory Services

"LA COUPOLE" OIL/CANVAS 60" x 72" (COURTESY OF THE RICHARD TAM COLLECTION)



GARY CRAIG
MARCH 31 – MAY 7

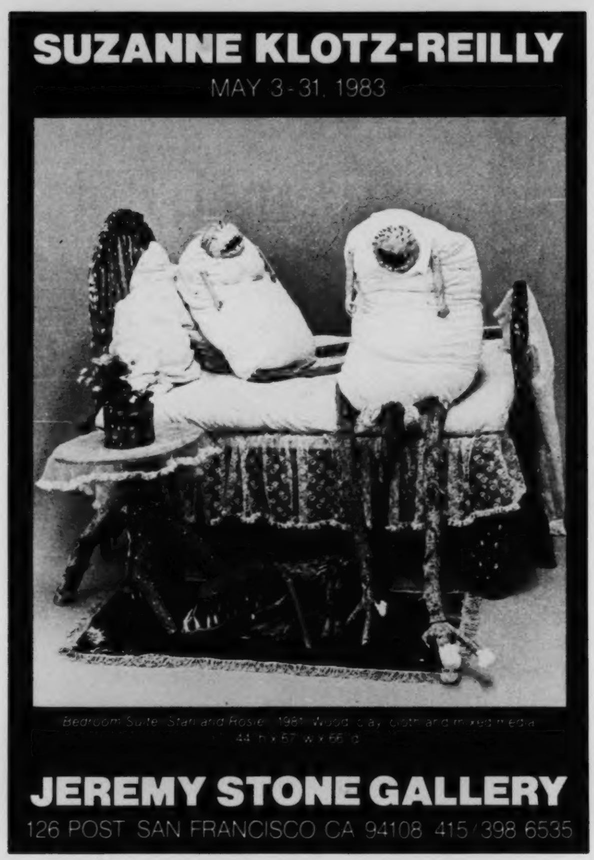
IVORY / KIMPTON GALLERY
55 GRANT · SAN FRANCISCO · 94108
415 · 956 · 6661

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

Stephen Buckley

April 27-May 21

Brooke Alexander, Inc.
20 West 57th Street
New York, New York 10019
Telephone 212/757-3721



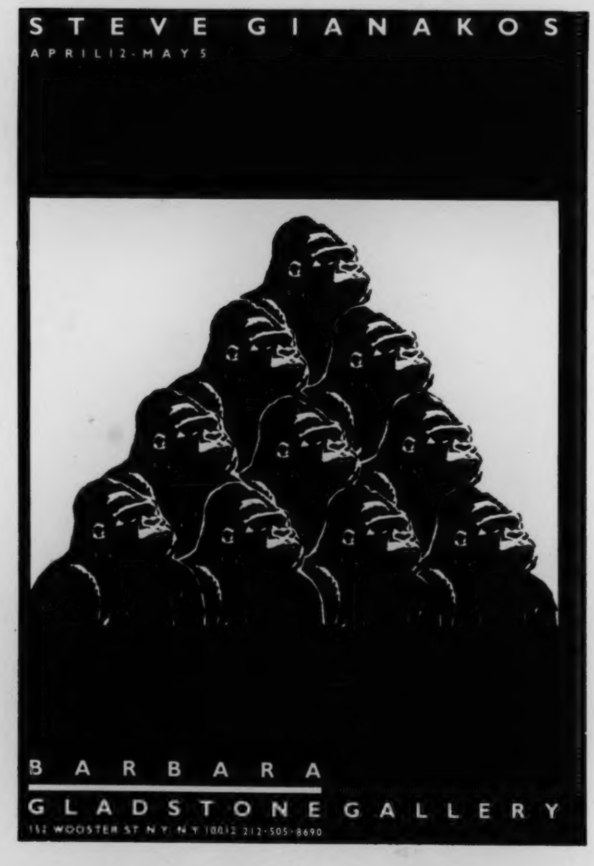
SUZANNE KLOTZ-REILLY

MAY 3-31, 1983

Bedroom Suite: Stan and Rosie, 1981. Wood, clay, cloth and mixed media.
44" h x 67" w x 66" d

JEREMY STONE GALLERY

126 POST SAN FRANCISCO CA 94108 415/398 6535



STEVE GIANAKOS

APRIL 12-MAY 5

BARBARA

GLADSTONE GALLERY

152 WOOSTER ST N.Y. N.Y. 10012 212·505·8690

The Estate of John Altoon
Jack Barth, Eric Fischl
April Gornik, John Lees
R.L. Kaplan, Ken Kiff
Doug Martin, Jane Rosen
Joseph Santore
Martin Silverman
David True

EDWARD THORP
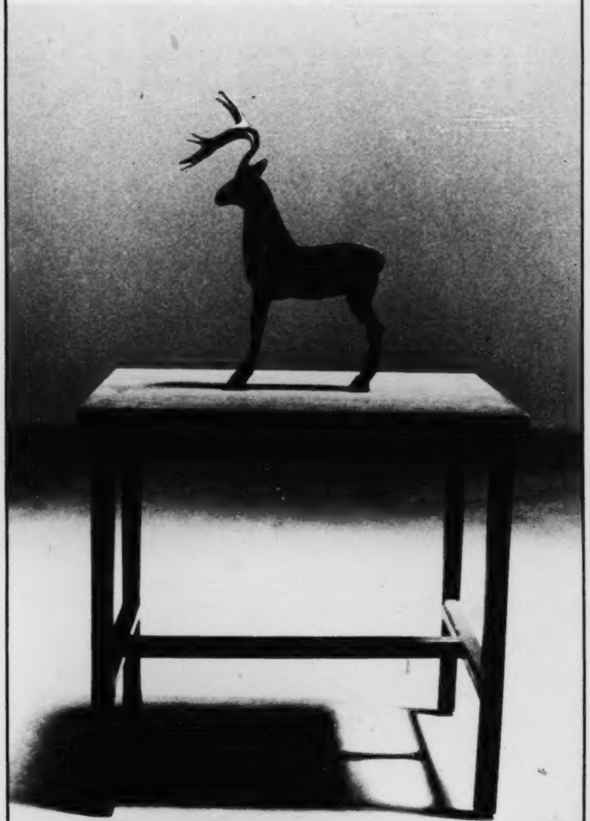
GALLERY

419 WEST BROADWAY, NEW YORK, NY 10012
TELEPHONE 212/431-6880

JOHN McEWEN



BUCK

MARCH 26-APRIL 23

49TH PARALLEL
CENTRE FOR CONTEMPORARY CANADIAN ART
49E PARALLÈLE
CENTRE D'ART CONTEMPORAIN CANADIEN
420 WEST BROADWAY NEW YORK 10012
212 925-8349

BUCK, 1979-82 (DETAIL OF SCULPTURE INSTALLATION)
PHOTO: COURTESY OF THE YDESSA GALLERY, TORONTO

MANUEL LUNA
MARCH - APRIL

GEORGE CONDO
APRIL - MAY

GEORGE RODART
JUNE - JULY

ULRIKE KANTOR
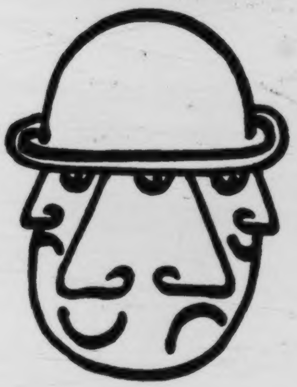
GALLERY
800 N. LA CIENEGA BLVD.
LOS ANGELES, CA 90069
213/273-5650

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI



NERI

KORNBLEE 20W57
APRIL 83 N.Y.C.

MARCIA GROSTEIN

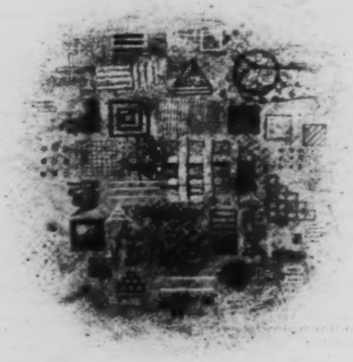
April 9-27, 1983

BETTY PARSONS GALLERY
24 WEST 57 STREET NEW YORK N.Y. 10019

2 APRIL TO 30 APRIL

FRANCESCO CLEMENTE

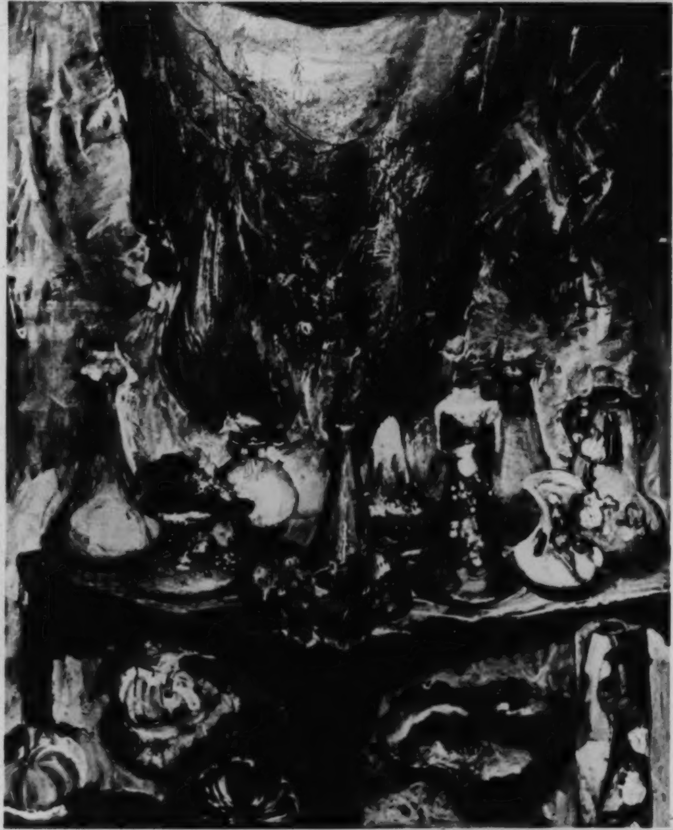
MARY BOONE
GALLERY, 420 WEST BROADWAY
GALLERY, 417 WEST BROADWAY
NEW YORK, NEW YORK 966-2114



DAVID SHAPIRO
RECENT DRAWINGS

"SUBTLE BODY SERIES" 1982 24¼" × 19¼"

GETLER/PALL
50 WEST 57 NY 212/581-2724

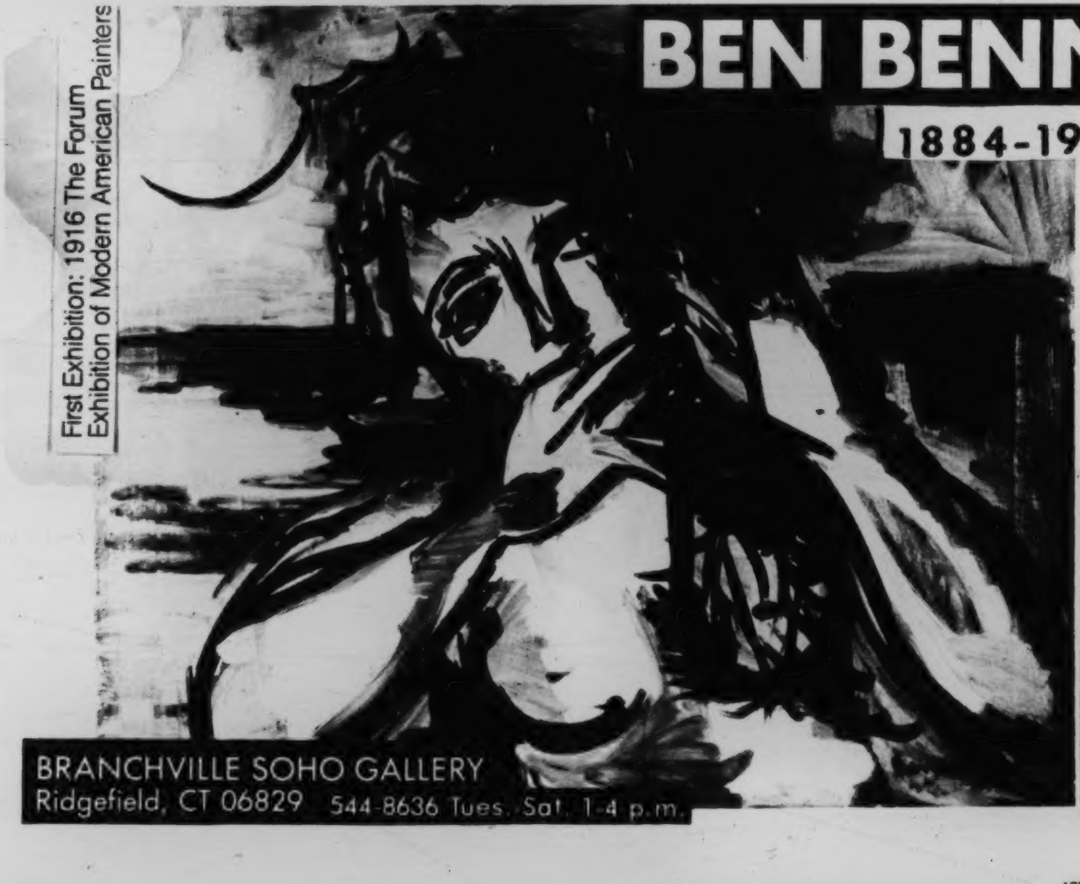


STILL LIFE 1980 OIL ON CANVAS 62" x 49¾"

HYMAN BLOOM

RECENT PAINTINGS
APRIL 2-28, 1983

TERRY DINTENFASS 50 W 57
NEW YORK CITY 581-2268



BEN BENN

1884-1983

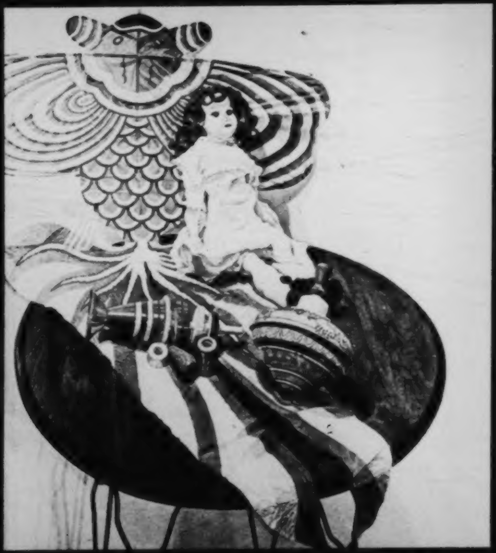
First Exhibition: 1916 The Forum
Exhibition of Modern American Painters

The Artist's Own Collection
Catalogue Available $8.00

BRANCHVILLE SOHO GALLERY
Ridgefield, CT 06829 544-8636 Tues.-Sat. 1-4 p.m.

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

LELAND WALLIN



CHILD'S TABLE STILL LIFES
April 6-30, 1983 11am-6pm
HAROLD REED GALLERY
120 East 78 Street New York 10021 (212) 861-6362

TIBOR DE NAGY GALLERY
29 W. 57, NY 10019 (212) 421-3780

NANCY WISSEMANN-WIDRIG
RECENT PAINTINGS
THIRD FLOOR

ROBERT TERRY
CITYSCAPES
FOURTH FLOOR

9 APRIL—4 MAY 1983

Piranesi, Madonna & Child with St. John, after Guercino

WILLIAM H. SCHAB GALLERY, Inc.

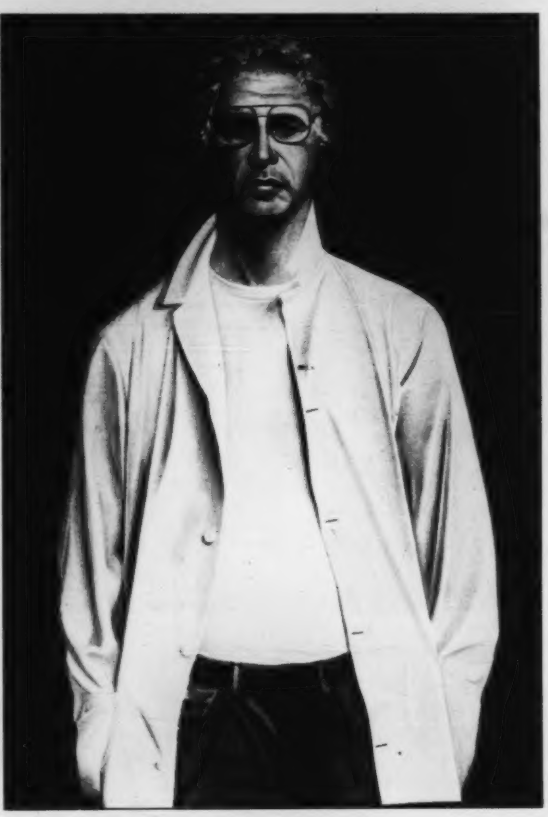
announces its move to
NEW PREMISES
March 1983:

11 EAST 57th STREET
NEW YORK, N.Y. 10022
(212) 758-0327

TADAAKI KUWAYAMA

April 1983

AKIRA IKEDA GALLERY
8-18, KYOBASHI 2-CHOME, CHUO-KU, TOKYO



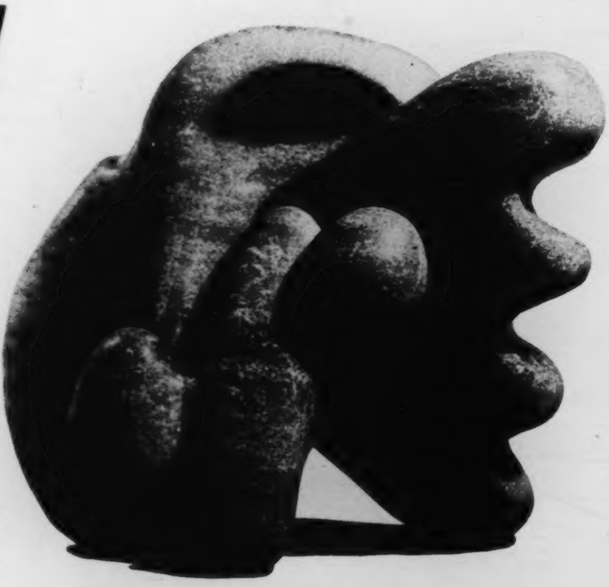
LESLIE: "ALFRED LESLIE" 1982, O/C, 84 X 60 INCHES

ALFRED LESLIE

NEW PAINTINGS APRIL

ALLAN FRUMKIN GALLERY 50 WEST 57TH NEW YORK

WINSLOW



Energy Form
Material: Marble

STUDIO 47
47 Indian Trail Barrington, Illinois 60010

Telephone 312 526-0019

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

JACQUELYN RICE
Ceramics, Collage, Constructions
APRIL

HADLER·RODRIGUEZ·GALLERIES
38 East 57th Street New York 10022 212 752-7734

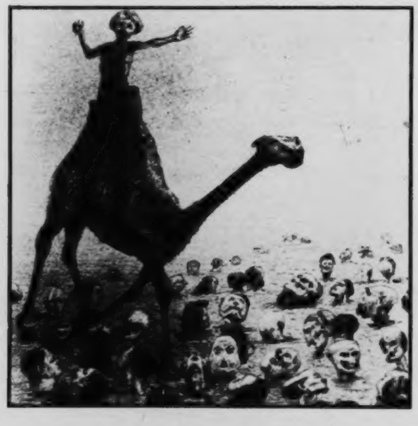
New Biomorphism and Automatism
Organized by Jay Gorney

1. AUSTĖ
2. CARROLL DUNHAM
3. RICHARD HENNESSY
4. MEL KENDRICK
5. JONATHAN LASKER
6. JOHN NEWMAN
7. DAVID STOREY

HAMILTON
20 WEST 57 NYC TEL (212) 765-5915

Jan Dibbets
420 West Broadway
New York
Julian Schnabel
142 Greene Street
New York
Leo Castelli
2-23 April 1983

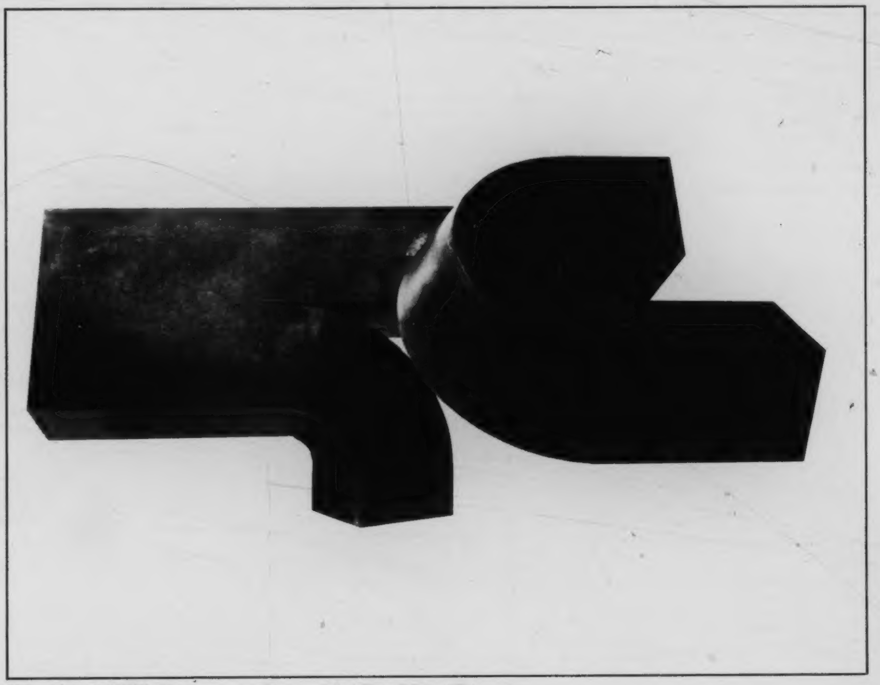
March 22–May 7, 1983
Alfred Kubin
Visions from the Other Side



A major retrospective of turn-of-the-century Austria's foremost draughtsman, with loans from the Lehnbachhaus, Munich and the Museum of Modern Art, N.Y.

Illustrated catalogue $10 (post. incl.)

Galerie St. Etienne
24 W. 57th St. NYC 10019 (212) 245-6734 Tues.-Sat. 11-5



"Hereby", 1983, Bronze, edition of 6, 17" x 33" x 19"

CLEMENT MEADMORE

Recent Sculpture
Thru April

DONALD MORRIS
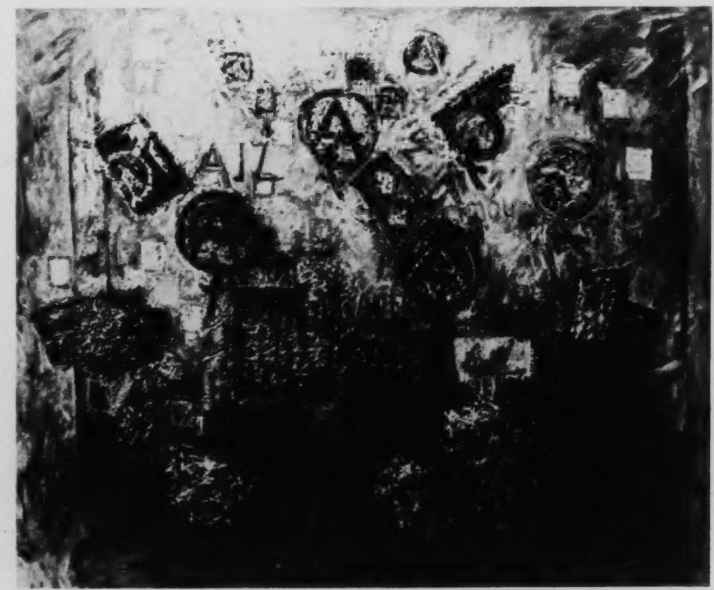
GALLERY

105 Townsend
Birmingham, MI 48011
(313) 642-8812



GRAFFITI, 1981, OIL ON CANVAS, 50 x 60 INCHES

HANS BURKHARDT

RECENT PAINTINGS, DRAWINGS & PRINTS

APRIL 2 - MAY 7

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE $15

JACK RUTBERG
FINE ARTS INC.

357 North La Brea Avenue ☐ Los Angeles, CA 90036 ☐ (213) 938-5222

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

RICHEBOURG/McCOY

4 East 89 Street New York 10028
212/410.5588

Major Works by

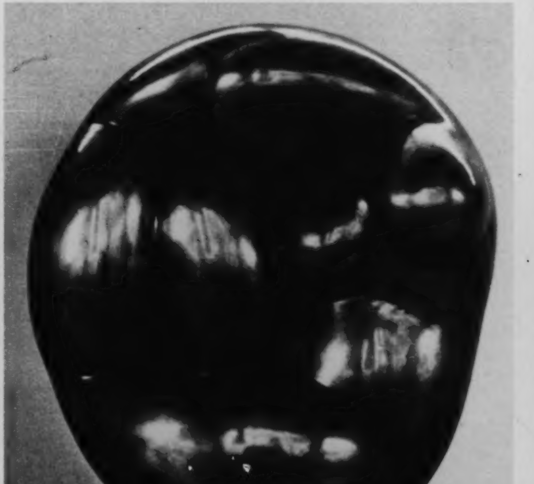
CORNELL
DALI
DE KOONING
POLLOCK
MODIGLIANI
OLDENBURG
RIVERS

By appointment
Elizabeth Richebourg · Jason McCoy

FERNANDO BOTERO
oil paintings, gouaches and watercolors

Galerie Beyeler
Baumleingasse 9
CH-4001 Basel
23 54 12

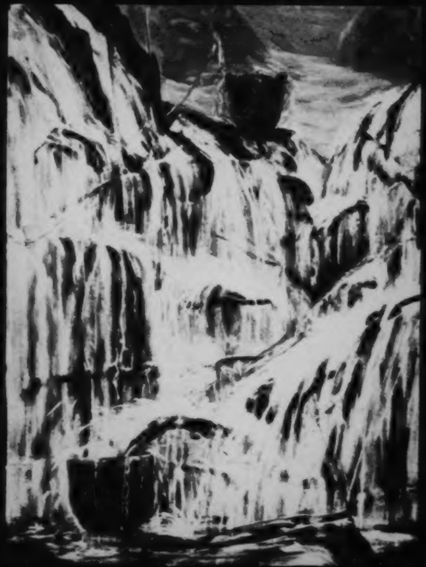
Tony Marra
April 6 — April 30



Moon Goddess, Bronze, 11-1/2 x 10 in.

Martha White Gallery
330 West Main Street
Louisville, Kentucky 40202

JUDITH E. SIMONIAN
PAINTINGS and RECONSTRUCTIONS



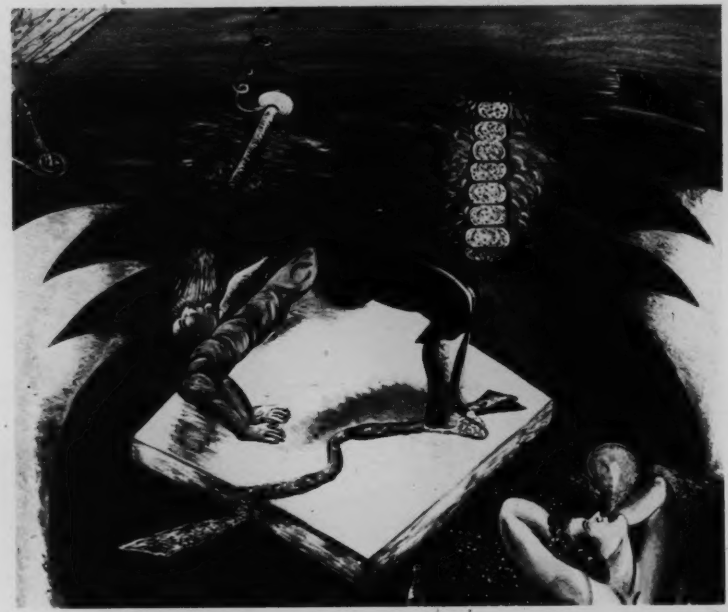
"Pots At The Falls" 1983 Mixed media on fractured drywall 66" x 49" x 6"

Photo: Douglas M. Parker

NEIL G. OVSEY GALLERY

APRIL 5 - MAY 7

705 EAST THIRD STREET, 3rd FLOOR • LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA 90013
TELEPHONE: (213) 617-1351



Phyllis
Bramson

Trickster and Other Mentors
April 15-May 11

"EXISTENTIALIST WITNESS STAGE 3 (FOR PAT ADAMS)" OIL ON CANVAS, 5' x 6' x 4", 1982.

DART GALLERY
155 East Ohio Street, 401
Chicago 60611 312-787-6366

MARC CHAGALL

"Joseph The Young Shepherd"

"The Bible"

April, May 1983

105 Hand-Colored
Etchings

FULLY ILLUSTRATED CATALOG $15 PPD

Gerhard Wurzer Gallery
5085 Westheimer
the Galleria Houston, Texas 77056
10-9 WEEKDAYS 10-6 SATURDAYS (713) 961-9888

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

JOHN GOSSAGE
L.A. TO BERLIN / APRIL 1ST THROUGH 23RD

CASTELLI GRAPHICS 4 E77 NEW YORK

DAVIDSALLE
THE GREENBERG GALLERY
44 MARYLAND PLAZA ST. LOUIS, MO. 63108 (314) 361-7600

Jackson Pollock

BETTY PARSONS GALLERY 24 WEST 57 STREET NEW YORK N.Y. 10019 APRIL 9-27, 1983

Thomas George
New Paintings March 29-April 23
Maxwell Davidson Gallery
43 East 78 Street New York 212 734-6702

Susan Heideman

Helix, 1982, oil on canvas 72 x 46"

April

HABER THEODORE GALLERY
29 West 57th Street, New York 10019 (212) 752-3338

Group Show

Jo Ann Callis, Clyde Connell, Richard Fishman, George Legrady, Mark McFadden, Nic Nicosia, Suzan Pitt, Dan Rizzie, Italo Scanga, James Surls, Danny Williams.

March 15–April 16

Delahunty NewYork
291 Church Street, NY 10013 226-2519

Robert Hernandez

David Kraisler

(east gallery)

Kirk deGooyer Gallery

1308 Factory Place Los Angeles 90013
Tuesday-Saturday 10:30-5:30 213-623-8333

New Works Rick Dillingham

Recent Sculpture Tom Nussbaum

March 19–
April 20

Delahunty Dallas
2701 Canton Street, Dallas Texas 75226
214-744-1346

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
A P 1983
UMI

Charles Cowles Gallery

Nino Longobardi

April 2-23

420 West Broadway New York 10012 (212) 925-3500

MICHAEL GOLDBERG
LYNN UMLAUF

YOUNG HOFFMAN GALLERY
215 WEST SUPERIOR
CHICAGO 60610
TEL 312.951.8828

MICHELLE STUART

JACKIE
FERRARA

Michelle Stuart concurrent exhibition,
Walker Art Center, Minneapolis, April 10 - June 5

APRIL 15 - MAY 14

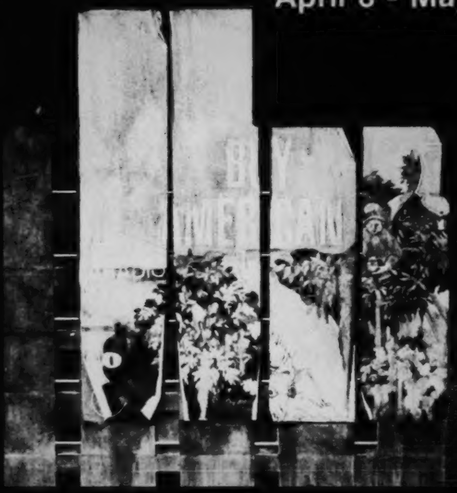
JANUS GALLERY
8000 MELROSE AVENUE, LOS ANGELES, CA 90046
(213)658-6084

JENE HIGHSTEIN
SCULPTURE IN BRONZE, WOOD AND CLAY/APRIL

OSCARSSON HOOD GALLERY
41 W 57TH ST. NYC 10019 (212) 750-8640

CARLOS MACIÁ

April 8 - May 3



Title: City Wall, oil/wood/canvas 60"x48" 1963

Barbara Gillman Gallery

270 N. E. 39 Street
3886 Biscayne Boulevard
Miami, Florida 33137
305 573-4898

Italo Scanga

Represented by Delahunty

Delahunty Dallas
2701 Canton Street, Dallas Texas 75226
214-744-1346

Delahunty New York
291 Church Street, NY 10013
212-226-2519

T. CHIMES

Time and Socrate
March 28 - April 23, 1983

ML
Marian Locks Gallery
1524 Walnut Street
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania 19102
215 546-0322

James Surls

Represented by Delahunty

Delahunty Dallas
2701 Canton Street, Dallas Texas 75226
214-744-1346

Delahunty New York
291 Church Street, NY 10013
212-226-2519

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

Mel Bochner

Paintings

Daniel Weinberg Gallery
619 North Almont Drive, Los Angeles 90069

ELIZABETH MURRAY

2 through 30 April 1983
PAULA COOPER
155 Wooster Street
New York 212 674.0766

Hokin/Kaufman Gallery
210 West Superior Street, Chicago, Illinois 60610
Telephone 312/266 1211

Hokin Gallery Inc.
245 Worth Avenue, Palm Beach, Florida 33480
Telephone 305/655 5177
1086 Kane Concourse, Bay Harbor, Florida 33154
Telephone 305/861 5700

Todd McKIE
WATERCOLORS
April 2 – May 12, 1983

MIKLOS POGANY

IMPRESSIONS GALLERY
275 Dartmouth Street, Boston MA 02116 (617) 262-0783
In New York by appointment, Victoria Munroe (212) 410-9179

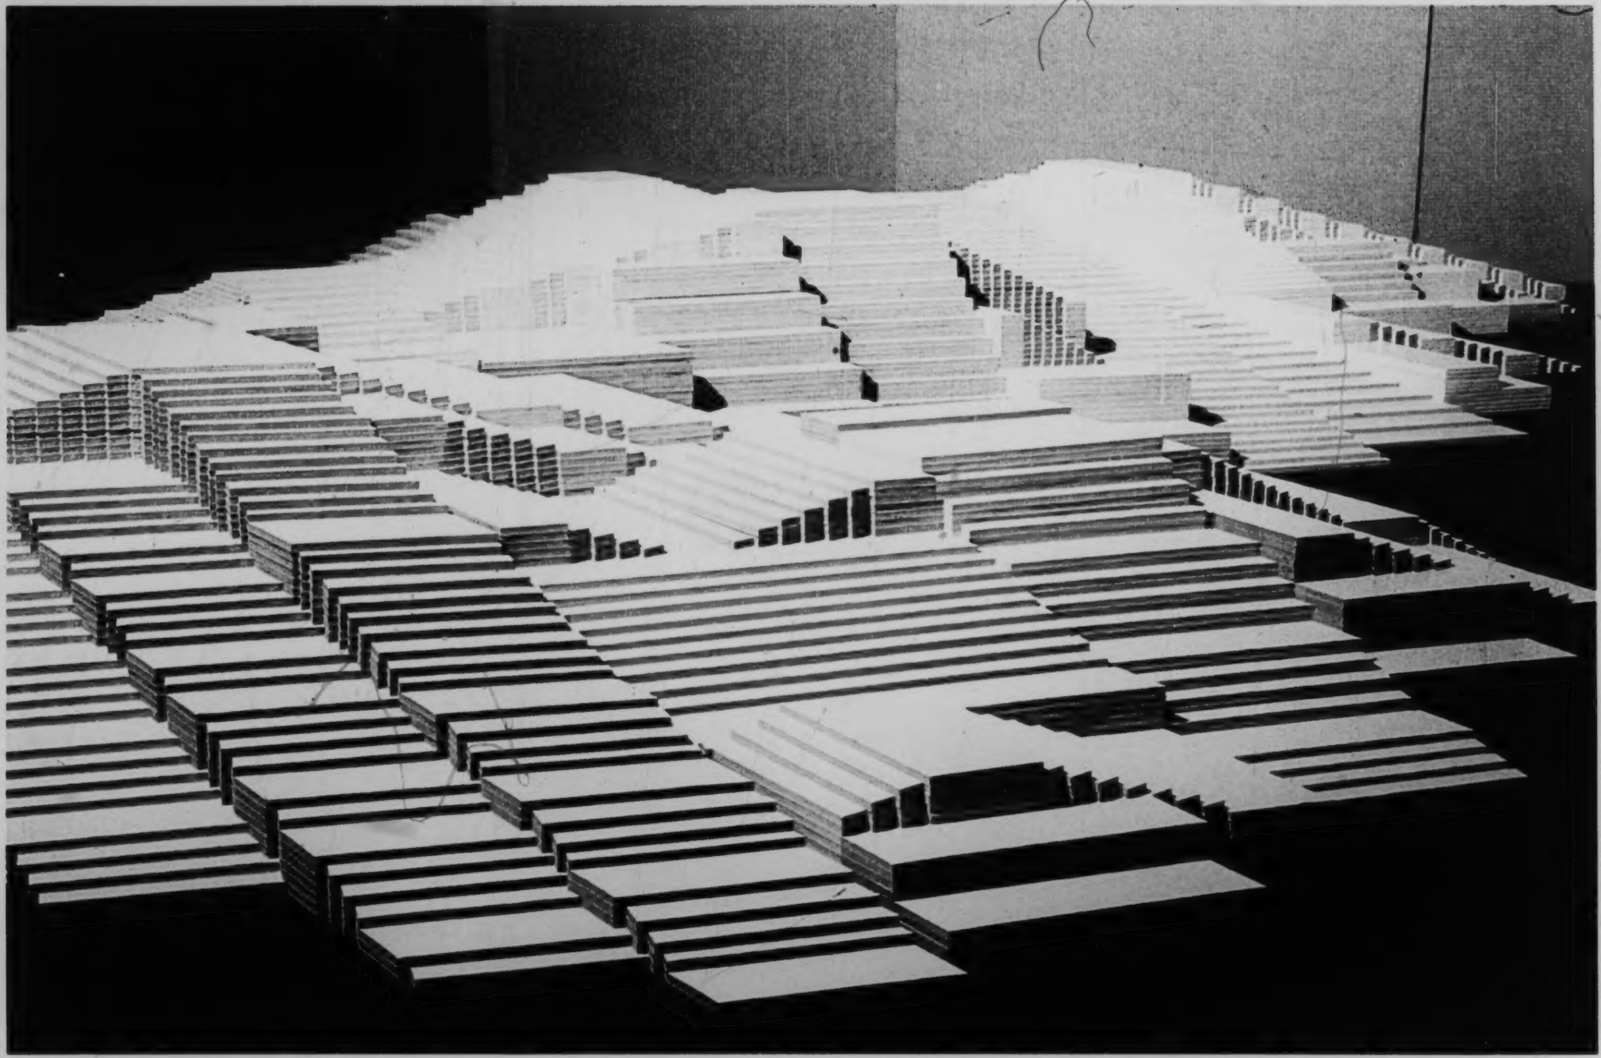
SCULPTURE INSTALLATIONS

THIRTY-THREE GALLERIES PRESENT A PORTFOLIO OF FORTY-SEVEN SCULPTURES

Art in America

THE ARTISTS • ARMAN • CHARLES ARNOLDI • FLETCHER BENTON • RONALD BLADEN
DEBORAH BUTTERFIELD • ROSEMARIE CASTORO • ROY DE FOREST • WILLEM DE KOONING
MARK DI SUVERO • LIN EMERY • TERRY FUGATE-WILCOX • JEDD GARET • CHARLES GINNEVER
NIGEL HALL • MICHAEL HEIZER • TOM HOLLAND • WILL HORWITT • ROBERT HUDSON
JIM HUNTINGTON • LUIS JIMENEZ • WILLIAM KING • IDA KOHLMEYER • GASTON LACHAISE
LOREN MADSEN • JOHN MC EWEN • CLEMENT MEADMORE • JOAN MIRÓ
NATHAN OLIVEIRA • ARNOLDO POMODORO • PETER REGINATO
GEORGE RICKEY • JAMES ROSATI • GEORGE SEGAL • RICHARD SERRA • TONY SMITH
KENNETH SNELSON • ROBERT STACKHOUSE • GEORGE SUGARMAN • ATHENA TACHA
WILLIAM TUCKER • JOHN VAN ALSTINE • CHRISTOPHER WILMARTH
ISAAC WITKIN • JACK YOUNGERMAN

VOL 7 1
ISS 4
AP 1983
UMI



33 Rhythms

ATHENA TACHA

Completed Public Commissions: Cleveland. Columbus. Miami. Norfolk. Oberlin OH. Seattle. Smithtown NY. Toledo. Tucson. Tulsa.
(216) 774-7535 or 775-8181

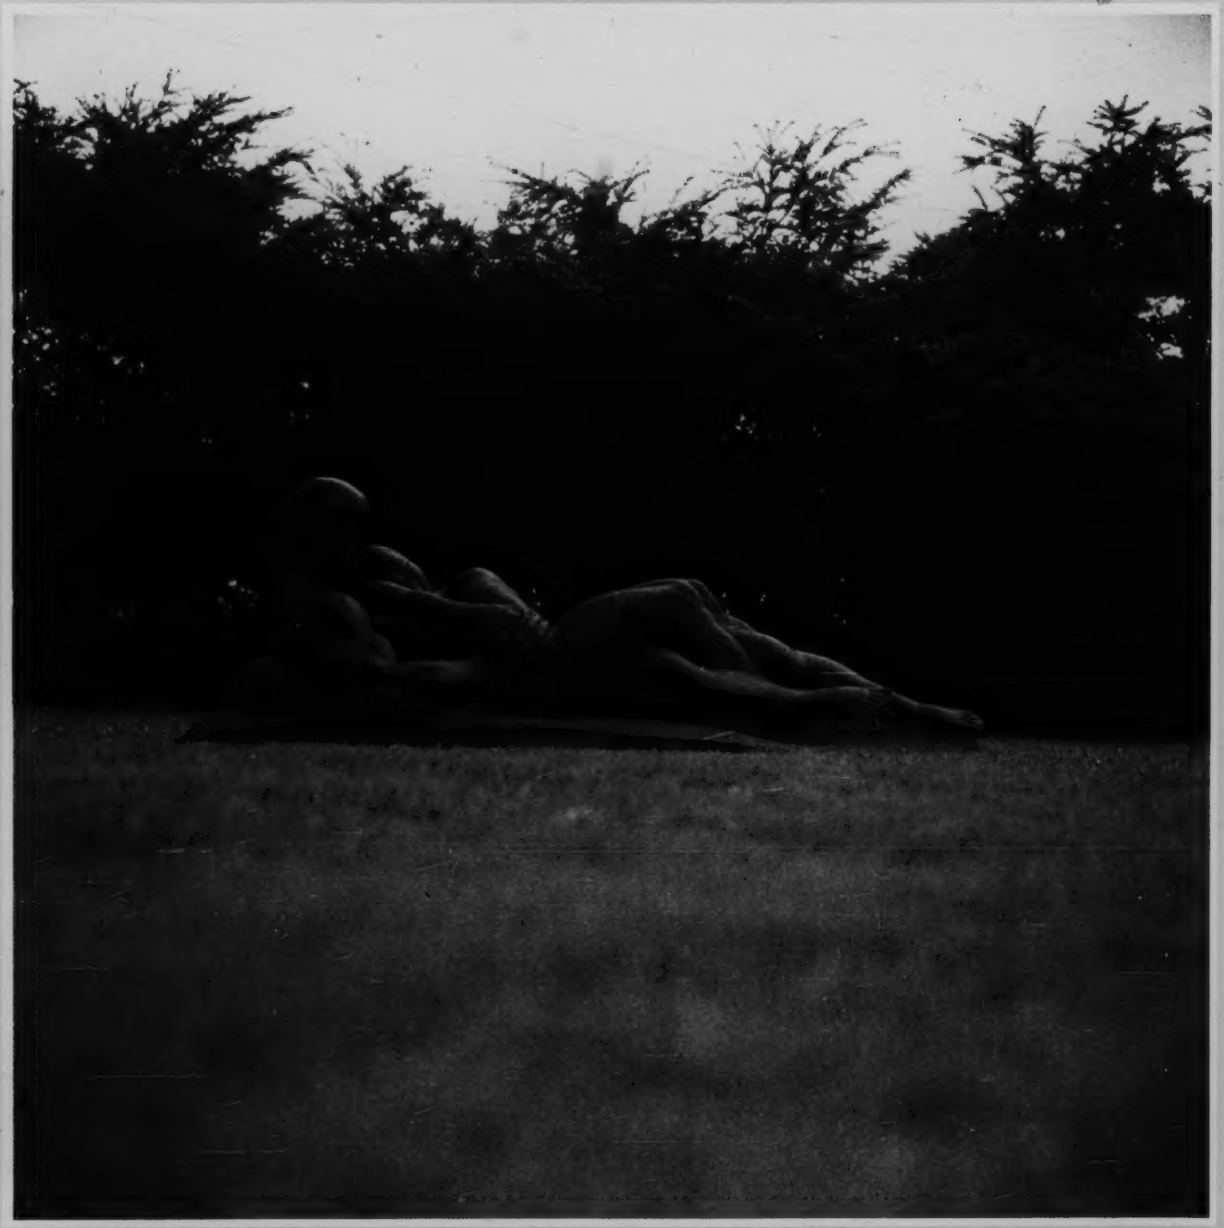


photo: Lee Boltin

GASTON LACHAISE

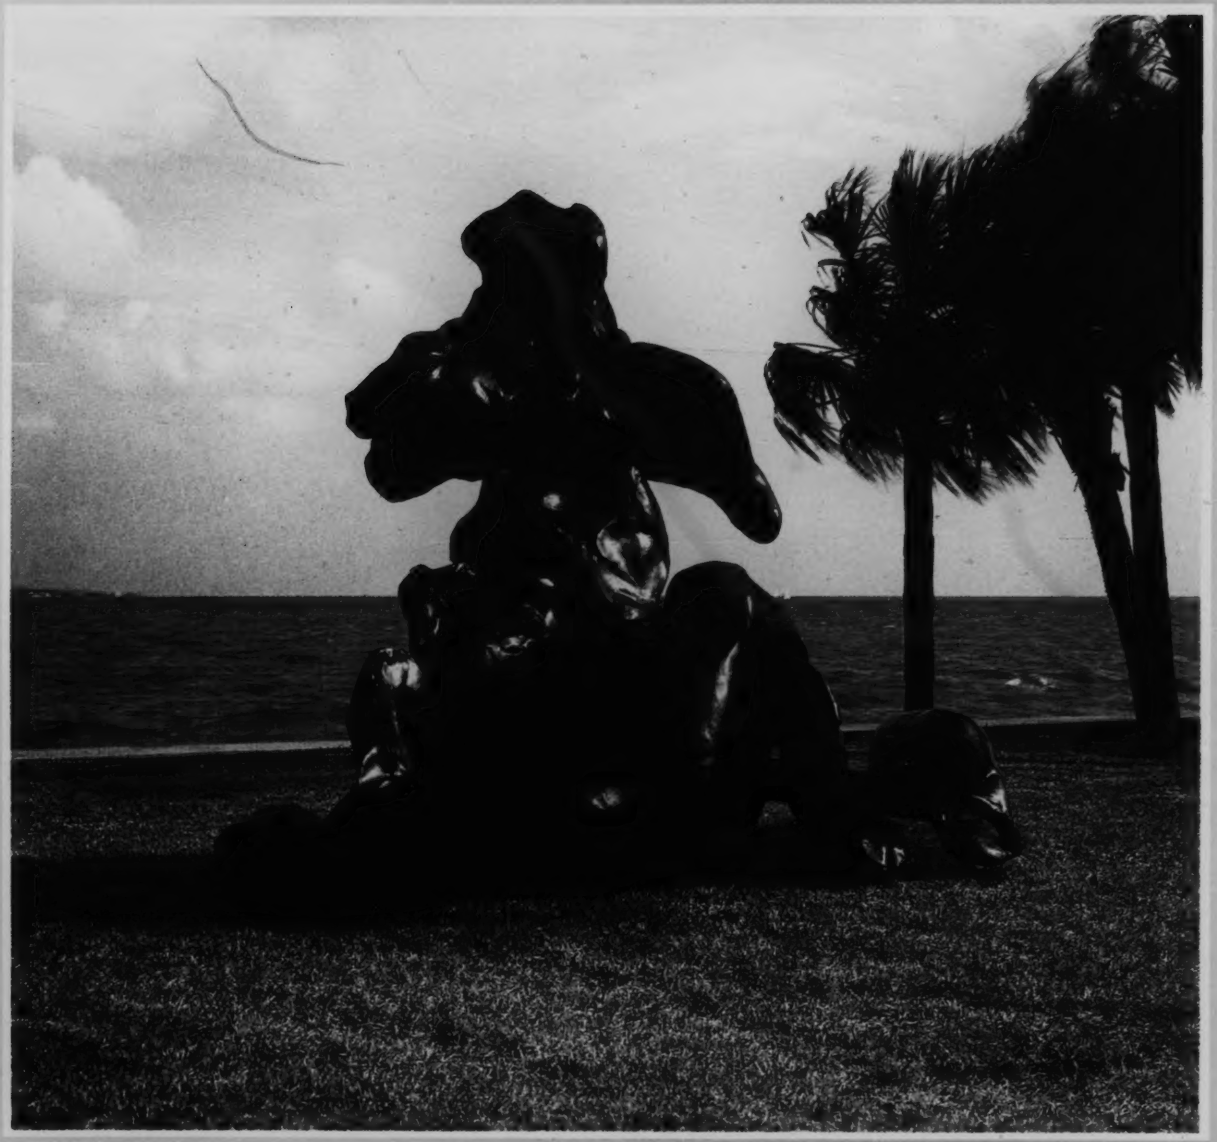
"Couple (Dans la nuit)", 1935

Bronze, 31 x 88½ x 41 inches. National Trust for Historic Preservation, Nelson A. Rockefeller Collection

ROBERT SCHOELKOPF GALLERY

825 MADISON AVENUE NEW YORK, N.Y. 10021 212-879-4638

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI



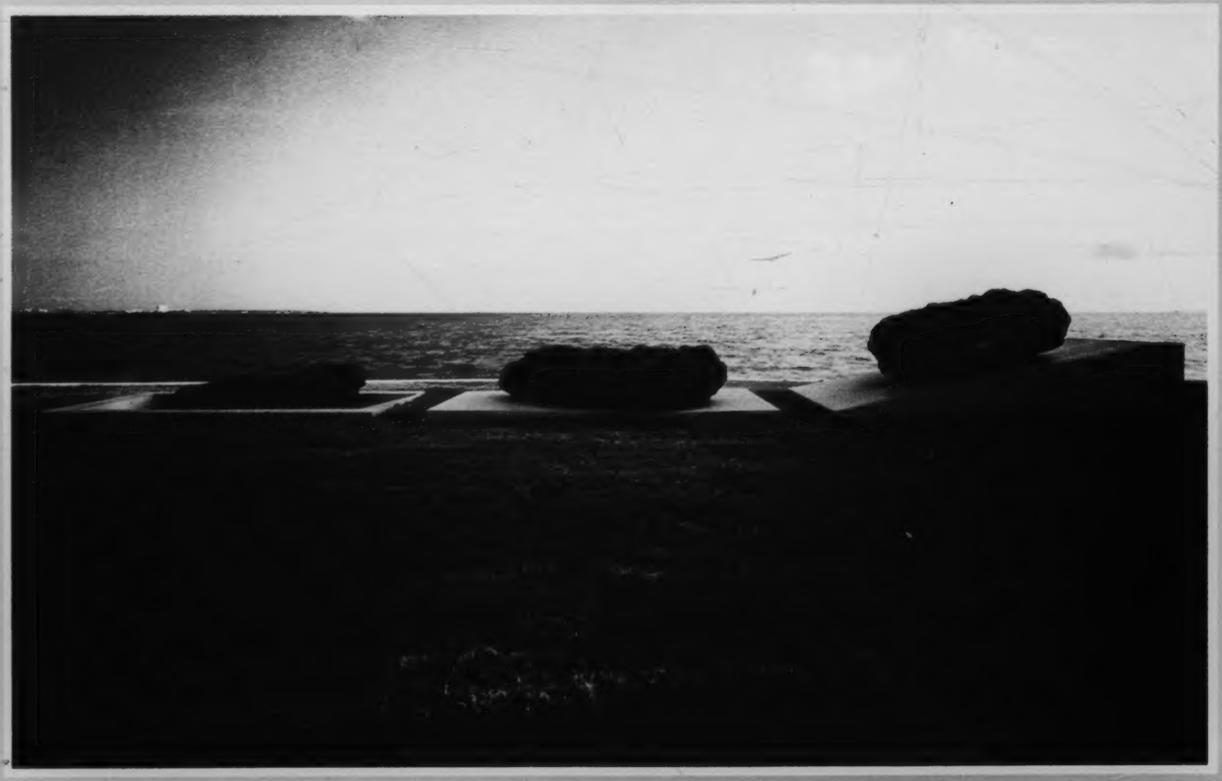
WILLIAM DE KOONING

"Seated Woman", 1969-80

9'5" high, 12'3" wide, 7'10" deep, bronze. Collection: Martin Z. Margulies, Miami. William de Kooning is represented by:

XAVIER FOURCADE, INC.

36 EAST 75TH STREET NEW YORK, NEW YORK 10021 (212) 535-3980



Photograph © Ray Fisher 1983

MICHAEL HEIZER

"Elevated, Surface, Depressed", 1981

Elevation: 7½' above ground, 3' below ground; Length 51'; Width 8', Aluminum and volcanic scoria. Collection: Martin Z. Margulies, Miami. Michael Heizer is represented by:

XAVIER FOURCADE, INC.

36 EAST 75TH STREET NEW YORK, NEW YORK 10021 (212) 535-3980

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
A P 1983
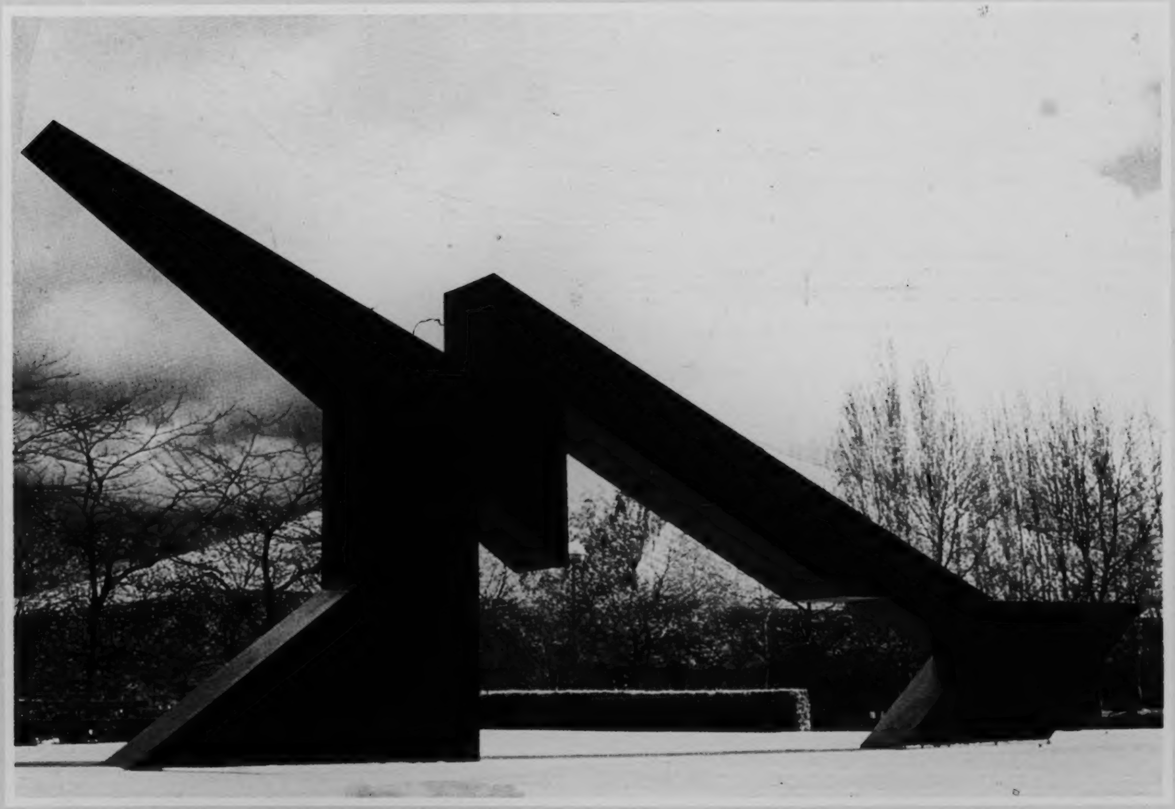
UMI



RONALD BLADEN

"Black Lightning," 1981

60 ft. long, 24 ft. high, 4-5 ft. wide. Installed at Seattle City Center, Seattle, Washington. Other Installations: Albany, New York; Baltimore, Maryland; Buffalo, New York; Des Moines, Iowa; Dusseldorf, Germany; Peoria, Illinois; Springfield, Ohio; West Palm Beach, Florida

INFORMATION

RONALD BLADEN 5 WEST 21ST STREET NEW YORK, NY 10010 (212) 929-4295

CHARLES GINNEVER

"Crate", 1978

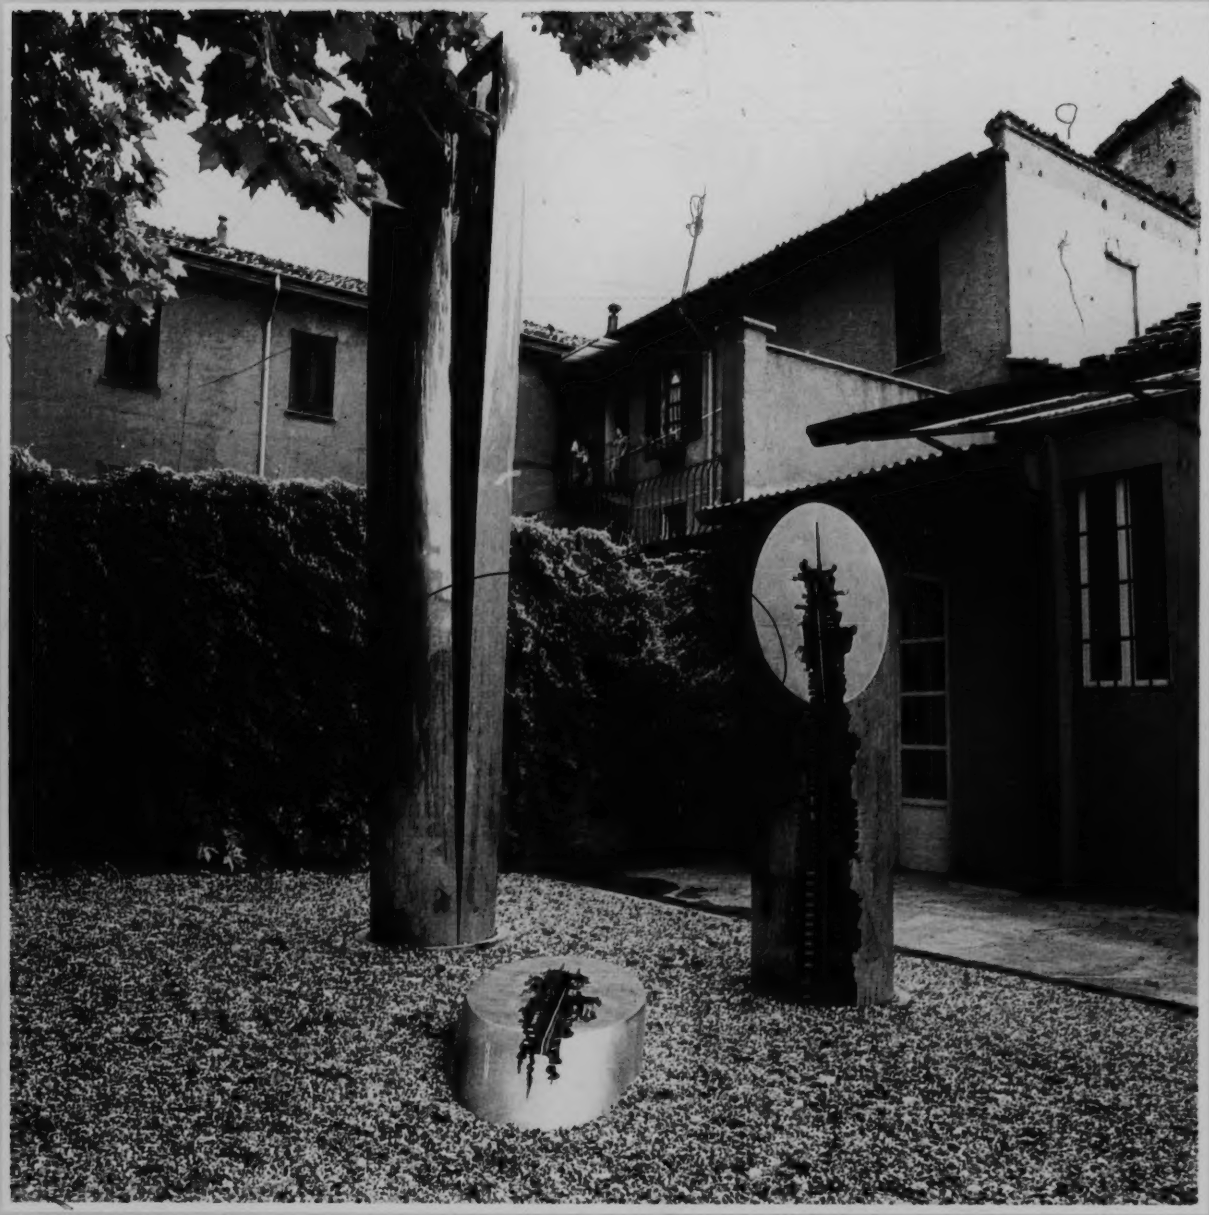
Cor-ten steel, 13' x 60' x 17'. On loan: Laumeier Sculpture Park, St. Louis, Missouri

Forthcoming Exhibition May 7 - July 2

MARLBOROUGH

40 WEST 57 NEW YORK (212) 541-4900

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI



ARNOLDO POMODORO

"Movimento di Crollo", 1970/71, Polished bronze, H 17' 8", "Colonna Recisa Transversalmente", 1970/71, Polished bronze, H 8'2" "Segmento", Bronze, H 5'6", Large Scale Sculpture Exhibition Opening June 4, 1983, Spectrum Center, 5080 Spectrum Drive Dallas, Texas

MARLBOROUGH
40 WEST 57 NEW YORK (212) 541-4900

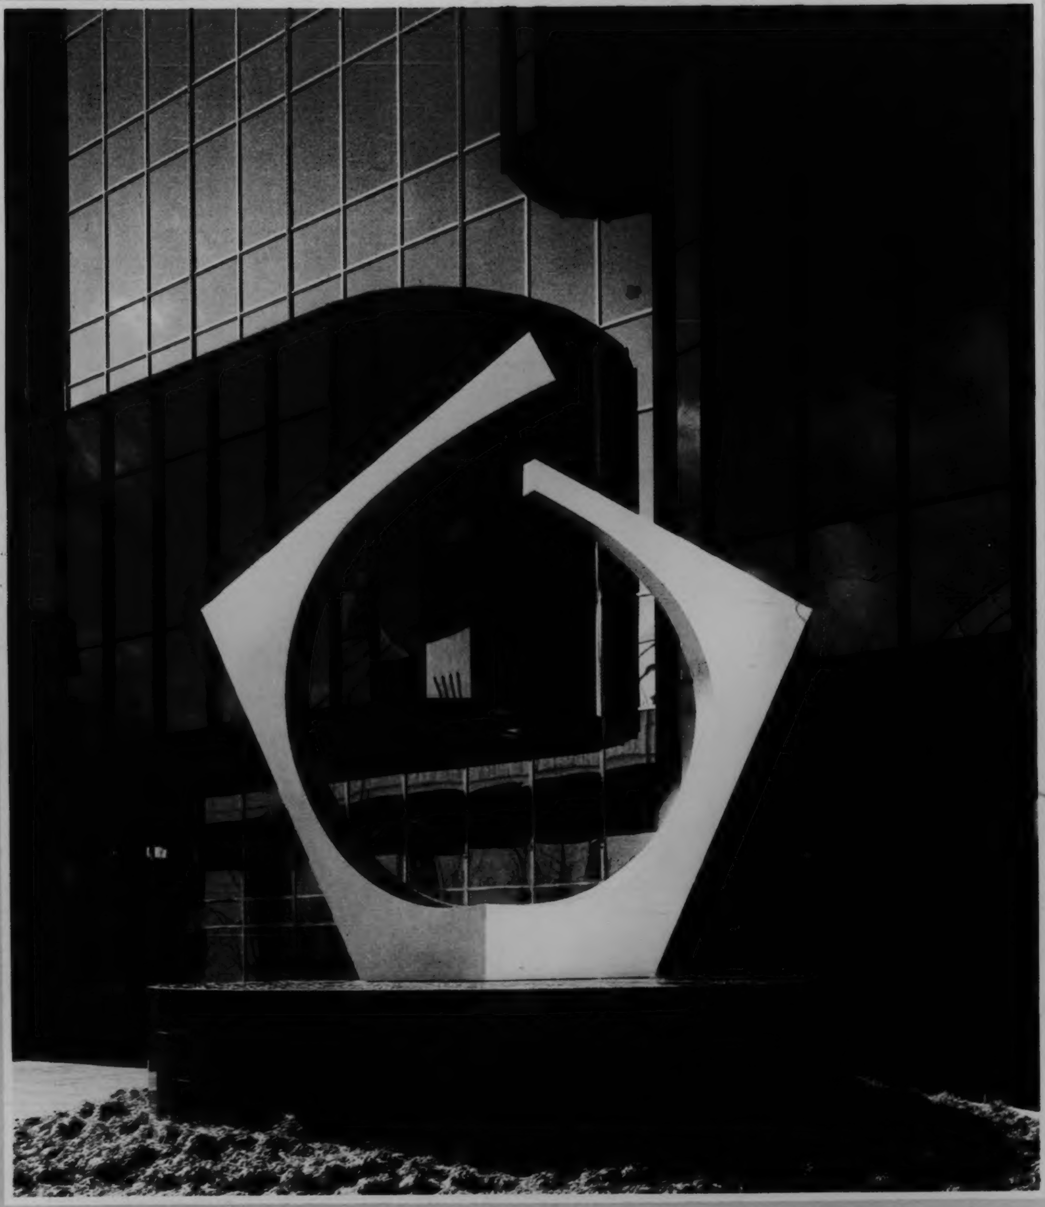


Photo Credit: Rick Alexander

JAMES ROSATI

"Two Angled Forms", 1983. Stainless steel, 16' x 20' x 10'.
Charlotte Plaza, North Carolina. Charlotte Office Tower Associates and Trammel Crow.
Architect: Duane Jarvis, JPJ Architects, Dallas.

MARLBOROUGH
40 WEST 57 NEW YORK (212) 541-4900

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

MARK DI SUVERO
"The Calling" 1981-82, Bluff Park, Milwaukee, Milwaukee County, Wisconsin gift of anonymous donor through Milwaukee Art Museum

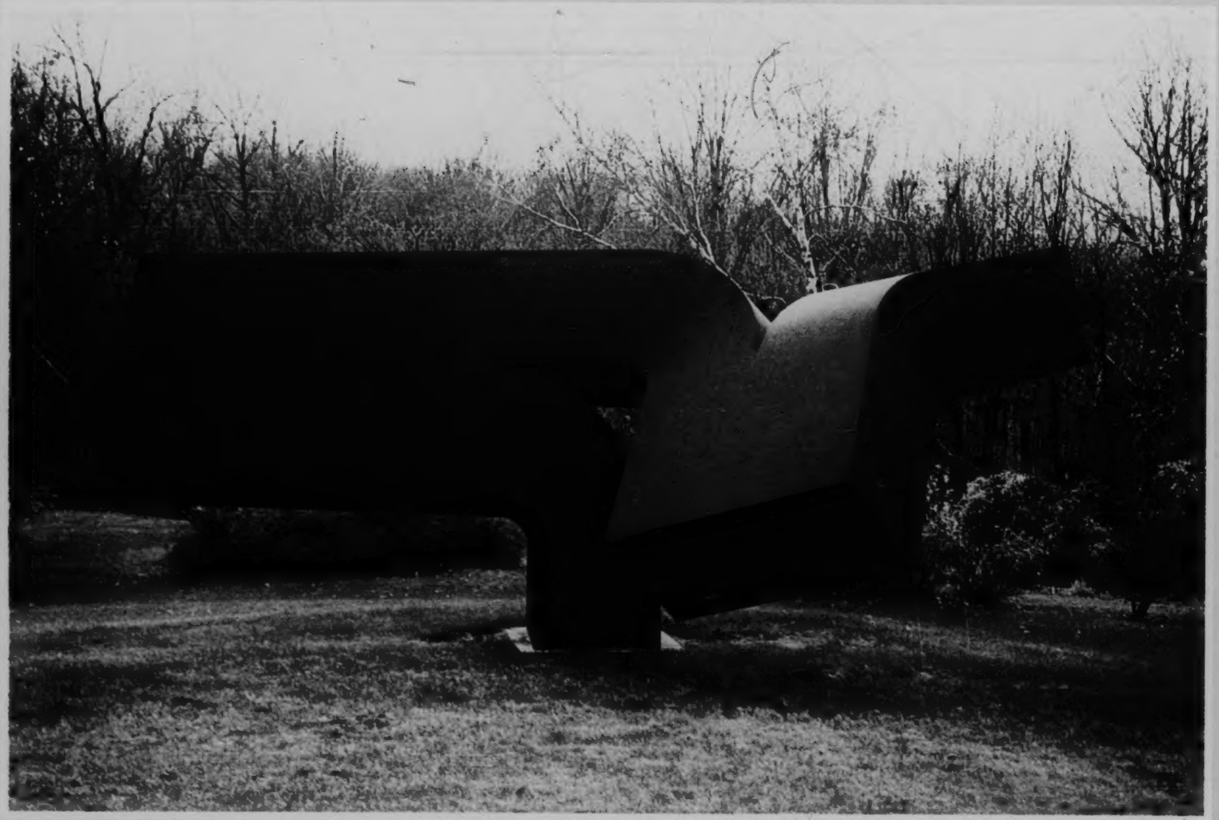
OIL & STEEL GALLERY, INC.
157 CHAMBERS ST., NEW YORK, N.Y. 10007 (212) 964-1567



CLEMENT MEADMORE

"Offshoot", 1982,

painted aluminum, 10 feet high x 24 feet wide x 12 feet deep

MAX HUTCHINSON GALLERY

138 GREENE STREET NEW YORK, N.Y. 10012 212-966-3066

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

LIN EMERY
"Flame", 1981
aluminum, 12 foot orbit

MAX HUTCHINSON GALLERY
138 GREENE STREET NEW YORK, N.Y. 10012 (212) 966-3066

ROBERT STACKHOUSE
"Prudential Installation, Plymouth, Minnesota", 1981
55 feet long x 15 feet wide x 6 feet high, painted wood, with etched shadow

MAX HUTCHINSON GALLERY
138 GREENE STREET NEW YORK, N.Y. 10012 (212) 966-3066

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

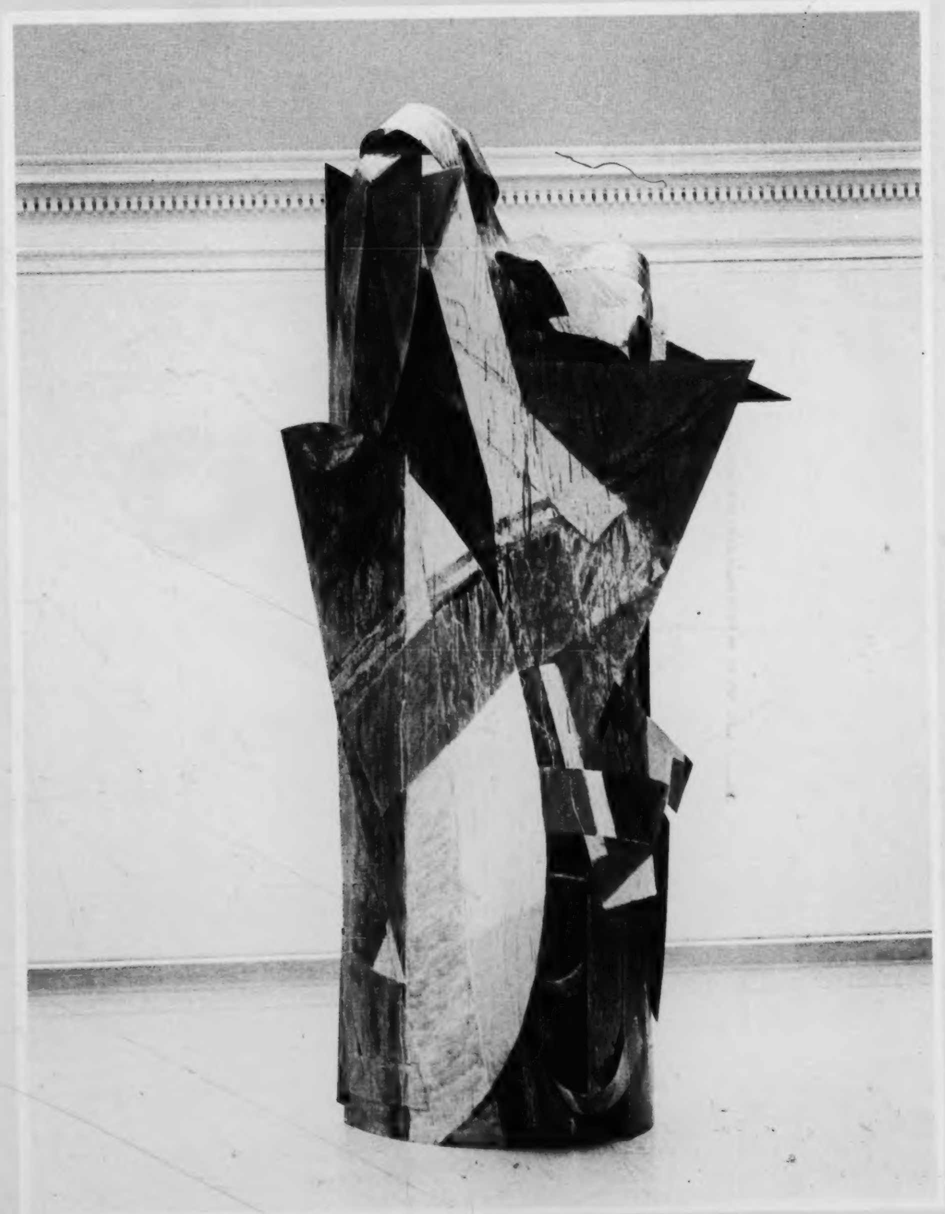
ROBERT HUDSON

"Tlingit", 1980. Installation July 1980.

10' x [illegible] x 5'10", painted aluminum. Anchorage, Alaska Federal Building Courthouse. Commissioned by the G.S.A. Art and Architecture Program.

FULLER GOLDEEN GALLERY

228 GRANT AVENUE, SAN FRANCISCO CALIFORNIA 94108 415-982-6177



TOM HOLLAND

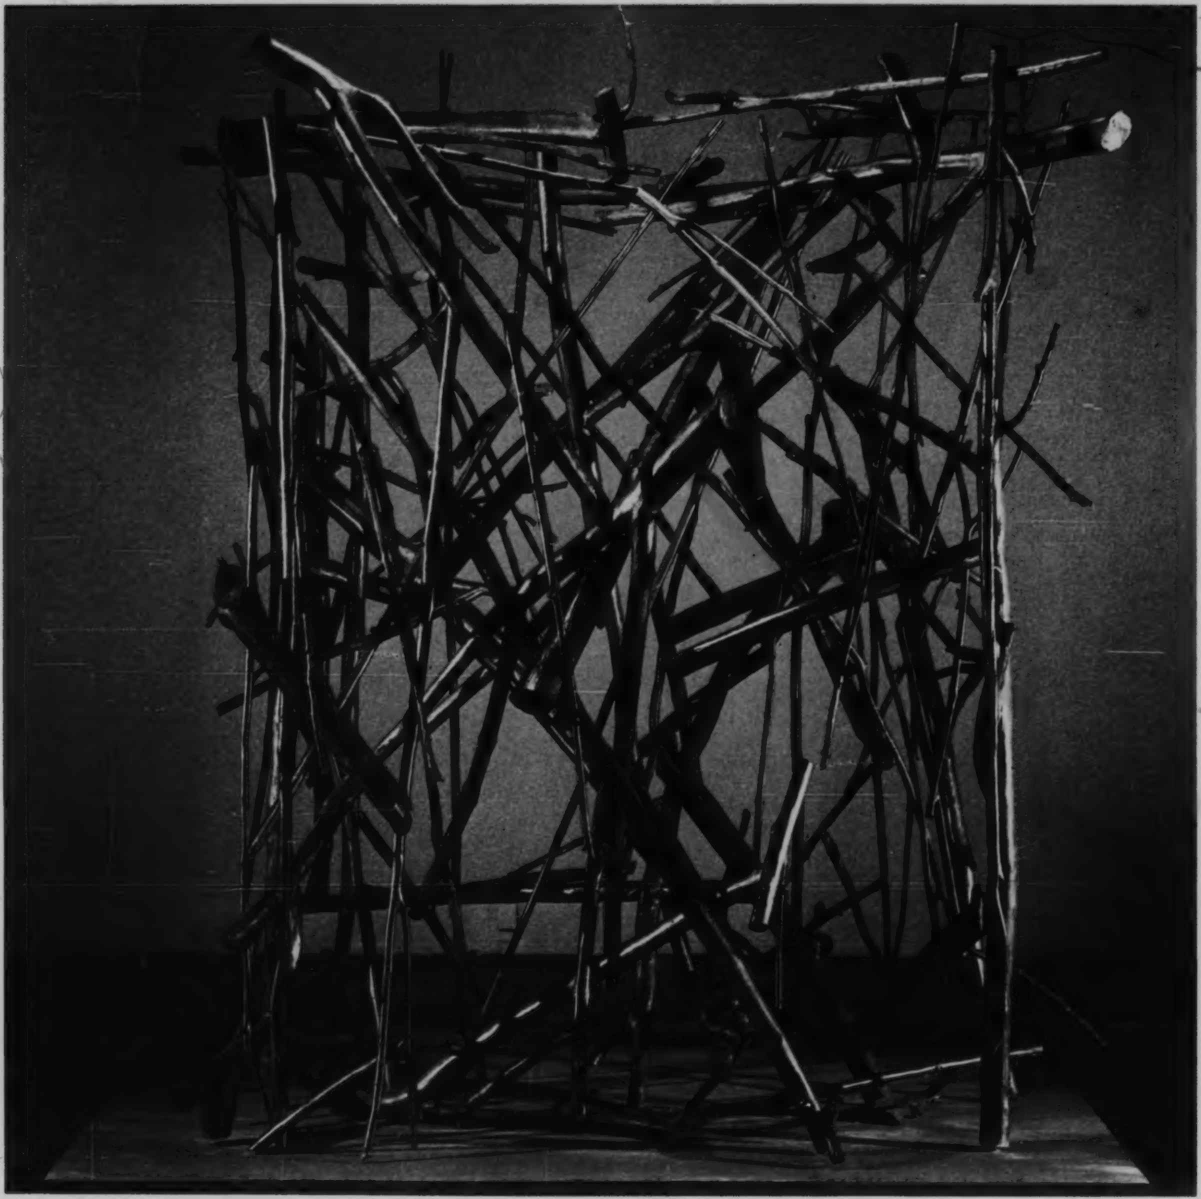
"McAdoo", 1981

18' x 5' x 6', acrylic urethane on aluminum, indoor/outdoor installation

FULLER GOLDEEN GALLERY

228 GRANT AVENUE SAN FRANCISCO CALIFORNIA 94108 415-982-6177

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI



Casting by Sun Foundry, Photo: Tom Vinetz

CHARLES ARNOLDI

"Nor Marble Nor Gilded Monument", 1982
119" x 92" x 87" represented by

JAMES CORCORAN GALLERY
8223 SANTA MONICA BOULEVARD LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA 90046 (213) 656-0662
FULLER GOLDEEN GALLERY
228 GRANT AVENUE SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA 94108 (415) 982-6177

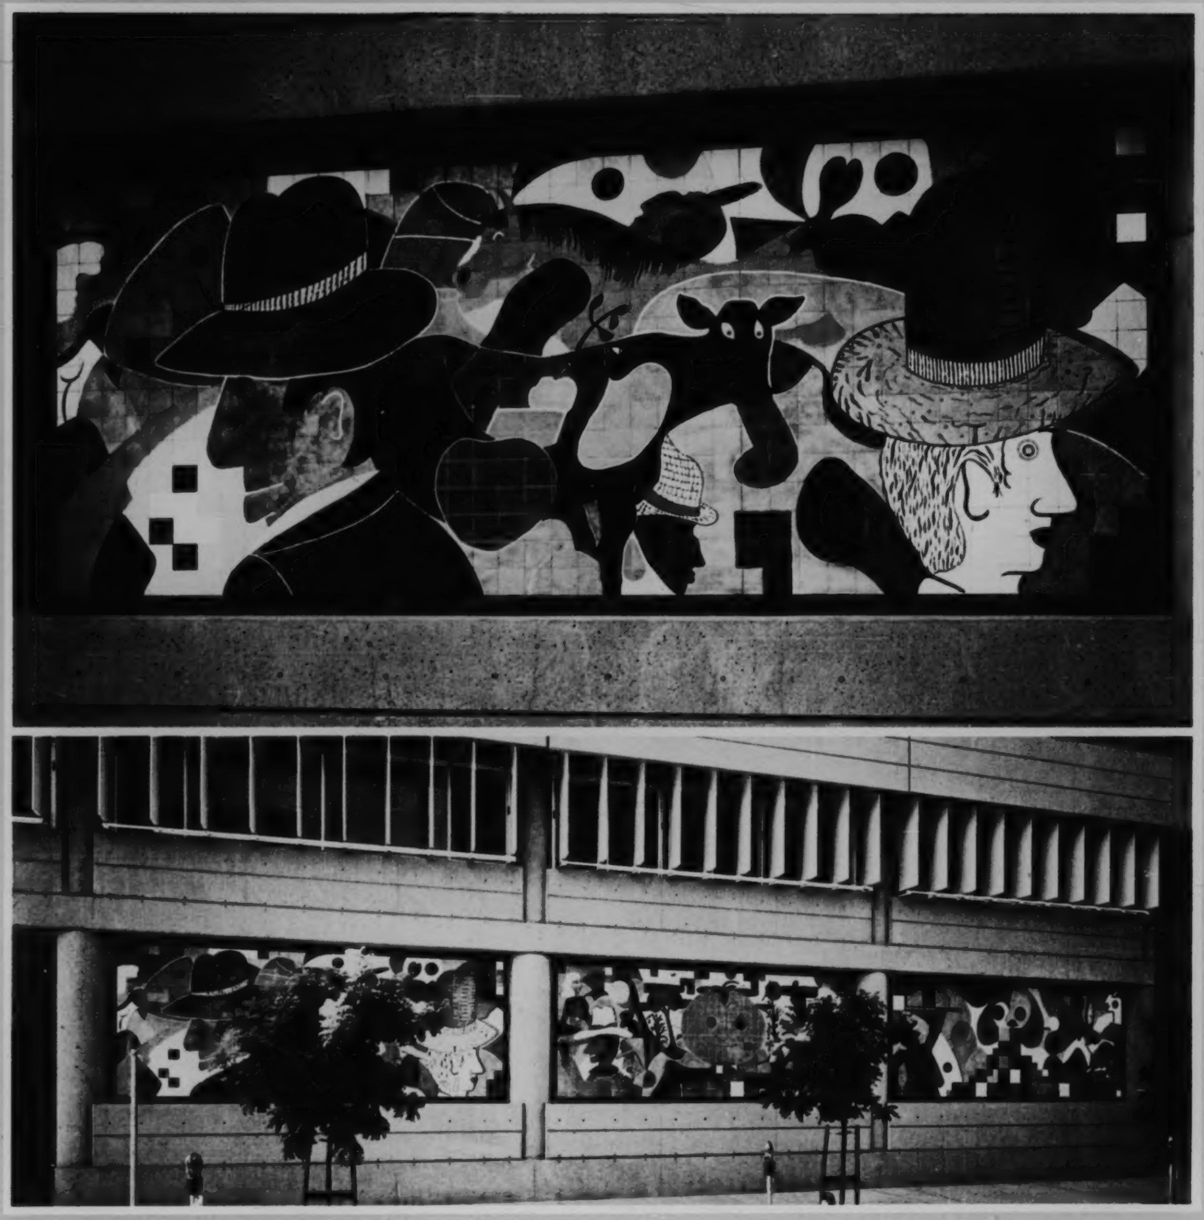


Photo credits: Ross Andelman

ROY DeFOREST

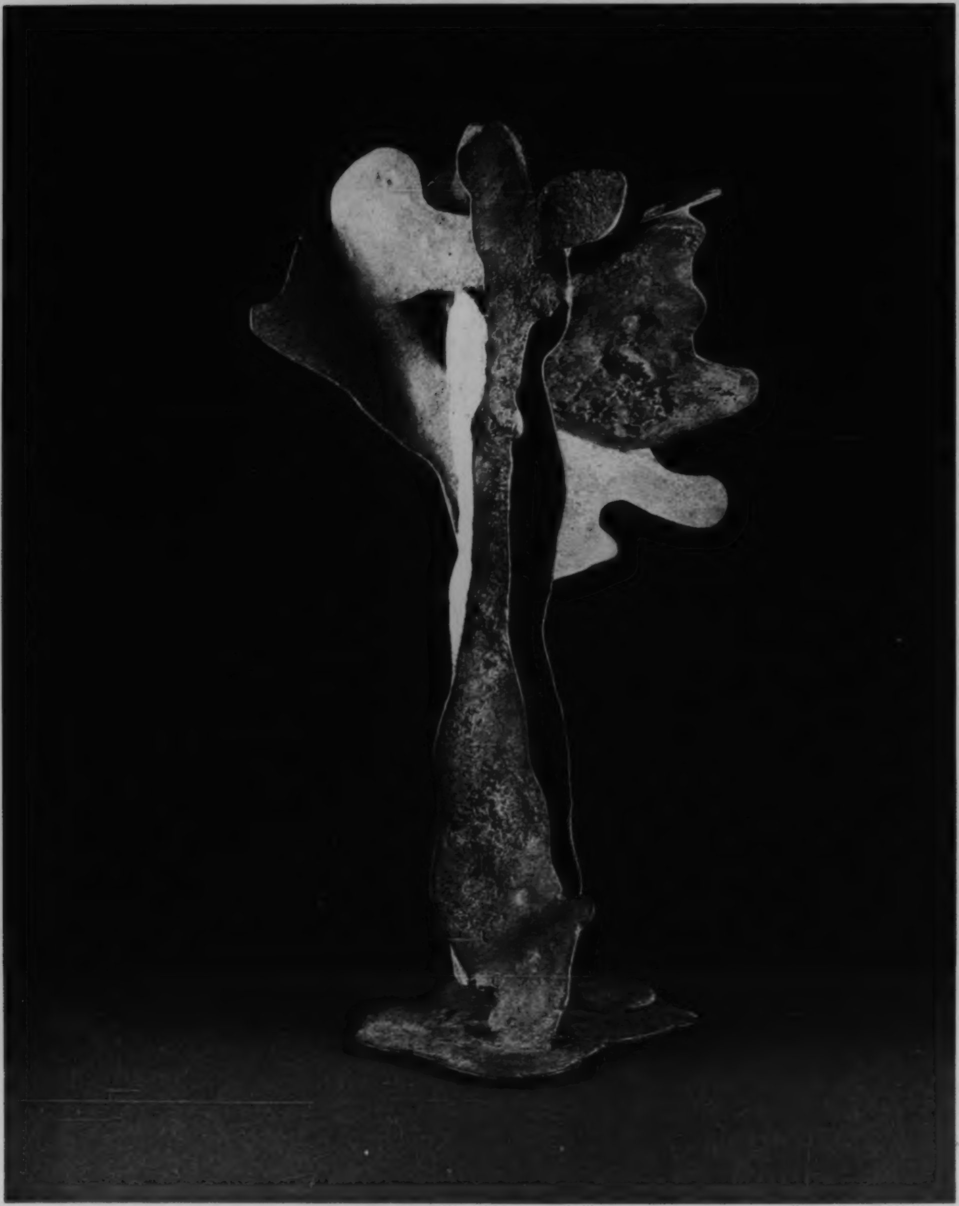
"Untitled" (California History), 1982

Triptych, 10' x 20' each panel, glazed tiles, California Energy Commission Building, Sacramento, California. Commissioned by the California Arts Council Art in Public Building Program. Installation August-September 1982

FULLER GOLDEEN GALLERY

228 GRANT AVENUE, SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA 94108 415-982-6177

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI



ISAAC WITKIN
"Linden Tree", 1982 (maquet) bronze, 25½x16½x12 inches. Exclusively represented by:

HIRSCHL & ADLER MODERN
851 MADISON AVENUE NEW YORK, NEW YORK 10021 (212) 744-6700

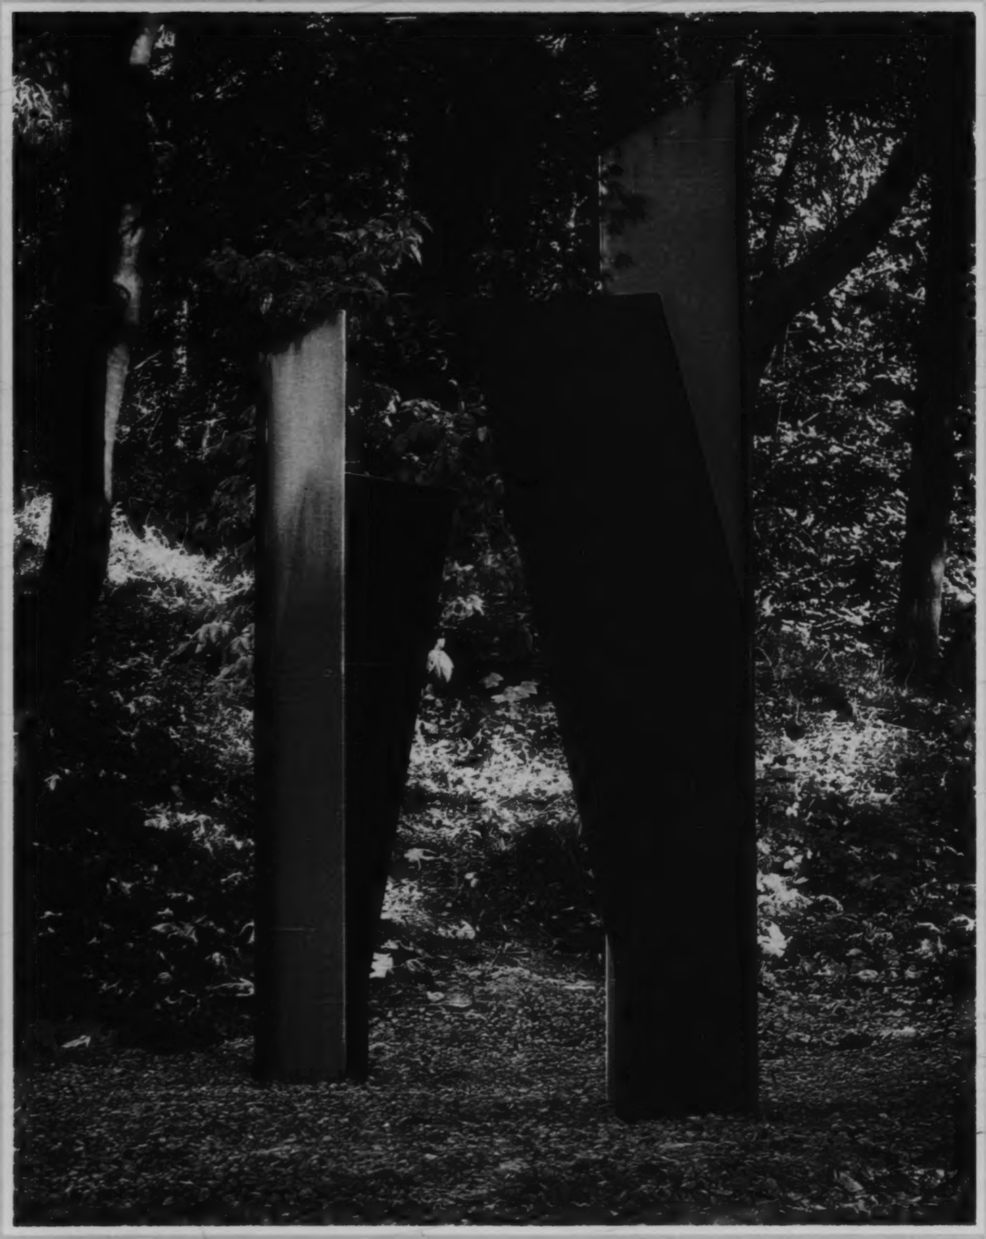

Photo credit: Ed Marquand

CHRISTOPHER WILMARTH

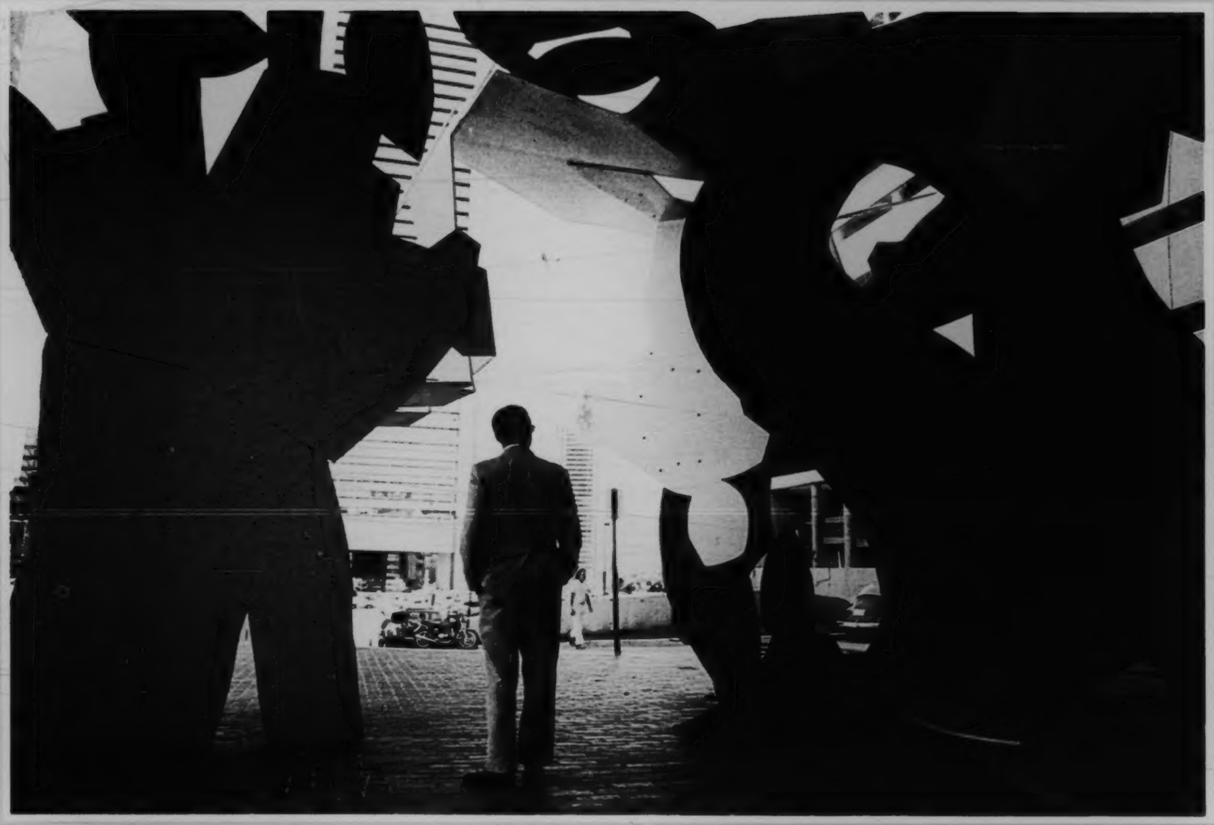
"Long Leaver's Gate", 1979

bronze and glass, each element 90x30x30 inches, Private collection, Seattle. Exclusively represented by:

HIRSCHL & ADLER MODERN

851 MADISON AVENUE NEW YORK, NEW YORK 10021 (212) 744-6700

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI



GEORGE SUGARMAN
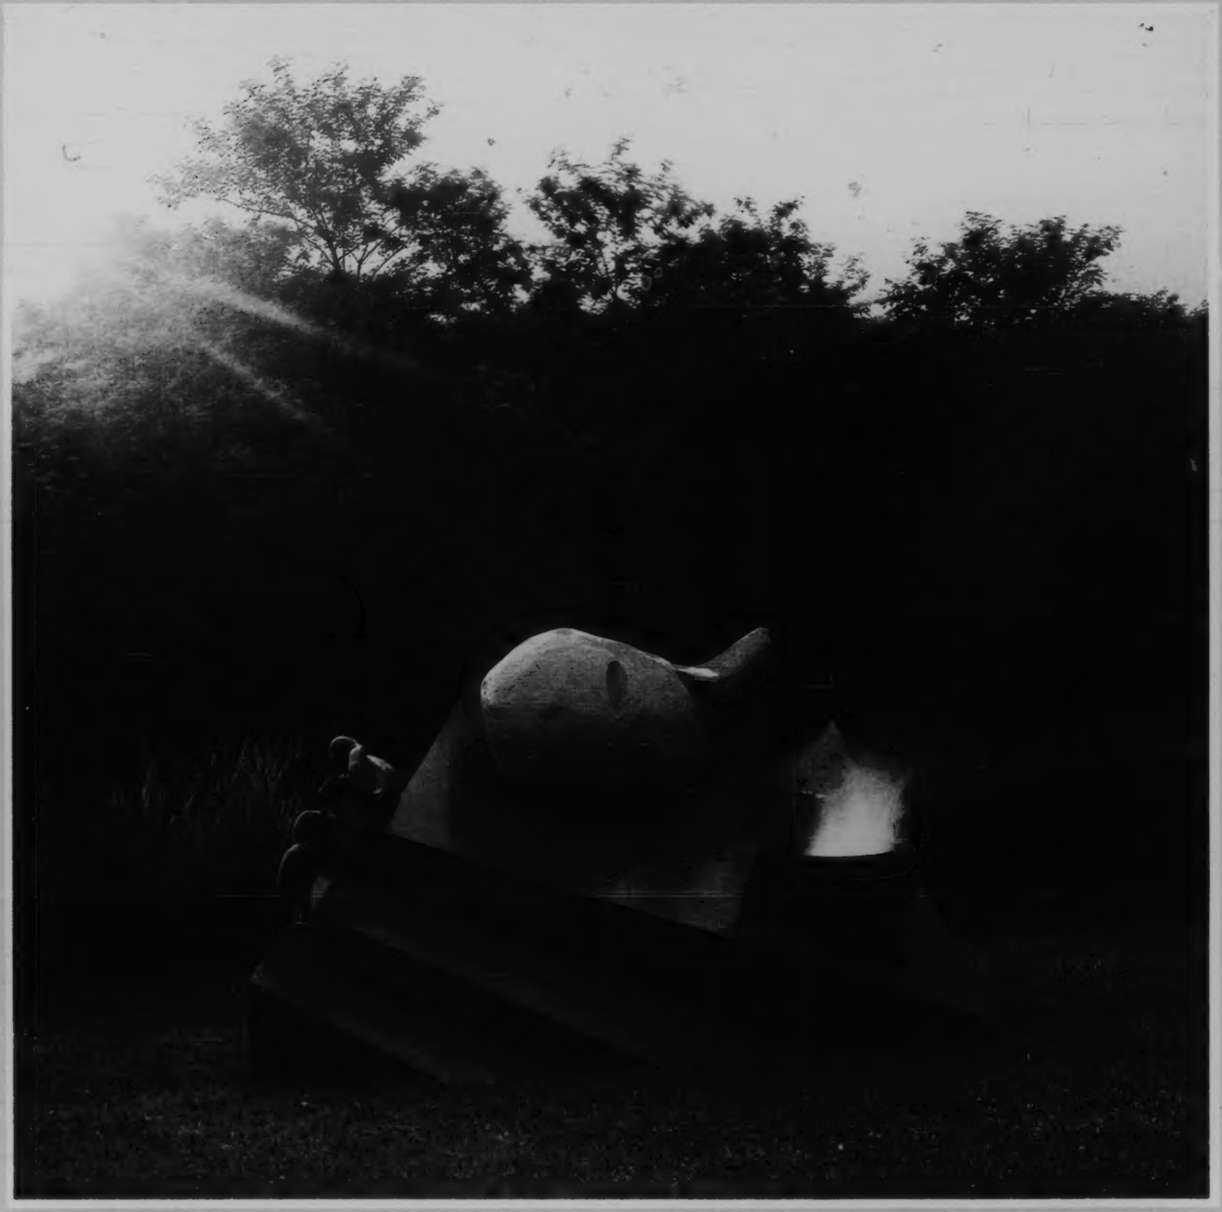
Detail of "Baltimore Federal" complex painted aluminum, approximately 50 feet x 50 feet, installed 1977

ROBERT MILLER GALLERY
724 FIFTH AVENUE NEW YORK 10019 (212) 246-1625



JEDD GARET

"Nothing Too Strange and Beautiful" painted aluminum, 12' high x 10' wide x 10' deep, 1982, photographed at Wave Hill, New York

ROBERT MILLER GALLERY

724 FIFTH AVENUE NEW YORK (212) 246-1625

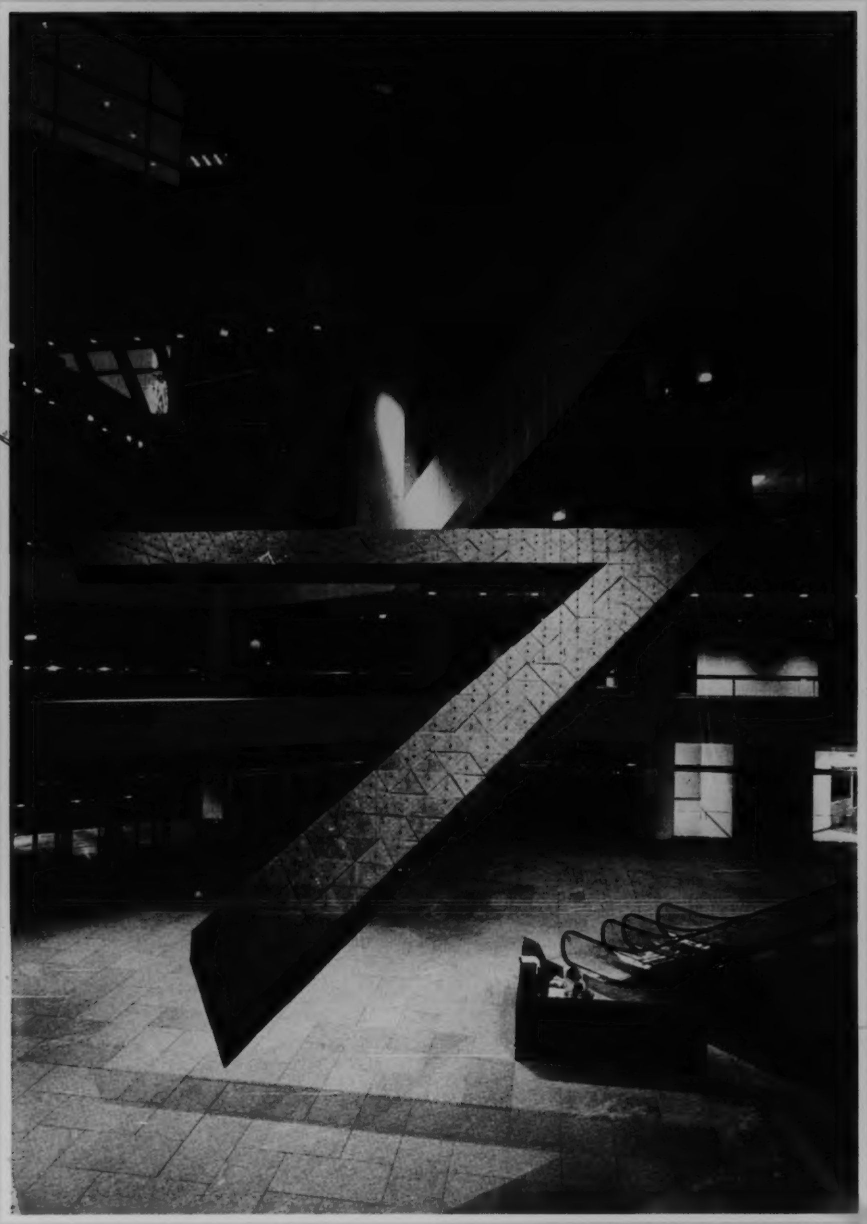
BERNHARDT ARTS

26 EAST 64TH STREET NEW YORK (212) 751-2460

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

JIM HUNTINGTON
"Lost Autumn" 1981-82
Granite and stainless steel, 13' high x 12½' wide x 10' deep. Commission completed for Hahn Company, Santa Rosa, California.
Jim Huntington is represented by

DAVID MCKEE GALLERY
41 EAST 57TH STREET NEW YORK, NY 10022 (212) 688-5951



LOREN MADSEN

"Untitled", 1981

276 granite blocks on independent cables, 83' high x 30' wide x 21' deep. Commission completed for the First Bank Atrium, Pillsbury Center, Minneapolis, Minnesota. Loren Madsen is represented by:

DAVID MCKEE GALLERY

41 EAST 57TH STREET NEW YORK, NY 10022 (212) 688-5951

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

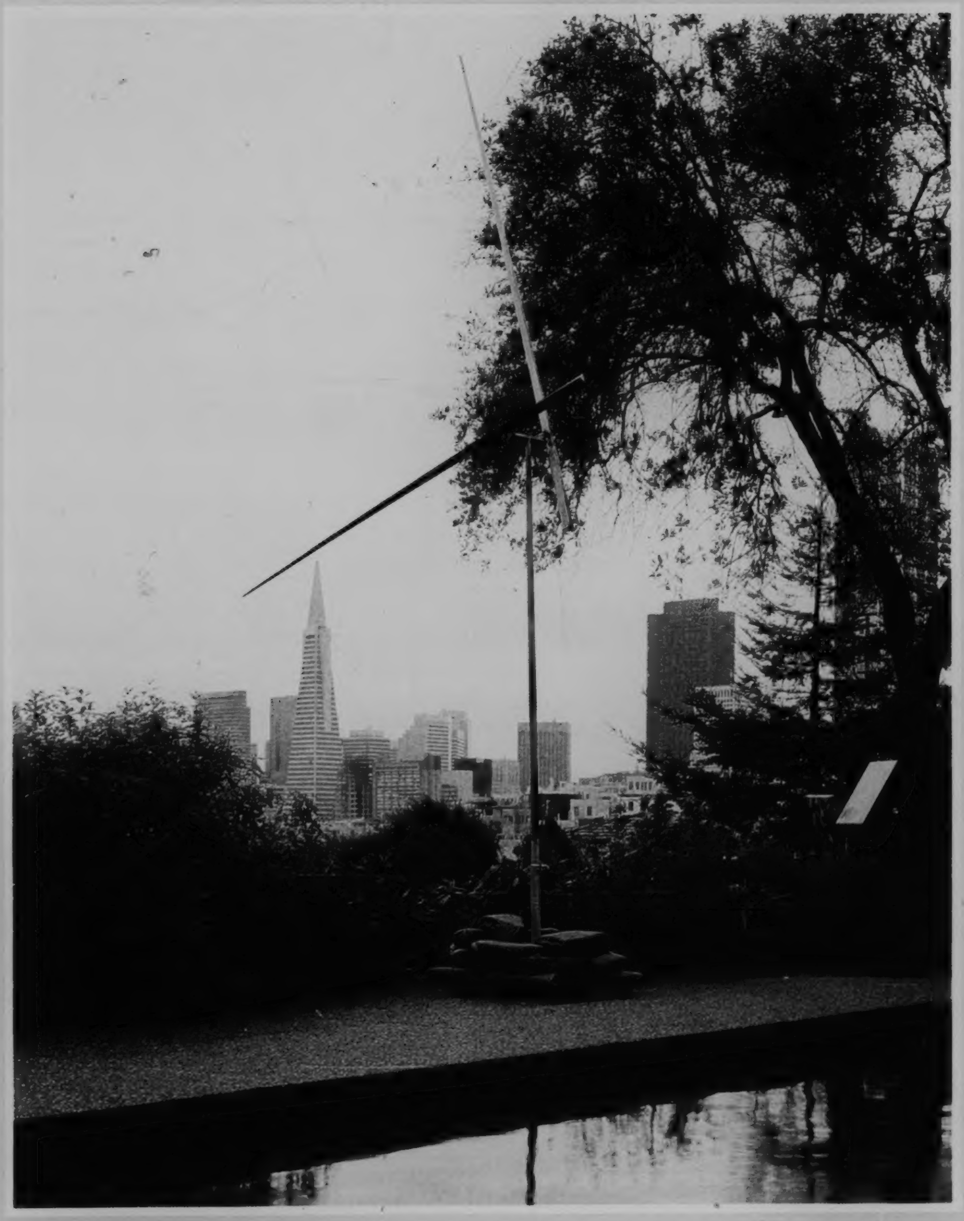
FLETCHER BENTON

"Balanced Unbalanced Three Triangles" steel, 26½'

John Berggruen Gallery specializes in sculpture by the following artists: Fletcher Benton, Alexander Calder, Stephen De Staebler, Manuel Neri, Nathan Oliveira, Beverly Pepper, George Rickey, Brian Wall

JOHN BERGGRUEN GALLERY

228 GRANT AVENUE SAN FRANCISCO (415) 781-4629



GEORGE RICKEY

"Two Lines Leaning", stainless steel, 17'

John Berggruen Gallery specializes in sculpture by the following artists: Fletcher Benton, Alexander Calder, Stephen De Staebler, Manuel Neri, Nathan Oliveira, Beverly Pepper, George Rickey, Brian Wall.

JOHN BERGGRUEN GALLERY

228 GRANT AVENUE SAN FRANCISCO (415) 781-4629

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

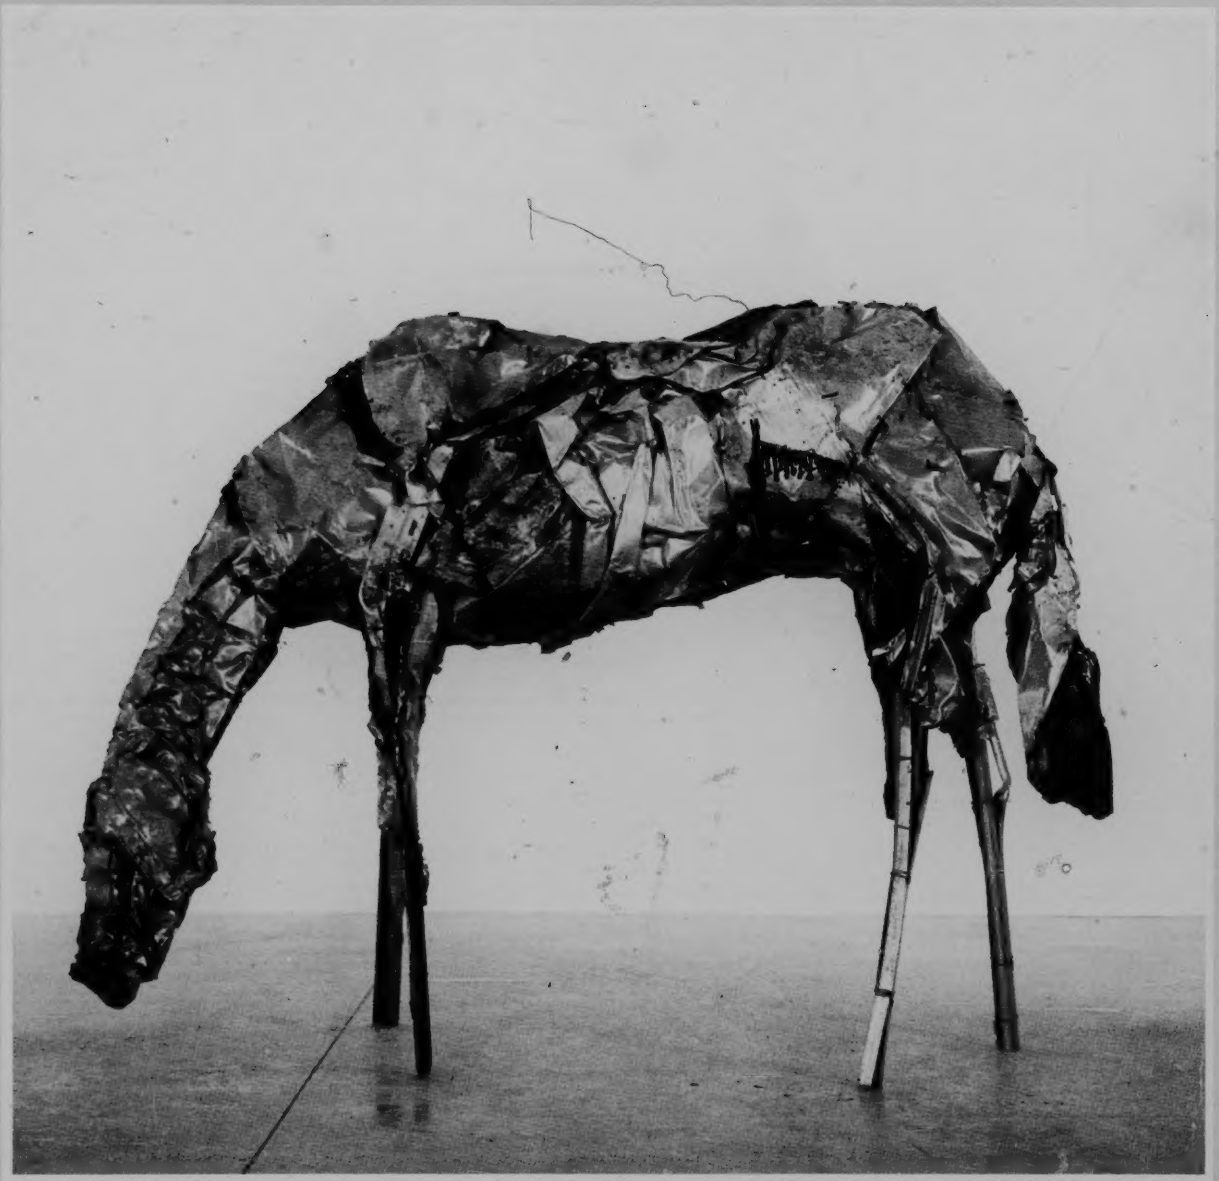
JOAN MIRO

"Oiseau", 1981

Bronze, 82 × 63 × 71 inches; 210 × 160 × 180 cm; Cast at Fonderia Fratelli Bonvicini, Verona. To be installed on the terrace at the entrance to the Annenberg Auditorium, Cummings Art Building, Stanford University, Spring 1983

GALERIE MAEGHT

U.S. OFFICE 9 WEST 57TH STREET NEW YORK, N.Y. 10019 49TH FLOOR (212) 371-9077



DEBORAH BUTTERFIELD

Horse #7-82 1982

Aluminum, steel, tar over metal armature 76" x 36" x 30" Concurrent Exhibitions May 6-June 8, 1983

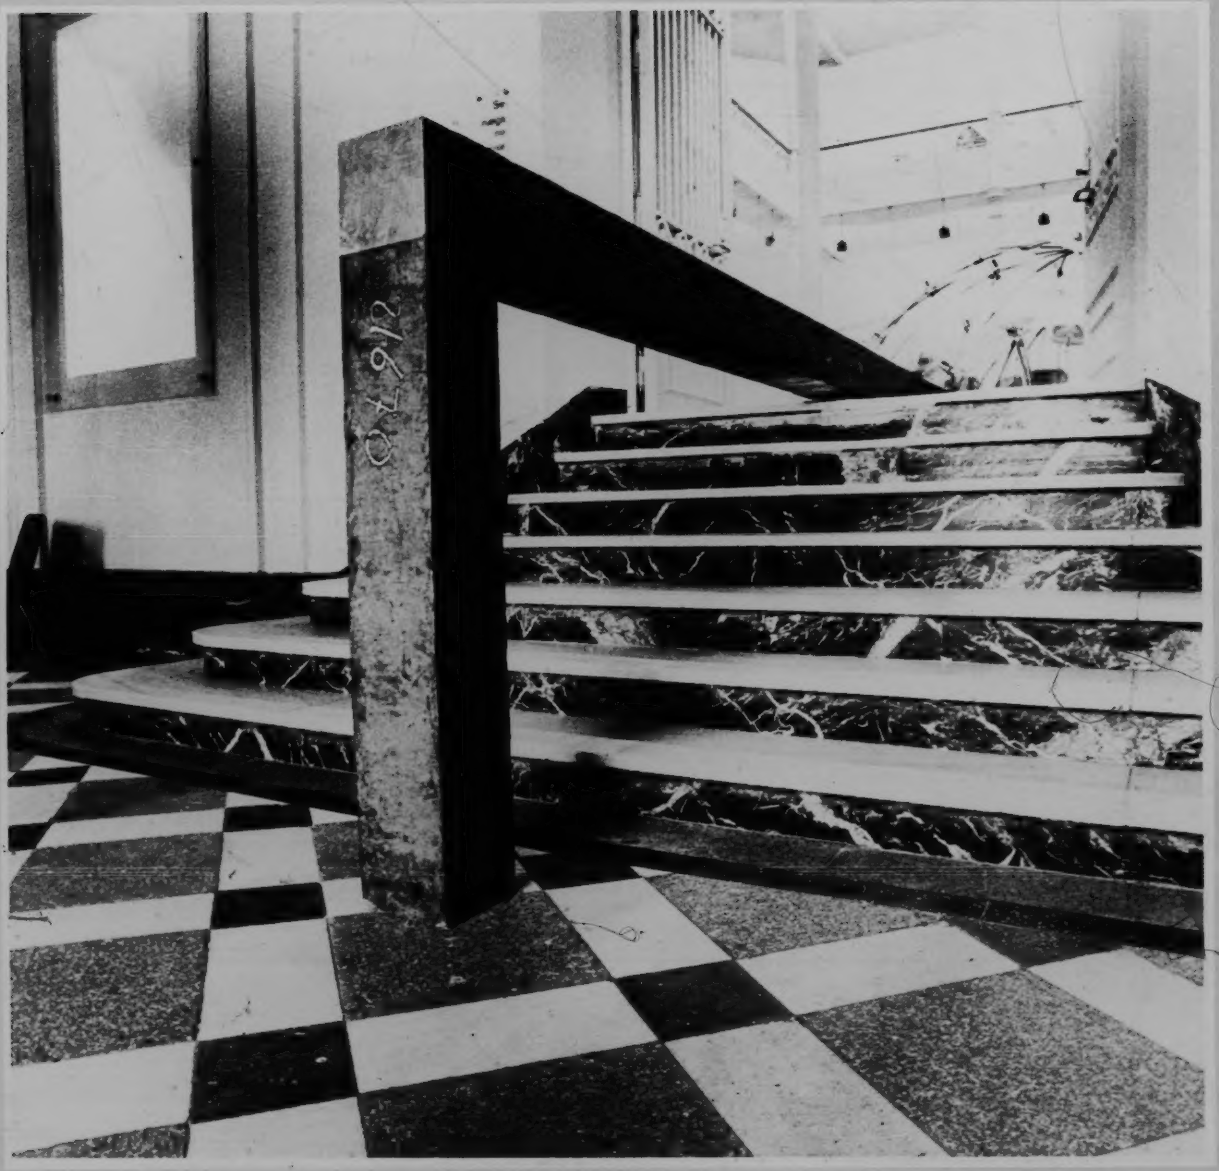
CHICAGO CULTURAL CENTER

(RANDOLPH & MICHIGAN AVENUE)

ZOLLA/LIEBERMAN GALLERY

356 WEST HURON CHICAGO, ILLINOIS 60610 (312) 944-1990

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI



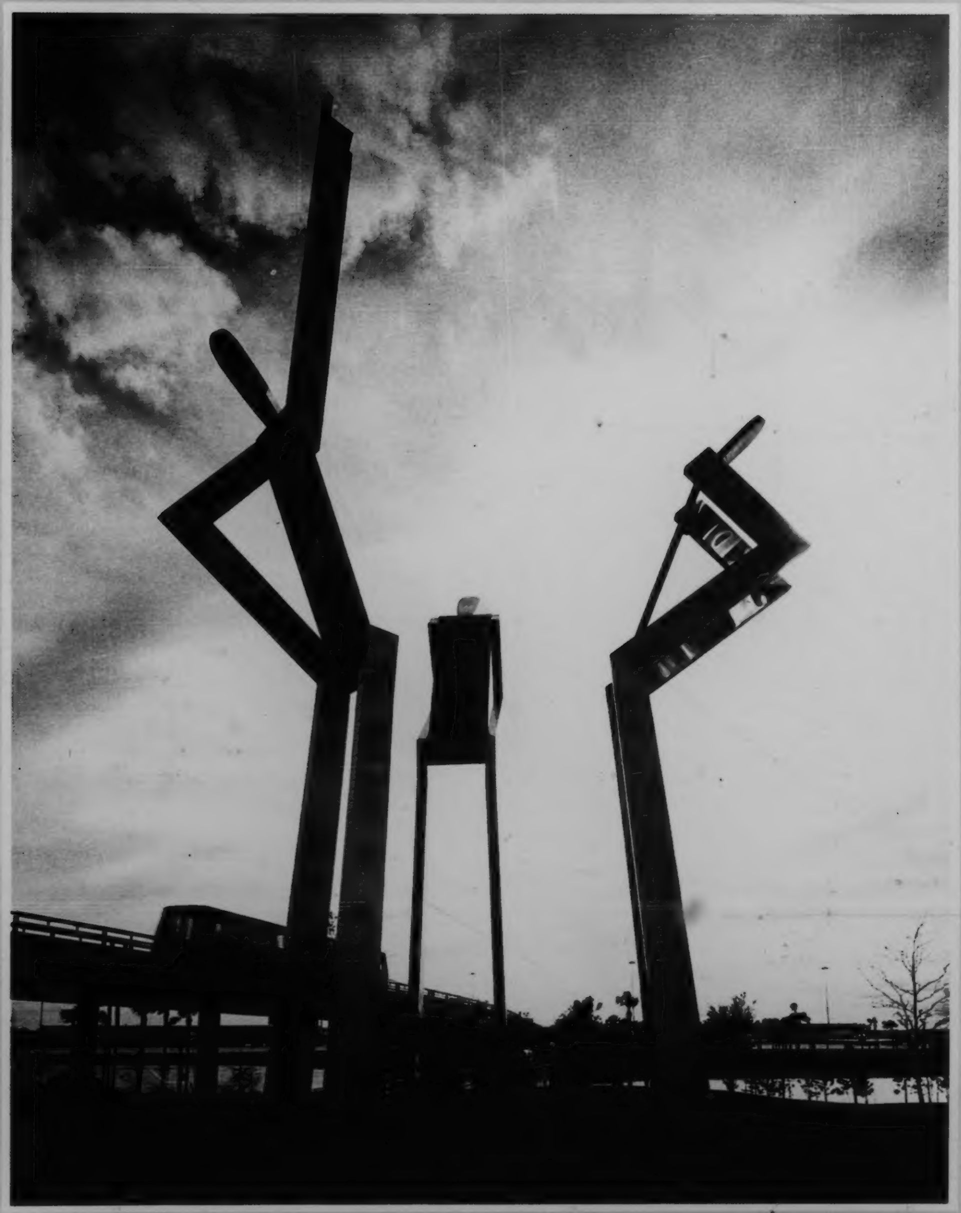
RICHARD SERRA

"STEP" 1982

18 ft. long, 5 ft. high, 8 inches thick. Two solid square steel beams. Collection, Jacques Hachuel, Madrid. Created in situ for exhibition "Correspondences: 5 Architects - 5 Sculptors," Madrid, Malaga, Bilbao, Barcelona.

"CORRESPONDENCIAS:5 ARQUITECTOS - 5 ESCULTORES"

Exhibition organized by Juan Munoz and Carmen Gimenéz



(photo credit: J.B. McCourtney)

WILLIAM KING

"At the Airport", 1983.

Stainless steel, Height 48 feet. Location: Orlando International Airport, Orlando, Florida

TERRY DINTENFASS GALLERY

50 WEST 57TH STREET NEW YORK, N.Y. 10019 (212) 581-2268

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

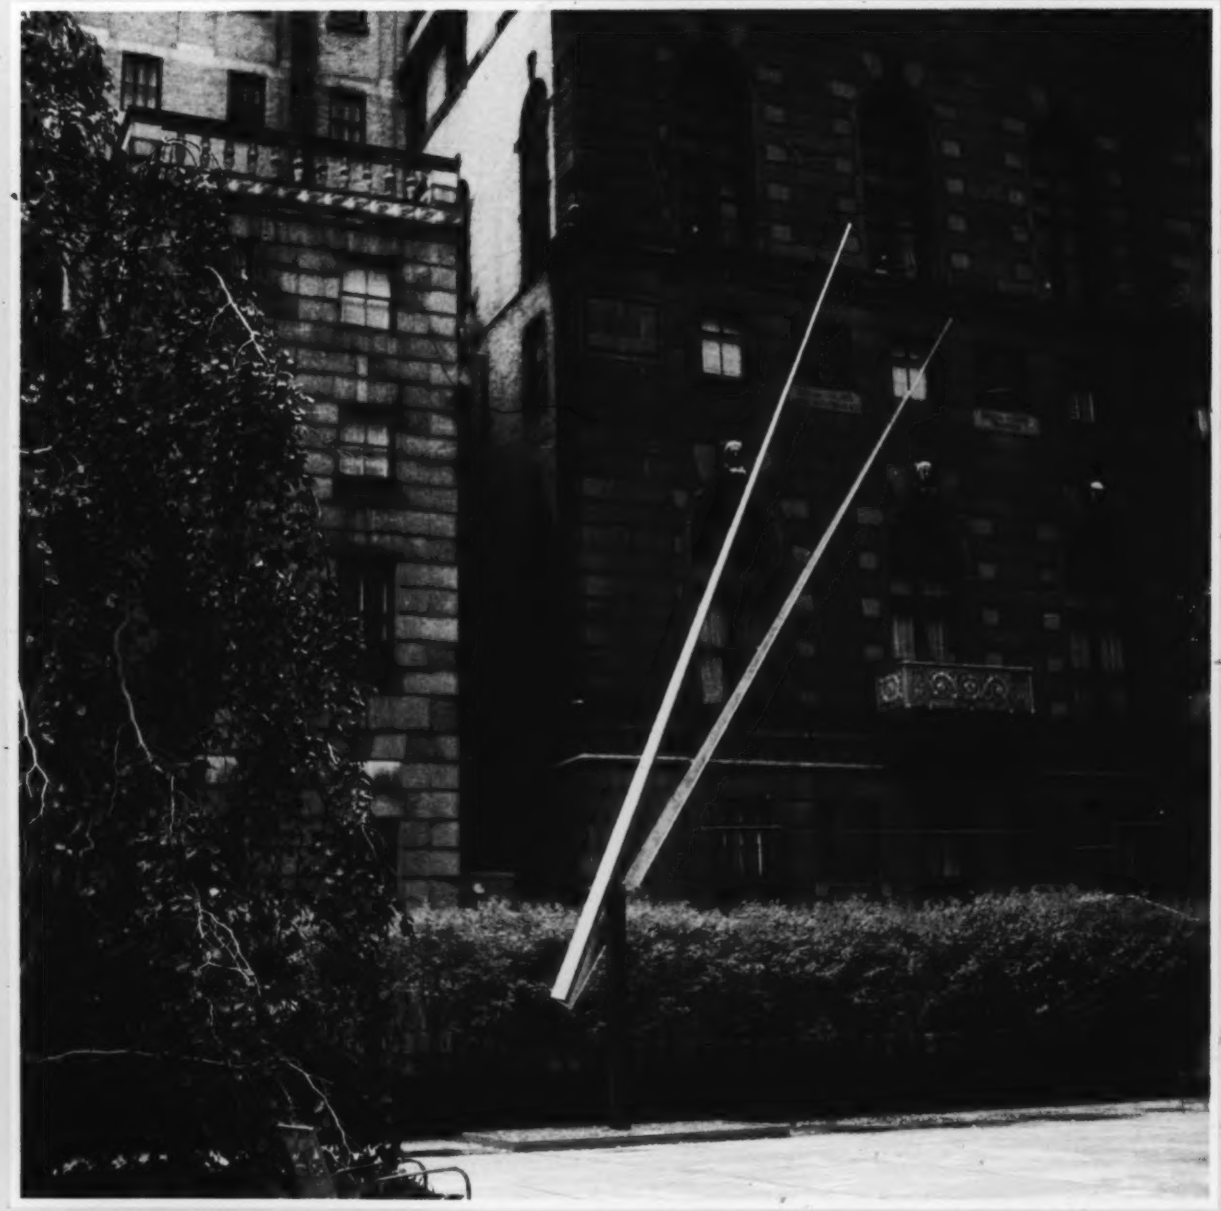


Photo Credit: Frank Lerner

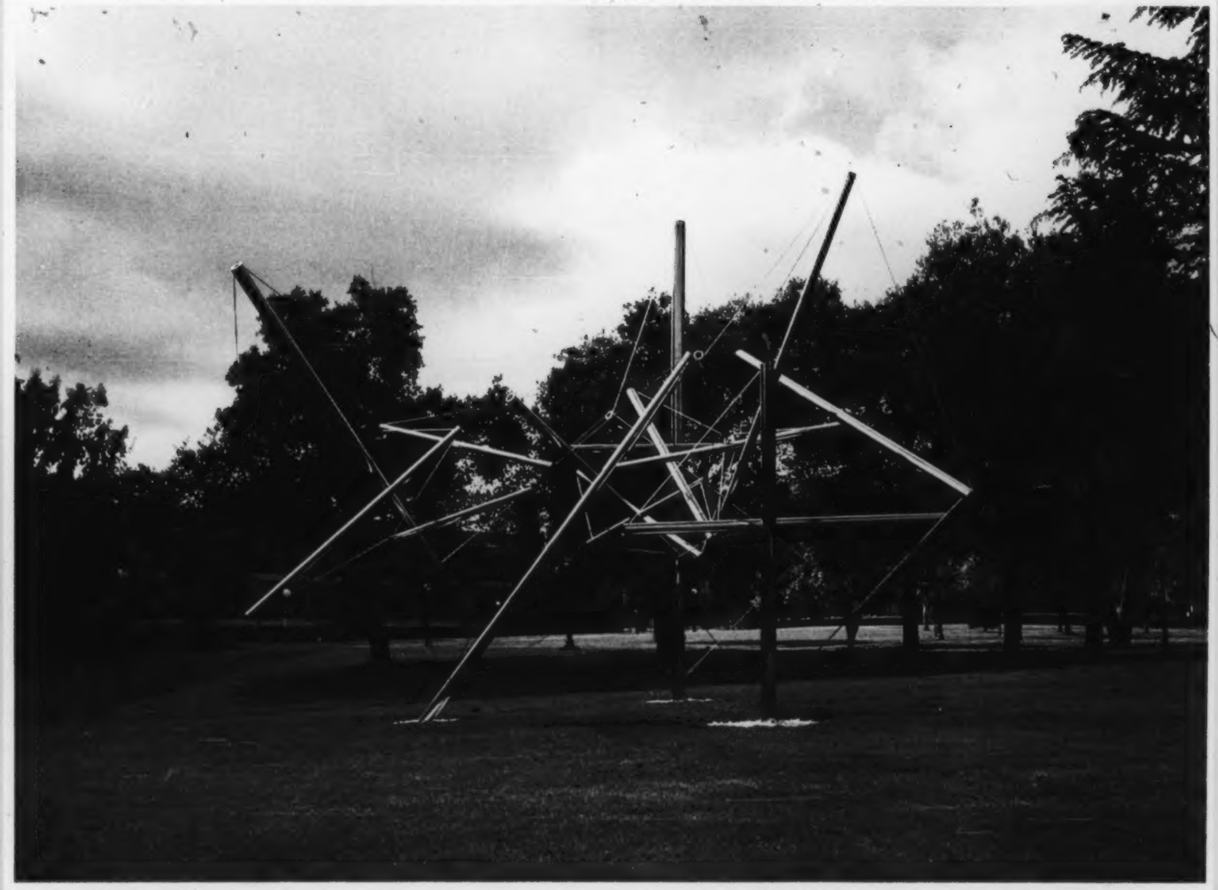
GEORGE RICKEY

"Two Lines Temporal I", 1964

Stainless Steel, 35' 2¾" x 2'6" x 2'6". Collection, Museum of Modern Art, New York. Mrs. Simon Guggenheim Fund. Exhibition October, 1983. Inquiries for commissions are invited.

THOMAS SEGAL GALLERY

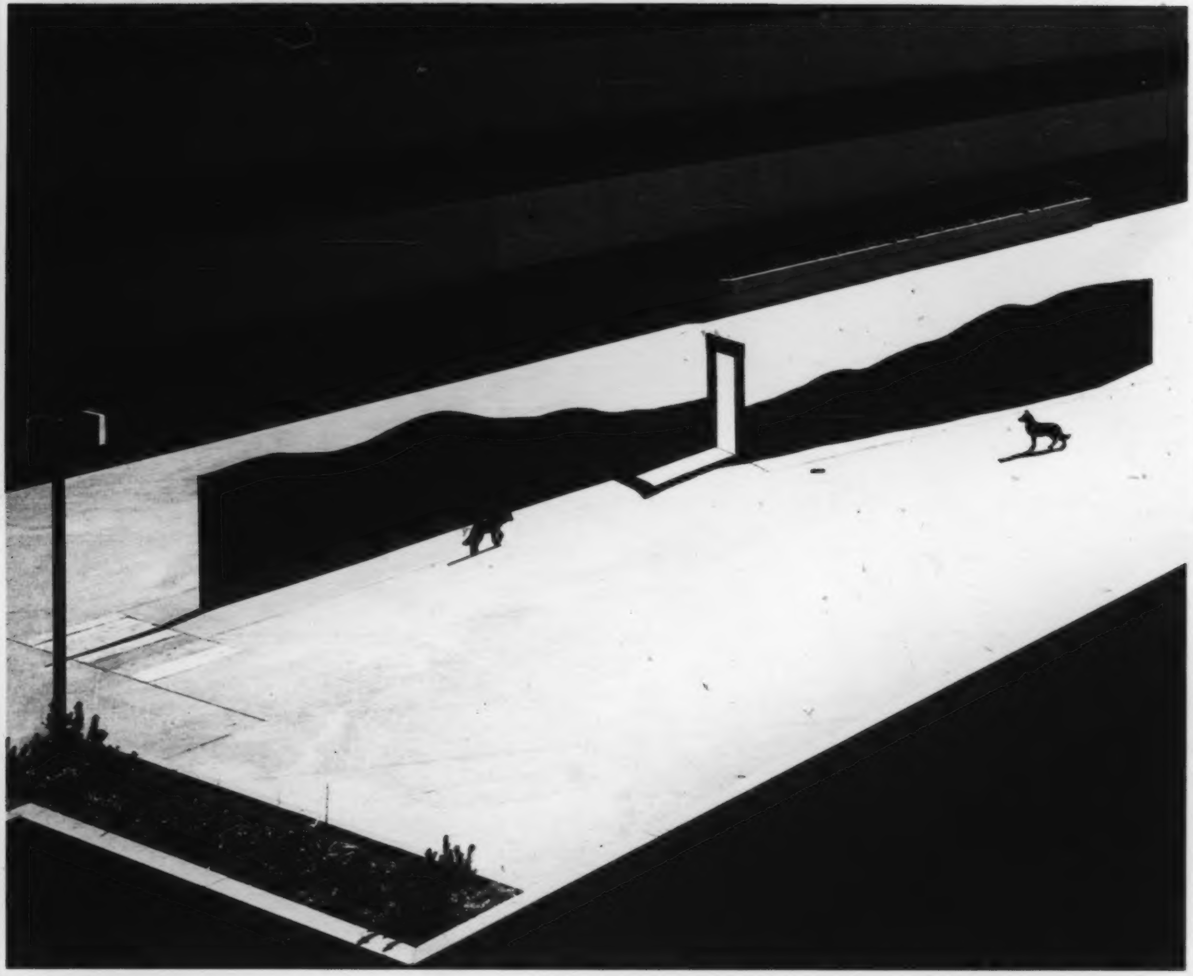
73 NEWBURY STREET BOSTON, MA 02116 617-266-3500



KENNETH SNELSON
"Mozart I" 1982
Stainless steel, 24 ft. x 30 ft. x 30 ft. Commissioned for Stanford University, Palo Alto, California. Represented by

ZABRISKIE
724 FIFTH AVENUE NEW YORK 10019 212-307-7430
521 WEST 57TH STREET NEW YORK By Appointment 37 RUE QUINCAMPOIX PARIS FRANCE 75004

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI



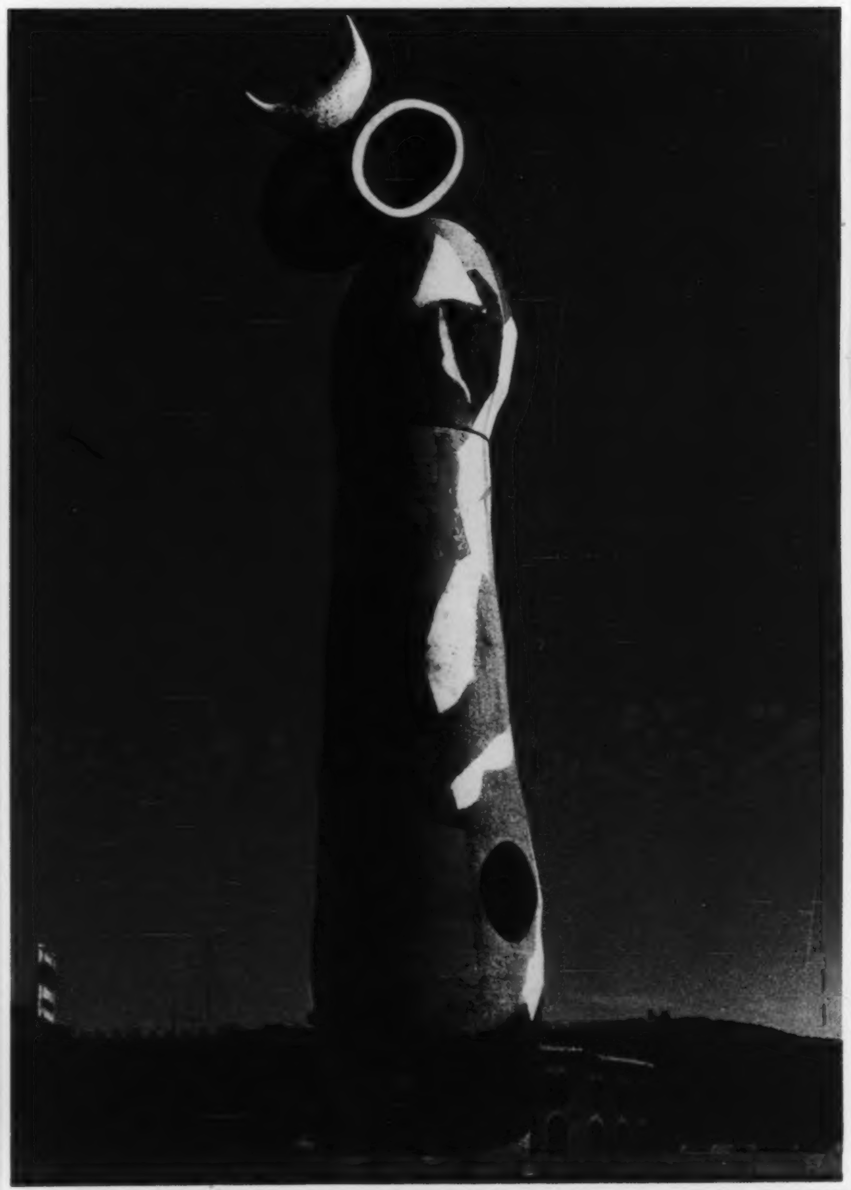
JOHN McEWEN

Western Channel

Landscape and architectural templates of 1¼-inch corten steel plate, 3 life-size canine silhouettes (one not shown) of flame-cut 2½-inch corten steel plate, 8' high × 80' long. Commissioned by the Performing Arts Centre, University of Lethbridge, Alberta, 1981. Recent works by John McEwen at 49th Parallel/49e Parallèle, 420 West Broadway, New York, March 26 - April 23.

THE YDESSA GALLERY

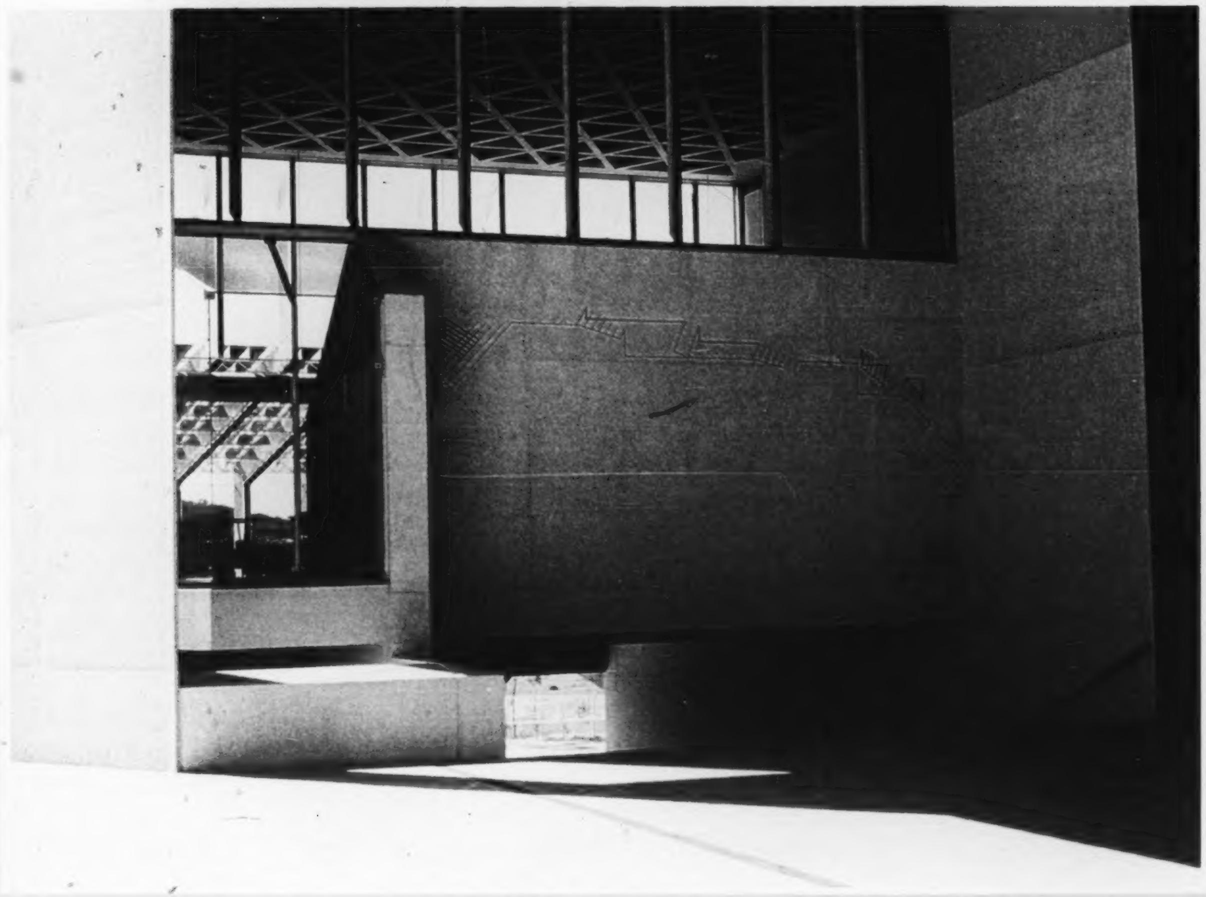
334 QUEEN STREET WEST TORONTO, CANADA M5V 2A2 TELEPHONE (416) 593-1100



JOAN MIRO
Exhibition of sculpture, gouaches 7 graphics April 13-May 21 Catalogue available

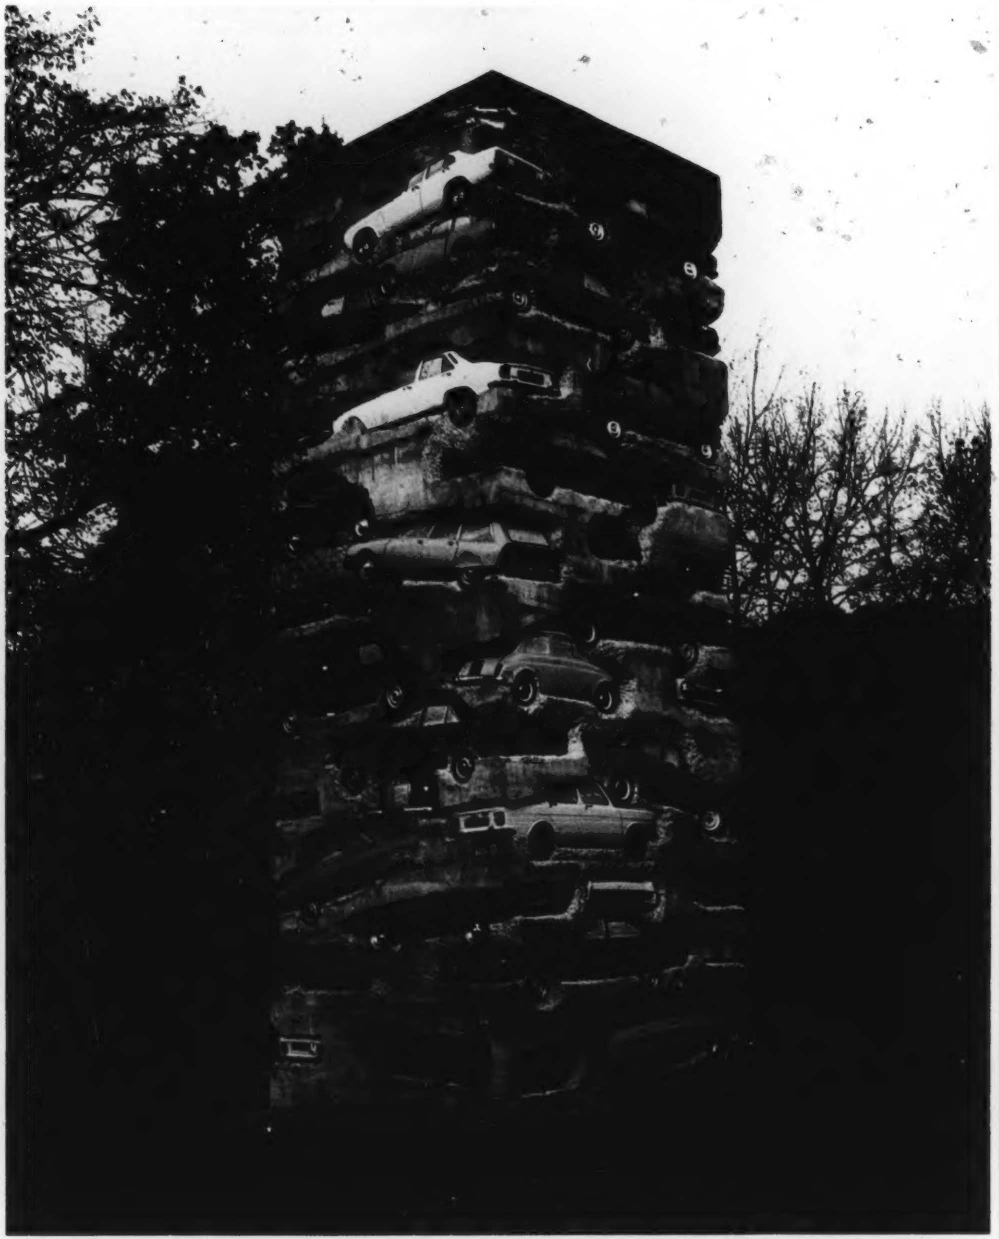
GALERIA MAEGHT
CALLE MONTCADA 25 BARCELONA - 3, SPAIN
GALERIE ADRIEN MAEGHT
46, RUE du BAC PARIS 75007, FRANCE

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI



NIGEL HALL
"Canberra"
aluminum sculpture, 11½ feet high by 24 feet wide by 2¼ feet deep, 1982, Collection Australian National Gallery, Canberra, Australia

ROBERT ELKON GALLERY
1063 MADISON AVENUE NEW YORK, NEW YORK 10028 (212) 535-3940



ARMAN

"Long Term Parking." 1982

Size: 18 m x 6 m x 6 m. It is to be seen at the Centre d'Art Contemporain du Montcel in Jouy en Josas 78350 France

GALERIE BEAUBOURG

23, RUE DU RENARD 75004 PARIS. TEL. 271.20.50

VOL
7
1

ISS
4

AP

1983

UMI

Photograph: Lee Boltin

WILL HORWITT

"SKY" 1983

Bronze, 12' 9"h. Courtesy: National Trust for Historic Preservation · Collection: Nelson A. Rockefeller · Site: Pocantico Hills

"DRAWING IN THIRTY-EIGHT PARTS AND RELATED BRONZES" MAY 3-JUNE 3, 1983

VANDERWOUDE TANANBAUM GALLERY

24 E 81 STREET NEW YORK CITY 10028 (212) 879-8200

NO POSTAGE
NECESSARY
IF MAILED
IN THE
UNITED STATES

BUSINESS REPLY CARD
FIRST CLASS PERMIT NO. 542 MARION, OHIO

POSTAGE WILL BE PAID BY ADDRESSEE

Art in America
542 Pacific Avenue
Marion, Ohio 43306

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

Art in America
SAVINGS CERTIFICATE
For the Sum of Up to $42.90

Subscribe now to the world's most innovative art magazine and save up to 35% off the single copy price.*

Save me
☐ 35% off the newsstand price 3 Years (33 issues) only $79.95 — a $42.90 savings.
☐ 27% off the newsstand price 2 Years (22 issues) only $59.95 — a $21.95 savings.
☐ 15% off the newsstand price 1 Year (11 issues) only $34.95 — a $6.00 savings.

Name______________________________
Address____________________________
City____________ State________ Zip________
☐ Payment enclosed ☐ Please bill me Please charge my ☐ MasterCard ☐ Visa Account Number __________ Exp. Date ______ Signature __________

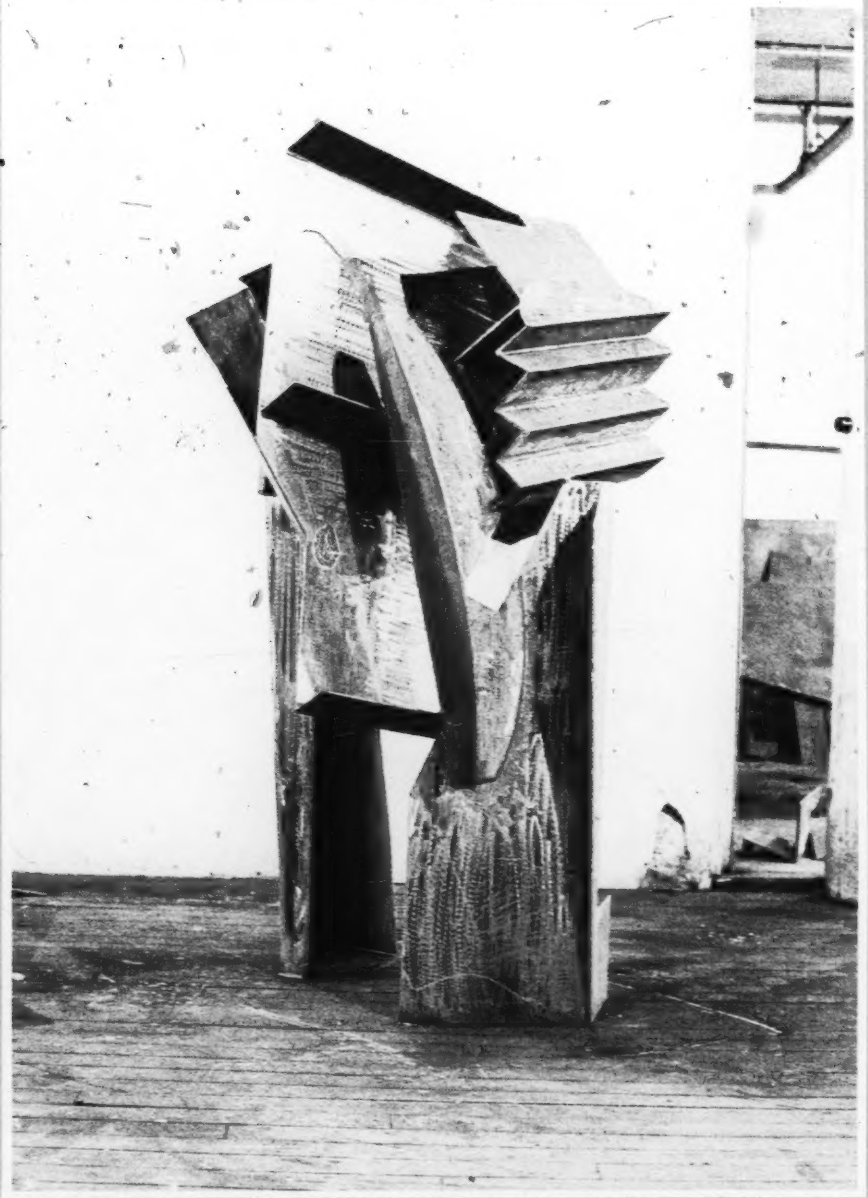
*All subscriptions include our new Annual Guide to Galleries, Museums, Artists—the most comprehensive national directory ever published. Please allow 6-8 weeks for delivery.
In U.S. Possessions and Canada, add $8 per year; elsewhere, add $15 per year.
EB33B



PETER REGINATO

"Garden Variety", 1982

Welded steel, 78 x 48 x 50 inches. Peter Reginato is represented by:

SALANDER-O'REILLY GALLERIES

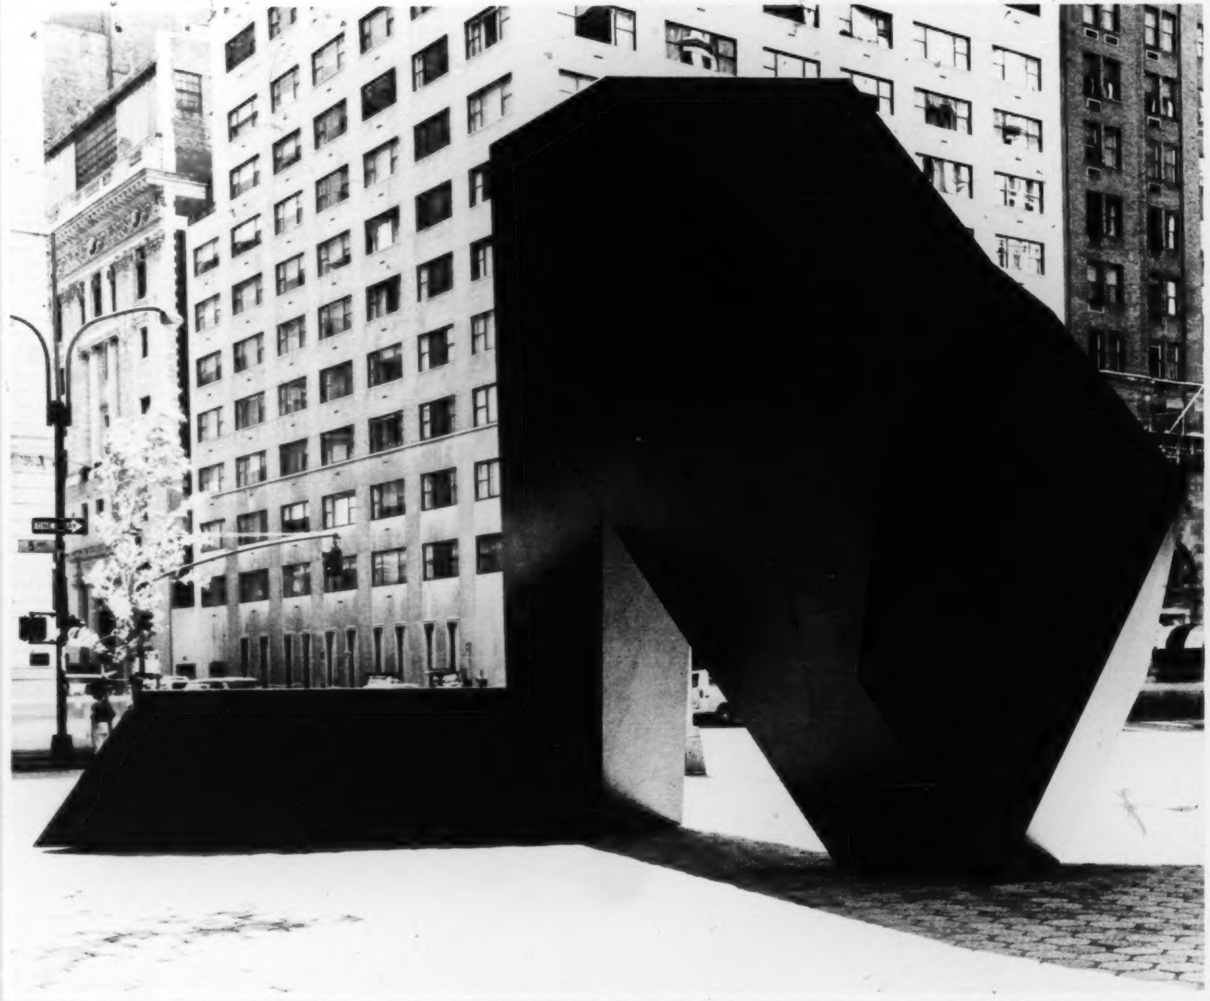
22 EAST 80TH STREET NEW YORK, N.Y. 10021 212-879-6606

VOL
7
1

ISS
4

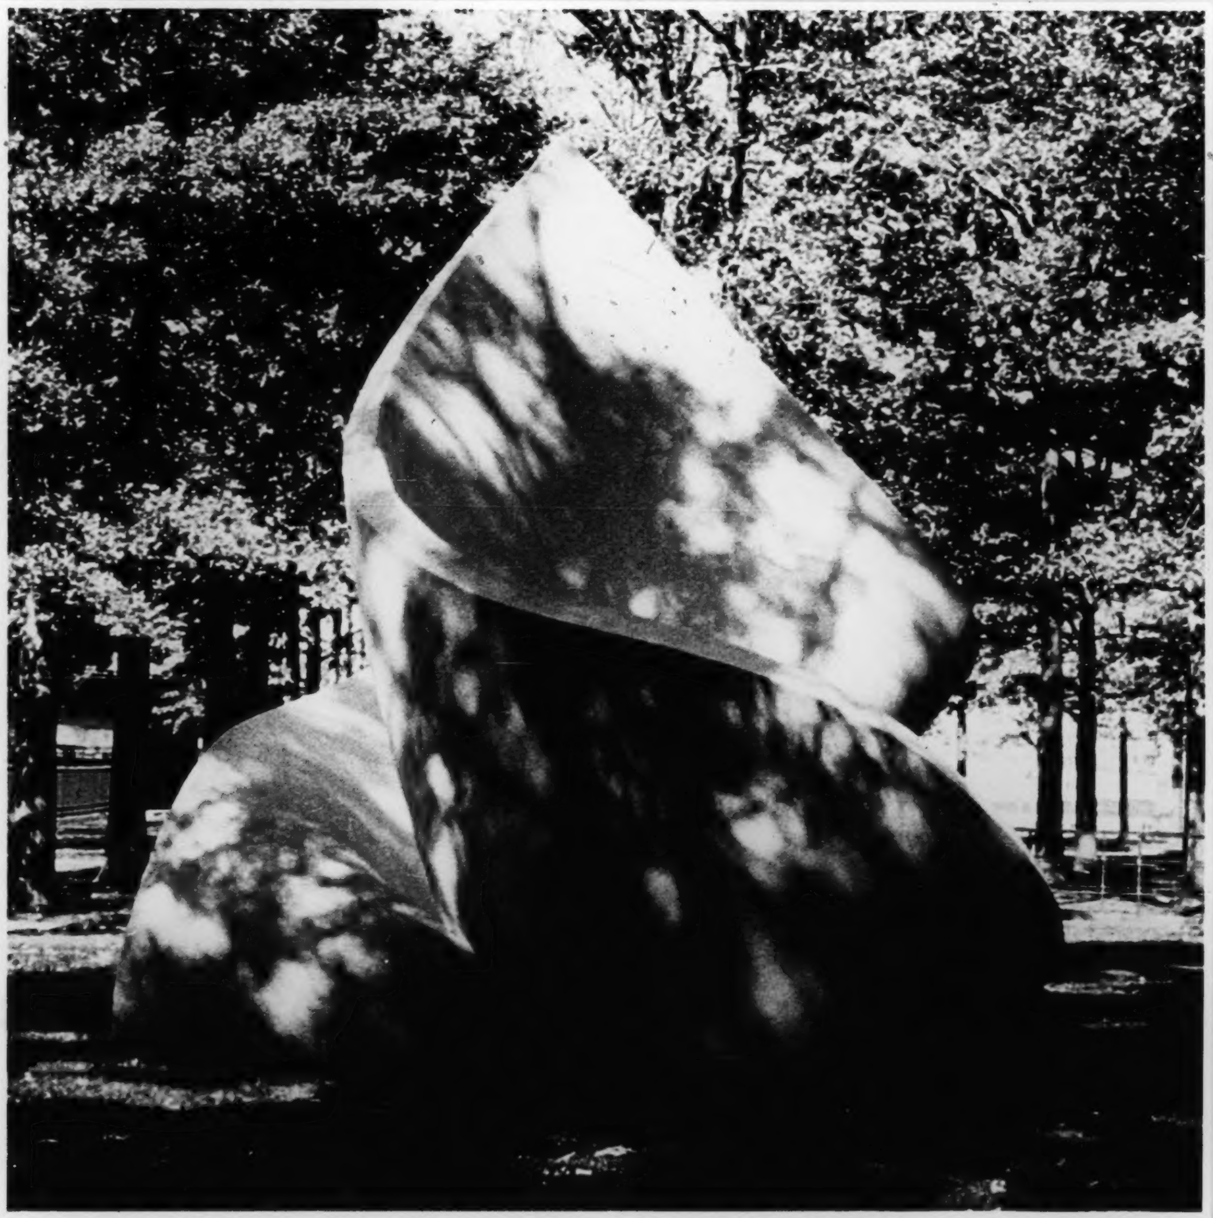
AP
1983

UMI



TONY SMITH
"Snake is Out"
Entrance to Central Park, 60th Street & Fifth Avenue, New York City   Welded mild steel, 15 x 23 x 19 feet, edition of 3

THE PACE GALLERY
32 EAST 57TH STREET   NEW YORK, NY 10022   212-421-3292



JACK YOUNGERMAN

"The Ohio", 1977, fiberglass/resin, 15' x 14' x 14', Gateway Center, Pittsburgh, Pa Sculpture Grove, 1981, Painted Steel 11 Ft. x 30 ft. x 30 ft. Central Park, New York Commission, 1983: "Helix", Wood/resin composite, 75' x 15' x 3', Neiman-Marcus Building, Chicago, Ill. To be installed August 15, 1983

WASHBURN GALLERY
42 EAST 57TH STREET NEW YORK 10022 (212) 753-0546

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

WILLIAM TUCKER

"The Promise"

30' long, 6'6" high, 3'6" deep, 1982. Built in cement on a steel frame from a full scale model built in 1980. Commissioned by Martin Z. Margulies for Grove Isle.

CARLA PANICALI

21 EAST 67TH STREET NEW YORK, NEW YORK 10021 (212) 535-3295

L'ISOLA

VIA GREGORIANA 5 - 00187 ROMA (06) 679-00-29 - 678-54-77

GEORGE RICKEY

Space Churn with Octagon II 1971-72

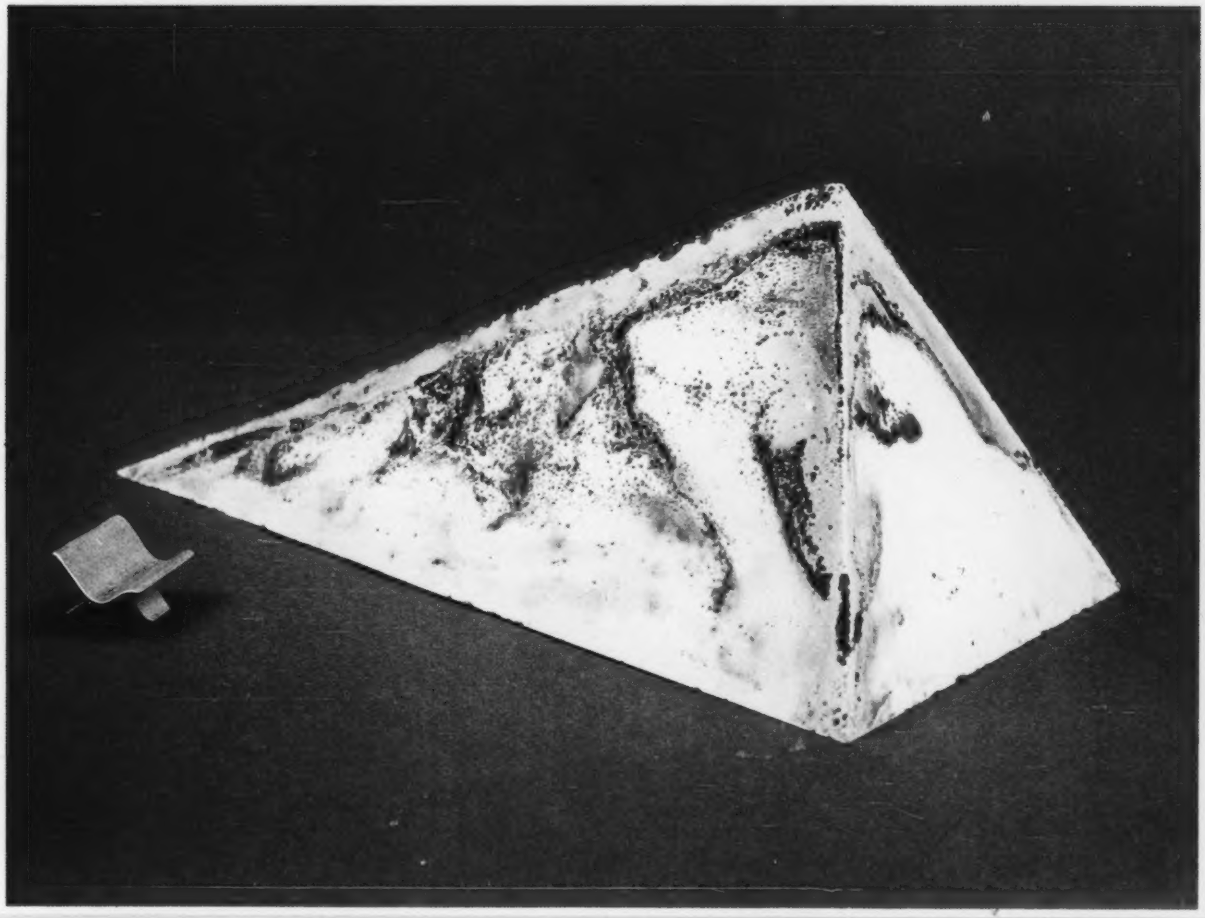
stainless steel 19'5" x 8'8" x 40" Exhibited at the George Rickey Retrospective, The Solomon R. Guggenheim Museum, New York

August 31-October 15, 1979. Your inquiry invited.

GRANT JACKS INC.

521 WEST 57TH STREET NEW YORK, NEW YORK 10019 (212) 586-4200 or (215) 293-1399

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

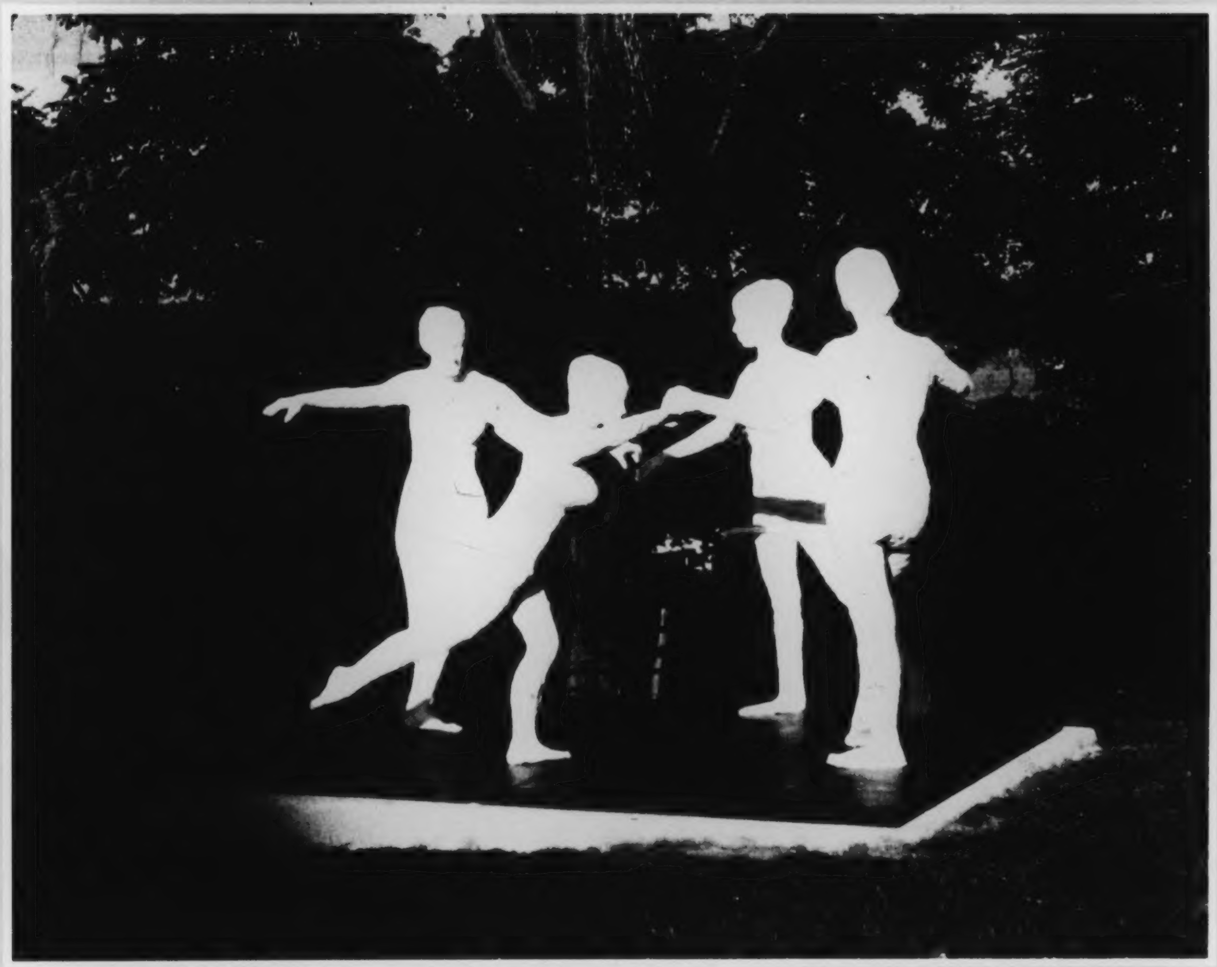


TERRY FUGATE-WILCOX

"Weathering Tetrahedron", Concrete for slow-watering fountain.
Fifteen feet high by thirty six feet long tetrahedron, with steels, iron, bronzes, brasses and copper imbedded in Portland cement, with piping to bring water to the top.

ACTUAL ART FOUNDATION

7 WORTH STREET, NEW YORK, N.Y. 10013 (212) 226-3109



GEORGE SEGAL

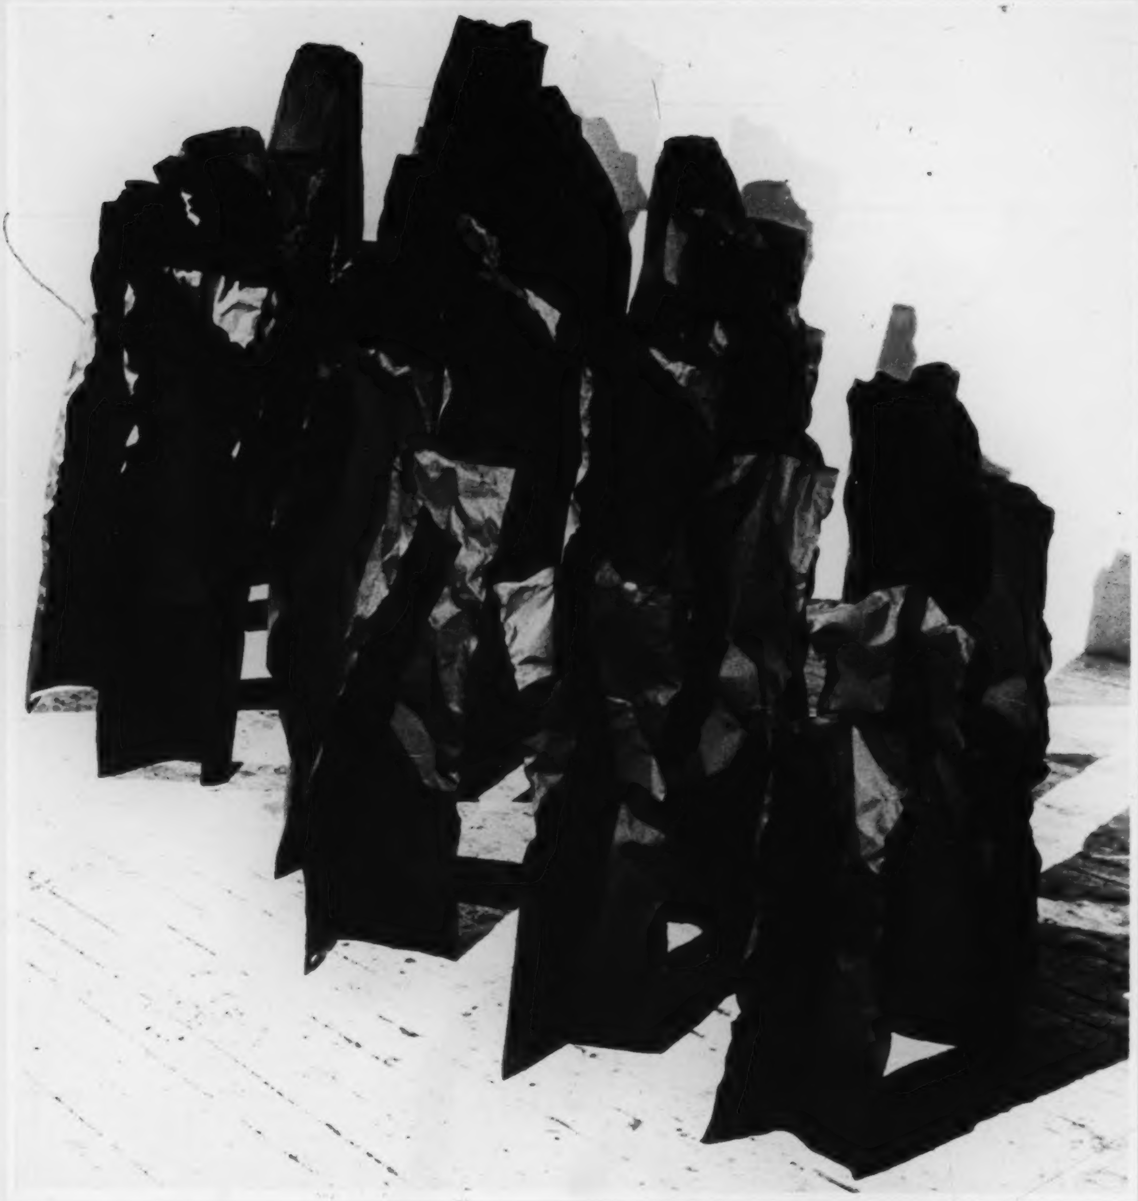
"The Dancers", 1971-1982

Bronze with white patina, 1/5, 72" high x 144" wide x 96" deep, Private Collection, New York

SIDNEY JANIS GALLERY

110 WEST 57TH STREET NEW YORK, NEW YORK 10019 (212) 586-0110

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI



ROSEMARIE CASTORO

"The force of my entire body bent sheet steel until a human gesture emerged"

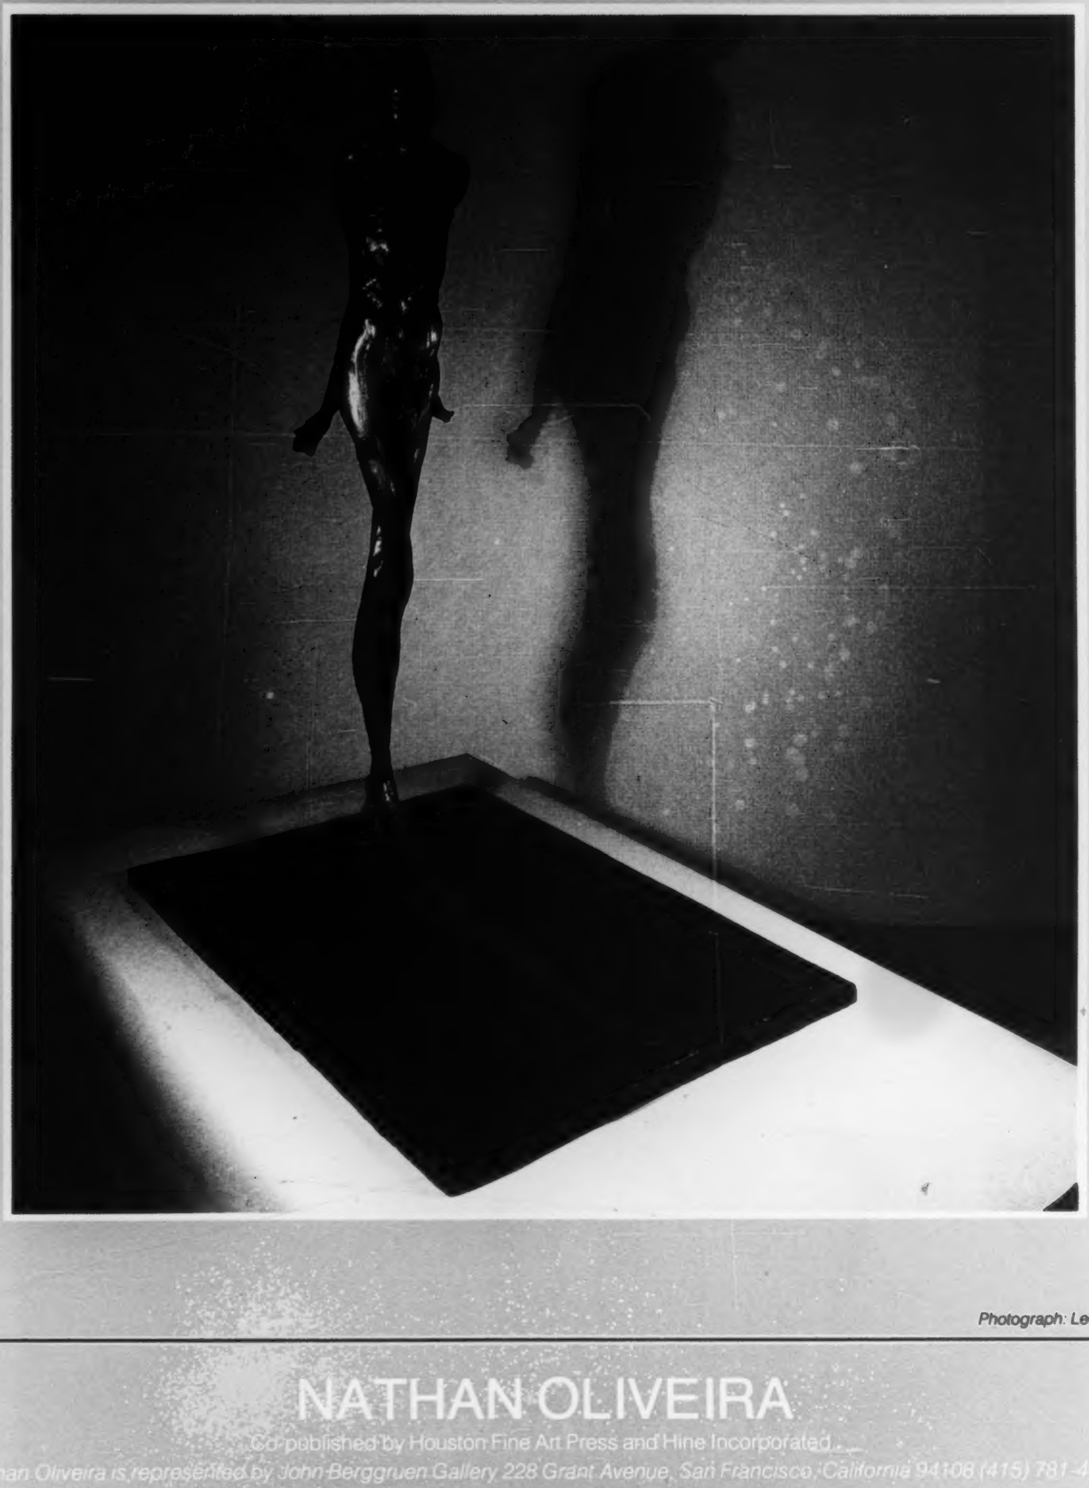
1 x 3 x 21" 1980 Painted Steel. Installation, The Hirshhorn Museum 21 elements, 96" x 96" x 276"

TIBOR de NAGY GALLERY

29 WEST 57TH STREET NEW YORK

HAL BROMM GALLERY

90 WEST BROADWAY NEW YORK



Photograph: Leo Holub

NATHAN OLIVEIRA

Co-published by Houston Fine Art Press and Hine Incorporated.

Nathan Oliveira is represented by John Berggruen Gallery 228 Grant Avenue, San Francisco, California 94108 (415) 781-4629

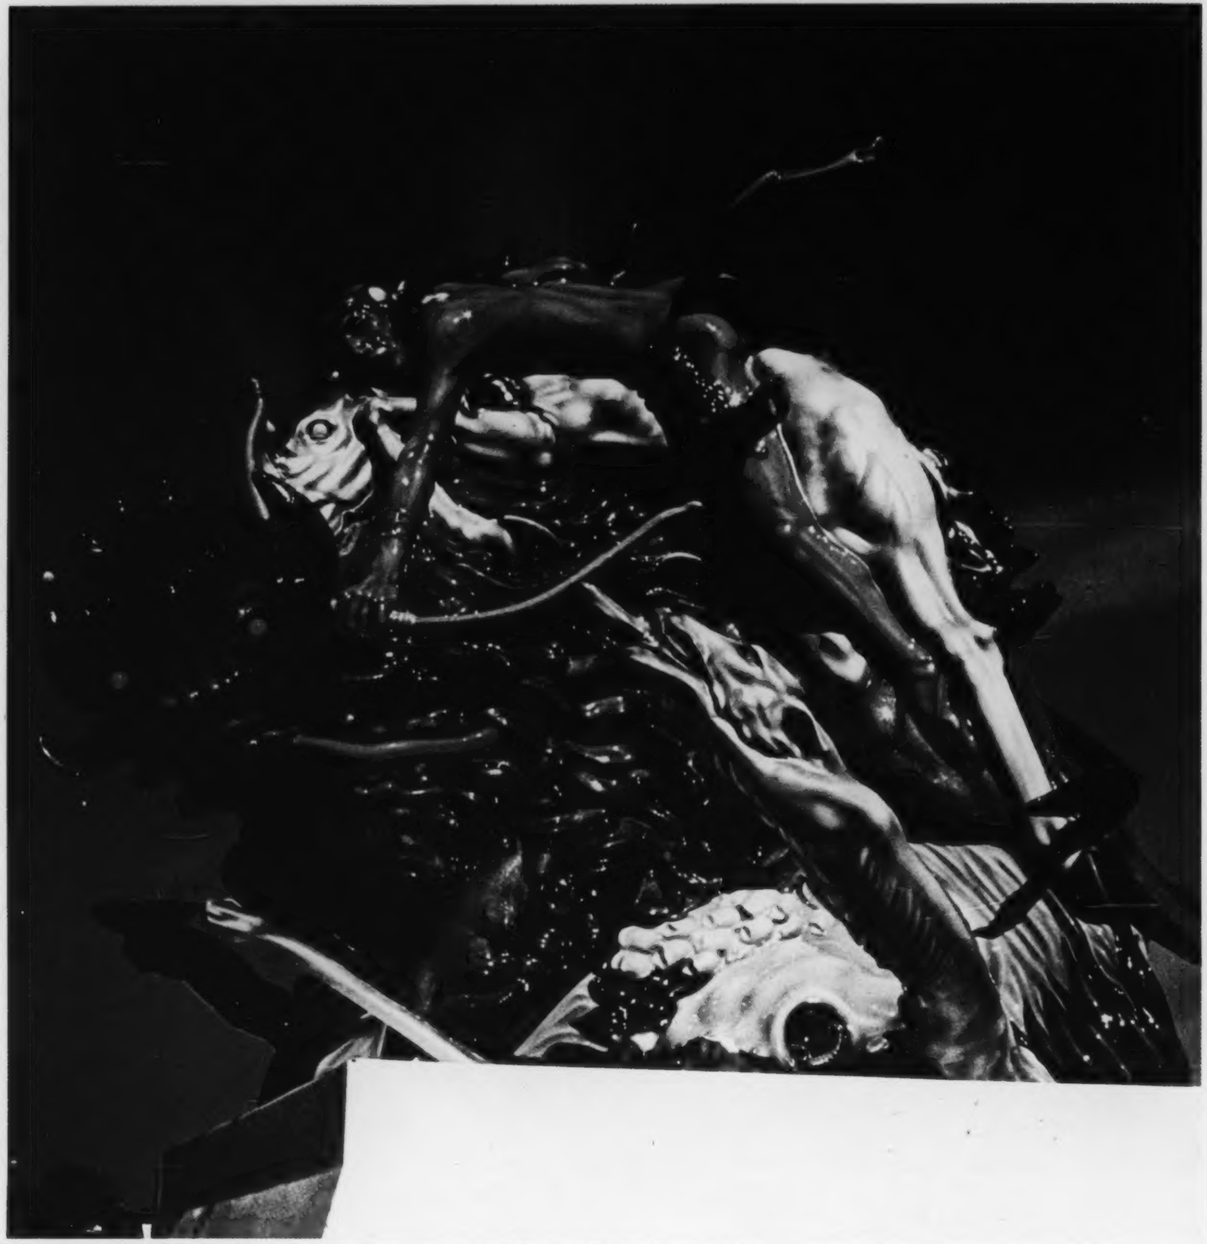
HOUSTON FINE ART PRESS

7330 RAMPART STREET, NO. 100 HOUSTON, TEXAS 77081 (713) 981-1009

HINE INCORPORATED

357 TEHAMA STREET SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA 94103 (415) 777-2214

VOL 71
ISS 4
AP
1983
UMI



LUIS A. JIMENEZ, JR.

Progress I 1974

Fiberglass finished with colored epoxy resins 9'6" high including base. This piece is available from Yares Gallery. Luis A. Jimenez Jr. is represented by the

YARES GALLERY

3625 BISHOP LANE SCOTTSDALE, AZ 85251 (602) 947-3251

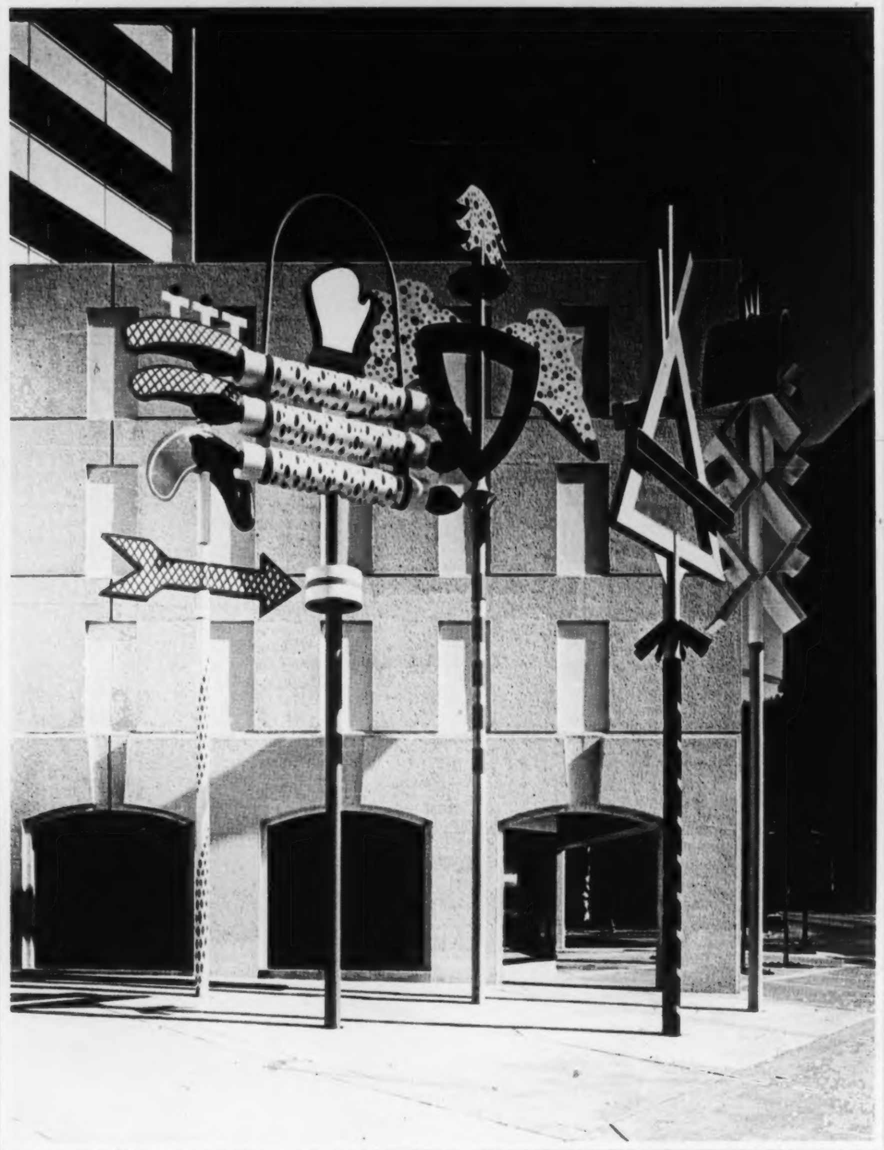


Photo-credit: Merrick/Hedrich-Blessing

IDA KOHLMEYER

"The Krewe of Poydras."

Five welded steel sculptures with catalyzed polyurethane enamel on Teflon bearings allowing for motion. Installed at the new 1515 Poydras Building, New Orleans, designed by Skidmore, Owings and Merrill. Represented by

Gimpel & Weitzenhoffer Ltd., New York
Heath Gallery, Atlanta
William Sawyer Gallery, San Francisco

Arthur Roger Gallery, New Orleans
Elaine Horwitch Galleries, Santa Fe, Scottsdale
Moody Gallery, Houston

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

JOHN VAN ALSTINE
"Trough." 1980-82. Billings, Montana.
Cold Springs gray granite and steel. 13' x 27' x 15'.

DIANE BROWN GALLERY
P.O. BOX 9739 WASHINGTON, D.C.20016 (202) 638-5757

The specially commissioned poster representing Chicago International Art Exposition, 1983 is by the noted American artist, Edward Ruscha. The multi-colored lithograph was designed exclusively for the Exposition in cooperation with Bernard Jacobson Ltd.

The four-color poster, a limited edition of 1,500, is printed on 100% rag content paper, is 28″ × 39″ with the Exposition title, and is signed in the plate by the artist. Price is $30.

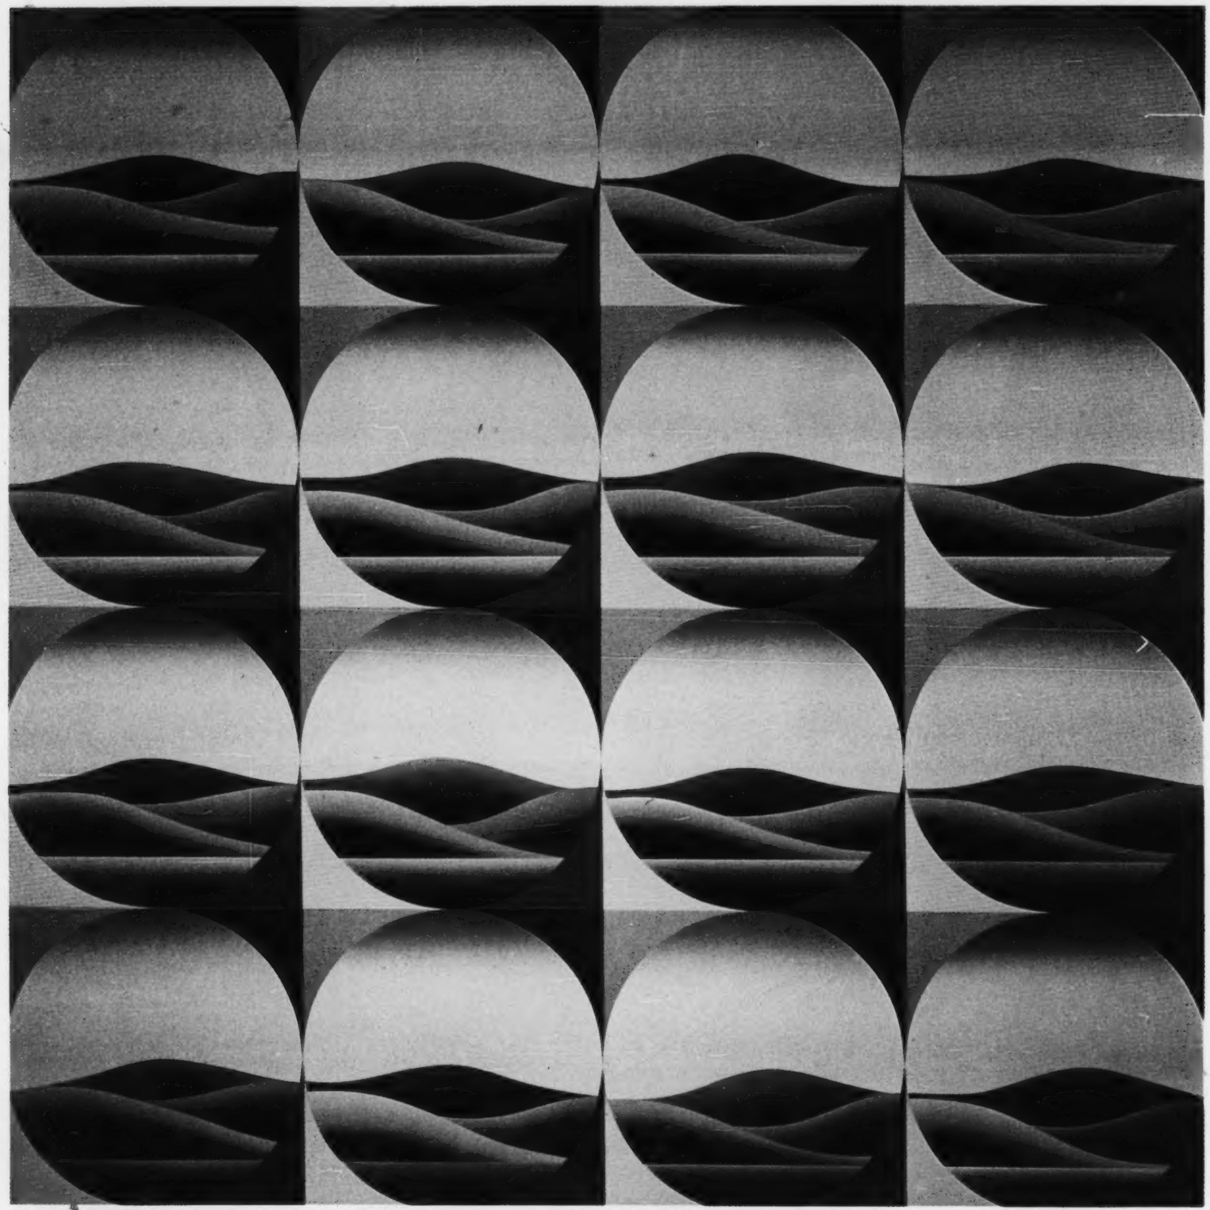
The four-color lithograph, without the Exposition title, is in a limited edition of 100, with 25 artist's proofs. It is printed on Arches 88 paper, signed and numbered by the artist, and is 28¼″ × 33″. Price is $750.

May 19-24, 1983
Navy Pier, Chicago USA

For further information:
Chicago
International
Art
Exposition
Chicago International Art Exposition
600 North McClurg Court
Chicago, Illinois 60611 USA
Telephone 312.787.6858

A Project of the Lakeside Group

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI



Snooperscope acrylic/canvas 60" square

George Snyder
Representation:
Arts Focus, Inc.
401 Capitol St., Charleston, WV 25301 (304)345-9059
San Francisco Bay Area 3708 Mt. Diablo Blvd., Suite 210, Lafayette, CA 94549 (415)284-7703

R.C. GORMAN

"Seated Navajo Woman" Bronze 50" high

ERWIN BINDER

"The Lovers" Orange Onyx 32" high

DOUG HYDE

"Red Lake Navajo" Pink Tennessee Marble 4' high

R.C. Gorman
Erwin Binder and Doug Hyde are exclusively represented by Gallery Mack in Manhattan and Seattle.

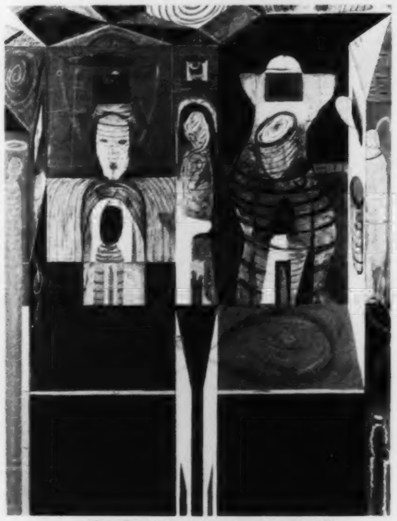
GALLERY MACK, N.Y.
50 West 57th Street, New York, N.Y. 10019 212/582-3606

gallery MACK NW, INC.
123 S. Jackson Seattle, WA 98104 (206) 623-1414

Photos by Steven Tucker

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

RICHARD HULL
NEW PAINTINGS



One, Two, 1983, oil/wax/canvas, 72½ x 54"

15 APRIL - 11 MAY at NEW LOCATION
313 W. SUPERIOR, CHICAGO
PHYLLIS KIND GALLERY

CHAMPIONS
MAR.26-APR.25
JOHN AHEARN
DONALD BAECHLER
JEAN-MICHEL BASQUIAT
JAMES BROWN
RONNIE CUTRONE
BRETT DEPALMA
FUTURA 2000
KEITH HARING
TOM OTTERNESS
KENNY SCHARF
ZADIK ZADIKIAN

PHOTOGRAPHY GALLERY
JACQUES-HENRI LARTIGUE

FAY GOLD GALLERY 3221 CAINS HILL PLACE
ATLANTA GEORGIA 30305 (404) 233-3843

TONY CRAGG

April 5–30

MARIAN GOODMAN GALLERY
24 WEST 57TH STREET NEW YORK NY 10019 (212) 977-7160

RICCO·
JOHNSON
GALLERY
SOHO·475
BROOME ST
NEW YORK
212·9660541
Tuesday - Saturday 11-6

A finely carved figure of a female. Varnished wood.
Circa 1920's. Stands
18" tall.

New Lithograph
by William T.
Wiley

Three Mile Island/
Three Years
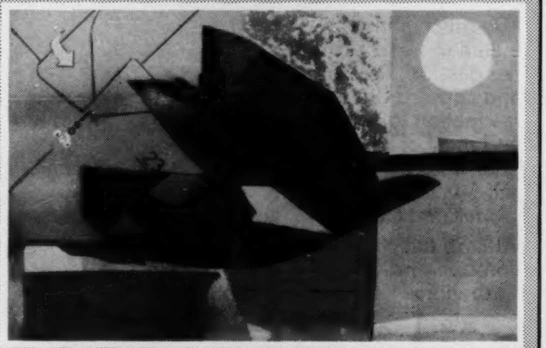
Later

Landfall Press Inc.
215 W. Superior, Chicago 60660
312 787 6836

MAX
PAPART



Etching w/ Aquatint "Royal Bird" 54½" x 38½"

NAHAN
GALLERIES
540 ROYAL ST. • NEW ORLEANS, LA. 70130
(504) 524-8696

World Agents for Max Papart - Inquire about Oils & Gouaches

THEO
TOBIASSE

Etching w/ Aquatint 37¼" x 53¼"
"Femme Qui Danse ses Legendes dans la Fumee des Bouges"

NAHAN
GALLERIES
540 ROYAL ST. • NEW ORLEANS, LA. 70130
(504) 524-8696

World Agents for Theo Tobiasse - Inquire about Oils, Pastels & Gouaches

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

HENRY MOORE
35 BRONZES • 25 DRAWINGS • 40 GRAPHICS

HENRY MOORE, "GIRL TORSO", 1966, BRONZE, 2 OF 9, HEIGHT 8¾ INCHES

DOMINION GALLERY
1438 Sherbrooke St. West, Montreal H3G 1K4
514-845-7471 and 7833

MILTON
AVERY
watercolors
April 5 - April 30, 1983

CAROL TAYLOR, Art
2508 cedar springs dallas, texas 75201 (214) 745-1923

PAT
STEIR
NEW WORK

INAUGURAL
EXHIBITION

THE HARCUS GALLERY
7 NEWBURY STREET, BOSTON (617) 262-4445

"I paint my own reality."
—Frida Kahlo

Flamboyant, sensual Mexican painter Frida Kahlo—wife to Diego Rivera, lover to Leon Trotsky and others—is the subject of "one of the most vivid and engrossing artist's biographies to appear in a long time."—Linda Nochlin

"So much authentic material.... Her beauty, her passion, her tiny and crippled body, her fascination for men, and most of all her enormous capacity for self-revelation."
—Malcolm Cowley

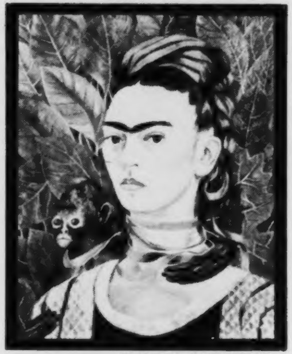
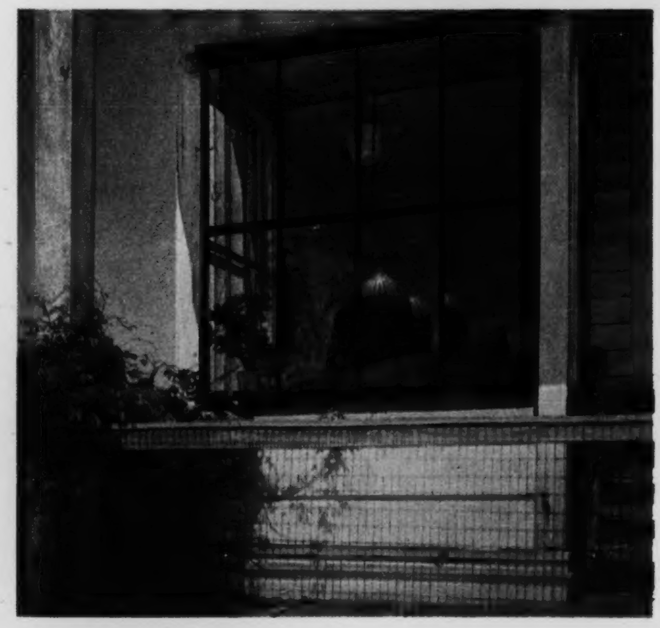
With 35 full-color, 96 black-and-white illustrations



Self-Portrait with Monkey, courtesy Otto Atensio, Caracas

FRIDA
A Biography of Frida Kahlo
Hayden Herrera
#1 Bestseller, Village Voice Literary Supplement
Harper & Row 1817



SHERRY FRENCH GALLERY

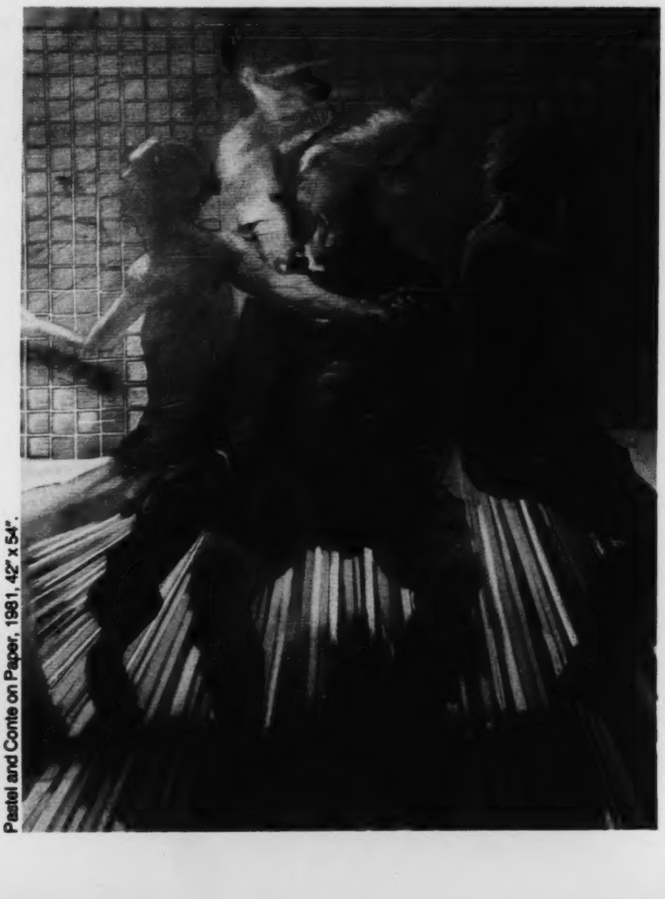
41 W 57 NEW YORK

APRIL 6 – APRIL 30

PETER POSKAS

PAUL CASTER DRAWINGS

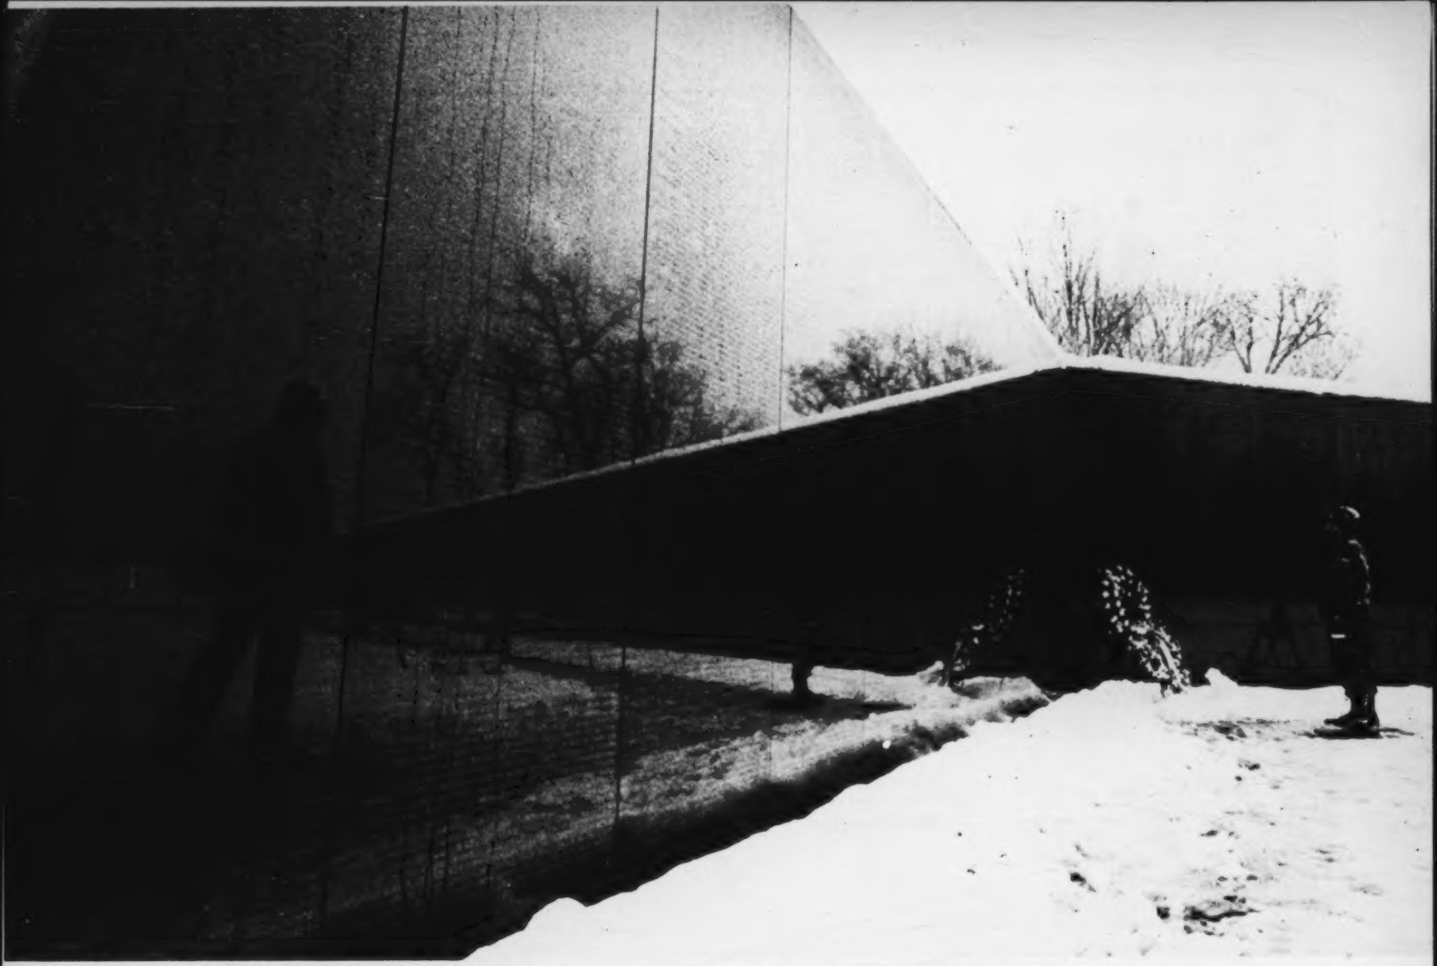
from his new book
REUNION IN HELL



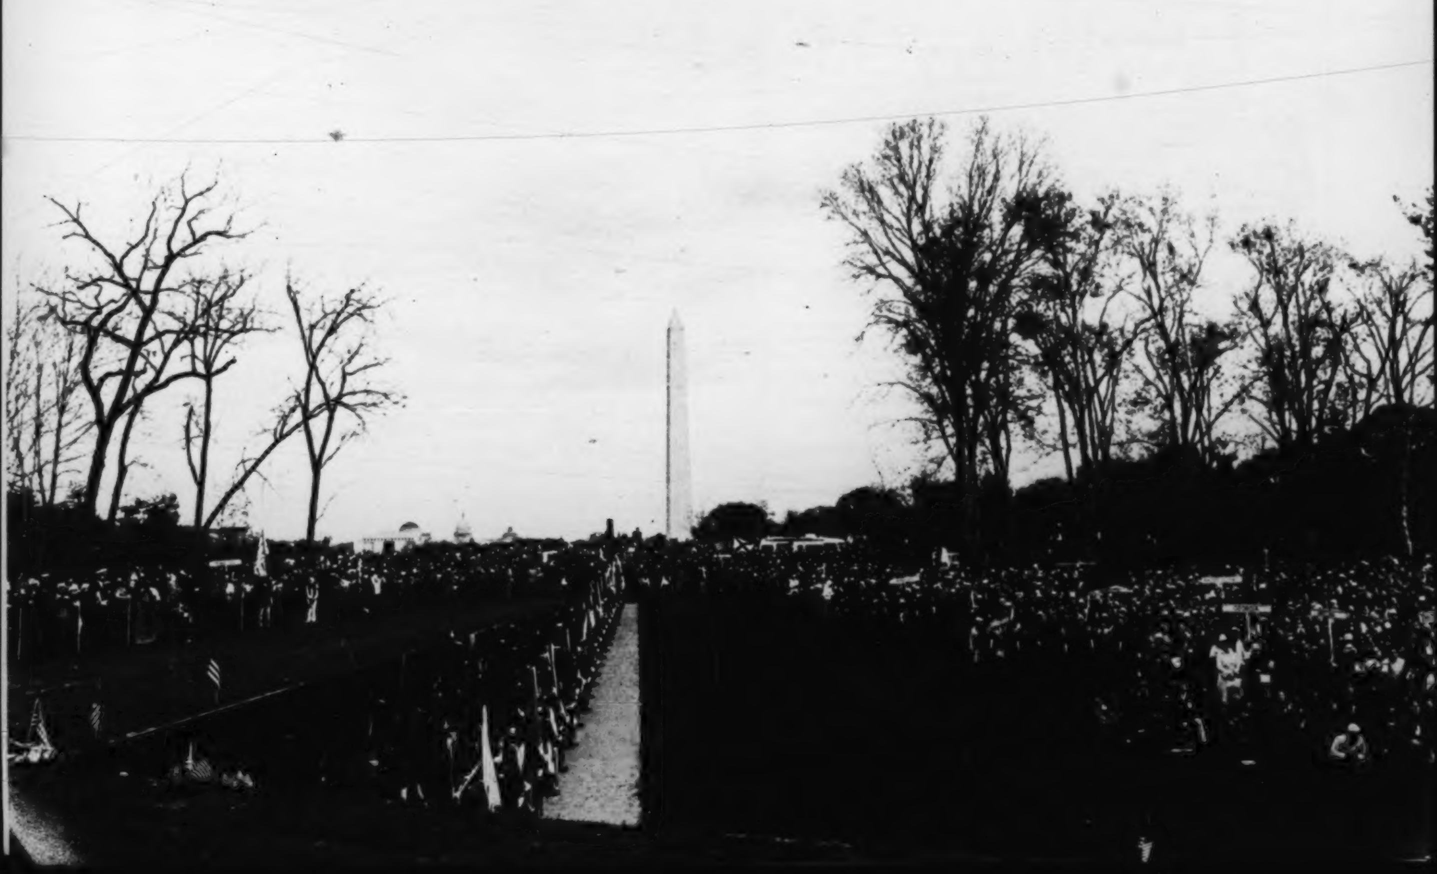
Pastel and Conte on Paper, 1981, 42" x 54".

March 25 · April 26, 1983
Perimeter Gallery
356 W. HURON · CHICAGO, IL 60610 · 312/266 · 9473

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI



Two views of Maya Ying Lin's Vietnam Veterans Memorial, 1982, Constitution Gardens, Washington, D.C. Above, visitors and the winter landscape reflected in the monument's polished black granite surface. Below, the dedication ceremony, Veterans Day, 1982. Photos Dolores Neuman.



A Tale of Two Memorials

Angry debate over the design for a Vietnam Veterans Memorial has finally ended with an uneasy, two-part solution. Was the long fight an art war or a predictable replay of hawks vs. doves? Here, the four-year history of Washington's controversial new monument for Americans who died in Vietnam.

BY ELIZABETH HESS

War memorials may be too important to leave simply to artists and architects.
—Congressman Henry J. Hyde

Advocates of modernism and realism often have difficulty appreciating each other. As old as our century, the conflict between these two points of view has recently been elevated to a new stage—the nation's capital—where two memorials for Vietnam veterans, one abstract and the other realistic, will soon be permanently at war with each other. The bitter Washington debate surrounding the erection of these two monuments has itself been warlike. What began as a clearly defined project to memorialize Americans who died in Vietnam has become, during the past two years, a battlefield echoing with the same rhetoric once heard at Kent State. So far there have been no casualties in this art war, only compromises.

Original plans had called for a single memorial to be built on Washington's prestigious mall between the Lincoln Memorial and the Washington Monument. Its design was to be selected by a jury of specialists from participants in a nation-wide competition. In May of 1981 the judges unanimously chose as their $20,000 prize-winner the entry of Maya Ying Lin, then a 21-year-old Yale undergraduate. But soon after Lin's modernist design for an austerely simple, V-shaped wall was made public, extremely vocal protests began to be heard in Washington, and within a short time a small group of influential men—some in government and some private citizens—launched a noisy, finally unsuccessful campaign to block construction of Lin's memorial. In spite of their efforts, ground was broken in March of 1982 and seven months later the memorial was on its site.

But the opponents of Lin's design did not admit defeat; though they could not prevent the erection of her monument, they did manage to arrange for the addition of a second memorial. A larger-than-life-size realistic statue of three GIs in battle dress, designed by Frederick Hart, a figurative sculptor from Washington, D.C., is presently under construction. Accompanied by a 50-foot flagpole, Hart's statue (which has thus far only been seen in maquette form) will be placed on the memorial site by Veterans Day, 1983.

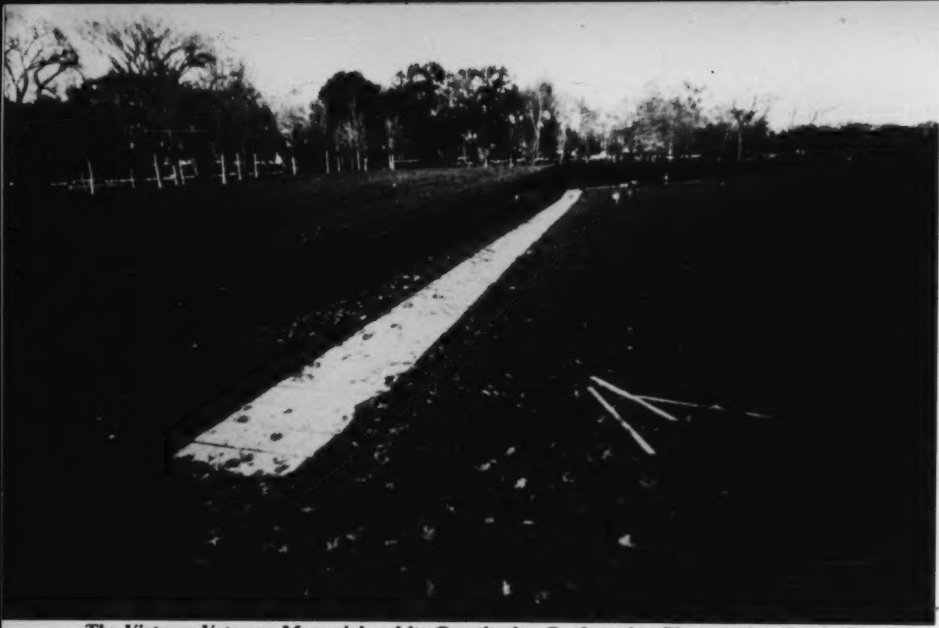
The story of the two memorials begins with Jan Scruggs, who was born in Washington, D.C., graduated from high school and went straight to Vietnam. Half of his company, the U.S. Army Light Infantry Brigade, was killed or wounded between 1969 and 1970, and Scruggs himself landed in the hospital for two months. Upon his return to the U.S., Scruggs enrolled at American University and became deeply involved in the problems of the demobilized Vietnam troops. Eventually attending graduate school, he completed a study on the psychological adjustments facing Vietnam veterans, and in 1976 presented his findings to a Senate subcommittee. Scruggs's sincere if somewhat naive aspiration was to replace the veteran's nightmare with the American Dream.

In 1979, Scruggs incorporated the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Fund (VVMF) of which he remains president. Its specific and only purpose was to erect a national monument honoring those who had died in the war. According to a press release issued by the Fund, the monument was to be "without political content," and it was to be funded by contributions from private sources. That year legislation was introduced in Congress to allocate land for the planned memorial and the project was eventually signed into law by President Carter in 1980. As is usual in such matters, all considerations for the memorial—design, landscape, planning, esthetics—would have to be approved by the National Capital Planning Commission (NCPC), the Commission of Fine Arts (CFA) and the Department of the Interior. (Those familiar with the process of trying to get anything built in the District of Columbia know that it is at best an extremely arduous procedure.)

The VVMF members decided to select a design by holding a juried competition open to all American citizens over 18, even though the Fund would thereby lose control over the final result. Advised by landscape architect Paul Spreiregen, the VVMF placed the decision in the hands of eight men: landscape architects Hideo Sasaki and Garrett Eckbo; architects Harry Weese and Pietro Belluschi; sculptors Costantino Nivola, James Rosati and Richard H. Hunt; and Grady Clay, editor of Landscape Architecture. The seed money to launch the contest was provided by Texas computer millionaire H. Ross Perot. (Ironically, Perot would later be among those who would attempt to dismantle the entire competition process.)

There were two design requirements

VOL 71
ISS 4
AP
1983
UMI



The Vietnam Veterans Memorial and its Constitution Gardens site. Photo Arthur Grace, Sygma.

stipulated by the VVMF that severely limited all entries. First, the names of the 57,939 Americans who died, or are still missing, in Vietnam had to be engraved somewhere on the memorial. Second, contestants were required to be sensitive to the Washington Monument and the Lincoln Memorial, which would bracket the site. Constitution Gardens, as the area is called, is the President's backyard—it's sacred territory. These considerations pretty much ruled out a vertical monument, and a wall of some sort would obviously be necessary for the names.

The competition, which was announced in October, 1980, received 1,421 entries, a surprisingly large response. In accord with contest rules, no names were attached to any of the proposals. Thus, when Maya Lin's design was selected in May of the following year, everyone was astonished to find that the winner was female, Chinese-American and an undergraduate. Lin's competition-winning design was a combination Minimalist sculpture–earthwork. It consisted of two walls—each 250 feet long and made of 140 panels—which met at a 125-degree angle; beginning at ground level at each extreme, both walls gradually rose to a height of 10 feet at the monument's center, or the apex of the angle. Working within and taking full advantage of the Fund's guidelines, Lin made some innovational decisions: she chose polished black granite as her material, thus turning the walls into mirrors; and she decided to list the 57,939 Vietnam casualties not alphabetically, as is customary, but in the order in which they were killed. ("I wanted to return the vets to the time-frame of the war," Lin explains, "and in the process, I wanted them to see their own reflection in the names.") Furthermore, rather than simply setting the two walls on top of the ground, Lin's design proposed to build them into a rise in the landscape, with only their inscribed sides visible. The spectator, walking downward along the length of either wall, would thus have the dramatic sensation of descending into the earth. In view of the response that Lin's walls would later provoke, it is amusing to speculate that initially her design was probably chosen because of its utter modesty—its simple, straight lines, its unobtrusive character. The jurors may well have thought that Lin's proposal was least likely to make waves in the ultrasensitive District of Columbia.

On Oct. 13, 1981, Lin attended one of the regular monthly meetings of the Board of Directors of the CFA, prepared to discuss granite samples. The CFA's chairman, J. Carter Brown, who has been called Washington's "arbiter of excellence," is also the director of the National Gallery. This commission, originally established by Congress in 1910, was created to give expert advice on works of art or architecture acquired or commissioned by the government. At an earlier meeting, Brown had already echoed the jurors' unanimous approval of Lin's design, and the October meeting included on its agenda various details of a largely site-specific character. As are all CFA monthly meetings, the Oct. 13 session was open to the public and transcripts were made of the proceedings for the record. There was an unexpected guest at this meeting—Tom Carhart, a member of the VVMF and a former infantry platoon leader with two Purple Hearts. Carhart had helped raise funds for the memorial and, in his enthusiasm for the project, had even entered a design in the competition himself—the first art work he had ever attempted.

Carhart was not happy with Lin's design. He characterized it as "the most insulting and demeaning memorial to our experience that was possible." He passionately argued that it was a memorial to "the war at home" rather than to the one in Southeast Asia: "When I came home from Vietnam in 1968," he said, "I was literally spat upon as I walked through the Chicago airport in my uniform by some girl in a band of hippies. That spit hurt." Carhart charged that Lin's design was geared to "those who would still spit," and he called the proposed monument a "degrading ditch." He was the first to publicly attack the color of the stone: "Black," he said, is "the universal color of shame, sorrow and degradation in all races, all societies worldwide." Carhart demanded a white memorial.

Ross Perot in Texas was also unhappy with Lin's design. A legendary and somewhat enigmatic figure, even in a state known for its cowboy capitalists, Perot is notorious for such expensive ventures as his unsuccessful hiring of a group of mercenaries to bring home POWs from North Vietnam and his financing of a surveillance mission into Iran during the hostage crisis. No one in Washington has been anxious to articulate Perot's exact role in the memorial controversy. Off the record, however, many people have targeted him as the organizer of the opposition to Lin's design. ("When powerful people are against you," Scruggs whispered to me over the phone, "it may not be in your interest to answer questions.") Perot, himself, was more than willing to talk to me about his side of the story in a telephone interview. To him, Lin's memorial was "a slap in the face." But he says he wasn't surprised that the memorial looked like a "tombstone" since "Maya did design it in a class on funereal architecture at Yale."

Rumor has it that when Perot's money talks, people listen. After contributing $160,000 towards funding the memorial, Perot may have expected to have some say in its final disposition. His strategy for overturning the decision of the jurors was to create the impression that the veterans themselves had rejected Lin's design. Scruggs believes that Perot flew in veterans from around the country to lobby against the jurors' choice. The Texan flatly denies this and says that all he did was "try to get the Fund off their ego trip long enough to remember their constituency of two million vets." To do so, he personally financed a poll of 587 POWs. According to Perot's poll, 67 percent of those polled disliked the original design; 70 percent thought the color of the memorial should be white; 96 percent thought the American flag should be prominently displayed on the memorial site. Though on the basis of Perot's statistics it seemed as if the majority of veterans were against the design, the memorial's supporters have charged that, since POWs are probably a good deal more conservative than the average veteran, the survey was skewed. Moreover, Scruggs claims that when he had the poll checked by an expert, he was told that it wasn't worth the paper it was written on. Perot, on the other hand, brushes aside these objections, saying, "Losers always discredit the winners." He insists that the poll was sent to POWs only as a test mailing.

Maya Ying Lin. Photo John McDonnell, courtesy The Washington Post.

Meanwhile in Washington during the fall of 1981, Maya Lin was beginning to be viewed as something of a radical. Her work, which had initially been praised by the CFA because it was "apolitical," was now labeled subversive. James Webb, for example, a highly decorated marine and author of a Vietnam novel titled Fields of Fire, called it a "wailing wall for anti-draft demonstrators." In some quarters, the monument's V-shape was being interpreted as the symbol of the antiwar movement. Carhart had already referred to the black stone as a "black spot in American history." Though one critic honorifically described the listing of names in nonalphabetical order as

An Interview with Maya Lin

Q. Certain people are outraged by your memorial. They read it as a statement against the Vietnam war.

A. The worst thing in the world would have been indifference to my piece. The monument may lack an American flag, but you're surrounded by America, by the Washington Monument and the Lincoln Memorial. I don't design pure objects like those. I work with the landscape, and I hope that the object and the land are equal players.

Q. Is your piece political?

A. The piece itself is apolitical in the sense that it doesn't comment directly on the war—only on the men that died. For some people—especially right-wing politicians—that's political enough. It's like the emperor's new clothes: What people see, or don't see is their own projection.

Q. Were you involved in the antiwar movement?

A. No. But I think any war is pretty sad. People killing each other because they can't resolve their differences. I don't make judgments about the Vietnam war though, because I don't know enough about it.

Q. Why do you think veterans like Tom Carhart dislike your memorial?

A. I haven't gotten one negative letter from a veteran. Most of them are not as conservative as Carhart. It's the administration that would like to remember Vietnam the same way it remembers other wars—through the heroes. Well, one of the things that made this war different is the fact that the veterans got screwed. They came back and their country called them "murderers." Nothing can make up for that. You can't pretend that this war was the same as others.

Q. What do you think about the decision to add Hart's piece?

A. It was a coup. It was a power play. It had nothing to do with how many veterans liked or disliked my piece. Ross Perot has powerful friends who managed to get a compromise through. Even Jan Scruggs said, "We've been ambushed." The vice president of the Fund called what happened a "rape" of my decision. I didn't even find out that they had made a "few modifications" until I saw it announced on TV! Perot flew in 50 people who hated the design from all over the country and they spread rumors in the White House that the designer was a leftist, that the jurors were all communists, and people believed it.

Q. How has the memorial fund treated you?

A. The fund has always seen me as female—as a child. I went in there when I first won and their attitude was—O.K. you did a good job, but now we're going to hire some big boys—boys—to take care of it. I said no! I wanted to help put together a team that knew about landscape, granite. Their basic attitude was I gave them the design and they could do what they wanted with it. They expected me to take the money ($20,000) and run.

Q. How has the fund treated the veterans?

A. The fund has really gone show biz and it's upsetting a lot of vets. My attitude is that you shouldn't spend tons of money on the memorial—7 million has been spent so far. The money should be given to the vets who need it—like Agent Orange victims—because it's obvious that the government isn't going to help them out.

Q. You haven't sat down with Hart to work something out?

A. No. But from what I gather, Hart thought a long time before accepting the commission. It wasn't necessarily going to be good for his reputation, but the price was right. They seem to be paying him 20 times what they paid me. He goes on and on about working with my piece rather than against it. But you can't really work with a piece if you don't have a dialogue with it. He claims that my memorial is "rude in its neglect of the human element." How can someone like that work with my design?

Q. What do you think of Hart's sculpture?

A. Three men standing there before the world—it's trite. It's a generalization, a simplification. Hart gives you an image—he's illustrating a book.

Q. But do you think the veterans will have an easier time relating to Hart's work?

A. No! I don't think the veterans are as unintelligent as some people would like to judge them.

Q. Why did you choose black for the color of the stone?

A. Classical Greek temples were never white. They were highly colored. At some point much later, someone decided that white signified classical architecture. Black for me is a lot more peaceful and gentle than white. White marble may be very beautiful, but you can't read anything on it. I wanted something that would be soft on the eyes, and turn into a mirror if you polished it. The point is to see yourself reflected in the names. Also the mirror image doubles and triples the space. I thought black was a beautiful color and appropriate for the design.

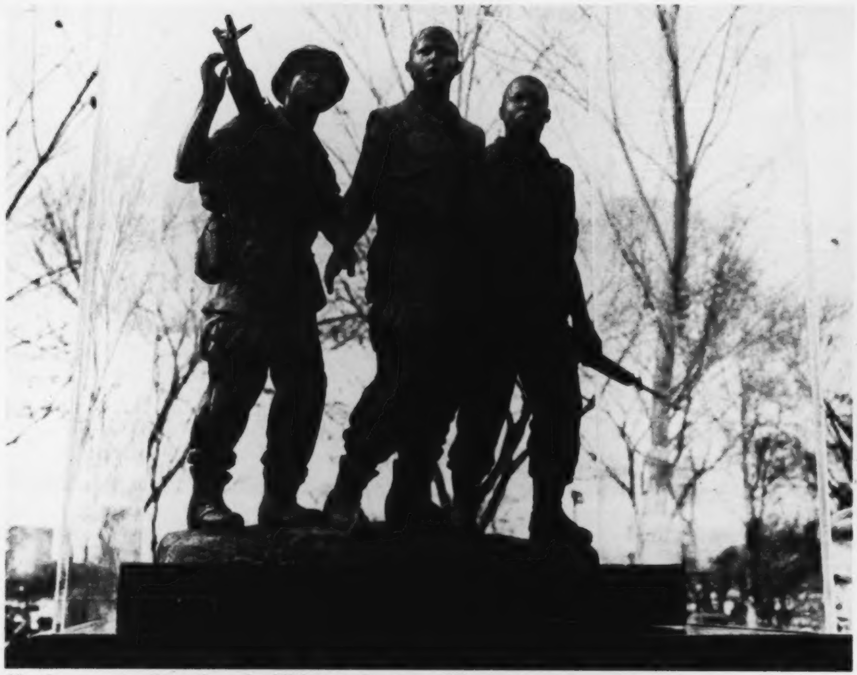
Q. Has this situation radicalized you in any way?

A. There were certain things I was aware of intellectually that I had never seen before. In the academic world where I grew up, my femaleness, the fact that I was Oriental, was never important. You didn't see prejudice. People treated you first as a human being. When I first came to Washington my biggest shock was that no one would listen to me because I had no power—no masculinity.

Q. Do you think the memorial has a female sensibility?

A. In a world of phallic memorials that rise upwards, it certainly does. I didn't set out to conquer the earth, or overpower it, the way Western man usually does. I don't think I've made a passive piece, but neither is it a memorial to the idea of war.

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI



Hart's maquette for a figural addition to the memorial, on view last November at the dedication ceremonies for Lin's monument. Photo D. Neuman.

Frederick Hart.

"a profoundly metaphoric twist with universal implications," Carhart called it "random scattering . . . such that neither brother nor father nor lover nor friend could ever be found." The fact

An Interview with Frederick Hart

Q. Can you describe your original submission to the competition?

A. Originally I had a circular wall with the names on it. There were two groups of soldiers on either side reaching out to each other. That was the whole idea—to reach back across a huge gap. I wasn't happy with it. In fact, I was astonished when I won third prize.

Q. At what point did you get back in the running?

A. People think I have been negotiating behind the scenes—that I've been wined and dined by Ross Perot—it's not true. When they [the Fund] eventually came back to me it made sense. Because I had entered the contest, I had already put a good deal of thought into the project. I was also the only figurative sculptor that had a won a prize.

Q. Certain critics think your sculpture portrays a stereotype.

A. I honestly thought that once people saw it, they would understand that what I was doing wasn't trite. The average age of the Vietnam combatant was 19 years old and it was an excruciating kind of combat situation. What a burden to place on a 19-year-old child. I wanted to make people aware of these indignities. I wanted to use realism to give some sense of the youth and innocence of these kids. The figures do relate to the wall. I thought it was a good solution and that people would give me credit, but the situation was too politicized.

Q. How did it get so politicized? How did Maya Lin come to represent the antiwar movement and Fredrick Hart the military establishment?

A. Well I don't know how conscious Lin was about using the black stone to turn the memorial into a funeral piece, but unconsciously it appealed to many liberals as appropriate for a black moment in history. If the monument was meant as a Vietnam War Memorial—then even I couldn't argue with it because the war was a tragedy. But that wasn't what the memorial was supposed to be. It was supposed to give a little dignity to the people who fought the war—the 19-year-olds, not the generals. The piece rubbed them absolutely raw.

Q. Is realism the only way to reach them?

A. No, not necessarily. All they wanted was for the memorial to be white! They didn't need a statue or anything else. The statue is just an awkward solution we came up with to save Lin's design. I think this whole thing is an art war. It takes a tremendous amount of egocentricity and arrogance for artists to feel that no one should interfere with their work—when it's for the public.

Q. You mean Lin's memorial is purely art for art's sake?

A. I don't like blank canvases. Lin's memorial is intentionally not meaningful. It doesn't relate to ordinary people and I don't like art that is contemptous of life. This event is a kind of Gettysburg for contemporary art—art that has isolated itself into a corner.

Q. If Lin's piece is political, isn't yours political also?

A. Yes, but it's different. My position is humanist, not militaristic. I'm not trying to say there was anything good or bad about the war. I researched for three years—read everything. I became close friends with many vets, drank with them in the bars. Lin's piece is a serene exercise in contemporary art done in a vacuum with no knowledge of the subject. It's nihilistic—that's its appeal.

Q. Were you involved in the antiwar movement?

A. I got gassed with everyone else, mostly out of peer pressure.

Q. Weren't the competition's laws broken by your addition?

A. The Fund did what everybody does today. They relinquished their autonomy and handed it over to the so-called experts—the art mafia. Senator John Warner, James Watt—all those people who intervened didn't do it out of whimsy. They did it because their constituencies asked them to. Letters of protest went to the White House and they were handed over to Watt because the memorial is in his legal jurisdiction. It's his job. It was democracy in action, not totalitarianism, Stalinism or fascism. Watt didn't simply say: I don't like this newfangled modern stuff and I'm gonna get rid of it.

Q. Does the fact that Lin is a young Oriental woman have anything to do with this uproar?

A. There is nothing more powerful than an ingenue. If she had been a professional the design would have been sacked. That's what happened with the Roosevelt memorial; the design went through. All the professionals and everybody else loved it—except for the Roosevelt family. They said no thanks, and that was it. Everybody is worked up about this poor little girl who is getting kicked around by the Secretary of the Interior. The press has turned her into a Cinderella.

Q. Is there a war between the two monuments?

A. The collision is all about the fact that Maya Lin's design is elitist and mine is populist. People say you can bring what you want to Lin's memorial. But I call that brown bag esthetics. I mean you better bring something, because there ain't nothing being served.

that it was possible from one vantage point to see the monument as sinking into the earth was interpreted by some commentators as an admission of guilt—an acknowledgment that we had committed crimes in Vietnam.

The VVMF, too, was under attack. In Scrugg's view, "The memorial's enemies were mostly members of the New Right" and they were pressuring the Fund to compromise their original plan. According to The Washington Post, it was Senator Jeremiah Denton who led the fight against Lin's memorial on Capitol Hill, and the campaign picked up considerable steam on its way to the White House. Even Phyllis Schlafly became an art-critic-for-a-day, calling the memorial a "tribute to Jane Fonda" in the pages of the Washington Inquirer, the Moral Majority's weekly newspaper. As the flak got heavier, Jan Scruggs admits that he began to suffer from battle fatigue. It seemed to him that if he wanted to dedicate the memorial by Veterans Day, 1982—then less than a year away—a compromise was the only way out.

It was clear to most observers that the battle over the memorial was being fought entirely with political ammunition. Attempting, as one Senator put it, "to neutralize this apolitical statement," the opponents of Lin's memorial could at most hope for additions to the site. They could not block construction completely nor even censor Lin's design without angering the press and the art world. It was also evident that James Watt, the Secretary of the Interior, held the final card, since his authorization was required before the VVMF could break ground. Watt, who would subsequently make his position clear in a carefully worded letter to the CFA, was refusing to grant permission until suitable additions to the memorial were agreed upon by the Fund, the CFA and the National Capital Planning Commission.

By January '82, the debate suddenly moved behind closed doors. A loosely organized committee, chaired by Senator John Warner and including, among other conservatives, Milton Copulos—a Vietnam veteran and currently an energy expert with the Heritage Foundation (a well-known right-wing think-tank)—was formed and Scruggs was invited to meet with them in face-to-face combat in order to settle the dispute. The press was not invited to this kangaroo court and no public record of proceedings exists. But according to a statement issued by the VVMF more than a year later, the group, which had convened on Jan. 27, 1982, agreed, after a nasty fight, to support the addition to the memorial site of a sculpture and a flag, but "with no location specified." The opponents of Lin's memorial also agreed "to cease their political effort to block approval of the design and to allow the planned March groundbreaking to occur on schedule." A second meeting was planned to "consider various alternative designs for the sculpture."

Now that the opponents of Lin's memorial had won their first major battle, they turned their attention to the strategic placement of the statue and the flag. According to members of the Fund, when Senator Warner's group reconvened in March of '82 to discuss designs for the sculpture, it was Ross Perot who changed the committee's agenda. Realizing that placement of the sculpture would be a crucial issue, he urged the group to agree about it at once. When a vote was taken, the majority of those present wanted the flag placed on top of the memorial, at the vertex of the walls, and the sculpture placed on the ground below, at the middle of the V. According to the Fund's printed statement, this majority opinion was not surprising: "As at the prior meeting, the handful of VVMF representatives were far outnumbered by the group of opponents which Mr. Perot and others had organized to attend the meeting." But the votes taken at this meeting were not final. All decisions still had to go through Watt, the CFA and the NCPC.

In February, 1983, after bitter arguments, it was finally decided that Hart's statue and a flagpole would be placed near the entrance to the memorial site.

What was most significant about these meetings was that the VVMF had been convinced to sponsor the additional sculpture and flag. Realizing that it was the only way to get Lin's piece built, Scruggs presented the VVMF's new proposal to the proper authorities, and in March work on the monument finally began. In April, without Maya Lin's knowledge, a sculpture panel was chosen by the VVMF to select an artist for the second memorial; it was comprised entirely of Vietnam veterans who had been involved in the dispute and included two people who supported Lin's memorial—Arthur Mosley and William Jayne—and two who opposed it—James Webb and Milton Copulos. In July, Frederick Hart was commissioned by the VVMF (for a fee neither party will make public) to design another Vietnam memorial, and by September Hart's maquette for the statue was unveiled.

The conservatives had wanted a statue in the tradition of the Iwo Jima memorial, which was based on an actual photograph. But Hart knew that there were few heroic moments in the Vietnam War. (After all, one of the most memorable photographs in the entire Vietnam debacle was of the shot taken at point-blank range into a guerrilla's head by Nguyen Ngoc Loan, then chief of police in Saigon.) Hart's model is a competent homage to an abstraction called "vets"—as traditional as a Hallmark card. Three young men, one of whom is black, stand on a small base. All three look to their right, perhaps (depending on their final siting) towards Lin's walls. There is nothing to identify these soldiers specifically with Vietnam other than their uniforms; the realism lies in the details of their military garb, in the gun thrown over a shoulder, the ammunition around a waist. The facial expressions of these soldiers are somewhat peculiar; they look stunned—more bewildered than heroic—but, of course, their features may change when the statue is executed at the projected scale of 8 feet.

When the maquette was made public last fall, its placement was still a matter of dispute. The members of Warner's committee who wanted the statue in the center of Lin's walls—in effect, penetrating her V—now began to fight an extended battle over the location of the second memorial. The issue was not settled until February, 1983, when after a great deal of acrimonious debate, it was finally decided that both Hart's statue and the flag would be placed 120 feet from Lin's walls, near the entrance to the memorial site. Hart himself supported this decision, understanding quite well that the two works of art would clash if placed too close together.

The decision to add a second memorial to the site has not been popular everywhere in Washington. Some of the negative feelings were expressed at last October's meeting of the CFA, when many witnesses testified against acceptance of Hart's model. Among them was Paul Spreiregen, the Washington landscape architect who was advisor to the original contest. "Imagine Arlington Cemetery," Spreiregen said, "with groups of larger-than-life soldiers, in various combat outfits, winding their way through the trees, coming up on headstones." Robert Lawrence, president of the American Institute of Architects, called the compromise a "concerted effort . . . by a few individuals unhappy with the design," even though Lin's design had been "applauded almost unanimously."

VOL 7 1 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

As many at the CFA meeting pointed out, the battle went beyond the memorial's design to the Vietnam war itself. Indeed, what the rhetoric of the memorial controversy reflected was the impossibility of separating the issue of Lin's design from opinions concerning the war; the controversy also revealed the naiveté of those members of the VVMF who had thought the memorial could be isolated from the war, and who had mandated the impossible—a "neutral" memorial.

Throughout this period, the VVMF and Lin's supporters tried to prove that there was nothing radical about her design, but Lin's enemies continued to see red reflected in the memorial's slick black walls. It was not simply the fact that the monument was abstract and black that angered them. Lin's memorial ran counter to tradition in several other important ways: it appeared to be sinking into the ground rather than towering above the site; it had an unconventional system of listing names; it was completely unheroic, totally nonaggressive. It could, in fact, be read as a pacifist piece. To add insult to injury, the eight male jurors had chosen a memorial with a distinctly female character, placing at the base of Washington's giant phallus a wide V-shape surrounded by a grassy mound. The memorial was hardly a "black gash of shame," but it could indeed be read as a radical statement about the war, and even as the expression of a female sensibility. The vast number of names inscribed on the wall comes across as a powerful antiwar statement. As a woman standing in front of the memorial remarked, "What an unbelievable waste."

And facing the myriad names, it is difficult for anyone not to question the purpose of the war. The reawakening of old conflicts about Vietnam has inevitably disturbed members of the Reagan administration; such reopened battle scars are too likely to suggest parallels with our current involvements in, for example, El Salvador. Lin's memorial functions as a powerful reminder of the potential consequences of our current foreign policy.

Towards the end of the memorial battle, Benajmin Forgey in The Washington Post underlined the essentially nonesthetic nature of the conflict. "Adding the sculpture and the flag," he wrote, "clearly was a political not an esthetic necessity." Even those critics who argued that Lin's memorial was too abstract for popular taste were attacking it from a political perspective. Tom Wolfe, who published a well-timed article in The Washington Post on the same day that the CFA heard testimony on the proposed additions, is a case in point. Calling Lin's memorial "non-bourgeois art," or art "that baffled the general public," Wolfe compared Lin's experience to that of Carl Andre in Hartford and Richard Serra in downtown Manhattan. He concluded that her memorial, too, was abstract and elitist. Yet no one, including Wolfe, has actually been baffled by the memorial. While Wolfe predictably lambasted the "Mullahs of Modernism," he also used this occasion to add the antiwar movement to his enemy list. Having referred to the memorial as a "perverse prank," he ended his vituperative piece with the already familiar phrase, "A tribute to Jane Fonda!"

In view of the response that Lin's walls would provoke, it is amusing to speculate that her design was probably chosen for its unobtrusiveness, its utter modesty.

If Lin's memorial is a tribute to Fonda, then Hart's is a tribute to John Wayne. It salutes the military establishment—the representatives of the American Legion, the Marine Corps League, the Naval Association and the Military Order of the Purple Heart—all of whom demanded an alternative to Lin's piece. What Hart's statue is not, however, is a tribute to the troops. In fact, no one has been anxious to hear from them. It is no secret that returning veterans were not welcomed home with open arms. There were no ticker-tape parades for an army that now has the highest suicide rate of any population of ex-GIs. "A few moments of honest conversation with any [veteran]," wrote critic Peter Marin in The Nation, "put to shame the versions of the war produced by our filmmakers, novelists and many journalists." The veterans are as divided as the rest of the population about Vietnam—and about the memorial. "I can't imagine anyone being proud of what we did over there," commented John VanZwieten, who returned home and joined the Vietnam Veterans Against the War. Although he now lives in Washington, VanZwieten doesn't even want to see the memorial—not because it's a tribute to Jane, but in fact for quite the opposite reason. As one veteran put it in About Face, a newspaper handed out at the dedication ceremony, "Buttering up Vietnam veterans as 'forgotten heroes' is a slap in the face directed at millions in this country who resisted the war."

Thanks to the battle over the Vietnam memorial, Constitution Gardens will present two very different interpretations of the war. Though initially Lin's memorial may have had a certain political ambiguity, its juxtaposition with Hart's conservative statue will clearly emphasize its radical edge. Scruggs's original contention that America owed the veterans was neither radical nor conservative. It was a centrist position shared by millions of Americans including the families of those who came home in body bags. These are the thousands who flooded Washington for last year's dedication: one monument was more than enough for them. Veterans have been weeping in front of Lin's black walls. Their families have been eager to touch a name or take a rubbing. Visitors have left flowers, clothes, snapshots and personal treasures belonging to the dead. The reception to this cold, black, abstract object has in fact been overwhelmingly warm. As The Washington Post noted in its editorial column, "The argument over the memorial dissolves the moment you get there." When Hart's statue is in place, the two memorials will inevitably challenge each other with contrary points of view. But this is one confrontation that Maya Lin should easily win. ☐

Author: Elizabeth Hess is a free-lance writer living in Washington, D.C. She is currently co-authoring a book on feminist art.

Above, Mementos and other objects left in front of Lin's walls by visitors during dedication week ceremonies. Below, crowds of viewers examine the memorial. Photos Dolores Neuman.

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

Louise Bourgeois: Femme Maison '81, 1981, marble, 48 ⅛ by 47 by 49 ⅞ inches. Private collection.

Louise Bourgeois: Gender & Possession

Seemingly swept up by three successive avant-garde movements—Surrealism, Abstract Expressionism, and today's Expressionist resurgence—Louise Bourgeois has in fact never ceased operating from the position of outsider. Indeed her real concerns, as a recent retrospective made clear, are basically subversive.

BY ROBERT STORR

Actual conditions are no longer determinant. With poetry the imagination takes place on the margin, exactly where the function of unreality comes to charm or disturb—always to awaken—the sleeping being lost in its automatisms.
—Gaston Bachelard
The Poetics of Space

For 40 years Louise Bourgeois has resisted assimilation. Indeed, she is the last major figure of her generation whose "art-world" reputation and influence on younger artists involve no significant debt to official approval or to wide public recognition and acceptance. Rather, the respect she commands is directly attributable to the active part she has continued to take in the ongoing struggles of contemporary art, and most importantly to the imposing and virtually unmediated presence of the work itself. By current standards, in fact, she has scarcely had an "art career" at all. Instead, Bourgeois has chosen to remain at the periphery of the "scene," though always close enough to feel its pulse, and has committed her full attention to the exploration of her own obsessive preoccupations, protecting the hermetic nature of her art and the idiosyncratic rhythm of its gestation from urgent demands of the market on one hand, and from stagnant isolation on the other. It is a position occupied out of both choice and necessity, and as much as it manifests a personal diffidence and a profound ambivalence toward authority and the mechanisms of power, it also expresses an unshakable sense of the real worth of what she has done and of the discipline required to do it.

In recent years this relative obscurity has been gradually altered. The specific agent of change was feminism, the most pervasive and radical of the many "pluralist" constituencies of the last ten years, and more particularly the insistence of feminist artists and critics that we look hard at whatever was formerly considered "marginal" in art, and hardest of all at the very notion that a "mainstream" existed. Under the pressure of their conviction and research, diaristic imagery, emotionally charged eclecticism, new materials and previously unacceptable attitudes toward craft were all admitted as serious points of departure for looking at old art and making the new. Wherever these categories were opened up one found Bourgeois hard at work. Thus, though she rejected the polemical premise of an exclusively feminist esthetic, Bourgeois nevertheless found herself part of a genuine avant-garde, and though the Surrealists and Abstract Expressionists had in their seasons swept her up similarly, she was this time unquestionably a dominant member. In the context of the broader revisionism of the time, Bourgeois shared with Philip Guston the special function of being a living and accessible link between the fertile confusion of historical modernism and the restlessness felt by many who had grown up half-enthralled and half-stifled by the pretensions and severities of post-'50s formalism.

Bourgeois's preeminent position has now been fully acknowledged by a ret-

Femme-Maison, ca. 1946–47, ink on linen, 36 by 14 inches. Collection Ella M. Foshay.

Femme-Maison, ca. 1946–47, oil and ink on linen. Collection Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Gorman.

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

Observer, ca. 1947–49, painted wood, 76 ½ inches high. Robert Miller Gallery.

rospective at the Museum of Modern Art, "chapters" of which have been seen in a number of solo shows over the past several years. This exhibition is an important achievement for its curators, Deborah Wye and Alicia Legg, as well as for the artist. It contains nearly all the major pieces made by the artist, beginning with the anthropomorphic Woman/House paintings of the '40s on through the carved and stacked wooden figures of the '40s and '50s, the dense, earthbound plasters and latex sculptures of the '60s and '70s, both of Bourgeois's environmental installations, and ending with a small selection of her more recent work, including the frail welded-steel Empty Houses and the massive marble Woman House '81.

The organizers have incorporated into this presentation the fruits of what is the first scholarly attempt to account for the full variety and complexity of Bourgeois's art. Not only that, but unlike many recent retrospectives devoted to the "complete works" of artists already secure within the modernist hierarchy, this exhibition combines its art-historical responsibilities with the Modern's original and more partisan ambition, which was to use its power to challenge the broadest possible audience with difficult and little-known work. It is no small accomplishment to have fulfilled that aim.

(There are, however, liabilities inherent in such attention. Any independent artist must be cautious about adoption by even the most accommodating institutions, since the interest of those institutions is primarily in the work completed, while the concern of the artist is with the open-ended work at hand. There are also, given the didactic role of the museum, dangers facing the work shown, dangers compounded by an uneasy public's need to have its discomfort soothed. The greater the intractability of the art offered museumgoers, the more urgent and distorting that public's compulsion to explain and thus control what it otherwise instinctively fears. These are the predictable and manageable hazards of official embrace.)

Since the late '70s when research for this exhibition was begun, Bourgeois has flourished, but the coordinates of taste and power have undergone a drastic shift. A widespread impatience with mechanistic thinking about purity and progress persists, but the freewheeling confidence and artistic openness it initially inspired have in many quarters been suspended, and the wondrous artistic miscegenation it sanctioned seems newly suspect. However, the most damaging assaults on pluralist vitality have so far been economic. The lessened availability of public grants for artists, along with the incursion of European artists into the American art market and a widespread recession psychology, has helped to create a mood of increasing conservatism among art professionals on this side of the Atlantic. As a consequence, the formal volatility that characterizes the art of the last decade has been preempted by the requirements of a revived "star system." Somewhat misleadingly presented as partaking of an "expressionist impulse," selected concerns and mannerisms of '70s art have been abruptly consolidated into the ideologically and commercially viable style often called "Neo-Expressionism." Still worse, the critical language summoned to justify this flip-flop has a familiar Manichaean ring. Once again we are being restricted to an arbitrary opposition of the gestural and the procedural, the organic and the geometric, the passionate and the cerebral.

Untitled, ca. 1950, ink on paper, 11 by 14 inches. Private collection.

To further legitimize and extend the authority of "Neo-Expressionism," writers have been busy discovering its antecedents and annexing the mythic systems associated with them. Bourgeois, with her growing notoriety, presents a special temptation, since she has explored so many dimensions of personal symbolism in her art, and since her life would seem to be a labyrinth of private and art-historical legends. But Bourgeois will be no more docile a presence within the new expressionism than she has been within the other movements that seemingly absorbed her, and those who would annex her will soon find her taking refuge in the intricate lair of her mythologies. For, despite the many ways in which her life and apparent motivations seem to confirm received notions of the solitary creator and the steady evolution of art history, her art and self-presentation are fundamentally subversive.

Temperamentally unable to accept anything as given, she has consistently questioned the assumptions of those who would compartmentalize art-making according to a priori ideas of what art should be or do. The explicit "bad taste" of some of her subjects and the unkempt look of many of her finished pieces are to a degree confrontational, but her fundamental defiance of authority is as much a matter of discreet stubbornness as it is of obvious aggression. She has simply followed the dictates of instinct and of her materials, regardless of the rules that are violated in the process. And so, in response to Sleeping figure, 1950, wood, 74 ½ inches high. Museum of Modern Art.

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

Janus Fleuri, ca. 1968, cast bronze, 9 ½ by 12 by 8 ½ inches. Robert Miller Gallery.

Tits I (Point of Contact), 1967, pink marble, 4 ½ by 10 ½ inches. Robert Miller Gallery.

inspiration and circumstance her sculpture may be poured, carved, modeled or constructed, either figurative or abstract, overtly narrative or virtually mute. Indeed, Bourgeois has been a perpetual sapper beneath the walls which enclose the separate dominions of modernism; subversion, like humor, is the weapon of those who fully understand the forces at work in the world but have been denied direct power over them. It is the polymorphous "style" of art in no-man's-land.

When looking back on Bourgeois's relation to the art of her time it is therefore more important to examine the extent to which she did not belong to the various groups with which she was connected than to establish belatedly these associations. The "one among others" is a recurrent image in her sculpture, and it was a central social and emotional reality of her life. Much of the eloquence of her speech and the beauty of her work comes from her capacity to use the ideologically loaded notion of "alienation" and its qualifier "ambivalence" while returning them to their matter-of-fact human meaning. Thus, one may see Bourgeois's work as in some respects a commentary on the artistic alliances she experienced as personal relationships.

For example, though she speaks of herself emphatically as an American artist, and though she knew well and liked most of the important painters and sculptors of the '50s, she does not see herself as part of that enclave. She had little interest in the American brand of Surrealism, nor in the turbulent painterliness it engendered. Moreover, she was held back, as were most women, by the inordinate success of the handful of men publicly recognized as the "movement." Unlike some of her sex, however, she chose not to engage directly the Promethean ambition and sometimes macho rhetoric of Abstract Expressionism—nor did she feed on resentment. Envy is simply, in her word, unrealistic. She responded instead with a practical, almost ferocious patience, Trani Episode, ca. 1971–72, hydrocal and latex, 23 ¼ inches long. Robert Miller Gallery.

Point of Contact, 1967, bronze, 5 ½ by 10 ¼ inches. Metropolitan Museum of Art.

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

Lair, ca. 1962–63, plaster, 18 ⅛ by 29 ½ by 23 ½ inches. Robert Miller Gallery.

The Quartered One, ca. 1964–65, plaster, 62 ½ by 24 by 20 inches. Private collection.

Lair Series, 1967, cast bronze, 10 ½ by 10 ½ inches. Robert Miller Gallery.

Femme Maison, 1982, marble, 25 by 19 ½ by 23 inches. Robert Miller Gallery.

and it was a patience which rewarded her with the last word. The form this delayed retort has taken is a characteristic mixture of purely sculptural invention and an unembarrassed realism. Thus, the wry phallic monuments and appendages such as the Janus pieces or Sleep II can in part be read as ironic observations on the priapic posturing of the '50s and after. In them the potent succumb to a perfectly natural deflation and the proud and menacing symbols of masculinity are revealed as vulnerable and vaguely ridiculous. This is not ritual castration but a bemused and at times nearly affectionate contemplation of spent power.

When it comes to those artists Bourgeois names as her father figures—Breton, Duchamp and the Surrealists who took refuge in New York—she is not so forgiving. Quoting La Rochefoucauld, she observes that "En France, le ridicule tue"; it is the masters of irony named above whom Bourgeois in her turn subjects to ridicule and desires at least to wound.

For many American artists, the unanticipated arrival of these magisterial remnants of the European avant-garde signaled the end of provincial isolation and the beginning of direct competition. For Bourgeois, who had known many of them before and had observed their coterie politics, their presence was a mixed blessing. As a student in Paris she had been drawn to Léger, Gromaire and especially Paul Colin, but since her arrival in America in 1938 her work had shifted from the formal clarity of Cubism toward an art responsive to conflicting psychological impulses. Undeniably the proximity of the Surrealists affected this change in direction, but Bourgeois deeply resented the indifference they demonstrated toward what she was doing.

It must, of course, be said that her own career was at that time in an embryonic stage of development—she was 27 upon arriving in New York and was not to have her first solo show until 7 years later. What rankles nevertheless, is the fact that this esthetic Comintern was in its sexual politics so essentially reactionary. Dependent upon the support of a select group of rich women patrons, its leaders demonstrated virtually no active interest in women artists who did not in addition serve as economic or sexual providers. Moreover, in their own work, they almost always subjected women to one form or another of exotic objectification. The fact remains, then, that however close Bourgeois was to individuals within the Fragile Goddess, ca. 1970, self-hardening clay, 10 ¼ inches high. Private collection.

The Destruction of the Father, 1974, latex, plaster and mixed mediums, 9 by 11 by 9 feet.

group—she speaks often of Miró and is careful to exempt him from her critique of the others—and whatever the Surrealist affinities of her early paintings and engravings, Bourgeois was never a full and acknowledged member of the Surrealist elite in this country.

Being ignored bred a desire for revenge, and that revenge has two aspects. One is seen in the maw-environment Bourgeois called The Destruction of the Father, which is a cannibalistic burlesque in which the artistic father is devoured by those condemned for so long to tolerate his pomposities. The more complex revenge has been Bourgeois's synthesis of Surrealism's use of the unconscious with the sculptural simplicity of Cubism. This she has accomplished by means of a body of work that itself seems to be of dual demeanor—dividing, on the one hand, into those pieces, usually done in luxurious materials like marble, alabaster or onyx, that have been very carefully planned, worked and finished, and, on the other hand, those that have been realized more casually, even insouciantly, in a variety of more yielding mediums such as wood, latex, plaster and wax. She has pushed the poised eccentricity of Ernst, Arp and Brancusi to the limits of imbalance, or, at the other extreme, has left her forms in a state where they are barely distinguishable from their primary, inchoate material. She has given an emotionally determined precariousness and sexually evocative weight to her shapes and so transformed the controlled and sign-based improprieties of orthodox Surrealism into a physical and intuitively perceived expressiveness. And while so much Surrealist art has ultimately found itself quite comfortable in the best homes, Bourgeois is rivaled only by Giacometti in the making of "disagreeable," undomesticatable objects.

At the same time, Bourgeois herself has repeatedly insisted upon the narrative content in her sculpture, a content which she sees as emphatically autobiographical in origin. Certainly the childhood events around which her own public explanations of her work revolve are themselves fascinating. As once again recounted in the catalogue and in a taped slide show accompanying the exhibition, they involve a delightful but philandering father, a quietly powerful mother, and the father's mistress, Sadie, who was kept in the house as an English tutor for the children. With Louise often in the midst of these adult intrigues, the other characters are an older and apparently passive sister, a younger brother unable to live up to what was expected of him, and the workers in the family tapestry business who participate in the daily life of the family and act as a chorus for its internal dramas. There are glimpses of life on the Riviera in the '20s, details of artisanal pragmatism, and intimations of the terrible pain caused by the divided loyalties of all concerned. What is most important about this story, however, is not its richness of detail, but the archetypal roles played by its cast and the almost infinite variety of emotional nuance it evokes in both teller and listener. We are thus confronted with a persuasive reality that echoes the dialectics of both modern psychology and classical myth, in which gods and demiurges act out their desires with the paradoxical combination of fickleness, cruelty and powerful constancy we accept as inevitable. It is the very sense of inevitability that allows these legends so fluid a range of reference.

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

Maisons Fragiles/Empty Houses, 1978, steel, 7 and 6 feet high. Private collection.

It is the same when one applies the private myths of Bourgeois's life to her work. What is remarkable is not the determinism of that relationship, but the extraordinary variety to which it gives rise. As with myth, the generative principle is metamorphosis. Just as the gods vacillate between disruptive whimsy and destructive anger, changing themselves or men without warning to beasts or trees or stone, each quality or image in Bourgeois's world is subject to unexpected transformation into its opposite or into a composite of supposed opposites.

A single scratchy pen stroke may describe wave motion, undulating terrain, biomorphic quiverings, vegetable striations, the fall of drapery or an avalanche of breasts. Bodies become architecture, pure ovoids sprout organic growths, a landscape evolves into phalluses gathered in a social huddle. Mathematical intervals, the convoluted shapes of an intuitive topology and mutant fleshiness all merge.[1] What was protruding is then hollow, what was hard becomes soft, what was efficiently made with fragile, available materials like latex or plaster reappears with a classical permanence and completeness in marble. Male changes to female, female to male, and both are merged into an indissoluble androgyny.

It is maybe simplest, however, to see the relation between the narrative and the visual in Bourgeois's work as being comparable to the correspondence between the text of her small book He Disappeared into Complete Silence and the engravings which accompany it. Set against each other on opposing pages, these parallel sequences do not illustrate one another, nor do they develop separately; rather, they are like companion ellipses which rotate around and partially describe a common axis. That axis—the inescapable and unromantic conflict of the genders and the loneliness and cruelty of possession—is a product of memory, memory as an approximative and creative act rather than as a psychological, literal reconstruction. In this respect Bourgeois's art strikingly suggests the critical paradigm articulated by Gaston Bachelard. Unsatisfied by any form of determinism and always cognizant of the fact that we are receptive, perhaps most receptive, to art whose specific origins we do not know, Bachelard separated "metaphor," which he judged a direct correlation of intended meaning to artifact, from what he understood to be the phenomenological existence of images—entities with their own resonance and "being" which established themselves in the space between the artist's conscious purposes and the critical intelligence of the nonartist. Bourgeois's sculptures seem best taken on terms such as these rather than as bits of expressionist catharsis or anachronistic animism.[2]

Given that Bourgeois is a maker of such images, it is impossible ever fully and precisely to account for their genesis or to exhaust their layered mysteries. Even the most tentative pieces seem essential to her enterprise, and for all the repetitions of form within this body of work, for all its tangential connection to other work of the period, Bourgeois never imitates herself nor uses uncritically what is around her. Hers is an accomplishment which, with all its outrageousness and singularity, is unmannered, coherent and beautiful in the way only something self-sustaining can be. What she offers to other artists is not a matter of solutions to problems of style, nor a maternal permission to commit funk, but rather the example of someone with the vision to make truly important art and the intransigence to do it even when nobody took much notice. □

1. In speaking of the mathematical influences on her work Bourgeois gives special emphasis to her early study of topology—the non-Euclidian geometry of spatial inversions and elastic forms. If planar geometry is the premise of Cubism, and set theory that of Minimalism, topology, at least as it is imaginatively understood in Bourgeois's practice, is the correlative of biomorphism. Bourgeois herself insists upon the formal problems of biomorphism as much as upon its psychological connotations.

2. In the first section of The Poetics of Space, Bachelard undertakes a detailed analysis of the correspondence between the house and the body, or more particularly between the imaginative states of mind and the affective connotations of interior space. Though there is to my knowledge no direct connection between his investigations and the house-body, body-landscape images of Bourgeois, it would be interesting, in a longer essay than is possible here, to examine these aspects of her work in light of the ideas set forth by Bachelard.

I would like to thank Kate Horsfield and Lyn Blumenthal of Video Data Bank for allowing me to use the transcripts of their interview with Louise Bourgeois, and for their past and frequent support. I would also like to thank the artist for many hours of conversation. The facts upon which this article was based were garnered from these two primary sources. The interpretation of those facts and of particular works are, of course, my own.

The Bourgeois retrospective is currently at the Contemporary Arts Museum, Houston [through May 8]. It will travel to the Museum of Contemporary Art, Chicago [Sept. 3–Oct. 30] and the Akron (Ohio) Art Museum [Nov. 19–Jan. 10, '84]. In 1984 it will appear at the Pompidou Center, Paris, the Kröller-Muller in Otterlo, The Netherlands, and the Musée de Toulon, France.

Author: Robert Storr is a painter and critic.

The Blind Leading the Blind. ca. 1947–49, painted wood, 67 1/8 by 64 3/8 by 16 1/4 inches. Private collection.

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

Neil Welliver: Moosehorn, 1978, 72 by 60 inches. Collection Albert J. Wood.

Terrestrial Truth: Neil Welliver

With a temperateness that Thoreau would have appreciated, Neil Welliver employs a painterly literalism to capture the pellucid Maine countryside. Fourteen years of his work were surveyed in a recent retrospective.

BY DONALD B. KUSPIT

What is extraordinary about Neil Welliver's landscape paintings is the way nature is made thematic without becoming empathetic, the way it is perceived without any theoretical preconceptions. There are many beautiful "tricks" of perception, which, if used in excess, could be regarded as too patently fictional—the way the "excessive" smell of certain tropical flowers outdoes sophisticated perfume. Welliver shows us how nature outdoes art, seems more arch and artificial than anything we can invent, which is why it seems so outlandish and objectionable, so pointlessly exasperating and outrageous. Thus, in Reflecting Pool (1980), the water becomes a powerful negative space, yet one which forcefully thrusts a reflection at us—an image of treetops, sending us soaring. The closer we come to the bottom of the picture the more we soar, for the center of gravity is located in the stones up above.

Similarly, in Spring Freshet (1975), the stones lose almost all their density in the light—which is a great actor in Welliver, upstaging all solids—while in Snow Painting (1974) the wall of white becomes solid, the trees lose their hardness. In Pond Pass and Casade, both 1974, we have no clear idea of how far we are from the distant shore, yet we feel close to it. Light affects our sense of space, manipulates our sense of distance and intimacy with the things in it, and is the source of the paradoxical inversions, the complexity of relationship, that Welliver's pictures abound in.

Raymond's Brook, 1978, 60 by 72 inches. Collection Jay Yang.

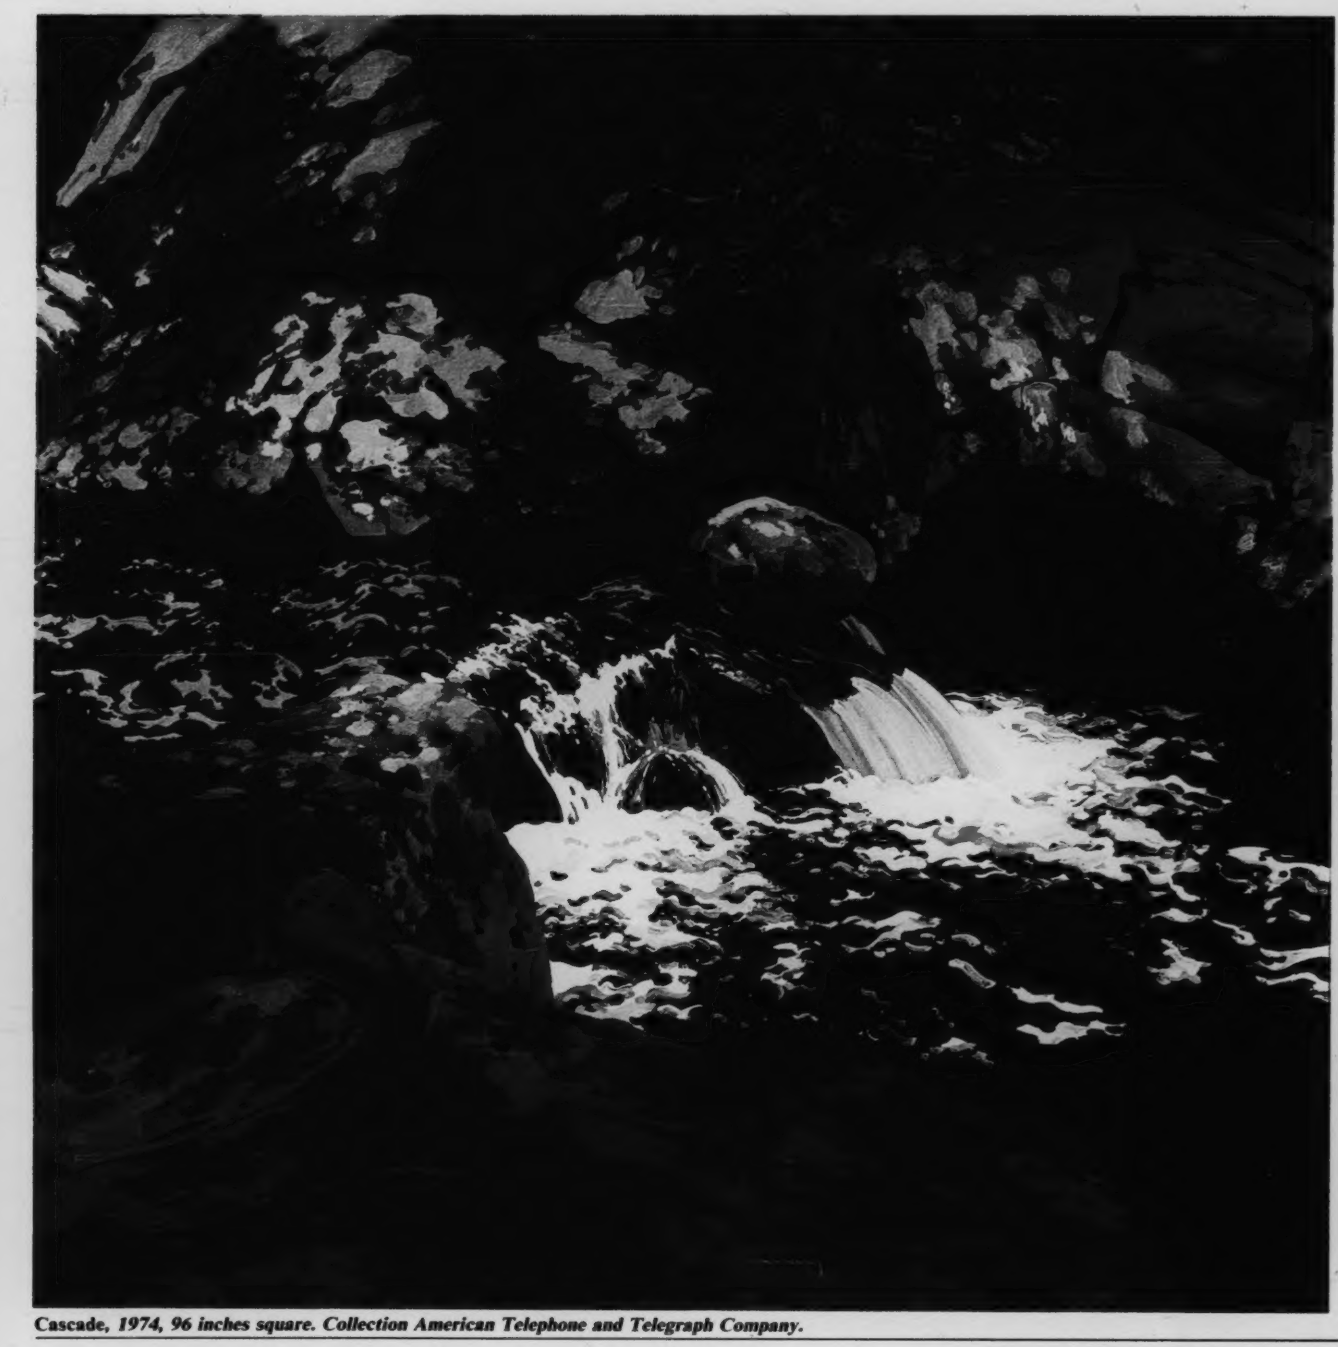
Nature, in its simplicity, in its being what it is and nothing else—in its lack of the need for self-doubling or self-display which is typically human, part of human frailty—becomes the perfect scene for such spontaneous paradoxes. They seem to disclose its Buddha nature, its pristine presentness—lack of pushy presence. Yet this revelation is not foreordained in Welliver, is not the destiny his art fights to arrive at. He starts from the pure givenness of nature; it fictionalizes itself. Welliver's content forms itself; in his scenes of nature, lack of consciousness seems to become a higher consciousness.

A Thoreau-like dimension has been claimed for Welliver's nature, based on a sense of his being nature's caretaker. His pictures "take care" of it in the sense of leaving it untouched, unmarked by any human presence—by keeping out all signs of civilization. These are very unsocial pictures, and ecologically sound; they are devastatingly sane in their attitude to nature, altogether non-exploitive. It is in their asociality, if not explicit anti-sociality, that they link up with the grand American tradition of 19th-century landscape, particularly with Luminism.

The sense of an isolation that wants for nothing, that amounts to self-sufficiency—that evokes that old philosophical ideal, and gives the illusion of divine presence—is part of the presociality of this kind of nature imagery. Welliver tries to recover the prelapsar-

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI



Cascade*, *1974, 96 inches square. Collection American Telephone and Telegraph Company.

ian state through an adroit awareness of nature's intensity in detail as much as in whole, an intensity generated by the kind of paradoxical contrasts spoken of earlier. These contrasts are there for their own sake, and inherent to—constitutive of—natural appearance, and by implication nature's reality. Welliver demonstrates that the whole of nature exists in each of its parts, and both whole and parts are studies in contrast, spontaneous refinements of contrasts. It is as though each natural shift in contrast—shift in light, in relation to theme, in substance of theme—brought closer an idea of perfection which we did not know until we saw it realized in nature.

For all the "inwardness" inadvertently suggested, the paintings, while remaining a heady mix of intelligibility and intensity, function as sheer display. For all their meditative, pastoral quality, they have a forceful erotic forwardness—power of confrontation, at once lyrical and epic, as if Welliver were at once making us a gift of nature and challenging us with it. This erotic "frontalism" is transparent in Welliver's early works, where it is concentrated in the presence of a nude, an archly fictional device in the context. It is not always clear, in these early works, whether the nude exists to throw nature into relief or, more conventionally, the reverse—whether nature is the setting for the nude. Later, the nakedness of the nudes is assimilated into nature, which thereby becomes all the most viscerally there. Nature in full nakedness—overt, "uncompromised"—is, in the later works, the whole theme.

Spring Freshet, 1975, 96 inches square. Collection John F. Walsh, Jr. and John Logan O'Donnell.

The early landscapes with nude introduce an involuntary biographical and inadvertently mythological note (which is why Welliver may have eliminated the figure). These works are "impure," which makes them wonderfully appealing. One wonders about Welliver's relations with Diane (the virginal goddess?) in the picture showing her With Soap (1967), in a way one never wondered about Matisse's relations with his much more abstracted models. The wading Nude (1969) seems sexually inviting; she's certainly not just there for her reflection, or for the way light and water ripple off her body. These pictures invite such projections, because of the con-frontality of the figure, which distracts from all the perceptual play of light and atmosphere—the nude absorbs all the "neo-impressionist" elements for which Welliver is justly famous into its equally stimulating shapes.

The erotic element is most powerful in the standing odalisque who is the Girl with Striped Washcloth (1971). The theme of a woman washing or bathing reminds us of Degas, but there is no sly keyhole vision here. The nude is out in the open, one might say overly visible. Did Welliver finally eliminate her because she distracted from the landscape, from his vision of nature—because she did not fit into nature, but aroused natural impulses which became all too human because of the complex sociality they implied? The figure remains an "impulsive" element in the landscape, drawing all impulse and perception to itself.

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

Reflections, 1970, 49 inches square. Collection Mr. and Mrs. John F. Walsh, Jr.

The Girl with the Washcloth is particularly strange because of the impulsively drawn, grotesque hand on her hip, a hand which looks more like a paw. Its rawness resembles that of some of the water-reflected shapes—has a similar tendency to indeterminacy. The hand's reflection in the water is seemingly about to disintegrate, but the hand itself looks as little about to change its shape as the model her intense stare. The red and white washcloth is a prop signaling the sensuality of the whole situation—of perception of the "natural" body, of the female "nature." The washcloth exists in tandem with the black patch of pubic hair—holding its own in reflection more than the washcloth—which makes the point succinctly.

Finally, the nude in the landscape had to go; it was more arousing than the landscape, and could not readily be absorbed in the perceptual display of nature, could not simply become another occasion for the play of light and atmosphere. Welliver could not distance himself from the nude, try as he might—as he did in Reflections (1970). He could not embed the women in the totality of nature. The nude was always more exhibitionistic than exhibited; it stood out as reality rather than stood in as art. Also, in a feminist period, it was a dangerous subject matter—the female as a creature of nature, the most intriguing animal in the forest—for a male artist, an intolerable act of appropriative machismo.

Girl with Striped Washcloth, 1971, 60 inches square. Whitney Museum of American Art.

Welliver's '70s pictures of nudes seem to make a social point about what landscapists are really after—a strictly sensuous relation with an undemanding "given," or, at least, a subject that is demanding only in that it asks to be actively perceived. Welliver's landscapes offer a spellbinding freedom from encumbrances and compromises; they propose a life devoted only to the involvements of perception. ☐

"Neil Welliver: Paintings, 1966–1980" was organized by Robert M. Doty for the Currier Gallery, Manchester, N.H. The exhibition finished a six-museum tour in Jan. '83. Recent paintings were seen at Marlborough Gallery, New York, Feb. 5–Mar. 2.

Author: Donald B. Kuspit received the College Art Association's 1982 award for art criticism.

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

Robert Longo: Culture Culture, 1982–83, acrylic on masonite, ink, charcoal, graphite on paper, 91 ½ by 147 ¾ inches. Metro Pictures.

The Art of Spectacle

Brashly combining relief, drawings and free-standing sculpture, Robert Longo's recent two-gallery extravaganza dealt in public imagery—fascistic and otherwise. Below, a discussion of the archaic forms and the surface seductions of Longo's multi-medium simulations of reality.

BY HAL FOSTER

Robert Longo is fascinated by the rhetoric of public representations—monuments, statues, reliefs. . . . He has used an image of the Brandenberg Gate in Berlin as a logo, and he announced his recent show[1] at Metro Pictures and Castelli Greene Street with a poster of an equestrian statue. Again and again Longo has simulated archaic and/or authoritarian representations. Why?

It is no secret that our culture is fascinated by images of fascism (in recent art alone one thinks of Troy Brauntuch, Anselm Kiefer, Gilbert & George. . .), and this fascination cannot be explained away either as a dandyish taste for the scandalous or as a return, not of the repressed, but of the desire for repression. For any such hypothesis there is no end of evidence (one sees a new authoritarianism as well as a new irrationalism everywhere). But I want to think about "fascinating fascism" in other terms—terms, I think, that will lead us to Longo, and much else in our culture besides.

Recently, Jean Baudrillard has suggested why fascism is the site of such attraction. We suffer today, he says, from a "loss of the real,"[2] and in order to compensate we have made a fetish of the period prior to this loss—the period of fascism (and World War II, etc.).[3] Now on the face of it this idea seems absurd. Fascism as a period with a purchase on the real? It is infamous instead for its irrationality. But this paradox is precisely why it fascinates us—for it is in fascism that one clearly sees a culture struggle with the loss of the real. How else to explain the fanatical resurrection, in fascism, of atavistic representations—myths of nature, race, empire, of "blood and soil"—except as a desperate means, in the face of the "one-dimensionality" of modern life, to rescue a sense of the real?

Clearly, the Nazi leadership exploited this cultural trauma, and just as clearly they exploited the modern mediums and effects which did so much to dissolve the real—mediums like film, effects like the spectacle.[4] This, I think, is one reason why artists like Longo have explored representations of fascism: because in them one sees both an extraordinary investment in the real and an extraordinary manipulation of its loss (in "spectacular" pageants and films).

It is a commonplace to say that the primary "public representation" in the 20th century is now film, not architecture or sculpture (though the very term is suspect, if one grants the loss of the real). Of course, the Third Reich invested in old forms like architecture (the rigid classicist vocabulary of fascist mouments makes clear the pretensions of this "Empire of 1000 Years") even as it explored new forms—like film—of "spectacular" control. In fact, one can point to a specific instance in which the ideological stress passes from architecture to film—in the 1935 Leni Riefenstahl "documentary" of the Nazi rally at Nuremberg. There architecture becomes scenographic: Albert Speer designed the stadium essentially as a set for a cinematic event. In this example, we glimpse how the spectacle works—as a simulated reality, a total illusion, a set of effects that consumes the primary event. Now, in the work of Longo we are once again in such a world of spectacle—but more, we are in a "world of simulation, . . . of the murder of every symbolic form and its hysterical, historical retrospection."[5] For Longo traces not only our loss of the real but also our morbid attempt to compensate for this loss via the resurrection of archaic images and forms.

To think about Longo in these terms, one should turn to his performances, in particular Empire. Comprised of three pieces—"Sound Distance of a Good Man" (1978), "Surrender" (1979) and "Empire" (1981), the first two originally performed individually—the work deploys dance, music, sculpture, film and expressionist theater to spectacular effect.[6] (Longo first presented Empire in toto in April 1981 at Washington's Corcoran Gallery, the neoclassical atrium of which was used scenographically.) "Sound Distance" and "Surrender" are both "sculptural/cinematic triptychs." Each consists of three simultaneous tableaux, arrayed horizontally and spectrally before the audience, that simulate different art forms. "Sound Distance," for example, simulates four arts—sculpture, dance, film and voice—but in such a way that each is stripped of its conventional supports (narrative, most obviously) and known only in its effects (pose, lighting, etc.). Thus is enacted a simultaneous estrangement- and fascination-effect, which enables one to see how these arts—and spectacle in general—operate.

In "Sound Distance" each art form is re-presented in terms of an opposition of "live" elements (present, active, etc.) versus "dead" ones (represented, prerecorded, etc.). In the tableau to the left, two spotlit wrestlers slowly revolve on a pedestal in a way which conflates dance and sculpture. Faced with a hybrid medium, we think instead in terms of an opposition—of the animate versus the inanimate, the live fact versus the esthetic form of the two bodies.

The center tableau is a screen on which is projected a film, a film that is really a paradox—a motion picture of a still photograph. Again, an ambiguity of live versus dead, which in turn is echoed by the photograph—of a man, back arched as if just shot, in front of a massively immobile statue of a lion.

Finally, in the tableau to the right, a soprano, also spotlit, sings in an operatic forte, at first with, but then against, a prerecorded tape of music and voices.

Empire*: Detail of "Sound Distance of a Good Man," performed at the Corcoran Gallery of Art, April 15, 1981. Photo Bob Epstein.

VOL
7
1

ISS
4

A P 1983

UMI

Empire: Detail of the performance "Empire." Photo Robert Longo.

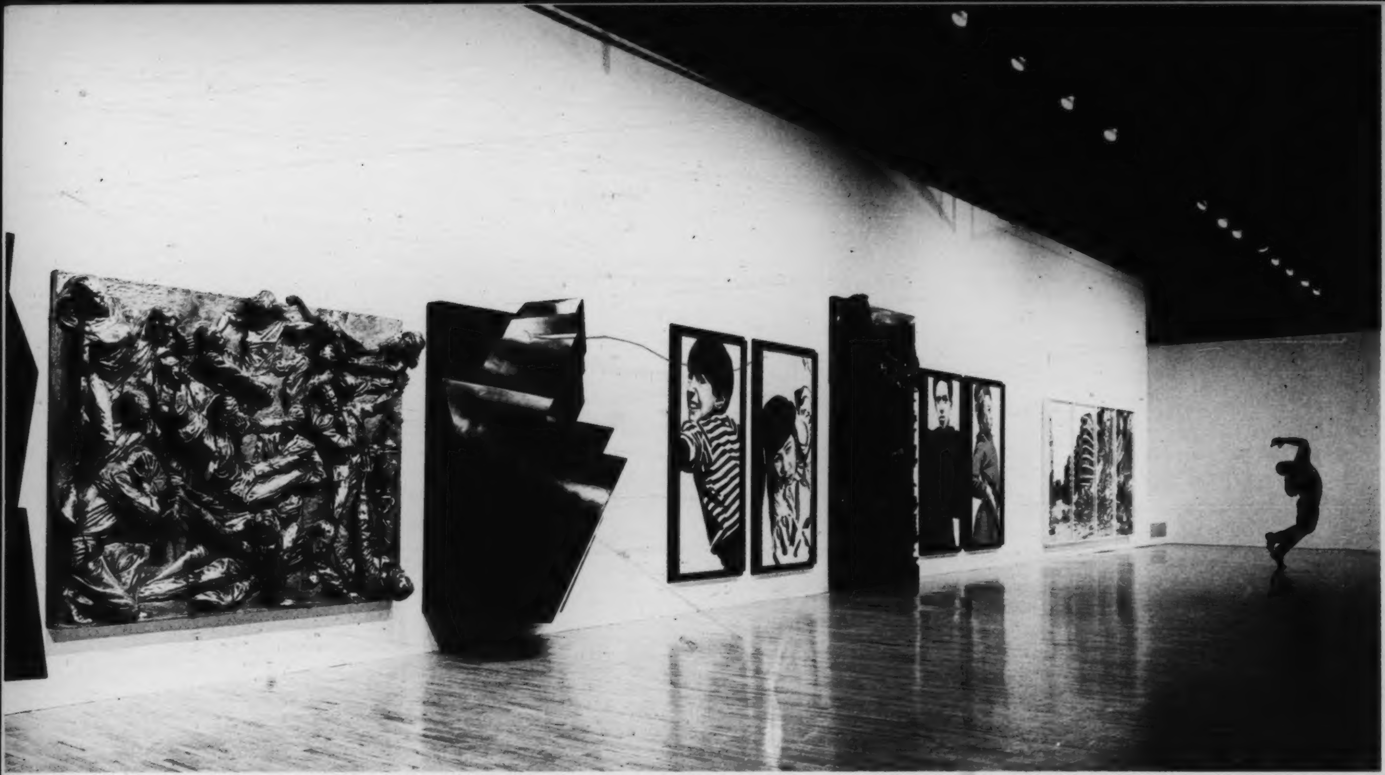
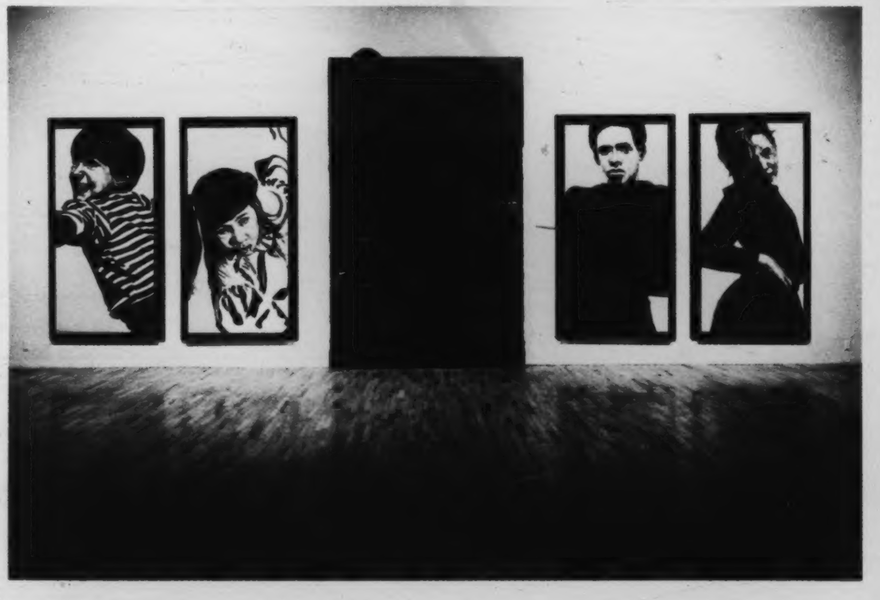
VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI



Above, and facing page: two views of Longo's installation at Castelli Greene St.: Above left,* Corporate Wars: Walls of Influence, 1982, aluminum, lacquer on wood, 9 by 26 by 4 feet. Right, Love Police: Engines in Us (The Doors), *1982-83 (detail below).



Here, as in the other two tableaux, the opposition live versus dead is blurred, broken down: simulations are let loose, and the order of things—what is present and what is "only" represented—is confused.[7] It is important to note that "Sound Distance" does not reduce each form to an essence (à la modernism); rather, it strips each form to surfaces—effects without origin or referent.[8] These simulations are very seductive (better than real); one is made aware of the spectacular (i.e., manipulative) potential of "the arts."

"Surrender" is also a "triptych," comprised of two long black runways on either side with three spotlights each and a movie screen in the center. We first hear a saxophone, then see the player, who walks robotlike to the right runway. A film image fades in, all six spots come on, and two dancers are revealed on the left runway. Simultaneously, the dancers and the saxophonist move down the runways in opposite directions: as they do so, the music changes (from R & B to a smooth, then to a shrill sound), as do the styles of the dancers—in effect, they rehearse a short history of the last three decades in popular dance. All this happens under the aegis of a motionless film image of a Greek athlete who acts as a colossal guardian. In "Surrender," we again have images at once less and more real than life—seductive simulations, in this case, of pop forms of music and dance, which are seen to be even more manipulative than the high-art forms in "Sound Distance." The title "Surrender" catches this duality nicely: it speaks at once of romantic seduction and authoritarian subjection.

Now, the entire three-part performance has a "Host" (played at the Corcoran by Eric Bogosian) who ushers the audience to the site of each piece and introduces it with an apposite anecdote or quotation. "Culture," he warns us at this point, "is not a burden, it is an opportunity. It begins with order, grows with liberty, and dies in chaos." This chaos, often a pretext for a return to authoritarian order, is simulated in "Empire." A horizontal rank of 16 spotlights appears amidst smoke and music for brass, strings and organ. The effect—the light colonnade and the fanfare music—evokes the spectacle at its most explicit. (One thinks of the "cathedral of ice" at the 1935 Tempelhof rally in Berlin, but this spectacle is contemporary: Longo describes the music, written by Joe Hannan, as "a cross between Wagner and Close Encounters of the Third Kind.")

Above, another view of* Love Police, *lacquer on aluminum, bronze, charcoal, graphite, paint; overall approx. 24 feet wide.
Right,* Noweverybody, *1982-83, charcoal, graphite, ink on paper, 96 by 192 inches; bronze figure, 79 inches high (detail below).

Now, as the rank of lights ascends, the music becomes martial, and male and female dancers in evening dress file in. Slowly the lights turn toward the audience, the music shifts to a waltz and the couples dance. More and more dancers appear—in waves—as the music accelerates. Soon they are pressed against the audience in one rhythmic mass. Suddenly, an air-raid siren sounds, and the music and lights are cut. The performance ends with "the clarion call of trumpets," the spectacular signal of war.

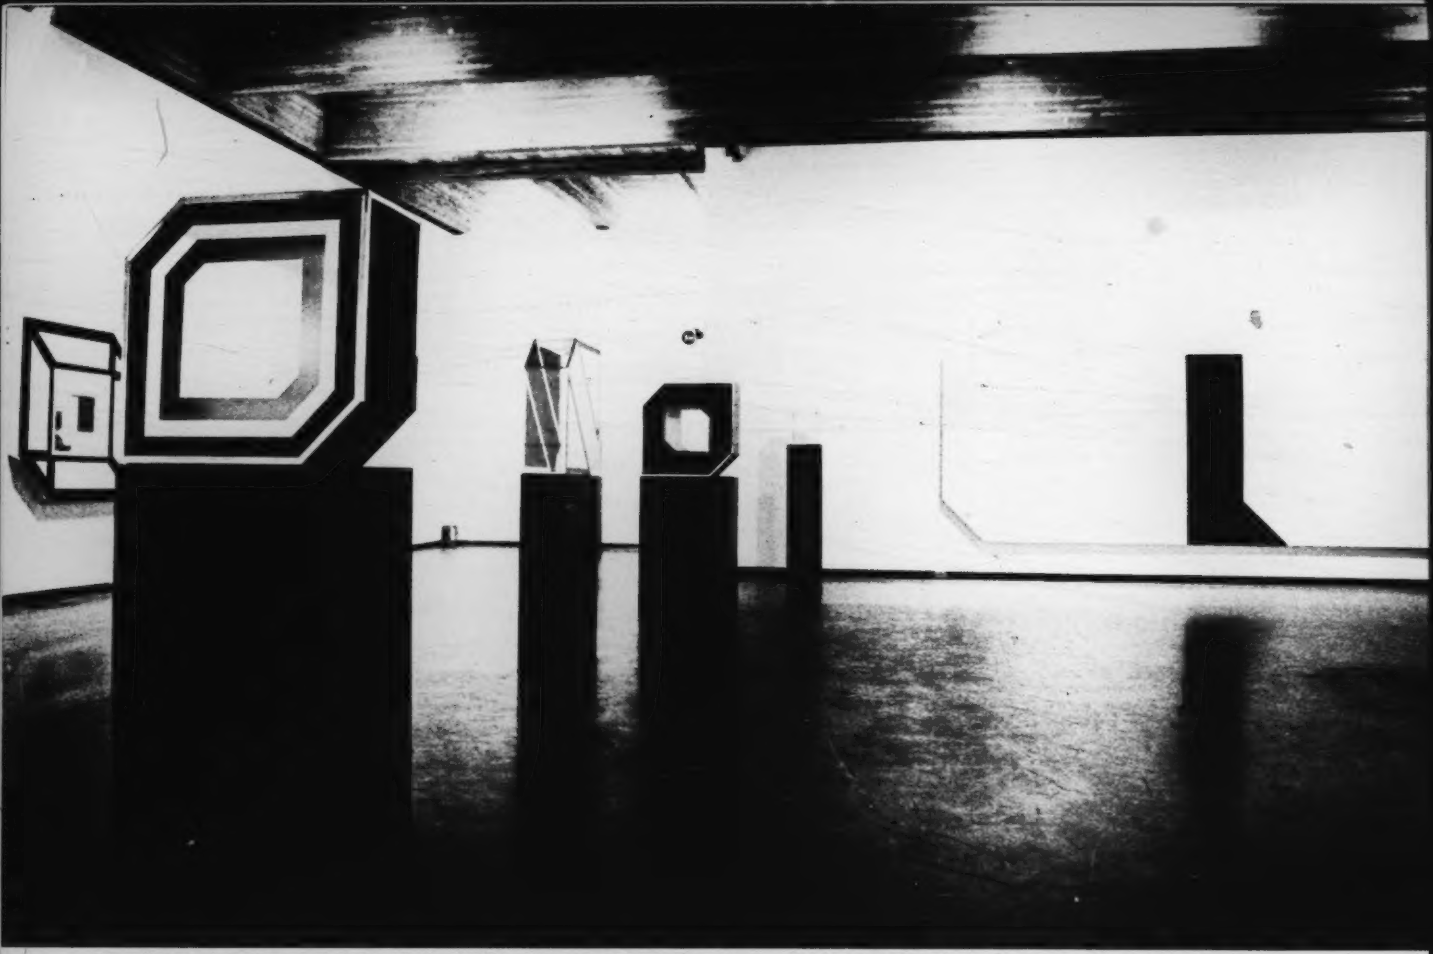
In each piece of Empire, then, elements of spectacle are broken down, stilled, reframed—so that we are paradoxically made aware of our own seduction. This, in turn, allows us to see how the spectacle functions. Unlike a typical representation which works via our faith in its realism, the spectacle works via our fascination with the hyperreal, the better-than-real.

Longo used another symbol of empire to announce his recent two-gallery extravaganza (seven huge drawings, reliefs and relief/drawings)—a poster of an equestrian statue, seen from below and cropped headless. Here again, a freighted image is reframed in order to see how its rhetoric works on us now. Perhaps the best example of the monument, the equestrian statue binds a public via symbolic representation to a leader, an event, a place—i.e., to a given history and reality. We associate it with empires, but it is found in "republics" too. (In fact, the statue here is of the great liberator Simón Bolívar, who sits on Central Park South in New York City.) That such representations vary in meaning is no surprise (Longo is obviously interested in how they are "retooled" in time and from state to state); what is a surprise is that so many states—fascist, democratic, etc.—invest, at least officially, in the same type of representation, the same model of the historical and the real.

This "investment" in representation is explored most astutely in Eisenstein's film October.[9] Authority—of the old regime of empire and of the old rhetoric (narrative, symbolic, etc.) of art—is figured there famously in the statue of

Continued on page 195

VOL 71
ISS 4
AP
1983
UMI



Installation view, "Larry Bell: the Sixties" at the Museum of Fine Arts, Museum of New Mexico, Santa Fe, Sept. 17–Dec. 5, 1982. From left to right: Ghost Box (1962–63), Death Hollow (1962–63), The Aquarium (1962–63), Untitled 1962–63, Untitled 1961, Untitled 1960.

Six-Sided Constructions

Seen in a recent retrospective, Larry Bell's '60s works—obsessive variations on a single theme, the cube—appeared quite different than when first exhibited. Here, six ways they were originally viewed, followed by six ways of viewing them today.

BY CARRIE RICKEY

Untitled, 1959, 11 by 12 by 4 inches.

Untitled, 1964, 2 by 2 by 2 feet.

Lil' Orphan Annie, 1960, acrylic on canvas, 8 by 12 feet.

Six ways of seeing Larry Bell's work during the '60s:

1. Essentially a painter obsessed with the primacy of the cube, Bell deconstructed and reconstructed his homage to the square in shaped canvases—corners notched to imply the cube silhouette—before stepping back from the wall and making explicit the implicit in his three-dimensional glass-and-steel boxes. As a sculptor of volumes that were, in the jargon, "all about" flatness, Bell inverted the formula of Cubist painters (whose canvases were 2-dimensional diagrams of the fourth dimension) and reinterpreted Cubism for the space age with literally Cubist primary structures equally indebted to Georges Braque and Josef Albers.

2. Bell, loyal clansman of the Ferus Gallery fraternity in Los Angeles (numbering among his brethren Robert Irwin, Billy Al Bengston, Ken Price and John Altoon), early recognized the significance of an artwork's context: the site could color or temper the object. Reflecting and refracting their environment, Bell's mirrored and glass cubes were barometers of their immediate climate. Like the mass-market phenomenon, "mood rings," Bell's boxes signalled changes in the atmosphere (both emotional and physical), a concern of likeminded site-specifists Robert Irwin and James Turrell.

3. Although primary structures, Bell's squares seemed capable of endless mutations, their reflective capacity involving the viewer/voyeur in a manifestly literal manner. As the spectator compassed a Bell mirrored box and peeked inside, her reflection became part of the object, integral to the experience of it. By engaging the audience in this way Bell's works connected with the participatory art of Happenings and similar events while also alluding to art's existential panic: is there art without an audience? Bell's boxes answered in the negative; his boxes were only complete by insinuating that the viewer was accomplice, accessory after the fact in the sculptural act.

4. Boxes evoke compelling associations—i.e., surprise packages—and they presume a hotsy-totsy art historical predecessor—i.e., Joseph Cornell. Bell subverted these associations by making boxes that were, essentially, empty. His glass, mirror and chrome configurations were hard-edged, slick barren vessels to be filled by the atmosphere and by the spectator. These boxes don't reveal or conceal personal fetishes à la Cornell; rather, they're public receptacles, impenetrable, and full of . . . air.

5. What are the connotations of the shape and the materials of Bell's '60s cubes? For starters, they're square and "square" carried a pejorative meaning during the '60s, implying unhip, conventional, unimaginative. Boxes evoke associations of sorting, pigeonholing, organization. And the black box (which, indeed, some of Bell's were, made opaque with epoxy paint) represented the unknown, possibly a Pandora package, unleashing devastation if opened. Glass? Fragility, to be sure; Bell's boxes were not and are not shatterproof. The emotional resonance of his '60s work straddled two milieus. Like funhouse furnishings, his mirrored boxes played with distortion and gave us a taste of infinity as we glimpsed

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

Larry Bell's House, Part II, 1962–63, mirrored glass and wood, 25 by 25 by 25 inches.

multiplied reflections of our own reflections. Though this is an idea that would be at home in a carny hall-of-mirrors, Bell executed it with the detachment of reductively simple geometry and a certain slickness of material. His was a sober funhouse; far from disorderly chaos, his hall of mirrors was organized, spick-and-span.

Six ways of seeing Larry Bell's '60s work during the '80s:

1. Omigosh! These sculptures of plane geometry could be maquettes for, or components of, modernist architecture. Seeing all the boxes together is like looking at the Park Avenue corridor of glass-and-steel volumes. From an '80s vantage, it looks as though Bell's spiritual fathers are Mies and Le Corbusier. Like them, Bell addressed the idea of a generic, no-frills formalism.

2. The mirror stage: as the French analyst Jacques Lacan theorized that an infant's ego develops as it regards itself in the looking-glass, so Bell's artistic ego evolved in these boxes that seem to look at themselves looking at themselves while subjecting viewers to a likeminded reflection, or self-validation. Bell thereby implicated the audience in the art work, forcing us to become witness to another primal act: art-making.

3. In requiring the viewer's presence to more or less complete the piece, Bell implicitly referred to the necessity of an art audience. Flattering the viewer by her importance, though, fed a kind of cultural narcissism, a canny presage of what Tom Wolfe called The Me Generation (in the '70s) and what Christopher Lasch deplored as a social cul-de-sac.

4. Certain of the "entrances," or peepholes, into Bell's sculpture have a typically '60s morphology —stylized forms so much a part of '60s culture that though unremarkable at the time, they induce nostalgia now. Take the crossed, overlapping ovals: they at once refer to the rings of Saturn and to the atomic energy symbol. The conquest of space and atomic power, so fundamental to '60s consciousness, are unconscious allusions here.

5. Precocious Duchampism, a key to the playful, revisionist qualities of the decade, informs Bell's work though Bell was working this way well before the Pasadena Museum and MOMA Duchamp retrospectives. The sense of preserved atmosphere within Bell's boxes reminds me of Duchamp's 50cc of Paris Air, an ampule/readymade containing air. Bell's choice of glass as a sculptural material refers to Duchamp's Large Glass; many of Bell's early peices are cracked like the Duchamp. The voyeuristic aspect and prescribed vantage from which to see into the boxes share features with Duchamp's Etant Donné, a piece Bell could not possibly have seen when he did his early boxes.

6. Ultimately, Bell's '60s boxes, like Duchamp's Large Glass, characterize a chief conceit of 20th century art. We want to see through art—and can, literally, because it's glass—but we also want it to reflect our lives. It's the old mirror-versus-lamp enigma of literature: is art the looking-glass reflecting or the lamp illuminating our lives? Bell's '60s work—as seen at this 1982 retrospective—insisted that art shouldn't be an either/or situation. It was both/and: we should see through it, and through our reflections. □

Author: Carrie Rickey writes about film and art and is working on a book about Hollywood.

Installation of Bell's Untitled Cubes (1965–69) at the Museum of Fine Arts, Santa Fe.

Installation of Untitled Cubes at the Pace Gallery, New York City, November 1965.

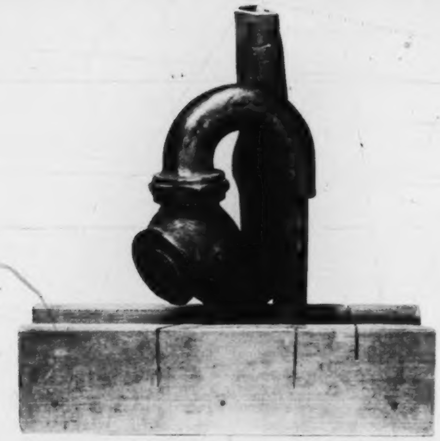
VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI



Morton Schamberg: God, 1918, assemblage, 10 1/2 inches high. Philadelphia Museum of Art.

Venus and the Stocking Machines

A current Morton Schamberg exhibition—the first in 20 years—introduces a number of recently discovered works that force us to revise our general ideas about the machinist esthetic of the early 20th century.

BY JULIA BALLERINI

From textbooks we know Morton Schamberg as the maker of the ironic God (1918)—a plumbing trap wedged upright in a miter box—and as the author of crisp paintings of machines, many of which are now in the Societé Anonyme Collection at Yale and the Arensberg Collection at the Philadelphia Museum. We may also be familiar with some of the photographs of city scenes he exhibited in 1917, along with similar views by Paul Strand and Charles Sheeler. But these examples do not prepare us for the range and characteristics of Schamberg's work as a whole.

Among the 64 Schamberg oils, watercolors and pastels (plus one photograph) recently exhibited at the Salander–O'Reilly Galleries in New York were 16 recently discovered small pastels of machine parts (all probably dating from 1915–16), which have never before been exhibited or published.[1] Though related to Schamberg's other work, and although most are signed and some are dated, these exquisite, provocative works possess an intensity and freedom of execution which suggest that they are much more private than Schamberg's larger, more restrained oils and watercolors. Not only do the pastels modify our viewing of his other work; they also force us to revise our general ideas about the machinist esthetic of the early 20th century.

The pastels first captivate by their color: raspberry-sherbert pinks combine with flip accents of turquoise and royal blues. There are aniline reds, lemon-rind and soft dun yellows throughout. There is also a great deal of orange—an orange of marigolds turned tough rather than tangy—and accents of storybook-tree greens. The most pulsating colors are a range of purples, which seem to swell and abate. And there is black—Cézannesque—confirming a contour here and there, but denying fixity as its trajectories are interrupted, opposing and yielding to other colors, unsettling certitudes.

Although the forms in these pastels seem abstract and secondary, sunken back as they are into color, they represent parts of actual machines that Schamberg drew from catalogues of cotton-stocking manufacturing apparatus.[2] He insistently chose circular forms with a central pivot—rotary spools, drive wheels, pulleys. At times there is one disk, at others two. Although many appear to be passing devices for thread or fabric, the itineraries they suggest are never completed.

We cannot tell if these disks are in motion or repose. They do not speak of the activity of technology, nor of its adventure (as do some Italian Futurist works), nor of its competence (as do some works by Lozowick, for example). In Schamberg, motion—if it exists at all—is bedded in battings of color, made infinite rather than temporal. If there is an image of speed and power in these works, then it is in such excess that it becomes an image of repose. Exterior friction is eliminated in favor of a state of coenaesthesis. Schamberg gives us a condition, not a process.

As a condition, these machine parts

Composition #21, ca. 1915–16, pastel on paper, 7 ⅞ by 5 ⅞ inches. Salander-O'Reilly Galleries.

Composition #22, ca. 1915–16, pastel on paper, 7 ¾ by 6 inches. Salander-O'Reilly Galleries.

Composition #19, ca. 1915–16, pastel on paper, 5 ⅞ by 7 ⅞ inches. Salander-O'Reilly Galleries.

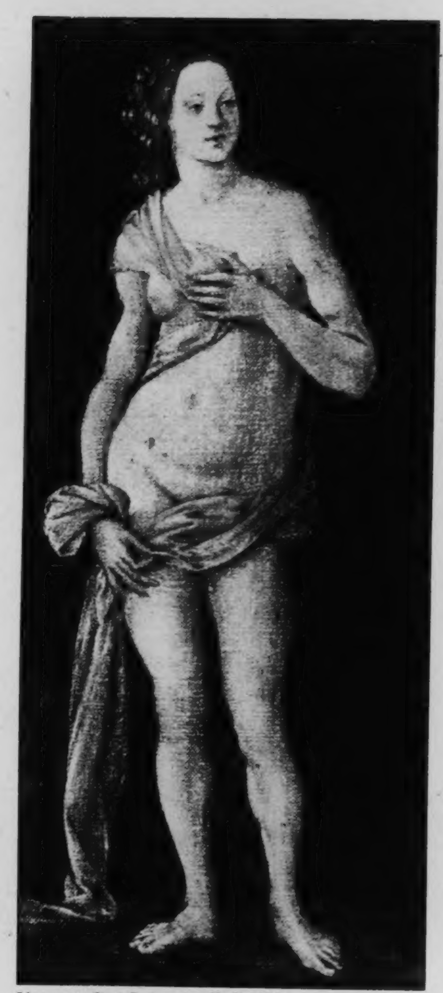
VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

are not only disembodied in their color, but exist in no definable space. They are not placed upon any particular surface, nor set against any specific plane. They float in their own atmosphere. At most, some of the disks are set in pink and turquoise halos. No light is cast upon them and they cast no shadows. They are illuminated only from within, by the vibrancy of their own coloration.

Schamberg's machinist paintings have been called "as beautiful as flowers."[3] It has been implied, or tacitly assumed, that this "beauty" refers to the machines themselves, that these works form part of an "esthetic stance" towards machines—a stance which, although it "essentially cut the machine off from its causes and effect . . . [implies] a positive attitude towards the machine."[4] However, the discovery of Schamberg's previously unknown pastels requires us to expand and modify this notion.

We can begin within the context of Schamberg's own work. Fortunately, the Salander-O'Reilly exhibition provided a broad range of examples. Here it is possible to indicate only a few, to suggest one aspect of Schamberg's work—inevitably giving short shrift to others. The winter of 1908–09 appears to have been a key moment in Schamberg's development. Having completed his studies at the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts (where, along with his close friend Sheeler, he studied under William Merritt Chase), he traveled to Florence and Siena. According to his contemporary Walter Pach, it was there that Schamberg discovered "the meaning of the great tradition which was to open his eyes to the falsity . . . of nineteenth-century naturalism."[5]

In that winter of 1908–09 Schamberg made three copies from Renaissance masters—the Duchess of Urbino after Piero della Francesca, a Venus after Lorenzo di Credi, and the David of Michelangelo (now lost)—as well as copies of Greco-Egyptian portraits (also lost). He evidently considered these paintings as more than mere exercises, since he included them in his one-man exhibition of January 1910 at the McClees Galleries in Philadelphia. The copy from Piero is faithful, although it seems to emphasize the painting's vertical/horizontal structure at the expense of some of the subtleties of Piero's landscape.



Venus (after Lorenzo di Credi), 1908–09, oil on canvas, ca. 14 inches high. Private collection.

In Schamberg's copy of di Credi's Venus the trajectory of the veil is illogical; as a relative remarked of his machine paintings, "The goddamn thing wouldn't work."

Although the experience of Piero was paramount to Schamberg's search for a compositional mode, the di Credi Venus may well be more pertinent. She stands, gazing off to our right in an awkward, lumpish contrapposto. A length of cloth wends its way around her body. Her right thumb and forefinger hold one end delicately across her pelvis from where the swath ascends around her back to the front of her torso. There the fabric is caught between her breasts by her other hand. Her right breast, encircled on three sides by cloth, is also accented by the direction of her hand and by an unexpected concavity in her right arm. The veil continues over her shoulders and presumably falls to wind around her right wrist and from there to the ground, but this last part of its trajectory is illogical. As a Schamberg relative remarked of his machine paintings, "The goddamn thing wouldn't work."[6]

"On his return to Paris," Pach continues, "he was ready to appreciate what the great Frenchmen of our time had accomplished." A 1911 Landscape (with Clouds) shows Schamberg right in step with an admixture of expressive Fauvism on the edge of Orphism, individualized by his unusual but consistent use of color. From this landscape it would also seem that Schamberg had been looking at van Gogh, who had structured many of his canvases after medieval and Renaissance works. Perhaps coincidentally, but tellingly nonetheless, if this landscape is upended so that its left side becomes its base, the configuration of the clouds assumes a pattern similar to that of the veil and breast of Schamberg's Venus copy. In any case, there are forces at work in this painting which transcend the mere rendition of a natural scene.

By 1912 Schamberg's style had assumed Cubist associations, as demonstrated in the 1913 Figure A (Geometrical Patterns), after a 1909 Matisse Back. If, as has been claimed, "Cubism appealed [to the artists of this generation] as a search for fundamentals, for the essential truths of the material world,"[7] then Schamberg here has pitted materiality against the dematerializing tendencies of juxtaposed planes as well as colors. The contiguous surfaces of the nude welter in oranges, ochers, yellows and pinks, spreading out her body against a glowing mandorla curve of nocturnal blues.

It was at this time, as early as 1912, that Schamberg first began to consider using machines as subjects for his paintings; apparently, in the Armory Show of 1913, he exhibited a canvas (now lost) which depicted a telephone, among other things.[8] This early date suggests that Schamberg's machinist tendencies developed independently, despite his affiliations with the pre-Dada French context within which, given his lack of irony (God excepted), he has never been comfortably placed.[9]

Certainly the structural concerns that run throughout Schamberg's work indicate that the order and logic of machinery would appeal to him. Apart from his interest in Piero, he was, like many of his contemporaries, a student of architecture and mechanical drawing. But his machines, the pastels in particular, are far from orderly or logical; they are sensuous and romantic. Perhaps, then, a different aspect of his formation deserves more emphasis.

Apart from such personal factors as the death of his mother while he was still a child, and the marriage of his close friend Fanette Reider to another man (she was until 1912 the model for many of his paintings), it is important to consider what it might have meant to belong to a generation which reached maturity during the bewildering first age of "full mechanization."[10] Changes in the modes of the production of goods, of communication and travel were unsettling to the minds and senses of Schamberg's generation. As Henry Adams wrote in 1900:

> Man had translated himself into a new universe which had no common scale of measurement with the old. He had entered a supersensual world, in which he could measure nothing except by chance collisions of movements imperceptible to his senses . . . physics stark mad in metaphysics.[11]

Some, such as the Futurists and Dadaists, reacted with irony, buffoonery and, at times, anger, in their attempts—often valid—to form a new vocabulary with which to confront a different world. Schamberg's response was more tender and conciliatory. He tended to interpret the new energy of the machine in terms of previously known forces, whether psychic or physical. Or, conversely, he would collocate known forces to the image of the machine. Adams himself wrote that "in America, neither Venus or Virgin ever had value as a force—at most as sentiment," and suggested that the machine possesses that missing force. He characterized the dynamo's rays of energy as "immediate modes of the divine substance."[12]

It is unlikely that Schamberg was familiar with Adams's essay (privately circulated in 1907, but not published until 1918, the year of Schamberg's death). Nonetheless, by 1915–16, when he came to realize his machinist oils and pastels, his immediate ambient was replete with imagery of the machine incarnate, especially in female form (albeit with irony). Duchamp had begun work on The Bride Stripped Bare by Her Bachelors, Even (which Schamberg would have known, being an habi-

Landscape (with Clouds), ca. 1910–11, oil on panel, 5 ¾ by 6 ¾ inches.

Figure A (Geometrical Patterns), 1913, oil on canvas, 32 by 26 inches.

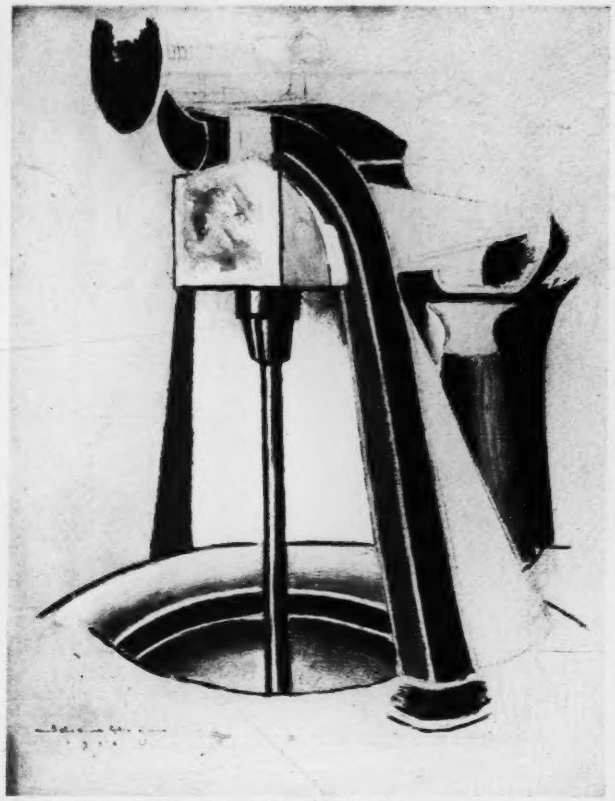
VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI



Painting VII (Machine Forms, The Well), 1916, oil on canvas, 18 1/8 by 14 inches. Rose Art Museum, Brandeis University.

Painting VI (Camera Flashlight), 1916, oil on canvas, 24 by 20 inches. Collection the children of Dr. and Mrs. Ira Leo Schamberg.

tué of the Arensbergs) perhaps as early as 1912. By 1915 Picabia had published his immaculate conception Fille née sans mère as well as his spark plug Portrait d'une jeune fille américaine.[13] Not surprisingly, the one machine painting by Schamberg that is not derived from an actual piece of equipment is related to Jean Crotti's Les Forces mécaniques de l'amour en mouvement (1916).[14] Schamberg would undoubtably have read Paul Haviland's statement in the 1915 September-October issue of 291: "Man has made the machine in his own image. She has limbs which act; lungs which breathe; a heart which beats; a nervous system through which runs electricity." And, in keeping with the machine-religion association, Schamberg would probably also have known Picabia's machine drawing Fantasie (1915), which carries the inscription "Man created God in His image."

Since Schamberg's pastels are so lacking in mechanical qualities and so full of soft, sensual forms, it does not seem inappropriate to consider them as a displaced Venus image, or at least as a merging of the energies of machine and goddess. The formal configurations of many of the pastels, in particular the insistent disk-pivot/breast-nipple shape, seem to support such an interpretation. If upended, two of the pastels are formally similar to the early di Credi Venus.[15] We might also consider the function of these machines: the transmutation of matter. Raw natural material (cotton) is sent on an itinerary through spools and wheels and pulleys to be transformed into ladies' stockings, much as the long drapery winds about the body of Venus, eroticizing that which it simultaneously conceals and reveals. And what is a miracle but the transformation of nature—usually eroticized?[16]

When we turn, then, to the less colorful, more precise oils and watercolors contemporary to and immediately following these pastels they become, by contrast, models of restraint and of renunciation—virginal. Especially in that the virgin can be, and has been, considered a life-giving force distilled from the sexual energy of Venus.[17] (Duchamp, to take a figure directly associated with Schamberg, believed that eroticism underlay the cult of the Virgin.)[18] Painting VI (1916), often mistitled Camera Flashlight (actually a textile splicing or threading machine),[19] is an example of Schamberg's transition in paint from a richly textured style to the austere, reductive mode of a later work such as Painting VII (Machine Forms, The Well). In this context it is not insignificant that, on the basis of these late machinist oils, Schamberg is usually considered the first of the Precisionists, a group which was also known under the monastic title of "Immaculates."

Contrasted with his pastels, Schamberg's less colorful, more precise oils become models of restraint and renunciation—virginal.

This is not to say that Schamberg's work need be considered as deliberately symbolic or allegorical. It is impossible ever fully to separate the conscious from the subconscious. It would also be misleading to consider his work as occupying a single ideological space. Rather we may think of it as a manifestation of psychological and cultural fluctuation within interstices. It is clear that, unlike many of his contemporaries, Schamberg never considered his art as a break with tradition. Rather his enterprise seems to have been, in part, to fuse the energy of a nonhuman "product of an inchoate present" to that of the life-giving forces of the past.[20]

It is questionable, given Schamberg's untimely death in 1918, whether or not he abandoned this enterprise. Certainly his God, which in its irony has always seemed an anomaly, can only be read, as it has been, as a product of postwar disillusionment. Yet, if one accepts the possible mythic religious connotations of his earlier work, God is no longer a surprising and unpredicted mutant, but rather the flip side, the dark underbelly, of faith rolled over.

A late watercolor of flowers, perhaps Schamberg's last painting, is more ambiguous. It has been interpreted as a sign of revitalized belief, yet, especially when compared to the pastels, this becomes uncertain.[21] Schamberg gives us a Trinity: passion-red zinnia ascending to dove-white lily to sun-yellow zinnia. Three flowers in a bowl set upon a table. As Gertrude Stein once wrote, "A table means a necessary place . . . it does mean that there has been a stand."[22] The deity has descended from its autonomous realm. Its container casts a shadow on the mortuary blue-gray black of a common support, set against an even pink of stilled expectations. □

Bowl of Flowers, 1918, watercolor, 11 ½ by 8 ¼ inches. Collection Jean L. Whitehill.

---

1. Mounted in December 1982 by the Salander-O'Reilly Galleries in New York, this was the first Schamberg exhibition in 20 years. It was accompanied by an illustrated catalogue, Morton Livingston Schamberg (henceforth: MLS) with an essay by William C. Agee. The exhibition traveled to the Columbus Museum of Art and then to the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, Philadelphia (through May 6); it will also be presented at the Herbert F. Johnson Museum, Ithaca, N.Y. (Nov. 16–Dec. 23); the Milwaukee Museum (Feb. 11–Mar. 27, 1984); the Federal Reserve Board Building, Washington, D.C. (Apr.–May, '84); and the Arts Club of Chicago (Sept. 17–Nov. 3, '84). After the exhibition's close in New York, two additional pastels were discovered.
2. Agee, p. 11. See also Ben Wolf, Morton Livingston Schamberg, Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1963, p. 30. The catalogues belonged to Schamberg's brother-in-law, who was in the ladies' cotton-stocking manufacturing business.
3. Henry McBride, New York Sun, May 25, 1919.
4. Barbara Zabel, "The Machine as Metaphor, Model, and Microcosm: Technology in American Art, 1915–1930," Arts, Dec. '82, p. 100. See also Earl A. Powell III, "Morton Schamberg: The Machine as Icon," Arts, May '77. Powell interprets Schamberg's mechanical forms as "a reflection and precise visualization . . . of the New American myth."
5. The Dial, May 17, 1919.
6. Wolf, p. 30.
7. Milton Brown, American Painting from the Armory Show to the Depression, Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1972, p. 104.
8. MLS, p. 10.
9. See Agee for a reevaluation of Schamberg's originality as regards his machinist subject.
10. See Zabel for a discussion of this topic, plus bibliography.
11. "The Dynamo and the Virgin," The Education of Henry Adams, New York, Random House, 1931, pp. 381–82. See also Dickran Tashjian's "Henry Adams and Marcel Duchamp: Liminal Views of the Dynamo and the Virgin," Arts, May '77.
12. Adams, p. 383.
13. The Fille nêe sans mère was published in 291 in June 1915, the Jeune fille amêricaine in the same publication in July-August 1915.
14. Agee, p. 14.
15. MLS, nos. 54 and 55.
16. Roland Barthes, "Plastic," Mythologies, New York, Hill and Wang, 1972.
17. Tashjian, p. 106.
18. Ibid., p. 105.
19. Agee, p. 14.
20. Tashjian, p. 106.
21. Agee, pp. 16–17.
22. Gertrude Stein, Tender Buttons, in Selected Writings, ed. Carl Van Vechten, New York, Random House, 1962, p. 474.

Author: Julia Ballerini teaches the histories of art and photography at Adelphi University.

VOL
71
ISS
4
A P 1983
UMI

Frida Kahlo: The Two Fridas, 1939, oil on canvas, 68½ inches square. Museo de Arte Moderno, Mexico City.

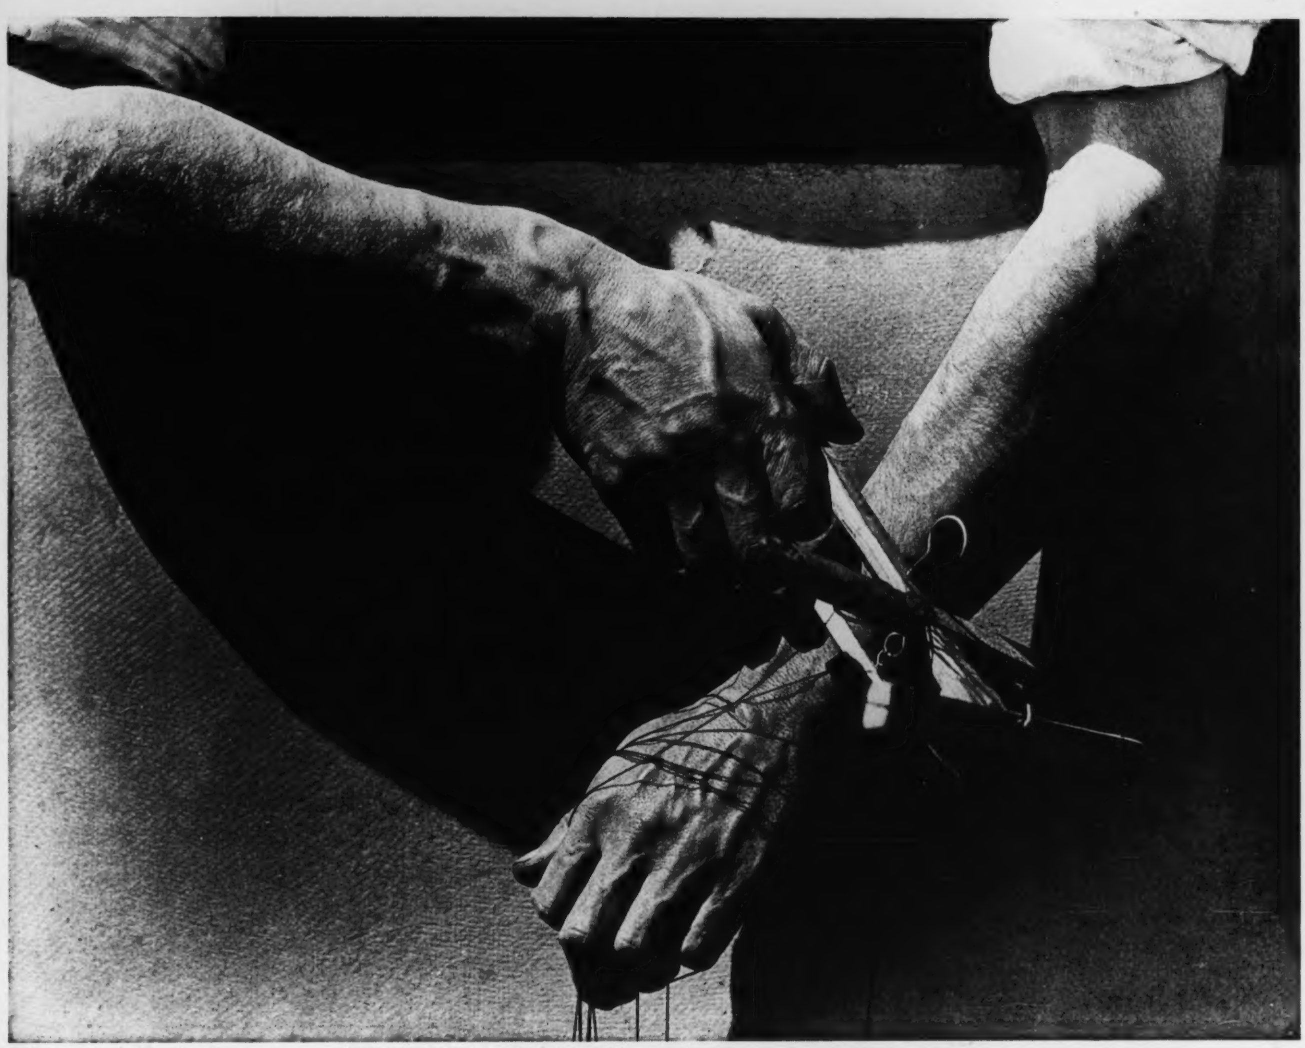
The Ribbon around the Bomb

The subjects of a current joint exhibition, Frida Kahlo and Tina Modotti—politically active women artists influenced by radical tendencies in post-revolutionary Mexico and concerned with representations of the female body—anticipated many of the questions addressed by recent feminist art.

BY MICHAEL NEWMAN



Tina Modotti:* Hands of a Puppeteer, *1926. Comitato Tina Modotti, Trieste.

As far as I know, the only image in which Frida Kahlo and Tina Modotti appear together is the Insurrection panel which Diego Rivera painted in 1928 as part of his mural cycle at the Ministry of Education building in Mexico City. While they are shown handing out arms to the people, both are picked out for special attention. They are brought together again in the exhibition of Frida Kahlo's paintings and Tina Modotti's photographs at the Grey Art Gallery, New York (through April 16), which was conceived by filmmakers Laura Mulvey and Peter Wollen and organized by Mark Francis of the Whitechapel Gallery, London (where it was on view last spring). Without the need for any obtrusive texts or documentation in the exhibition itself, the juxtaposition of these two artists acts like a montage in film, provoking questions which a show of either artist alone could not have raised so effectively. The brilliantly argued catalogue essay by Mulvey and Wollen is most concerned with issues of feminist esthetics and the radical possibilities of the avant-garde.[1] Inevitably, perhaps, it is the paintings of Frida Kahlo which have the greater presence on the walls of the gallery and which reflect most acutely on contemporary artists' attempts to use iconography, myth and allegory.

There are more than enough good reasons for a joint show. Apart from the obvious fact that both artists were women, both of them were influenced by radical tendencies in Mexico and both were politically active; each developed her esthetic under the shadow of a well-known male artist with whom she had an emotional relationship; and both challenged the dominant traditions of high art from a marginal position. Through explicitly political content in the case of Modotti, and through a preoccupation with self-image in the case of Kahlo, the work of both artists raises the question of "woman's body and its place in representation."[2] Finally, the juxtaposition places both artists firmly in the volatile political and cultural context of postrevolutionary Mexico. (The revolution, which began in late 1910, continued through 1915.)

There were also important differences in the backgrounds and lives of the two women which affected their careers. Tina Modotti was born in Udine, Italy in 1896 of a working class family.[3] They emigrated to the U.S. where she joined them in 1913 and worked for a time in Hollywood as an actress in silent films. Her husband, poet and painter Roubaix de l'Abrie Richey, died during a visit to Mexico in 1922 before she could join him. Modot-ti returned to Mexico the following year with her lover, the photographer Edward Weston.

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

Imogen Cunningham: Portrait of Frida Kahlo, 1931.

Edward Weston: Tina Modotti. Comitato Tina Modotti, Trieste.

Frida Kahlo was born in 1907 in the house in Coyoacan on the outskirts of Mexico City where she died 47 years later.[4] The "Blue House" as it is known is now the Frida Kahlo museum. In the painting My Grandparents, My Parents and I (1936), which uses the distortions of scale of naive art, Frida stands as a naked child in the courtyard of the house represented in miniature. She holds a ribbon which joins her to her grandparents: on the side of her father, a photographer of Hungarian-Jewish origin, they float over the ocean while on the side of her mother, of Indian and colonial Spanish descent, they are suspended over the mountains of Mexico. From a bourgeois family, Frida attended Mexico's elite high school, the Preparatoria. In September 1925 she was struck by a tragedy which changed her life: a streetcar ran into the bus on which she was traveling. Her spine, pelvis and foot were smashed, and a handrail penetrated her body, exiting at the vagina. While convalescing in hospital she began to paint. In 1928 she showed her work to Diego Rivera and the following year they married.

Both Kahlo and Modotti challenged the dominant traditions of high art; both worked under the shadow of a well-known male artist and in the radical climate of Mexico in the '20s.

It was from Edward Weston that Tina Modotti learned photography, and her work is marked by his emphasis on the direct representation of the subject in pursuit of pure formal values. This is evident in the pattern of leaves in Maize Plants, the emphasis on light and shade in Doorway and Steps, the modulation of symmetry and asymmetry in Telephone Wires, the man on a ladder and lettering highlighted against the grid of dark steel plates of Reservoir Tank No. 1, and the repeated rings of Glasses which uses a device of avant-garde photography, the double exposure, which Weston would not have allowed himself. Together, Modotti and Weston provided illustrations for Anita Brenner's book on Mexico, Idols Behind Altars (1929).

Modotti's approach, however, came to diverge from Weston's in her attitude to content. Political commitment as a member of the communist party (it was she who recruited Kahlo) drew her towards an overtly political subject matter. As Peter Wollen writes in an essay on Kahlo and Modotti in his recent book, "Her aesthetic strategy, which derived originally from Weston, was independent of her ideas about content, which derived from her political experience . . . there was a tension between the two."[5] Seen from above, the sombreros of Workers Reading El Machete create a pattern of circles around the radical newspaper just as those in March of the Workers create a pattern stressing the surface of the print. The Woman with the Anarcho-Syndicalist Black Flag makes a striking silhouette against the light

Modotti:* Workers Reading "El Machete." Comitato Tina Modotti, Trieste.

Modotti:* Composition with guitar, ammunition belt and sickle, 1927. Comitato Tina Modotti, Trieste.

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

Modotti: March of the Workers.
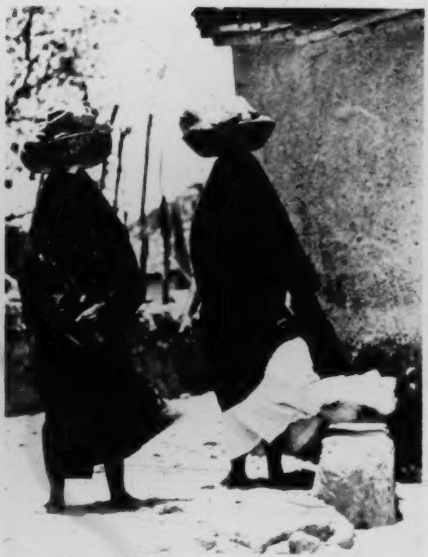
Comitato Tina Modotti, Trieste.



Two Tehuana Women.
Comitato Tina Modotti, Trieste.

Elegance and Poverty.
Comitato Tina Modotti, Trieste.

background. When Modotti photographs hands, it is important that they are hands at work, those of washerwoman or puppeteer. And objects from which Weston would have made a still-life composition become for Modotti emblems of the Mexican revolution: a guitar, a sickle and a bandolier of bullets arranged on a petate mat become attributes of the peasant revolutionary. As the catalogue states, the choice "is determined not for its denotation but for its connotation." But it is possible that this tension between content and contrived form, which makes for the interest of her work, was one of the reasons why she abandoned photography shortly after her expulsion from Mexico in 1930, in addition to the fact that she was ill at ease with the Leica which came to replace the heavier Graflex camera.

On her arrival in New Orleans after her departure from Mexico, Modotti wrote to Weston "here in the U.S. everything is seen from the 'beauty' angle—a daily here spoke of my trip and referred to me 'as a woman of striking beauty' . . . evidently women here are measured by a motion picture standard." Her reputation as a beauty had been perpetuated not only by her silent movie roles, but also by Weston's famous series of nude studies Tina on the Azotea (1924) where, from a high viewpoint, she is shown sleeping in the sunshine. Rivera, for a short time her lover, had also used her as a nude model, reclining and fondling a sprouting bud as The Fertile Earth in his mural in the agricultural college, Chapingo. Against these stereotypes of woman as passive beauty and earth mother, Modotti chose to photograph women at work and raising children—toiling, suffering, noble.

> From Weston, Modotti learned to straightforwardly pursue purely formal values; yet her photographs also stubbornly invoke an independent, and overtly political, content.

The background to Frida Kahlo's work is provided by the affirmation of national identity, of Mexicanidad, which followed the prerevolutionary régime's slavish following of European models. At that point in Mexico's history, the surge of interest in native arts and crafts was more than primitivist: it was a sign of political affiliation. This "indigeneity" must be distinguished from the more generalized "primitivism" of European and U.S. avant-garde art movements where it is supposed that tribal cultures have access to deeper currents of feeling or a "collective unconscious." In "indigeneity" there is a distinctly nationalist component—a product of 19th-century romantic nationalism. There is no denying that for Kahlo, who was of part-European parentage and middle-class background, and who traveled to San Francisco, New York, Detroit and Paris during the 1930s, the adoption of a naive manner and the use of pre-hispanic and Catholic iconography was a deliberate choice. It was a form of role playing, like when she wore the Tehuana costume which was featured in Vogue and taken up by Schiaparelli. In a late work of 1951 she uses her naive style to depict herself in a wheelchair painting a realistic portrait of her doctor, Dr. Farill. But the masquerade was a way of coping with and giving a meaning to suffering: her palette is a heart, and blood drips from her brushes.

Many of the paintings encompass a persistent dualism of reference—divisions which are both personal and those of Mexican culture. In My Nurse and I (1937) the baby Frida with an adult-size head is held like a Christ child at the floreate breast of a masked Indian madonna while droplets of milk rain like manna into the jungle behind. In The Two Fridas (1939), the largest painting in the exhibition, the European Frida severs the exposed vein which links her to the tiny portrait of Diego held by the Indian Frida. In a self-portrait of 1932 she is wearing a pink ball dress and stands between the factories and skyscrapers of Detroit and the pyramids and luxuriant plant life of Mexico whose flag she holds. Opposed to the archeological fragments of Mexico's past with its mythic unity of sun and moon, male and female, is the mechanical, precisionist repetition Frida Kahlo: Frida and Diego Rivera, 1931. San Francisco Museum of Modern Art.

Self Portrait, 1940, oil on canvas, 24½ by 18¾ inches. University of Texas, Austin.

What the Water Gave Me, 1938, oil on canvas, 38 by 30 inches. Collection Tomas F. Marquez.

Self-Portrait as a Tehuana, 1943, 30 by 24 inches. Collection Mr. and Mrs. J. Selman.

of America's future.

It is the tension between the desired wholeness and utopianism on one side and the acknowledgment of physical and historical contingency on the other that gives Kahlo's art its toughness and its pathos. She wished to identify with the fertile abundance of nature. There are a group of self-portraits in which, against a background of luxuriant tropical vegetation, the spider monkeys she kept in her garden play with her like the children she could not have. In one of these, a monkey is wearing a bow in its hair just like her, and she has given herself simian features. But this very likeness of the monkey, traditionally a symbol of lust, reveals its otherness as it almost seems to mock her as a strange, alienated being. Elsewhere—in My Nurse and I and the self-portrait in a Tehuana headdress with radiating plant tendrils—Kahlo identifies with the Indian at one with the land and the seasonal cycles of nature. Since World War I, Mexican cultural nationalism was reinforced by what was perceived as the failure of European civilization. Spengler's Decline of the West was influential, and Europeans like D.H. Lawrence and Count Herman Keyserling saw Mexico as "a culture of great depth in the sense of nearness to the earth . . . determined by a primordial life . . . the original heaviness of earth."[6] As late as 1945, after another war in Europe, Kahlo's Moses, the only work of hers that looks like a program for a mural with its pantheon of world political and spiritual leaders and religious symbols, still reflects the cosmic evolutionism of the Ateneo group[7] and the idea that in Mexico would be achieved a fusion of all races and cultures, uniting the principles of male and female, good and evil. This is not a successful work but it serves to remind us that even her more intimate imagery has a significance which transcends the purely personal.

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

In Kahlo's 1932 "Self-Portrait," fragments of Mexico's past, its mythic unity of sun and moon, male and female, are opposed to the cold, precisionist repetition of America's future.

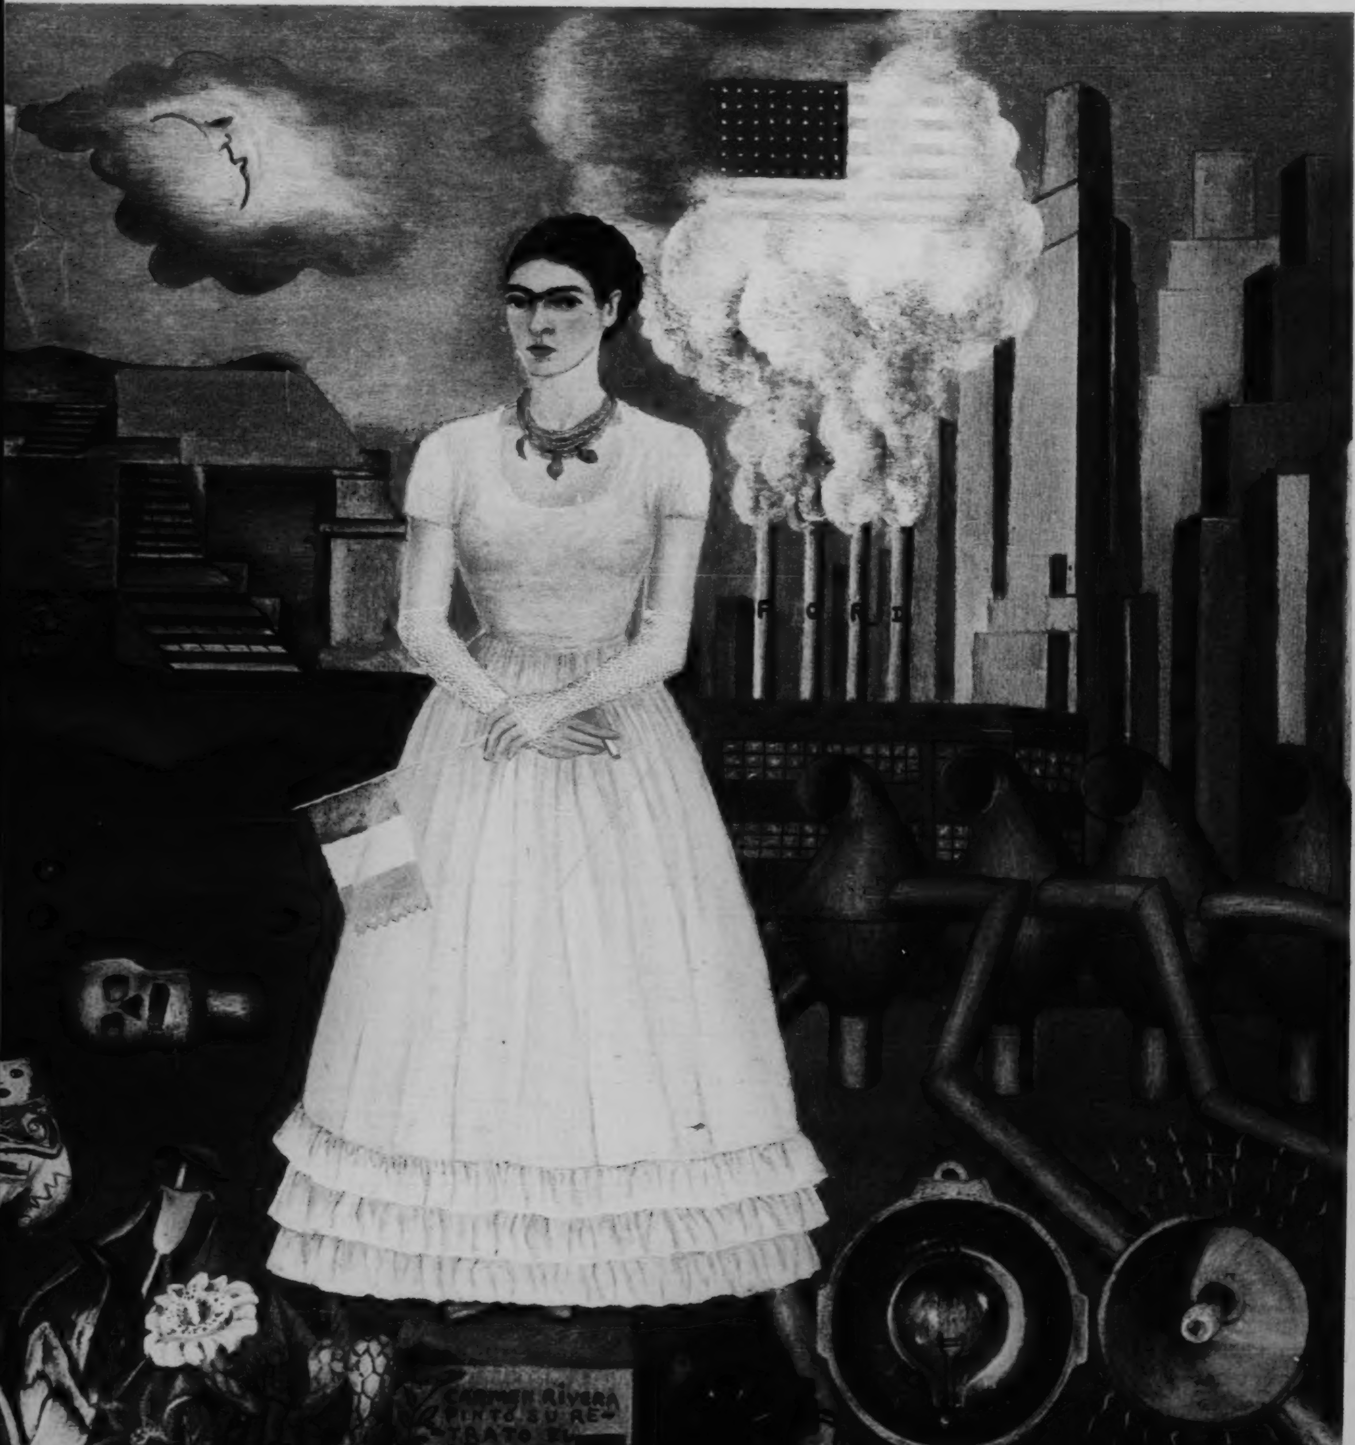
"The art of Frida Kahlo is a ribbon around a bomb" wrote André Breton[8] after he visited Kahlo in Mexico in 1938, a time when Trotsky was living in her house. He claimed her as a Surrealist whose work was "delicately situated at that point of intersection between the political (philosophical) line and the artistic line." Two years later she painted The Dream. Her four-poster bed floats in the clouds—a device which may owe something to Magritte. It is painted in the reverse perspective of naive art, and her sleeping form is enfolded in benevolent foliage, like a figure from a medieval miniature. On the canopy above, as if mimicking her, lies a memento mori, a plaster Judas holding a bunch of purple flowers and wired up with dynamite like those detonated on the Day of the Dead. Kahlo may have depicted herself sleeping but she painted with her eyes open: her iconography represents a specific and original adaption of traditional material. The clarity and intensity of the image spring from a consciousness of the void which gapes behind it, "the limit where it ceases" in the words of Maurice Blanchot.[9] That limit is death, and its frank acknowledgment is an integral part of Mexican culture. In What the Water Gave Me (1938)—the only Kahlo self-portrait without her face—her legs in the bathtub seem like those of a cadaver; one foot is cut but not bleeding. Bosch-like images floating on the water like toys form a phantasmagoria of the artist's life: her parents; the relation with her dark alter-ego, become overtly sexual; a phallic skyscraper emerging from a volcano; an empty dress floating beside the naked artist who is strangled by a cord held by a masked male figure.

Hard and sharp like jewels, Kahlo's paintings make no claim to spontaneity: their evident deliberation precludes describing them as Surrealist or Expressionist. There is no inner or essential core towards which they strive. Rather than the Protestant introspection of a Rembrandt or a van Gogh, their "masquerade" adapts the Catholic tradition of allegory. And, like Catholicism, they stress not the solitary soul but identification with the community: in Kahlo's case through the borrowing of its forms of representation.

Kahlo's closeness to allegory is indicated by The Little Deer (1946) where she portrays herself as a stag wounded with arrows, like the stricken stag in the "Verses Expressing the Feelings of a Lover" by the 17th-century Mexican nun Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz who plunges into an icy stream: "not in ease, in pain it mirrors me." Many of Kahlo's paintings are done on metal in the style of the ex-votos which she collected: paintings offered in thanks to the Virgin, Christ or a saint for recovery from an illness or some other misfortune. Almost all Kahlo's "ex-votos" have as their subject her sexuality or her physical suffering, and they offer no redemption. She shows herself being born in Childbirth (1932) in a way which recalls the Aztec figure of the goddess Tlazoltéotl, while over the bed above the shrouded head of her mother hangs a painting of the Mater Dolorosa stabbed in the neck: the scroll for an inscription is left blank; there is no intercession. By her injuries and by her womanhood, she herself is a martyr. In a self-portrait of 1944 her body, pierced with nails, is opened to reveal her spine as a shattered Doric column.

A macho holding a knife stands beside the bloodstained body of a woman on a bed, naked save for one stocking and shoe and covered with stab wounds; spatters of paint like blood on the picture frame insert the horror of the scene into the viewer's space but that horror is controlled and distanced by the ingenuous style and the floating banner inscribed with the painting's title. A Few Small Snips (1935) could almost be an illustration to a popular ballad or a scene from one of Posada's macabre woodcuts, his ejemplos of immorality. There is an actual snippet of song above the most "psychoanalytic" of Kahlo's self-portraits, the Museum of Modern

Frida Kahlo:* Self-Portrait, *1932, oil on metal, 13 ¾



FORD
CARMEN RIVERA
PINTO SU RE-
TRATO EL
AÑO D 1932

by 18 ½ inches. Collection Mr. and Mrs. Manuel Reyero.

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

Frida Kahlo: Self-Portrait with the Portrait of Dr. Farill, 1951, oil on masonite, 16 ¼ by 19 ¾ inches. Collection Eugenia Farill Novelo.

Art's Self-portrait with Cropped Hair (1940): "Look, if I loved you, it was for your hair; now that you are bald, I no longer love you." The artist is wearing an outsize suit and is sitting on a chair surrounded by hanks of her hair, one of which is on her lap beside a pair of scissors. The last time Kahlo painted a suit like that it was worn by Rivera in their marriage portrait; he is shown holding a palette while she holds his hand.

> It is the tension between the desired wholeness and utopianism on one side and the acknowledgment of physical and historical contingency on the other that gives Kahlo's art its toughness and its pathos.

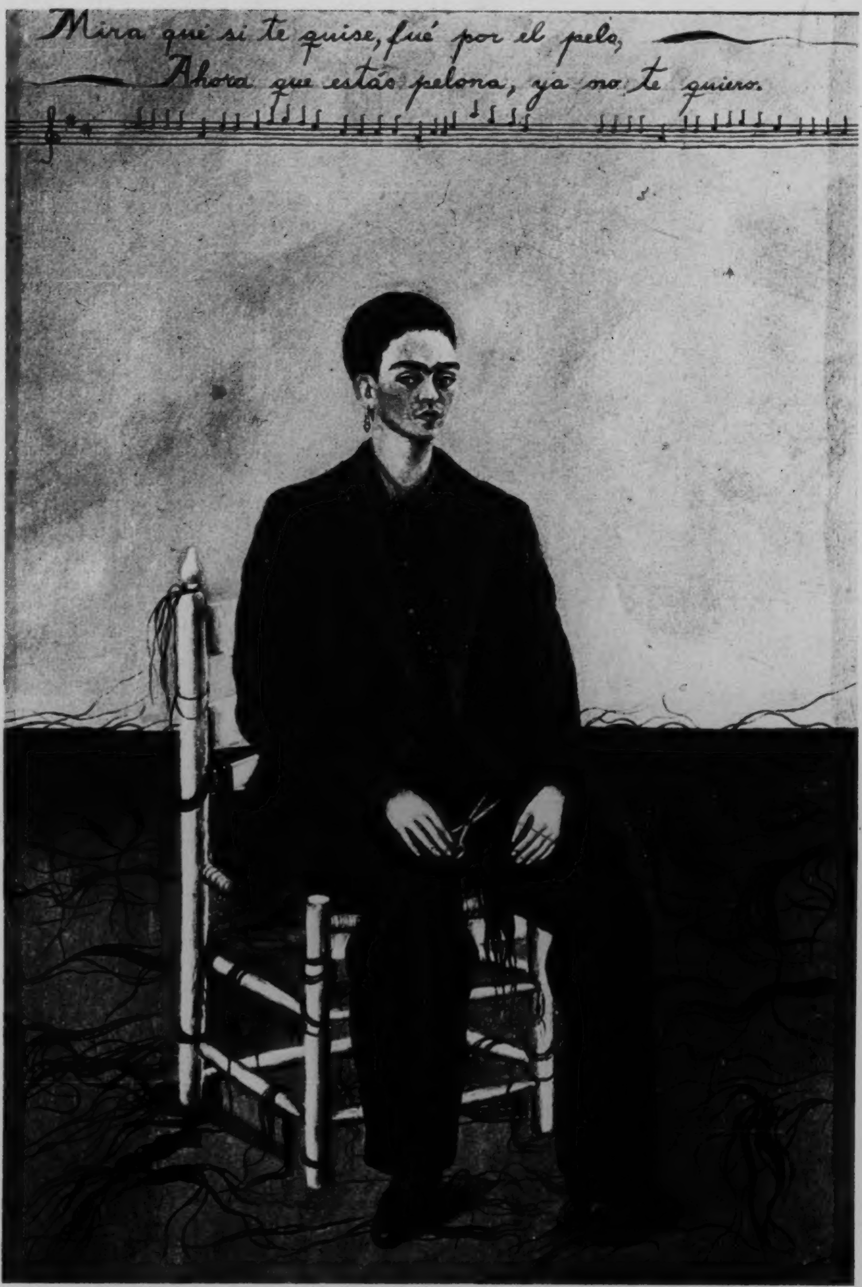
In retrospect, it is possible to see Tina Modotti's abandonment of photography for political activity as an outcome of the contradiction between form and content inherent in her work. Frida Kahlo's art is even more paradoxical and in the end more interesting. The paradox lies in the fact that she created the potential for an alternative representation of woman through a devotion to the transcendent possibilities of art and the narcissism of self-portraiture. Her self-portraits might be compared with the contemporary photographs of Cindy Sherman: both assume "roles." But, while Sherman's mass-media stereotypes are generally passive, even masochistic objects of the male gaze, Kahlo's self-images, while admitting, even flaunting the "wound" which becomes a metaphor for castration,[10] seem motivated by what the catalogue terms "self-regard." Indeed The Two Fridas and other paintings suggest an autoeroticism which, following Freud, we might link to her homosexuality. It is through this portrayal of herself for herself that she is able to begin to re-map the female body within representation: "The body becomes a bearer of signs, some legible, some esoteric . . . This discourse of the body is itself inscribed within a kind of codex of nature and cosmos, in which sun and moon, plant and animal, are pictograms. At the same time this pictographic effect deeroticizes the imagery." The assumption of a pictographic language enacts a movement outwards from the particular and private to the general and public, from the body to history and nature.

The conditions of Mexico from the 1920s to the 1940s provided "marginal" traditions of representation—folk, naive and Indian art—which were associated with real social groups. In employing these traditions, Kahlo was implicitly making a political statement: it is this which distinguishes her work from the eclectic image-plundering of much contemporary painting, often supported by some vague notion of myth. The art of Kahlo and Modotti emerged at a time when Mexico was undergoing an extraordinarily rapid development, a birth into the 20th century analogous to the more recent experience of many Third World countries. Their work is marked by the pressure of history and the possibilities of a future still to be made. Kahlo's painting in particular moves us today by the tension, both on a personal and cultural level, between desire and contingency.□



Mira que si te quise, fué por el pelo,
Ahora que estás pelona, ya no te quiero.

Self-Portrait with Cropped Hair, 1940, oil on canvas, 15 ¾ by 11 inches. Museum of Modern Art.

---

1. A film about Frida Kahlo and Tina Modotti by Laura Mulvey and Peter Wollen is available from the Arts Council of Great Britain.
2. Unless otherwise stated, all quotations are from the catalogue Frida Kahlo and Tina Modotti, London, Whitechapel Art Gallery, 1982.
3. Information about Tina Modotti, in addition to that provided in the catalogue, may be found in Mildred Constantine, Tina Modotti, A Fragile Life, New York and London, 1975.
4. Detailed information about the life and paintings of Frida Kahlo may be found in a new biography by Hayden Herrera, Frida, A Biography of Frida Kahlo, New York, Harper & Row, 1983.
5. Readings and Writings: Semiotic Counter-Strategies, London, Verso, 1982, p.121.
6. South American Meditations, p.157, quoted in Jean Franco, The Modern Culture of Latin America, Harmondsworth, England, Penguin Books, 1970, p.119.
7. Idealists, including José Vasconcelos, patron of the Mural Movement, who criticized the positivism of the científicos of the prerevolutionary regime of Porfirio Diaz.
8. "Frida Kahlo de Rivera" in Surrealism and Painting, London, Macdonald, 1972, and included in the catalogue.
9. "Two Versions of the Imaginary" in The Gaze of Orpheus, New York, Station Hill, 1981, p.79.
10. It is interesting to consider Laura Mulvey's interest in Kahlo and Modotti as a development of the position she outlined in a key article in the feminist criticism of film, "Visual Pleasure and Narrative Cinema" (Screen, 16, no. 3, Autumn 1975): "The paradox of phallocentrism in all its manifestations is that it depends on the image of the castrated woman to give order and meaning to its world. An idea of woman stands as linchpin to the system: it is her lack that produces the phallus as a symbolic presence, it is her desire to make good the lack that the phallus signifies. . . . the representation of the female form in a symbolic order in which, in the last resort, it speaks castration and nothing else. . . . Woman's desire is subjected to her image as bearer of the bleeding wound; she can exist only in relation to castration and cannot transcend it. . . . Woman, then, stands in a patriarchal culture as signifier for the male other, bound by a symbolic order in which man can live out his fantasies and obsessions through linguistic command, by imposing them on the silent image of woman still tied to her place as bearer of meaning, not maker of meaning."

If this is the position which Cindy Sherman's photographs deconstruct, then Frida Kahlo's paintings might be seen as an attempt to provide an alternative representation of woman, although many feminists would argue that this is not possible within a still-patriarchal order. It is interesting that the Indians of Tehuantepec, whose costume Kahlo adopted, are the most matriarchal of Mexican Indian cultures.

Author: Michael Newman is a London-based art historian and critic.

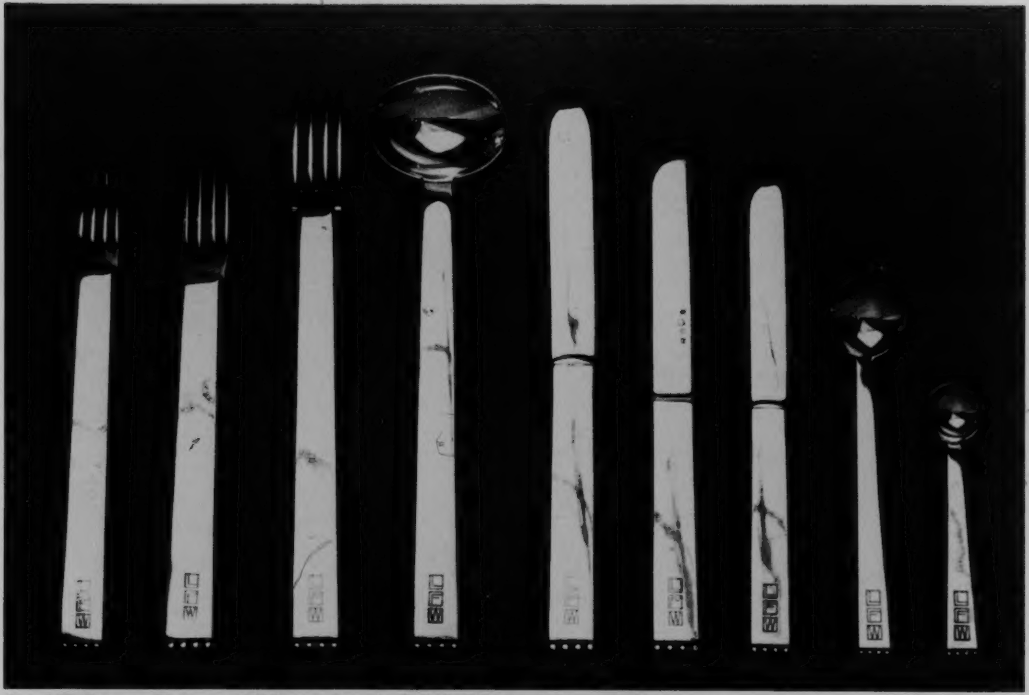
VOL 71
ISS 4
AP 1983
UMI



Josef Hoffmann: Flatware, 1905, metal work. Galerie Metropol, New York.

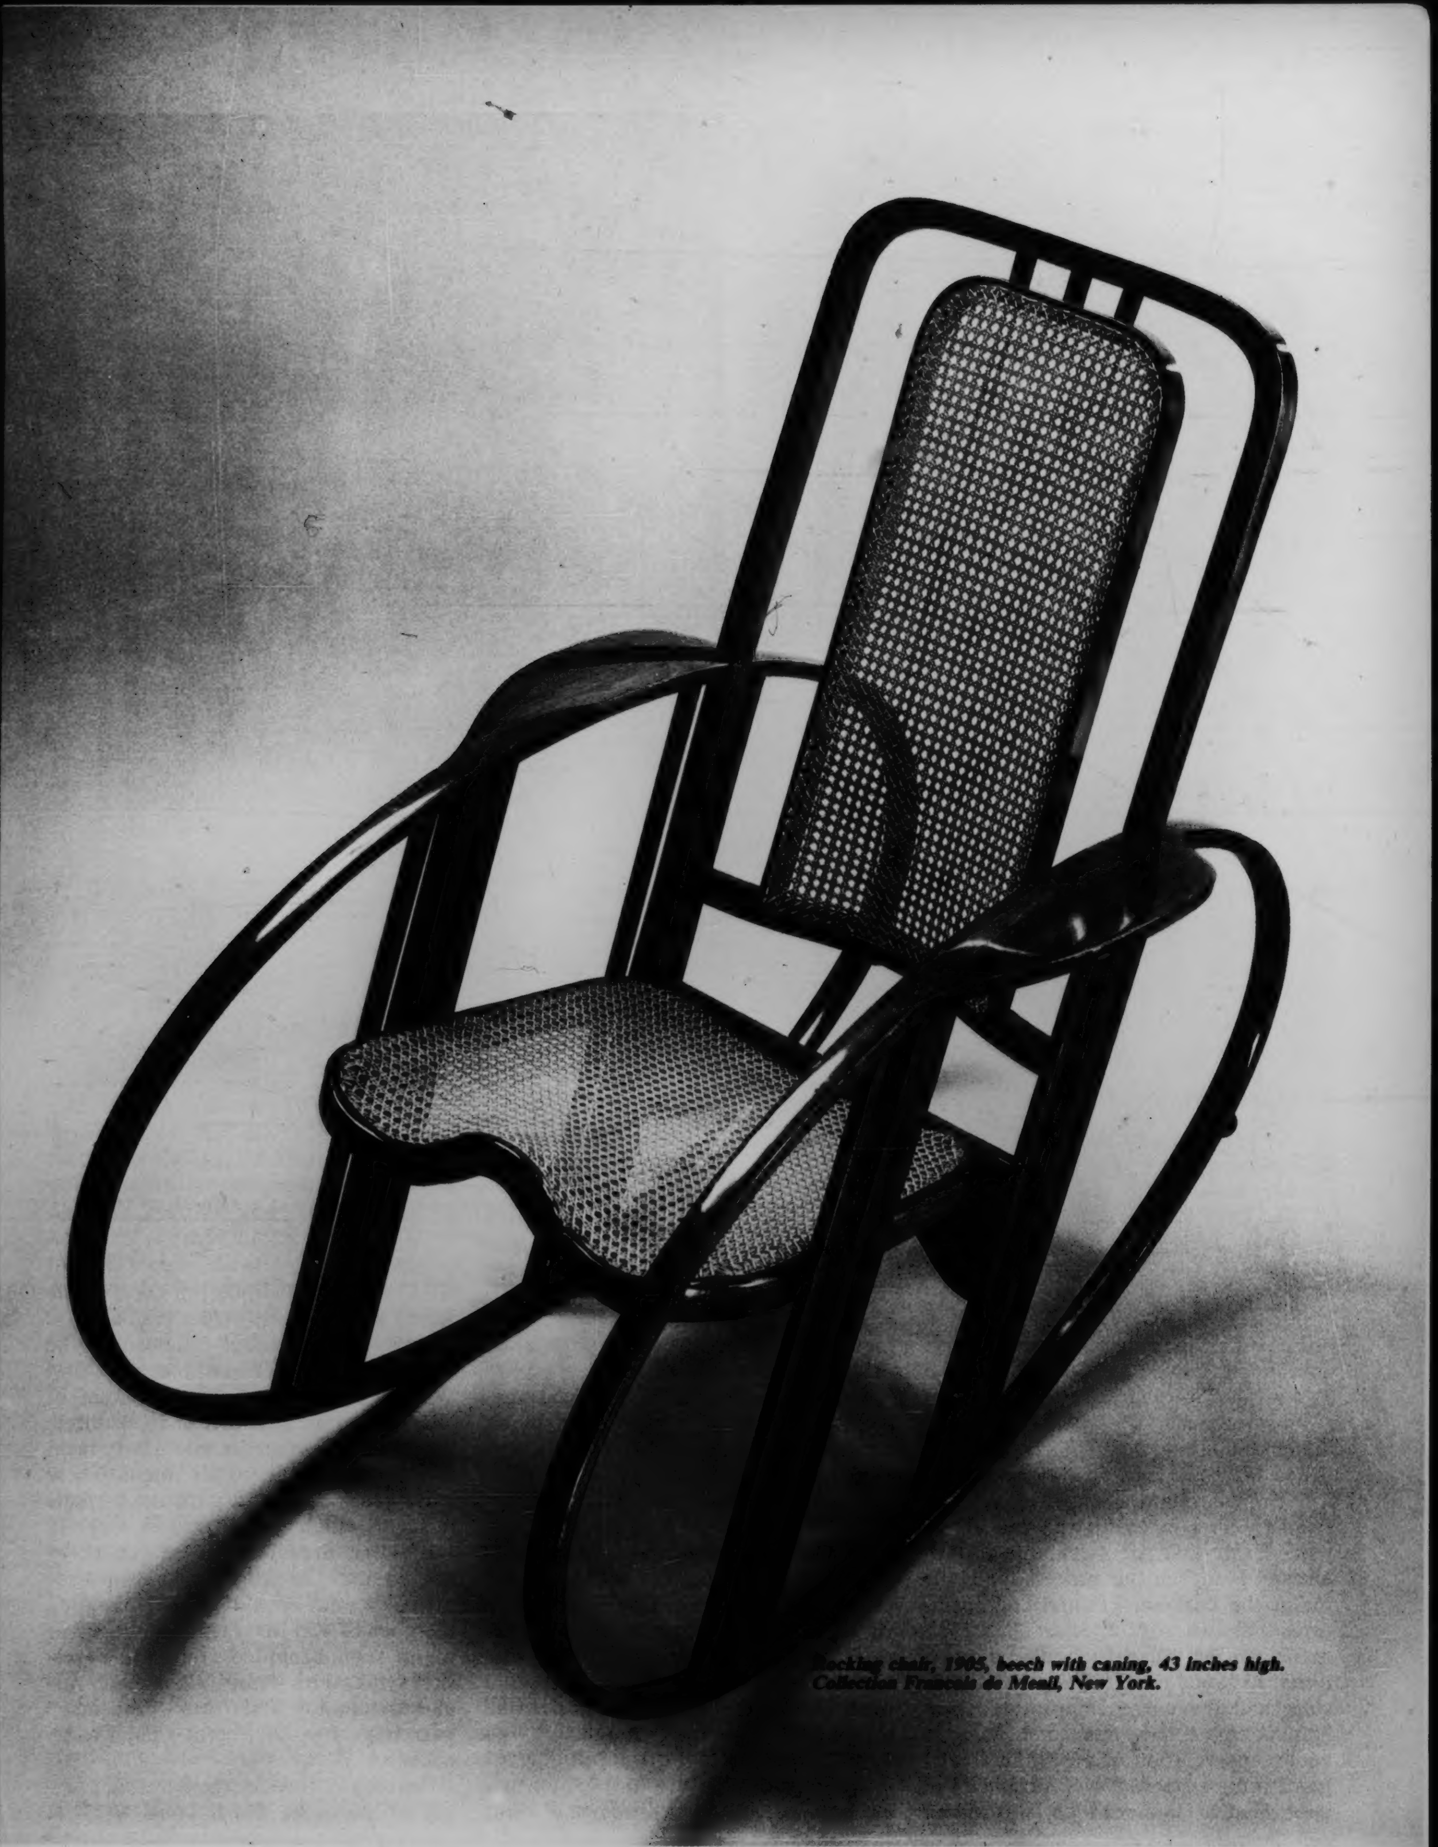
Rethinking Josef Hoffmann

Long consigned to the status of private craftsman by the archivists of modern design, Josef Hoffmann was recently the subject of an admiring museum retrospective. By seeking to present his designs as esthetic "classics," however, the show made a case for their beauty at the cost of their utility.

BY MARCIA E. VETROCQ

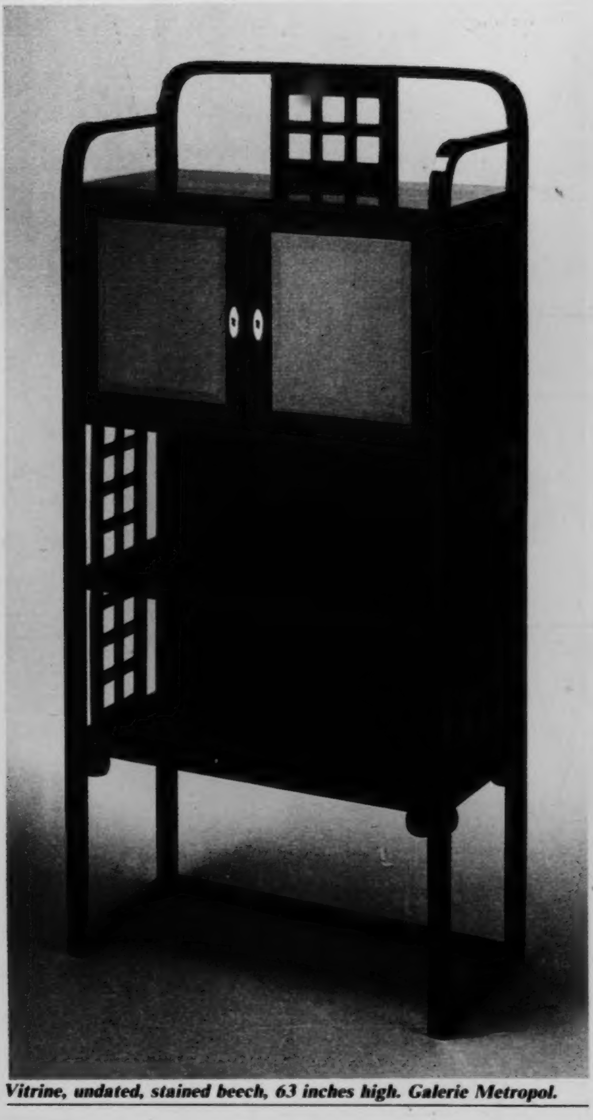
In 1907, at the urging of his provincial teacher, Charles-Edouard Jeanneret set out for Vienna, eventually to seek employment with the architect-designer Josef Hoffmann. Yet when the job was offered, Jeanneret declined. According to Sigfried Giedion, evangelist of modernism in architecture, Jeanneret resisted Hoffmann in favor of embarking on his voyage utile, a survey of Mediterranean building types which would contribute to his formation as the modern master Le Corbusier. According to architectural historian Kenneth Frampton, Le Corbusier instinctively rejected the "sophistries of the now classicized Jugendstil" practiced by Hoffmann. According to Le Corbusier, however, it was a gay Viennese performance of Puccini's La Bohème which drew the restless young Swiss to Paris and beyond.[1]

The various tellings of this little moment are more than a lesson in the relative emphases of historiography. They provide a capsule view of how Josef Hoffmann has fared in the framing of modern architectural history as a heroic progress: Le Corbusier escapes the siren song of the popular yet moribund design climate embodied by Hoffmann for a personal journey into modernism. In the herculean choice between surface or structure, handicraft or the machine, private estheticism or social engineering, Hoffmann was synonymous with the former of each pair. Such was not the stuff of which modern heroes, much less myths, were made. Although esteemed and employed early on by his contemporaries, Hoffmann came to represent an unproductive field

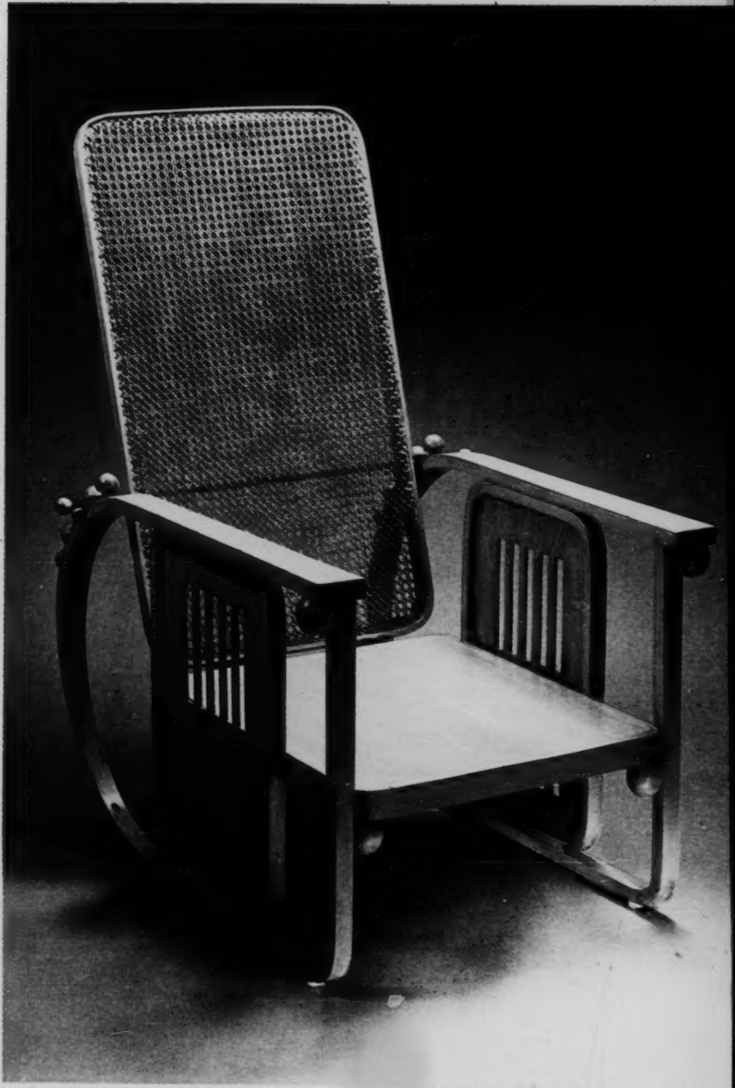


Rocking chair, 1905, beech with caning, 43 inches high. Collection Francois de Menil, New York.

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI



Vitrine, undated, stained beech, 63 inches high. Galerie Metropol.



Deck chair, 1905, beech and plywood, 41 ½ inches high. Francois de Menil.

of inquiry for most later historians. Hoffmann has not been misunderstood as much as neglected; his reputation does not require rehabilitation as much as nourishment.

It is practically assured that Eduard Sekler's long-awaited monograph, published last year and quickly scheduled for English translation, will prompt fresh interest in Hoffmann the architect.[2] Taste and the marketplace have already launched this process for Hoffmann the designer of interiors, furniture and domestic objects. The 1970s mania for Art Deco, the renewed sensitivity to wood and fabric craftsmanship, and the current acceptability of historicism all have opened the door to wider appreciation of Hoffmann's elegantly angular forms, rich surfaces and streamlined classicism. A newspaper report in January that a New York gallery was offering a single beech recliner for $27,000 serves as forceful if crude proof of Hoffmann's allure.[3]

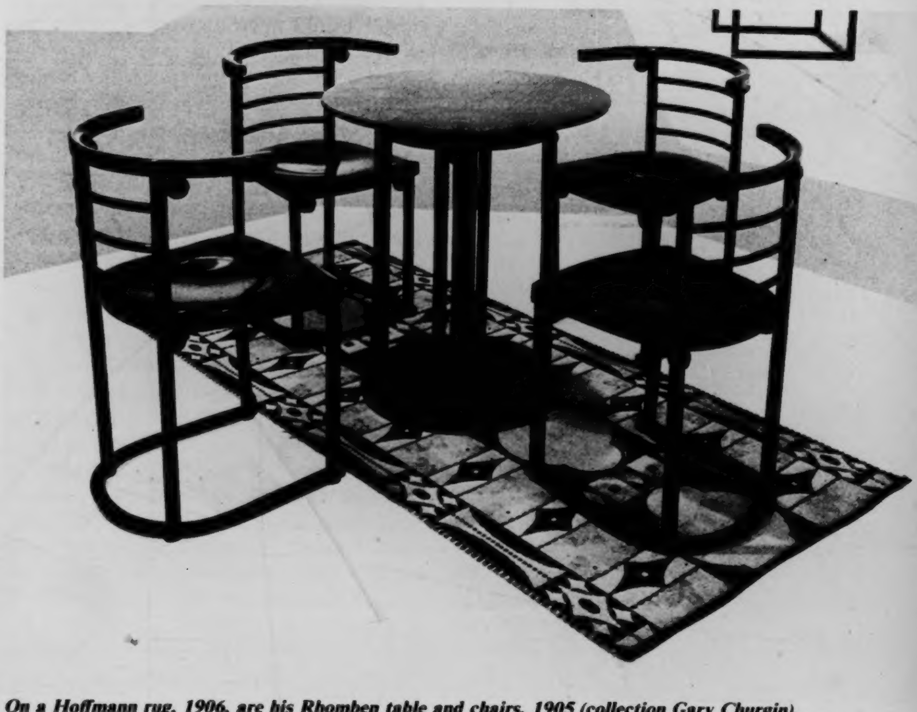
Further evidence, and encouragement, was provided by a gem of an exhibition recently mounted by the Fort Worth Art Museum and pointedly titled "Josef Hoffmann: Design Classics." The nearly 70 works were selected with uncompromising connoisseurship by museum director and exhibition curator David Ryan. Choice pieces in the finest condition—furniture, flatware, wallpaper designs, ornamental bowls, handbags, cigarette boxes, and more—documented Hoffmann's period of greatest strength, roughly 1900-1930.

Josef Hoffmann (1870–1956) trained at the Vienna Academy of Fine Arts, where his winning of the Prix de Rome in 1895 permitted a year's travel in Italy. Employment followed in the studio of his former teacher Otto Wagner, the preeminent architect of Vienna and the advocate of an architecture founded on reason and utility rather than imitation and ornament. These early years coincided with the esthetic ferment which culminated in 1897 in the Vienna Secession, a rebellion led by the painter Gustav Klimt against the artistic establishment. A founding member of the insurgent group, Hoffmann soon benefited from pro-Secession sympathies within Vienna's cultural bureaucracy and from enthusiastic patronage by the liberal upper bourgeoisie.[4]

Several features of the Secession program illuminate Hoffmann's work of the next three decades. One was the ideal of the Gesamtkunstwerk, the unified collaborative creation which would subsume and transcend all of its constituent arts. Another was the goal of the Künstlerschaft, the ideal community of art-makers and art-lovers. No distinction in status would be made between the practice of the fine and applied arts, nor was the patron merely a purchaser but rather an essential contributor to a society embraced and enhanced by art. It was in this spirit that Josef Hoffmann designed villas and coatstands, pavilions and planters, and many of the Secession's exhibitions. With abiding faith in these principles, client Adolphe Stoclet inhabited a Gesamtkunstwerk planned to the last detail by Hoffmann, and asked to be buried with a silk handkerchief also designed by Hoffmann.[5]

In Hoffmann's finest work—that of his years with the Wiener Werkstätte—his original curvilinear forms evolved into a linear mode of extreme refinement.

Installation view of Hoffmann chairs at the Fort Worth Art Museum, 1982.



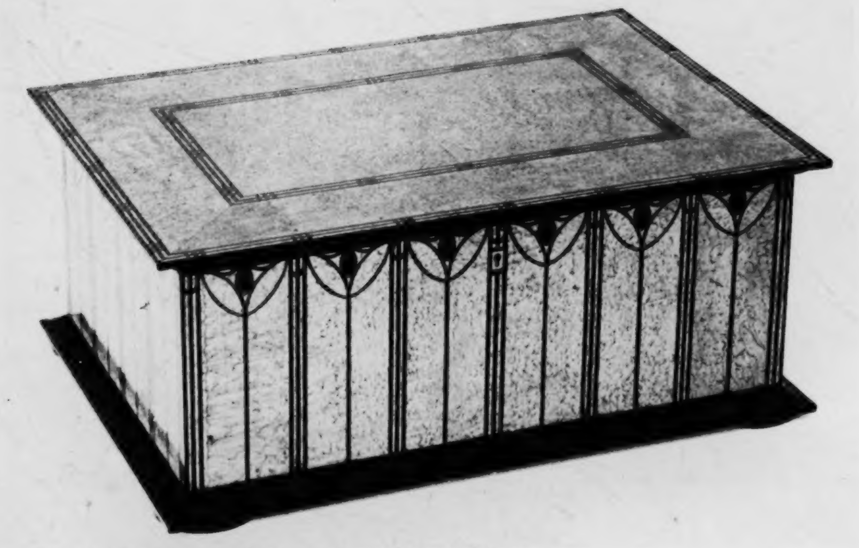
On a Hoffmann rug, 1906, are his Rhomben table and chairs, 1905 (collection Gary Churgin).

In 1899 Hoffmann was appointed to the faculty of the state School of Arts and Crafts attached to the Austrian Museum of Art and Industry. The model for the dual institution was London's South Kensington Museum (today the Victoria and Albert), and its anglophilic orientation suited Hoffmann's own admiration for the English Arts and Crafts movement. In 1900 Hoffmann pressed the Secession to devote its eighth exhibition to contemporary applied arts, with Charles Rennie Mackintosh and Charles R. Ashbee represented. Two years later Hoffmann journeyed to London and Glasgow, and in 1903, with the collaboration of designer Kolomon Moser, the encouragement of Mackintosh and the financial backing of banker-industrialist Fritz Waerndorfer, Hoffmann opened the Wiener Werkstätte, or Vienna Workshops. (The model was Ashbee's Guild of Handicraft.)

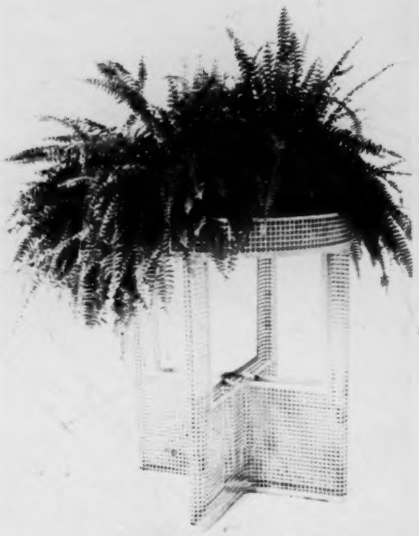
The Werkstätte was organized as a team of craftsmen and designers, coordinated by the architect, engaged in the creation of utilitarian objects, interiors and entire buildings. Hoffmann's finest work dates from this period, with the Werkstätte executing many of his designs, although certain pieces were manufactured by J. & J. Kohn and the Thonet Brothers. Hoffmann's initially curvilinear yet disciplined forms with roots in fin-de-siècle Jugendstil evolved into a linear mode of extreme refinement. The Werkstätte's first major undertaking was the Pukersdorf Sanatorium (1904–05), its most fantastic project the interior of the Cabaret Fledermaus (1907), and its most perfectly realized creation the Palais Stoclet in Brussels (1905-11).

By 1919 A Werkstätte showroom had opened on New York's Fifth Ave-

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI



Jewelry box, 1908, Swedish birch veneer with inlays of ebony and mahogany, 18 inches long. Austrian Museum of Applied Arts, Vienna.



Flower Table, 1905, sheet iron painted white, 26 ½ inches high. Galerie Metropol.

nue. Hoffmann received numerous architectural commissions, was appointed city architect of Vienna in 1920, and in 1927 served as Austria's juror for the League of Nations headquarters competition. He voted for Le Corbusier. With the Werkstätte's closing in the hard times of 1932 and his retirement from teaching in 1936, the 66-year-old Hoffmann's design activity diminished. The propaganda of the International Style, which accorded him only tight-lipped acknowledgment as a "pioneer," had already eroded his reputation, although Brussels was honoring Hoffmann with a comprehensive exhibition at the time of his death in 1956.

The Fort Worth exhibition was the first devoted to Hoffmann's design work by an American museum, although a comparable show was held at London's Fischer Fine Arts, Ltd. in 1977.[6] Quality, not comprehensiveness, governed most decisions at Fort Worth, and dictated, for example, the relatively small number of cushioned chairs included and even the withdrawal from view of the exhibition's only coatstand after its inclusion in the catalogue. Rather than attempt to recreate domestic settings, the exhibition designers invoked details of showroom interiors of the period. One long wall was given over to eight chairs, hieratic presences, each framed by the arch of a delicate, painted arcade as in J. & J. Kohn's gallery in the Austrian pavilion designed by Hoffmann for the Deutscher Werkbund exhibition (Cologne, 1914).[7] The walls of a second room were punctuated by a series of enlarged black "tacks," establishing the thinness, planarity and whiteness of the enclosure in emulation of the Wiener Werkstätte's own showroom in Vienna (1905).[8] Fresh flowers on the tables fulfilled another Hoffmann requirement for the smart interior.

The domination of Ft. Worth's main room by the hugely blown-up signature of Josef Hoffmann conveyed the underlying polemical intent of this exhibition: to downplay Hoffmann's participation in the collective activities of the Wiener Werkstätte, and to assert his importance as the individual creator of "design classics." Although three sitting groups were assembled, most of the pieces were discretely, deferentially spaced on raised white platforms which served as pedestals for sculpture in wood, glass, leather and cane.

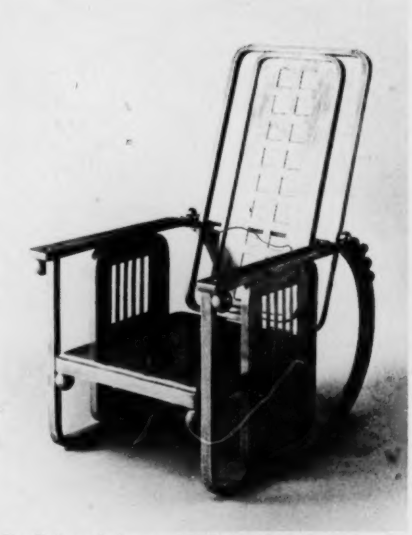
Striking qualities do indeed emerge from such a presentation. The viewer becomes aware, as when viewing sculpture, of facture and finish, of the reflective properties of polished surfaces, of the blunt confidence with which a planed chair foot rests flush with the floor, of the structure and poise implied by the emergence of a single bright brass screw-head from the juncture of seat and armature. The tapering and swell of a bentwood segment seems as perfectly calibrated as the entasis of a column. Viewed in profile, its back reduced to a line, Hoffmann's "egg" rocker becomes a stilled kinetic sculpture, more akin to Gabo's "Column" than a chair.

Hoffmann's pleasure in manipulating a precise vocabulary of form becomes evident. The four wooden spheres which replace corner struts between a chair's seat and legs now dip below the chair's arms as misplaced handgrips, now slide to the floor between the doubled legs of a table, now cluster as handles for a nest of tables, now assemble as beadwork on the ends of silverware designed for Werkstätte patron Waerndorfer. Elsewhere Hoffmann addresses the perennial design issue of reconciling line and curve, axis and circumference. The legs of an oval table are joined at the floor by cross-axes of wood. The axial basis of the oval is recapitulated in the table's central rectangular inlay of black marble, while the bilateral symmetry is cancelled wonderfully by two irregular white veins. In another, more delicate serving table, Hoffmann "suspends" the lower shelf by pinching its ends between the upright legs, compressing the perfect oval of the upper shelf into rococo complexity.

One readily detects the continuity between Hoffmann's large- and small-scale designs. The mother-of-pearl and ebony of a cigarette box invite comparison with the marble cladding and metal moulding of the Palais Stoclet exterior. A jewelry box inlaid with a stylized plant motif has the presence and proportions of a pavilion in miniature, its lid projecting as the cornice. The exhibition's drawings for a flacon and a glass bowl are on the same graph paper as the artist's preliminary architectural studies. It is tempting to view Hoffmann's use of perforated sheet metal for vases and plant-stands as a bold, three-dimensional projection of the paper's original grid, making design and object one.

For all its genuinely dazzling display of Hoffmann at his best, the Fort Worth exhibition did raise some provocative questions about the manner in which the applied arts are to be presented and understood. The antiseptic gallery environment was undisturbed by a single photograph of the kind of interior for which these pieces were intended. Those who see such photographs elsewhere may ask themselves whether the exhibition's high-backed white chair was one of the pair pictured in the antechamber of the Salzer House, designed by Hoffmann in 1902.[9] Was the lady's writing desk identical with that photographed in the apartment of Secession sponsor Karl Wittgenstein, the interior of which was designed by Hoffmann in 1905?[10] Was the display of the 1905 recliner as a punishing but immaculate statement in wood merely a purist's fantasy, given that the recliner was shown with humanitarian cushions, back and bottom, in the 1908 Kunstschau showroom of J. & J. Kohn?[11]

There was something faintly archaic in the Fort Worth exhibition's steadfast estheticism, in the ritualistic filing of viewers past objects identified only by date, medium and dimensions. To be sure, there is a danger in assuming that each slender chair embodies a socio-historical universe (even though Hoffmann's Secession colleagues did consider themselves agents of Kunstwollen, vehicles for the irresistible logic of formal development, instruments of the coming-to-be of forms appropriate to the new age). Nevertheless, the pieces do have a home in time, and their presentation as "design classics"—eternally valid truths of art—ill suits their nature. Some works were conceived for a sympathetic private clientele, whose living spaces might be crafted so thoroughly that the occupants would fit into them as securely as Klimt's embracing couples in the mosaic geometry of the Stoclet murals. Others were available on order from showrooms for the discriminating public. The iconic presentation of Hoffmann's work suggests that we can truly appreciate it only at the expense of wrenching it from life. It seems a hard bargain.



Reclining chair, ca. 1905, beech and plywood, 42 inches high. Collection Francois de Menil.

> To display the 1905 recliner as a punishing, immaculate statement in wood may be a purist fantasy, since it was first shown with humanitarian cushions, back and bottom.

David Gebhard's essay in the catalogue (well-illustrated and handsomely designed by Fort Worth artist Larry Felder) reveals more of the exhibition's philosophy. After a testy but thorough review of the Hoffmann literature, primarily concerned with architecture, Gebhard arrives at the objects. Instead of the modernist's praise for the bare utility and machine imagery of 20th-century design (by which standard Hoffmann would be condemned), Gebhard praises Hoffmann's work precisely because its usefulness was secondary to the expression of artistic temperament: "notwithstanding many excellent utilitarian solutions entailed in his furniture, Hoffmann's interest was first to conceive of the piece as an art object, and then to accommodate its purpose within a preconceived form."[12] Is it art? Well, let's see how useless it is. Gebhard is on the fringes of Duchamp country, where a stool is cancelled for sitting by the artist's addition of a bicycle wheel and becomes a work of art. Hoffmann is confirmed as an ARTIST as if he were a young contemporary—by having a one-man show at a good museum with a catalogue which praises him as the solo ideator of objects beautiful to behold in gallery isolation.

Without recourse to pitting the beautiful against the useful, sculptor Scott Burton has praised the furniture of Gerrit Rietveld for its sheer formal satisfaction, for the "maximal consideration" given each detail, for the careful integration of all surfaces.[13] One can extend comparable recognition to Hoffmann, without forcing a Solomon's decision between art and utility as the true mother of invention. Hoffmann's patrons and colleagues, his commitment to collaborative enterprises, and his awareness of the public's appetite for his commercially available pieces all inspired imaginative design. The Fort Worth Art Museum rightfully made Hoffmann converts of its visitors. More information and less adulation, however, would have been truer to the spirit and significance of Hoffmann's achievement. ☐

---

1. Sigfried Giedion, Space, Time and Architecture, 5th edition, Cambridge, Mass., Harvard University Press, 1973 (first published 1941), pp. 519-20; Kenneth Frampton, Modern Architecture: A Critical History, New York, Oxford University Press, 1980, p. 150; Stanislaus von Moos, Le Corbusier: Elements of a Synthesis, Cambridge, Mass., MIT Press, 1982, p. 9.
2. Eduard F. Sekler, Josef Hoffmann, Das architektonische Werk, Vienna, Residenz Verlag, 1982.
3. New York Times, Jan. 2, 1983.
4. On Hoffmann's career and the Vienna Secession, see Eduard F. Sekler, "Josef Hoffmann," in the Macmillan Encyclopedia of Architects, New York, Macmillan, 1982, Vol. II, pp. 397-402; James Shedel, Art and Society: The New Art Movement in Vienna, 1897-1914, Palo Alto, SPOSS, 1981, esp. chapters 1 and 2; Peter Vergo, Art in Vienna 1898-1914, London, Phaidon, 1975, esp. chapter 3.
5. Eduard F. Sekler, "The Stoclet House by Josef Hoffmann," in Essays in the History of Architecture Presented to Rudolf Wittkower, ed. by D. Fraser, H. Hibbard, and M. J. Lewine, London, Phaidon, 1967, pp. 228-244.
6. "Josef Hoffmann 1870-1956: Architect and Designer," Fischer Fine Arts, Ltd., London, 1977, with a catalogue by Eduard F. Sekler and Robert J. Clark.
7. Illustrated, though cropped, in the Fort Worth exhibition catalogue, p. 38.
8. Sekler and Clark, op. cit., p. 3.
9. Sekler, Josef Hoffmann, Das architektonische Werk, p. 39.
10. Giuliano Gresleri, Josef Hoffmann, Bologna, Zanichelli, 1981, p. 58.
11. Sekler, Josef Hoffmann, Das architektonische Werk, p. 326. The 1908 Kunstschau (literally, "art exhibition") featured works by those artists who had joined Klimt in seceding from the Secession in 1905.
12. David Gebhard, Josef Hoffmann: Design Classics, Fort Worth Art Museum, 1982, pp. 57-58.
13. Scott Burton, "Furniture Journal: Rietveld," Art in America, November, 1980, pp. 102-08.

Author: Marcia E. Vetrocq is assistant professor of art history at the University of New Orleans.

VOL
7
1

ISS
4

AP
1983

UMI

ACIOUS MISSION

HER MAJESTY QUEEN
ELIZABETH II

HOLBEIN AND THE COURT OF HENRY VIII

PIERPONT MORGAN LIBRARY
APRIL 21-JULY 30

MADE POSSIBLE
BY A GRANT
FROM MOBIL

THIS EXHIBITION, FROM THE ROYAL COLLECTION
WINDSOR, IS SUPPORTED BY AN INDEMNITY FROM THE FEDERAL COUNCIL ON THE ARTS AND HUMANITIES

Chermayeff & Geismar

© 1983 Mobil Corporation

Review of Exhibitions

NEW YORK

Tom Butter at Grace Borgenicht

Modern sculpture is roughly divisible into open, horizontal, linear/planar constructions and closed, vertical, solid-seeming monoliths. Most constructions are abstract; most monoliths are figurative or biomorphic in character. Tom Butter's sculpture straddles this opposition: his constructivism limns a nature rampant. His pieces are at core linear, but his lines have stretched and muscled themselves up into volumetric, vertical skins—evoking cylinders, obelisks, skyscrapers, stuttering lightening bolts—five to ten feet high. His lines, and so his sculptures, are imbued with expansion and growth; although his constructions are traditionally composed and seemingly complete, they suggest continuation or extension. They have gained the pulse we often sense in monoliths.

Butter cuts, suspends, guys and staples pieces of fiberglass cloth together to make his skinny volumes, which he then freezes with catalyzed polyester resin colored with dyes. His approach permits him almost to ignore gravity while working: the bottom of an element doesn't have to support the top physically until the resin has hardened, at which time its weight is no problem. Butter generally assembles his sculptures from these premade parts, though he will sometimes shape cloth around a rigid fiberglass element that he has made earlier—the work N.B. for example. Within a single sculpture, similar shapes are similarly colored.

Butter is probably attracted to the resin/cloth combination for the reasons other sculptors have been: fiberglass is relatively simple to master, requires little equipment to work, can produce objects both light and extremely strong, is responsive to touch, can be ambiguously translucent, and seems to possess a surface simultaneously wet and dry. For Butter it is also a material which can be worked quickly and gesturally—in which his loose personal geometry doesn't look sloppy.

Quickness—actual and apparent—is central to Butter's sculpture. Since he can readily make and rapidly deploy almost any volume he conceives, he recovers some of the liveliness that was central to Chamberlain's and Sugarman's great sculptures of the early '60s. Although the springiness, even tumidity of his forms is suggestive of growing things, it is the relationships in which he places his basically abstract parts that prompt and sustain a biological reading. With a couple of exceptions, the sculptures play a twisting, upward movement off a still, vertical core—actual or implied—like a vine twining around a tree, though in the sculpture the elements are structually interdependent. Such a movement brings with it a suggestion of time: the pieces are ongoing, not fixed. In W.H. a swollen, red, ten-sided column, its greatest girth near our eye-level, rises up from a tight circle of dark, collapsed arcs, like a shucked ear of corn surrounded by husks. Though large, its translucency keeps the piece light; it finesses the big, bigger, biggest quality of monoliths.

Butter's shapes aren't unique—Noguchi's akari lamps, Eva Hesse's, John Duff's, and Barbara Zucker's sculptures are acknowledged sources—but his active handling of space is fresh. He plays the perceived hollowness of his elements off against the open enclosure of their arrangements to suggest separate but simultaneous presents. In S.L. and C.B. (his titles are people's initials) he partially revives the stunning spatial richness and ambiguity that Constructivist-derived sculpture once had. —Wade Saunders

Marjorie Strider at P.M. & Stein and The Sculpture Center

Strider's show at The Sculpture Center featured works from 1970 through '80—her greatest hits, as it were. The pieces in the exhibition—curated by C.W. Post's Judith K. Van Wagner—brought back fond memories. Who can forget Strider's fragments of Greek vases from the early '70s, showing virile men in dubious poses, cracking apart as they emit blobs of Day-Glo colored gloop? Or her 1973 Plaster Bag II, with more styrofoam gloop—this time in pink—overflowing its opening?

Gloop, gloop, gloop—jamming venetian blinds, erupting out of giant Goodman's Soup envelopes, defeating brooms as they

Tom Butter: "S.L.," 1982, fiberglass and resin, 84 inches high; at Grace Borgenicht.

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

Marjorie Strider Manhattan III, 1982, painted aluminum, 38 by 58 by 20 inches; at P.M. & Stein try to sweep it away. For a while, Strider had one of the most easily identifiable artistic signatures in town. Looking back by means of the retrospective, we can now see in a way we once couldn't what Strider owes to Pop, especially in its nihilistic, Warholian phase.

But for all the mess and destruction, Strider's nihilism wasn't Mephistophelean but good humored. It was hard not to love the rampaging styrofoam or, later in the decade, the twisting-off-the-wall orange peels, or the strawberries spilling from a basket, getting larger and larger as they moved down the wall toward the viewer. It seemed as if Strider had a reverse Midas touch—everything she touched turned to garbage, delectable enough, but garbage all the same.

The show at the Sculpture Center concentrated on work from the early- to mid-'70s. Aside from some bronzed wall strawberries and two strawberries in "cream" in an aluminum pan, Strider seems to have had a quiet period over the past five years. The period, though, is over, as exemplified by her recent works at P.M. & Stein. You wouldn't have known this ballplayer without a scoreboard. Strider has abandoned the vase and the broom and the blob for three-dimensional aluminum constructions that stand on the floor, almost viewer-height. In a sort of "Travels with Marjorie" gesture, each piece is dedicated to a state of the union and decked out with cutouts according to geography. Makeshift Mansion in an Independent Canyon, for instance, is dedicated to Louisiana, its jaggedly cut aluminum base being an outline of the state, with a cutout riverboat, jazz instruments and a Baltimore oriole painted on different sides of the sculpture's surface. An Awakening, Questions and Sudden Jumps is about Texas and features Old West rifle, spurs, "Alamo" sombrero, sagebrush and, most noticeably, oil rigs on fire. Kansas (we'll drop the titles here—they're gibberish anyway) erects three silver plows around a sheaf of wheat, while New Jersey celebrates truck farming with a golden cornucopia. And on, through California (glittery stars and Golden Gate Bridge) and Manhattan (Statue of Liberty and an apple).

Alfonso Ossorio Contains, 1982, mixed mediums, 5 by 4 feet; at Oscarsson Hood

And on. Obviously, we've come a long way from the styrofoam. For a woman artist known for her feminist stance, these celebrations of some of the most downhome elements of the 50 states seem quite a departure. They can be justified in formal terms: Strider wanted to get off the wall and into three dimensions, and this aspect of her iconoclasm we can at least grab onto. What we can't immediately get a handle on are the contents. Has Strider discovered a long-distant patriotism in her soul—she is from Oklahoma—or are these works parodies? Considering the burlesque element in the early work, we'd have to opt for the latter. Still, to have gone to all these pains—including some gorgeous silk "state flags" and sketches and studies—just for the sake of satire seems like a waste of talent, even of comic talent. Somehow the void left by Strider's silence during the last five years still seems unfilled—especially with that razzle-dazzle retrospective breathing down our necks.

—Gerrit Henry

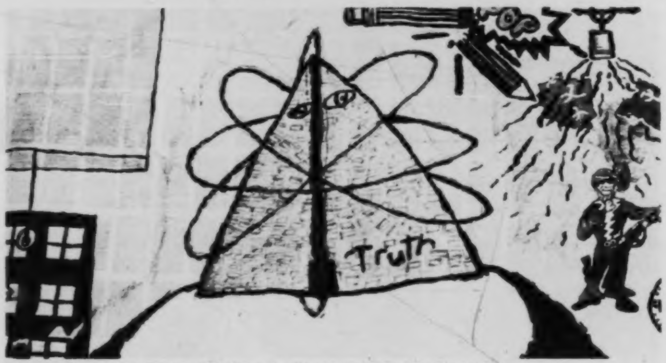
Alfonso Ossorio at Oscarsson Hood

Alfonso Ossorio's first New York exhibition in ten years consisted chiefly of watercolors from 1979-1982, with several more from 1972. In addition, there were two of the artist's assemblages, which he calls "congregations." Ossorio's paintings are small to medium-sized and teeming with energy. Amid a web of spidery, coiling tendrils of line, biomorphic shapes loom up vaguely—and sometimes not so vaguely. Like most of his fellow members of the New York School's first generation, Ossorio cultivates his own version of the allover field. His is tropical, a region of swelter and sharp contrasts of light and shade. When an organic form coalesces into a recognizable organ, it usually turns out to be sexual. Emblems of his own—male—presence drift toward female shapes. Everything is of course the artist's invention, so his rhetorical task is to persuade us that much of the imagery here—suggestions of female genitalia, as well as a swirling field—is somehow independent of the artist's surrogate presences, his phallic forms. Without this feeling of separation, there would be no drama of pictorial unity in the making. These high-level theatrics usually succeed, thanks to the fevered delicacy of Ossorio's touch, with which he maintains contact with the receptive, enveloping side of his manifestly aggressive personality.

There are numerous art-historical paths leading from the heroic days of the New York School to the present. One begins with Clyfford Still, moves on to Brice Marden, then to such emblem-makers as Susan Rothenberg and Bryan Hunt. Another starts with de Kooning, winds through an icy region in the vicinity of Jasper Johns, then branches off toward Pop Art on one hand and such painterly Minimalists as Robert Ryman on the other. Ossorio, who hasn't been seen much since the 1950s, has no secure place in these chartings. However, he was a close friend of Jackson Pollock, perhaps an influence, and I think it makes sense to see him at the source of much of the New York imagery of the moment that keeps the heat in the allover field. Julian Schnabel comes to mind here, as does Bill Jensen. Since Ossorio's presence was never completely dimmed despite his long seclusion at The Springs, his torrential energies have been important in a roundabout way for the survival of wide-open gestural painting.

Even more important (for Schnabel, in particular) are Ossorio's "congregations," odd bits and pieces assembled into low relief sculptures of considerable imagistic violence. Scraps of wood and metal, plus throwaway items of all kinds—bits of crockery, souvenir items—crowd the surfaces. Glass eyes provide the foci around which suggestions of figures hover. Fetishistic elements like animal horns occur with frequency. Unlike the junk sculptors of the 1950s, Ossorio favors the bright and the shiny. Thick coats of clear varnishes give the assemblages a polished look very different from the sexually ruminative textures of the drawings. However, the same principles—rather, feelings—are at work here, impulses that originate with Surrealist automatism then move very quickly into their own, thoroughly American idiom. —Carter Ratcliff

Robert Rauschenberg: Installation view of "Japanese Clay Works" series, 1982; at Castelli Greene St. (review on p. 182)



Timothy Rollins with Fifteen Kids from the Bronx: Ignorance is Strength, 1982-83, (detail) "Truth," by Michael John Gonzalez; at Ronald Feldman.

"1984—A Preview" at Ronald Feldman

George Orwell's 1984 is no longer simply a book, but a kind of cultural repository of social and political fears and realities. His vision of a totalitarian future speaks to the heart of avant-garde ideology, for it signals, if not the death, then at least the public deflowering of revolutionary romanticism. 1984 destroys the utopian vision of the future by turning its two great hopes, technology and revolution, against humankind. In Oceania there is no future because there is no past: history does not exist for it is entirely mutable; tradition is dismantled and reconstructed by official decree. In Orwell's future, modern criticality becomes doublethink and is turned on itself—it functions only as a tool of the Thought Police, an instrument of oppression designed to create intangible nuances of opposition only in order to crush them.

1984 is a warning with ramifications on all sides of the political spectrum. This future is now the present, and as we approach the watershed of 1984, its symbolic scope grows more voracious, encompassing all manner of fearful speculation and comparative analysis of the present state of affairs. This was amply demonstrated by the exhibition "1984—A Preview." Co-sponsored by the Village Voice, the show contained works by over 70 artists and ran the gamut of contemporary styles and genres. As is often the case with unwieldy theme shows, there was no particular curatorial point of view, no critical or historical position being defended. Since the great majority of the work was not created for this exhibition, its relationship to Orwell's novel was often tenuous. What resulted was a veritable Babel of form and content in which each work spoke its own language.

Though computers and technology received their due (in George Segal's sculpture tableau created for Time's "Man of the Year" cover and Don Leicht's cartoon of two video-game creatures, among others), there was no attempt to establish a fashionable futuristic esthetic or to indulge in the fantasies of prophecy and doom as the title might lead one to expect. In this cacophonous show, the grim realities of the present were the most palpable concerns. Some works had a real immediacy: In her Defense Dictionary Erika Rothenberg matched Defense euphemisms (e.g., "Permanent Prehostility") with their "oldspeak" definitions (e.g., "Peace"). Christy Rupp warned of ecological disaster in her painted cut-outs of fish titled Acid Rain, Brook Trout. Victor Burgin's St. Laurent Demands a Whole New Life Style and Hans Haacke's American Cyanamid poster were both subversive "ads" concerning exploited women. Other works presented more cryptic, less topical scenarios—as in Barbara Kruger's photo-text collages and Les Levine's doublethink command "Forget" stenciled over a painting of elephants.

"1984" was less the subject of the show than a socio-political pretext to speak of the world at large; the implicit and explicit social criticism was thus forced into relief. This sort of show demands viewer commitment to a broad range of issues and is bound to be problematic and uneven. "1984—A Preview" was no exception. But on the eve of 1984 it was a welcome look at the maze of the present, particularly when the art-world spotlight so frequently focuses on factional disputes, marketing tactics, and de-contextualized claims to art-historical supremacy. —Jamey Gambrell

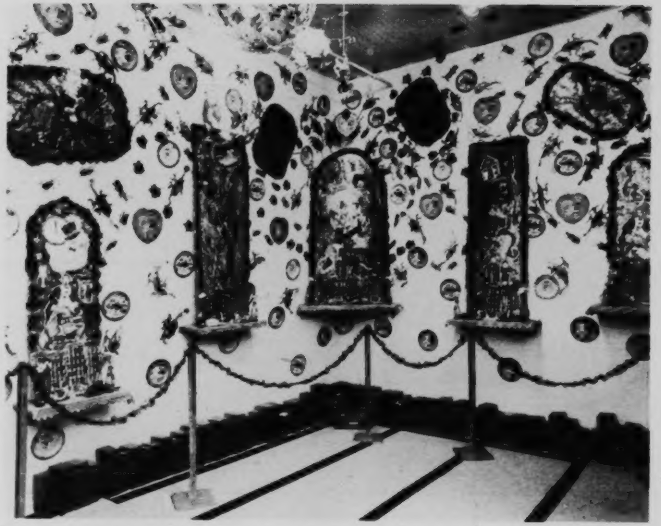
VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

Thomas Lanigan-Schmidt at Holly Solomon

Thomas Lanigan-Schmidt's recent installation—lengthily titled The Preying Hands: In A Little Corner Chapel to Mammon in the Cathedral of Moloch, Greed Makes Human Sacrifice Expedient Upon the Altar of Racism, Displacement and Gentrification (1981-83)—presented a didactic tale of consumption and exploitation that sought to encapsulate American history from the time of the first settlers to the present. Although the installation was structured as a chapel comprising five "altars," the traditional icons of orthodox Christianity that are a staple of Lanigan-Schmidt's work were overwhelmed by found iconography of another sort.

Lanigan-Schmidt continues to make ingenious use of materials that evoke the childhood magic of homemade Christmas ornaments and valentines. The work was fairly drenched in aluminum foil, glitter, fake diamonds and rubies, and iridescent plastic of all sorts. But here, his veritable catalogue of insipid Hallmark-card holiday imagery was joined by fanciful depictions of rats and roaches swarming out from behind the altars. Paper party plates of Miss Piggy, Smurf, and Pac-Man also adorned the walls around icons on which wide-eyed Pilgrims, American Indians, vampires and skeletons shimmer in orgiastic excess.

The central altar, set in a corner, contained the installation's principal motifs. Pilgrim and Indian children sit down to a Thanksgiving meal while Death in the form of a Halloween skeleton waves 3-D postcards of the Empire State Building and the Statue of Liberty above them, and cartoon vampires leer out at the viewer from a kind of inferno below. In this perverse Pilgrim's Progress of consumerism the emissaries of white American society—from the Pilgrims to the bedbugs marching single file along the gallery ceiling—are vampires that lasciviously consume their prey. Their fangs and long red tongues drip with blood. Rows of brownstones across the bottom of each panel recall festive Christmas calendars whose windows, when opened, reveal scenes of the Christmas story. But these windows are broken and boarded up—contemporary manifestations of the gluttonous scenario played out by the Pilgrims above. On little devotional shelves at the base of each panel lie emblems of the leisure class: deodorant or air freshener flanked by toy figures of white tennis players and Perrier bottles filled with daisies.



Thomas Lanigan-Schmidt: installation view of The Praying Hands, 1981-83, mixed mediums; at Holly Solomon.

Alice Aycock: Celestial Alphabet, 1982, steel, glass, motorized grinding wheel, 127 by 133 by 288 inches; at John Weber.

Lanigan-Schmidt condemns consumer society by using its own hysterical caricatures. Miss Piggy frantically exhorts us to ENJOY!; Pac-Man gobbles up ghosts on the run; a demonic Pilgrim woman dresses (tortures) a turkey that is half American Indian. The message is abundantly clear. America's history has been and is ruled by Mammon. Greed and its companions, racism and displacement, are its idols.

One of the individual works also on display in the gallery is titled A Child's Byzantium in New Jersey (shades of Dylan Thomas and Yeats). Its rendering of a Byzantine crucifix and a hand-written narrative panel on which the artist recalls his childhood managed, in a modest way, to bring a complete social reality to life. We glimpsed the source of the artist's subject matter and use of materials in the rich trappings of Eastern Orthodoxy, the lives of his neighbors, and the "powder-blue iridescent eye-shadow" of the young women attending church services. The subtle complex of the social, religious, and biographical was far more compelling here than in the straightforward pieties of Preying Hands.

Preying Hands lacked the sustaining pathos of the truly integral relationship of life, faith, image and materials that is found in Lanigan-Schmidt's work at its best. The piece did not manage to transcend caricature, for it was too intimate with the consumerist frenzy that it indicts. Its visual overload was also too easily merged into confectionary confusion. Finally, the SoHo gallery context made reception of the work ambiguous—its villains were also its primary audience.

—Jamey Gambrell

Alice Aycock at John Weber

In the early '70s Aycock's work was concerned primarily with the ordering of space around an ideal perceiver, the structure of whose memory and anticipation was subverted in order to produce effects of disorder, disjunction and randomness. These works, generally installed in landscapes, consisted of architectural structures such as pavilions, mazes or underground wells and tunnels and were simple insofar as they comprised one linear trajectory and produced one essential effect: claustrophobia, blindness or entrapment.

In the mid-'70s Aycock began to incorporate mythic, magical and historical themes into her work, allowing its increasingly complex architecture to emerge out of a conjunction of narratives and redissolve back into them. The origin of meaning was thus displaced from the perceiver to the structure of the work itself, and the unity of the work was broken down into ambiguous fragments which were arranged seemingly randomly.

In the last few years Aycock's work has tended away from the purely architectural towards the use of circuitry, electricity, moving parts—a logical move, given her desire now to elaborate relations based on multivalency and dispersion. Aycock's recent show was a good example of this later work, consisting of five aluminum and steel pieces—two large-scale (indoor) works which are motorized, one wall- and two floor-pieces—accompanied by titles, texts and/or drawings. The relations between the works and the titles—The Theory of Twilight (Prayers for the Undoing of Spells) or The Celestial Alphabet . . ., etc.—were not meant to be clear. For the show functioned as a kind of enchanted memory forest in which fragments of texts floated freely in and out of the clanking, whining and blinking machinery—as if relics of many civilizations were combining and recombining before our eyes.

One piece, a flat, circular, rimmed structure titled Celestial Alphabet . . ., sat connected to a circuit-box, which controlled current to the myriad little black forms distributed like alphabet soup on its bed surface. The forms, drawn from the Kabalah, represent Greek and Hebrew letters (though only partially legible—they seemed brittle, eroded), now revitalized by their new connection to an electronic network and blinking away as if bristling with new life. These characters also resembled strands of genetic materials. X and Y chromosomes whose informational density and mystery made a comparison with alchemical or kabalistic practice difficult to avoid. This conflation of the scientific and mystical, the mythic and the physic—and the attempt to reduce their hierarchic relations—is one of Aycock's most consistent themes.

Another work of far less benignity, titled The Theory of Twilight . . ., is actually a scale version of a project to be installed in Roanoke, Va. In this piece, crescent-shaped sheets of stamped metal are affixed to the front of a scaffold in such a way as to form a facade pierced by a large hole in which two scimitarlike forms spin menacingly and cause the entire structure to shiver and wobble sadistically. This is a decidedly mean work, essentially psychological in effect, suggesting some kind of oriental guillotine, abstract castration apparatus, or ecstatic bachelor machine.

Considered as a whole, the show gives way to more reservations than it does revelations. The new works are organized more as images than as polyvalent systems, and the status of the viewer is not questioned as acutely as it was in her earlier work. Throughout these pieces there is a return to discrete sculptural units, to metaphor and to a rhetorical rather than a structural deployment of signs. One wonders whether Aycock's recent work represents a mere transitional phase in a remarkable career or is rather a dangerous flirtation with contemporary art fashion in its disingenuous attempts to come to terms with "image" and "meaning."

—Sanford Kwinter

Graham Nickson: Lifeguard Chair with Bathers III, 1982, charcoal on paper, 5 feet 10 inches by 11 feet 8 inches; at Susan Caldwell.

Cristobal Toral: Interior, 1982, oil on canvas, 17 by 18 ½ inches; at Staempfli.

Graham Nickson at Susan Caldwell

Drawing from the nude is the usual starting point of art education, and the usual tool is soft charcoal. These pedagogical conventions are not simply arbitrary. The figure, especially given the physiological motley of professional models, is an inexhaustible source of forms, and charcoal, with its tonal range and responsiveness to quick motion and changing pressure, can reveal to the student almost without his intervention an infinite world of small dramas in light and dark. The exercise is immediate and magical in its effects—and perhaps for that reason many artists continue to draw from the model long after their interest in the figure as a subject has lapsed. Along with pool, it is the best hand-eye coordination game one can play.

Very few modern artists, however, have been able to integrate the discipline and satisfaction of "fusain" drawing into their mature work; Matisse and possibly de Kooning are the only names that come to mind. In these mural-sized drawings Graham Nickson demonstrates that he is determined to try, but so far the results inspire little confidence, and even less sympathy. To begin with, he has attempted to disguise the artificiality of his studio problem by setting his sturdy seminude models in a contrived outdoor space that combines the lateral extension and frontality of the classical frieze with the props and simplified detail of contemporary naturalism. Thus, his models are at once nymphs, "batters" and Jantzen-suited surfers doing calisthenics, pitching tents and engaging in beach-blanket semaphore. All of this is lit as if it were the last tableau in some terribly serious narrative ballet, but the lighting exists less for mood than to give Nickson the opportunity to show off all the gradations of tone and texture his drawing materials can produce. Granted, Nickson does have a competent hand, but despite or because of that competence, nothing much happens: his contours, hatchings, smears and erasures all seem acts of control rather than discovery or enjoyment. By using the same model repeatedly, or homogenizing the build of several models, he further regiments his designs, allowing neither aberrant limb nor awkward stance to force him into a truly interesting line of shape. The only exception is a group of four drawings of heads surrounded by suntan reflectors (a wonderfully absurd image); and even here, though his line does become looser, he fails to take real advantage of the mirror repetitions and asymcetries of his subject.

More aggravating than the missed opportunities in these "machines" is the decorousness with which Nickson approaches both the sexuality of his women and the voyeurism of those who scrutinize them over his shoulder. Victorian cheesecake was considered excusable so long as its alabaster temptresses held their Greek poses and looked back at their admirers with virgin incomprehension. More recently the marketing of the film Personal Best has shown how one can simultaneously gratify and excuse the voyeurism of a "liberated" public by using athletics as a cover for locker-room peeking. Similarly, there is an awful lot of squeezed flesh in Nickson's pictures, and the insistence with which he bestows upon his women their indifferent expressions, anonymous features and hygenic, Outward-Boundy bodies seems suspiciously like an attempt at providing us with an alibi for our eager stares. In other words, Nickson wants not only to make "good art" but to be "good." Eric Fischl, who has also concentrated lately on seaside antics, is less well-rehearsed as a draftsman and much more obvious and unembarrassed in his attention to the erotic undercurrents of his scenes; he is also by far the more interesting artist. Nickson may not intend to come across as a Peeping Tom, nor as a Long Island Rockwell Kent, but until he strips his drawings of their polite theatrics it will remain unclear what the real source of his obsession with the figure is, and, just as importantly, why anyone should participate in it with him. —Robert Storr

Cristóbal Toral at Staempfli

At first viewing, Cristóbal Toral's realism is so rich as to give one esthetic heartburn. Women sit in empty, dirty city rooms, all in dark browns and olives, reeking, if not of despair, then of resignation. Piles of luggage come bulging out of the doors and window of a railroad car; mounds of garbage, including an offensive-looking doll's head, are tied together with twine. Sometimes even the canvas is painted to look as if it's been slashed or torn away to reveal its insides—the wooden skeleton of the stretcher beneath.

The Spanish Toral is that rarity these days—a poetic, even literary, painter. His is the poetry of people—mostly women—living alone in their substandard housing as well as the more metaphysical poetry of the "ripped" canvas. The interiors exhibit something of the alienation of Edward Hopper and George Segal; and, by inclination and design, they share something too with Toral's fellow Spaniards Zurbarán and Velázquez, and maybe even a little of Goya. Then there's Magritte, seemingly

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

present in all of Toral's high-luster trompe l'oeils—and maybe a little John Koch, for good measure.

All these resemblances and influences render Toral's work even richer than on first viewing. A painting like Interior—in which a nude woman sits in a brown and olive room, with a painting wrapped and tied on the wall and a closet door opening to other packages and an off-balance chair—almost overwhelms in its references to Hopper (the poignant loneliness), to Velàzquez (the lush technique), and to itself (the wrapped painting). A similar complex of associations informs other works, especially The New Tenant and Woman Making Her Bed.

Call him what you like—eclectic, bathetic, academic—Toral rises above labels on the strength of his very associations, of his poetic musings, and of his masterly—even old-masterly—act of putting on the high-art dog. They may not be calling for this kind of art down in Tribeca, but certainly there's room enough for this sort of achievement in the art world—or there should be. If it's the kind of thing we Americans are used to seeing in museums rather than in galleries, well, vive la différence. For any discomfort following exposure to Toral, take two Philip Pearlsteins to cleanse the system. —Gerrit Henry

Timothy Greenfield-Sanders at Marcuse Pfeifer

Artists constantly submit to being photographed, but critics usually succeed in hiding behind their words. Timothy Greenfield-Sanders's show, "Art Critics," offered the novelty of portraits of 40 art writers and editors, all photographed against the same dark backdrop, their features side-lit by cool naturalistic light. Greenfield-Sanders used an old-fashioned, oversized view camera with a very shallow depth of focus to scrutinize his specimens, whose faces emerged in microscopic detail, while their hands and bodies tended to blur. The big (11-by-14-inch), black-and-white contact prints had the elegance of glamor portraits from the 1920s and '30s. They were distinctly more powerful and attractive than some of Greenfield-Sanders's earlier celebrity portaits, done outside the studio with a hand-held camera.

The critics here appear somewhat uneasy about taking center-stage in front of Greenfield-Sanders' camera. These photographs effectively capture the limited set of roles which the critic can hide behind—they range from intellectual pioneer to high-class salesman. Some borrow the bohemian informality of artists, sporting leather jackets, rough-knit sweaters or rolled-up shirtsleeves. Others dress like chic investment bankers (though the critic-as-dandy is really a variation on the role of the artist-as-dandy perfected by Baudelaire and Manet). The compromise "look" of comfortable, academic respectability (tie and V-neck sweater under a blue blazer) is consummately modeled by Meyer Schapiro, our preeminent dean of modernism.

In the end, only a few critics seem truly at ease before the lens. Clement Greenberg emanates blunt charm—like a self-made businessman who's proud of it. Hilton Kramer, aggressively glum, with a five-o'clock shadow that makes him oddly resemble Richard Nixon, turns the image of the rebel inside out, while the New Yorker's suave Calvin Tomkins dispenses just a hint of a smile.

But why these critics and not others? Why Robert Rosenblum and not Barbara Novak; why Rosalind Krauss from October and not Ingrid Sischy from Artforum? Who refused to pose? And who wasn't asked? Greenfield-Sanders gives us no clue. As documentary, these pictures are frustratingly incomplete. This would seem quite unimportant if Greenfield-Sanders's pictures were not so patently serious in their intentions. Lucas Samaras, for his 1979–80 series of "Sittings 8 x 10," picked an equally arbitrary art-world sample, but the bizarre, sensationalistic setups of his photographs justified the arbitrariness by making the whole thing so personal. One accepted that these were simply Samaras's friends and acquaintances—extensions of his own peculiar inner world. In contrast, we learn little of Greenfield-Sanders himself from these portraits of others. In Samaras's portraits, stylization became a means of confrontation with his subjects, telling us a great deal about both him and them. Where Greenfield-Sanders stylizes his images, however, as in several of the portraits of women, individual character gives way to pointless soft-focus glamor—which tells us, unfortunately, nothing about anyone. —Pepe Karmel

Robert Rauschenberg at Castelli Greene St. and Sonnabend

Just as Rauschenberg's work is too easily likable at this point in his career, it is also too easy simply to dismiss it. The latter impulse was considerably abetted by the media-blitz accompanying his recent two-gallery, three-space extravaganza, which opened on New Year's Eve. Unfortunately, all this flamboyance belies the seriousness that does exist in the work, for Rauschenberg was seen not only to be creating signature works, but also looking backward at himself with insight and, arguably, pushing forward into new territory.

The show at Castelli consisted of handmade paper collages done in China and clay-pieces made in Japan. The most theatrical work was a 100-foot-long photo-mural called Chinese Summerhall, which, suspended from the ceiling, sliced diagonally through the gallery space. Although Chinese Summerhall is a selection of some of the hundreds of photographs Rauschenberg took on a recent trip to China, their Oriental provenance seems almost irrelevant: Rauschenberg's vision is so consistent that he photographs Rauschenbergs wherever he goes.

The clay works, specially commissioned by the Otsuka-Ohmi factory in Japan, fall into two very distinct types of work. The ceramic "paintings" called "Japanese Recreational Clay-Works" are just that: playful visual jokes with titles like Pneumonia Lisa and All Abordello Doze. Mona Lisa's face and hands are, for instance, superimposed over Botticelli's Venus. The larger clay-works—essentially ceramic explorations in his by-now familiar "combine" mode—are more surprising. The surface glaze of the clay gives the silkscreened images beneath it an artificiality reminiscent of kitschy plastic "Made in Japan" dolls. Indeed, the medium seems both to renew Rauschenberg's inventiveness and allow him more control than has been lately evident in his combines. He pushes the limits of his innate good taste to a kind of vulgarity and gaudiness that reflects the general "look" of much currently fashionable art. The two most innovative clay works, Dirt Shrine: South and Gates South, are large multi-panel wall combines which incorporate such well-known elements from Rauschenberg's "palette" as the ladder (from Winter Pool), the tire tread, dump truck, alligator and rock. The previous impact of this imagery, dissipated by repetition, is now restored through the physicality and unfamiliarity of the clay. Everything is made of clay—hinges, chain, ladder and rock—but it is the ladder that is most bizarre: a trompe l'oeil bamboo affair complete with mock dowel joints and decaled-on images. What's more, some of the most luscious painting Rauschenberg has done in years appears here in the unexpected medium of ceramic glaze. The clay works have a ponderousness rare in Rauschenberg's art, each panel weighing some 250 pounds. There is a productive contradiction between the clunkiness of the material and the thin translucent surface in which the images seem to float, free here from the conventional Rauschenberg grid.

The paper collages (of some 491 works, seven were shown) are the result of a collaboration with the Anhui Artists' Association in China, which invited Rauschenberg to use the world's oldest paper mill. Very thick paper with gold-leafed edges is collaged with images, found in China and overlaid with a very thin translucent paper. Large Chinese characters in paper relief, chops and a cloth medallion (which hangs below the print and is reflected in a mirror) were added. The images, sitting in their rigid, contrived space, feel very arbitrarily arranged, lacking both the internal logic and environmental responsiveness.

At Sonnabend was a series of combines called "Kabal American Zephyr," as well as three more sculptural works that looked as if they could have been made in 1961 with Empire I & II. The combines, though all new, seem very familiar. Blinking lights, fans, waving flags, rulers, mirrors, chairs, tables, car parts, ladders, pails, wheels, cloth and transferred images are all on hand.

At its best Rauschenberg's art has an autobiographical quality to it. Site of the Mute Spokes reads not only as autobiography, but also as commentary on his own development. The head and foot of a white enameled four-poster bed frame are attached top to top and hung on the wall horizontally. The center is empty. A wooden panel is inserted in the right side on which are a series of elements one associates with Jasper Johns—i.e., stenciled words and numbers (incomplete), a beer can (squashed), a target (superimposed on flowered wallpaper), and a flashlight (smashed and mounted on a mirror). The only other element is a broken comb. On the left side is a collaged Chinese acupuncture diagram of a man, a reference to Rauschenberg's earlier X-ray self-portrait; his back is turned to the panel of Johnsian images. A drawer-pull placed under the man turns the panel into a drawer, recalling Johns's 1957 painting Drawer. Duchamp is also invoked, both by the comb and the enameled bed frame which conjures up Apolinère Enameled. (Indeed, Rauschenberg's punning title reinforces the Duchampian reference.) Finally, this circle of friends and influences is completed by obvious reference to Rauschenberg's own succés de scandale, the Bed of 1955.

Some disjuncture exists between the American series and the Chinese and Japanese collaborative works, in which Rauschenberg attempts to absorb the imagery and materials of foreign cultures (as he did previously in his Indian-inspired series, "Jammers"). Beyond question, it is the "foreign" work which has given Rauschenberg access to some new artistic territory. Nevertheless, the fact remains that his concerns have changed little over the course of his 30-year career.

The interest Rauschenberg is now lavishing on his R.O.C.I. (Rauschenberg Overseas Cultural Interchange) project, which, in the interest of world peace, will travel and exhibit a changing body of some 150 of the artist's works, suggests he may be currently neglecting his more avant-garde artistic ambitions in favor of a programmatic involvement in the world at large. Not surprisingly, his work has lost some of its provocativeness in the process, even though there is still much to look at. —Lizbeth Marano

Joseph Solman: Ice Cellar, 1937, oil on canvas, 26 by 36 inches; at A.C.A. and A.M. Adler Fine Arts.

Joseph Solman at A.C.A. and A.M. Adler Fine Arts

In the days of the W.P.A. and the American Artists Union, when regionalist and social protest painting began to make its mark in America, a group of young avantgardists met in Joseph Solman's New York studio to form The Ten. Founding members were Solman, Mark Rothko, Adolph Gottlieb, Ilya Bolotowsky, Louis Schanker, Ben-Zion, Nahum Tschacbasov, Louis Harris and Jankel Kufeld, who were later joined by Ralph Rosenborg, Earl Kerkam and John Graham. The Ten represented two new trends in American art: Expressionism and Symbolism.

By 1936, the year both The Ten and the American Abstract Artists were founded, Solman's technique was already decisive. He took a number of new admirations—Matisse, Klee, de Chirico, Cézanne—and superimposed them over earlier models such as Luks, Myers, and Whistler. It is not necessary to hunt for his signature—usually tucked away in some obscure part of the painting—to recognize one of his pictures. Apart from the characteristically expressionist distortions—the black lines which contoured his forms and unified his compositions, the swelling of the spaces between the lines, the thickness of the paint, the medley of superbly patterned shapes, the moodily Luminist coloring—there was evident that respect for a two-dimensional surface which marks the truly modern painting. The brilliance and poetry of these early works could be appreciated anew in these two recent shows.

In his introduction to a book of poetry by the English Poet Laureate John Betjeman, W.H. Auden introduced the word "topophilia" to characterize a special kind of affection for place. Solman is a pure topophile. It was not, however, the vision of an urban—or rather, urbane—America which drew him so much as the small neighborhood streets and houses he visited day in and day out: a stop on the Third Avenue El was for Solman certainly more beautiful than the soaring Chrysler Building. Indeed, Solman's brand of topophilism would prefer a view of a leaking fire hydrant to a view of untrammeled nature. His eyes are open to empty lots, to playgrounds, to where the pencil of the sky touches the sidewalk on crosstown streets. Solman painted Klein's Department Store in Union Square, 1936; the huge eyeball opposite the El in The Oculist, 1937; the large hanging street sign of a standing female which he calls Venus on 23rd Street, 1937; and everywhere the expressive garbage cans (almost a trademark), fire hydrants, subway kiosks and cellar doors belonging to ice and coal street-merchants that made up the extraordinary Toonerville that is New York to him. (The oils were done from notes in his studio; the gouaches, outdoors, from direct observation.)

Stephen Vincent Benét wrote "American Names" but the reader of this poem, which finishes with the famous line "Bury my heart at Wounded Knee," is not convinced that the poet had ever been there. "Bury My Heart on Avenue B" would be what a true topophile like Solman would have written. For viewers who admire his later paintings, especially those of the '50s, these earlier works, filled with sentiment and mood, will be a revelation. —Lawrence Campbell

Dianne Blell: It Lay Crouched on the Top of a Rock and Arrested All Travelers who Came that Way, Proposing to them a Riddle, 1982, cibachrome; at Castelli Greene St.

Dianne Blell at Castelli Greene St.

In her big new Cibachrome prints of naked women and objects dressed up to resemble old master paintings, Dianne Blell aims for the stars and hits the moon. Her show in Castelli's basement may well be the sleeper of the winter art season. No longer limited to other people's photographs of her, Blell herself now takes pictures of other people with a 3-by-4-inch view camera. Yet she is as much of an actress as ever, even though she only allows her enormous screen presence to be felt rather than seen.

Her eye for texture and detail is everywhere apparent, but especially in her rough-sanded wood frames painted either gold, silver or the color of a barbecued potato chip. These frames give the show its oxymoronic flavor of down-home opulence. No expense has been spared in making these recreations of Leonardo, Rubens, Ingres and Vien impeccable. Though not necessarily accurate restagings, the photographs do evoke the originals in elaborate and frequently hilarious ways.

Take her Andromeda after Ingres: isn't it also an advertisement for the model's bruised shins and red muff? Or the Portrait of a Young Woman in a Fur Robe after Rubens: can't this photo also be seen as a takeoff on the Blackglama ad? Blell is not afraid to show her roots in the type of California Pop sensibility that Mel Ramos began exploring in the 1960s.

Occasionally, as in Love fleeing Slavery after Vien, Blell's props threaten to overwhelm her model, but nevertheless such works are funny and even quite moving. Melting the Hearts of the Rocks and Moving the Trees from Their Stations is Blell's tribute not so much to Leonardo as to the beauty of female youth. Captured here amidst the allover crinkliness of crushed paper and silk, a particularly winsome model seems acutely embarrassed, probably from posing naked for the first time. At the opposite end of the emotional spectrum, in the Erotic Frigidaire, Blell's Sphinx, inspired by Ingres and Gustave Moreau, is framed on either side by pink painted wings and real flaming torchères; these help to create an eerie efect of hot and cold living symmetry.

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

Make no mistake about Blell's series of photographs of a single vase: it, too, is a woman. Except for the gaffers' tape around its handles, the globs of grapes on its sides and the chips in its gilt plaster, the vase is singularly vacant. Reminiscent of Greuze's Girl with Broken Pitcher, Blell's vase likewise carries intimations of lost virginity. The vase is about waist-high, yet it goes through a number of scale changes in the photographs: it becomes waifish when bathed in magenta light before a white backdrop; it's dwarfed when seen under a baroque swag of red drapery; and it grows even more metaphorically resonant when we learn that the vase has been rented.

These photos are an essay on provisional ownership—not so much old masterish as modern American feminist. Blell's objects are cheap if you think of the low-risk angle, pricey if you consider the per hour rates, luscious if you want an immediate effect, unbelievably tacky if you consider the ding an sich. Her allegory of the vase can also be seen as a bogus quest for the grail. But of course she has already found it, and offers it to you. Will you take it, this woman's battered, rented version of herself, or will you spurn it?

When Blell adds flowers to her vase, she's no Constance Spry, but the very inappropriateness of her lilies gives them their mock-Eleusinian air of Hollywood mystery. These are flowers for a certain kind of special event, a big party where no one will notice the flowers—but they have to be there. The vase with flowers comes in four colors, my favorites being the red, magenta and harvest gold versions—each of which has the visual heat and saturation of an FTD commercial.

Wearing real feathered wings in another series, the vase gives no impression of flight but does suggest a funerary urn, an amphora of inspiration, a miraculous love krater and an alchemical retort. Yet the winged urn also looks like an original emblem, more truly Neoclassical Pop than anything else in the show. Under different colored lights, the Winged Urchin looks battered and street smart like a hooker and a warhorse.

Last year Blell put Leo Castelli in the same pair of wings for a photograph that later apeared in Interview. This year her show included one photograph of the vase blown up to large-person proportions and called Colossus of Genius. Looking at this monster version of the vase, I can almost hear it say, "All right, Mr. DeMille, I'm ready for my closeup."—Brooks Adams

Arthur Cohen: Town Wharf, Provincetown, oil on canvas, 9 by 12 inches, at Peter Rose.

Arthur Cady: Looking Back from the Garden, 1982, acrylic on paper, 40 by 60 inches, at Fischbach.

Lois Dodd: Ice in the Trees, 1981, oil on canvas, 54 by 50 inches, at Fischbach.

Arthur Cady at Fischbach

Arthur Cady's acrylics on paper are unabashedly poetic. In fact, they are so evocative—of light, of time of day, of weather, even of climate—that Cady pretty much foregoes that most "poetic" of painting styles, painterly realism, in favor of a sturdier naturalism, the better to clarify things.

Watch Hill Channel (a site in Stonington, Vermont) is a warm-weather triptych featuring purple clouds, all looking as if it had come off the top of some high-art calendar. Dam and Spillway (a site in the Sodom Reservoir in upstate New York) shows blue/white water rushing from spillway to dam against a background of lush green trees and heraldically blue sky. Finally, In the Woods, Brewster, New York, depicts countless trees and foliage with gorgeous hints of sunlight in the yellow and green shade.

Very little emphasis is given to the action of painting here. In fact, acrylics on paper have the look of watercolor, that subtlest of paint mediums and the one that least lends itself to expressive manipulations. Cady's poetry comes fresh from the jar—and emerges as the poetry of some eternal summer in the north where, for all the greenery and sunlight and fast-flowing water, winter is always imminent.

This isn't beautiful painting of beautiful scenes—it's excellent painting of beautiful scenes. Cady is, first and foremost, a technician. His painting might have the look of being too "worked," but the fact is, Cady has worked—to capture the exact nature of his scenes, to make it all look effortless. If his art isn't in the painterly realist tradition of Porter and Freilicher, it is in the grand realist tradition of Homer and Eakins. (And even in the painterly realist tradition, in works by such as Susan Shatter or Darragh Park, technical virtuousity of Cady's sort is earning a reputation.)

Still, one feels the need to defend Cady's naturalism—it's so old-fashioned and he is so good at it. One of his paintings Late Afternoon, Sodom Reservoir, features purple cloudbanks over purple waters, and completely gets away with it. Another, Looking Back from the Garden, features a bee's-eye view of a foreground with flowers, trees in midground, bits of blue sky, and a house bathed in purple shadow—and here Cady's bravura naturalism scores again.

In Anne Fuller's Porch, Stonington—a study in white and its shadows, with white beams and latticework, white wicker and bamboo furniture, potted plants and ubiquitous blue sky—Cady hints at his secret. This is narrative painting, the story of time, of place, of the wonderful, ineffable appearances of reality. It's a story which, when well told, viewers never tire of, maybe because they've seen these stories—on vacation, traveling, in pictures, in memory—so many times before. It looks like reality, and yet it's visionary. And this is what we've always suspected is true.

—Gerrit Henry

Lois Dodd at Fischbach

These paintings of places and scenes near the Delaware Water Gap are filled with a personal current, a sharpness of personality, which spell out Lois Dodd's name like a sign on a billboard amid the American painting scene. There is a quality in her work that suggests she might as easily have been able to transmit this electricity had she been an abstract painter instead of a realist. Evidently she savors the inwardness of geometric forms; for her the rectangle of a door or a window has an intense inner life. And yet she continues to set up her easel near her dooryard, whether it happens to be in Maine or in Pennsylvania, and to paint this world of her senses as though nobody else had experienced it before her with an equal intensity. When she paints a simple, tarpaper-roofed cottage it can be read like a poem by Emily Dickinson. She is at the cutting edge where abstract art and realism meet.

One suspects that what initially draws Dodd to a scene is a visual essence which an abstract painter would have been inclined to separate and isolate, yet her paintings of windows, doors, bridges, overpasses, tree trunks, rivers, do not come out looking like ideograms. There is passion in her work, but it is savored almost dispassionately, never romantically. All this adds up to an unusually complete painter, able to communicate on many different levels.

Roger Laux Nelson: Crimson Shade, 1982, oil on canvas, 46 by 75 inches; at B.R. Kornblatt.

Joanne Carson: Heaven, 1981, oil paint on wood, 84 by 103 by 27 inches; at Fort Worth Art Museum (review on p. 186).

The paintings in this latest show chronicle a season. They begin in the fall when nights are cool but days are hot, and the sky blazes blue between the reds and pinks of maple leaves. Then, as winter settles in, the colors lose their voices, and hillsides become like walls of cat fur rubbed the wrong way, the river turns into an uneasily colored stream, the sky is like condensed milk, and, between the trees and framed by them, great geometric slabs of ice pile up as though in a builder's yard.

There is nothing photographic about Lois Dodd's work. It is almost as loosely painted, on occasion, as Milton Avery's. Yet she seems to know, instinctively, which of the many signs of resemblance must remain in the work, and which must be suppressed. Thus in Door Staircase the viewer feels himself walking straight into the painting and up the stairs, leaving the door open to be closed by somebody else. In Window, Deserted House, it is the window that is the painting, not the painting that is a window.

Although most of her paintings are taut in definition, there are several quite small pictures where she seems to have relaxed her tautness, and painted as effortlessly as a bird singing. This latest show bears witness to a profoundly original and personal talent now reaching for the stars—or perhaps the halo around the moon. —Lawrence Campbell

Arthur Cohen at Peter Rose

There's no doubt about it: Arthur Cohen is a wonderful painter. His waterscapes of Provincetown and studies of the Brooklyn Bridge display what can only be called a painterly genius. In the Provincetown views of wharfs and harbors and coves, sea and sky luminously reflect each other—in turquoise sky with slate blue water in one, in blue-green sky and brown-green sea in another—and press between them low-lying buildings or docked boats. In Cohen's paintings, a long, narrow horizon is often only a matter of color—of creams or purples striated between sea and sky. His views of the Brooklyn Bridge are heroic yet scrupulously delicate architectural caprices, at times naturalistically stroked, at other times more broadly and gesturally painted. All—bridges and bays, gestural or naturalistic, small or large—attest to Cohen's mastery of the genre, and exude a quiescent beauty. Not only is Cohen a fine painter of light: his evocations of time of day and the atmospheres created by weather together constitute some fourth dimension of visual experience. You can, in short, hear the waves lapping and the screech of gulls. Sand and sky and water are for the viewer the equivalent of the madeleine for Proust.

Despite all the wonderful painting and wonderful sensations, however, a nagging doubt arises: is all this beauty—admittedly a contemporary, anxious beauty, but still quite lush—enough? It never has been in the modern period, when visual beauty has more often than not been sacrificed for new kinds of beauty more dependent on depth of esthetic intention than on the relatively shallow quality of paint handling. Cohen, on the other hand, has been a painterly artist for 25 years, not so much developing his style as repeatedly crystallizing it, and not often adventuring out of the locales he has mastered.

Perhaps it is unfair to take an artist to task for not doing what he may never have intended, or wanted, to do. But the very high achievement of this body of work—which has been the same body of work for some years—signals that Cohen should now be able to move on. (Fairfield Porter, for instance, offset his landscapes with sharp, quite revelatory paintings of family and friends.) Cohen is only 54. One hopes that his next show will be one of adventure as well as excellence, and that he will not remain forever a Cape Cod Whistler. Cohen seems capable of better than even that.

—Gerrit Henry

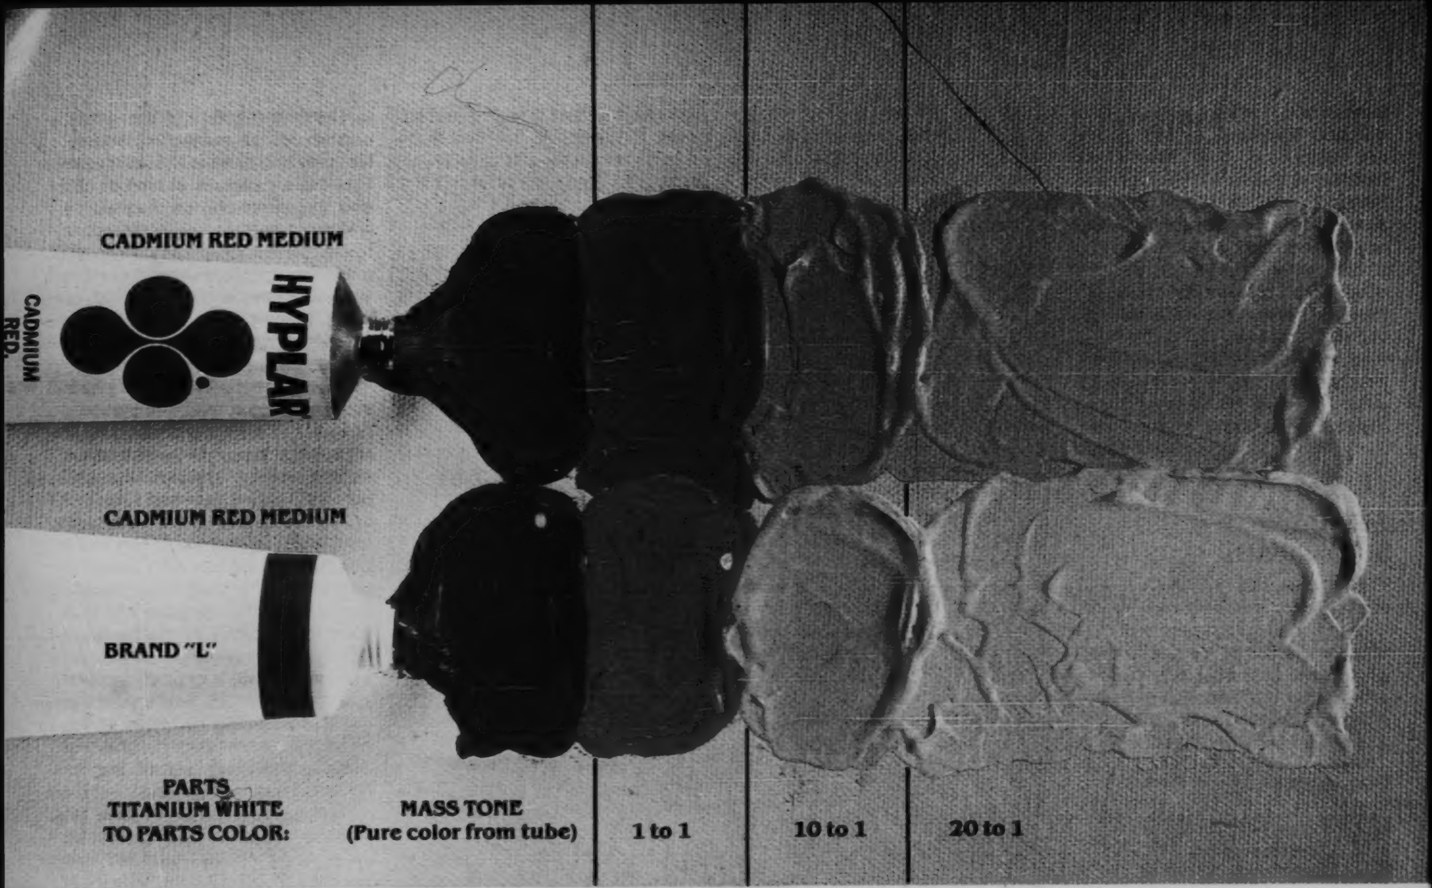
BALTIMORE

Roger Laux Nelson at B.R. Kornblatt

Nelson's new farm-country landscapes evolved from heavy painterly abstractions that he showed in the early '70s; there was also an intermediate phase of flatter, more geometric work. In all three stages, Nelson's interest has remained the same—the relationship between abstraction and representation expressed in terms of color, pattern and perspective.

The earliest of the landscapes, Windbreak (1981), involves three of Nelson's four basic compositional elements: plowed and planted fields, trees and sky (the other element is roads). The foreground is filled with rows of cornlike plants shadowed with violet

VOL 71
ISS 4
AP 1983
UMI



CADMIUM RED MEDIUM
HYPLAR
CADMIUM RED
CADMIUM RED MEDIUM
BRAND "L"
PARTS TITANIUM WHITE TO PARTS COLOR:
MASS TONE (Pure color from tube)
1 to 1
10 to 1
20 to 1

PERHAPS SURPRISING, BUT TRUE... RICHER COLOR BY FAR WITH HYPLAR® ACRYLICS

Right out of the tube, Grumbacher Hyplar and the leading acrylic competitor look about the same.

But mix them with white and you begin to see the difference.

At twenty parts white to one part color, the extra richness of Hyplar makes the other acrylics pale by comparison.

Hyplar Cadmium Red Medium actually has over TWICE the color strength when compared to the leading U.S. competitor, Brand "L".

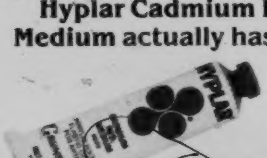
That means your dollar buys more when you buy Hyplar. Much more. Because the color goes so much further.

But it isn't just color intensity that makes Hyplar Acrylics superior. We "mill" our paint in a process that results in the finest, most uniform dispersion.

So you get a paint that covers better and responds better to your brush or knife.

Next time, give yourself the acrylic advantage. Get Grumbacher Hyplar... and get color as rich as your ideas.

TM



THE RICHER COLORS OF GRUMBACHER

Ask your local artists' material dealers for these products, or write:
M. GRUMBACHER, INC., 460 West 34th Street, New York, N.Y. 10001.
In Canada: M. GRUMBACHER (CANADA) Inc., 460 Finchdene Square, Scarborough, Ontario M1X 1C4 that abut a creamy gold field, is bracketed by two green fields. One is carried quickly into the painting's space, only to be stopped by the windbreak of the title—a row of thickly planted, round trees in several shades of green.

The perceived depth of the painting's space varies greatly with one's physical distance from it. If one stands near the work, the fields in the painting appear extraordinarily short, but if one moves back a couple of feet, the foreground flattens out, both opening up the fields and widening the vista. This elasticity is an admirable achievement. Another variable point of view is offered in View from Johnson's Road (1982), in which the fields run diagonally from lower left to upper right. If one moves to the left of the painting, its space opens up, conveying a "real" sense of the sweep of the midwestern landscape.

In these works Nelson has applied his paint in a brushy manner that blends smoothly into the overall composition. One can see changes from field to field, but only in textures. The prettiness of Nelson's palette (especially the bright primary and secondary colors of his autumn paintings) is so engaging that we may overlook his rigorous structures.

The real strength of these landscapes is in the tension they set up between abstract patterning and illusionistic spatial structure. In a few paintings—like Johnson's Road Entrance (1982)—this tension becomes a sort of dislocation. The multitude of textures and patterns in this work are ordered simply in sections from left to right. The horizon is hard to locate—it seems only a few yards away to the right, but miles away to the left. This painting, like all the others, looks representational only on superficial viewing. In these complex works Nelson offers us not only a landscape but a whole study in visual concerns as well. (Another version of this show appeared at the Delaware Art Museum in Nov. '82.) —Ellen Lubell

FORT WORTH

JoAnne Carson at the Fort Worth Art Museum

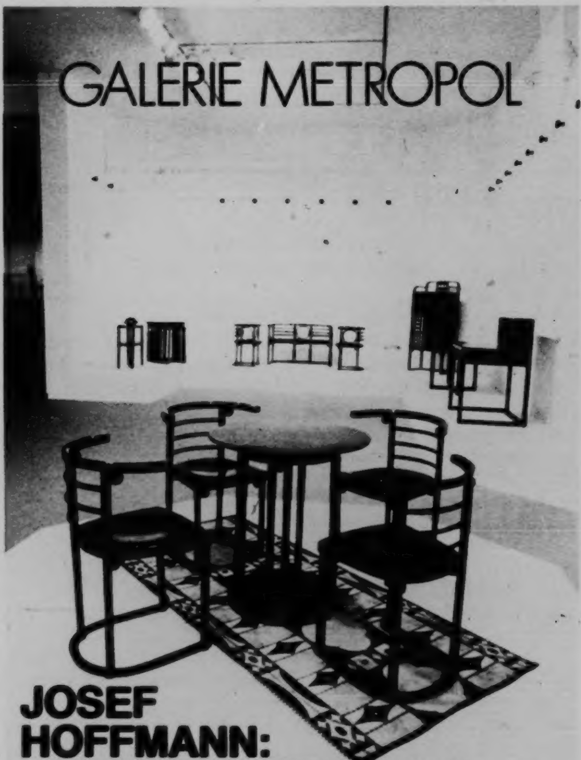
The most striking aspect of JoAnne Carson's recent work is its physical extension off the wall into the gallery space. These three-dimensional structures are each built out from a rectangular surface demarcating the traditional picture plane. The artist has further complicated her compositions by painting all surfaces with a complex mixture of art-historical and trompe-l'oeil styles.

Of the five pieces in the exhibition, three are immediately recognizable reinterpretations of works by modern masters (the remaining two were made earlier and are less specific). Paintings by Cézanne, Picasso, and de Chirico are subjected to the artist's reworking: some of the original forms are extended from the flat surface into the third dimension, along with contemporary additions including, in all but one of the works, a television. In addition, the surfaces are further fragmented by means of a quasi-Cubist overpainting, and in all of the works one element is singled out for varied repetition across the image.

The Broken Pitcher suggests an encounter between a hurricane and Cézanne's Still Life, ca. 1900, from the National Gallery. Cézanne's pitcher, wine glass and fruit are shown six times. The leftmost image is a freestanding two-dimensional pop-up image of the composition; to its immediate right, the same format is used to show the still life halfway disappearing into the side of an old-fashioned console television. The image can next be glimpsed through the TV screen, before it shows up whole again to the right of the console. The fifth rendering, slightly to the lower right, is partially obscured by a Cubist violin. Finally, at the lower right corner of the composition, the pitcher is shown shattered, in keeping with the title of the work. This gradual descent clearly recalls Duchamp's Nude Descending a Staircase.

The pitcher is not the only thing broken, however; the title of the work is a pun, and the picture as a whole appears literally smashed by a wooden X-shape that suggests rafters fallen from a collapsed structure. This metaphor for physical disintegration parallels the Cubistic fragmentation of the picture plane as evoked by Carson in her treatment of many of the work's surfaces (the tablecloth beneath the violin, for example). In addition, she uses bits of writing to recall yet another Cubist device for violating illusionistic space: along the length of the wooden beams the artist has attached triangular "pennants" with words painted on them. "Still life," "apple" and "plexi" each appear several times, "Adam" and "tree" at least once each. Most frequent, however, is the word "expulsion."

Carson's choice of words is hardly incidental, especially in the case of "expulsion" which carries connotations both of things



GALERIE METROPOL

JOSEF HOFFMANN:
EXHIBIT AT THE FORT WORTH MUSEUM 1982.
MAJOR FURNISHINGS BY GALERIE METROPOL INC.
(212) 772-7401 927 MADISON AVENUE, N.Y., N.Y. 10021

JOEL
BASS
new work

COREY POSTIGLIONE
new work

APRIL

JAN
CICERO
GALLERY
437 N CLARK CHICAGO, IL 60610 312 644 5374

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
A P 1983
UMI

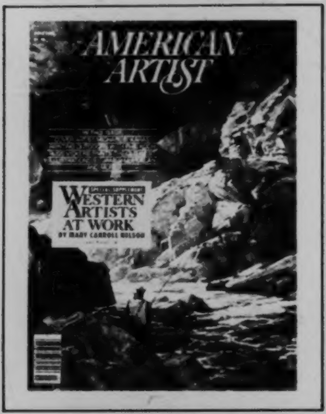
We'll paint you a clear picture of American Realism today.



A CONVERSATION WITH DAVID Hatfield

Ed Baynard's Still Lifes

AMERICAN ARTIST

American Artist is the art magazine devoted to the best in contemporary American Realistic painting, drawing, printmaking and sculpture. Each month, beautifully designed, colorfully illustrated articles will paint you a vivid picture of both celebrated and emerging artists in every region of the country…from city to farmland…photo realist to expressionist.

We'll take you right into the artists' studios and describe the training, the working methods, the development of ideas, and the future plans of the featured artists.

You'll also find technical advice…an open forum on important issues…book reviews…a monthly calendar of events…and offerings of hundreds of art materials, including frames, mats, lighting, and more.

American Artist will give you the valuable information and invaluable inspiration you need, whether you're painting your own picture, or keeping up with today's American Realism.

See for yourself.

Subscribe today at no risk. Your satisfaction is guaranteed.

SPECIAL TRIAL OFFER

YES, enter my subscription to AMERICAN ARTIST for one year (12 issues) at only $18.00. I understand if I am not completely satisfied, I can keep the first issue — FREE — and simply return my bill, marked "cancel". I'll be under no further obligation.

Name ____________________

Address ____________________ Apt. # ________

City ____________ State ________ Zip ________

DD312

SEND NO MONEY NOW. We'll bill you later.

AMERICAN ARTIST

1 Color Court
Marion, Ohio 43305

Please allow 6 to 8 weeks for delivery of your first issue.

pushed outwards and things purged. These works are, of course, "pushed out" in the most literal sense—painted images have been forced out from the picture surface. But there is also a strongly purgative air about them, as if Carson is here struggling to rid herself of the otherwise stymieing regard she has for these masters from the past. Certainly, the breaking of Cézanne's pitcher, shown amid the overall tumult of the composition, reveals the artist's ambivalence toward her source. Meanwhile, the presence of the television screen demonstrates Carson's allegiance to contemporary life, even as it comments on the influence TV has had on the contemporary eye. Like early Lichtenstein remakes of Monet's haystacks, Carson's art seems to question and struggle against the masters of modernism even as it reinterprets their work.

—Susan Freudenheim

Paul Heald: Clay Feet, 1982, acrylic on linen, 50 by 56 inches; at Traver Sutton.

Judy Fiskin: Dingbat Series—Landscape, 1982, photograph; at Newspace.

LOS ANGELES

Judy Fiskin at Newspace

Judy Fiskin's work is a quiet reminder that conceptualism is far from dead. Stripped of all technical virtuosity and decorative appeal, her tiny, black-and-white photographs are as much expressions of an idea as records of the process of visual perception. Fiskin's earlier work had classified varieties of stucco, desert landscapes, Hollywood bungalows. Her most recent exhibition was comprised of nearly 50 pictures of "dingbats."

The exhibition announcement provided a simple dictionary-style definition of the colloquialism: "Dingbat n. The classic wood and stucco box apartment of the 1950's and 1960's, primarily found near the freeways in Los Angeles and environs." This unlovable architectural species seems an odd choice for the photographer's eye: devoid of esthetic interest, it is a monument to contemporary society's philistine utilitarianism. From this vantage point, Fiskin's work can be read as wry social commentary, identifying a wasteland of dehumanizing environments in which the need for maximum rentable square footage has been substituted for architecture, and fast-tracked, do-it-by-numbers construction for materials and craft.

If this were all of Fiskin's purpose, however, the character and number of the photographs would soon exhaust the viewer's interest. But the format of individual works and the groupings of works within the exhibition indicate that Fiskin has other important conceptual motives in mind. The photographs are assembled in groups ranging in number from two to nine, and each group is titled according to common decorative features used to relieve the basic box construction: "Peaked Roofs" and "Side Stairways," for example, identify particular architectural features, while the categories of "Chinese," "Japanese" and "Geometric" sample some of the artificial flavorings used by constructors to distinguish one building from the next. In the group titled "Landscape," attention is directed to the meager trees, lawn and shrubbery sometimes used to relieve pitiless facades. In contrast, the "Car Ports" section includes structures in which no such sacrifice is made of the ultimate utilitarian purpose.

In their almost arbitrary whimsy, these groupings mimic the buildings themselves and the architectural mentality which informs them. Fiskin's photographs are monotonous not only in their numbers, but in their repetitive format as well; each building is seen frontally, from across the street. The curb provides an identical horizontal in each picture, while street and sky are bleached out to white. People—even such vestiges of humanity as cars—are few, an exclusion that focuses attention on the buildings themselves, and maintains a tone of delicate objectivity. And there is nothing, anywhere, to call attention to the technical artistry of the photographer.

Printed and framed on 6-by-8-inch photographic paper, the images themselves are a tiny 2½ by 2½ inches, a size which demands close reading. As we examine this "text," it becomes clear that we are dealing with documentary classification, with a kind of catalogue, rather than with a series of individual, self-contained works. This documentary character is emphasized by the imperfection of Fiskin's printing process, which leaves the edges of each image imprecise, unfinished. We read them as notations, quickly made from observation—much like those that a botanist might use to render a species of plants in a notebook. Their purpose is to inform.

The same spirit of curiosity which might inspire a botanist's renderings pervades Fiskin's work. There is her fascination with identifying species and subspecies, her subtle delight in comparison and cross-reference, her satisfaction in observation for its own sake. Fiskin's particular strength as an artist, however, lies in her ability to elicit the viewer's participation, in her ability to involve us in those processes of perception and critical selection, processes which subtly expand our understanding both of ourselves and our environment. —Peter Clothier

SEATTLE

Paul Heald at Traver Sutton

Like a number of Seattle painters since the late 1950s, Paul Heald has developed into a modernist without the pressures for novelty faced by New York painters with similar interests. The qualities in his work—soft lighting, thinned-out paint, quiet craftsmanship—are hallmarks of the earlier "mystic" artists of the Northwest area like Tobey and Graves. Heald learned from them and then went his own formalist way.

This gallery show, which followed a recent retrospective of this 44-year-old, Michigan-born artist held at the nearby Bellevue Art Museum, contained eight large and three small paintings, all acrylic stain on linen. In these and other works, Heald opposes an abstract background, softly stained and romantically spattered, to a more or less rigid system of lines laid over it. It is as if the sensitive nuances of a Morris Graves were suddenly restructured by a geometric painter.

Clay Felt is a good example of this type of work. Here, the smudges of purple, orange, green and gold are like ghosts of painterly actions given new form by the horizontal bands superimposed on them. The larger paintings in the show, like the diptychs Heart Breaker and Lift Off, are less convincing. Though the interplay of subtle color and rigorous line is more complicated in these works, they do not convey the intimate emotion typical of the best Heald paintings. They are somehow emptied out and ceremonial in feeling.

The smaller paintings with their bold drips and uncorrected "mistakes" seem to suggest a new direction for Heald. Whatever this may be, it is clear that though Heald still subscribes to the modernist tenets currently under assault in New York, he has developed into an artist of considerable strength. —Matthew Kangas

Review Contributors

Brooks Adams, Jamey Gambrell, Gerrit Henry, Pepe Karmel and Ellen Lubell are free-lance critics living in New York . . . Lawrence Campbell, Robert Storr and Wade Saunders are artists who also write on art . . . Sanford Kwinter is a doctoral candidate at Columbia University . . . Carter Ratcliff's most recent book is John Singer Sargent (Abbeville) . . . Peter Clothier is dean of the College of Fine and Communication Arts, Loyola Marymount University, Los Angeles . . . Susan Freudenheim is a free-lance critic writing on art from Fort Worth . . . Matthew Kangas is a poet and critic writing on art from Seattle.

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
A P 1983
UMI

Roy Boyd Los Angeles

Robert McCauley
Sculpture and Drawings

170 S. La Brea
Los Angeles 90036

213 938 2328

Roy Boyd Chicago

Vera Klement
Paintings

215 W. Superior
Chicago 60610

312 642 1606

MARCH 31 THROUGH APRIL 29

JAY McCAFFERTY PAINTINGS & DRAWINGS

CERAMICS NEIL TETKOWSKI

13225 SHAKER SQUARE CLEVELAND OHIO 44120 216/491-8062

DBR GALLERY

THE TWINING GALLERY INC.

33 BLEECKER ST NYC 10012 (212) 674-2070

SUSAN GARDNER: "NOT SO NAIVE"

WITH FOLK ART FROM THE COLLECTION OF AARNE ANTON

THROUGH APRIL

DEBRAH PEARSON

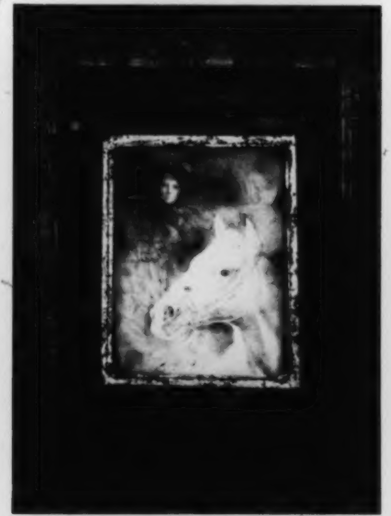
April 22 - May 14

Knightwood and Brooks, Ltd.

ONE FINANCIAL PLAZA 7210 METRO BLVD. MINNEAPOLIS, MINNESOTA 55435 (612) 831-1010

MERSAD BERBER

IN TEXAS



"JELENA AND HORSE" 20"x 28"

EXHIBITION APRIL 20 - MAY 4

SAN JACINTO TOWER LOBBY

DOWNTOWN DALLAS

PRESENTED BY PAIGE GALLERY

1519 Hi Line Drive • Dallas, Texas 75207 • 214-742-8483
Hours 9:30-4:30 Monday-Saturday

SAM GILLIAM

April 9-April 30

new paintings/draped canvases

May
HAROLD JOE WALDRUM

June
ARTHUR FRANCE

FORT WORTH GALLERY

901 Boland • Fort Worth, Texas 76107 • 817/332-5603

Liquin is probably just what you've been looking for. The question is, what is Liquin?

RESISTANT TO CRACKING & CRAZING
SPEEDS DRYING OF COLOURS
SUPERB FOR GLAZING
RESISTANT TO YELLOWING
REQUIRES NO MIXING
RESISTANT TO DISCOLOURATION
WINSOR & NEWTON
PAINTING MEDIUM DANGER
2.5 FL.OZ.(74ml)

PAINTING BY ROBERT B. DANCE

Although Liquin has been used by painters everywhere for over 15 years, it's still unknown to many artists. We'd like to make this unique medium better known to you!

Formulated with an alkyd resin base, Liquin is a painting medium that requires no mixing, safely speeds the drying of oil and alkyd colours, and affords excellent resistance to cracking and crazing.

It's fully compatible with oil and alkyd colours in any concentration, thins colours to working consistency and is superb for glazing. Unlike traditional painting mediums containing oil and varnish, Liquin is highly resistant to yellowing and discoloration.

Now that you know just what Liquin is, find out for yourself how well it works. Just ask for it at dealers who carry the Winsor & Newton line.

Winsor & Newton Inc., 555 Winsor Drive, Secaucus, New Jersey 07094. Western Distr.: Pacific Stationery, 415 SW Second Avenue, Portland, OR 97204. Pacific Artists Materials, 2410 W. Third St., Santa Ana, CA 92703. Wyoming, No. & So. Dakota Distr.: The Mathison Co., 1213 North P Avenue, Fargo, ND 58102.

WINSOR & NEWTON

1832 150th ANNIVERSARY 1982

Time and expense aren't our main concern. Quality is.

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

Passing Time Bronze

J. Seward Johnson, Jr.

Solo Exhibition
The Nippon Club
New York, New York
April 1983

For brochure and information contact:
Sculpture Placement • Suite 304, Dept. 8 • 2828 Pennsylvania Ave., NW • Washington, D.C. 20007 202-362-9310

Cultural tours of art centers in Scandinavia, Holland and the U.S.S.R.

Finnair offers fine arts, crafts, architecture, design and culture tours. Trips operate year round and can be tailored for institutions sponsoring fund raising or study groups.

All tours include cultural visits, first-class centrally located hotels, sightseeing and airfare.

For free information, call Finnair's special interest department (212) 689-9300 or check the tour(s) that interests you, below, and mail us your request today.

FINNAIR ART TOURS, 10 E. 40th St., N.Y., N.Y. 10016
YES, send me information on the tour(s) checked: AA 4/83
☐ Stockholm, Helsinki & Leningrad Art .... 10-15 days
☐ Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev & Helsinki Art .... 15 days
☐ Scandinavian Art Tour .... 11-15 days
☐ Dutch Masters Tour .... 15 days
☐ Finnish Architecture Tour .... 10-21 days
☐ Connoisseur's Finland Gourmet & Culture Tour .... 15 days
☐ Interior Design Tour of Scandinavia .... 11 days
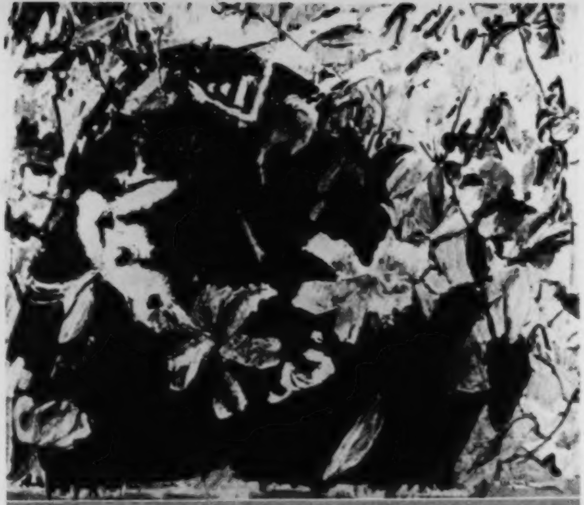
NAME: .... PHONE: ....
ORGANIZATION: ....
ADDRESS: ....
CITY: .... STATE: .... ZIP: ....

FINNAIR
Simple elegance... by Finnish design



PAM KELLY SILLS
Botanical Phantasies mixed media on linen and paper
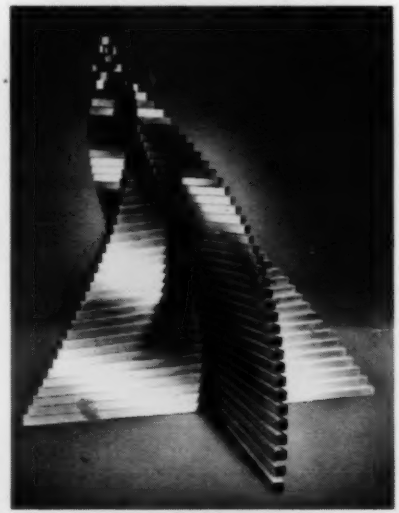
May 14-May 31, 1983

Graphic Editions
FINE ART COLLECTION
834 CHARTRES ST. NEW ORLEANS, LA 70116
(504) 528-9513 — 482 4560



Untitled #176 Stainless Steel H: 84"

MORTON

RACHOFSKY

SCULPTURE

3 Three Sisters Gallery

2300 Mercantile Bank Building
Dallas, Texas 75201
214/748-1248

Catalogue Available $6.00

JAN GROOVER

Jan Groover/Photographs

10 April to 12 June 1983
Neuberger Museum
State University of New York at Purchase
914-253-5133

Jan Groover/New Work

Platinum-Palladium
5 April to 30 April

Daniel Wolf Inc.

30 West 57th
New York, New York
212-586-8432

MALE
THE HUMAN FIGURE
FEMALE
THE HUMAN FIGURE
MALE
THE HUMAN FIGURE
FEMALE
THE HUMAN FIGURE

FIFTH ANNUAL APRIL 1-30

db

DONALD BATMAN GALLERY
825 WESTPORT ROAD KANSAS CITY, MO 64111/(816) 531-2688

MEXICAN MASTERS

Felipe Castaneda
Jean Charlot
Rafael Coronel
Jose Luis Cuevas
Ricardo Martinez
Carlos Merida
Gustavo Montoya
Leonardo Nierman
Felipe Orlando
J.C. Orozco
Diego Rivera
D.A. Siqueiros
Rufino Tamayo
Francisco Zuniga, etc.

The B. Lewin Galleries

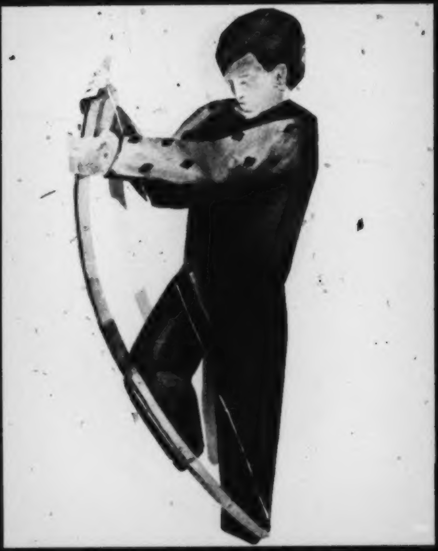
266 North Beverly Drive 213-278-5769
Beverly Hills, California 90210 213-550-1852

210 South Palm Canyon Drive
Palm Springs, California 92262 619-325-7611
World's Largest Gallery Collection of Mexican Art

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

TIMOTHY WOODMAN

APRIL 16 THRU MAY 28



THE GREENBERG GALLERY

44 MARYLAND PLAZA ST. LOUIS, MO. 63108 (314) 361-7600

GALERIE MICHAEL WERNER

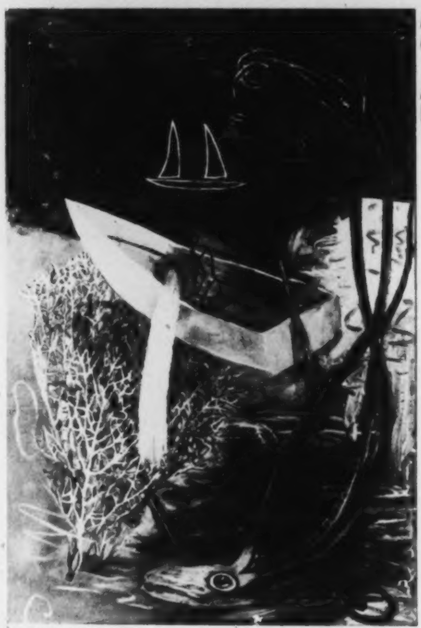
BASELITZ
BYARS
IMMENDORFF
KIRKEBY
LÜPERTZ
A.R.PENCK

D — 5000 KÖLN — 1 —
GERTRUDENSTR. 24/28 T.210661

Judith Linhares

Paintings
Gouaches

April 13
May 7, 1983



Red Sea 1982,
Oil on Canvas 4 x 6 feet

Gallery
Paule Anglim
14 Geary St. San Francisco
(415) 433-2710

Small Bronzes

Lynda Benglis
Louise Bourgeois
Nancy Graves
Bryan Hunt
Roy Lichtenstein
Bruce Nauman
Wade Saunders
George Segal
Joel Shapiro
Martin Silverman
Alan Stone
Paul Thek
Michael Todd
Herk van Tongeren
Isaac Witkin

McINTOSH/DRYSDALE GALLERY

2008 PEDEN . HOUSTON, TEXAS 77019 . 713/520-1688

The Art of Spectacle

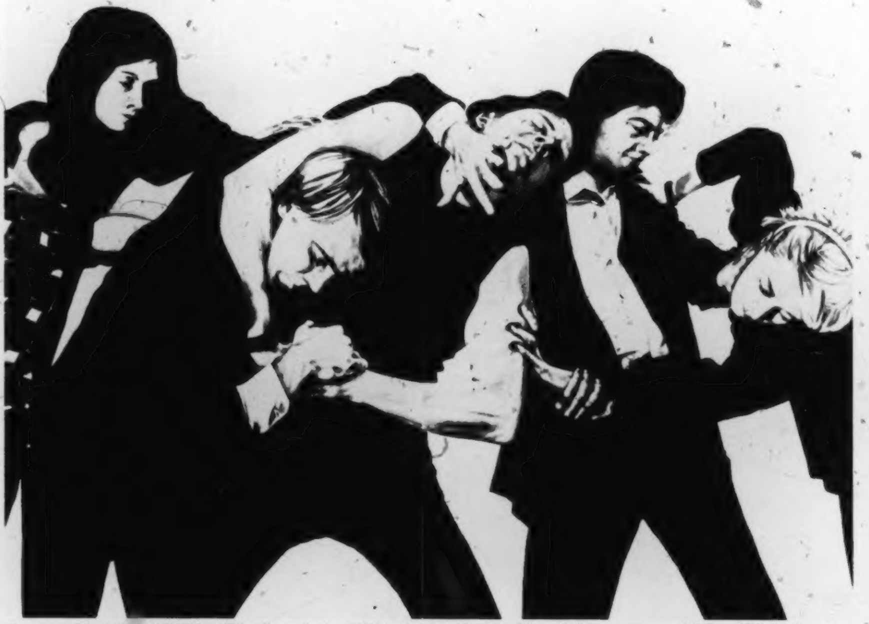
Continued from page 149

Czar Nicholas II. With a detailed shot Eisenstein transforms this monument into an extraordinary symbol of power—which perfectly sets up the next scene when the people rush in and topple it. In one symbolic blow the old imperial and cultural orders fall. Today, however, such a "coup" of the political in the cultural seems romantic—heroic yes, but mostly as a film gesture. (In fact, Longo has written a film also titled Empire that contains a scene of monuments toppled—scripted precisely as "stock footage.")

Now for Longo to use old images like the statue—or elsewhere, old mediums like the relief—is troublesome, but it hardly means he is celebratory of state power or only nostalgic for its representations (any more than with the "stock footage" of toppled monuments is he merely cynical about the revolutionary project of modernism). Rather, Longo is fascinated by the illusions at work in both discourses—fascinated by the confidence both of the state in its power (represented in the statue) and of the opposition in its truth (represented by the statue toppled). For in this regard the two sides are really of the same coin: they both invest in representation. To Longo, it seems, such investment is naive: in our world of diffuse subjection and delirious simulation, how can one hold to such models of power and truth?

The answer seems evident: in the authority of these representations is concealed a fear—about a lack of authority, a loss of reality. And this is what Longo explores in nearly all the new work: how, faced with this loss, our culture resurrects—morbidly, hysterically—archaic forms (here, the statue may stand for Presidential clichés about America, priestly adages about religion and family, etc.) in order to recover at least the image of authority or a sense of the real. For "it is no longer a question of a false representation of reality (ideology), it is a question of concealing that the real is no longer the real, and thus of saving the principle of reality."[10]

Longo first juxtaposed drawings and reliefs in the 1978–82 series "Men in the Cities" [see A.i.A., March '81], huge charcoal and graphite images of one, or occasionally two, contorted figures (later, women were added as well), set on the wall next to aluminum reliefs, usually of New York buildings distorted photographically. Critics responded to this work (all images were based on photographs) as representations that rendered the "activity of reference" problematic: what is the origin of these images? who are these men? what do the gestures mean? Longo spoke of them as "misplaced dramas"—as images they had no context, and as figures no narrative; one knew only that they were "men in the cities," subjects whose very nature was social. But the real interest was the violent gestures: not only how they were estheticized but how they were created—as if the figures were distorted by the photographic appropriation, by the very act of representation. For the "men in the cities" are wrenched in a perverse contrapposto—the humanist figure of man made grotesque.



Longo: Untitled ("White Riot" series), 1982, charcoal, graphite, ink on paper, 96 by 120 inches.

In time, Longo altered his format somewhat. In the huge "White Riot" drawings (1981–83), the images, horizontally disposed, are no longer of simple figures and "misplaced dramas" but of groups of young whites (of all sorts: punk, preppy, workers, execs) entangled in a "riot," locked into a narrative. The latest drawings and reliefs are likewise compositional: in them Longo has either composed several figures or "collided" public mediums (like relief and statuary). Representation is again the focus—but here understood less in terms of the activity of reference than in terms of the status of public representations.

In the immense Castelli space Longo deployed three huge works, all of them multipartite. Corporate Wars: Walls of Influence is a relief triptych with a battle royal of young business types cast in aluminum in the center and, as wings, high-relief depictions, in wood lacquered black, of two old skyscrapers (the one on the right is based on the New York Telephone building, the one on the left is a skyscraper "montage").

Love Police: Engines in Us (The Doors) consists of two huge busts, lacquered fire-engine red, set above a bronze relief of auto wreckage and flanked by four kids (one kid per panel, two panels on either side). And finally, at the end of the gallery is Noweverybody (For R.W. Fassbinder), an immense four-panel drawing of a rubble-strewn street with a contorted life-size bronze figure (described by Longo as the paradigmatic "man in the city") set out about 15 feet from the left panel. These three works, based like all Longo images on photographs, can be read singly or as an ensemble—a procession of public representations.

The two buildings in Corporate Wars jut up and out like props for an expressionist film. We seem to see the one on the left from its base and the one on the right from its top—both we and it are about to fall. The reliefs thus mime the classic syndrome of modern city life: oppression and vertigo. But Longo's city is not Kafka's or even Lang's: as is clear from these glossy relief surfaces, it trades in seduction and thrill, not estrangement and fear: which suggests a note of parody in Corporate Wars.

The parody is clear in the center relief, a portrait of 18 young male and female MBAs in suits, all scratching and slugging away—a "white riot" turned "corporate war." A parody of corporate order, this relief also mocks the neat success story of the "ones on top." Such "history" is traditionally represented in relief either in a "pregnant moment" or as an orderly procession, the ritual narrative of the state. Here Longo uses the relief form perversely, to expose what such history usually conceals—intra-class conflict.

But just as Longo mocks the relief medium, he makes fun of this theme, for to depict such struggle in mythic form is to render it a bit absurd. Clearly here, lived experience has once again eluded representation—which leads to two further thoughts: how difficult we find it today to

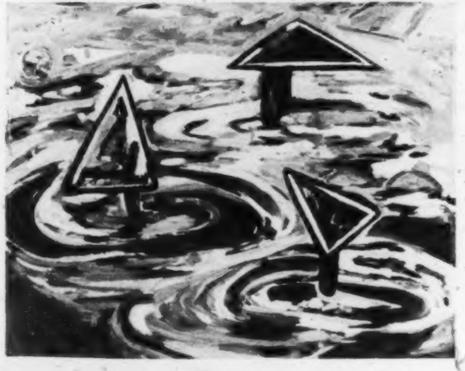
VOL
7
1
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

RENAULT RECHERCHES ART ET INDUSTRIES
CENTRE INTERNATIONAL DE CREATION ARTISTIQUE

LIGA PANG

Paintings 1980 - 1983
March 20 - May 2, 1983
Opening Sunday March 20 from 5 to 7:30 p.m.
ABBAYE DE SENANQUE - 84 GORDES

LINDA SCHONFELD

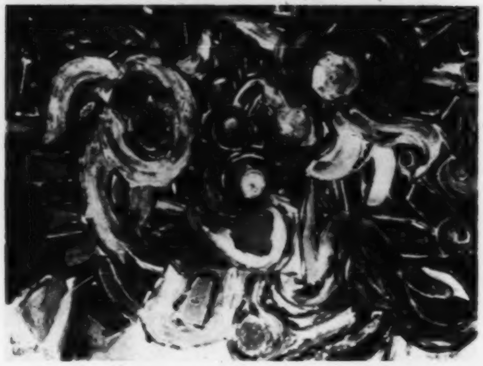


APRIL 5-24

Pleiades Gallery

164 Mercer St.
New York, N.Y. 10012
212-226-9093

LILLIAN LEVINE



April 5 - April 23
SPRING FESTIVAL

Amaral
Appel
Bearden
Chermayeff
Guay
Katz
Knauss
Lester
O'Hara
Schreiber
Stamos
Utterback

MODERN MASTER TAPESTRIES INC.
11 East 57th St., N.Y. 10022. (212) 838-0412. Tues.–Sat., 9:30–5:30.

JON LEON GALLERY

Spirit Catchers
by
Richard Mock

April 20-May 28

31 Desbrosses St. New York City 226-7789
Open Saturday 12 to 6 pm. Other Days by Appointment Only

PRINTWORLD

☐ 10,000 print listings
☐ 800 top artists profiles
☐ 600 photos ☐ 600 pages

NEW WORK IN PROGRESS!!!!

PRINTWORLD DIRECTORY is unique! It is the only print/price catalog with complete documentation of limited edition prints.

PRINTWORLD DIRECTORY quotes the market price of current & sold out editions. It also lists awards, exhibits, publishers, etc.

Pre-publication offer ends April 30, 1983. Money-back guarantee if not completely satisfied.

1983-84 PRINTWORLD DIRECTORY

PRINTWORLD DIRECTORY is a "must" reference for anyone actively involved in the print marketplace . . . an invaluable guide for galleries, collectors, appraisers, collectors, libraries, etc. Send for your copy today! Save!

COVER PRICE $49.95 Postage/Handling: $5. USA—$10. Outside USA
PRE-PUB PRICE $35.00 NAME
1982 EDITION $35.00 ADDRESS
VISA/MC # EXP

P.O. Box 785 • Bala Cynwyd, PA 19004 (215) 649-5140

image forth our present reality ("the radically different industrial dynamic of the computer, of nuclear energy and of the media"[11]); and how dangerous it is that we rely on archaic representations. (Can we really think of multinational affairs in terms of corporate "wars"—or of nuclear superpowers in terms of 19th-century nation states?) Longo participates in this archaism, but I think he does so deliberately—as if to rehearse the obsolescence of our thought, the inadequacy of our representations.

This, in any case, is how I read his revival of old forms like relief and statuary—as a "bombasting" of our new-old public myths. For Corporate Wars is an outrageous use of medium and myth: here we are very far from the modernist enterprise of "truth to materials" and "essence of the medium"—far, even, from the modern use of myth as order imposed on the chaos of contemporaneity (the famous T.S. Eliot dictum about Ulysses). Longo's is not this serious modern reference as subtle allusion (he uses relief unabashedly). Nor is his the flagrant antimodern reference, found in much contemporary art and architecture, used to resurrect old values (if Longo quotes past art at all, it is only to collide it with a contemporary form—a movie or magazine image, say). Indeed, in Longo's use of reference there is no truth-value at all: his is a mystification so outrageous as to demystify (corporate wars as a Roman frieze? come on), as to provoke us perhaps to think about the "neutrality" of these traditional forms, the uses of these public representations both in the past and now. After all, "what liberates metaphor, symbol, emblem from poetic mania, what manifests its power of subversion, is the preposterous."[12]

Love Police: Engines in Us (The Doors), the next station in this passion of public forms, is also a triptych of sorts: a stack of wrecked cars in bronze relief "guarded" by the male and female busts and at the sides by the four portraits (again, all based on photos). Longo refers to the bronze relief as The Doors, perhaps with the Rodin Gates of Hell and its antecedents in mind. But again, a rhetorical collision of representations, not an art-historical connection, is the operation here. The Doors portray junk, not a Last Judgment—in precious bronze an image of scrap metal, in the medium of history a representation of commodity-debris.

Junked autos enshrined as art: in a way this reverses John Chamberlain's "transgressive" strategy, for this relief is about reclamation. It reads as a parody of art not only as alchemy (dross turned into bronze) but also as appropriation, for what is reclaimed is the pure commodity—the car. The car is used here as a figure (not a dadaist material), a historical figure—the primary product of monopoly capitalism. Perhaps then The Doors does stand as a monument—to an empire of production and waste, a "wasted" empire for which, in the words of Henry Ford, "history is bunk."

Above this empire preside the two huge red busts, the Love Police. But what precisely do they represent? The man is cast in a quasi-social-realist style at its most bombastic: stern, head averted, arms folded, he could be either a Soviet worker-hero or a macho American male. In either role the woman mocks him, mocks the patriarchal order of which he is the figurehead. Hand cockily at his neck, she rears back, laughing, roaring. But is she a form of the new cultural thematic, "the revolutionary power of women's laughter"—or simply the old model of the "mad woman"? It is unclear. But clearly, the "love police" evokes the "thought police" of Orwell's 1984. Here again Longo raises the issue of fascinating fascism. ("He gazed up at the enormous face . . . But it was all right, the struggle was finished. He loved Big Brother.") Yet even this thematic of complicity with authority seems dated; even this representation of the future seems obsolete (1984 is next year). Again, we see how difficult it is to represent our social reality, how archaic our images (even of the future) have become.

The four huge portraits depict, on the left, a white boy and an Oriental girl, and on the right, a black boy and a white girl. They also question our representations of social reality as "mythological." Here is the image, one would think, of the many as one, of the Family of Man, an image that seems democratic but is potentially dystopian, for the Family of Man is really a benign version of the society of 1984: both operate on the suppression of difference or its reduction to stereotype. But these portraits oppose such suppression: pressed up against the frame, each kid threatens us (the white boy actively, the black by his cool reserve). Each almost defies his representation; each, finally, insists on difference, refuses to be seen either as "our child" or as our other.

Noweverybody (For R.W. Fassbinder),[13] a four-panel drawing of a bombed street, explores the contradictions of public representation today. The title suggests an apocalypse in which everyone is represented, but the image is of a public evacuated, if not destroyed. (The street resembles bombed West Beirut: the rubble that tumbles out to the right seems so out of place on this modern avenue of apartments and hotels.) There is, however, one figure in the work—a bronze statue, a "man in the city," posed in violent contrapposto and set out into our space. Here again Longo plays with the hierarchy of representations: the historical scene (Beirut) in a charcoal drawing, the anonymous man in fine bronze. Thus we cannot quite specify what site or space this is—real, esthetic, simulated, or all three? The man is not only out of context (the street), he is in another realm entirely. Reality and representation, cause and effect begin to slip and slide (in a way that recalls the delirious reversals of context and character in Gravity's Rainbow).

The public representation here is not the traditional statue or relief but a documentary image of Beirut. Yet such is the status of public representation today (e.g., images in Time and Newsweek), and such is the status of the public—a diffuse mass mediated by these images. Noweverybody suggests the ironies of this: not only that photography (especially "documentary") is privileged as the public medium, but also that the public now knows of "everybody" (i.e., the world and itself) through such images. This renders the absence in this street strangely appropriate: an historical scene "without a subject." (One recalls the Straub/Huillet film History Lessons, a search for the lost site of history—a circling around a vacated center.) But there is another absence at work here too. This "documentary" image of Beirut is not documentary at all (Longo based the drawing on four different photos). Reality here is a construct (which makes one wonder how the images are processed in, say, The New York Times), a reality that, on the one hand, never existed and, on the other, was "already written," constructed by the code of what documentary truth looks like.

These speculations lead one, finally, to the economy of such images and events today: not only how such images function, in a discourse of "crisis," to reinject a sense of the real into our lives (which is why images of war are so privileged) but also how such events often seem to be produced in advance as media spectacles (whose importance is judged in terms of "effect" or "impact"). One is confronted with the spectacle of events produced so as to be *re*produced as images and sold—of a history first scripted, then translated into pseudo-historical simulations to be consumed. This is why such images are so profuse and ephemeral: they must not slow down consumption and so must relegate each new event to the "used" (the superficially known, the already familiar). Indeed, this often seems the function of such spectacular representations: to use up events, to erase them in an oblivion of overexposure—or, as Guy Debord writes, "to make history forgotten within culture."

Longo uses the notions in Noweverybody—of effects without causes, of an image that usurps its original—throughout his spectacle. Two of the four drawings and reliefs at Metro Pictures, for example, derive from the film Empire, written by Longo but not yet made. In these works Longo continues to reframe and collide representations. This is seen most clearly in Culture Culture, a two-panel work with a painting of an equestrian statue (the same as in the poster) on the left, and a drawing (tinted dark red) of an older man on the phone on the right. In a sense, the headless statue and the head of the man "fit" as emblems of two cultures in a "history of victors." (Perhaps we see the man, in a desperate hour, summon up an old sign of power.) But as representations, the two images collide—painting versus photo-based drawing, historical versus contemporary sign.

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

ConStruct
SCULPTURE
Mark di Suvero
Linda Fleming
Charles Ginnever
John Henry
Linda Howard
Lyman Kipp
Frank McGuire
Jerry Peart

101 N. Wacker Drive / Suite 235
Chicago, Illinois 60606
312 . 853 . 1125

ConStruct South
12100 NE 16th Avenue
North Miami, Florida 33161
305 . 891 . 0183

H. TOMIHARI WOODCUTS

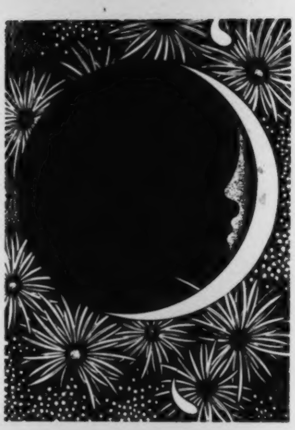
WESTON PRESS & GALLERY
45 E 7 St NYC 212/598 4897



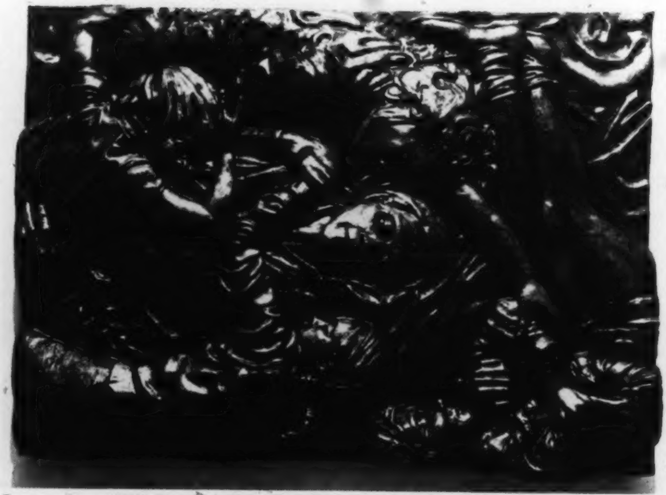
JON BECKLEY RICHARD BRUNKUS

NEW WORK

MIRIAM PERLMAN
Lake Point Tower 505 N. Lake Shore Drive Suite 5410 Chicago

NIMSLO 3-DIMENSIONAL PHOTOGRAPHY
First U.S. Exhibit
by Leading Artists and Photographers
April 13-May 4, 1983
CASTELLI GRAPHICS
43 West 61st Street, New York, N.Y. 10023

This is not the case in Love Will Tear Us Up (The Sleep), a bronze relief of a family of five coiled asleep, which uses representation in another way. Here Longo does fit form to content, subject to medium—but not without reason. For the esthetic archaism of the relief is used here to pronounce the social archaism of the nuclear family, or so it seems: The Sleep is like a familial memorial, a death mask found in some contemporary Pompeii.



Longo:* Love Will Tear Us Up (The Sleep), *1982, bronze, 47 ¾ inches high.

Old social forms, old esthetic forms: Longo gets at this relation and others through relief, a medium that presupposes that experience can be narrated rationally and causally;[14] it traditionally presents history as a stage (Hildebrand's "one simple plane"). With Rodin, this clear narrative is occluded by a surface roughened by gesture and process. Now, with Longo, this obsession with surface becomes a fascination with simulation: from the opaque, subjective forms of Rodin one passes to the cool, glossy finish of seduction. This is not an historical passage: Longo's are not reliefs in any historical sense at all: he uses the medium (long denounced by modernists) perversely—as a figure of archaism, on the one hand, and, on the other, as a means (given its mix of literal and virtual space) to evoke our own hyperreal world where objects and representations are often confused, "a universe everywhere strangely similar to the original—where things are overtaken, duplicated by their own scenario."[15]

One persistent criticism of Longo is that his is an art of sheer style, concerned only with "look"—a criticism that suggests that we can somehow be free of our own culture, for ours is a culture of seduction, of thrill. Now, to be seduced is to be at once lured and excluded by a false image of perfection: such, I think, is the mechanism of these Longo reliefs. But this "cult of the glossy image" goes beyond seduction, as Fredric Jameson has recently noted:

> . . . the silence of affect in postmodernism is doubled with a new gratification in surfaces and accompanied by a whole new ground tone in which the pathos of high modernism has been inverted into a strange new exhilaration, the high, the intensité. . . .[16]

This intensité, he implies, is symptomatic of a cultural "schizophrenia," a state that we witness chiefly as a breakdown in our sense of time—with the result that the present rises before us in the ultravivid mode of fascination. But this fascination, Jameson insists, is experienced as a loss, an unreality.[17]

Such notions corroborate others noted in Longo's work: the inadequacy of our historical representations ("a breakdown in our sense of time"), our inability to imagine the "unreal" present. This inability is due largely to the fact that our world is partly unreal. We cannot represent a simulated world precisely because simulation undoes representation. (Representation is based on a principle of equivalence between signs and the real; in simulation, however, the signs precede, posit the real).[18] In such a world of loss and unreality, it is almost to be expected that nostalgia would consume us—a nostalgia for representation (in an age of simulation), a nostalgia for realist art (in an age of "schizo" subjectivity), a nostalgia for monuments (in an age of information), a nostalgia even for spectacle (for the spectacle implies at least some scene, some place). Longo participates in nostalgia just as he participates in fascination—but he is also able to reframe it in order to suggest how it works. Now we may be ambivalent about this enterprise—the way his hyperreal images dessicate the "desert of the real" all the more, the way Longo too may be consumed by spectacle, convinced by the very signs of power that he simulates. But as it is now, he reflects for us in these seductive works two important cultural "truths": that "simulation is the master, and nostalgia, the phantasmal, parodic rehabilitation of all lost frames of reference, is our just desserts."[19] □

---

1. This two-gallery show was in fact a spectacle, for it seemed designed for a total effect (including media reproductions, art-world repercussions, etc.) in excess of the objects (and the viewer). Walter Benjamin wrote famously of "cult value" (art as a ritual instrument) and of "exchange value" (art as precisely work). Perhaps now we will have to talk about "spectacle value": art as a pretext for images, as an occasion, an event, and its new mode—fascination. This is not a neutral term: "the spectacle," as Guy Debord writes in The Society of the Spectacle, "is the guardian of sleep."
2. This is essentially a sociological elaboration of a basic tenet of structural linguistics—that signifiers refer to signifieds, not to referents in the world. On the "loss of the real" and fascism, see Jean Baudrillard, Simulacres et simulation, Paris, Editions Galilée, 1981, pp. 69–76.
3. For Freud the fetish has to do with trauma, specifically the trauma of the infant upon the discovery of sexual difference. It intervenes as a way to block the traumatic fact; it does not matter what the fetish is, but it is often the last thing seen before the event. Thus, if our trauma is the loss of the real, our fetish period—fascism.
4. Syberberg, for example, in Our Hitler, sees Hitler at once as "the final attempt of Europe to realize itself through its ancient traditions" and as "the greatest filmmaker of the 20th century."
5. Baudrillard, p. 20.
6. Much of the information in this text is based on conversations with the artist. Program notes for Empire are published in Wedge, Summer 1982; also see the fine essay on the performance by Brian Wallis in the same issue. Longo has since added another piece to the Empire cycle called "Iron Voices" with music by Peter Gordon. If "Empire" simulates social chaos, "Iron Voices" simulates an authoritarian "return to order."
7. "Sound Distance" corroborates this note of Debord: "The spectacle in general, as the concrete inversion of life, is the autonomous movement of the nonliving."
8. The filmed image in "Sound Distance" is a photomontage, one aspect of which is a photo of a man mimicking a Longo relief, which in turn is based on a newspaper photo of a fragment from the Fassbinder film The American Soldier. Here, representation is cast en abime: it is impossible to locate any sure origin or referent for the image.
9. See Rosalind Krauss, Passages in Modern Sculpture, Cambridge, MIT Press, 1977, p. 7.
10. Baudrillard, p. 26.
11. Fredric Jameson, "Diva," Social Text, Winter 1983.
12. Roland Barthes by Roland Barthes, New York, Hill & Wang, p. 81.
13. Obviously, Fassbinder is a major influence on Longo. They share, for example, a cult of style, a fascination with fascism, and an interest in nostalgia, melodrama and simulations (and their relation to capitalism).
14. See Krauss, pp. 7-37.
15. Baudrillard, p. 24.
16. Jameson.
17. See Fredric Jameson, "Postmodernism and Consumer Society," The Anti-Esthetic: Essays on Postmodern Culture, ed. Hal Foster, Bay Press (forthcoming, September 1983).
18. See Baudrillard, p. 16.
19. Baudrillard, p. 66.

VOL 7 1 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

JAMES CASWELL

New Works

April 9 - May 7, 1983

GARTH CLARK GALLERY
5820 Wilshire Blvd Los Angeles 90036
(213) 939 2189

TEXAS GALLERY

February
Matt Mullican

March
Alex Katz

April
Gary Stephan

May
Joe Zucker

June
William Wegman

2012 Peden • Houston • Texas • 77019

ALICE AYCOCK

JUN KANEKO

March 26–April 23

KLEIN GALLERY

356 WEST HURON, CHICAGO, IL 60610
312/787-0400

MARGIE HUGHTO
NEW WORKS IN CLAY & PAPER

TOM McGLAUCHLIN
NEW WORKS IN GLASS

APRIL 2-APRIL 23, 1983

B.Z. WAGMAN GALLERY
34 NORTH BRENTWOOD
ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI 63105
(314) 721-0250

Brentwood Gallery

The Pacific Northwest Today January

Tom Rippon February

Leon Anderson March

The Southwest Now April

1221 South Brentwood Boulevard
Saint Louis, Missouri 63117
(314) 863-0808

---

april

FROM LOS ANGELES

the eason gallery

338 east de vargas
santa fe, nm 87501
(505) 982-9573

INSURANCE SPECIALISTS TO THE ART WORLD

GALLERIES · COLLECTORS ·
MUSEUMS · PUBLISHERS ·
AUCTION HOUSES ·

GREAT NORTHERN BROKERAGE CORP.

INQUIRIES INVITED

CONTACT: NORMAN NEWMAN OR LARRY MORREALE
950 THIRD AVENUE NEW YORK, N.Y. 10022 (212)371-2800
TWX 710-581-2250 CABLE: GREATNORTH NEW YORK

BERLIN-COLOGNE
APRIL 9 - MAY 3, 1983

LUCIANO CASTELLI
RANIER FETTING
HELMUT MIDDENDORF
SALOMÉ
BERND ZIMMER

●

PETER BÖMMELS
WALTER DAHN
JIRI GEORG DOKOUPIL
GERHARD NASCHBERGER

BONLOW GALLERY
JEANETTE BONNIER
150 GREENE STREET, NY, NY 10012
[212] 925-4482

VOL 7 1
ISS 4
A P 1983
UMI

ARTRANSPORT INC.
800-336-4772

Photo: GARRISON

Fine Arts at Visual Arts this Summer

Painting in New York

A UNIQUE OPPORTUNITY FOR INTENSIVE WORK AND CRITIQUE IN PRIVATE STUDIO SPACE.

FIRST SESSION: JUNE 6–JULY 1 SECOND SESSION: JULY 5–JULY 30

FACULTY	FACULTY
BRUCE BOICE	SUSAN HALL
LOUISA CHASE	LUCIO POZZI
JUDY PFAFF	MAY STEVENS
DAVID REED	LYNTON WELLS

Summer Sculpture Workshops

METAL SCULPTURE WORKSHOP
JOEL PERLMAN JUNE 6–JUNE 17

WOOD SCULPTURE WORKSHOP
ALICE ADAMS JUNE 20–JULY 1

CASTING WORKSHOP
ARTHUR SCHADE JULY 11–JULY 22

SCHOOL OF
VISUAL ARTS
209 EAST 23RD STREET, NEW YORK, N.Y. 10010, (212) 683-0600

Chautauqua '83 Summer Scholarships, $125,000 available!

Be part of the Chautauqua experience this summer. Study and exhibit at the Chautauqua Art Center with the finest professionals. After studies enjoy exhibits, concerts, opera, popular entertainers, plays and all the fun a lakeside resort implies. Full term programs (June 27-August 19) in the art center facilities.

Robert Gilson, Coordinator.

Apply now! Portfolio reviews now in progress.
1983 Summer Scholarships awarded by application and portfolio.

Chautauqua W
Rush information about the Art Center.
Name __________
Address __________
City __________ State __________ Zip __________
Chautauqua Institution, Schools Office
1243 Colonnade Bldg., Chautauqua, NY 14722

NEW ART INSTRUCTION BOOKS

KEYS TO acrylics & watercolor

At last, an up-to-date, contemporary library of art instruction. These books represent the collective efforts of one of the largest, most talented professional art staffs in the country—over 250 artists and designers.

Written and illustrated for ease of understanding, this series not only covers the basics, but reveals professional secrets to ease the trial and error period experienced by the amateur and semi-professional. And each book is loaded with color.

Books included in this series are: Basic Drawing, Color, Perspective, Still Life, Animal Drawing, Portraits, Floral Painting, Seascapes, Landscapes, Oil Painting, Sketching, and Acrylic and Watercolor. Now there is a better way. High quality at a great price. Suggested retail—$2.99 each.

Prepared by The Skylight Division of shiva®
4320 West 190th Street, Torrance, CA 90509 • (800) 421-1325/(213) 542-5583

ART SERVICES

ADVERTISING AGENCIES

WEBB DESIGN STUDIO/TAOS Circle No. 1
501 Ranchitos Road
Taos, NM 87571 (505) 758-3447
Graphic design to promote the arts: exhibition catalogues, brochures, advertisements, quality color postcards.

APPRAISERS

AUDREY REAL HELFAND Circle No. 2
945 Fifth Avenue Member: I.S.A.
New York, NY 10021 (212) 535-5972
Appraiser of European and American Fine Arts
For Insurance, Gift-Tax, Property Division, and Estates.

MARK KESHISHIAN AND SONS, INC. Circle No. 3
6930 Wisconsin Avenue, Chevy Chase, MD 20815 (301) 654-4044
836 Rockville Pike, Rockville, MD 20852 (301) 340-6666
James M. Keshishian, A.S.A., Harold M. Keshishian, Appraisal, Cleaning, Restoration and Sale of Oriental Rugs.

KELVYN G. LILLEY AND ASSOCIATES, INC. 4
620 North Michigan Ave., Suite 520
Chicago, IL 60611 (312) 787-0985
Fine and Decorative Arts, Appraisals and Consultations.
Over 15 yrs Exp. Recognized by Major Insurance Companies.

L. McADOO PROFESSIONAL APPRAISERS 5
503 Canyon Road
Santa Fe, NM 87501 (505) 984-0152
Fine Art and personal property appraisals.
Member of Int'l Society of Appraisers.

PIERCE GALLERIES, INC. Circle No. 6
721 Main St. Route 228
Hingham, MA 02043 (617) 749-6023
19th and Early 20th Century American Art.
By Appointment Only.

TUCKER APPRAISAL ASSOCIATES Circle No. 7
River Oaks Shopping Center
Houston, TX 77019 (713) 529-8878
Independent Appraisers, Fine Art Only. We do not buy or sell.
Mrs. Sally Tucker, Member: A.S.A., I.S.A., I.S.F.A.

ART BOOKS

WILLIAM AND VICTORIA DAILEY, LTD. 8
8216 Melrose Avenue
Los Angeles, CA 90046 (213) 658-8515
Art reference, catalogues raisonnes, illustrated & rare books, 19th & 20th century graphics. Catalogues issued.

ART CONSULTANTS

ANN H. BISSELL Circle No. 9
2844 Wisconsin Avenue, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20007 (202) 363-2867
Art Installation, Lighting Design and Framing on a Consulting Basis.

COLSON SCULPTURE SERVICE INT'L Circle No. 10
1375 5th Street
Sarasota, FL 33579 (813) 365-3818, 953-5892
Ceramics Shell Sculpture Casting Set-up and Related Information.

CONTEMPORARY ART CONSULTANTS Circle No. 11
393 North Euclid Avenue
St. Louis, MO 63108 (314) 361-5110
Consultants to Corporations, Designers, Architects and Private Collectors.

DURHAM & ASSOCIATES Circle No. 12
Division of Linda Durham Gallery, 400 Canyon Rd. Ste. B
Santa Fe, NM 87501 (505) 988-1313
Specializing in Gallery formation/development. Professional Consultation on technical, promotional, artistic concerns.

GALLERY MACK NW Circle No. 13
123 South Jackson, Seattle, WA 98104
Lynn McAllister, Ph.D., Director, (206) 623-1414
Art advisors to Corporations, Architects, Designers & Private Investors. Fine Art for Business Space.

FRANZ VILA Circle No. 14
24 East 97th Street, Apt. 20
New York, NY 10029 (212) 410-1702
Advisory Critique for Collectors, Galleries & Artists.
Analysis & Evaluation of Research & Art Education.

ART POSTERS

LINCOLN CENTER GALLERY Circle No. 15
65th Street and Broadway, Concourse Level
New York, NY 10023 (212) 877-1800
Lincoln Center/List Collection, serigraph prints and posters by contemporary artists.

ART SUPPLIES

THE ART STORE Circle No. 16
7200 West Beverly Blvd.
Los Angeles, CA 90036 (213) 933-9284
Quality artist material; save 10% to 30% off manufacturer's list.

ARTHUR BROWN & BRO., INC Circle No. 17
2 West 46 Street
New York, NY 10036 (212) 575-5555
America's Largest Art Materials Distributor.
Home of the International Pen Shop.

EASTERN ARTISTS & DRAFTING MATERIALS 18
352 Park Avenue South
New York, NY 10010 (212) 725-5555
Everything for the Artist, Draftsman, Photo-Studio at 20% to 50% off list.

GRUMBACHER Circle No. 19
460 West 34th Street
New York, NY 10001 (212) 279-6400
Fine quality art materials since 1905.
See what our art can do for yours.

JERRY'S ARTARAMA, INC. Circle No. 20
248-12X Union Turnpike
Bellerose, NY 11426
Huge savings on art materials and picture frames.

KENNETH LYNCH & SONS Circle No. 21
Box 488, Wilton, CT 06897 (203) 762-8363
Picture hanging rods, mouldings, security devices, stanchions, vitrines, art storage racks, gallery carts, tablets, and plaques. FREE CATALOG.

RISING PAPER COMPANY Circle No. 22
Dennis M. O'Connor
Housatonic, MA 01236 (413) 274-3345
Manufacturers of Mirage, Dansk, Stonehenge, and more. Now in pads.

THE SAINT ARMAND PAPER MILL, INC. Circle No. 23
110 Young
Montreal, Canada H3C 2E7 (514) 935-7526
Finest Linen watercolor papers.
22x30, 300 lbs., $7.50/sheet: samples.

Continued

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

ART SERVICES

SELWYN TEXTILE COMPANY INC. Circle No. 24
15 West 38th Street
New York, NY 10018 (212) 921-9355
Direct source linen and cotton UNPRIMED ARTIST'S CANVAS. No minimum yardage requirements. Send for Free Samples.

SHIVA® INC. Circle No. 25
4320 West 190th Street
Torrance, CA 90509 (213) 542-5583
Artists PAINTSTIK®, solid oil paint in stick form.
Call (800) 421-1325

UTRECHT Circle No. 26
33 Thirty-Fifth Street
Brooklyn, NY 11232 (212) 768-2525
Major Manufacturer & Distributor of Art & Drafting Supplies at Impressive Savings. Free Catalog.

WINSOR & NEWTON Circle No. 27
555 Winsor Drive
Secaucus, NJ 07094
Manufacturers of the world's finest artists' materials since 1832.

ART WANTED

GALLERY RSVP Circle No. 28
218 West Main, Charlottesville, VA 22901 (804) 977-RSVP
Artist: Exhibition Space Available in new High Quality Fine Arts Sales & Exhibition Gallery. All Media. Send Slides and include S.A.S.E. to Colleen Later.

DISPLAY RACKS

ALUMNAL ART PRODUCTS Circle No. 29
P.O. Box 227
Woodmire, NY 11598 (516) 694-3030
Gridlock, lightweight, abrasion resistant, nylon-coated, Display Racks. 3' × 6'. Field tested. Free Brochure.

EXHIBITION CATALOGUES

WORLDWIDE BOOKS Circle No. 30
Brian Gold 37 Antwerp Street
Boston, MA 02135 (617) 787-9100
The foremost specialist in Int'l Art Exhibition Catalogues since 1960.

FINE ART PHOTOGRAPHERS

THOMAS MOON PHOTOGRAPHY Circle No. 31
1 Holden Street
Brookline, MA 02146 (617) 232-8044
Photography Services for the Fine Arts. Black & White, Color, INFRARED. Print or Transparency. All formats.

FINE ART PRINTERS

COLOR Q AFFORDABLE FINE ART REPRODUCTIONS Circle No. 32
2835 Springboro Dayton OH 45439 (513) 294-0406
Get your FREE booklet: "How to gain wider recognition for your artistry, and make more money, too."

CINDI ETTINGER Circle No. 33
142 Vine Street
Philadelphia, PA 19106 (215) 928-9897
Printing Services, Instruction and Plate Restoration.
Will Collaborate with Artist.

FINE ART PUBLISHERS

GONDECK GALLERY AND PUBLISHER Circle No. 34
211 Old Santa Fe Trail
Santa Fe, NM 87501 (505) 988-3580
Original Graphics, Lithographs, Serigraphs, etchings of contemp. Indian artists. Specializing in Kevin Red Star.

FINE ART TRAVEL

ART EXPLORER'S TOURS Circle No. 35
P.O. Box 26689-P, San Francisco, CA 94126 (415) 921-7677
1983: China-May/Africa-Aug./Sao Paulo Biennale-Oct.
1984: New Guinea-March/Scandinavia-June/Venice Biennale-Sept.

FINNAIR ART TOURS Circle No. 36
George Garber, 10 East 40th St.
New York, NY 10016 (212) 689-9300
Send for free brochure "Fine Art Tours". Tours operate year-round & can be tailored for fund raising/study groups.

FOUNDRIES/FABRICATORS

JOHNSON ATELIER TECH. INSTITUTE Circle No. 37
Jim Barton, 743 Alexander Road
Princeton, NJ 08540 (609) 452-2661
Bronze, Aluminum, Stainless Steel, Ductile Iron: Sand Molding-Ceramic Shell, Rubber Molds. Bronze Repair & Repatina

KENNETH LYNCH & SONS Circle No. 38
Box 488, Wilton, CT 06897
(203) 762-8363
Casting in bronze, lead, or stone, also fabricating large art work of copper or bronze sheets repousse.

MATTHEWS CLASSIC BRONZE DIVISION 39
2230 North Chico Avenue
South El Monte, CA 91733 (213) 444-0468
Our lost wax casting capabilities assure the quality and fidelity of your art. Contact Mel Schelbauer.

JOEL MEISNER FOUNDRY & GALLERY Circle No. 40
120 Fairchild Avenue
Plainview, NY 11803 (516) 349-0260, (212) 895-1472
THE COMPLETE CENTER FOR BRONZE SCULPTURE: for the Sculptor . . . for the Collector . . . for the Art Dealer & Publisher.

HANGING & DISPLAY EQUIPMENT

KENNETH LYNCH & SONS Circle No. 49
Box 488, Wilton, CT 06897
(203) 762-8363
The famous Lynch picture rods made of stainless steel have been the standard in galleries for 100 years. Send for FREE CATALOG.

ART SERVICES

WALKER SYSTEMS, INC. Circle No. 50
530 South 21 Avenue East
Duluth, MN 55812 (218) 728-4434
Picture Hanging Devices (Rails, Rods, Hooks, Holders)
Panel Hardware for freestanding displays & exhibits.

INSURANCE

FLATHER & HAYES COMPANY, INC. Circle No. 51
888 Seventeenth Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20006
(202) 466-8888
Fine arts insurance for collectors and dealers.

GREAT NORTHERN BROKERAGE CORP. 52
Norman Newman or Larry Morreale
950 Third Ave
New York, NY 10022 (212) 371-2800
Insurance Specialists to the Art World.

MOVERS AND PACKERS

ARTRANSPORT, INC. Circle No. 53
2706 S. Nelson Street
Arlington, VA 22206 (800) 336-4772
Climate-controlled nationwide art shuttle. Professional handling. Exclusive use transportation available.

L.A. PACKING AND CRATING Circle No. 54
5852 West Adams Blvd.
Culver City, CA 90230 (213) 933-5602
Specialist in Packing, Crating, Installing, Warehousing, Shipping Fine Art and Antiques. Jim Isenson.

PRO-PAK PROFESSIONAL PACKERS, INC.® 55
527 Dundee Road
Northbrook, IL 60062 (312) 272-0408
Fine Arts Packing, Crating and Shipping Specialists. Pick-up and Delivery Service. Full Insurance Coverage.

RESTORERS

THE TOMSICH ART GALLERIES LTD. Circle No. 56
11916 Manchester Road
St. Louis, MO 63131 (314) 966-6777
Conservation of Oil Paintings, Art on Paper, Framing conservation. Appraisals.

FRAMERS

AESTHETIC FRAME DESIGN Circle No. 41
800 Traction Avenue
Los Angeles, CA 90013 (213) 680-4710
Wholesale Custom Framing Specializing in Archival Presentation for Artists, Galleries, Museums, Consultants.

ARTISTS' FRAME SERVICE INC. Circle No. 42
1919 North Clybourn
Chicago, IL 60614 (312) 248-7713
Wholesale custom framing and supply. 80 metal, 200 wood styles, mat board, museum board. Fast professional service.

JACK BARNETT CUSTOM FRAMES Circle No. 43
144 North Second Street
Philadelphia, PA 19106 (215) 629-1766
Specializing in Molded Plexi Frames, U.F.3. Fully Rounded Leaf Frames, Complete Frame Restoration.

BRADIN CUSTOM FRAMING Circle No. 44
3646 South Westshore Blvd.
Tampa, FL 33609 (813) 837-5916
Archival Framing, Nielson Metal Molding for Artists, Designers. Wood Frames. Wholesale.

GREY GOOSE CUSTOM FRAMING Circle No. 45
5046 West Pico Blvd.
Los Angeles, CA 90019 (213) 938-6795
Art Framing to Museum Standards. Plexiglass, Aluminum, Brass, Hardwood. Wholesale.

MARK L.V. FRAMES Circle No. 46
330 Hudson Street
New York, NY 10013 (212) 620-0522
Museum Quality Custom Framing.
Poster Mountings. Plexiboxes.

TURNER FRAMING Circle No. 47
7508 Leesburg Pike, Falls Church, VA 22043
Serving Washington D.C. Metropolitan Area
Excellence in Quality Custom Framing. Private Individual and Commercial Accounts.

WALLNUTS FRAME DESIGN Circle No. 48
2018 Locust Street
Philadelphia, PA 19103 (215) 732-8850
Design Consultants to PROFESSIONAL PICTURE FRAMERS ASSOC. Museum Matting, Exotic Woods, Acrylic Boxes, Pedestals.

To receive information from the companies listed, circle the corresponding number on the REPLY COUPON below, and drop it in an envelope. You will receive information directly from them.

Art in America
REPLY COUPON
Reader Service Dept., 850 Third Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10022

APRIL 1983
THIS COUPON EXPIRES
July 29, 1983

NAME (PLEASE PRINT) TELEPHONE
ADDRESS
CITY STATE ZIP

Art Services & Schools
▽ Please send information circled.

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15 16 17 18 19 20 21 22 23 24 25 26 27 28 29 30
31 32 33 34 35 36 37 38 39 40 41 42 43 44 45 46 47 48 49 50 51 52 53 54 55 56 57 58 59 60
61 62 63 64 65 66 67 68 69 70 71 72 73 74 75 76 77 78 79 80 81 82 83 84 85 86 87 88 89 90
91 92 93 94 95 96 97 98 99 100 101 102 103 104 105 106 107 108 109 110 111 112 113 114 115 116 117 118 119 120

ALLOW 6-8 WEEKS FOR DELIVERY

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
A P 1983
UMI

Art Books and Illustrated Books

Rare and scholarly books in all fields of the visual arts.

Important illustrated books from the fifteenth century to the present.

ars libri, ltd.

286 SUMMER STREET • BOSTON, MA 02210
(617) 357-5212
Mon.-Fri. 9 to 6 • Sat. 11 to 5

MARVIN KING ORIGINAL PERFORMANCES
OF NEW MUSIC, HARDWOOD CARVINGS AND VIDEO ILLUSTRATIONS ON VHS
30 min / 8 tunes / 107 pieces Signed Drawing and Cassette . . . $268.00
JANE-LEE VIDEO GALLERY . P.O. BOX 50014 AUSTIN, TEXAS 78763 512-476-2799

Dyansen Gallery
of SoHo
is proud to announce the opening of our new uptown gallery

Dyansen57

Dyansen SoHo
122 Spring Street, New York, NY 10012 •
(212) 226-1384

Dyansen 57
2nd Floor
11 East 57th Street, New York, NY 10022
(212) 486-7830

Catalog available upon request. Toll free: (800) 847-4234

DURHAM AND ASSOCIATES

Art Gallery Consultants specializing in gallery formation and development, offering professional consultation on technical, promotional and artistic concerns.

a division of

LINDA DURHAM GALLERY, SANTA FE

400 Canyon Road
Santa Fe, New Mexico 87501
505-988-1313

JOE GOODE

PAINTINGS
LITHOGRAPHS
MARCH 26- MAY 2

GALLERY ONE INC

4935 Byers Fort Worth, Texas 76107 (817) 737-9566

the summer museum school

Classes beginning June 27 for more information, please call or write:

Summer School Office
School of the Museum of Fine Arts
230 The Fenway
Boston, MA 02115
(617) 267-1219

A FINE SELECTION OF CONTEMPORARY AMERICAN ART

HELEN BASKIN
REGIS BRODIE
MORGAN CLIFFORD
CURTIS HOARD
APRIL 10-MAY 7

incorporated gallery

1200 MADISON AVE. (87th ST.) NYC 10028 • (212) 831-4466

SIRENA

Première exhibit of 50 oils
March 26 - April 29, 1983 at

Lowenstein Gallery
Fordham University at Lincoln Center, New York City

information:
(212) 762-7412 (212) 535-1217

The Lucky Lady, 1982

"Steaks and chops are seared to juicy perfection."
Town & Country, September 1982

"One of the 100 best new restaurants in America."
Esquire, August 1981

"An elegant, high-quality steak house." Rated ★★ very good.
New York Times, October 1980

"Pure and simple native food, served as if it were haute cuisine." Rate 9½ of 10.
N.Y. Daily News, October 1980

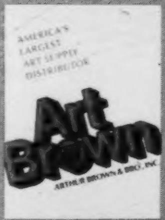
Now Open For Lunch Saturday!

THE POST HOUSE
STEAK & CHOPS

28 East 63rd Street, between Park and Madison.
Open 7 days. Reservations: (212) 935-2888.

FREE

catalog with purchase of Stumpy or Great Crate.



AMERICA'S LARGEST ART SUPPLY DISTRIBUTOR
Art Brown
ARTHUR BROWN & BRO., INC.

- Unique 228p resource for artists
- Use for one-stop shopping
- Contains over 20,000 items

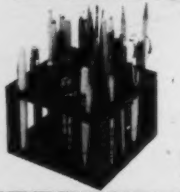
Just purchase
STUMPY™

$5.95
clutch sketching pencil
3 extra lead refills included

OR

Just purchase
GREAT CRATE™



$4.95
beautiful studio and desk top organizer

Enclosed find check for items checked below:

Stumpy ☐ plus catalog $5.95
Great Crate ☐ plus catalog $4.95
Art Brown ☐ catalog only $3.00

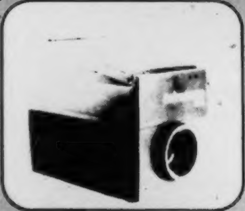
C183A1A

Name ______________________
Address ______________________
City/State/Zip ______________________

America's Largest Art Supply Distributor
ARTHUR BROWN & BRO., INC.
2 West 46th Street, New York, N.Y. 10036

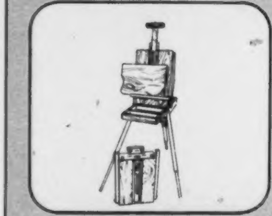
JERRY'S ARTARAMA INC.

SUPER-SAVERS

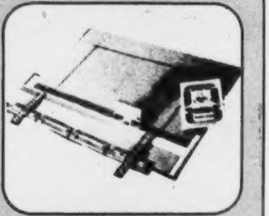


ASTRASCOPE ULTRA-BRIGHT OPAQUE PROJECTOR
No. 5000 — $199.95 ppd.
A fine Opaque Projector. Compact & Portable. Projects in full color, photos, sketches, and printed matter. Original material up to 5½"x5½", larger sizes in sections. Brighter than most projectors of this size. Uses a powerful 650-watt halogen lamp and complete with color corrected 200mm f/3.5 projection lens. Deluxe Carrying Case $29.95 addl. Astroscope and Carrying Case now at low Jerry's delivered to you price.

ARTOGRAPH OPAQUE PROJECTOR
No. DB-300 — $549.95
This modern projector is for today's professional artist-designer. Weighs only 35-pounds. Easy operation from a seated position and perfectly counter-balanced. Projects any opaque material, small objects, or color transparency. Normal range is 3x plus to 3x minus, with the range extendable to 6X. The 6½" triplet lens renders sharp images in subdued room light. Copyboard is 11"x11". Mfrs suggested list price $695.00.



GRUMBACHER FRENCH SKETCH BOX-EASEL
No. 286 — $159.95 ppd.
This is the original world famous combination sketch box/easel/canvas carrier. Made in France from seasoned hardwood and precision hand-crafted. Will hold canvas up to 32" high and can be tilted. Comes complete with a finished palette. Measures only 6½x16x21" collapsed, and weighs only 13 pounds. Nationally advertised for $259.50.



DELUXE ALTOS E/Z MAT CUTTER
No. J-EZ-3 — $59.95 ppd.
A new larger version of one of the most popular of all mat cutters. Base is 39½" long, making one stroke cutting of almost any mat possible. Mat widths from 1⅝" to 8¾". All parts are made of metal. With pin & center stops. Includes the Alto's book "Matting". Delivered to you at this low price!

The Jerry's Catalog #7A

THE JERRY'S CATALOG

An Art Store for $1.00 (free w/all orders). Discounts from 15-66% off manufacturers list.

SEND CHECK, MONEY ORDER, OR MASTERCARD & VISA NUMBER TO:

JERRY'S ARTARAMA, INC.
248-12 Union Turnpike, Bellerose, NY 11426

SHIP TO: ______________________
ADDRESS ______________________
CITY ____________ STATE ____________ ZIP ______
CARD NO. ______________________ EXP ______

NO.	QTY	DESCRIPTION	PR EA	AMOUNT
8A		Art Store (120 pg. catalog) free with order	1.00
286		Grumbacher French Easel Box	159.95
5000		Astrascope Opaque Projector	199.95
J-EZ-3		Deluxe Altos Mat Cutter	59.95
DB-300		Artograph Opague Projector	519.95
			Sub-Total
			NY State Residents add Sales Tax
			Outside Continental USA add 15% for shipping
			Total

This sale expires May 10, 1983. All items include Shipping and Handling within the Continental USA. Outside add 15% of order. Items are shipped UPS, allow 2 weeks for delivery, include street address.

TO ORDER BY PHONE Please have your MasterCard or Visa ready (sorry No Code)
☎ CALL TOLL-FREE 1-800-221-2323
In NY, Alaska, Hawaii, Canada call 212-343-0777

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
A P 1983
UMI

PASQUALE IANNETTI ART GALLERIES, INC.

Dealers in fine original prints and other unique works from the 16th century to the present Including works by:
Durer Goya Lautrec Miro Kollwitz
Callot Renoir Picasso Matisse Amaya
Rembrandt Cheret Rouault Braque

575 Sutter Street, San Francisco, CA 94102
(415) 433-2771 Cable: PIART
6th & Mission, P.O. Box S-3131, Carmel, CA 93921
(408) 625-2923

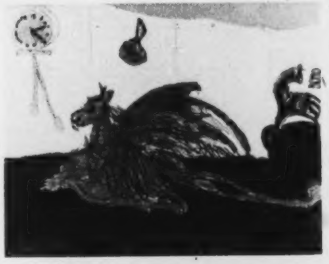
Art expo TEXAS

Dallas Market Center
September 30–October 3, 1983

The 7th international forum for fine art dealers.

Space reservations accepted subject to qualification and availability.

For further information, contact
International Art Exposition
509 Madison Avenue, New York 10022
Telephone: (212) 935-7607



ELISE ASHER

"Outscapes"
April 12 through 30

"Studio," 1981
Oil on canvas, 16 x 20 inches

INGBER GALLERY
460 W Broadway, New York 10012 (212) 674-0101

Lincoln Center/List Collection
Serigraph Prints and Posters
Recent Commissions

Joyce Kozloff
Joan Thorne
Dennis Ashbaugh
Jennifer Bartlett
Judith Murray
Louisa Chase

LINCOLN CENTER GALLERY
Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts
65th and Broadway, Concourse Level
New York, N.Y. 10023 • (212) 877-1800

F. M. LUCET

Impressionistic Paintings

April 1st - May 15th

SL Art Gallery
2133 Cedar Springs
214/761-9912 • Dallas, Texas 75201

L.A. Packing And Crating

Fine Art Specialists
Packing, Crating, Installation
Storage, Transportation

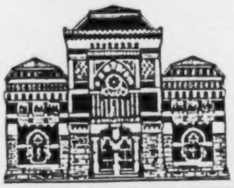
(213) 933-5602

5852 W. Adams Boulevard Culver City, CA 90230

STEVEN MOLASKY

BOXERS

Ziller and Associates
New York (212) 581-6470
Las Vegas (702) 734-0650



PENNSYLVANIA ACADEMY OF THE FINE ARTS

Oldest art school in America offers majors in Painting, Sculpture & Printmaking. Admission to Day school by Portfolio. Accredited by NASAD. Financial Aid available. Approved for Veterans.

Evening & Summer programs in Painting, Drawing and Sculpture.

Founded 1805

For catalog write:
PAFA, Room M,
Broad & Cherry Sts.,
Phila., PA 19102

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION DIRECTORY

A guide to current exhibitions abroad

ARGENTINA

BUENOS AIRES ☎ 54 (1)

RUTH BENZACAR Talcahuano 1216-1° • Tel. 41-8549, 42-5614/5568	Arnaiz, Aizenberg, Audivert, Benedit, Benguria, Cáceres, Castilla, De Monte, Esteves, Kleiman, Puente, Robirosa, Smoje, Torroja, Vegezzi.
DEL RETIRO Florida 943 • Tel. 32.5850	Gallery artists: Pablo Bobbi, Marcello Bonevardi, Sergio Camporalle, Dalia Cujat, Lea Lublin, Aldo Parella, Daniel Selaga.

AUSTRIA

INNSBRUCK ☎ 43 (5222)

KRINZINGER Adolf Pichlerplatz 8 • Tel. 32,131	Heinz Cibulka, photography

VIENNA ☎ 43 (222)

ARIADNE Bäckerstrasse 6 • Tel. 52.94.79
GALERIE HUMMEL Bäckerstrasse 14 • Tel. 52 12 96	Through May, portraits of women, Frauen Bildnisse
GRITA INSAM Köllnerhofg. 6 • Tel. 52.53.30	Until Apr. 9, Guiseppe Chiari, photos and scores; light concert Apr. 13-May 7, John Armleder
NÄCHST ST. STEPHAN Grunangergasse 1/11 II • Tel. 52.12.66	Mar. 30-Apr. 23, Young Austrian artists: Martin Walde, paintings
ULYSSES Opernring 21 • Tel. 57.12.26.	Aspects of Austrian Contemporary Art

BELGIUM

ANTWERP ☎ 32 (2)

AVANTGRADE Volkstraat 60 • Tel. 216.04.81	Panamarenko
MICHELE LACHOWSKY 27 Waalse Kaai • Tel. 237.23.93	Gloria Friedmann
LENS FINE ART Mechelsesteenweg 146 • Tel. 237.68.57	Pol Bury
"121" Mechelsesteenweg 121 • Tel. 218.68.73	Mar. 24-May 14, "Graffiti," will be present at the Fun Gallery in New York City.

BRUSSELS ☎ 32 (2)

ALBERT BARONIAN 89, Avenue Emile de Beco • Tel. 647.3414	Antonio Dias Siegfried Anzinger
ISY BRACHOT 62a, Avenue Louise • Tel. 511.05.25	Victor Koublack
CAMOMILLE 30, Rue Vilain XIV • Tel. 649.23.68	François Martin Jean-Louis Vila
FABIEN DE CUGNAC 55, Rue de Livourne • Tel. 537.14.15

VOL 7 1
ISS 4
AP 1983
UMI

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION DIRECTORY

BRUSSELS (CONT'D)	☎ 32 (2)
PALAIS DES BEAUX ARTS 10, Rue Royale • Tel. 512.04.03	Le dessin vénitien au XVIII ème Siècle; Tiepolo, Canaletto, Guardi, Piazetta, Longhi
POST-SCRIPTUM 37, Rue des Eperonniers • Tel. 511.96.43	Books and catalogues on contemporary art and photography, records.

GHENT	☎ 32 (91)
BARONIAN/LAMBERT Oudburg 22 • Tel. 254.057	Luciano Castelli
RICHARD FONCKE 18 St. Janvest • Tel. 23.81.28	Roger Raveel, prints on wood
GEWAD 23 Gewad • Tel. 25.56.16	Stanley Brouwn, Cindy Sherman
MUSEUM HEDENDAAGSE K'NST. Citadelpark • Tel. 21.17.03	"Museum Zoekt Museum" in Collaboration with V.M.H.K.

KNOKKE	☎ 32 (50)
ELISABETH FRANCK 124 Kustlaan • Tel. 606.881	The Gallery is closed through April.
GALLERY TRIADE Res. St. James, Kustlann 130 • Tel. 610.087/601.925	Apr.-May, abstracts from the 50's: Alechinsky, Appel, Atlan, Bissidre, Esteve, Fautrier, Herbin, Jorn, Soulages, Bram & Geer van Velde, Vieira da Silva

COLOMBIA

BARRANQUILLA
GALERIA QUINTERO CRA 51 B N° 80-65 • Tel. 359.210	Through Apr. Felix Angel

BOGOTA	☎ 57
GARCES Y VELASQUEZ CRA N° 26-92 - AA 28936 • Tel. 284.5593	Ammaral, Amat, Barrera, Caballero, Cardenas, Castles, Gonzales, Hernandez, Saramillo, Negret, Porter, Ramirez, Rosas, Salcedo, Sanin
QUINTANA Carrera 11 N° 85-62 • Tel. 236.8226	XIXth and XXth Century paintings: Botero, Degas, Gauguin, Hockney, Matisse, Moore, Picasso, Rodin, Vuillard

ENGLAND

CAMBRIDGE	☎ 44 (223)
KETTLE'S YARD GALLERY Northampton Street • Tel. 352.124	Until Apr. 10, "Paper as Image": An ACGB Touring Exhibition Apr. 16-May 1, Rose Garrard, "Frames of mind": installation & performances

LONDON	☎ 44 (1)
ANNE BERTHOUD GALLERY 1 Langley Court • Tel. 836.73.57	Apr. 14-May 5, Vicken Parsons, paintings
ART HOUSE 213 South Lambeth Road • Tel. 735.2192	Representing contemporary British artists, including John Bellany by appointment
IAN BIRKSTED 37 Great Russell Street • Tel. 637.2673	Until Apr. 16, Michael Porter, paintings and drawings As of Apr. 26, John Newling, new sculpture
BLOND FINE ART 33 Sackville Street • Tel. 437.1230	Until Apr. 23, David Bomberg, works on paper
CHRISTIE'S PRINT COLL'CTION 8 Dover Street • Tel. 499.6701	Graphics by British and international artists. Hockney, Moore, Sutherland, Miró, Chagall, others. Catalog (quote AIAIED).
ANTHONY d'OFFAY 23 Dering Street • Tel. 499.4695	Apr. 7-May 14, Wyndham Lewis (1882-1957), paintings and watercolors 1910-1920
12 DUKE STREET GALLERY Duke Street, St. James • Tel. 930.52.47	Until Apr. 29, William Wegman, photographs
FISCHER FINE ART 30 King Street, SW1 • Tel. 839.3942	Until Apr. 29, Jack Smith
GIMPEL FILS 30 Davies Street • Tel. 493.2488	Until Apr. 16, Susan Hiller, recent work & "Sister of Menon," a new publication Apr. 19-May 14, Louis Le Brocquy, "Studies towards an image of Shakespeare"
NIGEL GREENWOOD, INC. 41 Sloane Gardens • Tel. 730.8824	Apr. 12-end Apr., Stephen Cox "The Grand Tour" (and Vasari revisited Italy 1981-1983)
I.C.A. The Mall, SW1. • Tel. 930.3647	Apr. 4-May 22, Model Future, a view of contemporary British architecture; Apr. 20-May 29, Mary Miss, installation; until Apr. 3, drawings by Architects
NICOLA JACOBS 9 Cork Street • Tel. 437.3868	Until May 7, The Figurative Exhibition II, works by: Simon Edmondson, Ken Kiff, Colin Smith & others
BERNARD JACOBSON, LTD. 2A Cork Street • Tel. 439.8355	Until Apr. 9, mixed painting exhibition As of Apr. 9, Michael Heindorf, "New Carborundum etchings"

LONDON (CONT'D)	☎ 44 (1)
LEWIS JOHNSTONE GALLERY 7 Bolton Gardens (Old Brompton Rd.) • Tel. 373.1192	Until Apr. 23, Stuart Brisley Apr. 27-May 21, Paul Richards
ANNELY JUDA/JUDA ROWAN 11 Tottenham Mews • Tel. 637.5517/8	Through Apr. Arp, Exter, Lissitzky, Schwitters, Vantongerloo & others; Until Apr. 16 Peter Kalkhof, M. Naylor; Apr. 21-May 19, N. Haraguchi, Malcolm Hughes
KNOEDLER GALLERY (Kasmin, Director) 22 Cork Street • Tel. 439.1096	Apr. 6-30, Bhuphen Khakhar, recent paintings
LEINSTER FINE ART 9 Hereford Road • Tel. 229.99.85	Until Apr. 30, "50th Birthday Choice," a tribute to Edward Lucie-Smith
LISSON GALLERY (Nicholas Logsdail) 66/68 Bell Street • Tel. 262.1539	Until Apr. 2, Art + Language Apr. 13-May 7, Bill Woodrow
MAYOR GALLERY 22A Cork Street • Tel. 734.3558	Until Apr. 29, Pablo Picasso
PETERSBURG PRESS 59A Portobello Road • Tel. 229.0105	Roy Lichtenstein, 7 woodcuts; Frank Stella, "Shards" Other works by Hockney, Hodgkin, Johns
PICCADILLY GALLERY 16 Cork Street • Tel. 499.4632	Until Apr. 15, Graham Arnold, paintings and drawings
REDFERN GALLERY 20 Cork Street • Tel. 734.17.32 734.05.78	Until Apr. 13, Keith Vaughan, 1912-1977, paintings, gouaches and drawings
EDWARD TOTAH GALLERY 39 Floral Street • Tel. 379.6241	Until Apr. 23, Larry Rivers, paintings and drawings from the 60's to the 80's
WADDINGTON GALLERIES 2, 4 & 34 Cork St. • Tel. 439.1866	Until Apr. 23, Jack B. Yeats, paintings Until Apr. 23, Markus Lüpertz, sculpture
OXFORD	☎ 44 (865)
MUSEUM OF MODERN ART 30 Pembroke Street • Tel. 722.733	Apr. 3-May 22, Peter Kennard, Dispaches from an Unofficial War Artist
SOUTHAMPTON	☎ 44 (703)
JOHN HANSARD GALLERY The University, Southampton • Tel. 559.122	Until Apr. 23, Five New Painters: Philippe Bird, Eleanor Moreton, Brian Elwell, John Henshaw, Andrew Mansfield
FRANCE
BORDEAUX	☎ 33 (56)
C.A.P.C. ENTREPOT LAINE Rue Ferrère • Tel. 44.16.35	Until Apr. 23, Georg Baselitz, sculpture; Georges Rousse, photographs
CANNES	☎ 33 (9)
GALERIE HERBAGE 17, Rue des Etats-Unis • Tel. 39.19.15	En permanence: Calder, Max Ernst, Matisse, Miró, Picasso, Chadwick, Hepworth, Moore, Nicholson, Sutherland
LYONS	☎ 33 (7)
E.L.A.C. Centre d'Echanges Lyon Perrache • Tel. 842.27.39	Mar. 30-May 29, 15 "Soyeux" from Lyons who have exhibited in New York at the "Parsons School," a silk exhibition
LE NOUVEAU MUSEE 11, r. Dr. Dolard-69100 Villeurbanne • Tel. 884.55.10	Until May 15, Markus Raetz, drawings and sculpture
NICE	☎ 33 (93)
GALERIE PAUL HERVIEU 26, Rue Pastorelli • Tel. 80.02.10	Paintings and gouaches by Atlan, Clavé, Coignard, Goetz, Hélénon, Marchand des Raux, Papart and Key Sato.
PARIS	☎ 33 (1)
BAMA 40, Rue Quincampoix • Tel. 277.38.87	Until Apr. 23, Georg Brecht, boxes Apr. 27-May 28, group show of drawings
BAR DE L'AVENTURE (Caroline Corre) 53, Rue Berthe • Tel. 255.37.76	Apr. 15-20, American artists books at the book fair in Paris at the Grand Palais: Bacon, Baron, Broadus, Brody-Lederman, Giersbach, Greenbaum
BEAUBOURG 23, Rue du Renard • Tel. 271.20.50	Until Apr. 31, Ben, portraits 1982-1983
CLAUDE BERNARD 5-7-9, Rue des Beaux-Arts • Tel. 326.9707	As of Apr. 12, David Levine, watercolors
ISY BRACHOT 35, Rue Guénégaud • Tel. 354.22.40	Until Apr. 16, Roland Cat, drawings Apr. 20-May 21, "Pari 83" (an exhibition of young painters)
GALERIE JEANNE BUCHER 53, Rue de Seine • Tel: 326.22.32. 326.75.23	As of end Apr.-May, a retrospective of Wilfried Moser 1950-1983
FARIDEH CADOT 77, Rue des Archives • Tel. 278.0836	Until Apr. 5, Jean Clareboudt, sculpture As of Apr. 9, Günter Brus

VOL 7 1
ISS 4
AP
1983
UMI

PARIS (CONT'D) ☎ 33 (1)

LOUIS CARRE ET CIE. 10, Avenue de Messine • Tel. 562.57.07	Accrochage
JEAN CHAUVELIN 147, Rue St. Martin • Tel. 887.77.76	Russian and European Constructivists, gallery artists.
CREATIS ESPACE ALTERNATIF 50, Rue du Temple • Tel. 887.28.56	Until Apr. 29, "Les mots sont des choses" a collective scriptural space: works by 45 famous contemporary artists
CHANTAL CROUSEL 80, Rue Quincampoix • Tel. 887.6081	Until Apr. 12, Ben Apr. 15-May 17, Gilbert and George
JACQUES DAMASE Galerie de Varenne, 61 Rue de Varenne, • Tel. 705.55.04
DURAND-DESSERT 3, Rue des Haudriettes • Tel. 277.6360	Until May 7, Giuseppe Penone, recent sculpture
LE DESSIN 27, Rue Guenegaud • Tel. 633.04.66	Apr. 2-20, accrochage of the gallery artists Apr. 21-May 30, Odle, drawings
ERIC FABRE 6, Rue du Pont de Lodi • Tel. 325.42.63	Until Apr. 16, Jean-Luc Vilmouth Apr. 21-May 14, Daniel Buren
PAUL FACCHETTI 20, Avenue de Friedland • Tel. 563.80.26	By Appointment
KARL FLINKER 25, Rue de Tournon • Tel. 325.18.73	Apr. 7-May 14, Pierre Saxod, recent paintings
GALERIE FARIS 50, Rue de l'Université • Tel. 544.29.48	Through Apr. accrochage of the gallery artists
JEAN FOURNIER 44, Rue Quincampoix • Tel. 277.3231	Apr. 13-22, Ben, "Lorsque la matière se transforme et entraine l'idée"
GALERIE DE FRANCE 50-52, Rue de la Verrerie • Tel. 274.38.00	Apr. 13-end May, Jean Pierre Bertrand, "Zed in Red"
LILIANE FRANCOIS 15, Rue de Seine • Tel. 326.94.32	Until Apr. 6, Chabot, watercolors Apr. 7-30, Nicolaï, paintings
MAURICE GARNIER 6, Avenue Matignon • Tel. 225.61.65.	Bernard Buffet, permanently.
DANIEL GERVIS GALLERY 34, Rue du Bac • Tel. 261.11.73	Benrath, Constant, Dubuffet, Eterovic, Gerzo, Ghertman, Malaval, Montyn, Mutal, Nevelson, Olson, Pan, Pasotti, Toledo, others.
GILLESPIE/LAAGE/SALOMON 24, Rue Beaubourg • Tel. 278.1171	Apr. 7-May 7, Annette Messager, "Chimères" 1982-1983
GALERIE MARWAN HOSS 12, Rue D'Alger • Tel. 296.39.45	"Important works: Masters of the 19th and 20th centuries," drawings and sculpture
SAMY KINGE 54, Rue de Verneuil • Tel. 261.1907	Until Apr. 9, Watchi "Images d'ailleurs," recent paintings Apr. 12-May 7, Marina Karella, recent sculpture
LAHUMIERE 88, Bd de Courcelles • Tel. 763.03.95	Apr. André Masson, pastels and etchings
LA HUNE GALERIE EDITIONS 14, Rue de l'Abbaye • Tel. 325.54.06	Hayter, recent paintings and prints Alechinsky, Dorni, Folon, Cozo and Piza
LA HUNE-LIBRAIRIE 170, Boulevard St. Germain • Tel. 548.35.85	Books, catalogues and magazines: Fine arts, literature, architecture, graphics, photography and fashion.
YVON LAMBERT 5, Rue de Grenier St. Lazare • Tel. 271.09.33	Apr. 5-May, Blais, Combas, Middendorf, works on paper
GALERIE JEAN-PIERRE LAVIGNES 15, Rue St. Louis en l'Isle Paris • Tel. 633.5602	Apr. 12-23, Eric Lecoeur, watercolors Apr. 26-May 14, Gérard Deuquet, "paintings bursting out of their frame"
BAUDOIN LEBON 36, Rue des Archives • Tel. 272.09.10	Until Apr. 23, Antoine Bootz, photos Apr. 28-May 28, Keiji Nematsu
ADRIEN MAEGHT 46, Rue du Bac • Tel. 222.12.59	François Fiedler
GALERIE MAEGHT 13 & 14, Rue de Téhéran • Tel. 563.13.19	Until May 13, Jim Dine, monotypes and etchings Catalogue available, introduction by Bernard Noël
DENISE RENE 196, Blvd. St. Germain • Tel. 222.77.57	Agam, Albers, Arp, Baertling, Bill, Claisse, Cruz-Diez, S. Delaunay, Gerstner, Herbin, Heurtaux, Le Parc, Morellet, Neumours, Soto, Tinguely, Tomasello
DARTHEA SPEYER 6, Rue Jacques Callot • Tel. 354.78.41	Until Apr. 21, Group show of the gallery artists Apr. 27-Jun. 11, Granet

PARIS (CONT'D)	☎ 33 (1)
STADLER 51, Rue de Seine • Tel. 326.91.10	Until Apr. 23, Tromeur, recent work Apr. 28-May 28, Damian
NANE STERN 25, Ave. de Tourville • Tel. 705.08.46	Apr. 12-May 14, Gérard Koch, sculpture The gallery is open Tues-Fri. 3 p.m. to 8.30 p.m, Sat. 10-12 a.m. & 3-8.30 p.m.
DANIEL TEMPLON 30, Rue Beaubourg • Tel. 272.14.10	Until Apr. 19, Carl Andre As of Apr. 13-30, Ben, "écritures"
TEXBRAUN 12, Rue Mazarine • Tel. 633.47.84/633.14.57	As of Mar. 15, Gerald Incadela, photography
TRANS/FORM 22, Ave de la Bourdonnais • Tel. 550.40.32	Until Apr. 17, Olivier de Bouchiny As of Apr. 19, Pietro Lista
GALERIE VALLOIS 41, Rue de Seine • Tel. 329.50.84/85	Csaky, Biegas, Rodin, Dunand, Ruhlman, Franck, Cheret. Fine furniture of the Thirties.
ZABRISKIE 37, Rue Quincampoix • Tel. 272.35.47	Until Apr. 30, Paul Strand, Mexican photographs

LES SABLES D'OLONNE	☎ 33 (51)
MUSEE DE L'ABBAYE STE. CROIX Rue de Verdun • Tel. 32.01.16	Bernard Pagès, sculpture, recent work

ST. PAUL DE VENCE	☎ 33 (93)
FONDATION MAEGHT Saint Paul de Vence • Tel. 32.81.63	Until May 5, Sam Francis, paintings and monotypes
GALERIE CATHERINE ISSERT Saint Paul de Vence • Tel. 32.96.92	Through Apr. Blais, Blanchard, Boisrond, Di Rosa, "La Nouvelle Figuration"

TOULON	☎ 33 (94)
MUSEE DE TOULON 20, Boulevard Leclerc • Tel. 93.15.54	Until May 29, François Hers Eve Sonneman

GERMANY

BERLIN	☎ 49 (30)
GALERIE LIETZOW Knesebeckstrasse 32 • Tel. 881.28.95	Apr. 2-30, Peter Ackermann, new paintings and drawings
R. ONNASCH AUSTELLUNGEN Niebuhrstr. 5 • Tel. 882.77.18	Until Apr. 30, Erwin Heerich, work with plastic and drawings.
GALERIE POLL Lützowplatz 7 • Tel. 261.70.91	Apr. 11-May 23, Shang Hutter
GALERIE FOLKER SKULIMA Niebuhrstrasse 2 • Tel. 881.8280	German new art: Dornseis, Linde, Mobus, Oppermann, Pods, Rohling Stöhrer, Von Windheim

BONN	☎ 49 (228)
GALERIE LINSSEN Prinz-Albert-Strasse 47 • Tel. 21.89.09	German Expressionists. Russian Avant Garde. International classics. Osvaldo Romberg and Jan Voss.

COLOGNE	☎ 49 (221)
ERVEN'S ART SERVICE Machaerstrasse 1 • Te.12.34.36	We hang the shows
GALERIE GMURZYNSKA Obenmarspforten 21 • Tel. 23.66.21/2	Accrochage
GALERIE KARSTEN GREVE Wallrafplatz 3 • Tel. 21.39.21	Detlef Orlop
GALERIE HOLTMANN Richartzstr. 10 • Tel. 21.51.50	Banana, Buthe, Middendorf, Polke and others
GALERIE JOLLENBECK Lindenstrasse 20 • Tel. 24.67.59
RUDOLF KICKEN Albertusstrasse 47/49 • Tel. 21.02.34
KÖLNISCHER KUNSTVEREIN Josef-Haubrich-Hof 1 • Tel. 21.70.21/221.3740	"8 in Cologne" (8 painters from Cologne)
PAUL MAENZ Schaafenstrasse 25 • Tel. 21. 81.02	Until April 26, Georg Jiri Dokoupil As of April 29, Walter Dahn
GALERIE ORANGERIE REINZ Helenstrasse 2 • Tel. 23.46.84	Accrochage
GALERIE RECKERMANN Albertusstr. 16 • Tel. 21.20.64	Accrochage

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

COLOGNE (CONT'D) ☎ 49 (221)

GALERIE ROLF RICKE Volksgartenstrasse 10 • Tel. 31.57.17	Through April works on paper from the 70's: Artschwager, Heizer, Krücku, Ruscha, Rückriem, Sonnier
GALERIE WENTZEL St. Apernstrasse 26 • Tel. 24.24.00	Through Apr. 6 Rolf Rose As of Apr. 8 Jules Olitski
MICHAEL WERNER Gertrudenstrasse. 24/28 • Tel. 21.06.61	Markus Lüpertz, sculpture
GALERIE RUDOLF ZWIRNER Albertusstrasse 18 • Tel. 23.58.37/8	Accrochage

DUSSELDORF ☎ 49 (211)

KONRAD FISCHER Platanenstrasse 7 • Tel. 685.908	Gerdes, Klingelhöller, Luy, Ruscha, Schöete
GALERIE GMYREK Mutter-Ey-Strasse 5. • Tel. 32.77.70
DENISE RENE HANS MAYER Grabbeplatz 2 • Tel. 36.59.72	Until Apr. 2, David Stoltz
KUNSTVEREIN RHEINLANDE/WESTFALEN Grabbeplatz 4 • Tel. 327.023	Helmut Middendorf, paintings

HAMBURG ☎ 49 (40)

ASCAN CRONE Isestrasse 121 • Tel. 040/47.42.94	Until Apr. 9, Hans-Peter Adamski, new paintings Apr. 14-May 14, Werner Büttner, new paintings
THOMAS LEVY GALERIE Tesdorpfstrasse 18 • Tel. 45.91.88.	Until Apr. 23, Damia Jaume, paintings and drawings
GALERIE MUNRO Barmbeker Str. 138 • Tel. 48.45.52.	Through Apr. Paco Knöller, works on paper

MUNICH ☎ 49 (89)

GALERIE + EDITION A Amalienstrasse 81 & 87 • Tel: 28.13.64/28.84.45
GALERIE SIX FRIEDRICH Maximilianstrasse. 15 • Tel. 29.50.21 & 29.61.10	Until Apr. 16, Georg Jiri Dokoupil; Apr. 21-May 26, black and white drawings: Anzinger, Barfuss, Disler, Dokoupil, Wachweger
TANIT Maximilianstr. 36 • Tel. 29.22.33	Through Apr. Paula Mann, "Tracs" 1980-1982

NUREMBERG ☎ 49 (911)

GALERIE JOHANNA RICARD Königstrasse 33/37 • Tel. 22.50.20	Russian Avant-Garde

STUTTGART ☎ 49 (711)

MAX-ULRICH HETZLER GmbH Schwabstrasse 2 • Tel. 62.15.38	Through Apr. Martin Kippenberger, paintings

---

GREECE

ATHENS ☎ 30 (1)

KAREN & JEAN BERNIER Marasli 51 • Tel. 723.5657	Through Apr. Terry Winters, new paintings Carroll Dunham, paintings

---

HOLLAND

AMSTERDAM ☎ 31 (20)

GALERIE KRIKHAAR Spuistraat 330 • Tel. 26.71.66	Appel, Brands, Constant, Corneille, Cottavoz, Henning-Pedersen, Lindstrom, Saura, Sonderlinque and others.
STEDELIJK MUSEUM Paulus Potterstraat 13 • Tel. 73 21 66	Until Apr. 17, "2 Chairs" (Industrial Design); Until May 1, Charlie Toorop, paintings & an Architecture Exhibition; Until Apr. 24, Daniels, Dieleman, drawings

EINDHOVEN ☎ 31 (40)

STEDELIJK VAN ABBEMUSEUM Bilderdijklaan 10 • Tel. 44.85.55	Until Apr. 24, James Lee Byars Apr. 29-Jun. 5, group show: Daniel Buren, Georg Baselitz, Jannis Kounellis, Anselm Kiefer, Luciano Fabro and others

---

ITALY

BARI ☎ 39 (80)

MARILENA BONOMO Via Nicolò dell' Arca 19 • Tel. 21.01.45	Enzo Esposito

BOLOGNA ☎ 39 (51)

DE FOSCHERARI Via Goidanich 1 • Tel. 27.52.26.	Through May, Giosetta Fioroni 1962-1982, paintings
FABJBASAGLIA Via Farini 26 • Tel. 23.49.22.	Until mid. Apr., Fabio Peloso, paintings As of mid. Apr., Lunanova, paintings
GALLERIA FORNI Via Farini 26 • Tel. 27.07.60	Apr. 9-23 Philippe Garrel

BOLOGNA (CONT'D) ☎ 39 (51)

STUDIO G7, G. GRIGOLO Via Val d'Aposa 7C • Tel. 26.64.97.	Renato Boero

BRESCIA ☎ 39 (30)

MASSIMO MININI Via Apollonio, 68 • Tel. 56.275	Bertrand Lavier
PIERO CAVELLINI Via Fratelli Bandiera 18 • Tel. 57.401	Radu Dragumirescu, paintings

FLORENCE ☎ 39 (55)

GALLERIA SCHEMA Via della vigna nuova 17. • Tel. 28.40.90.	By appointment

MILAN ☎ 39 (2)

SALVATORE ALA Via Mameli 3 • Tel. 716-500	Jannis Kounellis
ARIETE GRAFICA Via S. Andrea, 5 • Tel. 79.55.73	Livia Livi
ARTRA/STUDIO Via Fiori Chiari 8 • Tel. 861.190	Marisa Vescovo
STUDIO CANNAVIELLO Piazza Beccaria 10 • Tel. 837.6368	Georg Baselitz
DIAGRAMMA (Luciano Inga Pin) Via Pontaccio 12a • Tel. 874.237	Luciano Palmieri Gianantonio Abate
DISEGNI DI ARCHITETTURA Antonia Jannone Via del Carmine 5 • Tel. 878.384	Pierluigi Pizzi, costumes and theatrical sets
STUDIO CARLO GROSSETTI Via dei Piatti 9 • Tel. 837.5594	Alf Schuler
FRANCOISE LAMBERT Bastioni di Porta Nuova 11 • Tel. 650.087	Michele Zaza
STUDIO MARCONI Via Tadino 15 • Tel. 225.543	Agenore Fabbri, paintings Arnaldo Pomodoro, projects
GALLERIA DEL MILIONE Via Bigli 21 • Tel. 780.879
MASSIMO MININI Via Cavalieri des S. Sepolcro • Tel. 86.71.30	Bertrand Lavier, recent sculpture
GALLERIA SENO Via Ciovasso 11 • Tel. 805.80.64	Through Apr. Attilio Forgioli
GALLERIA STENDHAL Via Santo Spirito 10 • Tel. 781.825	Mario Negri, projects Luoghi Immaginati, sculpture
GALLERIA 32 Via Brera 6 • Tel. 86 76 29	Armando de Stepsano
FRANCO TOSELLI Via del Carmine 9 • Tel. 805.0434	Nicola de Maria

MODENA ☎ 39 (59)

GALLERIA EMILIO MAZZOLI Via Nazario Sauro 58a • Tel. 357.605/243.455	Agnetti, Boetti, Calzolari, Chia, Clemente, Cucchi, de Maria, Germanà, Paladino, Schifano, Turcato.

NAPLES ☎ 39 (81)

LUCIO AMELIO Piazza dei Martiri 58. • Tel. 42.20.23/769.0521	Until Apr. 15, Tony Cragg; April 16-25, International Fair of Venice at the Grassi Palace: Barcelò, Beuys, Longobardi, Paladino, Tatafiore,

ROME ☎ 39 (6)

GALLERIA ANNA D'ASCANIO Via del Babuino, 29 • Tel. 678.5920
GIULIANA DE CRESCENZO Via del Paradiso 41 • Tel. 656.9846
UGO FERRANTI Via di Tor Millina 26 • Tel. 654.2146	Until Apr. 23, Sol LeWitt, wall drawings; Apr. 25-May 25, Duane Michals
L'ISOLA Via Gregoriana 5 • Tel. 679.00.29./678.54.77	Apr. 10-May 10, Burri, Fontana, Capogrossi, Colla
GALLERIA IL PONTE Via S. Ignazio 6 • Tel. 679.6114	As of Apr. 6, Philip Pearlstein, works on paper, watercolors and prints

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

	ROME (CONT'D)	☎ 39 (6)
	PRIMO PIANO Via Panisperna 203. • Tel. 460.309	Giuseppe Chiari
	SPROVIERI 3 Piazzi del Popolo • Tel. 360.8918/361.0975	Futurism Dada Surrealism.
	TONINELLI 86 Piazza di Spagna • Tel. 679.34.88	Important sculpture by: Bodini, Fontana, Marini, Arturo Martini, Melotti, Moore, Medardo Rosso, Schmettau, Vangi.
	TURIN	☎ 39 (11)
	GIORGIO PERSANO Via dei Mille 29 • Tel. 835.527	Renato Maestri, sculpture
	TUCCI RUSSO Corso Tassoni 56 • Tel. 779.304	Richard Long
	CHRISTIAN STEIN Piazza San Carlo 206 • Tel. 535.574	Giuseppe Penone
	ALBERTO WEBER Via S. Francesco da Paola 4 • Tel. 839.7493	Apr.-May, Tomarchio Levi, oil paintings
	VERONA	☎ 39 (45)
	STUDIO LA CITTA Via Samaritana 10 • Tel. 25.728	Apr. 16-mid May, Gianni Versace "10 Years of Creativity" 1973-1983
JAPAN	TOKYO	☎ 170
	RYU INTERNATIONAL GALLERY P.O.B 1383 Sunshine-City, Toshima-ku • Tel. 987.6160	Contemporary Japanese and Chinese (Main land) original prints. Catalogue upon request. U.S. $10 sea mail postage included
SPAIN	ALMAGRO	☎ 34 (926)
	FUCARES San Francisco. 2 & 3 • Tel. 86 09 02	Eloísa Sanz
	BARCELONA	☎ 34 (3)
	GALERIA CIENTO Consejo de Ciento 347 • Tel. 215.63 65	Apr. 5-9, Mirera Sentis, America Sánchez Apr. 13-May 4, Patricio Velez, paintings
	SALA GASPAR Consejo de Ciento, 323 • Tel. 318.87.401.318.87.36	100 years of art and poetry magazines
	GALERIA MAEGHT Calle Montcada 25 • Tel. 310.42.45	Xavier Franquesa, paintings As of April 26, Miró, sculptures
	RENE METRAS Consejo de Ciento 331 • Tel. 302.05 39	Lleixa, paintings
	LA CAJA DE PENSIONES (Centro Cultural) Passeig Sant Joan 108 • Tel. 258.89.07	Amadeo Modigliani
	GALERIA JOAN PRATS Rambla Catalunya 54 • Tel. 216.02.84	Joan Ponc, Apr. 26, Miró
	GALERIA TRECE Rambla Catalunya, 49 • Tel. 318.08.73.	As of Apr. 14, Roser Bru
	BILBAO	☎ 34 (4)
	GALERIA DE ARTE MUN Gran Via 60 • Tel. 441. 24 00	Artists of the gallery
	IBIZA BALEARES	☎ 34 (71)
	GALERIA ES MOLI Carretera San Miguel Sta Gertrudis	Azocar, Bechtold, Calbet, Faber, Galbraith, Hedrich, Kugler, Monreal, Segui, Tomlin, Villanueva, Zush.
	MADRID	☎ 34 (1)
	OBRA CULTURAL "LA CAJA" (Centro Cultural) Paseo Castellana 51 • Tel. 419.0440	An Antology by Aureliano de Beruete
	GALERIA KREISLER DOS Hermosilla 8 • Tel. 431.42.64	Until Apr. 12, Fernando Sanchez Calderón As of Apr. 14, Fernando Saez
	EGAM Villanueva 29 • Tel. 435 3161	José Ramon Anda, sculpture
	GALERIA HEINRICH EHRHARDT Barquillo 44 • Tel. 419.52.86	Siegfried Anzinger, Hubert Schmalix, Per Kirkeby

MADRID (CONT'D) ☎ 34 (1)

GALERIA JUANA MORDO Villanueva 7 • Tel. 435.84.42	Until Apr. 14, Sophia Vari Apr. 20-May 14, Paluzzi
GALERIA DE ARTE MUN Hermosilla 26 • Tel. 401.01.92	Gallery Artists
RAYUELA Claudio Coello 19 • Tel. 275 3146	Chillida, Ferreras, Genovés, Guinovart, Antonio López, Miró, Mompo, Palazuelo, Orlando Pelayo, Saura, Valls, Taples
GALERIA SEN Nunez de Balboa 37 • Tel. 435 52 02	"La Hermanadad Pictorica"
GALERIA THEO Marqués de la Ensenada, 2 • Tel. 410.26.51	Gustavo Torner
TORCULO GRAPHICS & BOOKS Claudio Coello 17 • Tel. 275 86 86	Francisco San José, a retrospective of his graphics Salvador Victoria, "Superposiciones"
GALERIA FERNANDO VIJANDE Nuñez de Balboa 65 • Tel. 435 8025	Ian Brackwell
GALERIA YNGUANZO Antonio Maura 12 • Tel. 231 54 10	Ernesto Fontecilla

MURCIA ☎ 34 (68)

GALERIA YERBA Vinadel 6 • Tel. 21 00 15	Amalia Avia

SEVILLE ☎ 34 (54)

GALERIA JUANA DE AIZPURU Calle Canalejaz, 10 • Tel. 22.85.01	Juan Antonio Aguirre

SWEDEN

MALMO ☎ 46 (40)

GALERIE NORDENHAKE Ostra Ronneholmsvagen 5 • Tel. 23.15.33	Marcia Hafif, paintings

STOCKHOLM ☎ 46 (8)

KONSTRUKTIV TENDENS Nybrogatan 69 • Tel. 61.16.65/61.50.65	Siebe Hansma, sculpture and wall objects

SWITZERLAND

BASEL ☎ 41 (61)

KUNSTHALLE BASEL Steinenberg 7 • Tel. 23.48.33	Miriam Cahn "Das Klassische Lieben" Georges Platt Lynes, photographs (1907-1955)
GALERIE BEYELER Baumleingasse 9 • Tel. 23.54.12	Through Apr., Fernando Botero, paintings, watercolors and drawings
FELIX HANDSCHIN GALERIE Petersgraben 18 • Tel. 25.59.85	Through Apr., Young German Artists

BERNE ☎ 41 (31)

MARBACH Wasserwerkgasse 37 • Tel. 22.42.05/22.38.25	Contemporary art. By appointment only.

GENEVA ☎ 41 (22)

GALERIE BONNIER 4, Rue Saint-Laurent • Tel. 35.87.35	Through Apr., accrochage of contemporary artists: Arman, Fautrier, Klein, Spoerri, Tinguely
CENTRE D'ART CONTEMPORAIN Bd. du Pont d'Arve et Bd Karl Vogt • Tel. 28.88.03	Opening of the new space on Apr. 30, Rebecca Horn Former Palais de Exposiciones
ECART/BOOKS & FLUXKIOSK 16, Rue d'Italie • Tel. 31.34.73, & 28.88.03	Artists Books, Catalogues and Magazines.
GALERIE ERIC FRANCK 15 Route de Florissant • Tel. 47.08.09	"A few portraits 1932-1982" by Henri-Cartier Bresson
CLAUDE GIVAUDAN 3, Rue du Soleil-Levant • Tel. 29.91.61.	XXth Century drawings and prints
MARIE-LOUISE JEANNERET 59, Avenue de Champel • Tel. 46.34.57	Through Apr. Kappa Kocherscheidt
DANIEL VARENNE Galerie Clos de Sierne 15, Chemin de Sierne • 84.15.93	Impressionist and 20th Century masters. By appointment only
WEBER 13, Rue de Monthoux • Tel. 32.64.50	Peter Takal, drawings

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
A P 1983
UMI

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION DIRECTORY

ZURICH ☎ 41 (1)

THOMAS AMMANN FINE ART Restelbergstrasse 97 • Tel. 362.62.31	Impressionists & 20th Century Masters—by appointment only.
GALERIE BISCHOFBERGER Utoquai 29 • Tel. 910.43.62	Cucchi, Clemente, Chia, Schnabel, Salle, Basquiat, Salome, Warhol, Tinguely
KONRAD FISCHER Ackerstrasse 44 • Tel. 42.71.61	Through Apr., Carl Andre
GIMPEL • HANOVER • EMMERICH Tödistrasse 40 • Tel. 202.03.00	Until Apr. 30, Gottfried Honegger: new works New Gallery: Vincenzo Baviera
M. KNOEDLER Kirchgasse 24 • Tel. 69 35 00	Apr. 23-June 8, changing group show
GALERIE MAEGHT Predigerplatz 10-12 • Tel. 251.11.20	Through Apr., Antoni Tapiès, papiers
MAURER Münstergasse 14-18 • Tel. 47.85.00	Through Apr. Alfred Klinkan, recent acrylic paintings
PETER NOSER St. Jakobstrasse 11 • Tel. 242.55.16	Through Apr., Anna Maria Santolini Tomiyo Sasaki
GALERIE SCHLEGL Minervastrasse 119 • Tel. 251.4963	Through Apr., Swiss painters
ANNEMARIE VERNA Mühlegasse 27 • Tel. 252.27.70	Through Apr., "When Art Becomes Books/When Books Become Art"
ANNEMARIE VERNA Scheuchzerstrasse 35 • Tel. 44.27.15	Through Apr., opening Exhibition
JAMILEH WEBER Schanzengasse 10 • Tel. 47.79.89	Through Apr. Aldo Rossi, paintings, drawings, and models
WORK GALLERY Trittligasse 24 • Tel. 482.39.58	Through Apr., International Photographers
RENÉE ZIEGLER Rämistrasse 34 • Tel. 251.23.22	Through Apr., Daniel Spoerri, new objects I + II May 19-24, the gallery will be at the Chicago Art Fair

VENEZUELA

CARACAS ☎ 58 (2)

DURBAN Calle Madrid-Urbanizacion Las Mercedes. • Tel. 92.42.31.	Spanish and Latin American Contemporary Art.
GALERIA MINOTAURO Calle Madrid-Entre Mucuchies y Monterrey • Tel. 92 27 40

ART IN AMERICA IS AVAILABLE IN EUROPE AT:

Amsterdam
Athenaeum Boekhandel, B.V.
Spui 14-16
Art Something Co.
Herengracht 259
Robert Premsela Boekhandel
van Baerlestrasse 78

Antwerp
Boekhandel Ban Den Bosch
St. Jacobsmarkt 1-B

Basel
Stampa
Saplenberg 2

Berlin
Galerie 2000
Knesebeckstrasse 56

Bern
Hans Huber
Länggasstrasse 76 und
Marktgasse 9

Brussels
Librairie Post Scriptum
Rue des Eperonniers, 37

Cologne
Walther Konig
Breite Str. 93

Eslangen
Buchhandling Redmann
Bohlemplatz 6/12

Florence
Centro Di
l/r Piazza de' Mozzi

Geneva
Ecart
16 rue d'Italie

Hamburg
Sautter & Lackmann
Klosterstern 8

London
Arts Bibliographic
37 Great Russell Street
Arts Council Shop
8 Long Acre
Covent Gardens, WC2E 9LG

Lyon
L'Ollave
58, rue Tramassac

Madrid
Torculo Graphics & Books
Claudio Coello 17

Milan
PAC - La Libreria
via Palestro 14
Idea Books Bookstore
Via Cappuccio, 21

Paris
Artcurial
9 Avenue Matignon
Flammarion 4
Librairie du Centre Georges Pompidou
Plateau Beaubourg
Galerie Jean Fournier
44 rue Quincampoix
Librairie La Hune
170, boulevard Saint-Germain
Librairie Musee d'Art Moderne
de la Ville de Paris
11, Avenue du President Wilson

Rome
Galleria Nazionale d'Arte Moderna
Viale delle Belle Arti, 131

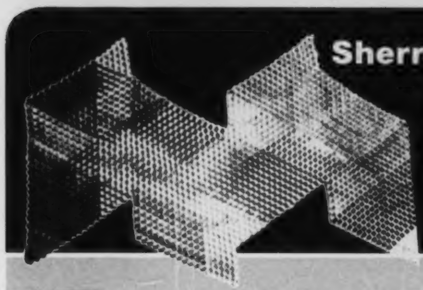
Strasbourg
Librairie Les Idees et Les Arts
Place Brant

The Hague
Artline
Toussaintkade 67-68

Toulouse
Ombres Blanches
Librairie/48
rue Gambetta

Turin
OOLP
Via Principe Amedeo

Vienna
Buchhandlung am Hafnersteig
Hafnersteig 10



Sherri Smith
Fiber Works
Exhibition Dates:
March 19 thru April 16, 1983

Editions Limited Gallery
8702 Keystone Crossing (Fashion Mall)
Indianapolis, IN 46240 • Tel. (317) 848-7878

We'll make you work hard so you'll have an easier time getting the job you want. For information about our programs in Graphic Design, Advertising, Illustration, Fine Arts and Photography, call (617) 262-2844.

THE ART INSTITUTE OF BOSTON
700 Beacon St. Boston, MA 02215
We'll put your creativity to work.

THE SOURCE
RC Gorman
AT
Now & Then Gallery Ltd.
797 Merrick Ave. East Meadow, L.I., N.Y. 11554
(516) 481-1447 (212) 895-1145
LITHOS—CERAMICS—SCULPTURE—SILKSCREENS

E.A.T. BIBLIOGRAPHY 1965-1980
by BILLY KLUVER

Lists 969 publications documenting the evolution of art and technology since 1965

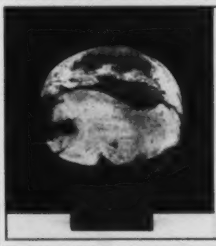
$7.50 plus $1 postage and handling

EXPERIMENTS IN ART AND TECHNOLOGY
49 East 68th Street New York, N.Y. 10021
(212) 285-1690

inter-american Art gallery
1000 madison avenue new york n.y. 10021 (212) 772-7760

RAMIRO LLONA

Galería San Jerónimo
Condado Holiday Inn - 999 Ashford Ave. Condado, P.R. - Tel. 722-1808 / 721-1000



FEATURING ARTISTS OF PUERTO RICO
and
J. D'ESOPO, J. KRESMAN,
C. PFAHL, L. MARCOS,
M. LOVELAND MILLER,
T. SPINNER

'ceramic sculpture 21"d by Sylvia Blanco

Galería San Juan
Blvd. del Valle 204-206 Old San Juan, P.R. - Tel. 722-1808 / 725-3829

MIDTOWN
GALLERIES EST. 1932 11 East 57 St., N.Y. (212) 758-1900

WILLIAM THON
MARCH 29–APRIL 23

FARNSWORTH MUSEUM, ROCKLAND, MAINE
MAY 13–JULY 10

William Thon is represented by MIDTOWN GALLERIES

Anne Harris
Art expo NY
New York Coliseum
Booth no. 1-309
April 7-11

afi Representation:
Arts Focus, Inc.
401 Capitol St., Charleston, WV 25301
(304) 345-9059

54" high

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
A P 1983
UMI

Rosa Esman
Gallery

29 West 57
Street
New York NY
10019

212
421 9490

John Bellany
April 12
to May 7

Lynn Chadwick
Eduardo Chillida
Jose Luis Cuevas
Giacomo Manzù
Marino Marini
Roberto Matta
Henry Moore

Tasende
Gallery
820 Prospect Street, La Jolla, California 92037
(619) 454-3691

Garth
Evans
New Sculpture
March 19-April 20

Robert Elkon
1063 Madison Ave New York
Telephone: 212/535.3940

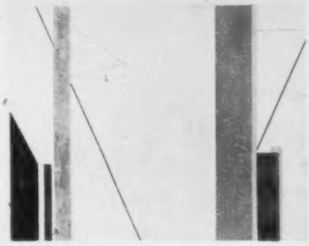
Cynthia Carlson

March 29 - April 23

Insects: A Guide

Pam Adler Gallery
37 West 57 New York 10019 212/980.9696

"Hanover"
Alkyd,
pencil on paper
1982
48" × 60"



Nan
Montgomery

C. GRIMALDIS GALLERY
928 n. charles, balto., md. 21201 301/539-1080

VICTOR WILLING

Paintings

BERNARD JACOBSON GALLERY
24 West 57 Street, New York, NY 10019. Tel 212 581-8346

JACK ZAJAC
Bound Goats: Santa Cruz Series
Through April 23
FORUM GALLERY
1018 Madison Avenue, New York 10021

HANS HINTERREITER
Paintings

JOSEF STAUB
Sculpture

ERICSON GALLERY
23 E 74 ST NYC 10021 737-6155

Index of Advertisers

Aaron-Hastings	223
Adler Gallery, Pam	220
Akira Ikeda Gallery	54
Alexander Brooke	50
Allport Associates	30
American Artist	188
Ars Libri	206
Artexpo, Texas	208
Art Institute of Boston	219
Artransport, Inc.	202
Arts Focus	114
Batman Gallery, Donald	193
Biach Gallery	223
Blum/Helman	Cov IV
Bonlow Gallery	201
Bonnier Gallery	24
Boone Gallery, Mary	52
Borgenicht Gallery	24, 28
Boston Museum School Program	206
Bourassa, Anne	42
Boyd Gallery, Roy	190
Branchville SoHo Gallery	53
Brentwood Gallery	201
Brown & Bro., Inc., Arthur	207
Carone Gallery	43
Castelli Graphics	60
Castelli, Leo	56
Chautauqua Institution	202
Chicago Int'l Art Exposition	113
Chivas Regal	Cov III
Chowning Gallery, Joseph	223
Christie, Manson & Woods	31, 33
Cicero, Jan	187
Clark Gallery, Garth	200
ConStruct	198
Cooper Gallery, Paula	64
Cowles Gallery, Charles	62
Crown Point Press	42
Dart Gallery	59
Davidson Gallery, Maxwell	60
DBR	190
De Gooyer, Kirk	61
Delahunty Gallery	61, 63
Del Re, Marisa	Cov II
De Woody, James	43
De Nagy	54
Dintenfass, Terry	53
Dominion Gallery	118
Durham Gallery, Linda	206
Dyansen Gallery	206
Eason Gallery	201
Editions Ltd. Gallery	219
Einstein & Co., G.W.	46
Elkon Gallery, Robert	220
Emmerich Gallery, Andre	2
Ericson Gallery	220
Esman Gallery, Rosa	220
Exhibit A	21
Findlay Jr., Inc., David	47
Finnair	192
Firebird Gallery	44
Fort Worth Gallery	191
49th Parallel	51
Forum Gallery	220
Fourcade, Xavier	8
French Gallery, Sherry	119
Frumkin Gallery, Allan	55
Galeria San Jeronimo	219
Galeria San Juan	219
Galeria Giorgio Persano	34
Galerie Beyeler	58
Galerie de France	6
Galerie Metropol	187
Galerie St. Etienne	56
Galerie Michael Werner	194
Galerie Rudolf Zwirner	5
Galleri Bellman	9
Gallery Paule Anglim	194
Gallery K	48
Gallery Mack	115
Gallery One, Inc.	206
G.E. Fine Arts	192
Getler/Pall	52
Gillman Gallery, Barbara	63
Gladstone Gallery, Barbara	50
Gold Gallery, Fay	116
Graham Gallery	41
Gray Gallery, Richard	25
Great Northern Brokerage	201
Greenberg Gallery	60, 194
Grimaldis Gallery, C.	220
Grumbacher	186
Haber, Suellen	40
Haber-Theodore	61
Hadler-Rodriguez	56
Hamilton Gallery	56
Hammer Gallery	47
Harcus Gallery	118
Harper & Row	118
Harris, Anne	219
Heidenberg, Lillian	22
Hirschl & Adler	29
Hoffman Gallery, Nancy	25
Hokin Gallery	64
Hokin/Kaufman Gallery	64
Horan Gallery, Vivian	14
Horwitch Gallery, Elaine	38
Iannetti Gallery, Pasquale	208
Impressions Gallery	64
Incorporated Gallery	206
Ingber Gallery	208
Inter-American Art Gallery	219
International Art Exposition, Inc.	208
Irving Gallery	32
Ivory/Kimpton	49
Jacobson, Bernard	220
Janis Gallery, Sidney	22
Janus Gallery	62
Jerry's Artarama	207
Kantor, Ulrike	51
Kind Gallery, Phyllis	116
Klein Gallery	200
Knightwood & Brooks, Ltd.	190
Knoedler & Co., M.	32
Knowlton Gallery, Monique	30
Kornblee Gallery	52
Krakow Gallery, Barbara	26
Kraushaar Galleries	46
Landfall Press	117
L.A. Packing & Crating	208
Leavin Gallery, Margo	29
Lee Video Gallery, Jane	206
Leon Gallery, Jon	196
Lewin Galleries, B.	193
Lincoln Center Gallery	208
Locks Gallery, Marian	63
Lowenstein Gallery	206
Maroney & Co., James	18
Maryanne-Martin	49
Mathes Gallery, Barbara	12
Matisse Gallery, Pierre	10
Midtown Galleries	219
Miller Gallery, Robert	27
Mobil	176
Modern Master Tapestries	196
Molasky, Stephen	208
Morris Gallery, Donald	57
Multiples/Marian Goodman	116
McIntosh/Drysdale	194
Nahan Art Galleries	117
Needlman, Phyllis	223
Nimslo Corporation	198
Now & Then	219
October Gallery	223
Odyssia Gallery	45
Oscarsson-Hood	62
Ovsey Gallery, Neil Co.	58
PA Academy of Fine Arts	208
Pace Gallery	1
Paige Gallery	191
Parsons, Betty	52, 60
Perimeter Press	119
Perlman, Miriam	198
Pleiades Gallery	196
Post House Steak & Chops	207
Printworld Directory	196
Quay Gallery	44
Rachofsky, Morton	193
Reed, Harold	54
Renault Recherches	196
Ricco-Johnson	117
Richebourg/McCoy	58
Roger Gallery, Arthur	43
Rosenfield Gallery, Betsy	4
Rutberg Gallery, Jack	57
Salander O'Reilly	7
Sawyer Gallery, William	20
Schab Gallery, William	54
School of Visual Arts	202
Sculpture Placement	192
Seguy Gallery, Yvonne	223
Shiva, Inc.	202
Sirena Art Studio	206
SL Art Gallery	208
Sotheby Parke Bernet	23
Sperone Westwater Fischer	45
Staempfli Gallery	16
Stoller & Co., John	8
Stone Gallery, Allan	27, 44
Stone Gallery, Jeremy	50
Studio 47	55
Tasende Gallery	220
Tatistcheff & Co., Peter	223
Taylor Art, Carol	118
Texas Gallery	200
Thorp Gallery, Edward	50
Totah Gallery, Edward	48
Twining Gallery	190
Vanderwoude Tananbaum	28
Wagman Gallery, Barbara	200
Weinberg Gallery, Daniel	64
Weston Press & Gallery	198
White & Assoc., Roberto	26,44
White Gallery, Martha	58
Winsor & Newton	191
Wolf, Daniel	193
Wurzer Gallery	59
Yoseido Gallery	223
Young/Hoffman	62
Zabriskie Gallery	23
Ziller & Assoc.	208
Zwirner & Sproveri	5
SCULPTURE INSTALLATIONS
Actual Art Foundation	106
Art for Architecture	104
Berggruen Gallery, John	88, 89
Bladen, Ronald	70
Bromm, Hal Gallery	108
Brown Gallery, Diane	112
DeNagy, Tibor	108
Dintenfass Gallery, Terry	93
Elkon Gallery, Robert	98
49th Parallel	96
Fourcade, Xavier	68,69
Fuller Goldeen	78, 79, 80, 91
Galeria Maeght	97
Galerie Beaubourg	99
Galerie Maeght	90
Gimenez, Carmen	92
Hirschl & Adler	82, 83
Houston Fine Art Press	109
Hutchinson Gallery, Max	75, 76, 77
Jacks, Grant	105
Janis Gallery, Sidney	107
Marlborough Gallery	71, 72, 73
Miller Gallery, Robert	84, 85
Mckee Gallery, David	86, 87
Oil & Steel	74
Pace Gallery	102
Panicali, Carla	104
Salander-O'Reilly	101
Sawyer Gallery, William	111
Schoelkopf Gallery, Robert	67
Segal Gallery, Thomas	94
Serra, Richard	92
Tacha, Athena	66
Vanderwoude Tananbaum	100
Washburn Gallery	103
Yares Gallery	110
Ydessa Gallery	96
Zabriskie Gallery	95
Zolla Lieberman	91

VOL 71 ISS 4 AP 1983 UMI

Artworld

Continued from page 224

raise funds to cover monthly maintenance, security, gas and electricity and photocopying, all previously provided free by the New School.

A series of benefit events and festivities will precede the public opening on Sept. 23. The inaugural show will survey those aspects of contemporary art that have been presented by the New Museum since its founding.

Another SoHo Museum Planned

Edward Broida, a California collector and real estate investor, has bought a $3-million, four-story former trucking garage in the heart of SoHo (Prince Street, between West Broadway and Wooster) which he hopes to transform into a museum of contemporary art by early 1985. According to Broida, the 40,000-square-foot structure will have almost as much exhibition space as the Whitney—two floors for changing exhibitions (half to be originated by the museum) and one for rotating selections from the permanent collection. Broida intends to finance the project independently, at least at the outset, and to hire a small professional staff.

The museum's holdings will be based on Broida's recently acquired (since '78) private collection, notable for its focus on works by Philip Guston. Future acquistions will be directed toward concentrations of works by relatively few artists.

Miami's Center for the Fine Arts Opens

Miami is preparing to lure art- as well as sun-worshippers. That city's newest art institution, a "kunsthalle" with 16,000 square feet of gallery space and a 3,300 square-foot outdoor sculpture area, opens April 21 with a four-month series of preinaugural exhibitions. The official inauguration is Oct. 27.

Headed by Jan van der Marck, who was the founding director of Chicago's Contemporary Art Museum, the Miami Center for the Fine Arts will originate and borrow exhibitions of both national and international scope. It does not plan to acquire a permanent collection.

The Center is part of the $25-million Metro-Dade Cultural Center, which also incorporates the Miami-Dade Public Library and the Historical Museum of Southern Florida. The complex's three Mediterranean-style structures are designed by Johnson/Burgee.

For October's grand opening, a major survey of 200 key works from 64 U.S. museums will occupy the entire space. Future plans include loan shows from the Prado and from van der Marck's native Holland.

Operations funds are provided by Dade County; the exhibition program, budgeted this year at $600,000, depends on private donations and state and federal grants. So far, strong local support bodes well for the Center's financial future.

Teheran Update

The three U.S. museums that have been holding art which was on loan to them from Teheran's Museum of Contemporary Art at the outbreak of the Iranian revolution [see A.i.A., Oct. '81] recently complied with an order from the Iranian government to return the works as far as Bonn, West Germany.

De Kooning's Light in August (1946), held at Cornell University's Herbert F. Johnson Museum, as well as his Woman III (1951–52) and Dubuffet's La Dêputation (a five-part sculpture, 1976), held at the National Gallery, were sent last October and officially accepted by a Teheran museum representative in Bonn in December. The Guggenheim Museum shipped Rothko's No. 2 (1954) on Feb. 16. As we go to press, the arrival in Bonn of that painting has not yet been confirmed.

It is the U.S. museums' understanding that the works are to be stored in a Bonn warehouse until Iran's Ministry of Islamic Guidance arranges their passage back to Teheran. Iran is under no obligation to provide information on the art's whereabouts or ultimate delivery to the Teheran museum.

Awards

This year's College Art Association annual awards were announced in February: Donald B. Kuspit received the Frank Jewett Mather Award for distinction in art criticism; the Charles Rufus Morey Award for scholarship in art history went to Art the Ape of Nature: Studies in Honor of H.W. Janson, edited by Lucy Freeman Sandler; the Distinguished Teaching of Art History Award went to Oleg Grabar; Elmer Bischoff received the Distinguished Teaching of Art Award.

The CAA's Women's Caucus for Art's fifth annual awards for lifetime achievement went to painter Edna Andrade, sculptor Dorothy Dehner, photographer Lotte Jacobi, historians Ellen Johnson and Stella Kramrisch, fiber artist Lenore Tawney and quiltmaker Pecolia Warner.

The Art Dealers Association's annual award for lifetime achievement in art history this year goes to John Rewald, Distinguished Professor at the Graduate Center, City University of New York and a leading authority on Impressionism and Post-Impressionism.

The first annual $500 awards for distinguished newspaper art criticism, initiated and coordinated by the journal Art/World and sponsored by Manufacturers Hanover Trust, go to Franz Schulze (Chicago Sun-Times) for contemporary art; David Elliott (Chicago Sun-Times) for art history; and Joseph Giovannini (Los Angeles Herald-Examiner) for architecture. (Giovannini is now reporting on architecture for The New York Times.)

Museumorama

Last month, the Los Angeles County Museum unveiled the $9-million extension of its Ahmanson Gallery, which houses the museum's permanent collection. The addition, which includes a connecting gallery-bridge to the museum's Frances and Armand Hammer Wing, provides 30,000 square feet of new exhibition space. Reinstallation of the collection on all four levels of the Ahmanson Gallery should be complete by the end of this month.

The North Carolina Museum of Art, which has survived since 1956 in a state office building, comes of age April 5 when it reopens in its new, $15.75-million Edward Durrell Stone-designed facility. Situated on 164 acres five miles from downtown Raleigh, the four-story structure contains 45,000 square feet of exhibition space for its collection of about 6,000 works (the museum's principal strengths are in Renaissance and Baroque painting). There will also be a 5,000 square-foot gallery for temporary exhibitions; the museum will begin initiating its own shows, with an emphasis on contemporary art, late this year.

Architects for the new National Gallery of Canada, a $93.3 million project to be built in Ottawa over the next five years, were recently announced. Canadian Moshe Safdie, designer of Expo 67's Habitat in Montreal, and the Parkin Partnership, a Canadian firm headed by John Parkin, will collaborate. Overseeing the project is the Canada Museum Construction Corporation, whose chairman is Jean Sutherland Boggs, formerly director of Canada's National Gallery and of the Philadelphia Museum of Art.

CAPS Grants '82–83

The Creative Artists Public Service Program has announced its '82–83 grants. CAPS policy has been changed due to a recent stipulation by the New York State Council on the Arts (which funds CAPS) that from now on money will be available to artists one time only. Awards are up from last year's $3,500 to $5,000 in most categories and to $7,000 in sculpture, in which there are fewer awards. Grants in specific categories will now be given in alternate years: the first cycle includes graphics, painting, photography, sculpture, music composition and poetry (the latter two not listed below). Awards for choreography, fiction, film, multi-media, playwriting/screenwriting and video will be made in '83–84.

Sculpture: Charles Abramson, Peter Brown, John Britain Bunkley, Nancy Clark, Peter Dudek, R.M. Fischer, Myrna Gordon, Walter Jackson, Ann Knutson, Justen Ladda, Barry Ledoux, Ursula Meyer, Linda Peer, Gary Perkins, Hank DeRicco, Jorge Luis Rodriguez, Maura Sheehan, Stephen Spretnjak, Haim Steinbach. Painting: Ida Applebroog, Marjorie Apter-McKevitt, Lorraine Archacki, Rolando Briseno, Howard Buchwald, Marina Cappelletto, Donna Clark, Thom Cooney-Crawford, Richard Corozine, Mary Beth Edelson, Jeffrey Elgin, Julie Gross, Michael Hafftka, Ralph Hilton, Shirley Irons, Hilary Kliros, Vitaly Komar/Alexander Melamid, Jill Beth Levine, Marion Lerner Levine, Lawrence List, Stephen Mueller, Joseph Nechvatal, Thomas Nozkowski, Juan Sánchez, Barbara Schwartz, Mark Schwartz, Stephen Sherman, Lee Sherry, Anthony Thompson, Carolyn Virgil, Michael Young. Photography: Frances Antmann, Lynne Augeri, Martine Barrat/Tom Bowes, Susan Barron, Dawoud Bey, Marilyn Baridges, Albert Chong, Lois Conner, Jeffrey Day, Roger Freeman, Tom Grill, Sandra Haber, John Kennard, Kathleen Kenyon, J. Michael Lesco, Dan McCormack, Sandy Noyes, Karen Ann Pell, Sylvia Plachy, Carmen Quesada, Durston Saylor, Patricia Scialo, Michael Spano, Harvey Stein, Tony Velez, Warner Wade. Graphics: Elliott Barowitz, Barbara Beck, Diane Bertolo, Lula Mae Bolcton, Judy Blum, Lori Christmastree, Charles Clough, Cyril David, Seena Donneson, Karen Fredericks, Jacqueline Freedman, Robert "Bobby G" Goldman, Michael Herbold, Kate Horsfield, Shirley Kassman, Nancy Lawton, Margot McLean, John Morton, Giro Naito, Helen Oji, Elaine Reichek, Barbara E. "Barbara Ess" Schwartz, Gregory Scholette, Betty Tompkins, Gretchen Treitz, Rose Viggiano, Paul Wong.

Obituaries

Josep Lluis Sert, 80, Barcelona-born architect who merged a Mediterranean sensibility with a life-long commitment to the modernist principles set forth by his mentor, Le Corbusier, and who championed the role of the architect both as city planner and as collaborator with visual artists.

Sert emigrated to the U.S. from Spain in 1939, when Franco came to power. (An active republican, Sert designed the Spanish Pavilion at the 1937 Paris World's Fair, for which Picasso's Guernica was commissioned.) He taught city planning at Yale ('44-45), worked on numerous planning ventures in Latin America throughout the '40s and '50s, and in 1953 succeeded Walter Gropius as dean of Harvard's Graduate School of Design (from which he retired in '69).

As co-founder of the Cambridge, Mass. firm of Sert, Jackson and Associates, Sert designed large-scale public projects, including buildings at Boston University, MIT and Harvard, and apartment complexes on New York City's Roosevelt Island ('76). Among his private commissions were studios for Braque and Miró and museums for the Fondation Maeght and the Miró Foundation's Center for Studies of Contemporary Art. In 1981, Sert received the American Institute of Architects' Gold Medal.

Yoseido Gallery

Contemporary Japanese prints

5-5-15, Ginza, Chuo-ku, Tokyo,
Japan phone: 571-1312, 2471

100 page catalog upon request — $8.00

TATISTCHEFF

TOMAR LEVINE

STILL LIFE

APRIL 5-29

TATISTCHEFF
38 EAST 57 • NEW YORK • 888-1599

theOctober
GALLERY

Specializing in Contemporary Works
on Paper by
American, Canadian and European Artists

1226 Spring St., St. Helena, CA 94574 707 963-7501

THOMAS AKAWIE

PAINTINGS APRIL 2-28

Joseph Chowning Gallery
1717 17th Street · San Francisco 94103
415/626-7496

LECOQUE
1891-1981

maison rose, montmartre-oil 1978

Biach Galleries

Cleveland Plaza suite 108
123 North Union Ave.
Cranford, New Jersey 07016
(201) 272-7070

RANDY ASPRODITES
NEW WORK
APRIL 30 - MAY 19
ALAN GERSON
NEW WORK
MAY 21 - JUNE 9
AARON•HASTINGS
GALLERY
1130 St. Charles Ave., New Orleans, La., 70130 (504)523-7202

Josely Carvalho
Diary of Images: Memories 1
April 5 - May 1

Only He Has Blue Eyes!
Mixed Media. 30"x40".

Yvonne Séguy Gallery
61 West 62 Street • Harkness Plaza • New York, New York 10023
(212) 265-3314

Charles Ringness works on paper
April

& Phyllis Needlman

216 East Ontario St., Chicago, IL 60611

VOL
7
1
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI

Artworld

People

John Walsh, Jr., curator of paintings at Boston's Museum of Fine Arts since 1977 and former curator of European paintings at the Metropolitan Museum (1972–75), has been appointed director of the J. Paul Getty Museum in Malibu, Calif. He succeeds Stephen Garrett, the museum's first director (1976–82).

Walsh takes charge this fall at a crucial moment in the Getty's history: having inherited over $1 billion from the J. Paul Getty Trust last year, the museum is currently planning a major expansion of its functions and facilities. Three new Getty institutions—a museum, a study center and a conservation institute—are scheduled to be built in the Los Angeles area by the end of the decade.

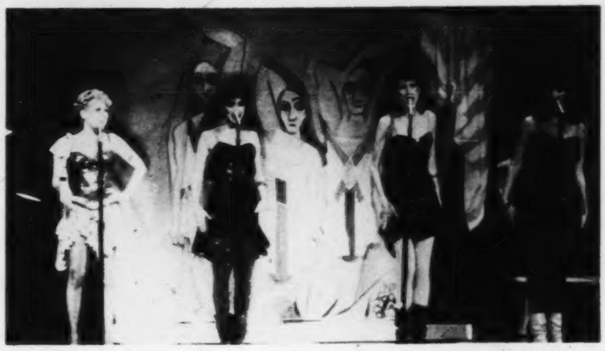
John Walsh, Jr., new director of the J. Paul Getty Museum, Malibu.

Walsh will be instrumental in selecting the architect and site and in defining the museum's future goals. Major issues include whether and how to broaden the scope of the collections—now limited to antiquities, French 18th- and 19th-century decorative arts and European old masters—and whether the Getty will organize big, temporary exhibitions.

Walsh, a specialist in 17th- and 18th-century Dutch painting, describes himself as a "passionate amateur of contemporary art." Although it is unlikely that this passion will be expressed at the Getty, Walsh intends to "dive in" to L.A.'s contemporary scene on his own. Judging from his impact on Boston's current art and artists, he will be a welcome presence.

Robert T. Buck, 44, director of the Albright-Knox Art Gallery, Buffalo, since 1973, becomes director of the Brooklyn Museum in July. A specialist in 19th-century French and 20th-century art, Buck has organized shows on Sam Francis, Richard Diebenkorn, Sonia Delaunay and Fernand Léger, and is preparing a Robert Motherwell retrospective.

Sydney J. Freedberg, expert on Italian High Renaissance and Mannerist art, editor and author, has been named to the new position of chief curator at the National Gallery, Washington, D.C. After teaching for 30 years, Freedberg will retire as Harvard's Arthur Kingsley Porter Professor of Fine Arts this June. In a new arrangement which splits former assistant director Charles Parkhurst's duties into two posts, Freedberg will oversee all curatorial departments and supervise acquisitions and exhibitions; deputy director John Wilmerding will be in charge of administration.



Observed: "Demoiselles" make the big time. In one of the most gratuitously art-laden theatrical events in years, Picasso's "Demoiselles d'Avignon" made a surprise appearance in Bette Midler's recent extravaganza at Radio City Music Hall, New York. (Sets: Bob De Morra; photo: Debra Trebits.) Other colossal, competently faked high-art simulacra framed the giant Art Deco proscenium: an unmistakable Delaunay, plus close cousins to Hans Hofmann, Stuart Davis, de Kooning . . . .

Mark Rosenthal leaves the University Art Museum, Berkeley, where he has been curator of the collection since 1976, to become curator of 20th-century art at the Philadelphia Museum this July.

At the Village Voice: Roberta Smith is named senior art critic. Kim Levin becomes a regular art reviewer.

Mayor Ed Koch has appointed Bess Myerson to succeed Henry Geldzahler as New York City's Cultural Affairs Commissioner.

Museum Preview of the Month

"Constable's England" opens at the Metropolitan Museum on April 16 [through Sept. 4]. Of the 64 oil paintings and oil sketches in the exhibition, 26 works have never before been shown in this country. Observing that this is the first "substantial Constable exhibition in the U.S.," John Pope-Hennessy, chairman of the Met's European painting department (and initiator of the idea for a John Constable show), also noted that the exhibition provides an unprecedented opportunity to juxtapose a number of artist's preparatory sketches with the finished paintings based on those studies. Some of these complementary works—such as the sketch and the final version of Arundel Mill and Castle (1837)—have not been seen together since they left the artist's studio.

Concentrating on landscapes in oil, the artist's principal subject and medium (none of his portraits, watercolors or drawings is included), the show comprehensively documents those English regions which especially inspired Constable—i.e., Suffolk, Essex, Brighton, Hampstead, London and Salisbury. It was Constable's stated ambition to become a "natural painter." Early in his career, he began working out-of-doors; the exhibition contains several of his open air sketches and paintings. Also represented are salon paintings (both the half-scale sketch and finished version of The Cornfield, 1826, are among them), naturalistic landscapes (which influenced the French Barbizon and American Hudson River Schools), his later "expressionistic" works (in which he used a palette knife), and his cloud studies. According to Pope-Hennessy, the most important painting included is a full-scale oil sketch titled View on the Stour near Dedham (1821-22), on loan from London's Royal Holloway College.

"Constable's England," curated by Graham Reynolds (formerly of the Victoria and Albert Museum), was conceived as one of the Met's contributions to "Britain Salutes New York 1983," the British arts festival which begins this month and continues through November.

Whitney Opens Midtown Branch

On April 7, the Whitney Museum opens its third satellite gallery, in the new Ulrich Franzen-designed headquarters of Philip Morris at 120 Park Avenue, across from Grand Central Terminal. (The museum's other branches are in Manhattan's financial district and in the Stamford, Conn. headquarters of Champion International.)

A five-year agreement, similar to the one between the Whitney and Champion International, stipulates that the corporate host shall house and maintain the Whitney Museum of American Art at Philip Morris (the gallery's official title). Philip Morris will also contribute to the costs of the exhibition program, directed by Lisa Phillips, associate curator of the Whitney's branch museums. The museum occupies 6,300 square feet in the building's enclosed, street-level plaza. The area is divided into two sections: a glass-walled court, with a soaring 42-foot ceiling, to be used for long-term installations of large sculpture, and an adjacent, smaller gallery for changing exhibitions (ca. six a year).

The semipermanent installation (some pieces may be rotated at intervals) is a somewhat familiar ensemble of large-scale works by Calder, Oldenburg, Segal, Noguchi, Lichtenstein, Nevelson, Robert Graham and Bryan Hunt. Chamberlain and di Suvero have created new works on loan to the Whitney. Drawings by these sculptors as well as small-scale sculpture will constitute the inaugural show in the adjacent gallery. Starting May 18, it will house "The Forum Exhibition: Selections and Additions," a recreation of the landmark 1916 show [through June 22].

The New Museum Moves to SoHo

The New Museum will emigrate downtown late this spring, after having spent its first five years on 14th Street. Housed and maintained gratis since 1977 by Manhattan's New School for Social Research, the museum has been given title to more spacious quarters in the newly renovated Astor Building, at 583 Broadway. The outright donation of two and one-half floors in the commercial condominium by its developers, 583–587 Broadway Associates, quadruples the museum's size to a total of 23,000 square feet.

The most immediate benefit of the move is a 7,500-square-foot ground floor exhibition space. A 200-seat auditorium will house a film and video program. Other new features: a generous area for "WorkSpace," the museum's open-studio program, a museum shop and lobby.

The annual budget is expected to double (from the present $450,000) over the next three years. For the first time, the museum will have to

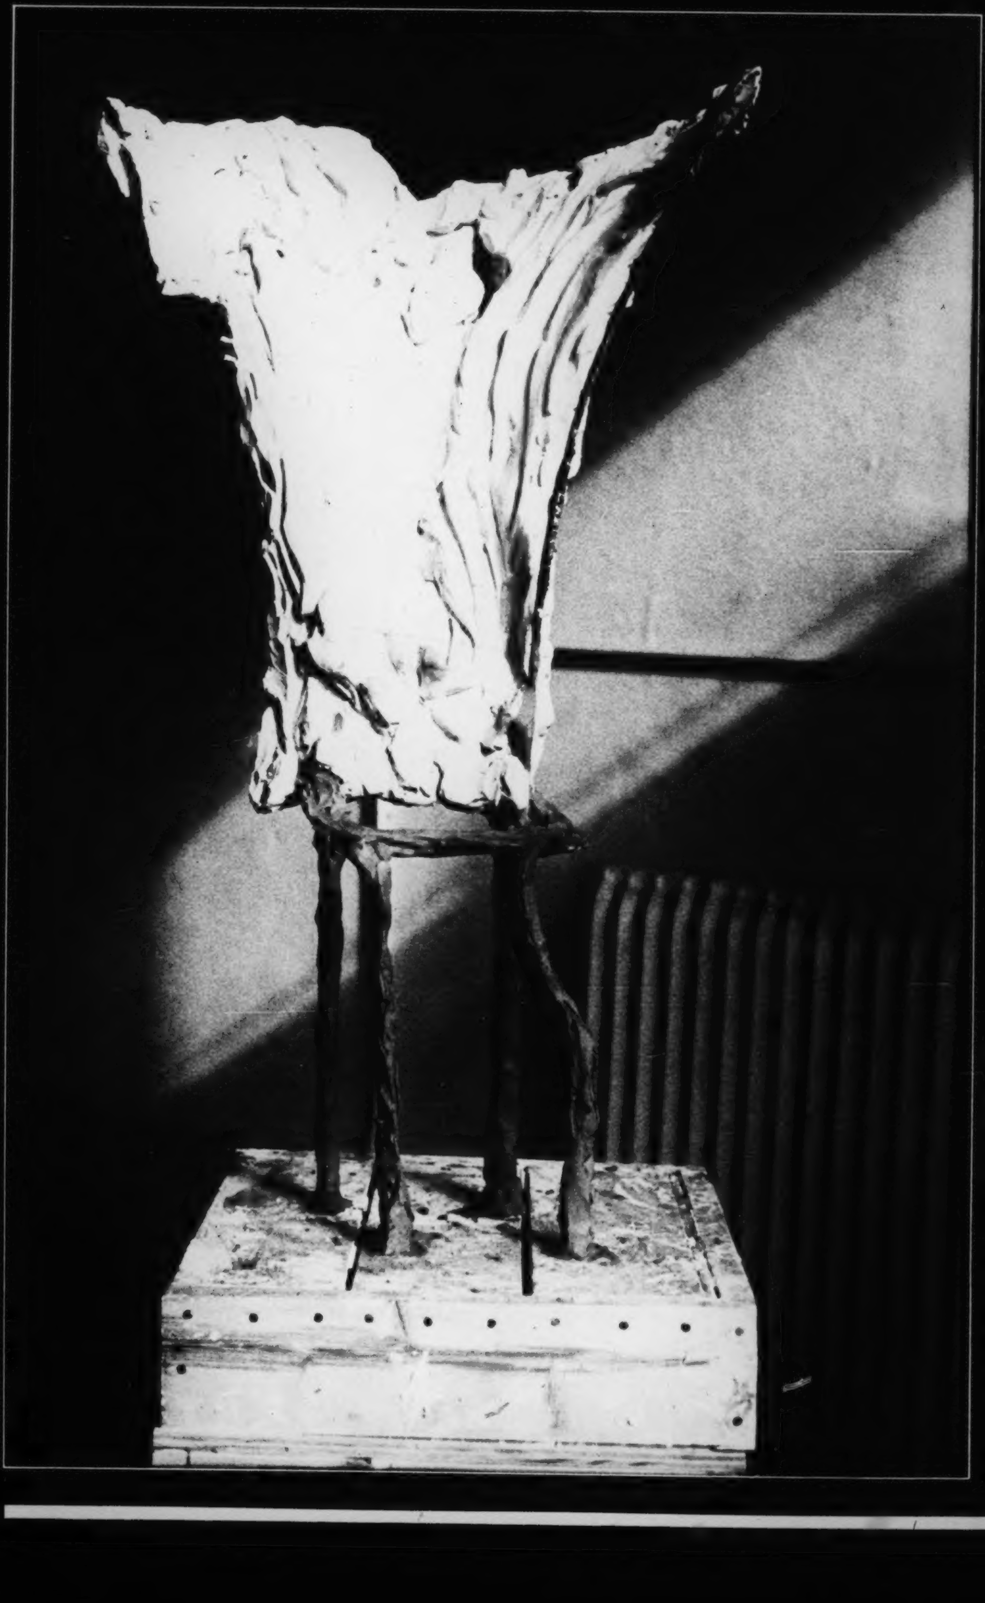
Continued on page 222

873154
PURE GOLD
999.9

Worth its weight in Chivas Regal.

12 YEARS OLD WORLDWIDE • BLENDED SCOTCH WHISKY • 86 PROOF • © 1983 GENERAL WINE & SPIRITS CO., NEW YORK, N.Y.

VOL
71
ISS
4
AP
1983
UMI



Bryan Hunt
New Sculpture
BlumHelman
20 West 57, New York
30 March - 30 April
112 Greene, New York
2 April - 14 May

VOL
7
1
ISS
5
MY 1983
UMI

Art in America

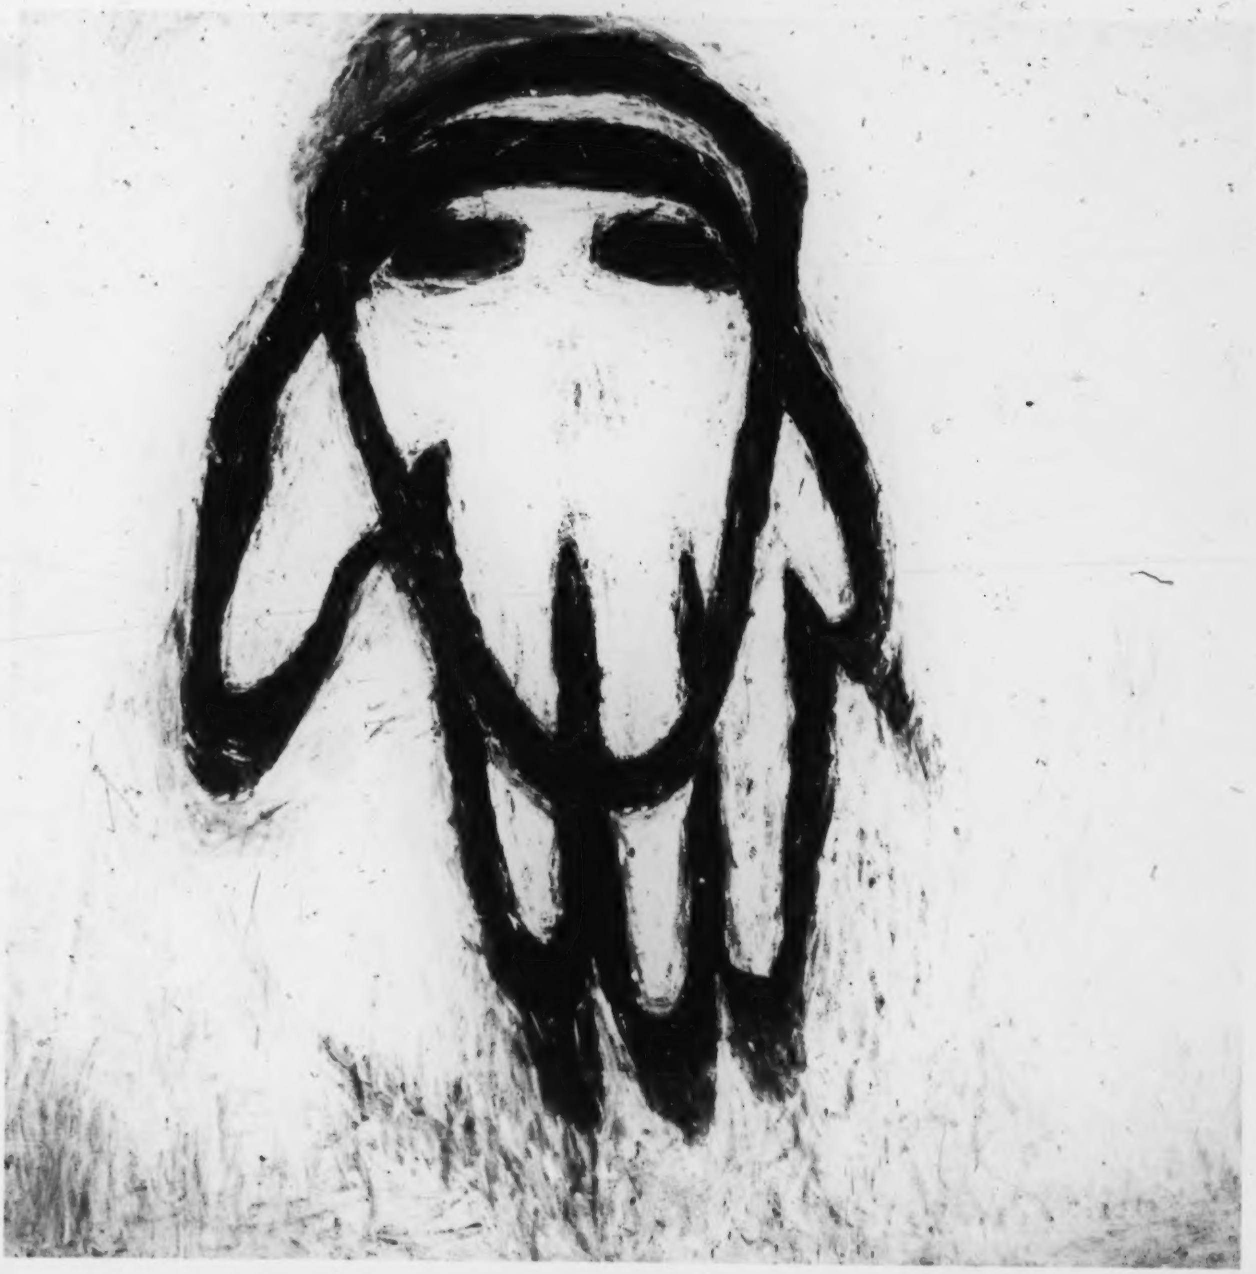
MAY 1983/$3.50
Outside North America/$5.00

Cover: Susan Rothenberg's Untitled, 1980-81
Joel Shapiro/Bob Thompson/Ellen Lanyon/Robert Moskowitz
Linda Nochlin on Orientalism/Susan Rothenberg/Charles James's Fashion
Boston: A Special Report/Books/Review of Exhibitions



VOL
7
1
ISS
5
MY 1983
UMI

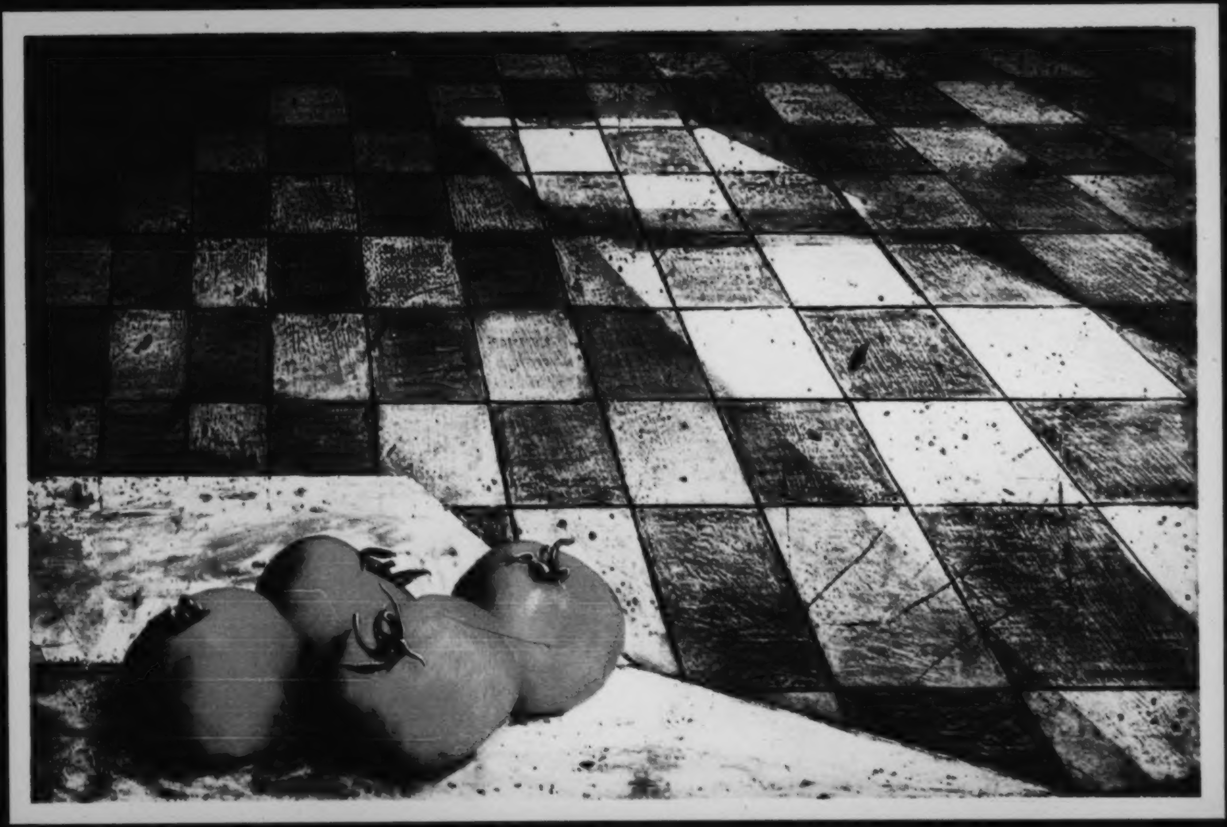
REALISM
AT MILLIKEN



April 30–June 1, 1983

Alexander F. Milliken Inc.
98 Prince Street/NY, NY 10012
212/966-7800

ROBERT BERLIND
ARNOLD BITTLEMAN
WENDELL CASTLE
MARY ANN CURRIER
JILLIAN DENBY
STEVE HAWLEY
STEPHEN LORBER
PAUL RICKERT

Steve Hawley, Four Frightened Tomatoes in Fear of Becoming Paste, 1982 Oil, wax, alkyd resin, linen mounted on board; [illegible] in.

New Editions at the Chicago Art Fair

STEINBERG

Louise Nevelson

Al Held.

C. Close

Jean Dubuffet

Jim Dine

Michael Mazur

don nice

Tom Holland

PACE EDITIONS 32 EAST 57 NEW YORK

VOL
71
ISS
5
MY 1983
UMI

Galerie Maeght

Arnold Herstand, President
U.S. Office: 9 West 57th Street
New York, New York 10019
Telephone 212 371 9277
Telex 428931
By Appointment Only

Galerie Maeght: Paris, Zurich

Joaquin Torres-García

"Barco Rojo Constructivo"
1943, Oil on Board
$17\frac{3}{4}$ x $21\frac{15}{16}$ in. (45 x 55.5 cm)

Exclusively Represented by Galerie Maeght, New York

Art in America

MAY 1983

The Imaginary Orient Linda Nochlin 118
A recent exhibition of 19th-century French Orientalist painting reveals links between realism and power, violence and the picturesque.

Ellen Lanyon's Natural Acts Lucy R. Lippard 132
Combining wildlife with kitsch, Lanyon's paintings explore the subject of metamorphosis.

Myths and Memories: Bob Thompson Judith Wilson 139
Thompson's emblematic imagery had its sources in art history as well as autobiography.

Building, Statue, Cliff Prudence Carlson 144
In his latest paintings of towering iconic forms, Robert Moskowitz discovers a newly symbolic gravity.

Manifest Densities Donald B. Kuspit 148
Seen in a traveling retrospective, Joel Shapiro's small-scale sculptures confront absence and activate negative space.

Spooks and Floats Robert Storr 153
Susan Rothenberg's new paintings treat spectral figures and other images with a coolly expressionist brushstroke.

DEPARTMENTS

Review of Books: Texts and Contexts Donald B. Kuspit 13

Photos, Texts and Photo-texts Calvin Bedient 17

Report from Boston Sarah McFadden 33

Report from Paris: Hobson's Choice Yve-Alain Bois 49

Fashion: Shapes by James Lawrence Campbell 53

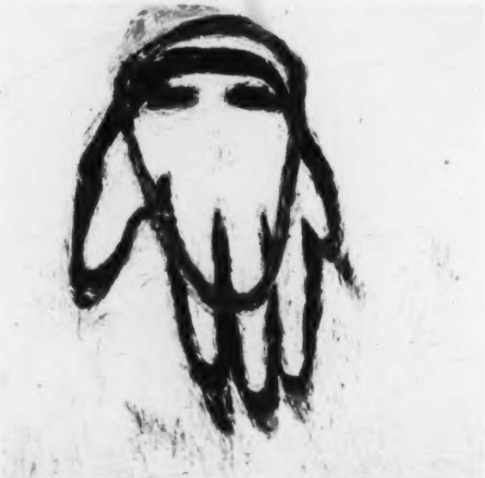
Artworld 224

REVIEW OF EXHIBITIONS

New York, Buffalo, New Haven, Chicago, Los Angeles, San Francisco 161



Cover: Susan Rothenberg's Untitled (blue), 1980–81, acrylic and flashe on canvas, 114 inches square; collection Sidney & Frances Lewis Foundation, Richmond, Va. See article on p. 153.

Editor: Elizabeth C. Baker

Managing Editor: Joan Simon / Executive Editor: Nancy Marmer / Senior Editors: Ted Mooney, Craig Owens / Associate Editors: Prudence Carlson, Hal Foster / Assistant Managing Editor: Kathryn Howarth / Assistant Editor: Robert Fisher / Designer: Alberto P. Gavasci / Associate Designer: Louis D'Esposito / Directory Manager: Amy Slaton / Consultant: John Peter / Contributing Editors: Donald B. Kuspit, Lucy Lippard, Sarah McFadden, Linda Nochlin, Carter Ratcliff, Bryan Robertson, Irving Sandler, Peter Schjeldahl, Roberta Smith, Charles F. Stuckey / Corresponding Editors: Chicago, Franz Schulze; San Francisco, Peter Selz; Washington D.C., David Tannous; London, Suzi Gablik; Rome, Milton Gendel

Publisher: Paul Shanley

Director of Advertising: Susan B. Anthony / Advertising Sales: Susan McCall, Karen Niedzielski, Ruth Rothseid / Advertising Services: Susanne Vorster, Mary Baez / Production: Mary Jontry / Production Assistant: Sarah King / Promotion Director: Valerie Green / Circulation Director: Barbara Gutman / Circulation Manager: Susan Blattman / Marketing Services Director: Karen Tubridy / Art in America, 850 Third Ave., N.Y.C., 10022, Tel. (212) 715-2600

Director for International Development: John H. Liesveld Jr., Art in America, 39 Quai des Grands Augustins, 75006 Paris, France. Tel. (1) 325.26.55.

WHITNEY COMMUNICATIONS CORPORATION MAGAZINE DIVISION
PRESIDENT John S. Prescott SENIOR VICE PRESIDENT, FINANCE/ADMINISTRATION Gordon H. Duncan
VICE PRESIDENT MARKETING William Hitzig VICE PRESIDENT PLANNING Dean Haine
VICE PRESIDENT PRODUCTION James Kearney VICE PRESIDENT PRODUCT DEVELOPMENT Virginia Evans PROMOTION DIRECTOR James Anderson

WHITNEY COMMUNICATIONS CORPORATION
CHAIRMAN Walter N. Thayer
PRESIDENT Charles H. G. Rees

Vol. 71, No. 5 (May) Art in America is published 11 times a year (monthly except July) by Art in America, Inc., 850 Third Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10022. Telephone (area code 212) 715-2600. Cable address: AMARTMAG. A member of the Magazine Division of Whitney Communications Corporation. Contents copyright © 1983 by Art in America, Inc., and may not be reproduced in any manner or form without permission. ISSN: 0004-3214. The opinions expressed in "Issues and Commentary," apart from the editor's comments, are those of the writers themselves and not necessarily those of this magazine. Not responsible for unsolicited manuscripts or photographs. Art in America is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature and the Art Index. Back volumes of Art in America are available in microfiche from Bell & Howell, Att. Periodical Department, Old Mansfield Road, Wooster, Ohio 44691. Microfilm copies are available through Xerox University Microfilm, Ann Arbor, Michigan 48106. Articles appearing in this magazine are abstracted and indexed in Historical Abstracts and/or America: History and Life and RILA. Circulation is verified by the Audit Bureau of Circulations. Controlled circulation postage paid at Concord, N.H. and New York, N.Y. BACK ISSUES AND COMPLETE VOLUMES: Lawrence McGilvery, P.O. Box 852, LaJolla, Calif., 92038. SUBSCRIPTIONS: U.S. 11 issues $34.95, 22 issues $59.95, 33 issues $79.95. Possessions & Canada add $8.00 per year. All others add $15.00 per year. Domestic single copy $3.50 prepaid. Outside North America $5.00. Single copy August/Annual $7.45 prepaid (includes $1.50 postage and handling). SUBSCRIPTION OFFICE: Art in America, 542 Pacific Ave., Marion, Ohio 43302. Telephone (area code 614) 383-3141. FOR CHANGE OF ADDRESS send old and new addresses and label from a recent issue. POSTMASTER: Send Form No. 3579 to Art in America, 542 Pacific Avenue, Marion, Ohio 43302.

Member of the Audit Bureau of Circulations

VOL 71 ISS 5 MY 1983 UMI

ARMAN'S ORCHESTRA

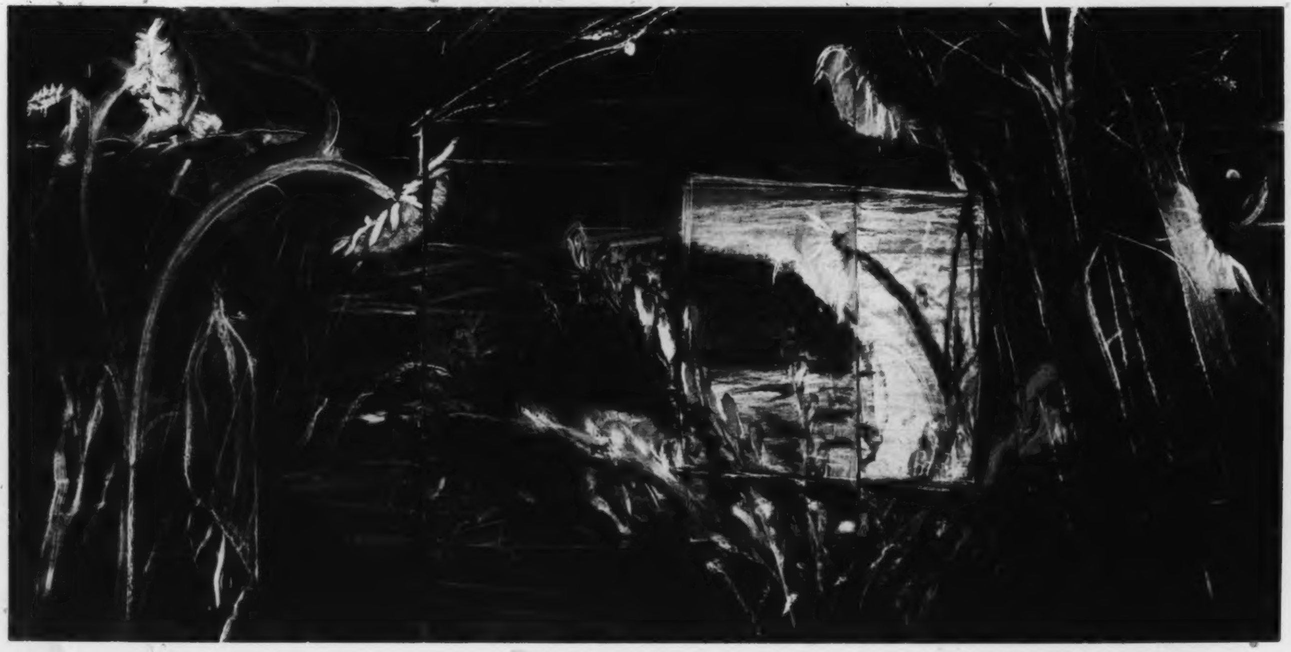
Sculpture in Bronze
May 11–June 11
Catalogue available

Arman with "Braque 1912". 10 x 16 inches, bronze, cast of 8

Marisa del Re Gallery 41 East 57 NY 10022 (212) 688-1843

See us at the Chicago International Art Exposition Booth 3-119

MICHAEL MAZUR IS REPRESENTED BY BARBARA MATHES GALLERY.



MICHAEL MAZUR
Wakeby Night Study I
1982-83
Pastel over monotype
47 x 94⅝ inches

BARBARA MATHES GALLERY
851 Madison Avenue New York NY 10021 212/249-3600

VOL
7
1

ISS
5

MY 1983

UMI

MIRÓ

A CELEBRATION

90

YEARS

SCULPTURE AND MIXED MEDIA

MAY 10-JUNE 11

PIERRE MATISSE
GALLERY
41 EAST 57
NEW YORK

◂— Personage, 1975
Bronze, 28 x 13 x 5 inches

VOL
71
ISS
5
MY 1983
UMI

We are pleased to announce our new location beginning mid-May 1983 at 13
White
Street
212 966 5090

BETTE STOLER GALLERY

To inaugurate the gallery there will be an exhibition of new sculpture

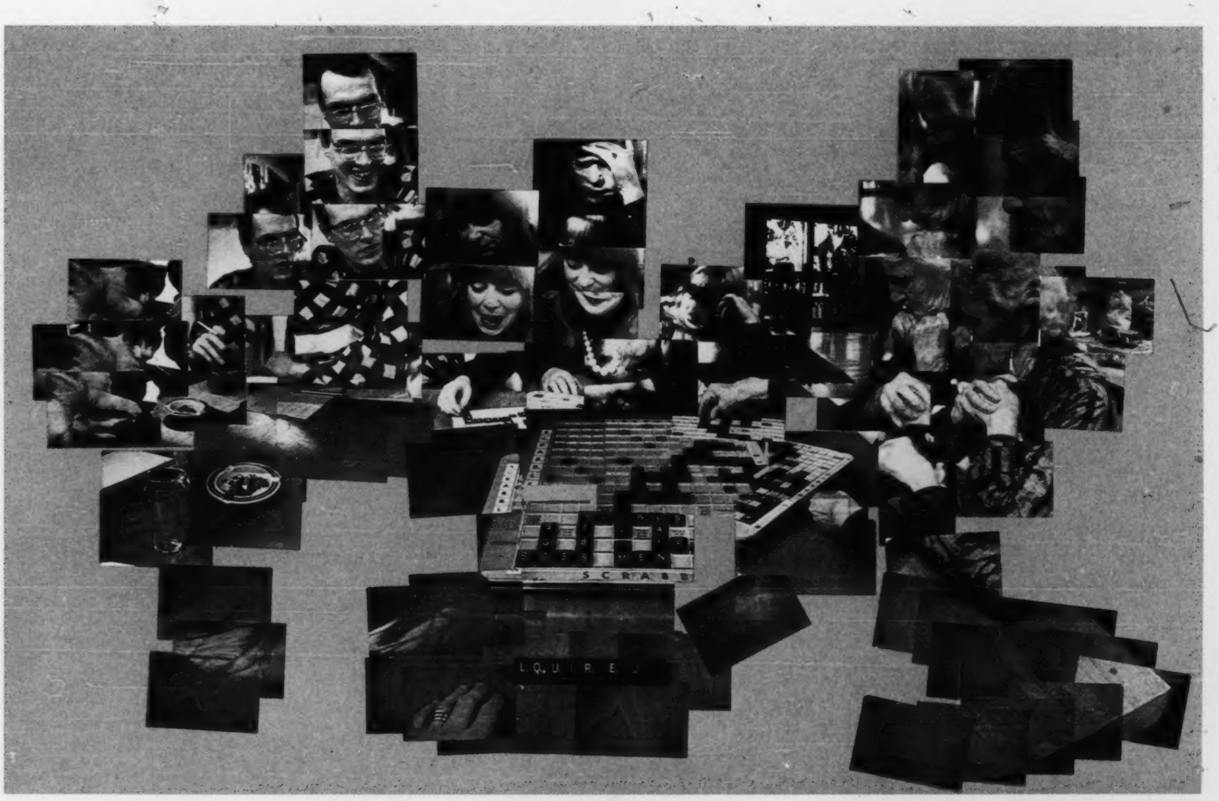
John Duff
James Ford
Nancy Grossman
Christopher Sproat
Ursula von Rydingsvärd
Steve Wood

DAVID HOCKNEY



The Scrabble Game, Los Angeles, January 1, 1983. Photographic collage, 39 x 58 inches. © David Hockney 1983. Edition 60.

Photographic Collages

PETERSBURG PRESS
17 East 74 Street New York · 59A Portobello Road London

VOL
7
1

ISS
5

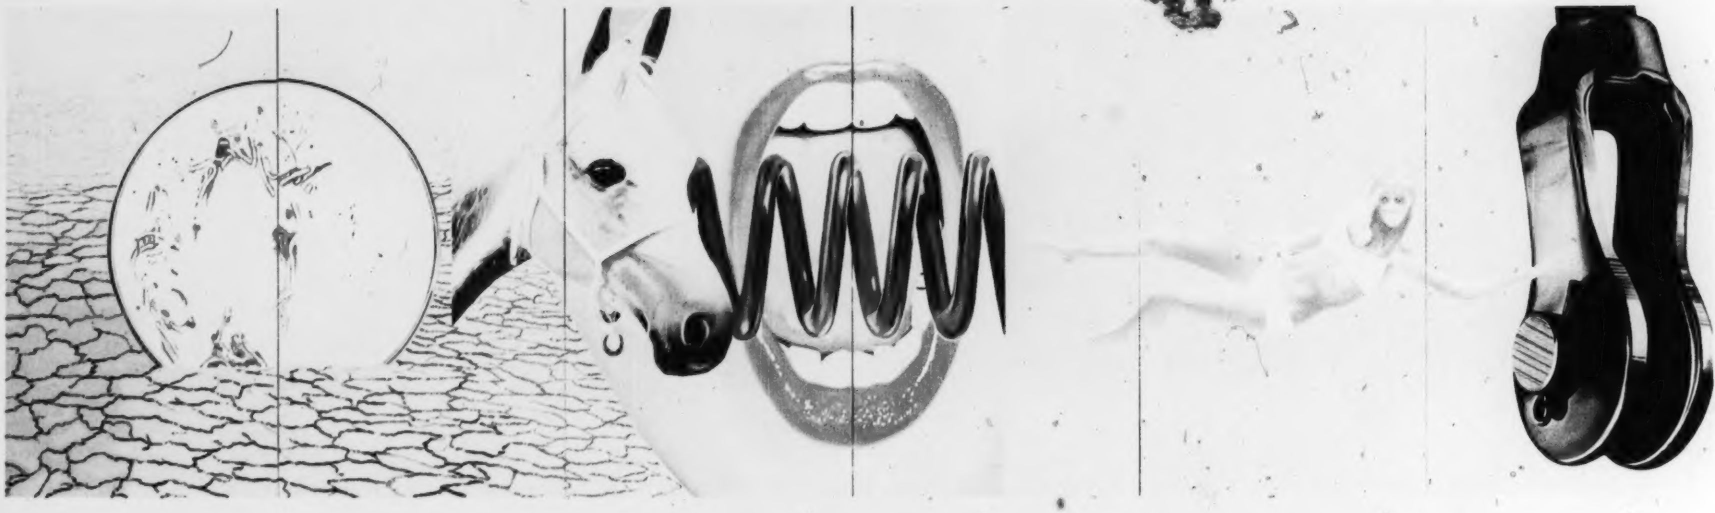
MY

1983

UMI

NOGUCHI

THE PACE GALLERY 32 EAST 57 NY



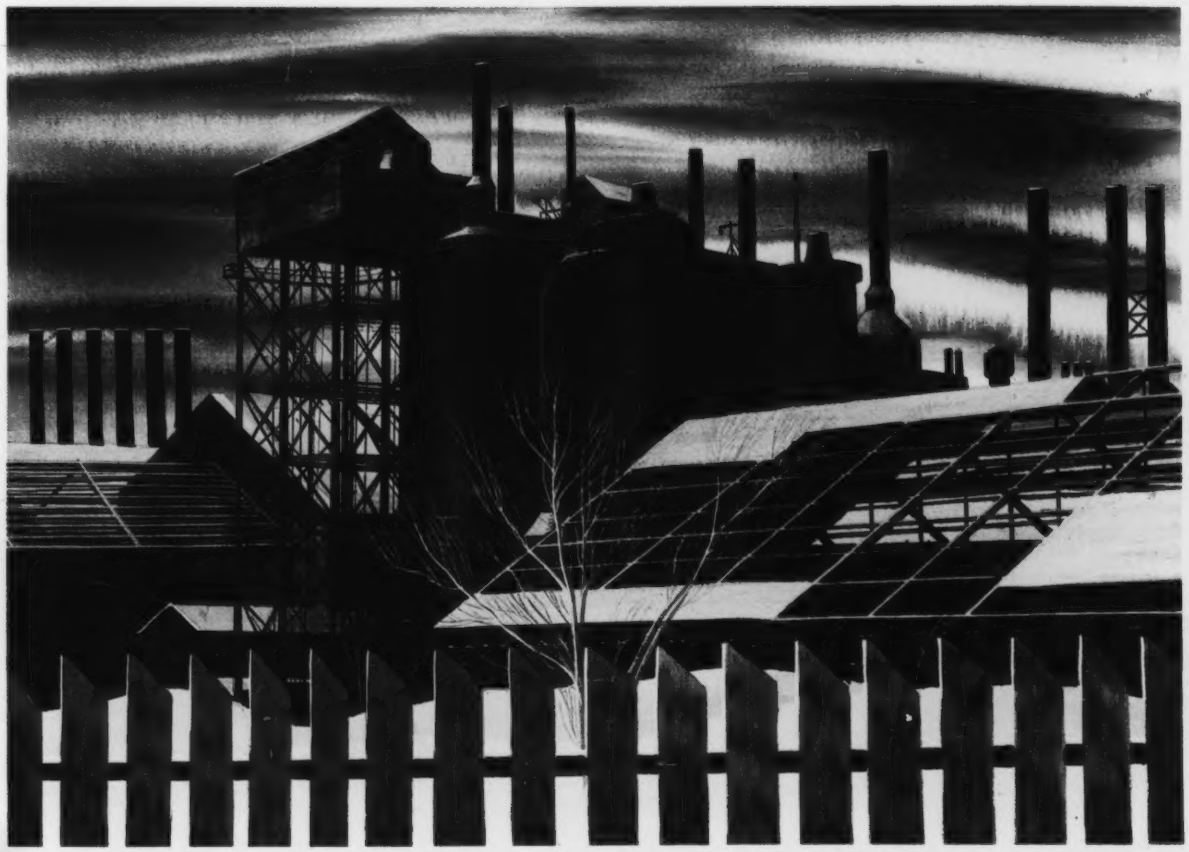
James Rosenquist, "Just Desert", 1978, Acrylic auf Leinwand, 213 x 731 cm (6-teilig)

GALERIE RUDOLF ZWIRNER
ALBERTUSSTRASSE 18
5 COLOGNE 1
49 (221) 23 58 37

GALLERIA PAOLO SPROVIERI
3, PIAZZA DEL POPOLO
ROME
39 (6) 361 09 75

ARP BALLA BRAUNER DUBUFFET ERNST FONTANA FAUTRIER YVES KLEIN
LEGER MAGRITTE PICABIA PICASSO SCHWITTERS STELLA TWOMBLY

VOL 71
ISS 5
MY 1983
UMI



Edmund Lewandowski (b. 1914)
Deserted Old Steel Mill
Watercolor and gouache, 18½ x 26 inches
E. D. Lewandowski 1940, lower right center

JAMES MARONEY incorporated

129a East 74th Street, New York, N.Y. 10021 (212) 879-2252
Church Street, Roxbury, CT 06783 (203) 354-6783

Review of Books

Texts and Contexts

Four diverse publications—ranging from an anthology of 19th-century criticism to a scholarly festschrift—provoke some comments on the function and circumstances of art writing.

BY DONALD B. KUSPIT

The Art of all Nations, 1850-1873: The Emerging Role of Exhibitions and Critics, selected and edited by Elizabeth Gilmore Holt, Princeton University Press, 1981; 606 pp., $32.50 cloth, $8.95 paperback (Doubleday).

Focus on Art, by Werner Spies, New York, Rizzoli, 1982; 280 pp., $14.95 paperback.

The Visual Arts: A History, by Hugh Honour and John Fleming, Englewood Cliffs, N.J., Prentice-Hall, 1982; 639 pp., $30.

Art The Ape of Nature: Studies in Honor of H.W. Janson, edited by Moshe Barasch and Lucy Freeman Sandler; coordinating editor Patricia Egan, Abrams and Prentice Hall, 1981; 814 pp., $75.

These critics of an earlier day seem to have had it easier. Apparently not subject to the pressures of space, they could take their time, expound at length on individual works of art, lay out theoretical issues fully, and create an aura of well-roundedness. This came with the advantage of viewing regularly Salons and grand international exhibitions. Comparisons, the springboard for judgment, were readymade; the politics of the exhibition were self-evident; and the general sense of having missed nothing—which didn't mean one wanted to treat everything—made for a certain self-confidence in comprehension. Not that the critic wasn't caught up in the same complex, ambiguous role that he is today: part analyst, part polemicist, and part publicist. But his interpretative reporting wasn't subsumed by the idea of public relations; he could be more the respondent to new art than its advance man.

Moreover, the cult of celebrity had not obscured the meaning of cultural achievement. The market had not yet absorbed both artist and critic, making them instruments for the growth of capital. Criticism was nothing like the cosmetic embalming that it has become in certain quarters. The compulsion to keep up—which goes hand in hand with the need to make a new market, have a new fashion, each year—had not yet become a common vice. It seemed possible to have enthusiasm which did not degenerate into irony, detachment which could develop into perspective, and spiritual expectations which art might satisfy. Criticism was not yet matter-of-factly instrumental. Independence of judgment was still an ideal, informing the pursuit of quality and clarity. In sum, criticism could be a form of aspiration.

